

Dungeness

We came across a place the sea could not haul back.
A gravel tide of huts clinging to the gorse in stern focus, sufficient, direct and not without charm. The town's off-grid reactor was being closed down.

We studied its redundant calculations:
pebble dash geometry of forgotten outbuildings;
and under a damp grey that hovers milkily, the sea. We fought through flights of shingle.
It felt like loitering.

A gull marks the grey above, a scratch on metal over a hazy film of industry. The power station glistening cold, a squint like an old dog relishes its role, a reputation that precedes; without it the beach would have a pier.

At the Pilot Inn Brenda deals in disinfectant, the radio blasting off last night;
sets scorching tea succinctly on coasters next to pictures of the food; whilst in the corner, somehow congruous, sits a television star and photographer to decorate him against the shore; because this place is not unconscious.

It sees its reflection in the guttering of things, in the damp gallery of salvage strewn like pagan relics on the beach, in the brown field sketches of homes tethered loosely together in the shadow of Vesuvius. Plant traffic beats up a smoke of grit: they're shoring up the shingle before the coastline is gone forever.

Helicopter

Flight is just a fling - I said
as we first twisted,
two pivoting feathers,
the ground falling away.

Even when teetering,
ahead the coast for miles
the cities trivial; hung here, like two hummingbirds hovering, the ground was prepared.

Some night, compelled to scoop you into whirling arms I'll hesitate, whisper you are safe and hoist you up into the rotor blades.

The Flat Upstairs

Recently, a soft piano tune of pee on water moves this house to waken. A splash of summer wine as familiar as the upstairs yawn when drenched from the shower
- - - she answers the phone.

Here is below a fabric of syllables, muffled and low, that settle like a gently intruding conspiracy of snow; barefoot in her element, honest as a broken chandelier, if only she could hear herself.

Framed is a partition of lives a constant, unflinching portrayal of what this is and was - underneath a warm roof of sex I sleep, his car parked outside, what can't be forgotten set in the stone of a retaining wall.

Laid out like a city sprawls she walks all over me, but later, as evening softens the din of the street, entwined we lie, inkblot copies through a paper floor as meaningless as our separate rental agreements.