

Live Debris Under the Sea

Plastic did not exist when mobile creatures first slid forth from the sea. Today's oceans spit forth garbage and yellow foam, reminding us that out there beyond view swirl currents thick with plastic and other waste. Origin of life and symbol of the subconscious, the ocean compels us to face our garbage. Look deep into the seaweed of our subconscious and seek out the sources of our darkest tendencies. Plastics or people-- we reject and discard, hate and disregard, both in much the same way. It is in this deeply-rooted habit of thoughtless disposal that waste can help us to understand why humanity is plagued by violence, rejection and inequality. By touting the value of our material waste, Live Debris aims to help people also find value in some of the ideas or people that we may reject.

The plastic seats in this installation were made for sitting. Please have a seat. But I ask that, when you do, spend a moment considering what swims there in the swirling eddies of your subconscious.

Workshops . Commissions . Plastics counseling
Taylor Cass Stevenson
livedebris@gmail.com
www.livedebris.org

Plastic Seats (Seat Anemone and Seat Foam)

Discarded berry containers

Octopuseat

Light made from seafood nets

Bread tabs melted into a container lid

Re:Vision Gallery's invite