Upper Snake Basin study to explore adding water storage

Brad CARLSON
Capital Press

The Bureau of Reclamation and Idaho Water Resource Board are making progress toward executing a comprehensive study of the Upper Snake River Basin, including exploring opportunities to increase storage.

IWRB is seeking a technical consultant to help develop the study.

Water users had expressed interest in pursuing a basin study through Reclamation's Water Smart grant program. Minidoka Irrigation District representatives and bureau officials last September presented the program to the board, which decided to proceed.

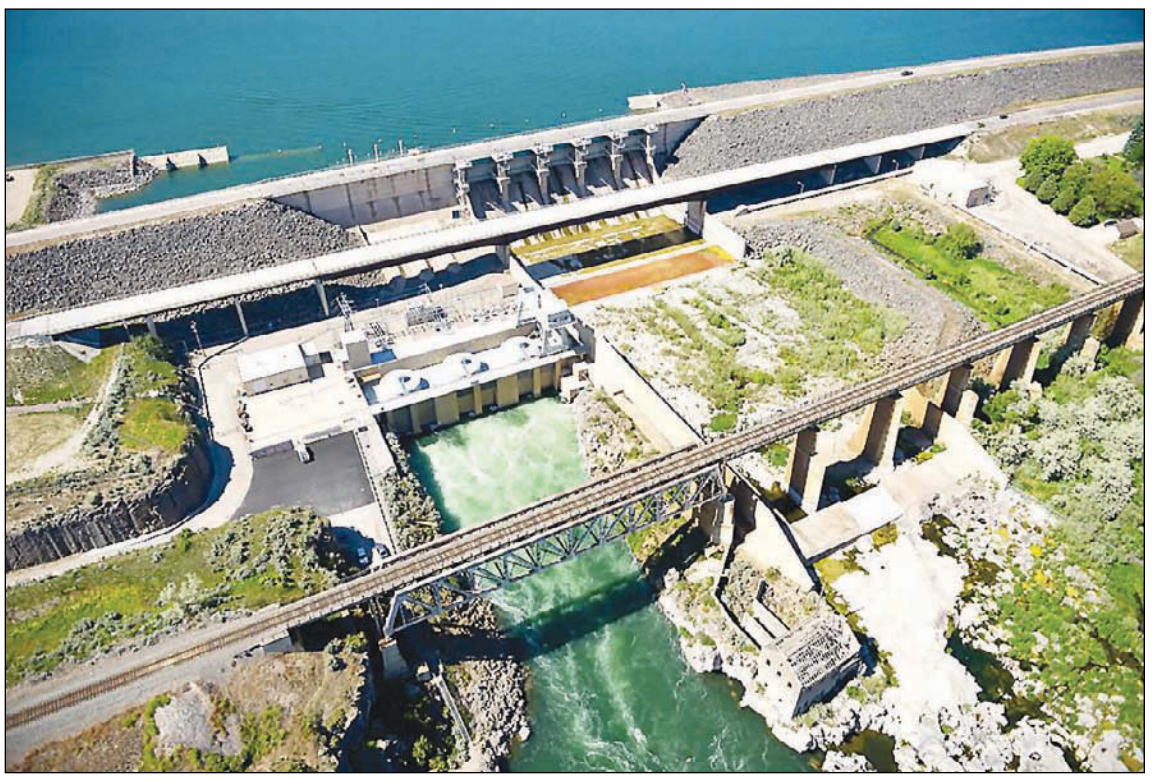

Based on IWRB's Oct. 14 letter of interest, Reclamation just over a month later recommended the board submit a full proposal — which occurred Feb. 13 following a meeting of stakeholders in January.

The bureau on June 3 selected the proposal for development of a basin plan of study.

Idaho Department of Water Resources staff have been working with Reclamation to prepare the required planning documents, department project manager Amy Cassel told the board.

Planning documents are due June 3, 2027, said Reclamation project manager Rebekah Triolo.

"Once we have completed those documents, we start another clock; we then have five years to be able complete all of our modeling and analysis, and document it in our final report," she said. Processes will include public input and may conclude earlier.

The required plan of study is a comprehensive project management document that addresses common questions and covers management structure, decision making processes, roles and responsibilities of various participants, cooperation and coordination, and methods to be used for technical analysis, Triolo said. The plan covers documentation of cost control and scheduling, and material the study will deliver.

A communication and outreach plan also is required so stakeholders and the public can receive information about the study and provide detail to be used in it, she said.

Another required document will outline how technical information and data, models, analysis and conclusions are reviewed, Triolo said.

All planning documents — to be reviewed and approved by various groups within the bureau — will support and be attached to a memorandum of agreement, she said. "And this really establishes our 50% cost share between Reclamation and the Idaho Water Resource Board to conduct the execution phase of the study."

Study execution will involve teams specializing in coordination, project management, technical support and public involvement, Triolo said.

Study scope, goals

The study area encompasses the basin upstream of Milner Dam — including the Snake and tributaries, and the entire Eastern Snake Plain Aquifer to its downstream end at King Hill, according to the proposal. The basin includes "complex interactions between surface water diversions, the ESPA, and an extensive network of canals, laterals, wells and storage reservoirs."

Projected total cost of the study is $5 million.

The study aims to identify current and future imbalances between water supply and demand, and to develop strategies to improve system reliability, enhance drought resilience and "support conjunctive management without increasing consumptive use," according to the proposal. Idaho manages surface water and groundwater conjunctively as a single interconnected system.

Existing storage facilities and operations would be assessed as to usable capacity, physical condition and operating constraints. Inefficiencies and unrealized capacity in existing infrastructure would be identified. The proposal also calls for "screening new or expanded storage opportunities and operational strategies to address climate variability, population growth and long-term water supply challenges."

Examples of possible opportunities for additional storage include the existing American Falls Dam and reservoir, the existing Jackson Lake (Wyo.), and building a dam on the Teton River, according to the proposal. Teton Dam failed in June 1976. Trade-off analyses covering cost, environmental impact, risk and stakeholder response would be considered.

Master gardeners help meet seniors' need for fresh produce

Brad CARLSON
Capital Press

The vouchers have been popular, but the market did not have enough vendors to meet corresponding demand, said Ariel Agenbroad, UI area extension educator in community food systems and small farms.

Meeting a need

Market organizers contacted UI Extension in 2024 to offer ideas about how to close the gap. With the master gardeners, UI piloted the Backyard Gardens program at the market that year and returned for the 2025 and 2026 seasons.

UI Extension offers courses to beginning farmers, who ultimately could help add to the supply of fresh produce. Home gardens were seen as a more immediately available source.

The growing master gardener program and the Food Safety Advisor program are helping to meet current needs, said Surine Greenway, UI Extension family and consumer sciences educator.

More than 85 extension master gardener and food safety program volunteers are in Canyon and surrounding counties, according to the university.

Voucher usage so far is tracking ahead of 2025, and Backyard Gardens — to be reassessed following the current season — is continuing to meet a need, Agenbroad said.

"It's going great," she said. "Our clients love us. We are only as good as what our volunteers grow and donate."

Wide variety

Master gardeners over the 2025 growing season made available 82 varieties combined, Agenbroad said.

Much of the produce is optimum quality, grown using sustainable practices and picked at the ideal time, said Matt Waite, a UI Extension community food systems intern.

Canyon Springs, a community garden in Middleton, is among suppliers important to the effort, said Brad Stokes, UI Extension horticulture educator.

At Canyon Springs, "Suzanne Ubry and her fantastic team take great care in growing produce, cleaning it and driving it to Caldwell every Tuesday afternoon for the senior produce program," Stokes said. "The seniors of Caldwell are always looking forward to the great bounties the Canyon County Master Gardeners bring to the booth."

Backyard Gardens weekly offerings are put together to appeal to voucher holders without conflicting with what is available at other booths, Agenbroad said.

"We are not replacing farms," she said. "We're also not replacing other vendors here."

A Farm to Fork market organizer said participation from produce suppliers has increased recently.

At the voucher booth, Southwest District Health educator Raquel Nunez said she enjoys helping and speaking with the seniors, many of whom earn fixed incomes. The vouchers help stretch weekly grocery budgets.

"I love visiting with people and helping people, and it's fun," said district WIC supervisor and voucher booth volunteer Gretchen Migas.
