“Little House on the Prairie” depicted life in the American mid-West in the 19th century and was based on the real-life and books of Laura Ingalls Wilder. “Livin’ On a Prairie” is not about the popular series itself, but it makes clever use of it to show the main character’s disappointment and disillusionment with life. In other words, you don’t have to know anything about “Little House on the Prairie” to love “Livin’ On a Prairie”.

In the series, late 30 something Pamela is a huge fan of the TV show “Little House on the Prairie.” She is misunderstood and socially awkward and her life appears to be going nowhere, as the rest of the world buzzes around, living theirs. The TV series and its simple message about community, family, and unconditional love have become her only source of comfort, or as Pamela Bob frankly puts it: “Her drug of choice.”

Fans of the popular television drama will appreciate and understand the turmoil of the main character and how she has become disconnected. Her unhappiness can only be cured through her acceptance that she needs to heal herself. She must find a way to recover and get back on board with living her life.

The series carries a message for everyone, even if they have never watched “Little House on the Prairie.” Fans of the show will be thrilled to know that there are some cameo appearances by Charlotte Stewart (Twin Peaks and Eraserhead) who played the role of Miss Beadle, and Alison Arnglim (also a best-selling author) who portrayed Nellie Oleson.

Pamela Bob has played some dynamic roles on Broadway, and has shown her fans that she is also a talented script writer. “Livin’ On a Prairie” is her second script, her first being the short comedy "Cotton Balls for Clouds", which premiered at the iPhone Festival in NYC in 2016.
