Protecting Horses Against Fires

Do you have a fire plan for your family? Do you have a fire plan for your horses? With the most recent wildfire disasters in the western U.S. and in the not-so-distant past here in Kansas, it is important to have an equine fire plan. In addition, it is important to understand what fires could do to exposed horses.

Steps to creating a fire plan for you and your horses:

1. Prevention

Whether you are a horse owner with a barn or boarding a horse at a facility, it is important to review the structure and items used in or around the facility/farm with fire safety in mind. You can begin assessing your barn today by double-checking electrical outlets for exposed wires and proper covering. Use GFCI outlets - near water sources. Prevent flammable material from collecting around outlets (like hay and stall bedding). Barns and farms use a lot of electricity and outlets for multiple purposes depending on the time of the year; therefore it is imperative not to over-use circuits (especially too many plug-ins on one outlet). Consult with your local fire department and an electrician to provide additional insight.

Along with reviewing electrical hazards, materials that are highly flammable should be stored in safe locations. This would include hay stacked outside or next to the barn/pens, other flammable materials (cleaning agents, gasoline and isopropyl alcohol-aka rubbing alcohol), and dead organic debris stacked outside or next to the barn/pens (twigs, fire wood, dead trees, and bushes). Also, don't forget about the barn gutters, as embers can blow up into these areas. You should remove/clean debris from the gutters to prevent a source of fuel for a potential fire.
