Eastern Snake Plain Aquifer volume plunges in 2026

By BRAD CARLSON
Capital Press

A conversion from groundwater to surface water irrigation in part of the Bingham Ground Water District in eastern Idaho. (Idaho Department of Water Resources/Contributed)

The Eastern Snake Plain Aquifer had a net reduction of about 600,000 acre-feet of water between 2025 and 2026, Idaho Department of Water Resources hydrogeologist Mike McVay told a state Water Resource Board committee Aug. 26.

The estimate is based on measurements at 329 monitoring wells prior to the 2026 irrigation season. No change in aquifer storage volume occurred from 2024 to 2025.

Measurements are taken in the spring largely because "we're trying to integrate the impact of last year's irrigation activities, for the most part," McVay told the board's aquifer stabilization committee. "It takes time for that to settle down. If you're in a groundwater-irrigated area, those water levels are depressed; they need to recover to some static condition. If you're in a surface water-irrigated area, you need to receive back to that same static condition."

Spring measurements also help keep results from being skewed by short-term, local impacts such as an irrigator first turning on a well, he said.

The aquifer level, which changes year to year due to weather, is about 100,000 acre-feet lower than it was in 2015.

The Eastern Snake Plain Aquifer lies underneath much of the state's east and south-central region. Total ESPA volume — which approaches 300 million acre-feet of groundwater — has been in decline for decades for reasons including business and population growth and efficient irrigation systems that return less water.

Spring flows that discharge into the Snake River from the Blackfoot-to-Minidoka Reach in the east and from Thousand Springs in the south-central region are expected to decline this year, IDWR water specialists said.

But technical modeling results for the board's managed aquifer recharge program, recharge activities by cities and groundwater districts, and groundwater pumping reductions are showing a combined net storage gain to the aquifer of about 2.8 million acre-feet, technical hydrogeologist Alex Moody said.

"We are definitely moderating the decline with the board's aquifer-recharge program, pumping reductions by the groundwater districts, and private recharge," he said.

Over the last 10 years, aquifer recharge activities from all parties are showing positive impacts, Moody said — with 53% of the board's recharge flows still being retained in the aquifer, 25% retained from private recharge and 47% retained from pumping reductions.

The aquifer "leaks" at many locations, so gains can be fleeting, McVay said.

"We need to stay the course with aquifer recharge, pumping reductions and our other initiatives to manage the ESPA, or we will be seeing our aquifer volume going down much lower than it is now," Brian Patton, IDWR deputy director and the board's executive officer, said in a news release.

Rangeland forum to focus on post-wildfire practices

By BRAD CARLSON
Capital Press

Post-wildfire practices are to be emphasized at the Rangeland Fall Forum slated in Southern Idaho Sept. 11-12.

The Sept. 11 session is scheduled from 9:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. at the College of Southern Idaho Herrett Center for Arts & Science, 315 Falls Ave., Twin Falls. The Sept. 12 session is to be held from 9 a.m. to 2 p.m. at the University of Idaho's Rinker Rock Creek Ranch near Hailey, Fire activity is increasing across the state's rangelands, leading to questions, conversations and ideas about recovery, adaptation and restoration, according to an event flyer. The forum will focus on "real-world examples and practical lessons" from post-fire recovery efforts in the state's south-central region.

The annual forum is a partnership between the UI Rangeland Center and the university's James A. and Louise McClure Center for Public Policy Research.

In recent years, "we have been focused on a lot more fire-related research," said Scott Jensen, UI area extension rangeland educator, He expects some research presented at the forum to apply directly to what the state could face in the next few years given several recent large fires.

As the current fire season is large and severe, and as fires are increasing across the West, "we need to be able to recover after those fires," said Eric Winford, Rangeland Center associate director and a UI research assistant professor of rangeland ecology and management. "When you just think about how to strategize and prioritize our resources, what is the latest science on how we can improve and steward these resources, and what are the policies that support that?"

Sharing the latest science is a key aspect of the Fall Forum, he said. Research to be presented looks at topics such as fire severity and recovery, post-fire grazing and how these factors influence ecosystem traits.

"This is an opportunity to learn and share information that can support the stewardship of rangelands," Winford said.

Scheduled panel discussion and interactive session topics Sept. 11 at CSI include post-fire policy, the science of post-fire recovery, conservation readiness, and what new research and policies are needed. Sept. 12 sessions at the ranch will focus on post-fire grazing test plots, drones and herbicide treatments, and landscape conservation strategies.
