

Monopoly

We can all remember when we played Monopoly with a new friend. Invariably the new person would have different rules. It happened more often than not. Sure, you could bring out the official rule pamphlet, but those rules were often discounted. The one thing we learned was not to play Monopoly with this person again.

Those people grew up. We all know professions in which the existing rules are changed. During the IRS investigation we saw the “rules” were changed for some. They were changed for only Tea Party members. That was outrageous. When I changed the “going steady” rule and took another to the prom, I was viewed as a real creep. Both examples show that the changing of rules can occur in a big major way or even in between just two people. It does not matter, in both cases outcomes was a loss of faith felt by the injured parties.

The same is true with Monopoly. When the rules are changed in the middle of the game that feeling in the pit of our bellies bubbles up. It is a feeling that we have felt. The feeling is uncomfortable and one emotional reaction is the falling of the drape of betrayal.

This election was a betrayal of our liberty, of our belief in honest play that we learned on the playgrounds of our youth. When rules are changed, when ballots are mailed out against existing laws we all sure a loss of faith in our political system. All those that were worried about being infected after leaving the supermarket to vote at the community precinct only needed to apply for a legal absentee ballot.

If we can't correct this in the next weeks then it will take generations to regain our faith and trust in our nation. The only way to correct this illegal vote is to simply not allow the returned mail out ballots to be counted. Those that played by the rules, voted in person or voted by absentee should not be forced to lose their legal vote by those that changed the rules. Those that break the rules should not benefit from the new rules. We were warned of the obvious potential of fraud before the mail out ballots were sent out. We all knew that changing the rules would not give us a good outcome. 95% of Republicans and 30% of Democrats know that this election was stolen. The idea of America will dissolve if this fraud is allowed to succeed.
