GERALD DAVID PEDROS
PERIPHERAL

'As our eyes grow accustomed to sight they armour themselves against wonder.'
- Leonard Cohen

Michelangelo's David, Manet's Olympia, Schiele's Fighter, De Kooning's Woman—the nude is a subject firmly entrenched in the history of art, and as a genre, one of the most representative means of depicting a particular moment within history while functioning as a powerful vehicle for political and social change. Figure painting has come to be seen as hopelessly out of date and is once again under threat, with references to prurience, sensationalism and the spectacle overriding the importance of assessing its interpretations as essential to the ethical dimension of humanity. This outcry begs the question, what are the connotations of our 'shells' and the highly politicized nature of their portrayal? Furthermore, what are the affirmations of the nude in a contemporary Western Culture that is rife with ambiguity, censorship and confusion surrounding decorum and boundaries?

For Gerald Pedros, a series begins with questions, then an idea that leads to a progression and a rapid unpacking as the artist works through the subject. Unpredictable, exceedingly curious and energetic, at 66 Pedros has reached a stage in his lifelong career as an artist where he wants less and less to do with the familiar. Peripheral vision, which is the vision outside the very centre of our gaze (and the opposite of tunnel vision) began as the inspiration for Pedros' most recent collection, aligning both his eye and hand to create optical and tactile qualities in a body of work sensory to our peripheral.

A source of fascination with what is a notoriously weak capability in humans in determining detail, colour and shape, Pedros' interest in vision emerged at a cultural moment when it is pivotal that we ask ourselves what we see, what we infer from what we don't see, what is being hidden from our direct line of sight and why. The compositions in this body of work entertain a certain measured stillness in the peripheral perspective. Forms become snapshots of a sideways glance, where the awareness of a protruding or deformed limb, a face unrecognizable due to our limited range, or a lurking, shadowy figure, reveal scenes propagated within a collective imagination so desperately looking for visual coordinates, but whose vision is obscured.

One cannot assume that because Pedros' subjects are depicted with a shifted perspective that his world is illusory; his subjects possess rather ordinary proportions that deviate from the Classical, delectable, idealized figure and are a revision to a more primitive, loose style. This Fauvist approach to the form, exercises an emphasis on the simplification of the shapes and parts that comprise the body. Pedros utilizes this method in defiance of a strictly literal representation that can often be seen as self-conscious or fraudulent, allowing the viewer to be freed from the limitations of Realism, opening the door to interpretation while nurturing an images ability to carry varied implications.

Colour functions as a vehicle in this approach, as in works such as Untitled 13 where pure form and colour meld in a way that is not directly representational, but expressive. Our peripheral vision and its limitations on the range of colours we see, is distilled in the specific hues applied in these works. Extreme periphery of the retina, in fact, does not see colour. At a particular range in our peripheral vision, the eye is no longer able to see blue, at an even wider range, the eye begins to be unable to see red, and so on.

Acrylic applied in full, wet dabs onto the Mylar has its own effusive flow, bleeding out, bruising and mapping itself across the transparent flesh of the figures. Pedros manipulates the paint by blocking it off or diverting it, in instances consciously censoring a face, breasts and genitals as discernable identifiers of the subject, or in works such as Untitled 8, alluding to a foundational symbol of inflicted suffering by brushing a crucifix of dark navy pigment over a naked female figure—trapped symbolically, with arms splayed in retribution.

The way in which the form is conveyed from the peripheral has no intention of communicating explicit detail, as in Untitled 5 where the approach to expressing the form recalls blind drawing: the process of sketching the contour of a subject without looking at the paper, reducing the image to an outline in one swift, continuous stroke on the page. Body parts become augmented, distorted and caricaturesque—a calf appears swollen, a hand transforms into an oversized claw, the basis of skeleton, musculature and skin supporting and embracing the form loses its relevance and the eye seeks to repair the form back to an identifiable wholeness. Even the androgynous depiction of figures such as Untitled 19 produces a compulsion to ascribe gender as a category to limit our unease.

Pedros' subjects are sometimes playful, but even in the silliness of works such as Untitled 30 there is a silent, menacing quality—a secret at play. Three rakish men stand naked, facing forward, grins splayed across twisted faces; their nakedness, rather than being erotically potent, subverts any essence of machismo, and is oddly disconcerting. Men appear as simultaneously cowering and immense figures in Untitled 15 and Untitled 20, positioned so we can clearly see their sex, however their faces are cropped, debasing their masculinity and calling into question objectified portrayals beyond a realm that historically has been distinctly female.

Women, alternatively, are most commonly portrayed in confrontation with the viewer, as in Untitled 7 where the relentless gazes of the three figures are matched only by their unabashed nudity. Multiple identities of the same subject are presented as companions transparent, or silhouetted. These mythical, mysterious figures are the embodiments of their own narratives and each look carries a tension for what we don't know: who is the victim and who is the subject, what are the roles ascribed to them and what imposed identities do they reject or emulate?

Duality exists as a prevalent theme throughout this body of work, much as Sigmund Freud's theories correlate the link between sex and death, pleasure and pain, Pedros explores this notion in scenes depicting the melding of bodies, revealing a sort of convoluted aggression where the physicality of the forms appears at once, violent and intimate—opposing but not adversarial. The peripheral and its link to our defenses plays a key role in survival, and works such as Untitled 2, suggest a carnality that merge those extremes.

Conflating history through a contemporary lens sees the power of the nude in Pedros' paintings as a response to outside conditions and a reality lived by the artist. In a way, this collection eulogizes the nude in contemporary art, but is also an acknowledgement of the need for a re-examination and embrace of the genre both in conversation, and in Pedros' case, by exploring a new way of looking.
