

I'm not a robot!

Which one is correct attached herewith or herewith attached

Is attached herewith correct. How do you use attached herewith in a sentence. Which is attached herewith. When to use attached herewith.

I'm no great expert (first I heard of "speech-act" language), but I do write and deal with Contracts daily for close onto 40 years, and believe it sounds very inappropriate and uneducated to use such formal language to make a formal decree that you officially "attached" one document to another. Though indicating it is "attached" is helpful to identify the documents are associated, but the fact that you just now "attach said paper-to-paper" is insignificant, not in the least bit important or worth mentioning; it clutters the statement, distracting from the overall purpose or terms of the contract. Exaggerated Example to illustrate this point: "In the name of the Queen, with this my right hand, I do declare that I do pickup this pen and do hereby push the button on the top to extend the ball-point, ... bla-bla-bla." You should get the picture, the necessary and mundane details are irrelevant and not worthy of flowery legalese language; or as mentioned, is inappropriate use of "speech act" language. If you are not well versed in such formal usage, stick to normal conversational language (Plane English), it is usually my preference (when it works well) and recommended more these days, since it easily understood and does not appear to be flaunting intellectual superiority. Sincerely, Amender (2018-MAY-07) English has a few phrases that are pretty odd. One that you may have heard before is "attached herewith". Is this phrase correct or is it totally wrong to use it?

In this post, we will cover the answer to this question, as well as alternatives to this phrase. The phrase "attached herewith" is grammatically correct, but also redundant, as "herewith" means "with this letter". Saying "attached herewith" is simply saying that you have attached something twice, which is unnecessary.

It is better to use either "attached" or "herewith", but not both. You may have seen the phrase "attached herewith" in an email before, generally referring to some sort of attachment. But this phrase is redundant and pointless, even if it is technically correct English. "Herewith" is just an old way to say "with this letter" or "attached to this letter". That means saying "attached herewith" is actually saying "attached with this letter". That sounds right, doesn't it? But the phrase "with this letter" already implies that whatever you are talking about is attached to it. Here are some examples of using "attached herewith" in a sentence: Attached herewith is my resume for the interview. Attached herewith is the copy of the letter you requested. Attached herewith are the requirements for this project. Attached herewith are the documents you wanted from our last meeting. All of these are grammatically correct, but also wordy and dated. So if you aren't comfortable with "attached herewith", we've gathered some great alternative suggestions you can say instead of "attached herewith". Other Ways to Say "Attached Herewith" Other ways to say "attached herewith" are "attached below, enclosed within", and "please find attached". All of these say the exact same thing while also sounding much more modern and less outdated or complicated. No one will be confused with these phrases being used. There are some other options, but we'll go into all of them in detail further below. Attached Below In the vast majority of emails, attachments are underneath the text content of the email itself. So you can easily say "attached below" and then indicate whatever it is you have attached. If the attachment is in a different location, say, above the text, you could simply say "attached above" instead. Here are some examples of how you could use "attached below" in a sentence: Attached below are the documents you asked me to submit. You can find my resume attached enclosed. Within While this phrase is more of a holdover from the days of writing physical letters with envelopes, "enclosed within" can still be used with emails, on the logic that attachments are "within" the email itself. This makes for a proper synonym phrase that most everyone will understand. You can find a few examples of how to use "enclosed within" in a sentence below. Enclosed within is the sample essay that you asked for. Enclosed within this email is a report on last quarter's profits. Please find attached. This phrase is not only a good synonym for "attached herewith", but it also adds an element of politeness to the proceedings. It is a little formal, but it sounds better if you specify what it is you want the reader to find attached. Either way, it's a good option as an alternative to "attached herewith". Below are some examples of how to use "please find attached" in a sentence: Please find the information attached in this email. As to the reports in questions, please find them attached below. Attached is rather than going for any fancy lingo you can simply tell whoever is reading your email that something is attached to it. "Attached is (item)" gets the message across clearly without having to use a phrase like "attached herewith". Modern English favors being direct and concise, so it's a good alternative. Here are some examples of how to use "attached is" in a sentence: Attached is the submission form needed to go on the trip. Here's the email you have attached is the one I believe you should make to it. I've attached. This phrase is another way to simply tell someone the direction that there is something attached to the email. No need for "attached herewith" if you can just say "I've attached" whatever item is in question. Attached is the submission form needed to go on the trip. Here's the email you have attached is the one I believe you should make to it. I've attached. This phrase is another way to simply tell someone the direction that there is something attached to the email. No need for "attached herewith" if you can just say "I've attached". Attached to Her is another synonym phrase for "attached herewith" that strives to simply be direct with one's words. You can just tell someone that something is attached to a message or email directly. It's a good idea to use this alternative, as it is direct and clear, and leaves no room for confusion. You can find some examples of how to use "attached to" in the sentences below. Attached to this email is the document we were discussing yesterday. The news article I want you to look at is attached to this message. I have Enclosed While it's a little more formal than some of the other alternatives, "I have enclosed" is a good substitute for "attached herewith". It's direct and uses words that sound like they are from this century, which is always a good thing. You can find some examples of how to use it in the sentences below. I have enclosed the money order in the envelope. I have enclosed the statistics report within this email. Attached Here As you may have determined by now, it's always better to use as few words as possible, while also being clear to everyone. "Attached here" is a good way to do that, as it is very straightforward about what you are saying. This makes it a suitable candidate to replace "attached herewith". Below are some examples of how to use "attached here" in a sentence: Attached here are all of the required documents for this submission. You can find the rough draft for my novel attached here. Attached Herewith or Herewith Technically, both "attached herewith" and "attached herein" are correct, but it depends on the exact context of your message. "Herewith" means "with something" while "herein" means "in something". So basically, it all depends on if you feel "attached with" or "attached in" is more appropriate. For instance, is an email attachment with an email or in an email? There is some debate on this, so it really comes down to personal preference in most cases. That said, one could argue that an attachment does indeed come "in" an email, as opposed to "with" it, like a separate message. Either way, most people don't know the difference and see "herewith" and "herein" as effectively interchangeable, despite their slight differences in meaning and context. Here are some examples of both of them being used appropriately in a sentence: Attached herewith is the money owed from the loan you gave me. Here's the envelope; the money you are owed is attached herein. The documents requested by the committee are attached herewith. I've attached a folder to this message; the photos you're looking for are attached herein. Ultimately, deciding between "herein" and "herewith" is mostly a matter of preference that mostly comes down to semantics. Most people will view either option as being identical in practice, as the meaning of the phrase is easily understood regardless. Martin holds a Master's degree in Finance and International Business. He has six years of experience in professional communication with clients, executives, and colleagues. Furthermore, he has teaching experience from Aarhus University. Martin has been featured as an expert in communication and teaching on Forbes and Shopify. Read more about Martin here. Hi everyone. Are they the same meaning? When you're sending an email to someone with attachment docs. Many thanks Good day! Attached here's my presentation later or Good day! Attached herewith is my presentation later.

December 4, 2019

To:
Mr. xxxxx
xxxxxx
xxxxxx

Sub: Application for Accountant Position

Dear Sir,

I am very happy to refer Mr. Rajesh, who recommended your name with a request that you're looking for an experienced Accountant for your firm.

I am currently associated with Vasantham Group, based at Perinthalmanna, handling Accounts, IT and Admin activities.

Please find attached herewith my resume for your kind consideration & necessary action.

Looking forward to hear from you soon.

Thanking You,

Yours Sincerely,

Kishore

End: CV

For me, 'herewith' is an extremely formal adverb which should be used rather carefully. It means 'along with' the document that you are about to mention. In the case that you gave, I prefer 'here' to 'herewith'. If you insist upon using 'herewith', you may need to have your sentence restructured: Dear Sir [or Madam], I am sending you herewith my PowerPoint slides which I shall use in my class presentation. Are they the same meaning? When you're sending an email to someone with attachment docs. Many thanks Good day! Attached here's my presentation later or Good day! Attached herewith is my presentation later. In modern English, "herewith" is rarely used outside of very formal writing and/or legal documents.

I wouldn't use it in an email in the way you're suggesting there. 'Attached is my presentation.' It is unclear what 'later' means here, by the way - do you mean 'below' (further down in the document?). Herewith does not mean along with. It means "with this" (herewith would mean "with that"). Its use is a throwback to the conventions of formal business correspondence that included the use of Latin terms such as "inst." and "ult." (this month; last month) and formalized phrases such as "please find enclosed herewith..." (meaning: I have included with this letter...). Many formal words are formed in the same way, such as: hereat, hereto, herein, hereby, heretofore, hereafter, hereupon; and similar compounds are made with here and where. Herewith does not mean along with. It means "with this" (herewith would mean "with that"). I am sorry for providing the original poster with, probably, an inferior definition which I found in the Collins English Dictionary. By the way, is it correct and natural to say "I am sending you herewith my PowerPoint slides"? Last edited: Aug 14, 2018 To be fair, the Collins definition (US version) actually says "along with this", not just "along with". Your line in red is fine, assuming you mean to use it in an email. Or you could say: I'm attaching (or I've attached) my PowerPoint slides.

* K. Narendhiran@IITJU To: 1995AGREEMENT-MISSIONS@LISTS.UNCCE.ORG
From: * K. Narendhiran@IITJU
Sent by: * Notifications
Email: notifications@lists.uncce.org
Under the 1998
* 1995AGREEMENT-MISSIONS@LISTS.UNCCE.ORG
* 1995AGREEMENT-MISSIONS@LISTS.UNCCE.ORG
CE-00-00
44 02 2019 18:08

Please find attached herewith the scanned copies of the Note Verbales related to the 1995 Agreement between the Government of India and the United Nations.

(E. Narendhiran
Country Economist
9 Rue du Valais, 1202 Geneva,
Tel: +41-22-9058 686,
Fax: +41-22-9058 686,

E-mail: k.narendhiran@iitjuliett.uncce.org Note Verbale GTH No. 2.415 PDF

But I don't think "sending" would sound right in a paper-and-envelope letter. By then, the letter would already have been sent and delivered and opened and read! Attached here's my presentation later I would never say "attached here". "Attached" means "physically connected to something". In this phrase, you are omitting the "something" and adding a meaningless place word "here". What you mean is "my presentation is in the file attached to this email". In emails, it has become common to omit "to this email" and just say "attached file(s)". The most common phrase is "My presentation is in the attached file". It is also acceptable to omit "file" and just refer to "the attached presentation" or "my presentation (attached)". The definition that I provided is "along with" the document that you are about to mention. Is it right? I don't quite understand your question. The definition of herewith is "with this" (or, if you prefer: along/together with this), where "this" is the document in which you're writing, not the file or whatever that you're sending with the document.