According to Dr. Quebec, his interest in the field developed long before he became an educational consultant. A proud graduate of public schools, he was introduced to private school education through his younger brother, who attended boarding school. That early exposure provided insight into different educational experiences and eventually influenced the direction of his career, working at boarding schools.

While working within independent boarding schools, Dr. Quebec earned his Master's Degree in Educational Administration. He progressed through leadership roles while developing a deeper understanding of student development and school communities.

"My career has always been centered on helping students and families identify opportunities that can positively influence their futures," says Dr. Quebec. "Education plays an important role in shaping a young person's trajectory, and I have always believed that finding the right environment can make a meaningful difference in that journey."

As a lifelong learner, his academic work further strengthened that focus. Dr. Quebec later earned a Doctorate Degree in Educational Administration, where his dissertation examined the values and benefits of independent boarding schools. From his perspective, educational choices are highly individual, and successful outcomes often depend on identifying environments that align with a student's learning style and interests.

Today, Dr. Quebec's work extends across three organizations that support students and families in different ways. Through Quebec Consulting, he advises families seeking the "right fit" as they navigate the competitive admissions process. With his Pre-Prep Showcase®, student-athletes are introduced to educational opportunities available at independent schools through the sport of ice hockey. He also founded Why Boarding School?, an educational platform that includes the Why Boarding School? Podcast, where school leaders and education professionals discuss student experiences, school communities, and educational pathways.

This podcast has become a significant part of Dr. Quebec's broader educational mission. According to him, the program was created to expand awareness of boarding opportunities while giving schools a platform to share their communities with others. The podcast reaches listeners all over the world and now includes episodes featuring admissions leaders, educators, and administrators from nonprofit independent boarding schools.

"Bringing thoughtful people together to discuss education has always been important to me," Dr. Quebec explains. "When educators share ideas, experiences, and best practices, those conversations ultimately benefit students and families who are making important decisions about their futures."

Throughout his career, Dr. Quebec has remained closely connected to schools and educational communities. He notes that visiting school campuses, building relationships with educators, and staying informed about evolving opportunities remain important aspects of his work. Having traveled extensively and worked with families from all across the United States and around the world, Dr. Quebec continues to emphasize the importance of understanding each student's unique circumstances rather than applying a single approach to every educational decision.

According to Dr. Quebec, some of the most meaningful moments have come long after the admissions process concludes. Hearing from former students and families about their educational experiences, career achievements, and personal growth has reinforced the long-term significance of helping students find environments where they can thrive.

"The greatest reward is seeing students succeed," says Dr. Quebec. "When a student or family member shares an update about an accomplishment or moment of growth, it is a reminder that education can create opportunities that extend far beyond the classroom."

Looking ahead, Dr. Quebec says he hopes to continue expanding the global reach of his work while increasing awareness of the opportunities available through independent school education. As he enters his fourth decade in education, he remains focused on fostering meaningful conversations and helping students discover pathways that align with their goals.

From his perspective, educational progress begins with informed decision-making. By connecting students and schools through educational consulting, events, and media, Dr. Quebec believes the broader community can continue evolving in ways that create lasting benefits for future generations.
