"I live a dream in a nightmare world"

A Godly Concept

What is it about the human animal that makes us such animals? The more we strive to become civil the more animalistic is our behavior. I remember at the University at a round table someone asking openly. Where is God? Then the question was turned to each individual. Most people pointed up. Others to their hearts. Yet others dismissed the concept as a psychological entity that is the bounding glue that keeps civility alive. Without it. We be nothing but animals in a kingdom govern by instinct.

Religions across the spectrum all share one common element and that is the need the fulfillment of believing... that this system of belief brings them hope and an unmatched advantage over all other.

Once again... where is God?

I guess if the above stands to be true...as by his own scriptures at least those of interpretations by scholars. God made man in his image. If so then God is within us and if so...then technically we are Gods in charge of our own destiny.

Interesting as if this stands to be true. The question remains why do so many feel the need to follow any particular religions (system) of belief?

Another interesting question that can be easily dismissed by allocating the thought of the human psychic as nothing more than a front in order to keep us civil in a world that keeps us confused. After all, religion does serve as a crutch and a means to an end. The ever thought of being good and going to heaven. The belief that if one serves in the flesh he will be repaid in the after life with some super human reward.

All religions hold these beliefs... Even non believers as, non believers are so blinded by opposing religion that within their own opposition create a system of faith.

We as human animals are easily influenced. Easily controlled. We are manipulated by fears and phobias that keep us harmoniously in sync with the status quo of the day. Change does not come easy to society as change requires sacrifice and the ability to venture into the unknown. A factor in the human factor that is the root cause for seeking faith.

We fear death as it is an unknown so we turn our live to God as without any proof. God promises to mentally nourish us and guide us as well as take care of us in the after life.

Comforting to most. Understanding this basic human psychological element one can begin to understand modern day politics. Modern day social acceptances. Modern day.

It appears that the status quo is the norm. It appears that in modern times we reward the weak and deceptive as we reflect our own incompetences and find comfort in others weaknesses.

Therefore we support their plight.

We are becoming weaker as a civilization due to the fears that have chained common sense to a platform social conformity. We are living in a society that it is easier to go with the flow then to stand up and be counted. Those that stand for change are denounced with labels and terminology that at one time were reserved for those that have molded society to benefit the weak.

God is not an ideology. God in my opinion is not a way of life.

God in my opinion is you and me. Living in a very hostile and complex world. A world that wants winners but reward losers. You don't believe me. Look at Canadian Politics. Who is our Prime Minister. How did he get there. In God we trust alright.... I trust me above all.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:

A Bizarro cartoon in many papers this week showed a person being told that if they were ill yesterday then today that would be a pre-existing condition. This leads to the assumption that it wouldn't be covered by any medical insurance. Although the Bizarro cartoons, as implied by their name, take an alternative look at life this may not be a joke to many people.

Many people have little or no insurance and what little they do have may only cover minimal costs for a short time. People should have access to free medical support and treatment but this is not a reality in many countries.

Another issue that is seen in recent times is the security of stored medical records and who can access them. If a perspective employer could see how many days a person had off at their last job and why then the chances of getting an interview may decrease irrelevant of ability and experience.

The enthusiasm for DNA testing for historical purposes may allow you to connect with distant relations although it could highlight possible genetic flaws and potential future illnesses. Many companies are starting to ask if you have had DNA testing and then require disclosure of potential outcomes which again may influence employment opportunities.

If we had free, adequate health coverage this cartoon would be just a joke rather than the medical system being the joke.
