The Men and Women of November

Late on that November night
Speckled stars aloft, and bright
The lone candle flame, it fluttered
And the sleeping dog, she muttered

The pines and maples were deeply dark
Their silhouettes so muted yet stark
And the age-old river they called the Grand
Washing the bedrock of time, it ran.

A poppy alone, down in the river
Loosed from a collar that night in a shiver
Off to the lake and then to the sea
Tracing the path of all that be

Quietly on that late autumn night
Came soft faint inklings of first light
Rising over sleeping town and land
Night now gone, the bugle call at hand

In the valley and down the hill
Was the cenotaph, weeping still
Fading memories of youth and war
Long gone stories, long gone lore

It was solemnly dark against the sky
A band of light, like red blood dye
With morning quiet still, as if to see
Forgotten memories of those that be

Near the fountain in the square
Stood the cannon's cold barrel stare
Pointing east up the long Main Street
Gunmetal black, then the rain and sleet

Over bridge and hill the silence filled
Deeds and names echoing the killed
Their spirits live, though lives do not
Sacred town soil marking their spot

And high up the sky, on both sides
Spires rise heavenward, two twin brides
Soon the town square is alive and filled
For this was the eleventh, forever stilled

Almost gone now were the leaves
With the harvest and the sheaves
The names were read one by one
Then the silence, then the gun.

They left the tomb and went up the hill
Walking slowly despite the chill
Each to a one tried to remember
The men and women of November
