- Rory Nairn, 26, was in good health when he was vaccinated on November 5.
- The pharmacy that vaccinated him admitted it didn't warn him about myocarditis or its symptoms, but said health advice it received was "confusing".
- Nairn experienced a symptom of myocarditis the night he was vaccinated, and again the night he died, November 17.

Confusion about advice to health practitioners meant a plumber who collapsed and died after getting the Covid-19 Pfizer vaccine was never warned of the possibility of it triggering a rare heart condition.

Rory Nairn, 26, died at the home he had bought with his fiancée Ashleigh Wilson on November 17, less than two weeks after receiving his first dose of the vaccine at a pharmacy.

The Dunedin man had developed myocarditis, an inflammation of the heart muscle that is a very rare side effect of the vaccine, and had complained of pain since receiving his immunisation on November 5.

At Dunedin High Court on Tuesday, the final day of the inquest into his death, Coroner Sue Johnson said she wanted to know what Nairn was or wasn't told about the disease and its symptoms, and would then consider recommendations which may prevent future deaths.
