Role of Victim Services

When law enforcement agencies respond to reported incidents, victim services personnel within those agencies are uniquely positioned to promote proactive and consistent access to victims' rights and address the unique needs of victims and co-victims as they navigate the complex justice system processes. Victim services personnel have access to incident reports, can readily collaborate with other agency personnel, and can be incorporated into multiple agency practices that directly affect victims and co-victims.

Many incidents that are reported to law enforcement do not progress to prosecution or remain unsolved. As a result, victim services personnel within law enforcement agencies often represent a valuable connection for individuals impacted by crime and crisis circumstances to information, support, and services that are unavailable elsewhere. These victim services personnel can also serve as a bridge for providers at other agencies and organizations who are interacting with individuals who want to engage with law enforcement.

Beyond directly serving those impacted by crime and crisis circumstances, victim services personnel can also contribute to enhanced engagement of victims and co-victims during law enforcement investigations, promotion of collaboration among professionals of varied disciplines, and the elevation of community trust and public safety.

Intentional Connections

Law enforcement agencies interested in implementing victim services for the first time or looking to enhance or expand existing services may want to connect with other agencies for inspiration and ideas. Connections among agencies can also be established to discuss operational details of victim services, review motivations behind decisions, and explore realistic strategies that support ethical and effective victim services.

This resource provides law enforcement agencies with the ability to independently connect with other agencies who have incorporated victim services into overall agency response and practices.

Victim Services Agency Profiles

All agency profiles within this resource provide snapshots of victim services roles and responsibilities and represent agency factors as of the date indicated on each profile. All agency profiles have been voluntarily submitted and the agency contacts welcome networking opportunities.

Join the networking efforts and submit a profile for your agency!
