The number of students in New York City public schools who experienced homelessness between the 2010-11 and 2014-15 school years is larger than the size of the Boston and Seattle school systems combined. A 2016 study by the Institute for Children, Poverty and Homelessness found that 127,000 of the city’s 1.1 million public school students have been homeless at some point during those five years. THE ED-TECH GROUP provides technology-based training designed to help the academic achievement of homeless children. Parents are trained to monitor the child’s academic performance and make the right decisions that lead to academic success. The technology allows parents to support and intervene in the education and delivery of services indicated on their mobile device.

THE ED-TECH GROUP, INC. is a non-profit organization that provides services to help homeless children succeed in life. Our “systems change approach” develops collaborations with families and agencies that work effectively together to focus on sustainability. This creates a culture of shared responsibility for improving student outcomes. THE ED-TECH GROUP is committed to reaching out to parents in salient ways that support each child’s academic development.
