

Weird and Freaky Nature: Margaret Curtis

Charlie was a caterpillar, striped and rather pretty,
He was munching on a cabbage leaf when he spied another critter.
This caterpillar was so delightful, with stripes not unlike his own,
So, he sidled up beside it to show off the smart features that HE owned.

He tried to get its attention, but it didn't want to know,
So, he slunk away to ponder - what was to be his fate he moaned.
He munched a few more cabbage leaves, for a few more days indeed,
Then went searching for the caterpillar he had previously seen.

But when he arrived he got a fright, though a pleasant one maybe,
For no tube-like rounded caterpillar was anywhere on the scene,
But there at the place where the worm like creature had once been,
Was a butterfly, so beautiful it brought Charlie to his knees!
