Parent Tip of the Month

CONSISTENCY OVER PERFECTION

Children learn best when the world is predictable.
When expectations and consequences stay consistent, your child begins to understand what will happen next and what is expected.

Consistency doesn't mean perfection. Every parent has busy days, stressful moments, and situations where things don't go as planned.

What matters most is creating patterns your child can recognize over time.

For example, if your child is expected to clean up before getting a new toy, try to keep that expectation the same whenever possible.

Consistent responses also help children feel more secure because the environment becomes more predictable.

At home, focus on a few important expectations and try to respond to them the same way each time. Small, consistent moments throughout the day can make a big difference in learning new skills and building independence.
