

Dear Yudamek,

I'm writing to bring you up to speed on a developing situation.

The Verdant Pact was established after the Hannibal Site disaster, a catastrophic strike that eliminated several high-ranking internal VIPs, including Forrin Govansky. With funding left vulnerable and redirected to the highest bidder, Forrin's son, Darijn Govansky, secured the resources and formed Verdant Pact—a highly-trained, privately funded paramilitary organization. Distrustful of the security forces involved in Hannibal, including the Rilan authorities, Verdant Pact personnel have been trained with a singular focus: neutralize any threats to Govansky-controlled projects.

Since formally contracting with the SRR, Verdant Pact has been deployed to suppress uprisings and enforce royal decrees in contested territories. Their methods have consistently raised ethical and operational concerns.

The Verdant Pact demonstrates a willingness to blur—or outright ignore—the line between lawful engagement and extrajudicial action. While effective at suppressing rebellion, their tactics rely heavily on fear, intimidation, and loyalty to Govansky interests. Analysts caution that continued reliance on Verdant Pact forces risks destabilizing occupied territories and fueling long-term insurgency cycles.

Though their full capabilities remain uncertain, recent reports indicate they have employed a weaponized material gas, marking them as a priority target to subdue and remove from the war board.

Regards,
