Tonight my son Harry has the last oral chemo that he's had daily marking the end of two years ongoing treatment for relapsed Leukemia. A marathon for him. Multiple lumbar punctures, more chemo than last time, endless steroids. Lots of lost school time. He hasn't complained once about his situation, even though he wakes most mornings vomiting and has had headaches almost every day. Early on we were inspired by Ben Crowe and stoics to accept what is and isn't in your control and being grateful for the daily good things amidst the horrors he was going through. When he called me at work yesterday to say he gets his port out next week and ahead of tonight's significant moment ending treatment he was "F&CKING EXCITED" (channelling Roy Kent). He has been strong, courageous, resilient and found a way to laugh through it. He has had adult conversations kids shouldn't have to have this early in life. Our family have stuck together, we are all knackered but proud of him and each other. It will take a while for us to step back and try to make sense of it and we pray it never comes back. To those reading this who are going through their own illness or stresses in life, we wish you strength and send love. Onwards.
