Vision Plan Proposal

Wagner Community Park

Wagner is interested in reclaiming and updating the city park. This community asset is a central visible space for community activity and could better serve residents with design and program updates, renovations, and improvements.

Healthy Landscapes Healthy Communities

This initiative of SDSU Extension and SDSU School of Design has partnered with the community of Wagner to develop a vision plan focused on the community park, walkability, and community connectivity. Through a community leader and resident engaged process the project team will provide guidance for future investments to strengthen public spaces in the community of Wagner.

POLLINATOR GARDEN
Providing Nectar Resources For Survival

HOW YOU CAN HELP

Flowering plants use fragrance and color to attract butterflies, moths, flies, bees, bats and hummingbirds. Most of these pollinators come to drink nectar—the energy-packed sugary liquid flowers produce. The plant's pollen (powdery seed dust) rubs off onto the gentle feet, wings and bodies of pollinators as they drink. The pollen is moved from flower to flower, helping the plants to reproduce by making fruits and seeds.

POLLINATORS AT WORK

Many flowering plants have evolved to reflect the size and habits of their primary or preferred pollinator. For example, flowers with a typical "landing pad" have the pollinator's body, their wings, eyes, legs, their wings, and antennae positioned to pick up pollen as they fly.
