By LEE PRICE Published: 10th April 2013

AN unemployed graduate made headlines earlier this year after spending £500 on a billboard advert pleading for a job.

It paid off for desperate Adam Pacitti, 24, as he landed a position with a media company.

Inspired by that success, Sun man Lee put up three billboards of his own – asking for a job, a date and a gaming opponent.

Each billboard cost £500 for a two-week stint.

Here is how Lee's ads got on.

29 Fifa 13 challenges

Louis Wood / The Sun

MY first billboard was a bold call-out to all players of leading sports video game, FIFA 13.

Cockily, my ad read: "Come and have a go if you think you're hard enough. Any team, any platform, anywhere. Email me for a match."

The billboard was erected in Hackney, north London, on the corner of the borough's busy High Street.

Responses were steady — until someone posted it to social news website Reddit, where it quickly went viral.

An incredible 3,172 people voted the snap of my billboard "up", while it sparked feverish debate with almost 200 comments.

One user, known as KermittheKilla, wrote on the site: "Dang, this guy must be REALLY good."

Another, ShockeronShockStreet, was more cynical, though, posting: "This looks a lot like viral advertising... I bet they have several staff members playing as 'the billboard FIFA 13 guy.'" That prompted another strand of discussion, with PaulTheLegend arguing: "If you don't already have the latest FIFA, you're not the kind of person this advertisement would bother."

And Dravorek added witheringly: "You'd think if he's so good at the game he would've found the online matchmaking function."

There are 29 gamers who summon the courage to challenge me directly by email — including one message that almost bordered on fan mail.

Korey Ross wrote: "I think I have no chance of beating you. I just wish to ask if you have any resources that may help me become a better player?" He even thanked me for my time and signed the message off with "sincerely, Korey Ross".

I was also messaged by a journalist from Game Informer, the biggest gaming magazine in America, asking for an interview.

Single singer Rihanna: I don't understand love

8 job replies

AFTER listing my academic qualifications, my job advert cheekily changed the tone – telling potential employers: “But you don’t care about that, do you?”

Next to a smart-ish photograph of myself, I signed off with: “For a hard working, innovative employee, email me on lee_price@live.co.uk.”

And it was put in a great location – on a street near London Bridge.

Surely even my ugly mug couldn’t scare off all those potential employers passing one of the London’s chief landmarks.

But an annoying shrub meant that part of my email address was concealed – interested parties would have to really go out of their way to hire me.

My first inquiry came from headhunter Melanie who was “intrigued” by my advert.

That was followed by an email from recruitment director Nigel who thought my job-seeking tactics were appropriate for his sector. He wrote: “I would be interested in having a chat with you about a potential career in recruitment.

“It struck me that the sort of guy who is up for putting his face on a massive poster in central London in order to get a job could have a decent chance at being good at this job.”

While managing director Adam was more straightforward: “I could use those skills. Are you still looking for something?”

I also received a message from a well-wisher called Geoffrey who wrote: “Loved the advert. I hope you land in a company worthy of your innovation and balls!”

In all, three potential employers asked me to send them a CV, while five more got in touch requesting more information.

COMBINED with a picture of myself in just my underpants, my dating ad boasts: “I like to do things differently, do you?”

I go on to describe myself generously as a bubbly 20-something with GSOH (a good sense of humour).

The location isn’t great — it’s placed on the side of a FUNERAL services shop on a sleepy road in Hammersmith, West London, and is outshone by a huge advert on the opposite side of the road.

Looking for excuses, I fail to receive a single email from potential partners.

Embarrassed, I head down to the billboard to check there's not been some kind of mistake.

Lurking beneath a giant picture of myself in my underwear gives passers-by a sinister impression. One woman actually crosses the road to avoid me.

I swallow my pride and stop pretty student Elen Newcombe, 22, to ask her why my advert had failed.

She said: "I think it's a great idea and the wording is really funny, but the picture put me off. It looks like you're wearing some kind of hot pants and standing in a bush — it's all a bit weird.

"And the hairy arm pit is a big no-no. No one needs to see that.

"It's a shame because you're clearly a good-looking bloke and, meeting you in person, you're very funny. But I think you should've chosen a 'normal' picture."

She added: "All my friends have seen it and thought it was hilarious.

"We debated whether it was real or not and decided it was. We were going to send you an email — but only as a joke.

"I can't wait to go home and tell them that I've met the 'billboard guy'."
