
A Little More Details For The Coming Weeks Cold & Snow Expectations Including Parts Much Farther South . . .

After another cold week with further and continuing wintry and snow showers still to come across at least higher ground and a colder than average November overall and on our part, we will see a 'temporary' shift to something 'less cold' and unsettled, with rain and showers for many to begin next week over a number of days.

However, it will still feel rather chilly and cold in the evenings and this will progressively enhance to induce more widespread frosts from ground frosts and frosts from further north earlier in the week and as the week progresses.

This will also pave the way for further cold conditions and enhancing wintry and snowy conditions during early December and in parts as far south as southern and south-east England and matching our 'several months ahead' and 'unchanged' reports for these same localities and dates of "late November and into early December" on our part. Additionally, some of the latest available third-party charts from both the GFS and ECM would see snow falling in parts of the far south of the country on or just after those dates of 6th December at present.

This is also something we still think could shift forward and improve between now and then in favour of widespread snow and cold due to certain and quite reliable meteorological factors and earlier atmospheric disturbances, and it is also important to remember they will vary from run to run at present and the ECM is a little behind the GFS presently for these dates.

That should silence those who don't have the ability to forecast cold and snow from this far ahead and, just as with EVERY heatwave and storm or named storms for this year on our part and always ahead of elsewhere . . .

Please also feel free to check all our earlier and correct, digitally-dated and public domain claims on this in comparison to elsewhere and for those with short memories of this year's many' and correctly predicted weather events on our part:

The winter and snow are still coming from when we said it, and hopefully this clears up any confusion arising from elsewhere . . .

Kind regards and take care for now,

James Madden, Exacta Weather

PS: I am also going to be a bit busy over the coming days due to medical appointments and attending the hospital for further investigation into the Lesion AV Malformation issue on my brain, so nothing is up in terms of the weather expectations on our part and I will just be a bit preoccupied and will post as and when I can.
