

Statement from NTM

Posted on 07/01/2009 by ntmabuse

Hello Kari, Bonnie (and all):

We read your recently posted blog with great sadness. We want to apologize again for the hurts you have experienced and to let you know that we at NTM are committed to constructive dialogue, further preventative actions, and God-honoring organizational change. In response to your question, here are some of the actions that NTM is committed to taking. This is not to say that these actions are all that NTM is willing to do, as we are eager to prayerfully consider any ideas presented to us.

First, NTM is committed to a posture of transparency. This is reflected by (among other things) all of the documents we have provided to you – regardless of whether the documents were positive or negative – in response to requests from you or your family members. (As you know, you posted a number of those documents on your blog.) One of our primary goals is to help clarify any confusion.

Second, consistent with our desire for transparency, we would support appointing an independent, unbiased, outside individual or group to conduct a review of the abuse
