

Forging Bonds Between Worlds

By: Victoria Yee

Our story begins with two best friends: a little boy named Oscar Windleton and his friend, Mars, a robot dog. Every day they played together and supported each other, always ready to lend a hand.

In their society, cities dominated the world. Nature was replaced entirely by technology. Life, besides humans, could only be found in the few nature reserves that were left on their Earth.

One night, when Mars went walking around the city after Oscar fell asleep, he found a real Labrador near a wall separating the city and a nature reserve. Because he was a mechanical dog, the Labrador growled menacingly at Mars as he approached. Unfazed, Mars opened a portal to help it return to the forest, but he accidentally fell through the portal himself as it was closing.

The Labrador rescued Mars from attacking dogs after he stumbled into the reserve. Then, it taught him how to survive in the forest. Mars also showed the Labrador ways to cure a disease in the reserve. Eventually, they started to rely on each other during hunts and became close friends.

Mars almost forgot about the city and Oscar as he adjusted to living in the forest, until, suddenly, Oscar's father and his urban designing team came to bomb the reserve for more urban land.

Risking his life, Mars worked on defusing the bomb to save the Labrador's home, while the animals of the forest, now united together as one, helped him by preventing the designing team from reaching Mars.

However, right after Mars was finished, Mr. Windleton threatened to kill the Labrador with a gun. But when the trigger was pulled, Oscar, who originally came to find Mars, blocked the shot. The bullet hit him on the leg. Although suffering from his injury, Oscar managed to explain to his father what Mars and the Labrador could not. Thousands of animals, displaced by humans, found refuge in the reserve. They could not risk losing it to humans again.

Mr. Windleton was touched by their efforts to help each other as friends, so he spread the message to the rest of the world. As a result, cities added gardens to their designs for the inclusion of nature, and adapted as wildlife came to live alongside humans and robots.

As Oscar recovered, the Labrador, Oscar, and Mars formed a strong friendship, their worlds now merged together as one.

These three friends exemplify how nature, humans, and technology can form strong bonds to make peace and collaboration possible between worlds.
