The Battle

May 18, 2021

We often hear the phrase, “battle with cancer.” A person has either begun their battle, has won their battle, or has sadly lost their battle.

But what is this battle? Whether our campaign is long or short aren't we fighting the same war against death? Whether it's with cancer or chronic illness, done at age 30 or 90, we understandably strive to delay our passing for as long as possible. To spend more time with our loved ones. To accomplish our goals in life while we are physically on this earth. This struggle to survive can only last so long, however. So, are we really expected to win a “battle” that cannot be won?

I believe that there is a different fight that we can choose to ensue, one that goes beyond our physical presence on Earth long after we've moved on. This fight is to create change within the world, and this is a battle that can be won. If you've changed somebody's life – helped them, gave them a happy memory, or done a good deed, does that change end just because you've passed? No – it lives on through others. And if the changes that we make during our time on Earth live on, then we can win the war.

These changes do not need to be grand or earth-shattering. We tend to think about the famous people who have shaped our history within the past thousand years, while forgetting about the billions of years that came prior. Each of these years consisted of small changes that would build and build into the world we know today. A curious child would explore our world and ignite the curiosity of other children, who would learn from one another until our knowledge of the Earth became so advanced that we put a man on the moon. A helping hand would influence other helping hands, which would develop into life changing feats during humanity's darkest times.

At the time of our passing, we may not fully see the extent of how the changes we make will impact the course of the universe, but we can look at the embers and envision how our choices will impact those around us. As for me, I worked in a career that helped people with severe neurological conditions. While publishing multiple papers that could eventually lead to better quality care, I also talked to and brought joy to patients during dark times in their lives. I've published research on recycling, which may impact policies that help produce a healthier planet. I have tutored children with special needs and gave them encouragement when needed, which gave them hope that they could achieve what others told them was impossible. I've given to charities, helped out with fundraisers, and volunteered my time all in order to help others. I have made incredible friendships full of laughter and memories. All of these actions may amount to small waves in the grand scheme of things, but these small waves may be overtaken by bigger ones that over time cause a tsunami. I look at my life and see that I made many changes to the world that, despite their seemingly small size, may ripple into something amazing.

So, when I pass, please do not say that I “lost my battle.” I may not have lived a long life, but my life was a good one where I impacted the world around me to the best of my ability. And for that, I claim victory.
