Molico Relaunches Australian Aerospace Corporation

Molico has today announced the relaunch of Australian Aerospace Corporation, with a focus on further developing intellectual property relating to its electric air transport platform and small tactical UAS.

Following a downturn in business during COVID, Australian Aerospace Corporation was contemplating closure, but thanks to assistance from the Australian government it has now become part of the Molico group of companies.

Molico intends to maintain all current activities of Australian Aerospace Corporation, whilst adding a unique element of aerial imagery and videography to its own media business unit.

Mike Johnson, Group CEO, Molico said:

“The relaunch of Molico’s aviation business is a fabulous opportunity to offer added value to our existing clients, whilst also supporting the product development side of the business, including the SEAT™ electric air transport and Stuart™ small tactical UAS platforms. Molico is excited to develop the business into multiple markets and prove that an aerospace company can be a value adding asset to any organisation.”

Time will now be spent developing and incorporating unique product and service offerings into Molico's client catalogue, whilst seeking further investment to accelerate platform development.
