A photograph of a young woman from behind, wearing a blue denim jacket and carrying a brown backpack. She is walking through a crowd of people, likely at a school. The image is slightly blurred and has a blue tint.

Add this to back-to-school supplies and your teenager will thank you. Someday.

At first, it sounds unimaginable: drug testing your kid at home. But hear us out.

In the right context—and as part of an ongoing conversation about the temptations of drug use during adolescence—it's smart.

Why now? Teens are most vulnerable during times of transition, like back-to-school.

Drug use usually surprises parents and might feel unpredictable. But it's not. Kids tend to cave to peer pressure and experiment with drugs when they're stressed, in a state of transition.

Protect them by being prepared with FirstCheck. It's easy to work with, and provides visible, accurate results in minutes.

The consequences of mom or dad discovering drug use with FirstCheck? In the end, it can be a temporary, constructive experience for your child. Be first.

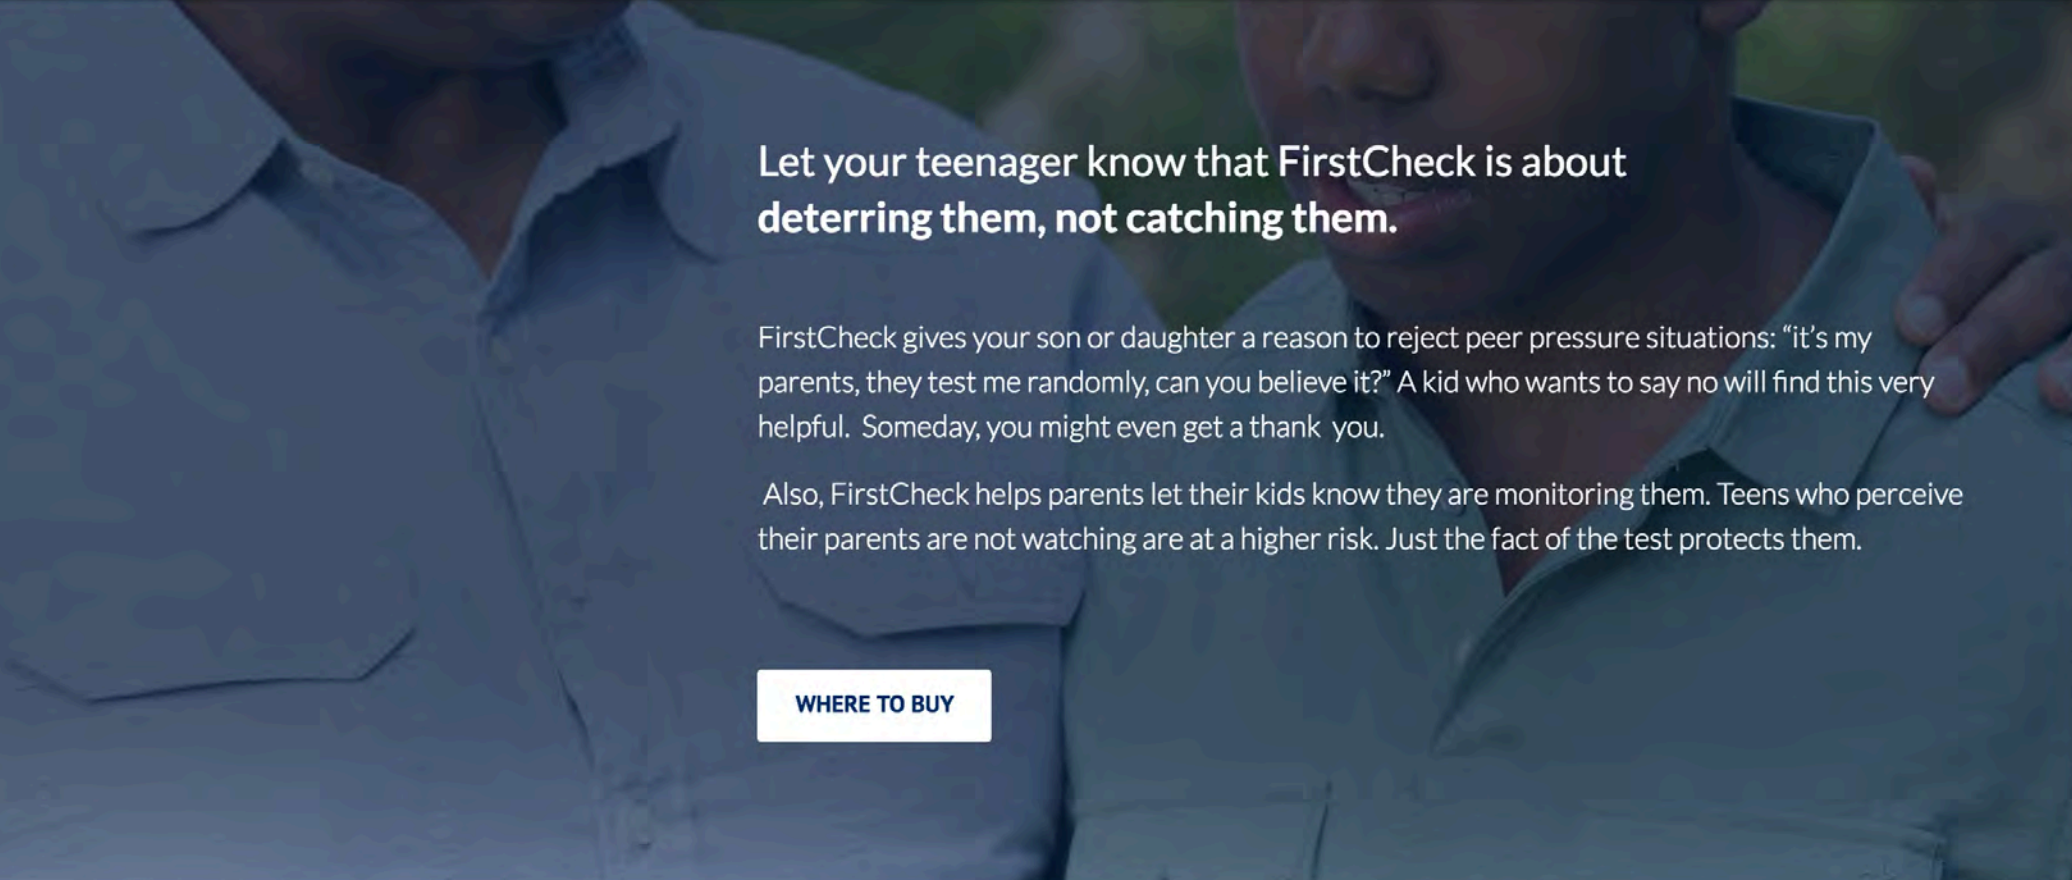

FirstCheck home drug tests are conversation starters between parents and children.

It's a good springboard for talking about the dangers and long-term life consequences of drug use. When you were a teenager, you were probably exposed to the same kind of drugs and decision-making moments. This could be a subject you know well.

Let your kid know that FirstCheck may seem like an extreme measure — but one that comes from extreme love, and a willingness to do anything to protect them.

Let your teenager know that FirstCheck is about detering them, not catching them.

FirstCheck gives your son or daughter a reason to reject peer pressure situations: "it's my parents, they test me randomly, can you believe it?" A kid who wants to say no will find this very helpful. Someday, you might even get a thank you.

Also, FirstCheck helps parents let their kids know they are monitoring them. Teens who perceive their parents are not watching are at a higher risk. Just the fact of the test protects them.
