

President Steps on his Tongue Again

Well the world has expressed its faux outrage over President Trump's statement concerning the source countries of immigrants. Yes, his language is out of bounds for a president, but let's remember, he said that in a private meeting and a "teacher's-suck-up" tattled. If you look past the language, the president's assertion is a valid one concerning the skill values brought to this country. Haiti's infrastructure, their education system, their health environment as compared to those of Norway, in the president's example, are not comparable in any degree. It is not casting aspersions on their citizens, but on the country as a whole. Expressing a desire to have immigrants with higher skill sets is not racist, unless of course you are a racist and looking for a fight. The question was posed by a reporter where would you rather live – in Norway or Haiti? If you are honest I can guess which country you would pick. The president's responsibility is to America and not to other countries. Even though Norway is a great country, I noticed these backward countries are not trying to emigrate there, nor Canada or Portugal. Why is that? Could it be we are dupes?
