Back to School Online

Starting a new school year is always a different experience, especially during a pandemic. After experiencing online learning, students are questioning if it is an efficient way to learn. In fact, many students agreed that the summer holidays were more productive than online school in terms of efficiently managing their time. For example, one student admits that he “wasn’t able to focus completely during online classes due to the never-ending distractions”. He also stated that over the holidays he was “able to concentrate on his studies for a much longer period of time, increasing his productivity”. On the other hand, a few other students felt that the pace of online classes was too slow for them.

All in all, each student learns at their own pace regardless of the medium of learning. However, online school along with the absence of in class interactions between students themselves as well as students and teachers, makes it that much more difficult for already struggling students to grasp concepts. This gives rise to a new question: is online school really worth it?
