

Will COVID-19 Be the Moment of Truth for Telemedicine?

As the telemedicine market grows and is made more readily available and accessible across the U.S., the demand for this technology will begin to increase. This presents opportunities and challenges for the healthcare industry. For businesses rolling out and working with telemedicine capabilities, they must have the right insurance coverage, tools, and resources available to ensure their business is protected while providing cutting-edge services to their patients. For most insurance brokers, carriers and physicians, telemedicine is uncharted territory. It is now vital for healthcare businesses to work with a specialized insurance broker who understands the intricacies of telemedicine to help them select the most appropriate insurance coverage and to better manage the risks.

With the onset of the COVID-19 pandemic many medical practices were forced into a telemedicine platform overnight. Many of these practices weren't prepared for this new delivery of medicine through a virtual platform so they must have an expert to rely on within the healthcare medical malpractice specialty. Telemedicine is state-specific so having someone on your side who understands the intricacies is vital to the well-being of your medical organization. Here at Worldwide we are dedicated to helping you navigate this virtual world as we seek to understand the details of your business and challenges you and your clients are facing.
