THEMATIC LIST

Updated February 16, 2019

The Black Women’s Studies Booklist is a web resource that contributes to the growth, development, and institutionalization of Black women’s studies (BWST). By collecting over 1,400 book publications and organizing them thematically, this comprehensive bibliography clarifies past, present, and forthcoming areas of research in a dynamic field. The BWST Booklist is useful as a guide for research citation, course instruction, and advising for undergraduate/graduate projects, theses, dissertations, and exams.

*APA Citation:
Praxis, a Greek word, refers to the application of ideas. The West African Adinkra concept, Sesa Wo Suban, symbolizes change and the transformation of one’s life. These two concepts, praxis and transformation, summarize the overarching message of Black women’s studies. This thematic booklist traces histories and trends of scholarly work about race and gender, revealing patterns of scholarship that facilitate critical analysis for individual, social, and global transformation.

The year 2019 represents an opportune time to reflect on Black women’s studies. In the past three years, several major developments have signaled the advancement of BWST as an academic area of inquiry. These developments offer an opportunity to reassess the state of the field and make clear the parameters, terrain, and contours of the world of BWST. The Black Women’s Studies Booklist maps the scholarly field to allow more fruitful, deliberate, and informed discussion as well as more consistent training of the next generation of scholars. Beyond creating a “generative” discussion, this comprehensive survey of books in Black women’s studies is a regenerative effort to more adequately record the full scope of extant critical race and gender research and enable more informed interventions through future scholarship.

Sesa Wo Suban
Introduction: A Timely Assessment of Black Women’s Studies

Decades of discussion by communities of Black women, both within and outside of the academy, have led to the proliferation of campaigns celebrating Black women on social media and within popular culture. Some of these include Beverly Bond’s youth empowerment organization and television award show, BLACK GIRLS ROCK! (2006); CaShawn Thompson’s viral hashtag, #BlackGirlsAreMagic, frequently shortened to #BlackGirlMagic (2013); Yaba Blay’s #PrettyPeriod (2013) and #ProfessionalBlackGirl (2016); and Glory Edim’s #WellReadBlackGirl (2015). Activist initiatives include #SayHerName and #BlackGirlsMatter, coined by Kimberlé Crenshaw’s African American Policy Forum in 2015. Significantly, three initiatives—#CiteASista, #CiteBlackWomen, and the Black Women’s Studies Association (BWSA)—have formalized sentiments articulated in earlier campaigns by creating spaces in higher education dedicated to the advancement of critical race and gender research.

Brittany Williams and Joan Collier, then doctoral students in College Student Affairs Administration at the University of Georgia, held the first #CiteASista Twitter chat in July 2016. Their initial chat was inspired by the “#BlackGirlsMatter: Public Scholarship Engaging with the RaceGender Interaction in Schools” panel at the American Educational Research Association (AERA) conference earlier that year. Since then, founders have defined #CiteASista as “a Black Feminist digital project that centers the experience, knowledge, and literature of Black women (cis and trans*) within and beyond the academy through digital programming (topical monthly Twitter chats), written content by contributors on the CiteASista.com website, national conference presentations, online group-chat spaces for Black women, and in-person engagements. Central to #CiteASista’s praxis is the inclusion of Black women whose voices and knowledge have not been valued within the academy (e.g., sex workers, differently educated... family members, etc.).” Williams and Collier have created a team of contributors and provide resources on their website for those who are new to graduate school and higher education.

In 2017, Christen A. Smith, a Black feminist anthropologist (Associate Professor of Anthropology and African and African Diaspora Studies at The University of Texas at Austin) created #CiteBlackWomen, which she described as “a campaign to push people to engage in a radical praxis of citation that acknowledges and honors Black women’s transnational intellectual production.” What began as a community-based t-shirt campaign to benefit the Winnie Mandela School in Salvador, Bahia expanded to include a collective of scholars advancing a discussion through conference presentations (featuring A. Lynn Bolles, Keisha-Khan Y. Perry, Erica Lorraine Williams, Ashanté M. Reese), social media campaigns, and a podcast that tackles questions of purposeful community-building, Black feminist archival work, spirituality, and anti-imperialism. Smith writes, “As Black women, we are often overlooked, sidelined and undervalued. Although we are intellectually prolific, we are rarely the ones that make up the canon. Recognizing this, Cite Black Women engages with social media, aesthetic representation (our t-shirts) and public dialogue to push people to critically rethink the politics of race gender and knowledge production.” Building on demands from several decades of women for more visibility and formal acknowledgement of their epistemic contributions, #CiteBlackWomen mobilized a multi-generational and culturally diverse scholarly collective.

In September 2018, African American Studies scholars Nneka Dennie and Jacinta Saffold founded the Black Women’s Studies Association (BWSA) as a professional organization connecting scholars from disparate disciplines. BWSA is the only association specifically designed to foment multi-disciplinary engagement with the research and praxis of Black women's studies. Like the founders of #CiteASista and #CiteBlackWomen, Dennie and Saffold are interested in sharing resources about Black women’s intellectual and professional production—and they are invested in creating a professional community that maximizes existing online and conference spaces for the benefit of those who work in the field of Black women’s studies.

The first BWSA gathering was held in Atlanta, GA in 2018, during the National Women's Studies Association (NWSA) and American Studies Association (ASA) annual meetings, signaling a successful effort to operationalize its mission statement:

This organization is for scholars at all stages of their careers, whether they be undergraduate students, graduate students, independent scholars, adjunct professors, postdoctoral fellows, professors, and scholars with alternative academic careers. The BWSA is an interdisciplinary and multidisciplinary organization that welcomes various methodological approaches to studying black women’s experiences, histories, politics, literature, and more.¹

As BWSA’s genesis demonstrates, established academic conferences offer strategic opportunities to embody communities cultivated online, and BWST scholars have both used these spaces to convene in person and been commended within these spaces for their work centering Black women. For example, #CiteASista has been decorated within the Student Affairs and Higher Education communities, earning the 2017 Innovative Response, Social Justice Award from the Commission for Social Justice Education of ACPA-College Student Educators International and garnering public recognition from the 2017 and 2018 presidents of ACPA-College Student Educators International and the Association for the Study of African American Life and History (ASALH), respectively. #CiteBlackWomen featured prominently at multiple academic meetings in fall 2018, including the NWSA, which livestreamed Christen Smith’s #CiteBlackWomen panel, and the Association for the Study of African American Life and History (ASALH), where an entire panel of scholars, led by historians Martha Jones and Natanya Duncan, sported

#CiteBlackWomen t-shirts. In December 2018, Dennie and Saffold expanded their discussion of visibility, recognition, and sources for Black women’s studies research on a panel titled “Archives Ain’t Big Enough: Stretching Repositories to Fit Black Women” at the 40th Anniversary gathering of the Association of Black Women Historians (ABWH).

These three initiatives emerged in the context of other new developments pushing the frontiers of Black studies scholarship, most notably the founding of the African American Intellectual History Society (AAIHS) by Christopher Cameron, Keisha Blain, Ashley Farmer, Brandon Byrd, and Jessica Johnson in 2014. AAIHS has expanded to include a popular blog, but has also established an independent annual conference. These new collaborations enhance the growth of established organizations such as ASALH (1915), the National Council for Black Studies (NCBS, 1975), NWSA (1977), and the Association for the Study of the Worldwide African Diaspora (ASWAD, 2000), in addition to disciplinary-based Black women’s caucus groups.

Professional academic organizations dedicated to the advancement of critical race and gender studies build upon the tradition of generations of collegiate Black women organizers whose work fueled the Black women’s club and sorority movements of the early 20th century. As with those earlier movements, questions of access, class assumptions, liberal uplift, radical activism, respectability, and town-gown relations are inherent in the growth of 21st-century professional organizations. With so much new growth, it is essential to consider available and forthcoming scholarship within the proper context of five decades’ worth of cornerstone book contributions. As BWST is a relatively young field, it is imperative not only to note new contributions in Black studies and women’s studies but also to thoroughly clock discussions happening within more established academic disciplines.2
I am fortunate to have been present for many of these recent gatherings and to have engaged in meaningful conversations about the history and future of our craft. My academic career is rooted in BWST, but I have been interested in discussing lingering ambiguities in the field. I earned my doctoral degree in Afro-American Studies (2003) with a graduate certificate in Advanced Feminist Studies (2002), both degrees from the University of Massachusetts-Amherst. My faculty appointments at the University of Florida and Clark Atlanta University have been joint appointments between African American Studies and Women’s Studies Departments. At CAU, I have chaired the Department of African American Studies, Africana Women’s Studies, and History (AWH) for the past eight years, and as outgoing chair, I have been contemplating the legacy I will leave for the next head of this very unique academic unit, particularly as it concerns the degree program in Africana Women’s Studies.

Recent moves toward professionalization and institutionalization of BWST, and conversations surrounding these developments, have led me to formalize my assessment of the field as an organization of major themes. Specifically, in the past few years, such discussions have included:

- debates around definitions and perceptions of womanism;
- the relationship of newer developments like Afropessimism, post-Blackness, and a sharpened focus on queer and transgender studies, to older or more established topics like Afrocentrism, Black feminist thought, critical race theory, and intersectionality;
- how to engage foundational scholars in Black women’s studies (i.e. Patricia Bell-Scott, Barbara Smith, Beverly Guy-Sheftall) with Black women scholars in various disciplines (i.e. Hortense Spillers, English; Faye Harrison, anthropology; Darlene Clark Hine, history; Evelyne Hammonds, STEM), as well as scholars in Black studies (Carter G.
Woodson, W. E. B. Du Bois, Walter Rodney), women’s and gender studies (Simone de Beauvoir, Adrienne Rich, Alfred Kinsey), and adjacent fields (Michel Foucault, philosophy; Karl Marx, political science);

- the location of Black women’s studies classes in Black studies departments vs. women’s studies departments; curricula and appointments (or lack thereof) of BWST faculty in those departments;
- the proximity of scholarship to activism—particularly in the wake of unmitigated personal, cultural, and structural violence against Black women and girls;
- how department chairs can create intellectually and physically inclusive spaces for Black women’s studies to flourish;
- how new media impact language, audience, dissemination, and preservation of scholarship, and the vital role of librarians in relating new developments to scholars;
- the responsibility of peer reviewers for journals, books, and other academic outlets to require revision of submissions that do not cite relevant literature.

While all of these issues have arisen, I have faced the recurring question of how to make graduate training more effective and cohesive. As a department chair, I have asked, “What is on the test for Black women’s studies?” While consensus is never the goal, questions remain about consistency when preparing syllabi, constructing graduate comprehensive examinations, and advising students on dissertations and theses. Ultimately, these developments and roles have led me to produce a broad assessment so that we may more clearly define what it means to say “I teach Black women’s studies” in the 21st century.
Foundations: A Regenerative Approach

The BWST Booklist connects foundational texts of critical race and gender scholarship to newer publications. Beyond a "generative" project, the BWST Booklist identifies past, present, and forthcoming work to create a robust, regenerative discussion. Said another way, this comprehensive bibliography identifies long-term trends and places recent contributions in historical context. This approach enables more clarity in the formal study of Black women's theories, identities, academic disciplines, activist work, and geographic locations. As seen below, it reflects a long timeline of Black women’s scholar-activist organizing.

2018-20  50th anniversaries of Black studies & women’s studies departments

The years 2018 and 2019 mark 50th anniversaries for several Black studies departments in the United States. Similarly, many institutions are gearing up for the 50th Anniversary celebrations of departments of women’s studies beginning in 2020. Black women’s studies began as a formal academic discipline in the 1970s, at the intersection of these two academic movements, Black studies (BST) and women’s studies (WST). The first BWST classes, like the foundational courses of critical race and gender studies, were taught to fill gaps in higher education course offerings; however, they also addressed the nuances of BST and WST as these fields developed in colleges and universities around the nation.

Like Afro-American studies, women’s studies, and ethnic studies programs, Black women’s studies resulted from an increase of women and Black students on mainstream, predominantly White campuses after the late 1960s social uprisings, including anti-war protests; the free speech movement; the Black Power, Chicano/Latinx, Native American, and Asian American movements; and renewed demands for women’s rights. As students integrated campus spaces, they also demanded integration into the curriculum. Black women professors have been teaching Black women’s studies since the mid-19th century at Historically Black Colleges and Universities, but the development of a formal field of study did not happen until university structures began to evolve in the 1970s. When Black women scholars began to earn graduate degrees and enter the professoriate in the late 1970s and early 1980s, an explosion of Black women’s scholarship emerged, enabling collectives to grow into associations and professional organizations of scholars committed to critical race and gender studies in both disciplinary and interdisciplinary ways.

In 1981, Spelman College established the Women’s Research and Resource Center, naming Beverly Guy-Sheftall as Anna Julia Cooper Professor and head of the Center. This institution began a tradition of holding benchmark gatherings where Black women scholar-activists discussed a range of topics including arts, health, and politics. The next year, Gloria Akasha Hull, Patricia Bell Scott, and Barbara Smith published All the Women Are White, All the Blacks Are Men, But Some of Us Are Brave: Black Women’s Studies (1982), the first comprehensive anthology of Black women’s studies. But Some of Us Are Brave contained six main sections: feminism, racism, social science, health, literature, and a bibliography of history, poetry, novels, playwrights, composers, and material culture. Within this text, authors explored the meaning of sisterhood, the Combahee River Collective statement, music, the Black church, racism, literary traditions, and how to research and teach about Black women.

In the final section of But Some of Us Are Brave, a compilation of syllabi from several institutions foreshadows the present institutional position of Black women’s studies: BWST courses could be found in Black studies, women’s studies, and traditional academic departments. Universities offering classes centering Black women in the 1970s and 1980s included San Jose State University (Bettina Aptheker, Women’s Studies), Wellesley College (Marsha Darling, Black Studies), University of Maryland (Sharon Harley, Afro-American Studies), University of Massachusetts-Amherst (Sonia Sanchez, Black Studies), University of Massachusetts-Boston (Barbara Smith, Women’s Studies; Alice Walker, Afro-American Studies), Morgan State University (Rosalyn Terborg-Penn, History), University of California-Berkeley (Barbara Christian, Afro-American Studies/Women’s Studies), and University of Delaware (Gloria Hull, English).

Milestones of the 1990s and the early 20th century include landmark gatherings like the 1994 conference at Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT), “Black Women in the Academy: Defending Our Name, 1894-1994,” as well as the establishment of several academic journals dedicated to Africana women’s research. The University of Maryland established an undergraduate minor in Black women’s studies (2005), and several research centers (including the Black Women Oral History Project at Harvard University’s Radcliffe Institute and the Black Feminist Theory Project at Pembroke Center at Brown University) joined historically Black research institutions (like Howard University’s Moorland Spingarn Research Center and the New York Public Library’s Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture) to offer support and critical collections for concentrated research on Black women.

Today, formal training in Black studies and women’s studies degrees, minors, and certificates has bolstered graduate and especially undergraduate course development. A cursory search for online syllabi revealed courses at institutions like Brandeis, Gonzaga, North Carolina State, and Purdue. Yet there are gaping holes in certain departments where few classes are offered and too few BWST-trained faculty hired. Certainly, there are too few departments hiring faculty with PhDs in the fields of Black studies or women’s studies. Further, there is no discernable parity of content in course offerings; some classes incorporate foundational journal articles from Signs, Black Scholar, and NWSA Journal, some don’t. Some include LGBTQIA+ reading, some do not. Most assign Black Feminist Thought as a required reading, yet too few syllabi mention womanism at all. There should be no effort to create an immovable “canon” in Black women’s studies; however, curricular choices must deliberately acknowledge the foundational texts and contexts of the field while considering how BWST courses fit into a range of departments and disciplines.

When womanist scholars gathered in Atlanta to begin the first program in Africana Women’s Studies in 1982—the same year But Some of Us Are Brave was published—they compiled four volumes of resources for building this field. Topics in the Atlanta University Africana Women’s Studies Series (1985) included course syllabi, course bibliographies, cross-cultural bibliographies, and Africana women’s studies in the United States. The African continental and diasporic focus in some areas of BWST can be traced to its origins, with Shelby Lewis, the founding director of Clark Atlanta University’s Africana Women’s Studies (AWS) program, having worked as a Fulbright scholar in Uganda. In 2004, Bennett College named anthropologist Irma McClaurin the head of its newly founded Africana Women’s Studies Program, signaling the continued growth and institutionalization of the field.

The Black Women’s Studies Booklist follows in several traditions of scholars who periodically define and redefine this field of study with purposeful attention to geographies, disciplinary trends, and emergent themes in research.3

Since the early classes on Black women’s studies in the 1970s, there have been several continuities, changes, and expansions within the field. Notably, a commitment to exploring Black women’s experiences and perspectives in every academic discipline has remained consistent, as has a global and diasporic awareness. Fittingly, gender studies are becoming as central to BWST departmental structures as feminism. New directions include formalizing the study of intellectual history, inclusive of but beyond the “feminism” in Black feminist thought.
Each of these areas of inquiry has plenty of room for expansion, but we cannot expand if we have not clearly identified existing boundaries.

Methods, Content, Structure, and Sources of The Black Women’s Studies Booklist

The Black Women’s Studies Booklist (BWSTBooklist.net) is an open access, online bibliography that contains over 1,400 entries. This list of predominantly academic, peer-reviewed texts is presented in two ways: one thematic, one alphabetical. In line with technological capacity, each book title links directly to its Amazon website.

Methods for finding material were varied. I first searched available book lists (key terms included Black feminist, womanism, studies, gender, sexuality, queer, lesbian, etc.) in Amazon, Google Books, and Goodreads. I then searched the Library of Congress for similar key terms; that search provided a link to Black American Feminisms: A Multidisciplinary Bibliography, by Sherri Barnes. This outstanding source categorizes books, journal articles, dissertations, and other items into an incredibly useful online resource. Of the 1,400 books on the BWST Booklist, at least 250 appear as a result of this amazing resource produced by Barnes, a librarian at the University of California-Santa Barbara. Her work is essential; citation and attribution matter. Closely related and equally impressive is Ola Ronke Akinmowo’s Free Black Women’s Library, which references over 1,000 literature texts. This is an especially important collection as it houses many creative and fiction titles.

I accessed several important “best of” booklists and online syllabus projects published in the past five years, most importantly The MHP Black Feminism Syllabus by Melissa Harris-
Perry, Black Womanhood: The Syllabus by Jessica Marie Johnson and Martha Jones, and annual Academic Books By and about Black Women lists on BlackFeminisms.com by Melissa Brown, a PhD candidate in the Department of Sociology at University of Maryland-College Park. In addition, I drew upon public “syllabus” projects blending activism, popular culture, collective referencing, and academic sources, like the Charleston Syllabus by Chad Williams, Kidada Williams, and Keisha Blain, and the Lemonade Syllabus by Candice Benbow. These search methods and sources, along with lists from various newspapers (Huffington Post, NPR, New York Times, etc.), provided ample information to construct a list of books that is both deep and broad.4

My work differs from available lists in several important ways. For example, in order to find items not included on popular lists of books by Black women, I searched for books by scholars in PhD departments of women’s and gender studies as well as Black studies. This helped identify critical resources off the mainstream path, like work on Afropessimism, gothic, and pornography. I also searched NWSA conference categories to inform the list and validate my organization of themes. In addition, I queried Black women writers in book series (University of Mississippi’s Literary Conversations, Feminist Press’s Women Writing Africa) and university press catalogs to ensure those vital sources of publications were included. Lastly, I included books by scholars in the School of Women and Gender Studies at Makerere University in Uganda and by scholars at The Institute for Gender and Development Studies at The University of West Indies as a sample of scholarship not only produced about the diaspora, but by scholars of the diaspora. This diasporic approach builds on my research about dissertations in the East Africa Library at the University of Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, titled “Gender and Research in the African Academy: Moving Against the Grain in the Global Ivory Tower” (Black Women, Gender, and Families, 2008).5
In sum, the BWST Booklist offers a more complete list of studies than currently exists, expanding the range of texts that might be included in future course syllabi and “best of” lists. This thematic presentation puts scholars, whether new or experienced, in direct contact with those who are talking about subjects which we address in our own areas of interest. The open access, online presentation means the list is searchable, facilitating endless combinations of citation. Because of the BWST Booklist, not only will the reliable phrases “no one has written on this subject” and “there is a gap in the literature” become more readily verifiable, but scholars will also be able to more adequately articulate the connections, overlaps, and relationships with existing scholarship that make their work both “new” and richly informed. While popular texts like the benchmark Black Feminist Thought by Patricia Hill Collins or the veritable library of books by bell hooks are certainly standards of the field, they are by no means the totality of what is needed to be thoroughly trained in the field of Black women’s studies.

This booklist, while not exhaustive, is a thoroughly-researched and comprehensive representation of scholarship in BWST. While I included many books on gender or masculinity, for example, I did not include every book published on these topics. The goal of this collection is to identify foundational and new texts on major themes in order to adequately identify prominent works on a wide array of relevant topics. Books on women with some semblance of focus on Africana issues (as well as books on Africana issues with some focus on women), particularly those that address race and gender in the book description or table of contents, are included. Topics are clustered into major areas to identify emergent themes. Rather than fit topics into a pre-determined list of themes, I simply followed the paper trail of publications to develop key groupings of existing research, then identified sub-themes present in each group.
To further inform my search for books, I surveyed departments for newly appointed faculty to identify projects on the horizon. A short, sample list of “forthcoming” books shows the direction of Black women’s studies scholars in areas like neoliberalism, male intimacy, diasporic definitions of womanhood, historical conceptions of health, scientific racism, ongoing efforts of decolonization, and expanding notions of the Black diaspora to include understudied locales like Nicaragua. This list is also available in the Appendix. Hopefully, these new research directions will facilitate the institutionalization of Black women’s studies, particularly in women’s studies departments where there is too often still a dearth of full-time faculty who have actually earned graduate degrees in Black/women’s studies. Using the BWST Booklist as a resource, African American Studies departments can work to formalize BWST and gender courses, incorporating them as part of the core curriculum and not simply electives. This list will also be an essential tool for department chairs and deans seeking to make the case for expanding faculty and curriculum at their institutions.

Though I created the BWST Booklist as a work of public scholarship, peer review was an integral part of finalizing the work. I queried scholars who were mentioned in this introduction, included in the booklist, or were faculty in BWST programs across the United States, in the Caribbean, and in Uganda, where the largest gender graduate studies program operates. Those who answered the call provided critical feedback in shaping this introduction (including editorial support from Rachel Panton, Ayesha Hardison, and Lindsey Jones) and collectively identified over 125 additional texts. A final method was to query my social media communities to ask questions about obscured or overlooked books, which yielded another dozen texts. Teaching the BWST Booklist: Strengths and Limitations

The original surveys of Black women’s studies (like But Some of Us Are Brave and the four Atlanta University Africana Women’s Studies Series volumes) made use of many source types beyond books. The full bibliography of BWST is now substantial, growing broader as journal articles accumulate, as more dissertations are produced, and as digital humanities increase access to diverse types of information. The one significant strength of the BWST Booklist is also its most apparent limitation. It offers an in-depth look at one source type: books. In my classes, I require ten different source types for final papers. I say, “Scholars without sources are REAL BAD NEWS” (an acronym for over a dozen types of information students must synthesize to produce valid scholarship):

RLL BBAAADD NNEWS

1. Report/government document/database
2. Live source/oral history/interview/video
3. Laws and legal journals
4. Books (nonfiction, scholarly, two disciplines)
5. Book reviews
6. Articles (scholarly journals and magazines)
7. Archives/museums
8. Agency, professional association, or organization
9. Dissertations/theses
10. Documentary or movie
11. Newspapers (one prior to 1945, one contemporary)
12. Novel or short story
13. Encyclopedia/bibliography/anthology
14. Website/internet/multimedia/blogs/social media
15. Songs or poems
The BWST Booklist’s focus on books simultaneously permits a deep view of extant scholarship and obscures an entire mountain of available research in terms of journal articles, archives, newspapers, digital humanities, new media, performance, creative works, and other relevant sources. In the discipline of history, for example, colleagues argue that research is not complete without full consideration of articles by scholars like Elsa Barkley Brown, Evelynn Hammonds, Darlene Clark Hine, Evelyn Brooks Higginbotham, Nell Painter, and others like Hortense Spillers or Cathy Cohen. There are ideas made concrete in articles that do not always appear as definitively or succinctly in books. The Appendix offers a sample “Black women’s studies” search of journal articles in JSTOR that, along with this booklist, presents foundational texts that should be required reading in every BWST course, whether undergraduate or graduate.

In addition to the source type limitation in the BWST Booklist, very little autobiography or biography is included on this list. Select narratives by or about individuals were included when they represented a historical trend or social movement, such as Ida B. Wells, Ella Baker, Fannie Lou Hamer, and Patrisse Cullors. This absence of memoirs and biographies about prominent and lesser-known figures means that scholars must become familiar with writers, scholars, and activists by seeking out memoirs and other profiles of individual women elsewhere. In a different but related project, I created AfricanaMemoirs.net, which houses over 500 life narratives by Black women from around the globe—only a handful are included on the BWST Booklist. In short, this booklist is at once a definitive statement and an incomplete sentence.

Language is another obvious limitation of the project’s construction. Though efforts were made to invite suggestions from various geographic locations, the focus on English-language books means that the project represents only a small percentage of available scholarship by, for, and about Africana women globally. Despite these limitations, the significance of the project is still clear: this is a 100-page bibliography of BWST scholarship and it only scratches the surface.
This underscores the need for a broader appreciation, more diligent citation, and increased critical engagement of the existing research.

The field of Black women’s studies is reaching a new benchmark. This resource seeks to make histories more visible, to make developments in this field more formal, and to actively engage current scholars in the field in order to better inform and prepare undergraduate and graduate students. The BWST Booklist should improve the quality of life, teaching, research, and service for those of us who have made Black women’s studies our career, profession, and life’s work.

Themes in the Black Women’s Studies Booklist: TIDAL

Five main themes emerged from clustering books in this bibliography: Theory, Identity, Disciplines, Activism, and Location (TIDAL). The search methods described above resulted in a much more inclusive cartography of race and gender research than is generally seen on many course syllabi currently available online. The BWST Booklist gathers disciplinary areas of humanities, social sciences, professions, and STEM, while also situating major theoretical thrusts (such as feminism and intersectionality) and centralizing activism and location as specific sites of knowledge production. Themes highlight the main ideas in book titles and descriptions. While many books could have been assigned to multiple themes, I placed each book in only one of the following five categories: either a major theory (Critical Race Theory, womanism), an aspect of identity (gender and sexuality, queerness, motherhood, or masculinity), an academic discipline (humanities, STEM), a focus of activism (personal or state violence, for example), or a location (the United States South, a country, the continent of Africa, or diaspora). Books are categorized in such a way as to generate the richest interaction between texts, but certainly texts should be read across categories.

Several areas of continuity and change can be noted in the five thematic areas. A cursory survey of titles shows the evolution from Black Feminist Thought to a focus on intellectual history, feminisms from bell hooks to Brittany Cooper, and womanist ideas from Alice Walker to Layli Maparyan (née Phillips). Discussions of feminism include womanhood, queer theory, radical politics, communication, desire, male feminists, and a range of African and diasporic perspectives. Womanist thought primarily encompasses theology, but also touches on aesthetics, health, and ecowomanism. Critical race theory and intersectionality have both broadened, but (as Kimberlé Crenshaw often laments) closer attention should be paid to the origins and intentions of these terms; offerings on methodology, human rights, agency, technology, and power should ground current discussions. In addition, theoretical approaches to BWST cover Black Power and the Black Arts Movement as well as utopian, post-humanist, transgressive, or Afrofuturist perspectives.
Scholars who focus on identity explore corporeal realities and perceptions of race and gender by examining thick bodies, probing hair politics, and positing the body as a place from which to challenge patriarchy. Books on girlhood and motherhood delve into antebellum functions of family and struggles for reproductive freedom on plantations, and stretch to new understandings in areas like adoption, mixed marriages, teenage motherhood, Muslim polygyny, and gay families. As indicated by the shift in university department names from “women’s studies” to “women and gender studies,” LGBTQIA+ scholarship has become more central in BWST. Sexual agency and Slutwalks, transgender rights, queer memory, desire, and lesbian locations in the southern United States exemplify a few of the new foci. Similarly, queries of race in terms of colorism, mixed-race identity, and post-race discussions complicate and pleasantly distort one-dimensional approaches to Blackness.

Academic disciplines provide an extraordinarily rich line of race and gender scholarship. BWST thrives in every area of the academy, as seen in publications about blues, hip hop, drama, and literary criticism; in particular, the Literary Conversations series by University Press of Mississippi is a wealth of wonder, featuring full-length interviews with Sonia Sanchez, Rita Dove, Maya Angelou, Toni Cade Bambara, Octavia Butler, Gwendolyn Brooks, Johnetta Cole, Edwidge Dandicat, Gloria Naylor, Natasha Trethewey, Margaret Walker, and two volumes of Toni Morrison. This series, along with collections like those by poet Mari Evans, points the way to a cadre of writers who should be required reading in BWST.

Historical examinations and life writing offer similar depth of contributions. Ample work on periods like the Migration Era or the Harlem and Chicago Renaissances provides details about the scope of Black women’s historical experiences. Now-common topics such as Black clubwomen and slavery are given depth by new investigations and fresh approaches like conducting interdisciplinary social histories of Black women’s resistance, examining activism in terms of interracial cooperation, and establishing the centrality of Black women’s library and archival work to the development of public history.

Media and popular culture are thriving sites for work in BWST, with creators using film, television, and social media to explore topics of femme representations, food and power, creative ideologies, and up-and-coming show runners in Hollywood. Black women’s perspectives are essential to interpreting the contemporary political landscapes of the nation and world, informing discourse about capitalism, labor, Anita Hill and Clarence Thomas (and 21st-century echoes of the gendered intra-racial tension symbolized by this pair), leadership, citizenship, and the global economy. Spirituality and religion permeate much of BWST, but the social sciences—fields like anthropology, psychology, and sociology—are all undergoing fundamental revision by both Black feminist and anti-colonialist interpretations. Significantly, health research has been a rich site of interdisciplinary inquiry, pointing toward much-needed challenges to social determinants of poor health, redefining entire medical fields like gynecology, and problematizing conceptions of DNA and heritage.

The section on activism is essential to informing discussions of the relationship between theory and practice in the profession. African American studies and women’s studies engage an ongoing tug-of-war about authenticity, social responsibility, rigor, community building—on and off campus—and fitting goals for academic departments. Hopefully, this section highlighting activists, resistance to violence, and social movements can bridge the gap between scholarship and activism and demonstrate that these endeavors are not a dichotomy; instead, they exist on a continuum. Intellectual organizing can sometimes be as impactful as direct action, but the question of activism in academe is one that is far from answered in many higher education spaces that center race, class, or gender research. Incarceration, domestic violence, rape culture, and reproductive rights are areas of research interest, yes, but they are also issues that directly impact the lives of BWST scholars.

Lastly, the theme of location revisits a dialogue that has existed since the earliest formal BWST publications. Scholars like Rosalyn Terborg-Penn, whose 1980 “African-American Women in United States History” course syllabus was featured in But Some of Us Are Brave, sought to foster diasporic dialogue from the beginning. While Dr. Terborg-Penn was a co-founder of the Association of Black Women Historians (ABWH), she also contributed to border-crossing scholarship like Women in Africa and the African Diaspora and supported the establishment of Association for the Study of the Worldwide African Diaspora (ASWAD). Locating BWST means traveling to Cuba, Jamaica, Brazil, Nigeria, and South Africa, but also checking in with Germany, Britain, Mexico, and Australia. It also means determining how Black women’s experiences vary based on rural, urban, and regional settings within state and national locales. The theme of location is at once particular (a means to focus on experiences in one place) and global (an opportunity to identify contrasting and shared experiences in disparate nations).

Several of these themes reveal sparse production and the need for further research. These areas include health and wellness, STEM, disability studies, and work on Central and South America, for example. Certainly, there are significant contributions in these areas, but clearly room for more work to be done. Some subsections are deceptively brief; it is therefore imperative to look in multiple areas for themes like “history” or “gender” that defy singular categorization. Recent attention to areas like girlhood studies shows the way to build bridges and coalitions around shared areas of interest. The BWST Booklist should foster more independent research, but also encourage deeper and broader cross-cultural, interdisciplinary, and international collaborations.

The alphabetical list of all books, also available on the bwstbooklist.net website offers a “clean” version, for those who may find the thematic list unsavory.

Conclusion: Black Women’s Ideas and the Goal of Black Women’s Studies

“…the goal of Black women’s studies is to save Black women’s lives…” Barbara Smith, co-editor, All the Women Are White, All the Blacks Are Men, But Some of Us Are Brave: Black Women’s Studies

In the Introduction to But Some of Us Are Brave, Gloria Hull and Barbara Smith discuss “Black Women’s Studies as an Academic Area.” Smith writes, “Whatever the uses and results of this anthology, they will be satisfactory as long as the combined acts of faith and courage represented in it do indeed help to save Black women’s lives and make Black women’s studies a greater educational reality.” After laying out a brief history of Black women in American higher education, Smith recalls in Flat-Footed Truths: Telling Black Women’s Lives,

With the increased acceptance of research and writing about Black women, I sometimes reflect on the introduction to our book All the Women Are White, All the Blacks Are Men, But Some of Us Are Brave: Black Women’s Studies. In that piece we said that the goal of Black women’s studies is to save Black women’s lives. We didn’t say it was to get tenure, a book contract, or a certain salary. We said it was about saving lives, and we meant every Black woman—not just those lucky enough to get higher education and do college or university teaching or research. We meant the Black woman who’s never going to read any of our damn books.

As Black women’s studies programs were being founded, Black women’s community advocacy continued, but also turned inward to focus on issues impacted by the intersection of race and gender and to work toward transforming the academy as an integral part of transforming society.
Certainly, the personal, social, and structural violence that Black women face can be challenged with a deeper understanding of the systems in which we operate. Praxis is required, both theory and action, in order to transform our world. The field of Black women’s studies is a vital part of that process of social change. As I complete this project of public scholarship, my social media timelines are literally brimming with news of violence against Black women. As a survivor of several types of violence, I write with a keen awareness that my agenda with the BWST Booklist is not only to change narratives, but also to change policy, practice, culture, and the social systems that oppress Black women.

Black women’s studies saved my life. I first entered college at the age of 25. I started at St. John’s College, home of the “Great Books” curriculum of “dead white men.” While I certainly enjoyed reading Plato, Herodotus, Thucydides, and Homer, and doing Euclidian math, I hungered for evidence of Black women’s intellectual existence. Black women’s studies validated and challenged me intellectually. It also improved my quality of life by helping me understand the cultural and institutional social systems that were largely responsible for the violence I had experienced as a young Black girl. Black women’s studies gave me the tools to change those systems of domination and oppression by transforming the academy from within: serving as a source of support for students, a way maker for faculty, and an administrator cultivating sites of critical resistance within institutions of higher education. But, ultimately, I am a writer. That is what I love most and why I entered the academy in the first place. At the suggestion of Sonia Sanchez, I wrote a haiku about my work:

Black women’s ideas
Can help solve global problems
At least, they solved mine.

BWST is a problem-solving project. It addresses problems around theories, identities, disciplines, activisms, and locations—and much more. BWST raises as many questions as it addresses and, in doing so, contributes to the library of human thought. The BWST Booklist amply demonstrates that the tidal wave of Black women’s studies has made an indelible mark in the academy in ways acknowledged and not yet realized.

Black women’s intellectual history is an exploration of ideas. In Toward an Intellectual History of Black Women, Mia Bay, Farah Jasmine Griffin, Martha Jones, and Barbara Savage identify the cornerstone of Black women’s ideas about “race, gender, and justice.” The Black Women’s Studies Booklist advances intellectual history, expands knowledge about how academic scholarship is located and cited, and opens new possibilities for how Black women’s lives can be experienced and transformed as we, in the words of Mary McLeod Bethune, work to “build a better world.”
