IDAHO EDITION

Upper Snake reservoir storage outlook improves slightly

By BRAD CARLSON
Capital Press

Upper Snake River reservoirs will be low, but maybe not record low at the end of the irrigation season. The American Falls Dam in eastern Idaho is part of the system. (U.S. Bureau of Reclamation/contributed)

Conservation by water users may keep the volume of water in the Upper Snake River system's eight storage reservoirs from dropping to an all-time low at the end of the irrigation season, according to Bureau of Reclamation officials.

The bureau projects the reservoirs will hold 8% to 9% of their capacity. In August, the bureau foresaw the volume potentially dropping to as low as 6%, breaking the record low of 8.5% set in 2003.

The reservoir system on Sept. 18 was at 11% capacity, slightly below the 2003 volume on the same date. Irrigation demand, however, is dropping and deliveries of reservoir-stored water are expected to end around mid-October, similar to the normal schedule, the bureau's Upper Snake water operations manager, Brian Stevens, said.

"Irrigation districts have been conserving water as much as possible in preparation for next year amid record drought conditions," he said.

Demand is "a little bit below normal for the time of year," Stevens said. "Part of it is seasonal and driven around harvest. And irrigation entities are getting a more firm handle on what they will have for carryover for next year."

Since tracking began in the late 1970s, the median system volume for Sept. 18 is 41.5% of capacity and the median season-ending minimum is 38%, Stevens said.

Reclamation will begin winter minimum Snake River flows in the October-November period, he said.

Barring an extreme circumstance such as an unusually big storm, winter flows are expected to be normal — such as 280 cubic feet per second flowing out of headwater reservoirs Jackson in Wyoming, 900 cfs out of Palisades in eastern Idaho and 425 out of Minidoka downstream in south-central Idaho.

Water managers are working to store more water this offseason in upstream reservoirs such Jackson, Ririe and Island Park, and less in downstream reservoirs such as American Falls Reservoir and Lake Walcott, Stevens said. The work is underway and on track for completion in mid- October.

"By storing water higher in the system, Reclamation is able to maintain space in the lower system to store extra water that may not be able to be stored in the headwater reservoirs," Stevens said. For example, American Falls or Walcott would have more room to capture water, either from runoff or from storms that do not reach headwater areas.

IPC names regional promotion director

Capital Press

The Idaho Potato Commission named produce industry veteran Tom Hanyzewski as Northeast/Midwest foodservice promotion director.

He will work primarily with foodservice distributors throughout the Northeast and Midwest while also supporting operators and other industry partners across the region, according to a news release. He will focus on strengthening relationships, growing the Idaho potato business and serving as a resource for the foodservice industry.

Hanyzewski brings more than 44 years of experience in the produce industry, with a career spanning sales, procurement and business development.

He has built a reputation for strong industry relationships and a commitment to service and results, according to the release.

"We're excited to have Tom on our team," commission CEO Jamey Higham said. "His decades of experience and strong relationships throughout the produce industry will be a tremendous asset to IPC and our foodservice partners."

Hanyzewski succeeds Matt Brigotti, who retired in July.

The commission, which is a state agency, is funded by a tax of 12.5 cents per hundredweight on all Idaho-grown potatoes. The funds are used for marketing, research and education. The commission is responsible for protecting the Grown in Idaho seal, a federally registered certification mark.
