

A Very Mixed Week Of Weather Ahead + Could It Still Turn Colder & Wintry With Snow Later & When/How . . .

After a fairly settled and dry start to the week and on Monday, an expected area of rain and strengthening winds in places will turn things much more unsettled and push across our shores from the south-west and west of the country by early Tuesday and bring some heavy showers and supporting and increasing winds, particularly in some western parts of the country and Ireland.

However, as we also covered in our last updates on this below and for around November 24th, there will also be an increasing risk of some of these expected unsettled conditions to turn potentially wintry and to snow across higher ground in the north from Tuesday evening and into Wednesday and possibly even Thursday on current indicators.

https://www.facebook.com/share/p/1FZCnN7svz/

On and beyond these days, for elsewhere will then bring a good mix of sunshine and showers as fronts continue to bring the threat of rain, particularly in western parts of the country and Ireland.

Beyond later next week then becomes a little more complicated on the basis of the 'current' model runs for the situ of high pressure across the north and any infiltrating colder conditions or colder nights along with any expected precipitation or rain bands/weather features and how they could interact and even turn wintry or to snow for between and around November 28th and December 5th/6th.

Additionally, this is something likely to be picked up upon from elsewhere and the main third-party models during this upcoming week as those unsettled and precipitation opportunities strengthen and shift considerably from where they are at present within the models over the coming several days (also as covered in our last updates on this below for these changes and expected dates on our part).

https://www.facebook.com/share/p/1FZCnN7svz/

Happy Saturday all,

James Madden, Exacta Weather

www.exactaweather.com

Copyright © 2010-2026 Exacta Weather - All Rights Reserved.