

From Campaign to Implementation: An Overview of President Biden's Immigration Policy¹

Summary: Candidate Biden campaigned on reversing many of President Trump's controversial immigration policies leading up to the 2020 presidential election. After taking office in 2021, he sought to strike a balance of tough but fair policies, pursuing actions that encouraged individuals to pursue safe and orderly immigration, restored legal immigration, opened new legal avenues for immigration, and enhanced regional cooperation. However, he has been confronted by record levels of irregular immigration at the U.S.-Mexico border, legal challenges to his policies, and a sharply divided Congress that have stymied his ambitions to reform an outdated immigration system. In 2024, with voter discontent running high on immigration in an election year, President Biden has sought to address that perceived political vulnerability by implementing a strict, controversial border policy.

1. Introduction

President Biden entered office in January 2021 after campaigning to reform the country's outdated immigration system, reverse many former President Trump's more controversial immigration policies, and promote safe, legal, and orderly immigration. On his first day of office, he sent Congress legislation that would regularise the status of millions of undocumented immigrants and overhaul the country's legal immigration system and border controls. Over the next several weeks, he signed a series of executive orders that directed his administration to make immediate changes to certain immigration policies and review other policies to make sure they were consistent with his vision to update the U.S. immigration system.

2. Border Trends and Policies

Reversing Trump Border Policies

In early February 2021, President Biden followed through on one of his publicised immigration campaign promises and signed an executive order that established a task force to reunite immigrant families who were separated at the U.S.-Mexico border under the Trump administration. A June 2021 U.S. government report estimated that at least 3,900 children were separated from their families from July 2017 to January 2021 due to the Trump administration's implementation of the controversial "zero-tolerance policy."

The Biden administration also announced in February 2021 that it would terminate the Asylum Cooperative Agreements (ACAs) signed with Guatemala, El Salvador, and Honduras in 2019. Pursuant to the ACAs, the U.S. government could transfer certain asylum-seekers to these countries to pursue their protection claims. The administration then publicised its plans to terminate the Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP, also known as ‘Remain in Mexico’) program in June 2021. Pursuant to this policy, certain immigrants seeking entry into the United States could be returned to Mexico until their court cases were decided. Both programs were heavily criticised by immigration advocates and some Democratic members of Congress for undermining the U.S. asylum system and placing migrants at risk. After withstanding legal challenges, U.S. courts permitted the government to terminate the MPP program in August 2022.

Unlike the administration’s early moves to terminate the Trump-era ACAs and MPP, Biden relied longer than expected on Title 42, a public health authority invoked by the Trump administration in 2020, to restrict irregular immigration to prevent the spread of COVID-19. Pursuant to Title 42, the U.S. government could expel certain irregular immigrants who had crossed the U.S.-Mexico border back to Mexico or their countries of origin without providing them access to the U.S. asylum system or immigration proceedings.

Title 42 helped keep certain irregular immigrants arriving at the U.S.-Mexico border out of the country. It allowed the government to rapidly process and remove arriving irregular migrants without allowing them to enter the backlogged asylum system. Still, Title 42 did not prove to be an effective deterrence tool, as many immigrants expelled to Mexico turned around and tried to cross again—often the same day. From March 2020 to March 2023, more than 2.8 million immigrants were expelled from the United States pursuant to Title 42.

The Trump and Biden administration’s use of Title 42 faced significant criticism from immigration advocates and some Democratic members of Congress for placing immigrants at risk by returning them to dangerous parts of Mexico and violating international law by denying immigrants the ability to seek asylum in the United States. Nonetheless, the administration viewed it as an imperfect tool to address irregular immigration flows while it worked to develop different border policies.

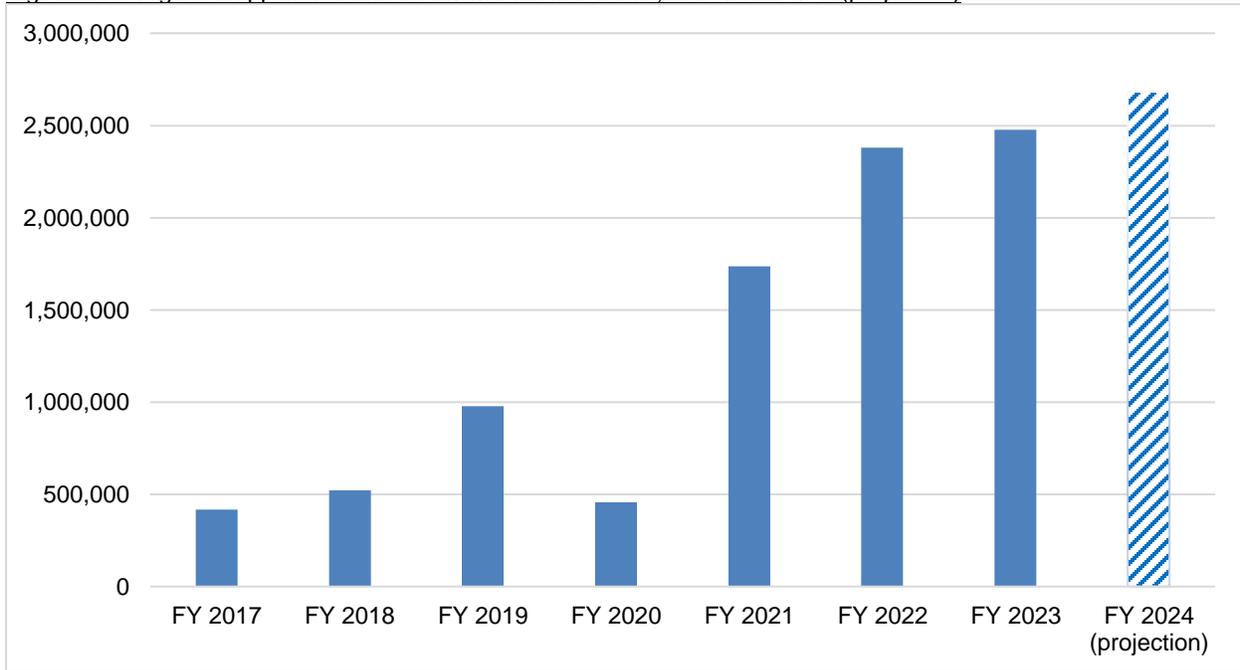

Despite concerns from Republican and some Democratic members of Congress that the end of the policy would result in a surge of immigration to the border, the administration determined in April 2022 that there was no longer a public health basis for keeping Title 42 in place. It sought to lift the rule, but legal challenges delayed it until March 2023.

Recent Border Trends

As President Biden followed through on his campaign promise to dismantle many of President Trump’s border immigration policies, his administration faced a historic number of immigrants seeking to cross the U.S.-Mexico border. The government apprehended an average of nearly 2.2 million immigrants annually at the U.S.-Mexico border from fiscal years (FY) 2021 to 2023, including a record total of 2.5 million in FY 2023. (Note: U.S. fiscal years are defined as October to September.) This trend continues in FY 2024. In the first half of FY 2024, over 1.3 million immigrants were apprehended trying to cross the border. At this pace, FY 2024 border apprehensions will surpass the record level from FY 2023.

Note: FY 2024 projection is based on six months of available data and assumes the same number of apprehensions in the second half of the fiscal year

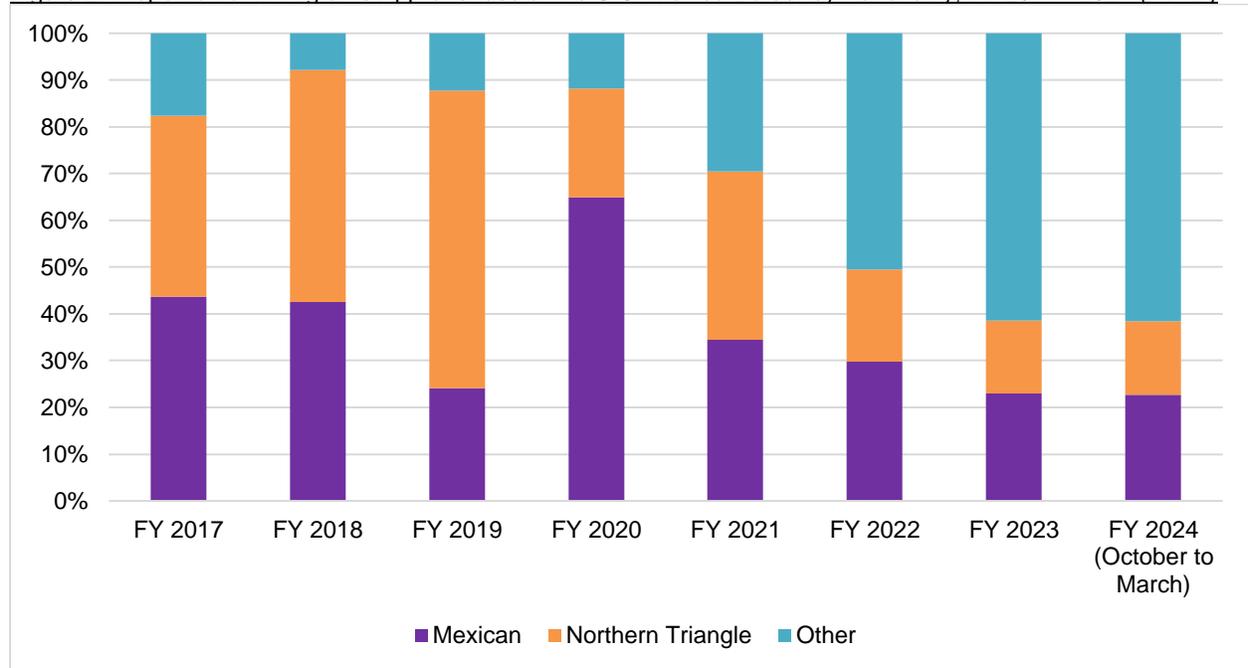

The uptick in irregular immigration in early 2021 was likely driven by many factors, including grinding economic conditions in countries of origin, robust labour demand in the United States, the desire to reunify with U.S.-based families, the easing of COVID-19-related border restrictions, and the belief that it would be easier to enter and stay in the United States under the Biden administration.

Although many anticipated the increased irregular flows in 2021, the Biden administration has been challenged to fulfil the President’s initial vision of a more humane immigration system in the face of the historical arrival of immigrants crossing the border and an unprecedented diversity in immigrants’ countries of origin. More immigrants are coming from countries outside of Mexico and Central America, more unaccompanied children and families are arriving, and more individuals are requesting asylum. These factors create a vicious cycle – they complicate the government’s ability to process cases quickly, contributing to the perception that immigrants can enter the United States and stay, fuelling more irregular immigration.

In the past, most irregular border crossers were adult men from Mexico immigrating to find work. In FY 2014, for the first time, the United States apprehended more immigrants from the Northern Triangle countries of El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras than from Mexico. Moreover, many of these immigrants were unaccompanied children and family units – demographic groups that, by law and court rulings, are difficult to process expeditiously – in search of protection from crime, violence, and persecution.

Then, in FY 2022, the range of nationalities of irregular immigrants arriving at the border increased dramatically. Immigrants from countries other than Mexico and the Northern Triangle represented more than half of border apprehensions – up from just 8% in FY 2018. And thus far, in FY 2024, this trend continues to grow: 62% of immigrants apprehended were non-Mexican, non-Northern Triangle nationals. For example, 25% of all border apprehensions in the first half of FY 2024 are nationals of Cuba, Haiti, Nicaragua, and Venezuela. These flows also increasingly include nationals from countries outside the Western Hemisphere. The combined number of Chinese, Indian, and Russian nationals encountered at the border grew from 7,000 in FY 2021 to over 109,000 in FY 2023, a 1,500% increase.

Unaccompanied children and families have also grown as a portion of irregular immigration flows. In FY 2020, they comprised 23% of immigrant apprehensions. In the first half of FY 2024, 44% of apprehensions are unaccompanied children and family units.

Consistent with global displacement trends in recent years, more irregular immigrants are requesting asylum protection upon arrival in the United States. This has led to an overall increase in the number of asylum requests – both defensive (generally applications filed by immigrants in deportation proceedings seeking to prevent their removal) and affirmative (generally applications filed by immigrants who are not in deportation proceedings) – and a growing asylum backlog. The U.S. government received 66,000 asylum applications in FY 2013; by FY 2023, the annual total jumped to 918,000 applications.

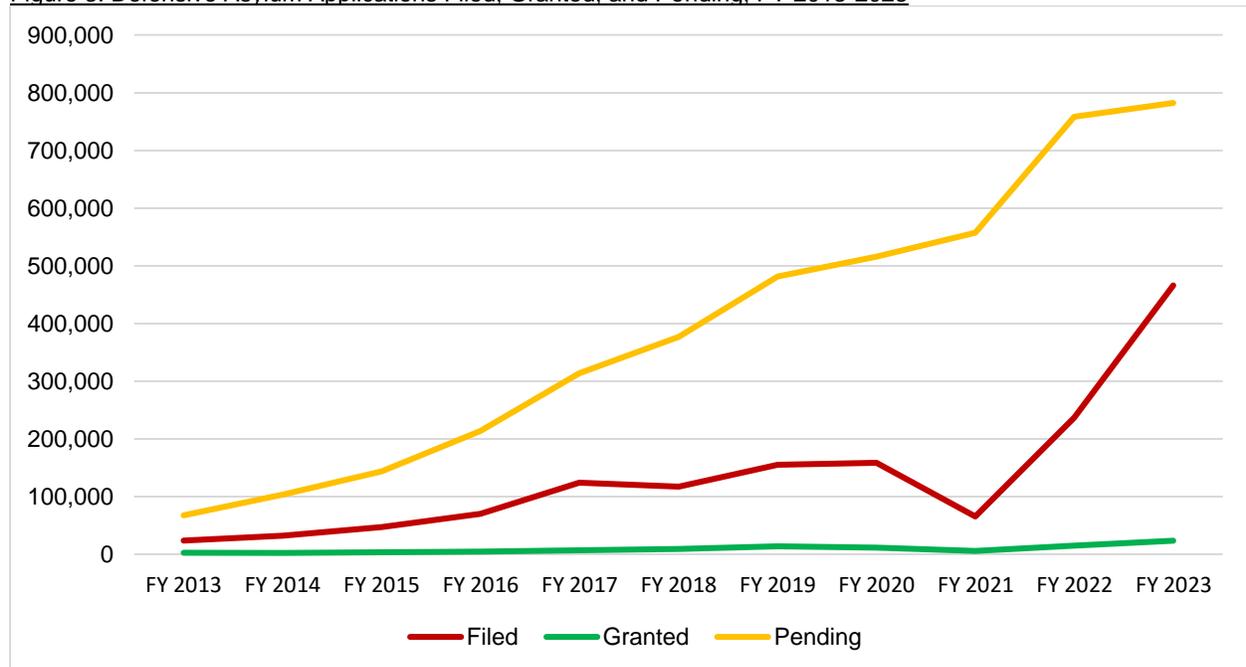

The dramatic increase in asylum requests, insufficient resources and staffing, and a slow and litigious process contributed to a backlog of over 2.2 million (1.3 million defensive applications and 975,000 affirmative applications) based on the most recent publicly available data. The top five nationalities filing affirmative applications in FY 2023 were Venezuelans (22%), Cubans (18%), Colombians (8%), Nicaraguans (8%), and Haitians (6%).

The government is now delivering asylum outcomes in years rather than months. Syracuse University’s Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse estimated that in late 2022, the average wait time from an asylum application to an immigration court hearing was 4.3 years. A separate June 2023 report from the American Immigration Lawyers Association concluded that the wait time for an asylum applicant was more than six years.

Asylum applicants are allowed to remain in the United States pending the resolution of their cases. They can apply for work authorisation after six months, incentivising many individuals to apply for asylum to remain in the United States even if they do not have a strong protection claim. However, for individuals legitimately fleeing persecution, the backlog means years of legal limbo as they await a final adjudication. These growing wait times also fuel the perception that individuals who request protection can remain in the United States, which motivates more people to try to reach the United States.

Removals

Removals to Mexico and the Northern Triangle comprise the vast majority of U.S. removals due to their large emigration totals, proximity to the United States, and strong bilateral cooperation to receive their returned citizens. In FY 2018, they comprised 92% of U.S. removals. Yet, due to the changing composition of immigration flows to the United States, their share dropped to 74% in FY 2023.

As noted earlier, irregular migration flows from countries such as China, Cuba, Haiti, Nicaragua, Russia, and Venezuela have been growing dramatically. However, because of complicated bilateral relations or poor country conditions, it is difficult, and in many cases impossible, for the United States to deport nationals who fail to qualify for immigration relief.

The inability of the government to remove certain groups of immigrants further contributes to the perception that these groups can stay if they make it to the United States, motivating more to try to reach the United States.

New Border Policies

As the COVID-19 pandemic eased, the administration announced it would implement new measures to prepare for border processing once Title 42 was lifted. Its goal was to reduce irregular immigration and strengthen border security, create new legal pathways for certain nationalities seeking to cross the border in increasing numbers, promote legal immigration, and speed up asylum processing. The government assessed that only pursuing deterrence policies had not worked to combat irregular migration flows and it could not completely eradicate irregular immigration; instead, it focused on implementing measures that encourage or incentivise individuals to pursue safe, legal, and orderly immigration to reduce pressure on the U.S. border and limit the impact on the asylum system.

In January 2023, the administration declared that Cuban, Haitian, Nicaraguan, and Venezuelan nationals who try to cross the U.S.-Mexico border and fail to apply for a newly created parole program would be returned to Mexico, pursuant to an agreement with the Mexican government. (More details in the 'Legal Immigration' section below.)

Then, in May 2023, the administration launched a new rule to incentivise immigrants seeking to cross the border irregularly to instead arrive at U.S. ports of entry. The government reasoned that doing so would better utilise limited U.S. border personnel on immigration processing at ports – not detection and apprehension – and encourage immigrants to seek asylum in the United States without using human smugglers and thus expose themselves to risks.

Pursuant to the rule, immigrants would be considered ineligible for asylum unless they scheduled an appointment via CBP One, a U.S. government app, had been denied protection in a third country, arrived through a parole program, or qualified for an exception covered under the rule. The U.S. government would also expand the use of expedited removal to quickly remove immigrants without a court hearing if they did not seek asylum or failed to establish a credible fear of persecution. Elements of this rule were adopted from a rule initially adopted from a Trump-era policy, drawing backlash from immigration advocates and some Democratic members of Congress. In addition, the requirement to use CBP One has also been criticised for limiting immediate access to asylum protection, the long wait times to receive appointments, and placing immigrants at risk in Mexico while they wait for their appointments.

Thus far, these initiatives are successfully steering immigrant arrivals to U.S. ports of entry and making it harder to pass the initial credible fear screening. In FY 2021, 4% of immigrants were encountered at U.S. ports of entry, but in the first six months of FY 2024, this total had jumped to 23%. In addition, the rate of those passing the initial credible fear screening dropped from 89% in FY 2019 to 52% from May 2023 to March 2024.

However, the initiatives have yet to be successful in reducing irregular immigration. There were 2.5 million immigrant apprehensions along the U.S.-Mexico border in FY 2023 – a record total—and apprehensions remain just as high in FY 2024. They did initially succeed in reducing border apprehensions of Cuban, Haitian, Nicaraguan, and Venezuelan nationals, but apprehension totals of these nationals have since picked up in FY 2024.

3. Legal Immigration

Candidate Biden criticised President Trump’s attempts to reduce legal immigration. Upon taking office, President Biden issued a proclamation that reversed the so-called Muslim ban and two executive orders: one to direct the government to review existing policies that limit legal immigration and another to rebuild and enhance the U.S. refugee resettlement program.

In February 2021, President Biden also issued an executive order that directed the government to identify and expand access to legal pathways for Northern Triangle nationals to encourage them to pursue legal pathways and discourage them from taking the dangerous journey to cross the border without authorisation. As increasing numbers of nationals of other countries were apprehended at the border, the administration expanded eligible nationalities.

Restoring Visa Adjudications

In response to the COVID-19 pandemic, in March 2020, the Trump administration declared that U.S. Embassies would suspend routine visa services and provide only mission-critical and emergency services. Embassies could only resume limited services beginning in July 2020, as local conditions allowed. This significantly impacted the provision of services for immigrant visas (generally permanent visas for close family members and workers) and nonimmigrant visas (temporary visas), significantly reducing legal immigration. In FY 2019, the full fiscal year before the pandemic, the United States issued nearly 9.2 million visas. This total dropped to 4.25 million in FY 2020 and then to 3.1 million in FY 2021.

The Biden administration has taken steps to restore legal immigration and streamline visa processing. The government has resumed visa processing at U.S. Embassies overseas, increased the types of applications that can be filed online, waived certain interviews, and extended some document validity periods, among other measures. These steps have contributed to a notable increase in legal immigration to the United States, surpassing pre-pandemic levels. In FY 2023, the government issued nearly 11 million visas, and through the first half of FY 2024, it issued almost 5.5 million visas.

Note: FY 2024 projection is based on six months of available data and assumes the same number of visas issued in the second half of the fiscal year

Increasing and Rebuilding Refugee Resettlement

Since establishing the U.S. refugee resettlement program in 1975, the government has admitted, on average, 72,500 refugees per year. However, during the four years of the Trump administration, the government admitted an average of fewer than 30,000 annually, including fewer than 12,000 in Trump's final year.

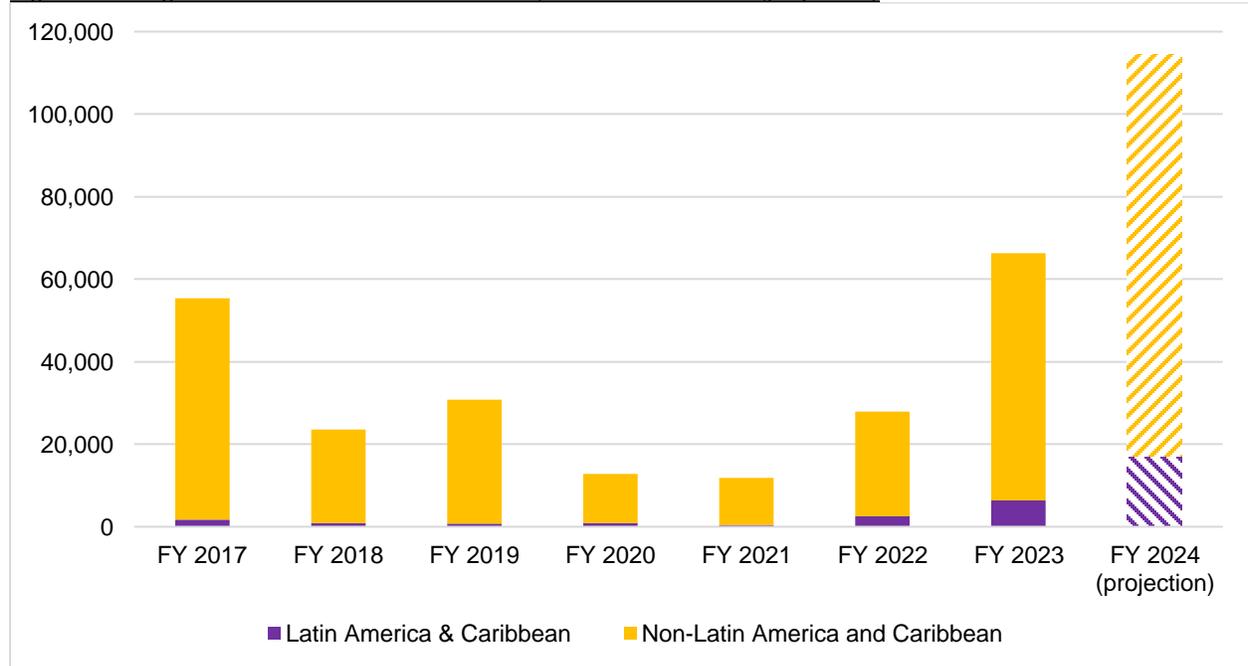

The Biden administration's progress in restoring and growing the refugee program was initially slow, given the need to rebuild the national network of refugee resettlement partners following years of reduced arrivals under the Trump administration. In FY 2022, just 25,465 refugees were admitted. However, the government has made steady progress and has set ambitious goals. In FY 2024, it set an annual refugee resettlement target of 125,000. And for the first half of the fiscal year, over 48,500 refugees have been resettled, including nearly 18,000 in February and March. Currently, the government is on pace to resettle the largest number of refugees since the 1990s.

To increase access to refugee resettlement for at-risk individuals from Latin America and the Caribbean, the administration announced in March 2021 that it was reopening and expanding the Central American Minors program, an initiative terminated by the Trump administration in 2018. The program allows certain parents in the United States to petition on behalf of their children to be considered for refugee status in their home countries of El Salvador, Guatemala, or Honduras. The Administration also committed to increasing contributions to the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) to increase referrals and prioritise cases from Latin America and the Caribbean for refugee interviews. Since early 2021, UNHCR has referred more than twice as many individuals from the hemisphere as in the previous three decades combined. Refugee resettlement is now taking place in 22 countries in the hemisphere; by comparison, at the start of the administration, it was only operating in four countries.

These efforts have contributed to a significant increase in resettlement from Latin America and the Caribbean. Regional resettlement totals from Latin America and the Caribbean increased from 500 in FY 2021 to 6,300 in FY 2023. In the first half of FY 2024, over 8,500 refugees have been admitted, which is already the most ever resettled from the region in one fiscal year.

Parole

President Biden has significantly increased the use of parole to temporarily admit hundreds of thousands of immigrants fleeing armed conflicts or political and economic crises and reduce pressure on the U.S.-Mexico border. Based on publicly available data, nearly 1.3 million immigrants have been paroled into the United States under President Biden through various initiatives. Pursuant to existing law, the United States may admit certain immigrants if they further a humanitarian cause or public benefit; however, the law does not give beneficiaries permanent legal status. Instead, parolees are generally permitted to live and work in the United States temporarily without fear of deportation.

After the successful implementation of the Afghan and Ukrainian parole programs in 2021 and 2022, which led to the admission of nearly 280,000 parolees, the Administration expanded the use of parole for certain Latin American and Caribbean populations and their immediate family members. It sought to target nationalities arriving at the U.S.-Mexico border in large volumes by encouraging them to pursue a safe, legal, and orderly immigration process.

In January 2023, the administration announced a humanitarian parole program for Cuban,

Haitian, and Nicaraguan nationals. Nationals of these countries who have a U.S. sponsor and pass a background check are allowed to come to the United States and work for a period of two years. Since then, more than 435,000 of these nationals have been paroled into the United States.

In April 2023, the administration also created a family reunification parole process for certain nationals from Colombia, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras and their immediate family members who have approved family-based petitions. It also streamlined existing programs for Cuban and Haitian nationals. The program allows nationals from these countries with an approved family visa petition to be considered for parole in the United States while they wait for their immigrant visa to become available. Thus far, only 3,600 immigrants have benefitted from this program.

Lastly, since January 2023, the administration has provided parole on a case-by-case basis to nearly 550,000 immigrants who used the CBP One app to schedule a time to be processed at a U.S. port of entry along the U.S.-Mexico border. Individuals are provided parole after the government places them into removal proceedings and issues them a notice to appear at a future immigration proceeding.

Temporary Worker Programs

The Administration also sought to increase access to two temporary worker programs – the H-2A and the H-2B programs – for Northern Triangle nationals to promote legal immigration. It has since expanded its focus to other high-sending countries in Latin America and the Caribbean (Colombia, Ecuador, and Haiti). The H-2A program is for temporary agricultural work and has no annual limit on the number of beneficiaries; it, therefore, has the potential to grow if U.S. employer demand for Northern Triangle workers increases. The H-2B program, on the other hand, is for temporary non-agricultural seasonal work and is capped at 66,000 visas annually. The H-2B program, however, allows the government to allocate supplemental visas for select countries under certain conditions.

From FY 2017 to 2020, the average number of Northern Triangle nationals admitted via these temporary worker programs was just under 8,000. The Biden administration enhanced engagement with foreign governments to increase the supply of potential Northern Triangle workers, conducted outreach to U.S. employers to encourage increased demand for Northern Triangle workers, and allocated more H-2B visas for Northern Triangle nationals. As a result, the total number of Salvadoran, Guatemalan, and Honduran workers admitted via the H-2A and H-2B programs grew to 28,033 in FY 2023, with 83% (23,219) coming from the H-2B program.

Safe Mobility Offices

The administration previewed in April 2023 that it would open Safe Mobility Offices (SMOs) to provide access to lawful pathways to certain individuals and discourage dangerous immigration and irregular arrivals to the U.S. border. In partnership with UNHCR, the International Organization for Migration, and partner governments in Central and South America, a total of four SMOs have been opened in Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, and Guatemala

The SMOs provide access to the United States for refugees, individuals eligible for parole, certain immigrants with family members in the United States, and individuals eligible for seasonal or temporary employment pathways. The offices also provide access to legal pathways to Spain and Canada, with media reports that Greece and Italy may also participate in the future.

The program has since received nearly 190,000 applications, with almost 27,000 being admitted to the United States: 8,800 as refugees and 18,100 through other legal channels. Spain has admitted approximately 300 Nicaraguan and Venezuelan refugees via the SMO in Costa Rica.

4. Regional Cooperation

President Biden promised to enhance diplomatic engagement with governments in the Western Hemisphere to promote more regional cooperation to manage immigration and increase investments in U.S. programs and initiatives to address immigration. Upon taking office, he issued an executive order which directed the development of two regional immigration strategies.

Regional Strategies

In July 2021, the Administration unveiled the two strategies – the U.S. Strategy for Addressing the Root Causes of Migration in Central America and the Collaborative Migration Management Strategy – to give U.S. departments and agencies clear guidance on how to pursue development and immigration management policies in the Western Hemisphere to reduce irregular immigration to the United States.

Vice President Harris launched the Root Causes Strategy to align U.S. government efforts to address the economic, governance, and security drivers of irregular immigration from Central America to the United States. The Vice President led the development of the strategy in 2021 by travelling to Guatemala, Honduras, and Mexico to meet with government leaders and by launching initiatives to address the root causes of immigration.

The Collaborative Migration Management Strategy identifies and prioritises actions to strengthen cooperative efforts to manage safe, orderly, and humane immigration in North and Central America. The strategy aims to address urgent humanitarian needs, promote access to protection and legal pathways for immigration, and improve secure and humane border management, amongst other objectives.

Enhanced Cooperation

Historically, the United States preferred to engage bilaterally at senior levels on immigration with critical countries like Mexico or regionally with the Northern Triangle countries. However, considering the growing number and evolving profiles of immigrants reaching the U.S.-Mexico border, the United States led efforts at the June 2022 Summit for the Americas to promote consensus and political will around collaborative efforts to improve hemispheric immigration management. The United States and 20 other countries, including Argentina, Brazil, Canada, Colombia, and Mexico, signed the Los Angeles Declaration on Migration and Protection. The declaration promotes a common understanding of regional immigration challenges and the shared commitments to stability and assistance, expansion of lawful pathways, access to international protection, humane immigration management, and coordinated emergency response.

Since then, Suriname has joined as a signatory, three high-level meetings have been held, and governments have taken many steps to implement the Los Angeles Declaration. Endorsing countries continue to convene through the framework and have committed to a range of concrete actions.

Like any multilateral process, progress is rarely quick, and participants' commitment levels are uneven. Still, the initiative has thus far proven to be a helpful tool for promoting a shared view around immigration management, advancing regional cooperation and responsibility sharing, and measuring progress.

Foreign Assistance

In contrast with the Trump administration, which cut foreign assistance to Central America, the Biden administration sought robust funding support to address the root causes of immigration in Central America and to enhance immigration management in the hemisphere.

The United States reports it is on track to meet its commitment to provide US$4 billion over four years to implement the Root Causes Strategy. The government has also provided more than US$3.9 billion in humanitarian assistance for the Western Hemisphere since FY 2021 to respond to the needs of refugees, vulnerable immigrants, and other displaced persons and support the regional SMOs, among other objectives.

5. Impact of Irregular Immigration on U.S. Domestic Politics

Stress on U.S. Cities and Backlash from Democratic Elected Leaders

As most irregular immigrants who cross the border end up moving to communities away from the border, when large waves of immigrants cross the border, large U.S. cities are often among the first to receive immigrants. Since 2023, elected leaders representing large cities such as New York, Chicago, Denver, and Washington, DC, have voiced their concerns about the large number of immigrant arrivals and the lack of federal support and coordination. This has been compounded by Texas and Florida, states that are currently led by Republican governors, to send recently arrived immigrants to cities led by Democratic politicians.

The result was awkward for President Biden as he was campaigning for re-election. Governors and mayors from his party publicly criticised him and pushed him to take more decisive action to stem irregular immigrant arrivals and provide work authorisation for asylum-seekers as they wait for their cases to be adjudicated.

President Biden has not yet acted on the recommendation to reduce the wait time for work authorisation for asylum-seekers, though he has taken other decisions to assist recently arrived immigrants. His administration's decision to redesignate and extend Venezuela for Temporary Protected Status (TPS), a program that allows the United States to permit eligible nationals of designated countries to live and work in the United States temporarily if their country is experiencing natural disasters, protracted unrest, or conflict, immediately made more than 470,000 Venezuelans nationals eligible for U.S. work authorisation. This decision is consistent with the administration's more generous approach to granting TPS, but it can also be interpreted as a response to officials pressing the government to provide recently arrived immigrants with work authorisation more quickly.

Immigration Reform Legislation and Executive Action

In October 2023, Senate Republicans, backed by House Republicans, declared they would not consider a Ukraine foreign aid package unless it was coupled with measures to strengthen U.S. border security. To the surprise of many, President Biden went along with the proposal, likely viewing it as an opportunity to achieve two legislative victories – passing funding to support Ukraine in its fight against Russia and adopting border and asylum reforms in response to record-level immigrant arrivals.

After four months of negotiations, a bipartisan group of Senators believed in early February that it had developed a strong but fair bill that could garner enough support from both parties to be signed into law. The bill would close the border if the average number of border apprehensions exceeded a certain threshold, enact stricter asylum policies, increase detention capacity, and enhance removal policies. However, the bill only included some of the measures President Biden recommended to Congress in January 2021, notably resolving the status of the estimated 11 million immigrants in the United States without legal status. Most Democrats in Congress embraced the relatively hard-nosed legislation, demonstrating how much the political ground has shifted over recent years and reflecting the Democrats' view they needed to respond to the border challenges. However, less than one week after the bill text was released, the bill collapsed under the weight of primarily Republican opposition. Former President Trump had asked Republican members of Congress to oppose the deal, partly because he did not want President Biden to achieve a legislative victory on his top priority issue in an election year.

Since the bill's failure, President Biden has identified a possible opening to turn the tables on former President Trump and Republican members of Congress. After suffering attacks for more than three years for being too soft on immigration, he criticised Republicans for backing away from legislation that would have delivered much-needed border security and asylum reforms.

On June 4, President Biden signed a proclamation that allows the government to shut down the U.S.-Mexico border in between ports of entry when there is an average of 2,500 irregular daily border crossings over a seven-day period. Once the shutdown is made, immigrants are generally ineligible for asylum. The government can reopen the border once the average number of daily crossings falls below 1,500 for seven consecutive days. For context, average daily border apprehensions were last below 2,500 in January 2021. Biden's executive action relies on the same legal statute that President Trump utilised when he sought to implement the so-called Muslim ban in 2017 and to shut down the border between ports of entry in 2018. Eight days after Biden signed the proclamation, the first lawsuit was filed to challenge the order for violating the rights of individuals seeking protection in the United States.

An April survey from Gallup confirms why Biden is to flip the script on the issue of immigration. For the third consecutive month, nearly one-third (27%) of Americans say immigration is the most important problem facing the United States. This is the longest stretch immigration has been a top voter concern in Gallup polls in the past 24 years. Moreover, Gallup surveys from February indicate that 67% of Americans disapproved of President Biden's handling of the issue.

Biden's change in posture is probably intended to show moderate and independent voters that he understands their frustration and is willing to take bold action to reduce the irregular flows. He sees an opening to show he is a leader of action while painting former President Trump and Republicans in Congress as standing in the way. However, in taking this action, he angered progressives in his base by implementing a strict border measure that curtails the rights of asylum-seekers and places them further at risk by returning them to their countries of origin or parts of Mexico that are dangerous.

Two weeks after signing the border proclamation, President Biden announced on June 18 plans to implement a new program that would allow spouses of U.S. citizens living in the United States without legal status for over ten years to receive work permits and protection against deportation. This process would also allow them to apply for lawful permanent residency in the United States without having to leave the country and seek a waiver to re-enter. The government estimates it could benefit as many as 550,000 immigrants – 500,000 spouses and 50,000 children. The program will certainly also be challenged in court, but for the time being, it allows the president to boast of his balanced approach to immigration by pursuing tough but fair policies.

6. Conclusion

President Biden campaigned on pursuing a progressive, compassionate immigration agenda upon taking office. According to an analysis from the Migration Policy Institute, Biden implemented 535 immigration executive actions during his first three years in office, compared to 472 by Trump during his term of four years.

President Biden has had success incentivising more immigrants to seek entry at ports of entry, restoring legal immigration, increasing refugee resettlement, significantly expanding access to legal immigration pathways for Latin American and Caribbean nationals, and securing the cooperation of other countries to cooperate on immigration management. However, he has struggled to maintain control of the border as the number of irregular border crossings has grown to record levels, leading to a backlash across the political spectrum. To respond to these historic flows, he has sometimes drawn from the restrictive border policies of President Trump that he had previously campaigned against.

His administration's executive actions thus far have made some noteworthy changes, but since they are not enacted into law, they are subject to reversal by future administrations. Moreover, existing court mandates and the constant threat of litigation further limit the administration's options to pursue other executive actions and its ability to fundamentally reshape U.S. immigration policy.

Enduring immigration reform requires Congressional action. Priorities should include a modernisation of U.S. border security and asylum laws accompanied by robust funding support to enable the United States to adapt to the more diverse immigration flows and to deliver adjudications more quickly. Without a more updated and streamlined border management and asylum system, the United States is likely to continue to struggle to respond to irregular migration flows crossing the U.S.-Mexico border in the years to come.

Immigration, however, is a complicated, politically divisive issue defined by zero-sum politics on both sides of the aisle. This is one of the main reasons Congress has not passed a comprehensive immigration reform bill since 1986. During his time in office, President Biden has faced non-stop attacks from the right, alleging he was implementing ‘open border’ policies. But he also faced significant criticism from progressives in his base, who feel he has eroded the asylum system and has not done enough to protect immigrants in the United States.

President Biden has not received credit for a number of reforms that have positively reshaped the U.S. immigration system. Instead, immigration has emerged as a political vulnerability for the president and his party in an election year as border crossings have reached historical levels, and some cities away from the border have felt the impact of these new arrivals. As a result, President Biden has found himself facing significant voter frustration, forcing him to endorse tough immigration reform legislation and implement controversial border policies that candidate Biden in 2020 would have rejected. The willingness of President Biden and many Democratic members of Congress to endorse more hard-line border policies may just be a temporary move to try to win the 2024 elections, but it may also indicate the views of Congressional Democrats and Republicans are beginning to align more closely on immigration border management.
