The Project

Compassion in Crisis is a research project which explores and documents experiences of crisis which may have led to an unplanned admission to mental health hospitals and specialist units. It focuses on the experiences of autistic individuals, individuals with learning disabilities and or/both.

Who we are looking for

We, the researchers, are looking for 10 Surrey-based participants to join us for a research conversation and an optional follow-up focus group. Research conversations can be either in-person, online, by telephone, or by e-mail.

How to get involved

If you have an experience of a mental health crisis which may or may not have led to an unplanned admission to a mental health hospital or specialist unit, are autistic and/or have a learning disability, and are interested in participating, please email alex.hird@surreycoalition.org.uk
