Delivery Industry

The global medical supply delivery service market size was valued at USD 54.8 billion in 2019 and is expected to grow at a compound annual growth rate (CAGR) of 6.5% from 2020 to 2027. The growing need for quick transportation and delivery of drugs and medical supplies at the time of emergencies are the key factors driving the growth of the market. Furthermore, increasing focus on improving the healthcare system and reducing supply chain costs are some other factors increasing the demand for delivery services. Expansion of healthcare logistics and increasing demand for faster and cost-effective delivery of samples and specimens for testing purposes is promoting the growth of the market. Pharmaceutical and medical device companies are using third-party delivery services to transport their products to reduce their supply chain costs.

The adoption of medical drones is providing opportunities to improving healthcare services, especially in remote and underserved environments by enabling just-in-time delivery services, reducing costs for routine prescription care, and decreasing turnaround times for lab testing. Many companies are developing medical drones to provide better patient care at remote locations and emergency cases. This is anticipated to improve medical care capabilities at the time of emergencies. For instance, TU Delft has developed an ambulance drone installed with lifesaving equipment. This drone will be helpful at the time of situations such as heart failure, traumas, and respiratory issues. Furthermore, the use of medical drones is significantly increasing in the pharmaceutical sector, owing to the ability to deliver drugs in remote locations at a relatively faster pace. These drones help in transporting drugs during severe circumstances such as disasters or medical emergencies. Many countries have used drone services in the COVID-19 pandemic to deliver drugs and devices in containment zones across the world.

On the other hand, the market for medical supplies delivery services is affected by the lack of proper infrastructure. Many emerging countries lack the infrastructure and logistics necessary for the efficient transportation of medical devices and pharmaceutical products through drones and courier-based services. Healthcare logistics requires heavy investments and developing countries lack such investments. This has negatively impacted the market since the major challenge for healthcare logistics companies is to maintain the integrity of the drugs and devices throughout the transportation, which is difficult with improper infrastructure.
