After the most recent Paris fashion week, it is clear that the fashion landscape of 2025 is going to be all about personal style and individuality. Designers like Dries Van Noten and Alessandro Michele highlighted maximalism and eclectic pieces. Michele's debut collection with Valentino showcased a wide range of looks that also celebrated this theme of variation. The looks included bold combinations of ruffled skirts, bourgeois blazers, and oversized accessories, all paying homage to the maximalist and bohemian style. The collection's styling urged viewers to personally interpret the fashion, making each outfit feel expressive and unique.

Earlier at Milan Fashion Week, designer Bottega Veneta offered a new take on soft power dressing with well-tailored, and sophisticated pieces. This trend carried on into Paris Fashion Week. Stella McCartney and Saint Laurent's collections included oversized blazers and draped skirts. These outfits mimicked the soft power trend that finds neutrality between masculinity and femininity.

Color will also be a dominator for 2025, and shades of pink are going to take over the spring season. Ateliers like Khaite and Alaïa played with a variety of powder pinks, and powerhouse Hermès played with intense fuschias. Experts are predicting that spring will very much be "pretty in pink." These themes of elegance are expected to influence the streets and the runway for the 2025 season.
