A New Paid Family Caregiving Page

One of the most significant additions is a dedicated page about paid family caregiving.

Many people already help a relative with everyday needs without realizing that eligible family members may be able to become paid caregivers for approved services. Others have heard about the possibility but do not know where to begin.

The new page introduces this opportunity, explains that eligibility and program requirements apply, and directs interested visitors to our office for more information. A new video featuring Rachel helps explain the subject in a conversational way.

Staff can share this page with someone who wants to learn more:

Please refer individual eligibility questions to the office. The page opens the conversation; determining whether an arrangement qualifies requires further review.

A Growing We Care Library

Our We Care Library continues to expand with practical articles for individuals, families, and others involved in caregiving.

Topics address situations people recognize: a loved one insisting “I’m fine,” family members struggling to agree about care, changes in memory, deciding how many hours of assistance are needed, and the challenges that arise when an older adult stops driving.

These articles help families think through difficult situations and prepare for useful conversations. They also give staff information worth sharing when a topic comes up.

Helping Visitors Know Who We Are

Updates to our team information and other website content help put people behind the agency’s name. Families are inviting assistance into their homes. Knowing more about the organization and the people coordinating that assistance can help them feel more comfortable contacting us.

Help Us Keep Improving

Our staff hear the questions families ask and see the concerns they face. That experience can help us make the website more useful.

Please let the office know if you notice outdated information, a link that does not work, or a question the website should answer. Suggestions for future We Care Library articles are welcome, too.

Visit nhhomecare.net, explore the updates, and become familiar with the resources available. The next time someone asks about home care—or whether caring for a family member could become paid employment—you will know where to direct them.
