

Failure is good

Success is good but why do we say failure is better?

We must not let successes get to our head but also must not let failure consume our heart. Know that, sometimes, actually most times, things don't go as planned and that is perfectly fine.

For many people, it's easy to simply give up when things don't work out. But if there is one thing you shouldn't do it is just that: Do not give up ...because the reality is you're going to fail...a lot.

Failure is an opportunity. It's a chance to reevaluate and come back stronger with better reasoning

Failure is not fatal. No matter how hard it may be know that failure simply means you get another shot to try it all again.

Take failures as opportunities because you'll learn more in a single failure than in a lifetime of success. There are lessons in all our faults that are attempting to take us to our ultimate goal. Get going and trust the process.

Do one thing a day that will help your overall goal. It won't be perfect, but if you're persistent, the easier it will be to deal with failures along the way.

Each failure is simply a feedback of how to perfect our goal. Know that nothing works unless you know that what you envisioned will not happen exactly how you thought it would, But that is what makes the distance between where we are and where we want to go so exciting.

Failure won't kill you but your fear to fail just may keep you from doing what you want to do..

Knowing that you failed at something is probably one of the worst feelings imaginable. Whether it be a relationship or a task at your school or work, the feeling of disappointment stings. You know you have no one to blame but yourself and there's no changing it. It hurts the most if it's something that you worked really hard for, sometimes hours or even years, only to have it blow up in you face. But there are benefits to having failed. Sometimes these advantages may not be clearly visible to you in the moment but here are some things to keep in mind when you do fail:

Every failure is a learning experience

If your failure is a sin – that can be good too. You can repent and learn from your sin. When you fail, you're able to look at what happened and learn and grow from it. You can analyze what went wrong, what mistakes you made, and figure out how to grow.

Failure builds character.

Maybe that relationship breakup hurts a lot right now, but in 10 years when you're settled down and happy with someone, you'll be able to look back on your past failed relationships and talk about how they helped you grow as a person. Sometimes we have to be thankful for our failures because they helped us understand what we didn't want.

We learn from others failures, errors, and sins, too. We observe and benefit from failures by others. When you fail at something, you learn from it. And you're able to impart this wisdom to others in the same predicament as you were. Failed that quiz in your science class? At least you can tell all of your friends in the next period what to look for. Is your friend going through a problem at her job? You're able to advise her and give her real, helpful advice to apply to her situation because of your past failures.

It reminds us that we are human.

We are all flawed. Not one human on this earth has succeeded in everything they have attempted. That's okay; we're not perfect beings and we're not meant to be, physically.

Failure makes you more focused on success

. A wise sage named Chumbawumba once said, "I get knocked down but I get up again. You're never gonna keep me down." Once you fail something in your life, it makes you even more determined to get it right the next time. And even though it might seem like the easiest way is to give up, stay focused and listen to "grow.

Nothing worthwhile in life has ever come easy, or overnight.

Even things that you like doing, whether it is your job or being in a relationship, will have moments that are difficult. There will be times that you fail; you may lose a client or you and your partner get into a huge argument because of something you did. Whatever it may be, those failures push you to work harder and do better in the future.

One of the greatest failures in the Bible is David. He sinned and when he realized his sin he asked forgiveness. He repented and he was right with God again. He became a man after God's own heart.

Failure makes success just that much sweeter.

When things finally go right and everything's coming up roses, you'll be so much more thankful for the success, having previously failed. When you work hard and refuse to give up, your victories will be even more powerful.
