It wasn't long before Raphael ended up on television, among the syndicated talk show greats. From 1983 to 2002, Raphael hosted over 3,000 episodes of television. She was the first woman to host an issue-driven talk show that featured participation from the audience (per People). The show was entertaining and made for good TV, but Raphael didn't always like it. It was especially hard at the end, when she was forced into the shock format that was being used by competitors. "The last years of doing those Maury Povich/Jerry Springer shows? I hated them," she told Oprah Winfrey on a special reuniting talk show hosts. "I was betrayed by some of the producers into doing that. Come to think of it, I should have fought harder for what I knew what right — what I knew that I didn't want to do." By March 2002, Raphael's talk show was canceled. She did return to radio from 2005 to 2008, but spent much of the years after her show as her husband's primary caretaker. Soderlund was living with Alzheimer's and Parkinson's, with his condition declining until his death in early August, 2020, at 90-years-old (per The U.S. Sun). The two didn't spend a day apart during their entire 57-year-long marriage. Sally has been on longer than most other talk shows and is sadly being removed from the air now due to the fact that she can't and won't stoop to the sideshow tactics used by others in the business. The fact is that when she isn't force to do sensationalist shows, she shows a great deal of heart and tackles major issues. She does great celebrity interviews and has a wonderful sense of honor. I, for one, will truly miss her and wish her luck. Hopefully she will find her way back onto television again in the near future.Sign in to rate and Watchlist for personalized recommendationsSign inSuggest an edit or add missing contentBy what name was Sally Jessy Raphael (1983) officially released in Canada in English?Answer Skip to contentContinue reading the main story More travails for SALLY JESSY RAPHAEL: Her 19-year-old son JASON SODERLUND, who was severely injured in an automobile accident in January, was involved in another car accident on Sunday. He was not seriously hurt, according to The Associated Press.

Mr. Soderlund was driving north on the Taconic State Parkway in Dutchess County when his car collided with one driven by Victoria Corbo, 39, of New York City. The police in Stormville, N.Y., said that Mr. Soderlund; his passenger, April Horowitz, 14 years old, and Ms. Corbo were taken to the Hudson Valley Hospital Center in Peekskill, N.Y., where they were treated and released. SALLY JESSY RAPHAEL'S 33-year-old daughter, Allison Vladimir, died accidentally from the combined effects of several prescribed drugs and over-the-counter medications, the coroner in Bucks County, Pa., announced yesterday. "The cause of death is respiratory arrest due to the combined adverse effects of medication she was taking," Dr. Thomas J. Rosko, the coroner, said yesterday in a telephone interview from his office in Doylestown, Pa. Dr. Rosko would not divulge how many different drugs Miss Vladimir had taken before she was found unconscious in bed early Sunday in a private home behind a bed-and-breakfast inn owned by her mother, the television talk-show host. The daughter of the talk-show host SALLY JESSY RAPHAEL was found dead early yesterday morning in her mother's bed-and-breakfast inn in Pennsylvania, just three weeks after Ms. Raphael's son Jason (J.J.) Soderlund was seriously injured in an automobile crash. Ms. Raphael's daughter Allison Vladimir was found dead in bed at the Isaac Stover House in Tinicum Township, the Bucks County District Attorney, Alan Rubenstein, told The Associated Press.

The house facing the Delaware River is owned by Ms. Raphael, the host of the syndicated show "Sally Jessy Raphael." Erwinna is about 10 miles north of the art colony of New Hope. Ms. Vladimir, 33 years old, of White Plains, was declared dead on arrival at Doylestown Hospital, Mr. Rubenstein said. State police in Dublin said they were investigating the death but gave no additional details yesterday morning. Officials said there were no signs of foul play, nor did it seem likely that Ms. Vladimir had overdosed on medication she took to relieve back pain.

Dr. Thomas J. Rosko, the county coroner, said the autopsy did not show any apparent heart damage. He said he would learn more from further toxicologic tests. "Suicide is always a possibility in cases like this," Dr. Rosko said. "But I don't have any evidence of that. I would say it is likely to be due to natural causes." Ms. Vladimir was one of two daughters Ms. Raphael had with her former husband, Andrew Vladimir, an advertising executive. Ms. Raphael is now married to Karl Soderlund, a former television producer. A spokeswoman for Ms. Raphael said that she was unavailable for comment but that a statement would be issued today. On Jan. 11, Mr. Soderlund, the youngest of Ms. Raphael's eight children, was in a near-fatal car accident about 60 miles north of New York. Mr. Soderlund, 19, regained consciousness after six days and is still hospitalized with leg, rib and facial injuries. If Paris, that judgmental Trojan, were around today, he would no doubt take on the assignment of choosing which of the three daytime talk show graces -- Sally Jessy Raphael, Joan Rivers and Oprah Winfrey -- gets the platinum apple. All have established themselves in a field once dominated by men. In New York, Ms. Winfrey reigns in the afternoon; Ms. Raphael is queen of the morning, and although Ms. Rivers is not up there with the ratings royalty, she keeps rolling along. What are their appeals? The love-besotted Paris would be gratified to note that all offer romance of a sort. Among Ms. Raphael's contributions in July were "Married Men Who Act Like They're Single," "Cheating Wives" and "Gay Men in Search of Rich Lovers." On one show, Ms. Raphael (who can be seen at 10 A.M. on Channel 7, where she enjoys the spillover from the popular "Live With Regis and Kathie Lee" program), brought on young men who, in their search for foreign wives (they say they don't like American women) resorted to catalogues from abroad describing available foreign women.© 2023 The New York Times Company If you tuned into daytime television on any given weekday between October 1983 and May 2002, you're probably familiar with host Sally Jessy Raphael and her signature red glasses. She was a staple within the talk show genre for 19 seasons. But in recent years, Raphael remained under the radar, as she cared for her husband Karl Soderlund who passed away in August 2020 due to complications from his five-year battle with Alzheimer's and Parkinson's Disease. A close family friend told the Daily Mail that Soderlund "never lost his brilliant sense of humor" as he lived out his final days at their family farm in Dutchess County, N.Y. "They had a wonderful 57 years together and literally never spent a day apart," the friend said. "Karl was known for his warmth and kindness, as well as his wicked sense of humor. He was loved by all. Sally is asking for privacy during this difficult time as she mourns her beloved husband." In June 2020, Raphael took to Twitter to celebrate her husband's 90th birthday. "When I married Karl, he was 5 years my senior," she wrote. "Somehow, over 60 years, my Peter Pan husband has remained forever young and handsome! Happy 90th birthday to the love of my life – so glad we can finally be together with loved ones to celebrate your amazing life!" While Raphael hasn't had her own talk show in nearly 20 years, the former host hasn't been afraid to speak out about her showbiz experiences. Before Sally Jessy Raphael became her husband's primary caretaker in the final years of his life, the talk show host faced her own health battles, as she secretly fought cancer during her last days on-air. In fact, Raphael believes her honesty was the reason producers chose not to renew her show. "All they needed was a 60-year-old that might have cancer," she told the Daily Mail in 2019. "I was stupid enough to tell them." As part of Oprah Winfrey's Where Are They Now? series (per HuffPost), Raphael told the fellow talk show icon that, while some staffers thought she knew about the show's impending cancellation, she was just as shocked. "[Network executives] told us that the show was going to go on," Raphael added. "We had 250 employees. Some of them said, 'Sally, now, we need to know if we're going to be renewed. I want to buy a house. My wife and I want to be pregnant.' Within two months — after they bought their house or got pregnant or whatever — I had to go in front of the entire crew and staff." Yet while Raphael's been heralded as a pioneer in her field, as she was the first woman to headline a talk show that focused on human interest and hard-hitting news items, Raphael's primarily proud of how many lives she touched and changed over the years. "How can you not be slightly tickled by having people love you?" Although Sally Jessy Raphael's career was bookended by radio gigs — she briefly revived her old radio program Talknet with SiriusXM — the host will always be known for her syndicated daytime talk show. If it'd been up to her, however, this groundbreaking hit never would have stooped to the same level as her sensationalist competitors Maury Povich and Jerry Springer during its last years. Despite being the "first female to host an audience-participation, issue-drive talk show," as People noted, producers forced the host to mirror the subjects of her male contemporaries so the shock value might jumpstart ratings. "The last years of doing those Maury Povich/Jerry Spring [sic] shows? I hated them," she told Oprah Winfrey in 2016 (via People). "I was betrayed by some of the producers into doing that. Come to think of it, I should have fought harder for what I knew what right — what I knew that I didn't want to do." As Raphael told the Daily Mail, she thinks she was goaded into making said changes because she valued her reputation as someone who was easy to work with, and the producers knew they could convince her to embrace the stereotypical paternity reveal that has become synonymous with talk shows of the '90s. "What strikes me, on those shows, 'Who Is Your Baby Daddy?'... It's extremely demeaning," she added. But Raphael need not worry, for her iconic eyewear will always outshine any such missteps. Just as Sally Jessy Raphael became a fixture of the syndicated daytime talk show lineup throughout the '80s and '90s, her signature red glasses also made an indelible mark on the genre. Early in her career, veteran journalist Hugh Downs advised Raphael to be normal. "He told me, 'People last in broadcasting by blending in, by being part of the scene,'" she recalled (per the Daily Mail). "Hugh said to be mild if you want a long career in broadcasting. People want people like them." However, she was destined to stand out and her free glasses were the ticket. "Glasses were expensive, everyone knows that," Raphael told Today in 2017. "They were offering me a Pap smear and an eye test and red glasses.

And I said, 'I'll take the red glasses.'" Yet, while producers weren't sold on the look, they ultimately had no choice. "When we started, I looked at the teleprompter and I said, 'I can't read that! I'm going blind!' she added. "I had to fight to have the glasses. Producers tried to change them. Those shadowy figures objected to everything." In the years since her debut, Raphael has amassed an extensive collection of glasses in her iconic color — nearly 200, to be exact. Although she never trademarked the look, Raphael's glasses will forever be synonymous with her legacy. Necessity is the mother of invention, after all, and in this case, it created a TV icon.
