Bio

Ane Mulligan has been a voracious reader ever since her mom instilled within her a love of reading at age three, where she escaped into worlds otherwise unknown. But when Ane saw PETER PAN on stage, she was struck with a fever from which she never recovered—stage fever. She submerged herself in drama through high school and college. One day, her two loves collided, and a bestselling, award-winning novelist emerged. She lives in Sugar Hill, GA, with her artist husband and a rascally Rottweiler.

Historical fiction/Southern

Excerpt:

Sadie always says, "Southern women may seem as delicate as flowers, but we've got iron in our veins." And I believe her. After all, she's living proof—a lone Cherokee rose, whose thorns protect her better than any man could. Though older than my mama, she stepped into the role of friend the day I arrived in Rivers End as a new bride, and then later as mentor on the day my husband died. I long to be like her, but figuring out how to work around the prejudice against women working is the pickle. Sadie says she overcame it by pure meanness and tenacity, and that I need more vinegar.

Women's Fiction/Southern

Excerpt:

The morning fog was as thick as the pea soup Great-aunt Lola used to make. Claire hated that soup then and she didn't much like this fog now. A tourist could get lost and walk right into the lake on a day like this. She swished her hand back and forth in an impotent attempt to dispel it. It was a good thing Chapel Springs was small and she knew its topography like she knew her own face. Visibility was down to five feet if that. In the distance, the foghorn on Henderson's Island blew a warning.

Women's Fiction/Southern

Excerpt:

Of all the days to be late. Claire Bennett stormed up the boardwalk toward Dee's 'n' Doughs. Any other morning, the storefronts, with their brightly striped awnings, created a cheerful rainbow on Sandy Shores Drive. Not today. Skulduggery was afoot in Chapel Springs.

The bells clattered a loud jangle as she plowed through the bakery door. Patsy already occupied their favorite table by the window where, when the fog wasn't so thick, they could watch the lake and the board walk. Claire nodded hello and went to the counter for coffee. Normally, the aromatic bouquet made her mouth water and sent her taste buds into a frenzy of expectation. Today, all she tasted was bitterness.

Retail: Print: $9.99 e-Book: $3.99

282 pages

Women's Fiction/Southern

Excerpt:

Like shot pinball, Claire Bennett pinged against, around and between hordes of straw hats, bikinis, and plaid shorts. All along Sandy Shores Drive, shoulder-to-shoulder throngs of people crowded the sidewalk and spilled into the avenue. A party atmosphere—with noise level to match—permeated the quiet morning and their once peaceful village.

What had they done? When she and her friends envisioned the revitalization of Chapel Springs, it was a nice, controlled rise in tourist trade—not this craziness.

Chapel Springs Revival

ISBN: 978-1941103418 and ASIN: B01IFT9XLO

Retail: Print: $9.99 e-Book: $3.99

276 pages

Women's Fiction/Southern

Excerpt:

Claire Bennett couldn't remember when the tradition began—meeting her friends at the bakery, Dee's 'n' Doughs, before the workday started. It must have been after their nests had emptied, since none of them had any tag-alongs velcroed to their ankles. Whatever the cause, stopping for a chat and a hot cup of coffee got her creative juices flowing. Okay, maybe that was the caffeine and sugar, but she couldn't imagine life without her friends.

Excerpt:

"How are you, Mama? Is Daddy still treating you like a queen?" I leaned against the two-foot long kitchen counter. Affordable Manhattan apartments were miniscule compared to ... anywhere, but especially to home.

"He's a keeper, that's for sure."

I heard a "but" in her voice.

"Sweetie, I called for a reason." Yep, there it was.

"Are you between roles now? Can you come home?"

Between roles? Uh, yeah. Way between. I hadn't played so much as a walk-on since September and it was now November. I actually had to take a second job to pay my rent, which was due in—I flipped a calendar page on my tiny fridge—two days. I stifled a groan so Mama wouldn't hear.

Romantic Suspense

Excerpt:

Sienna O'Shea slammed the door of her red Volkswagen Beetle, trying not to slip on the icy patches in the parking lot. She hurried to the elevator for the Legislative Office Building and her dream job in New York's capitol. New York! Her heart kicked up its heels and she could hardly believe she'd made it. Her second day on the job and already she'd been assigned to testify before New York's Senate Judicial Committee. She might be a rooky at lobbying, but she'd show them.
