New internship opportunities for Canadian students will lead to skills development, jobs

Pilot program will allow colleges and polytechnics to participate in newly expanded work-integrated learning placement program

When Canada's college and polytechnic students have the opportunity to learn in a hands-on work environment, they build the real-world skills and connections they need for the good middle-class jobs of today and tomorrow.

Today, during her address at Colleges and Institutes Canada's annual conference in Victoria, British Columbia, Kate Young, Parliamentary Secretary for Science, announced a new pilot program that will allow colleges and polytechnics to work with businesses and not-for-profit organizations to send students into the workforce.

The new pilot program expands on an existing Mitacs initiative that has a proven track record of supplying students with new skills and training opportunities. The program announced today builds on last year's federal budget commitment of $221 million over five years, to 2020-21, to help Mitacs create 10,000 new paid internships per year for Canadian students. These internships help students boost their chances of employment by giving them valuable on-the-job training and experience.

In her remarks, Parliamentary Secretary Young also outlined many of the research investments the Government of Canada announced in Budget 2018, including the largest investment in discovery research in Canadian history. In addition to this investment, the budget proposed a significant increase in funding for programs that support students and faculty at Canada's many colleges and polytechnics.
