When a parent signs an athlete up for a cheer season, you are not just paying for week-to-week participation — you are committing to a season-long financial agreement. Here's why payment is still required even if the athlete stops participating:

1. Team and Business Costs Are Fixed:

Once a team is formed, expenses such as choreography, music, uniforms, competition registrations, insurance, staff wages, and facility costs are already paid or committed up front based on the total number of athletes. These fees do not decrease when one athlete leaves.
2. Non-Refundable Vendor Payments:

Many costs (like competitions, uniforms, or music) are paid in advance to outside vendors and are non-refundable to the gym. That means the organization still owes that money whether the athlete is active or not.
3. Roster Commitments:

Competitions require official rosters, and once a team is registered, the organization is financially responsible for that spot — even if an athlete withdraws.
4. Team Impact:

Each athlete's share of costs contributes to keeping the team affordable for everyone. If one family doesn't fulfill their financial commitment, the gym absorbs that loss, or it indirectly affects the other families.
5. Contractual Agreement:

Most programs require parents to sign a contract or policy agreement before the season starts. This outlines that fees are due in full regardless of attendance or withdrawal, ensuring fairness and stability for the program and other families.
