Supanakha waited impatiently for the last of Ravana's bootlickers and sycophants—ministers and generals—to file out of the sabha hall before she climbed down from her perch in the ceiling, creeping down the side of the alabaster wall, not caring if she left pugmarks on the pristine white surface, and leaped onto the dais. She landed on all fours, preened with self-pride at her own dexterity, and sprang up to the throne that Mandodhari had vacated a while earlier. She didn't mind the warm seat but sniffed disapprovingly at the remnants of Mandodhari's scent. Was the woman a rakshasi or a mortal? She smelled disgustingly clean, as if she had bathed within the past week. Why anyone would want to immerse themselves in steaming hot water at all was beyond Supanakha's understanding. Wasn't licking one's haunches a few times a day good enough, then? This bathing fetish was a perversion of the natural way of things. She sneezed out the disgustingly aromatic scent, and felt better.

Ravana was watching a clutch of his personal guard carry something heavy up the stairs of the dais. They set it down with exaggerated caution then retreated quickly, leaving the sabha hall empty except for Supanakha and her cousin. She peered doubtfully at the thing they had left. It was a large, shallow-bottomed vessel made of baked clay. It seemed to be filled with water. How repellant. Surely he didn't intend to wash himself as well? What was Lanka coming to? Bad enough that Ravana had had the Pushpak insinuate itself into every structure in the city-capital, turning everything into a gaudy imitation of mortal architecture and design. Did he have to go and—

‘Cousin, shut your mindbabble before I dunk you in this Gangajal.’

Supanakha swore aloud, leaping backwards. She perched on the backrest of the queen's throne. Gangajal? Water from the sacred river Ganges? ‘What do you want with holy water? Are you planning to bathe Rama's wife in it?’

Ravana's voice sounded distracted. ‘Quiet, cousin. I need to concentrate.’

She stayed sullenly silent, licking her paws and keeping her distance from the cursed water. She watched with disdain as Ravana stood before it with all his six arms outstretched, uttering some arcane mantra too softly and too quickly for her to catch— as if she would steal his stupid sorcerous Sanskrit shlokas! Her disdain turned to horror as at one point he bent, dipped his hands into the water and splashed it liberally into the air. She cringed, even though the water was thrown in the opposite direction from her. To her amazement, the water rose up, then froze in mid-air. Intrigued, she began to creep forward slowly, then stopped herself. Suspended in the air or no, that was still holy Gangajal. Even a drop of it would be enough to burn a hole through her flesh like the harshest acid. She remained where she was, crouched on the backrest of the queen's throne, watching in mute fascination.

Under the urging of more shlokas, the water began to move and swirl, taking a definite shape and form. It gained myriad hues as well, creating a proximation of reality that was close enough to identify. An image formed in mid-air, like a sculpture wrought out of molecules of water in defiance of gravity. Supanakha narrowed her eyes, recognising the shape Ravana had crafted.

It looked like a vanar leaping through the air. A not unattractive vanar, well-formed and well-built. The image on the water was, well, watery ... like a rapidly melting ice-sculpture. Not much detail was available. But from her point of view, it seemed as if the vanar was leaping across a body of water—a lake or a pond of some sort perhaps? ... Or was that only the surface of the water in the vessel itself? No, those were surely waves flecked with foam, and was that a cloud beside his arm? It couldn't be, for the cloud was smaller than his fist. And the look of determination on his protruding face was quite amusing. He looked like he was on a mission!

All in all, it was a very clever imagining. A vanar as large as a mountain, leaping across the ocean on a mission! How droll.

'I had no idea you were artistically inclined, cousin,' she said, swishing her tail. 'That is quite good, you know. Maybe if you lose the battle with Rama, you could take up painting royal portraits for his family?'

She chuckled at her own wit.

Ravana didn't reply.

Instead, he gestured with his uppermost pair of arms and the suspended water sculpture changed its shape, producing a sound like an oar swishing through a lake. When the image settled again, it depicted the same vanar in a much smaller perspective, far in the distance but still recognisable. The cloud by his arm had fallen a long way behind, hinting at the great speed at which he was travelling. Far ahead of him, many yojanas distant, lay a landmass surrounded by ocean. His destination.

Even with the restrictive imagery of the water-sculpture, she could recognise the familiar blackrock cliffs and the sloping grass-topped peak of Nikumbhila with its tiny spire of stone that was the monolithic temple of Shiva. Her jaw dropped open, and she lost her sardonic grin. There was no mistaking the vanar's destination. And if the destination was real, then obviously so was the vanar. The giant flying vanar who looked like he was ready to face and fight an army single-handed. The giant vanar who seemed to be leaping across the ocean as easily as she, Supanakha, might leap across that vessel of Gangajal— not that she would want to chance leaping across holy water. Leaping to Lanka.

Ravana laughed. The rakshasa king reached out and grasped the tiny image of the flying vanar in his fist. Crumpling it. It dissolved in his hand, droplets leaking through his fingers. The curtain of water cascaded down in a torrent, splashing back into the vessel.

‘Come, then,’ Ravana said. ‘Come and meet your death, fool.’

KAAND 3

ONE

The sky pressed in above his head, seeming close enough to touch. It brought back memories of his childhood prank, the time he had leaped to grasp the sun. This exhilaration, this feeling of total freedom, he remembered it well now. It was marvellous. How could he have forgotten how to do this? Now that he had rediscovered the ability, he felt he could fly forever, a creature of air and sky, eschewing the land and clumsy bipedal motion altogether. Up here, he was free, alone, supreme.

At this height, the sky above him was white, as pale as a duck's belly. While the sea before him, endless and eternal, was deep cerulean blue, the blue of a robin's egg. Clouds drifted slowly by, leagues below him, tiny puffs over an epic expanse. The occasional flicker of a flock of birds flying slowly in an enormous arc, casting rippling shadows over the water, caught his eye. He looked to his left and to his right, below and then back over his shoulder. Nothing was as high as he was. Except the sun. And, faintly glimpsed beyond the uppermost reaches of the airblanket that covered the world, the myriad stars. Surya deva shone down hard, scorching his back and head. But he did not mind that, for the air was cool and constant up here, the speed of his flight ensuring an unceasing stream of refreshing wind that ruffled his fur, aerated his pores, kept him alert.

At times, the ocean was so clear, so still, he could see down to the bottom itself, glimpse great underwater terrains, rolling mountains and valleys rife with the flora and fauna of the deep undersea world. Sea monsters frolicked and danced in the deep, enormous grey-backed things as large as mountains that rolled beneath the surface and spouted out geysers of foaming water high into the air; many tentacled creatures that issued dark inky bursts as they looked up and saw him pass, as if fearing that he would plunge down and attack them; sleek, swift things with jaws full of jagged fangs, biting and slashing and tearing into their prey—and even each other, cannibals that they were; playful, dancing, finned beings that leaped in mischievous arcs above the surface, reminding him of leaping salmon, and in turn, of the bears. What would Jambavan say if he could see all this? The profusion of fish in inconceivable numbers, enormous shoals of them, numbering in lakhs and crores, darkening the ocean like cloud-reflections. He recalled Rama musing aloud to Lakshman that he could not understand how some parts of the ocean occasionally appeared to be darker than others, then cleared soon after, when there were no clouds in the sky to account for such shadowplay. It was the shoals of fish that caused that discoloration and darkening. It was one of the many things that he tucked away in his mind to share with his friends when he returned.

The world scrolled below him as he flew. He remained fascinated by the sheer variety and lushness of life in the waters below. There was an entire world here. Richer and more profuse than on land. He saw predatorial creatures hunt and kill smaller predators, and those smaller ones in turn hunt even smaller ones, but the largest of them all, the gargantuan grey and white and black beasts that rolled ponderously through the water like herds of elephants, seemed to hunt not at all, only gulping down enormous mouthfuls of ocean, then spewing the water back out through the spout-holes on their heads. Some of them paused in their swimming, floating with their blunt heads raised upwards, their dark glinting eyes reflecting the sun, watching him. They sang a song for him, in a language he could not understand. But the sentiment was unmistakable. They were praising and honouring him, acknowledging this great land beast, larger even than they were, who flew above their realm as effortlessly as the winged denizens of the air.

Once, a great bird with a wing span almost as wide as a tall ash tree appeared below him, drifting languorously on the air currents. As his shadow passed over it, blocking out the light of the sun, it issued a piercing scree of outrage that travelled for miles. It was furious and humiliated that any creature could rise above it; these high reaches were its realm. It had believed itself master of the high airs until now. Hanuman cooed softly to it, reassuring it that he was only passing through. It flapped its great wings angrily twice, then blinked up and saw that he was no bird, but a wingless land animal. With a final squawk of dismay, it plunged downwards, spiralling down with folded wings, fleeing from him as fast as it could. He laughed at its panic and flew on.

Towards noon, he looked back and found that he could not see any trace of the land he had left behind. The last time he had checked, a faint black line had still been discernible, rippling with heatwaves. Now only the ocean was visible. He looked around, sweeping his vision in a full circle. Ocean everywhere. He shielded his eyes from the sun and peered ahead, seeking to glimpse some sign of his destination. There was none as yet. He sighed and lowered his hand. Looking down, he saw that he was still rising. The arc he had traced as he leaped out over the sea was designed to carry him up as high as he could go, then bring him back in a long, slow curve to the ground—right down to Lanka, if his estimation was correct. If he was still rising, then that meant he had not as yet reached the top of his first arc. The air was growing thinner, and colder. The clouds very far below, the ocean farther still. The landscape of the undersea world lay spread before him like an enormous map seen from a treetop. The almost unchanging regularity of his surroundings, the wafting stream of wind upon his body, the sunlight baking his back and head, all made him drowsy, dreamy. He fell into a reverie, musing on things that were, might have been, and might be again.

He wondered if once, in aeons past, all this had been land as well, emptied of this saline water, and if creatures of the land had dwelled here too. Then he remembered something, a faint memory of an ancient knowledge. It was the other way around; all had been ocean once, and the waters had receded only in some parts, allowing new life to spring up and exist. This was the original state of the world, waterbound. In the first age, all life had existed only beneath and upon the water. It was told in all the Puranas. The age when Vishnu had taken his first flesh-and-blood form as Matsya, the Fish Avatar ...

Something caught his eye, interrupting his musing.

At first he thought it was a reflection of sunlight upon the ocean, some silvery thing catching the light and casting it up at an angle that met his eyes.

He blinked when he saw that it was no reflection at all. It was something quite impossible.

A mountain was rising up from the middle of the ocean.

It rose at tremendous speed, matching the velocity of his flight, as if it sought to reach a certain height before he reached that spot. He recognised it as being similar to one of innumerable suboceanic rises he had glimpsed below, their peaks submerged leagues beneath the surface, and their lengths extending many miles further below into unplumbed depths. But this mountain was shooting up from the ocean, rising and growing visibly, just as he had grown to his present size.

And it was rising to block his way.

Hanuman watched in bemusement as the mountain rose up. Water cascaded down its sloping sides, falling back into the ocean. Sea creatures fell with the water, all shapes and sizes and colours and species. The larger ones were pulled down by their weight and splashed noisily back into the sea, lay stunned awhile, before sluggishly starting to swim again. But the smaller ones fared less well. He saw a large shoal of fish suddenly beached on the side of the mountain, only a few of them falling back into the precious life-giving waters, while the majority flopped and gasped, tiny silver pinpoints winking in the sunlight. One of the enormous, toothed predators of the kind he had glimpsed earlier was beached too, and he saw it thrash and twist violently, seeking the water that it needed to sustain itself. Yet even in its death throes, it lunged greedily at the gasping fish nearby, its jaws snapping them up and chomping them to bloody bits. Then, the mountain's rapid rise caused the slope to smoothen out, and the large predator as well as its gasping prey all fell back into the brine, splashing and resuming at once their eternal dance of survival.

The mountain loomed up, already reaching as high as Hanuman himself.

And still it continued to grow. To expand, as he had expanded his own form. To enlarge itself, spreading now to form a butte-like shape that stretched for yojanas from top to bottom—and that was only to the surface of the ocean—as well as miles from side to side. As it passed above his present height and surpassed him, it slowed its upward motion and began to expand breadthwise at a faster rate. Now it was a mile or two across, then four or five, then a full yojana. And still it grew.

Still, he wasn't concerned. He did not understand what force could cause such a phenomenon to occur, raising an entire mountain out of the sea-depths, but he knew what the purpose of this phenomenon was. It was meant to block his flight. To stop him from reaching his destination.

It would not succeed.

He inhaled deeply, spreading his arms and feet wider than they already were, expanding himself even further. Exerting his will, he increased both his speed and the angle of the arc by which he was presently rising. He saw himself rise to the level of the mountain's peak, then crest it, then rise above it. And he was going faster now. In a matter of moments, he would reach the place where the mountain had appeared and fly over it. He would not be daunted in his mission.

The mountain began to grow again. It shot up tendrils of earth, still damp and cloggy from their millennia of immersion, clad with weeds and undersea plants and growths. Like a row of spears, the fingers of earth shot up, high above where he was, seeming to stretch to the very stars themselves. Then, like a second rank rushing to fill in the gaps, the spaces between the fingers of rising earth were filled by the mountain's substance, making a solid wall once more.

Hanuman roared and flew higher.

The mountain grew again to meet him.

Still he rose higher. And higher.

And still the mountain rose.

He darted to the left.

The mountain expanded itself to that side.

He flew to the right. It blocked that path as well.

He was fast approaching it now. For in increasing his size and the angle of his upward arc, he had increased his speed as well. The changed angle had delayed his reaching the spot, where the mountain had appeared, by a few moments, but now he was finally approaching it.

He set his jaw firmly, and beat his chest with his fists. Roaring a challenge, he flew directly towards the mountain.

He was less than a mile away, and approaching at great speed, when the top of the mountain changed shape. As quickly as it had elongated itself, it moulded its crest into a shape that was surprisingly familiar. Within a fraction of an instant, it became a giant face. An imperfect, roughly hewn face, such as a potter might dab and press out of a lump of wet clay, unfinished and without fine detail. But enough that he could see it had two eyes, a semblance of a nose, and a mouth. The eyes of the mountain's face opened, and within were two mud-brown eyes without pupils, staring back at him.

Hanuman slowed his flight by exerting his will, reducing his speed to almost nil. He floated in mid-air, face-to-face with the mountain.

‘Who or what are you?’ he asked.

The mouth of the mountain opened. It stretched from side to side and up and down as if unfamiliar with the use of this appendage. A great rumbling emerged from deep within the bowels of the structure, causing a disturbance in the ocean below, sufficient to generate waves several dozen yards high. They ran from the base of the mountain—or from the belly of the mountain man, as it were—fleeing in panic just as the sea hawk had fled at the sight of the giant vanar flying overhead. When the mountain spoke, it did so in rumbling waves of sound, each wave generating its namesake in the ocean below.

‘I am Mainika,’ said the mountain. ‘I am the gold-navelled one. Placed here by Lord Indra to pose an obstacle to the asura hordes that dwell in the underworld. Once, I blocked the way to that netherland, preventing the demon dead from coming to the mortal realm. But Ravana through his sorcery rendered me useless. So I diminished in size and lay huddled at the feet of the ocean lord Varuna, biding my time until the world ends.’

‘Mainika, why do you block my way? I am no asura, as you well know.’

‘I know this,’ the mountain rumbled. ‘You are the son of the lord of wind. Once, in the kritayuga, a long time before your kind came upon this world, He was kind to me. In that great age, all mountains had wings and they flew everywhere with the speed of the breeze that blows across Prithvi. But then the sages began to live upon the earth and increased in number, and they feared that the mountains might fall upon them and crush them to death. So they entreated the devas to clip our wings. Indra complied and with the use of his thunderbolt Vajra, he cut the wings of all my brothers and sisters. I did not try to flee, as I wished to share the fate of my brethren. But even as the celestial thunderbolt approached me, a great wind rose and carried me away, throwing me into these salty waters with my wings still intact.’

‘But why were you spared?’ Hanuman asked.

‘I asked the wind lord, for it was he who had saved me. And Varuna replied that someday he would have use of me. And it was for that day that I was spared and sent here. For many millennia I was used to weigh down the entrance to the netherworld, thwarting Ravana’s plans to release the demon races. That long pressing down altered my structure and the wings I once possessed became a part of the rest of me. That is why I can now rise and grow and expand, but not fly as I once could.’

‘You still have not answered my question, Mainika mountain. Why do you block my path?’

‘I do not block it, son of Marut. I sensed your approach from a long way, for the use of such powers as you possess can be sensed by all the elements of the universe, as it involves a great exertion of the force of Brahman, the energy that sustains and unites all things, animate and inanimate. When I knew that you were the son of my saviour, I knew I must rise to meet you. So I have come out of my watery home to greet you and offer you my back to rest upon before continuing your journey.’

Hanuman smiled at last, relaxing his guard. ‘You are kind, old one. And it is an offer I would gladly accept. But my mission is urgent and time is short. I must reach Lanka before this day is ended, or a great calamity will befall Sita devi, the wife of my lord Rama. Please accept my gratitude and move aside to let me pass. I must be on my way.’

Mainika sighed a great sigh, the exhalation setting a sea typhoon into being that churned its way westwards at a furious pace. ‘If that is your desire, then I shall move at once. I apologise if I have delayed you in the commission of your task. I sought only to honour and aid you.’

‘No apologies are needed, Mainika,’ Hanuman said benevolently. ‘To show you my appreciation, and thank you for staying loyal to my father for so many ages, I shall touch you and offer you my heartfelt thanks.’

And he flew forward and, bending down, touched the tip of the mountain—the top of its ‘head’—with his forefinger.

‘And now, my friend, I must be on my way.’ And he shot up over the mountain, which began to recede and diminish at once, and flew over it.

‘May your father’s strength speed you,’ cried Mainika, the reverberations of its shout causing another enormous hundred-foot high wave.

Hanuman raised his hand to acknowledge the mountain’s wish, and without turning back, flew onwards, picking up speed. After a while, he heard a loud groaning, then a huge implosion of water, and guessed that the mountain had returned to its watery bed.

TWO

He was within sight of Lanka when the second obstacle arose. He had been scouring the horizon anxiously for a glimpse of the emerald island, and starting to wonder if he had somehow been travelling in the wrong direction, when he glimpsed the first flash of green in the distance. It was only a speck, like a tiny pinpoint, a fleck upon the glimmering, silvery expanse of the sea. But it remained still, and grew slowly as he flew on, and he knew that it was his destination.

He roared with exultation and increased speed, flying faster. He had lost a great deal of height in the encounter with Mainika, because although he was able to keep himself aloft by sheer force of will, each time he used his mind to do something else—such as speak to the mountain—he slipped down lower and lower. And when he increased speed too, he fell correspondingly lower. He was only a few miles above the ocean now. But it hardly mattered. Lanka was there. He would be on its shores before the sun had travelled a finger’s length further west.

He pushed his chest out and raced through the air, the wind buffeting his sunburned body and feeling as searing as fire.

Lanka was the size of his fist and growing fast when he saw the serpent.

She rose from the ocean, water dripping from her golden scales. Her head was flattened and protruded in a v-shaped wedge. Fibrillations streamed from either side of her head, flowing down in multicoloured strands. Her body beneath opened in thick, undulating coils, lashing the sea and stiffening to hold her aloft. He had not known what or who Mainika was, for, as the mountain had explained, he was from a different age altogether. But he knew the serpent at once. She was a legend among vanars and had been for millennia. She was one of the reasons why vanars feared the ocean. She was Sarasa, mother of all serpents of the sea and sister of Takshak, the celestial serpent who lay coiled around the neck of Shiva himself.

She rose up to meet Hanuman, her coiled body gleaming like a pillar of gold in the sunlight. He knew better than to try to dodge her in mid-air. He was still unaccustomed to the art of flight. She was in her element here. And, unlike Mainika, she was no mountain of mud and sludge that he could break through with brute force. If the legends were true, then she possessed enough poison to kill him with a single jab of her fangs.

She bared those fangs now, as he slowed and came to a floating halt. Her hood danced, showing him how swiftly she could move and strike if she pleased. The fibrillations around her neck changed colour constantly, traversing every imaginable shade in a dazzling display. He made sure not to stare at them too long, knowing they would hypnotise him into helpless immobility. Instead, he kept his gaze fixed firmly on her ruby-bright eyes. Even so, he could see her fangs, each a hundred yards high and tapered to a razor point. A drop of milky, viscous venom dribbled slowly down one gleaming bone-white fang as he watched, and when it splashed into the ocean, the water boiled and sizzled and seethed. He saw fish turn belly up for a mile around the spilt drop, dead upon contact with the lethal venom.

‘Vanar,’ she said. And hissed at him. ‘It is forbidden for your kind to pass through this ocean. This is my domain.’

Hanuman folded his arms across his chest and stared at her calmly. ‘This ocean, and all others upon the earth, are the domain of Lord Varuna, not yours. But I do not pass through the ocean. I pass above it.’

She hissed at his impudence. ‘Even so. You annoy me by flying over my home.’

‘Then you must get accustomed to being annoyed. I intend to pass this way at least once more, when I return the way I came.’

She opened her mouth and made a horrible throaty sound that nauseated him. For all his bravado, he was still a vanar by upbringing. And to vanarkind, nothing was more frightful than a snake. He thanked the devas that Sakra did not have to see this. The poor fellow would leap off a mountain and drown himself at the very thought that such a being existed. Sarasa herself. Queen of serpentkind! And here he was, speaking to her as if she was naught more than a vexatious impediment in his path.

‘You do not scare me,’ he said sternly. ‘Now return to your seabed and let me pass. I have business in Lanka and it will not wait while I tarry here with you.’

‘Businesssss,’ she hissed, stretching the word into a sibilant nightmare. ‘What business would a vanar have in the land of asuras?’

‘That,’ he said curtly, ‘is none of your businesssss.’ He stressed the last syllable deliberately, taunting her. Careful now, he warned himself. There might still be a way to handle this diplomatically.

Her eyes blazed, glittering like hot coals in a fire. ‘You dare mock me? Do you know who I am?’

He feigned a yawn, then feigned stifling it. He couldn’t resist it. She was so pompous and arrogant, so full of her own importance. ‘Probably. But what does it matter? I am not here to pay you a visit and exchange pleasantries. Move aside and let me pass. Go on now, slither home.’

‘Fool vanar,’ she said. ‘You do not know whom you insult. I have been given a boon by the devas. Anything I desire must enter my mouth. I will eat you and spend a century digesting your flesh. No creature can escape my maw.’

Hanuman glanced up. The sun was well past noon, moving on towards late afternoon. He glanced over Sarasa’s quivering head. Lanka was right there, within easy reach. He had only to get past this wretched sea snake and he would be there.

She grinned. 'Do you still think you will reach Lanka in time to save your beloved Sita devi? You are more stupid than I thought. The only place you will travel to today is the bottom of my belly. And let me tell you, that is a long, long journey. My coils are so long, even I have no idea where they end. I have not seen my tail for many centuries. It could be in another world for all I know.'

'You speak too much,' he broke in. 'If you wish to eat me, then go ahead and do it now.'

She hissed angrily. 'Insolent vanar. I told you, the devas have gifted me a boon. If I desire you, you will not escape my mouth. Even your father the wind god cannot save you now.'

'Is that what you wish?' he asked. 'That I should enter your mouth?'

She grinned at him. 'That is all.'

He nodded, as if thinking it over. 'And if I do this, if I enter your mouth, then you will let me pass?'

Her grin widened. 'Pass, yes. Pass into my stomach!'

'So you presume,' he said nonchalantly. 'But let us assume for the moment that I only pass through your mouth and not enter your undoubtedly fascinating digestive system, will you then let me pass this way and go towards Lanka?'

She laughed a sibilant serpent laugh. 'It is impossible. But yes, if you could do that, then I would happily let you go anywhere you pleased!'

'So be it,' Hanuman said grimly. 'Now, if you're going to eat me, eat me. Don't bore me to death with your mindless patter.'

Her grin vanished. She emitted a sibilant cry, producing a sizzle as loud as a volcano's lava flow meeting the ocean. And then she lunged wordlessly at him.

Hanuman danced out of the way of her first lunge, darting backwards. She hissed in frustration and lunged again. Again, he dodged her easily and she missed. She screamed a serpent cry, making fish flop madly and swim away in terror around them both. She lunged yet again, and again he was able to dance out of the way just in time.

She paused, eyes glinting, and twisted her head to look back quickly. He looked as well, and his heart fell when he saw that the three leaps backward had taken him three full miles back the way he had come.

‘How will you avoid my mouth?’ she said. Now it was her turn to taunt him. ‘Will you have me chase you all the way back to your friend Rama? Will you cower by his feet and beg him to save you from me? Come here, you craven vanar!’

He tried to think quickly. He kept moving as he thought, flying this way, then that. He tried a feint in one direction, then flew in another, hoping to get past her. But she was too quick and blocked him each time. He knew that this game was wasting his precious time. While she could dance all day—or for the next hundred days if she pleased. That would suit her as well.

Nor could he simply stand still. That was the mistake almost every vanar made when confronted with a serpent. First, they froze, stunned by the sight of those lethal fangs, those hypnotic fevered eyes, that flattened hood swaying slowly to the rhythm of unheard music, those glistening, scaly coils. Then, they ran. Leaping this way. Or that. Or worse, turning and fleeing back the opposite way. This last was the worst of all, for the turning-around itself slowed them, and gave the snake ample time to lunge and strike. Even leaping to either side was useless: no vanar could leap as fast as a snake could lunge.

There was only one way a vanar could defeat a snake. And that was to leap towards it, grasping its neck in both hands as tightly as possible and then pounding it senseless or dead on the ground or against a tree trunk. He had known vanars who had done this, had seen it done on one occasion, years ago, though he had been high on a branch looking down, and the vanar in question had nevertheless sustained a glancing nick from a single fang when his hold on the snake’s throat slipped a little. The vanar had not died, but he might as well have. He took severely ill as a result of that single nick, and was unable to leap or run the rest of his days.

But this was not the forest, nor was this an ordinary snake. It was Sarasa. And she was empowered with a boon that made it impossible for any creature she desired to escape her mouth.

So he knew that he must enter her mouth. Unless ... well, unless her mouth wasn't big enough.

An idea blossomed in his mind. Without wasting more time thinking, he expanded his body. Putting all his energy into the act. He had reduced himself after the encounter with Mainika, diminishing back to the yojana-tall form in which he had left the mainland. Now, he expanded himself in the wink of an eye to five times that size, then ten times. Ten yojanas tall.

Sarasa laughed and before the sound of her laughter reached his ears, she was twenty yojanas tall.

He doubled his size. Now he was twenty yojanas tall.

She doubled her size. She was forty yojanas now.

'Grow, grow, foolish vanar. The more you grow, the more meat I shall get to feed on!'

As she spoke, he became forty, then eighty, then a hundred yojanas tall. She followed suit a blink of an eye later. But each time, he observed, she took a breath before each expansion. Just a tiny intake, barely a fraction of a moment, but it was there. An inward puff of breath, and then she expanded, another small puff, another expansion.

He knew what he had to do.

She loomed two hundred yojanas tall, twice as tall as he was.

He shot up like an arrow from Rama's bow, up to where her hood swayed high in the sky. Stars glimmered faintly behind her hood. She gaped down at him, ready for his next move, whatever it might be.

He reached her mouth's height and shouted, 'Is this the tallest you can become? Have you reached the end of your strength? I thought you were the queen of snakes, Sarasa. Even an ordinary grass snake with a boon can do better than this!’

She shrieked, the sound echoing off the moon’s surface. And expanded herself to twice her size again. And yet again. And again. Each time, she took a tiny breath, each time she wasted a fraction of a moment.

When she was taller than he would ever have believed possible, he flew straight at her mouth. In a blink of an eye, he reduced himself to a hundredth, then a thousandth, then a millionth of his size.

The size of a vanar’s thumb, he flew into her gaping maw, straight into those jaws of certain death. Between those poised fangs, dripping venom. She was so huge, he so tiny, it was like a gnat flying into a cave.

He flew out again.

As he emerged, he expanded himself.

At the same time, she realised his trick and reduced her size. She shrank at the speed of thought, and in a blink she was a yojana high, as when she had risen out of the ocean to confront him. Too late.

By then, he was a yojana tall as well.

He stopped and turned to face her again. ‘So,’ he said. ‘I have entered your mouth and fulfilled your boon. Now your power over me is gone. Slither back into your watery home and let me pass.’

She cried out in sibilant rage. But he was right. She had agreed to his condition and he had fulfilled his part of the deal. Had flown into her mouth and out again.

For a moment, he thought she would not honour the bargain, that this dance would resume, and that he would have to fight her to the death, which he was not sure he could do without wasting a great deal of time or injuring himself gravely in the process.

But then she scowled. And dipped her hood once. Like a duck dipping its head for a drink of water.

‘It is true,’ she said. ‘You have done what no being before you has been able to do until today. You have entered my mouth and lived to tell the tale.’ Her ruby eyes flashed dangerously at him. ‘Clever vanar.’

He shrugged, trying to appear unaffected. ‘All the cleverness I possess would not fill a thimble on my lord Rama’s little finger.’

She inclined her hood. ‘I would like to meet your lord Rama, then. If his servant is so powerful and shrewd, how great a warrior might he be?’

‘And perhaps you shall meet him,’ Hanuman said. ‘But now, I must be on my way.’

‘Goodbye, then, clever vanar. I do not know if you will accomplish your goal. For Ravana has many, many allies like me waiting to defend his kingdom. But I think I will watch with great interest how you fare in the fight. And perhaps it would please me to see you succeed. After all, if you vanquished me but stay unvanquished yourself, then that would mean I was bested by the very best of all.’

‘In point of fact, Sarasa, I only outwitted you. To vanquish you I would have to kill you.’ He added playfully: ‘Which I have no doubt I could easily do, if I had a few more minutes to spare!’

She hissed at him. ‘Silence! Insolent two-legged creature! Now go your way and unite your lady Sita with her husband. I have better things to do than to stand around here bickering with vanars all day! Go before I change my mind and swallow you again!’

He smiled and flew past her. But he kept his eyes on her until he was well out of lunging distance. She remained where she was, watching him. But she made no move to come after him. Like all ancient ones, she was true to her word.

Finally, he turned his back upon her, and flew the last few miles to Lanka.

THREE

In the leafy shade of the Ashoka grove, Sita stood on one leg, performing a pranayam exercise to help clear her mind of fear and anxiety. It was the first free spell she had had since regaining consciousness in Lanka. The rakshasis were within sight of her, but kept their distance. They had been instructed to do so. After the chain-lashing she had given them in the sabha hall, they would gladly have torn her to pieces the instant she was back in this place. Vikata, in particular, seethed visibly with blood-lust, eager to do to Sita as she had done to her own companion, the unfortunate Trijata. The memory of the savagery with which Vikata, and then the other rakshasis, had fallen upon their own fellow sakhi had haunted Sita. If these beasts could do that to their friend, what might they not do to her?

But the lord of Lanka's orders had been explicit, and she had a feeling that Ravana brooked no disobedience. So ever since leaving the sabha hall, they had not dared to lay a finger upon her. The endless litany of taunts and abuse, as well as the relentless prodding and scratching, had not resumed as well, and that was a relief.

But she knew they were only biding their time. The rakshasis knew their moment would come soon enough. She had no way to tell time in this unnatural place, but from the references to 'after nightfall' and 'tonight at midnight' made in the sabha hall, she had guessed it was still day at the time. Now, several hours had passed, and it was probably closer to evening. Not long now. Not long before they came for her and put an end to this farcical travesty.

If not for the unborn life within her womb, she might almost welcome it.

No. I will not think that. Death will come when it will. But I must fight it to the very end. If not for my own sake, then for the sake of my child. Our child. Mine and Rama's.

That was her reason for living, for fighting on, for waging this unequal battle as best as she could. It was her sole motivation for her defiant display in the sabha hall. She had felt a burning need to speak out against the injustice being done to her, yes, to lash out at those despicable beings for pretending to dispense justice, in the name of dharma, of all things. Dharma! Even Vibhisena, that Brahmin brother of Ravana, had not raised his voice at the end, either because he dared not, or because he had no further argument to offer. The judgement had been made, sentence passed, and the time for execution approached.

But still she might have held her peace and allowed herself to be led from the hall in stony silence. Only the thought of her unborn child had driven her, compelled her to speak out and make an effort to appeal to any shred of decency that might exist in this godless land.

And what had she achieved by that? Nothing, it seemed. The execution was to go ahead as planned. The hours were wasting away. She did not doubt that Rama would come for her, that he would find a way to come to Lanka and fight for her release. But it did not seem likely he would reach in time. It was too much to expect of him, that he would arrive in the very nick of time, literally at the eleventh hour, and carry her away in a golden flying chariot.

What was it that one of the rakshasis had said—was it Vikata? ‘She has no champions here.’ It was true. And yet, she was a Kshatriya princess, a swordmistress of Arya. She could champion her own cause. If she could but lay her hands on a weapon, she would show them how Arya women fought—and died, if need be. She was willing to risk all to protect her honour and dignity. If nothing else, she would slay as many as she could before she fell, and she would fall praising Rama’s name with her last breath.

But she had more than herself to think of now.

She had another life to think about. She must cherish that helpless, unborn life. Nurture it until it was ready to join this world.

It was for the sake of that life that she had partaken of some little nourishment and water. Just enough to sustain herself.

She breathed out slowly one last time, then cleansed the crowded slate of her mind of all thoughts and worries. She began her twice-daily cycle of prayer to the goddess Sri. Not knowing when sunrise and sundown came in this unnatural environ, she had taken to performing her ablutive prayer ritual in her mind at roughly twelve hour intervals, judging the time as best as she could. But now she spoke aloud and prayed wholeheartedly to the goddess. Pouring out her heart's burden and raising her hopes to that ultimate court of appeal.

She was a little more than halfway through the one hundred and eight repetitions of the sacred shloka praising Sri when the familiar voice spoke.

‘My lady.’

There was no mistaking Ravana's voice. Somehow, even though he spoke from different mouths each time, often changing face in the middle of a sentence, yet his voice always sounded the same. That same intonation. That flawless Sanskrit diction. That perfect pronunciation.

She continued the recitation without losing a beat. A part of her felt a twinge of surprise when he did not interrupt her again, but still she sensed that he still stood waiting behind her. She paid him no heed. Nothing would interrupt her ishtaa this time, the first she had performed in Lanka.

It took her a long while to finish. When she was done, she bowed and touched her head to the oblong-shaped black stone she had used as a symbolic effigy, opening her loosely held fist and showering the stone with the flowers she had picked for the purpose. She added a fruit, a portion of her own meagre meal, as prasadam. She had already washed and figuratively clothed the effigy with a strip of cloth from her own tattered garment. Crude as the arrangements may be, she made up for them with her love and devotion, leaving no step untaken, taking her time with the ritual, uncaring of whether the lord of asuras himself waited behind her. Only when she was satisfied did she rise, back away three full steps, then turn.

Ravana was standing before her. His own hands were folded as well, heads bowed. She saw the lips of more than one of his heads moving as if reciting a shloka. He unjoined his palms and looked up at her with all his glittering eyes.

Her voice, so soft and melodic during the prayer ritual, turned stony and caustic as she addressed him. ‘Have you come to torment me again?’

He seemed to take no offence at her words or her tone. ‘My lady, if I wished to torment you, I would have locked you in the dungeons beneath this tower. Not kept you in the uppermost level under the highest level of security.’

‘Security?’ She almost laughed.

‘Yes, your own security. You might not know this, but the kingdom is in an uproar over the murder of the rakshasi Trijata. Many of my generals and nobles believe that I should throw you to the people and let them exact the justice they feel you deserve. Yet—’

‘Why don’t you do it, then?’

He continued as if she had not interrupted. ‘Yet I have gone to extraordinary lengths to ensure that you are given the full protection you deserve under the law.’

This time, she did laugh bitterly. ‘I have seen your law at work. False accusations, rampant bias, it is a travesty of the very concept of justice.’

‘Nevertheless, you have been treated as fairly as could be expected under the circumstances. Did you honestly expect a mortal in the land of Lanka to be regarded with any less hostility and derision? I would wager a year’s harvest of blood-apples that a rakshasa in Ayodhya would not receive the same. You have been treated as well as could be expected under the circumstances, my lady. You should be grateful for that small mercy.’

She folded her hands across her chest. ‘I hardly call the treatment meted out by your wife and her rakshasis merciful. They spared me no pain or abuse. And before that, your own cousin sought to slay me. This, of course, was all before I was dragged in chains to a humiliating public hall, accused of a crime I did not commit, given no chance to speak in my defense, and summarily condemned to death.’ She shook her head firmly. ‘Do not speak to me of mercy or fair treatment.’

‘Have I treated you unfairly or unmercifully?’

She grimaced. ‘You mean, apart from wresting me by brute force from my husband’s house and carrying me off like a slain doe?’

He sighed. ‘My lady. Let us move past these old arguments. Try to see your situation in the present light. You are condemned to be executed within a few hours. People have already begun gathering in the city square to witness your execution.’

Which meant it was probably close to sundown. ‘And yet you speak to me of mercy and fairness.’

‘Yes. Because I am not one of those baying for your blood.’

‘I see.’ She tried not to ask the obvious question: Why is that? Why do you pretend to be so fair and merciful to me? ‘And yet in the sabha, you endorsed the verdict. I did not hear you overturn it or put it aside. You showed little mercy or fairness there.’

‘True. Because I am only the chosen liege of my people. Not a tyrant or a dictator. All rakshasas in Lanka are free to feel differently and act upon their feelings. It was not always so, but it is so now in the new, resurrected Lanka.’ He paused a moment, as if musing on how things had once been and how they were now. She had time enough to think that it was an odd word to use, resurrected. Then he continued: ‘Still, I did prevail upon Mandodhari to cease this needless persecution. Even now, as I arrived, you were able to perform your evening ritual undisturbed, were you not?’

She shook her head in disbelief, genuinely amazed at his barefaced lying. ‘You dare to speak of Mandodhari? Her actions were motivated entirely by the falsehoods you told her about my husband and myself. If you had not spun that pack of lies about Rama, she would never have come to hate me with such vehemence. Nor would she have turned her rakshasis upon me. Even when they murdered their own associate and I was falsely accused of the crime, it was you who were responsible for that accusation. Do not think I am too naive to see through your stratagems. Do not be fooled by my apparent passivity. I see and hear and understand everything. This is all a well-spun contrivance designed to suit your purpose. I see through it and I see your hand in everything that happens to me.’

‘Then you must see that I am responsible for the good that comes to you as well,’ he said mildly.

She stared at him, trying to guess which face would address her next. It was unnerving not knowing, being unable to know which face to look at when speaking. It also meant, she warned herself, that he could present a good face, and a bad, and eight shades between as well. ‘Good?’ She laughed bitterly. ‘What good have you done me?’

‘I spared you in the sabha hall when you threatened and insulted the honour of my throne. I have called off the rakshasis. I have requested my wife not to visit you again. She is very upset with me, for even though these may seem like small things to you, they are very great sacrifices for us. Would the king of Ayodhya spare a prisoner of war who behaved in his court as you did earlier today?’

She ignored his question. ‘You claim to do so much for me. And yet you intend to have me executed at midnight tonight. Death. By eating alive.’ She imitated the singsong chorus of the rakshasa nobles passably well.

‘Not I. You heard it yourself. Lanka willed it. The decision to condemn and execute you was a collective one, based on the facts at our disposal.’

‘But I did not murder her!’ she said, struggling to keep her voice level. ‘It was the other rakshasis who did it.’ She turned, intending to point out Vikata. But the rakshasis were gone from the spot where they had been standing before she began her prayers. She scanned the grove.

‘I asked them to leave us for a while,’ he said quietly. ‘What I have to discuss with you is not meant for their ears.’

She shook her head once. ‘I have nothing to discuss with you. I expect no justice or redressal from one such as you. I have already spoken my heart in your court. Execute me as your sabha decreed. I have said my last prayers and am prepared to face the end of this life.’

She turned her back on him, showing that she was unafraid. Of him. And death.

But in truth, it was because she feared that he might see her face and know the truth. That she was not ready at all. That she wished to live. That she still hoped against hope that somehow, a way could be found to save her unborn child and carry it to term.

‘It would be a shame for you to die,’ he said. ‘For one so beautiful and noble and rich of heart to end her life in such a manner. Eaten alive by rakshasis in a public spectacle. Is that how you wish your life to end?’

She did not answer. There was no right answer to that question. But her heart pounded faster. Was he doing what she thought he was doing? Hinting to her that there might still be a way out of this? Surely she was reading too much into his words and tone.

‘I do not think so,’ he said, answering his own question. ‘I think you wish to live. And you may do so yet.’

She resisted the temptation to turn around. But she was listening to his words with a sick fascination. What new tortuous design had he dreamed up now? Did he really believe that she would fall for his lies and deception yet again? How arrogant could he be, to think she would be duped for the third time?

In any case, she told herself firmly, there is nothing he can say that I will believe. There is no way he can undo the decision of his court without proving himself to be the very things he claims not to be: a tyrant and a dictator.

‘There is one way. And one way only. I cannot repeal the decision of the court. For it is the decision of the people. And because we are a race that believes in dharma, even a king cannot overturn his people’s verdict. But there is a small chance that we may be able to save your life and persuade the people to take back their decision. There is one circumstance under which they may yet change their minds and agree to spare your life.’

Still she kept her back turned to him, unwilling to show him that she cared a whit for his words. But her heart pounded loudly, deafeningly. The blood roared in her head. Her stomach, long deprived of nourishment, churned its own acids. When Ravana spoke again, each of his words struck at her like a javelin point wielded by an unseen assailant striking from behind her, stuck over and over into her flesh, piercing her heart.

‘All you have to do is tell them that the life you bear in your womb is of my making.’

FOUR

He decided to land on the rim of the island and spy out the lay of the land before proceeding further. The sight of a giant vanar crashing down in the heart of their city might scare the Lankans into concealing Sita somewhere where he might not find her easily.

This way, he would be able to seek her out stealthily, and, when the time was right, expand himself and execute his rescue.

All his life he had thought of Lanka as an island of horrors. Crawling with nightmarish demons of every hue. He had assumed the very soil and grass to be alien, perverted. But the beach he landed on seemed the very twin of the beach whence he had departed the mainland. The sand crunched gritty beneath the soles of his feet, baked searing hot by the sun. The sea was gentle and calm, sloshing peacefully upto his calves, the froth tickling his soles as it drained into the porous sand. Gulls flew overhead, splattering the blackrock strewn about the beach with their white splashes. Even the cliffs rising up from the beach were similar to the cliff face on the mainland. Perhaps once in a past age, the island of Lanka had been a part of the great subcontinent his kind called Jambudwipa, and which the Aryas called Aryavarta. Perhaps Ravana himself had split it from the larger land-mass through his sorcery. That would mean that these cliffs rising before him were once affixed to the cliff face of the mountain he knew as Mahendra. He examined the line of the cliff closely. Yes, he would wager that the two cliffs were kin. In which case, it was more than likely that this cliff was also riddled with labyrinthine caves. And if those caves went far enough, they would take him nearer to the city more discreetly than an overland route.

He leaped up into the air, towards the cliffs. Hovering in mid-air, he scanned the cliff face intently. Soon enough, he spotted what he was looking for: a spot where the sunlight did not gleam off the lichen-encrusted blackrock but was swallowed up entirely. He flew to that spot and saw at once that it was the mouth of a cave. He alighted lightly, congratulating himself on his control over his flying ability. Two strides forward and his forehead struck a low, hanging lip of rock. The rock shattered, showering him with debris. He made a mental note not to congratulate himself too quickly. He still had a fair amount to learn about the exercise of his powers.

The cave curved and twisted, turning back upon itself. The sunlit mouth fell far behind, and soon he was in near darkness.

But he was still able to see by the light of some greenish substance that coated the irregular walls. Rubbing his finger against a wall, he saw that it was the same lichen that grew on the blackrock outside. Apparently, in pitch darkness, it gave off some kind of luminescence. The greenish light was very faint but his vision adjusted quickly and he was able to see his way well enough.

He stayed alert for sounds or scents. The cave smelled faintly of rakshasas, but none seemed to have passed this way recently. As he ventured deeper into the heart of the winding labyrinth, the scents grew stronger and more recent. He paused several times to choose a way between two separate caves, and sometimes three or more separate diversions. Each time he followed the stronger smelling way. At no time did he scent any mortal.

After travelling thus for what seemed like hours, he finally came to a place where the cave opened into a larger cavern. He moved through several successively larger caverns, until he came out through a wet passageway into which fresh water dripped constantly from a crack in the roof, and found himself in the largest subterranean chamber he had ever seen in his life.

It seemed to be a cave. But could not be. No cave could be so vast. Or so perfectly smoothed on all sides. Like the inside of an eggshell. He guessed it must be the work of sorcery again. It was the first unnatural thing he had encountered in Lanka.

There was no sign of life in here, but he sensed something. He walked out into the centre of the cavern floor, where a great heap of rubble lay. As he approached, he saw the rubble was glowing with a reddish light and stopped warily while still a distance away. It seemed to be the debris of a large slab of redstone. But what force had shattered it? He looked upwards and saw a mouth in the ceiling of the cavern, tapering towards the centre, like a giant funnel. The hole at the very top was lost in darkness. Had something fallen from up there, shattering this slab? He shrugged. It did not matter either way. Sita was not here. He could smell the faint stench of rakshasas, but the scent was several months old. But in the rubble, the debris of the shattered slab, he smelled the unmistakable odour of one particular rakshasa, fouler and more fetid than any scent he had smelled. He suspected that it was Ravana's scent. But it was as old as the other scents.

He grew impatient and decided he must move faster. He sniffed his way to the far side of the cavern, finding a crevice where the scent of rakshasas was strongest and most recent. He sensed that the city of Lanka lay that way, to the south-west of the island. He debated flying up through the roof of the cavern and up to the surface, but decided that proceeding underground was wiser.

He moved through the crevice as far as he could go. When he came up against a rough rock wall, he hesitated only briefly, then bunched his fists and struck at the wall. The rock shattered as easily as limestone at a hammer's blow. He waited, listening for any signs that he might have alerted some rakshasa sentry somewhere in the bowels of the island. But there was nothing to be heard or smelt for miles around. All his senses told him that the rakshasas lay that way. He clasped his hands together in a wrestler's hammer and swung them at the rockwall. The rock shattered again, and he passed bodily through it, like a knife through butter. He flew with his clasped fists before his head, driving through the bedrock. He picked up momentum, flying through the rock. Debris and dust spewed in his wake.

He drilled on, moving as rapidly as a horse galloping over open ground travelled. He paused every few miles to get his bearings and take a scent-bearing again. Finally, after some twenty yojanas, he judged that he was close to the city of Lanka and began to fly upwards, breaking through the rock just as easily. Even deep within the bowels of the earth, the unmistakable stench of asura blood had seeped in. He grimaced. Much blood had been spilled on the ground above. The earth was heavy with the weight of all those slaughtered souls. He smelled the residue of volcanic effluents, and recalled what Sampati the vulture had told Jambavan and him about there being a great volcano on Lanka once. He also smelled the stench of burnt flesh as he rose through the tortured earth, and connected the smell with the great fires that had razed the old black fortress and city of Lanka to the ground, fourteen years earlier. It took all his self-will to keep from being overwhelmed by the residue of misery and pain that remained in this soil. It was true after all: this land was cursed. You only had to dig deep enough to see it.

He broke through the surface at last, and had to fight the temptation to simply fly up into the sky and leave the stench and pain below. He scanned his surroundings quickly, smelling the scent of rakshasas powerfully here. Recent smells, from only hours earlier. But none were nearby at present. He examined his surroundings and was taken aback.

He was in some kind of garden. It was breathtakingly beautiful, the entire landscape meticulously laid out and maintained. Fountains of water sprang up, walkways wound their way through groves of beautiful flora and every variety of tree and plant imaginable. It was a cornucopia of beautiful, growing things. He had grown up hearing vanars speak with awe and pride of the gardens of Vrindavan, where the famed honey wine of Kiskindha was made. But this garden made even Vrindavan seem a backyard plot in comparison. He climbed a tall ash and looked in one direction then another, seeing only miles upon square miles of fountains and pathways, ponds and flower gardens. After travelling through the cursed bedrock of Lanka, seeped with the stench of countless slaughtered asura, the scents of the garden were heavenly. He marvelled at the existence of such beauty and perfection on an island of monsters.

Then he turned and looked the other way, and there it was. Less than a yojana away, rising from the ground in a bouquet of pristine white spires and towers and vaulting arches, more beautiful than anything he had ever imagined. The complete antithesis of the nightmarish hell-land he had been raised to expect.

The city of Lanka.

Supanakha watched the vanar leap from the ash tree and land with an impact that left the imprints of his bare feet permanently embedded in the grassy knoll. He ran through the picturesque pathways of the royal botanical gardens, moving quickly and discreetly. The image turned and altered, the molecules of water spinning and changing place and colour to follow him as he made his way towards Lanka. She crept around the bowl, still keeping her distance from the holy water, snarling silently at the intruder's image.

The image collapsed abruptly, the water splashing back into the vessel. Supanakha leaped back to avoid a few droplets that splashed her way.

‘You did that deliberately.’

Ravana grinned at her. ‘There is work to be done, cousin. I have to go speak to the prisoner. I am sure you will find something with which to occupy yourself.’

‘But what of the vanar?’

Ravana's heads were already distracted, turning away. ‘What of him?’

‘He is in Lanka! He intends to rescue the mortal. Won't you stop him?’

Ravana laughed. ‘Do you expect me, king of rakshasas, Lakshaman Lanka, to belittle myself by wrestling a mere messenger? A vanar, at that?’

‘But you saw what he can do. How he dealt with Mainika and then Sarasa. He's no ordinary messenger.’ She licked her chops. ‘He seems to be gifted with great powers.’

Ravana's heads examined her shrewdly. ‘Why don't you deal with him?’

She feigned surprise. ‘Me? Why me?’

‘Sometimes, guile can triumph where brute force fails. As you just pointed out, he appears to be gifted with great abilities. It would be a waste of resources pitting one of my champions against him. Oh, I'm sure they would defeat him eventually, but it might be more interesting to see how your gift fares against his gifts.’

‘My gift?’

‘Seduction, cousin dear. Coupled with your ability to transform your appearance. I'm sure that you could find a form that would be attractive enough to stop even a vanar as resolute as he dead in his tracks.’

She allowed herself a catty smile. She loved praise. ‘I suppose I could think of something.’

‘And if my knowledge of vanars serves me well, they are a female-dominated species. It is the woman who initiates fornication, and the male invariably complies. For the sake of the perpetuation of the species, of course.’

‘Of course,’ she purred.

‘So if you were to use your seductive skills effectively enough, you might be able to succeed where a dozen of my best fighters might not.’

‘Might?’ She snarled in protest. Softly.

‘You certainly will succeed. Because all I need is one more night. Before sunrise tomorrow, the last die will be cast. And then Rama can send a thousand champions like that one, each capable of expanding himself to the size of the moon and the sun, and it will be of no avail. The most important battle will be won by me.’

Supanakha inclined her head, gazing curiously at the rakshasa lord. ‘What battle?’

‘Nothing that concerns you. You wished to toy with the vanar. You have your wish. If you play your part well, you will spend a very enjoyable night, with a partner far more enjoyable than you’ve had for a long while, I’ll wager.’

‘Surely,’ she said. ‘But I’m curious too. The mortal woman has already been condemned. She is to be executed at midnight tonight, in full view of all Lanka. If the excitement I smelled in this sabha hall was any indication, then you can expect every one of your law-abiding, tax-paying, flesh-eating citizens to be present in the city square to witness her execution. I hope you don’t intend to disappoint them?’

He spread his arms in mock protest. ‘How could I? You heard the council’s decision. Lanka has voted that she be put to death. Who am I to alter that democratic writ?’

‘Only the king of Lanka,’ she said. ‘And a tyrant so terrible the devas named him Ra-van-a. He Who Makes The Universe Scream.’

He wagged a finger at her. ‘You misjudge me sorely. That appellation is offensive. I am no longer that person. Besides, those cruel times called for cruel measures. If every one of us were to be called by the names our enemies chose for us, we would all have very ugly names indeed.’

‘Ah.’ She chuckled throatily. ‘You have something very naughty planned, I’m sure of it. I can’t guess what it might be. But I know you, cousin dearest. You will find a way to have the mortal woman for your own, won’t you? I saw the light in your eyes when you came to speak with her. Never before had I seen you act so ... gentlemanly. Why, you seemed almost human! But even that brilliant performance couldn’t disguise your lust for her. You want her, don’t you? And you want to win her over by talk and emotional bonding, the way foolish mortals do. Not the rakshasa or gandharva way, the natural way. That was why you have been treating her so kindly, so respectfully.’ She flicked her tail sharply, like a whip cracking. ‘What do you think, cousin? If you win her over by sweet words and emotional blackmail, it will be more honourable than simply ravishing her outright? Is deceptive seduction more respectable than rape? Is that why you manoeuvred the prisoner into that moral cul- de-sac, pinning a false charge of murder upon her? So you could make her more vulnerable to your seductive wiles?’ She chuckled softly, flicking her tail again, brushing the tip against his foot, tantalisingly, teasingly. ‘You know, I don’t think you’ve changed much at all. Not at heart, where it matters anyway. You’re still the same old Ravana. Except you wield a sweet candystick instead of a chopping axe. And sweeter words where you would have used poisoned arrows before.’

An impatient flicker rippled across Ravana’s rack of faces. ‘Enough banter, cousin. It’s been entertaining listening to your theories. Do you intend to stay talking all night or do you still wish to intercept the intruder?’

She feigned a thoughtful expression. ‘I suppose as long as I’m still in the king’s favour, I ought to make the best use of it.’

One of the heads grimaced. ‘One of these days, it might be instructive to remind you of your place. But let us not waste any more time on this foolish talk. If you still wish to dally with the vanar tonight, it would be well to seduce him before he enters the city. You will have to move quickly if you are to do that.’

He turned to go, gesturing casually to open a portal before him. Through it, she could see the foliage and shrubbery of the forest level of the tower. He moved to step through the portal, then paused and turned a head back.

‘Remember, all I need is for you to keep him occupied until daybreak. After that, you may do with him as you please.’

Without waiting for her answer, he stepped through and the portal winked shut behind him.

She purred in anticipation. ‘I will, cousin, I will do with him exactly as I please ...’

FIVE

It was a city of gold. So beautiful, so perfect, he could not imagine any other existed to rival it. If a group of apsaras had appeared, greeted and garlanded him, and told him this was Vaikunta, the city-home of Lord Vishnu himself, he would not have doubted them. Or Amravati, the capital city of the devas, eternally resplendent. Indraloka perhaps, seat of power of Indra, lord of the devas. Or even Swargaloka itself, the most superior level of heaven.

But instead, this was Lanka ... Lanka! City of demons and adharma. Home of all ugliness and immorality. A vile and fetid place of blood and vomit and offal ... The list of clichés rolled off so easily, the cumulative residue of a thousand treetop talks and grandma’s tales. Foothold of the demon races on the mortal realm, land of death and darkness, kingdom of terror.

And yet the reality lay sprawled before him. Golden. Gleaming. Pristine.

Beautiful.

Lanka.

He was perched on the top of a great wall, some hundred yards high, that bordered the city limits. No doubt the wall was provided for defence, but there were no guards visible for miles in either direction. Even the enormous golden gates were open, as if inviting the world itself to enter and be welcome. So much for Lanka's formidable defenses and hostility to strangers.

It had taken him only a single leap to bound to the top, but the wall itself had given him pause for long moments. He glanced down doubtfully now, at the broad yards-thick rampart gleaming in the dusky light of the setting sun and reconfirmed what he had seen when he first approached it. The entire surface of the wall was plated with beaten gold, welded so perfectly that he could not discern a seam or joint; it was inlaid with an exquisite pattern into which precious stones had been embedded. He raised his head and looked one way, then the other, sniffing in incredulity. For miles upon miles the wall extended in both directions, a hundred yards tall and five yards wide, stretching around the base of the great mountain upon which the city was built, circling its enormous periphery. And every square inch of it was plated with solid gold and inlaid with those gems. He had not known so much gold and treasure existed in the world, nor that rakshasa skill could craft such perfection. He had licked the gold, not believing it was real. It was. The stones were real too: pearls of many colours, and lapis lazuli, onyx, diamonds of every known hue and several unknown or unimagined. What defensive wall was covered with ornamentation enough to fill the coffers of a dozen kingdoms? What citizenry, however happy and content, could pass such a gaudy display of wealth without being tempted at least once to pry loose a diamond, or even a lapis? And yet, not a gem was missing, not one gold plate out of place.

On both sides of the great wall were gardens more beautiful than the ones in the tales he had heard about the heavenly realms. He had already passed through the outer gardens to reach the wall, and they were exquisite in their immaculate perfection. The inner gardens extended for many miles, acre upon acre of undulating beauty. Meticulously landscaped walkways and lotus ponds, trees and flower fields. Several miles on, the land rose steadily upward, racing to meet its destination. The beautiful tree-lined marg that passed through the golden gates rose too, undulating in gentle, chariot-easy curves to enter an unwalled city. And that city was built in a spiralling series of layers around an impossibly tall, white tower, whose peak reached up so high beyond the red-tinged clouds of sunset that he could not see the top.

The rising layers of the city, built upon the mountainside, were easily accessible to his enhanced vision. As he watched in stupefied wonder, lights came on across the city, to dispel the twilight duskiness. Even these were unspeakably beautiful: not the flickering, guttering jaundice light of oil-dipped torches, but a kind of illumination he had never seen before. White luminescence tinged with rainbow hues, like drops of moonlight distilled and captured in beautifully shaped lamps, illuminating the great sprawling city and turning it into the aspect of a giant oyster, opening slowly to reveal an unimaginable treasure trove of pearls. As the lights came on across Lanka, he held his breath. It seemed something far greater than a city. A jewel box, perhaps, fit for a goddess on her wedding night.

He concentrated his senses, attuning them more finely than was possible by normal means. Granting himself the power to see, smell, hear, sense so acutely that he might as well have been there, in the heart of the city itself, walking about among the lakhs of rakshasas that inhabited Lanka like an invisible surveyor.

The moon, visible in the fading dusky light, seemed a part of the city itself, another proud ornament in this resplendent display. Somehow, he sensed, the ethereal illumination that provided light to the city was derived through some magical process from the lustre of the moon itself. As the light of the celestial orb fell upon the parts of the metropolis that sunlight had abandoned, the lamps that hung from every mansion and dwelling captured its silvery luminescence and trapped it within their bellies.

The awakening of these moonlit jewel-like sconces made everything seem even more splendid and breathtaking. It reminded Hanuman of a night when he had followed a dying great tusker for two days and a night, and after a winding, tortuous journey through the most remote reaches of the redmist ranges, he had finally watched the great jumbo reach a secret spot, tumble to its knees and lay itself down in a graveyard of dead elephants. He had gazed with awe and reverence upon that legendary spot. The gleaming pile of ivory in that secret place had formed an intricate pattern of its own over the centuries, perhaps even millennia; a pattern that resembled a white maze that glowed from within in the sacred illumination of the moonlight, as if marking the pathway to another realm. He had imagined that it was exactly that: a pathway for the souls of dead elephants to travel to the next life. It was a moment that had remained with him forever.

But to see a place made and designed and constructed by living hands—by rakshasas, no less!—that evoked the same emotion within his breast was confusing and maddening.

His omniscient eyes flickered this way, then that, seeing, drinking in, barely able to accept the evidence of his senses. He could hear music now, sweet music, wafting on the air. He could hear laughter and conversation, love-making and childplay. Carousing went on in those countless mansions and buildings. Chariots rode the avenues, driven by richly clad rakshasas, both male and female. Palanquins bore veiled rakshasi women to and from secret trysts and public appointments. Everywhere he looked, he saw only beauty and luxury. Even the clothes and jewels that draped the bodies of the denizens were scintillating. Far from the ugly and deformed brutish aspects of most rakshasas he had seen or heard of, almost every single individual he saw was handsomely made in form and face. Some were extraordinary, gifted with divine beauty. He found himself barely able to tear his gaze away from a beauty who watched from an overhead balcony, her body naked for all to see, biting daintily into a blood-red apple, available to any who wished to come and enjoy her embrace.

There was ugliness too, here. For rakshasas were not formed in the likeness of vanars or even mortals. They were horned and tusked, pig-faced and wolf-snouted, carapaced and chitinous, ichor-oozing and slime-trailing. But somehow, in this place, their natural habitat—if one could term a city as natural—even the ugliest specimens seemed to find a place in the larger scheme of things. Just as even the most hideous creeping insect seems vile when perched upon one's leg or arm, but perfectly suited to its natural environment, so now the vilest looking rakshasas seemed to be an essential part of the great beauty of Lanka. What was more, seen thus in their home setting, even their hideous aspect, so distasteful when compared to the smoother lines and limbs of mortals or vanars, seemed almost attractive. Beautiful, even. Even the most repellent rhinoceros appears perfect when seen with his mate and young ones in the secret, dappled glades of the deep forest.

So it was to Hanuman's empowered gaze that even the natural ugliness of Lanka seemed wholly natural, a welcome counterpoint to the exquisite beauty that was everywhere and would have been overwhelming without some balance. And he was impressed and awed by this observation.

There were angry debates and drunken brawls. Rants and raves. Bold accusations and even bolder denials. Gruff laughter and raucous parties. He smelled the odours of rakshasi women anointing themselves with unguents and cosmetic enhancements. Despite the legends painting rakshasas as un pitying black-hearted demons, he saw now that here were many shades to the race. Just as the worth of a jewel could not be judged by any one facet alone, but by appraising all its facets, so also the rakshasa nation was a multifaceted entity, replete with all the hues and variances that nature provided all her children. He heard mantras chanted and shlokas recited, by pious rakshasas, and smelled the ghee sizzling in the sacrificial fires. He focussed his potent vision on different places across the city, seeking out individuals at random, and saw rakshasas strikingly handsome as well as hideously ugly, virtuous-acting and rowdy brutes. Love-making and carousing, fornicating and fighting. Women illuminated by their own beauty, nestled in their lovers' arms. Pairs and groups on terraces of splendored mansions, enjoying the moonlight and each other's company. Women whose feet tinkled delicately as they walked, or ran, or danced. Rakshasas with skin the colour of molten gold, others with skin like moonlight. Many alone. Many reclining in their homes and contemplating, studying sacred texts, or uttering profane words to their spouses or companions.

None of them were Sita.

He looked high and low, seeking with the aid of his heightened senses. He scanned hundreds and hundreds of rakshasi women, moon-bright faces, sun-glowing countenances, eyes with lashes that curled like butterflies, neck ornaments that shimmered like garlands of lightning, women whose eyes glowed like black pearls, twinkled like the sun in eclipse sprinkled with motes of gold, clad in tiger and lion skins, naked and resplendent, beautiful and alluring, dangerous and desirable. He scoured the inner rooms and private chambers, seeking, probing, searching out. He saw sights of unimaginable couplings that would have aroused the most debauched bachelor. Scenes of heartbreaking romance and tenderness that evoked a desire to join in, become part of that family, that very moment. Sights of friendship and brotherhood, the exchanging of vows and the taking of blood-oaths, the sharing of sisters' secrets, the betraying of marital bonds, the spurning of proposals and the acceptance of invitations. He saw scenes of majestic grandeur as nobility paraded its wealth and power, and scenes of unspeakable degradation and domination. Submission and capitulation. Brutality and remorse. Virtuosity and virtuousness. Purity and high-mindedness. Intellectual debate and foul abuses. He scanned the faces of thousands upon thousands of women, moonbright faces, eyes with great curling lashes, breasts decorated with ornaments that glittered like princely prizes. Heard sweet voices and smelled sweeter perfumes. Guttural accents and gutter-worthy lewdness. Tears and tenderness. Profanity and prudishness.

He sought out Sita, seeking her as if she might be a barely visible flash of moonlight, a glimpse of gold hidden in the dust, an arrow-wound obscured by seeping blood, a fragment of cloud torn to shreds by the wind ...

The evening drew on, night fell, the lights of the city blazed with their tantalising rainbow-tinted hues, and the oyster of Lanka opened fully to his potent senses, as he searched on relentlessly, resisting a thousand temptations, passing over countless distractions, overcoming a hundred unwanted thoughts and desires and urges inspired by the things he saw heard and done.

By the time the moon was fully risen over the city, a luminous pearl floating over the oyster from which it had escaped, he had searched all of the conceivable places within the city without finding any trace of Sita. Traversing the wall to circumscribe the mountain, he had used his empowered senses to scan virtually every possible place where Sita might have been imprisoned. His choices were not infinite: Ravana would hardly have kept her upon an open terrace or even in any of the numerous mansions or buildings. She would almost certainly be under heavy guard, a prisoner. And not just a prisoner in a city gaol; she would be imprisoned close to where Ravana himself resided and ruled. Which left only his royal palace. But which of those magnificent mansions was the palace? He saw many important-looking structures, each vying with the rest for claim to being the city's most luxurious, most elegant showcase of wealth and prosperity and power. Yet none was significantly larger than the rest. Back in Kiskindha, the king's tree-palace was several times as large as any of the others. He expected it to be much the same. He had scoured all the palaces and mansions and estates of Lanka, which left only one likely spot.

His gaze rose to the towering white structure that dominated and dwarfed the rest of the city. The tower tapered gradually as it rose. In the cloudless night, the moonlight reflected off the length of the tower for as far up as he could see—and he could see a hundred miles high, or farther, if he so desired. He could not estimate exactly how tall the peak was, indeed, each time he tried to follow its length with his eyes, his gaze seemed to slip. It was like counting the rings on the stump of a very ancient redwood tree. As you got closer to the centre, the rings were so tightly banded, if you lost your concentration for even a fraction of a moment, you had to start all over. Except that here, he was not losing concentration; it was as if the tower itself were changing height. But how could that be? He reminded himself that this was Lanka. And that phenomenon was itself proof that the white tower was undoubtedly the personal domain of Ravana. The more he examined it and probed it and tried to look within its milky opalescence, the more it resisted his scrutiny. He could not sense any distinctive smell from it, nor hear a single sound from within its moon-white walls. Most oddly, there seemed to be no one coming or going, nor any sign of an ingress. Not so much as a doorway or a window along its entire miles-long length, let alone a gateway and ramp. If it was a palace, it was the strangest he had ever heard of. Yet he had nowhere else left to look. Unlikely as it seemed, he must explore the possibility that Sita might be within that edifice. Since he could not scout it out from here, he must enter the city and breach the tower. The hour was already late.

He was about to reduce himself to the size of a gnat, after debating that subterfuge was the most effective disguise until he located his goal, when the apparition appeared.

SIX

At first he thought her to be a mist blowing from the direction of the sea. Then, as the cloud of mist approached closer, it coalesced to a more solid form. Taking the shape of a mortal woman in flowing robes. Yet she was no mortal, that was evident. She floated upon the air itself, as high as the top of the wall on which he crouched. Ethereal and angelic, she had an aura of celestial beauty that enraptured him at first sight. A devi, perhaps. At the very least, a gandharva or apsara descended from the heavenly realms.

He was on his guard at once, had in fact never lowered his guard since entering Lanka. But as he probed her with his empowered senses, he was surprised to find that she bore a scent of something quite the opposite of violence or aggression: affection perhaps? Attraction, even? He thought that unlikely. But as he sniffed once more to confirm his doubt, he thought that the scent she exuded faintly was surely closer to desire than danger. In any case, one thing was certain—she meant him no harm.

She spoke. And he received another not-unpleasant shock.

He felt her voice rather than heard it. It was not like the mindspeech of Jambavan. The timbre of her voice did not reach his ears at all, nor did it sound within the chamber of his thought-cage; instead it rippled across the ether separating them, like invisible waves of vibration that washed across his person, and entered delicately through the pores of his skin, making even the tiniest hair on the back of his hands and neck quiver, flowing across the entire expanse of his mostly bare body. It was a voice that found and penetrated into the most secret, unguarded places within his person, soothing, reassuring ... arousing.

~~Who is this who dares to transgress my borders uninvited? Identify yourself, intruder.~~

He had to struggle to regain a semblance of control. Her ‘speaking’ had disarmed and disoriented him. Exerting his will, he joined his palms together in a respectful greeting. It felt the proper thing to do. ‘My lady, I am Hanuman, servant to Lord Rama of Ayodhya, presently in exile. May I know your good name?’

~~I am Lanka,~~ she said, as if that cryptic announcement was identification enough. ~~What is it you seek here? Why do you creep across my ramparts thus under cover of darkness? And before that, why did you fly across the ocean and tunnel your way through my caverns like an iron worm? From your surreptitious actions and unfamiliar visage, I fear you mean my denizens no good.~~

‘When you say you are Lanka, do you mean that you are ... ’ he hesitated, ‘ ... the spirit of this land? The governing spirit of Lanka itself?’

~~What else would I mean?~~ she said with a flicker of impatience. She gestured imperiously at the island at large. ~~This is my home, my body, my flesh and blood. I take great pride in myself and in the welfare of my denizens. It is no different from the maternal care that Prithvi Maa herself lavishes upon the denizens of the mortal realm. You have violated the sanctity of my care by stealing into this land. Speak! What is your purpose in coming here?~~

‘My lady, I will not lie to you. You say you are to the island of Lanka as Mother Nature is to the earth itself. I believe and respect you. As I said before, I serve Lord Rama. His virtuous wife Sita, who is a paragon of dharma, has been kidnapped and carried here by the rakshasa lord Ravana. I have come to seek her out and rescue her.’

~~You?~~ She looked him up and down with amazement. ~~A mere vanar?~~

He did not take offence. She could hardly be expected to know him. ‘I am armed with the weapons of faith, my lady. My lord Rama is no ordinary mortal. If he entrusted me with this important task, I must have some qualities that bear consideration.’

She floated a little higher, above the wall on which he crouched. He turned his head to follow her. She floated above and behind him, circumscribing three quarters of a circle, then descended slowly to land on the top of the wall, as gently as a feather touching the ground on a windless day. He was enchanted by her grace and her manner. Clearly accustomed to giving orders, she bore an air of great nobility and elegance. She was commanding without being dominating or superior.

Her voice wafted more gently across him as she spoke again. It thrilled the pores of his skin, like a soft perfumed summer breeze carried across a blossoming grove.

~~Indeed you must,~~ she said quietly. ~~For you have come thus far already. It is a long way from the mainland to my shores. And I witnessed the ease with which you broke your way through my subterranean bedrock. No doubt, you are no ordinary vanar.~~

A strange ripple of pleasure passed through him at her reluctant but honest praise. ‘I apologise if I have caused injury or insult to you, my lady. Such was not my intention. I seek only to find my mistress Sita and carry her home.’

She examined him silently, her face limned by moonlight. He thought he had rarely seen such a beautiful visage in his life. Even after scanning lakhs of stunningly beautiful rakshasis this past hour, she possessed an ethereal allure that affected him strangely, deeply. ~~You believe it will be that simple? Just find her and you can take her away, back to your lord Rama? Do you expect no resistance from the king of rakshasas?~~

He hesitated.

She caught his self-doubt and smiled wistfully. ~~I see you are uncertain of my loyalties. You assume that since I care for the land of Lanka, that I must be allied with the lord of this land. That assumption would be ill-founded.~~

His heart pounded suddenly. ‘My lady, you said yourself that you care for the denizens of Lanka.’

~~Whomever they might be, young vanar. It is not given to the land to choose its occupants. I merely provide and care for them. As long as I am cared for as well in return, it matters little whether they are rakshasas, other asura, mortals, devas ... or vanars even.~~

He gestured at the gardens to his right and the city to his left, without taking his eyes off her. ‘You are wise to be so open-minded. For I see that your land is very well cared for. Truth be told, my lady, I have not seen such beauty in my entire life. Never did I imagine that Lanka would be such a beautiful and spellbinding spot on earth. Yet now that I am here, I cannot deny the evidence of my own senses.'

She beamed with pleasure. ~It pleases me that you appreciate my beauty. Yes, Ravana and his people have cared well for me. And I have reciprocated by supporting their efforts. If they plant a garden, I see to it that it flourishes rapidly and stays in bloom a long while.~ A shadow passed across her face. ~Yet it was not always thus. Only a short time ago, a scant decade or so by mortal counting ... ~ She shook her head. ~But let us not speak of things that were and are no more. You are here for a purpose, serving your lord Rama, you say. And you wonder if I am allied with his enemy, Lord Ravana. Have I understood you correctly thus far?~

'Perfectly.' He adored the way the moonlight fell upon her cheekbones and the nape of her neck. And her tall graceful movements were a wonder to behold.

~Then let me set your mind at rest. I house Lord Ravana and his legions. As long as he cares for me, I care for him. The land and her people are ever intertwined. Yet tomorrow, if Ravana abuses my love and trust, I will respond in kind as well. Just as a field when overworked becomes fallow and infertile and requires a season of rest, so also a land must be allowed time to recover. Ravana respects me because he fears me. I hold the key to the secret of his immortality.~

'You—?' His eyes opened wide at this news. 'My lady, but that means you possess power over his life and—'

She raised a hand, cutting him off in mid-sentence. ~I say this not to offer you the means to his destruction, young vanar. For that would be dishonest and unfaithful on my part. The knowledge I possess is for me alone, it is not to be shared. I say this only to impress upon you that the lord of Lanka and I have an inviolable understanding. He does not violate my domain, and I stay loyal to him. Anything you say to me will not reach his ears. Why else do you think I stand here alone before you? Had I been allied with Ravana, a thousand rakshasas would already have apprehended you by now.~

He did not try to argue the point. ‘I understand, my lady. You are independent of Ravana’s influence. I see that now. You asked me if I expect no resistance from Ravana’s forces. Indeed, I expect nothing but resistance. If there is anything I do not expect, it is mercy. If discovered and apprehended, he will surely seek nothing less than my death by the most painful means. But those are not things that concern me overmuch. I am fixed only upon my single purpose: to find out and retrieve my lost mistress. May I assume that since we are allies now, you will not hinder me in my quest?’

She arched her eyebrows. Again, like all her other gestures and actions, he found this greatly pleasing to watch. ~~You leap too far, vanar. How did we progress from a simple question to becoming allies?~~

He shrugged. ‘You said you are not allied with Ravana ... ’

~~Yet it does not follow that I should therefore be allied with his enemy Rama.~~

‘Mayhap. But Rama’s is the just cause. He was wrongfully exiled and persecuted, in large part because of Ravana’s machinations. By abducting the lady Sita and bringing her here, he has transgressed the most inviolate laws of dharma. I do not ask you to aid me in any way. I am confident I will find the lady Sita on my own. When you interrupted me moments earlier, I was about to change my form and enter the city to seek her out. I ask only that you permit me to proceed without obstruction.’

She gave him a peculiar searching look. ~~If you are willing to confront the power of Ravana himself, why do you fear the obstruction of a single island-spirit? Perhaps you think you can outwit me as you did the sea serpent Sarasa, or the mountain Mainika?~~

He was impressed at her knowledge. And noted the tart tone that accompanied this comment—she was a little offended at his assumption that she could be so easily subdued, but she was also unsure of the full extent of his powers. ‘Perhaps I could, my lady. But I do not wish to. Because you are not my enemy, nor have you done anything that gives me reason to attack or offend you,’ he said seriously. ‘If you seek to obstruct me, then I have no choice but to battle you. But if possible, I would rather have you as a friend and ally.’

She smiled a slow smile that lit fires within his heart. ~~I have no cause to obstruct you, young vanar. Nor to do battle with you. If anything, I would like to accompany you secretly and see how you go about this bold and adventurous mission. Never before have I known any spy to infiltrate the heart of Ravana's kingdom and steal out something the lord of rakshasas possesses. I would see how you attempt to accomplish this ambitious task.~~

He hesitated only a fraction of a second before nodding. 'So be it, my lady. I assume that you possess the power to change your bhes-bhav?'

She smiled and held out her hand. It melted away to become a waterfall of mercury, flowing down into the night.

He nodded. 'I expected no less. Let us change into less obtrusive forms and enter the city, then. Time is of the essence and I must not fail in my mission.'

She reformed her hand, returning it to the semblance of a mortal hand, perfect and smooth as the surface of newly set butter. ~~Come, then. Let me see how a mere vanar, unarmed and alone, fares in the land of rakshasas.' She held the hand out to him ~~Let us go to the city, my new friend.~~

He thrilled at the feeling of her pronouncement of his name, and of those three simple words. My new friend. He had only just met her and already he wished he could be more than just her friend.

SEVEN

After a brief conference, the lady Lanka suggested they would be least obtrusive if they were clad and shaped as rich rakshasa nobility. Since there were many disparate races among the rakshasa species, Hanuman chose one that was least unnerving to mortal eyes, to reduce the shock caused to the lady Sita when he finally found her. It was a moment's work to fly to the city's outermost limits, where the marg from the wall became a cobbled avenue. Moments later, a male rakshasa and a female rakshasi clad in rich shimmering robes strode up that same avenue. The rakshasa was a tall, well-built specimen, with stippled skin a sickly milk-white in colour, eyes as blue as the summer sky on a cloudless day, and hair as yellow as ripe corn. She was similarly built, but with lighter eyes, almost greyish-blue, and hair so dark it bordered on reddish. Catching sight of their reflections on a polished gold pillar proclaiming the name of the avenue in some indecipherable rakshasa script, he thought they made the ugliest creatures imaginable. But they were far less unappealing than the variety of other rakshasa forms in Lanka and so he put aside his distaste.

If nothing else, they seemed to make a handsome couple, fitting well into their surroundings, as several pairs and trios of eyes turned their way as they passed. More than one look was overtly inviting. This was the land of hedonistic pleasure, after all. The lady Lanka insisted on taking his arm as they walked, holding it so close to herself that he could feel her breathe. But he did not protest, wanting to give no sign that he was not a Lankan.

She whispered continually into his ear as they walked through the city, pointing out people and places and explaining this or that. He gleaned a great deal of useful information, and as he grew absorbed in his task, he began to relax and found himself enjoying even the musky rakshasi perfume that she had assumed as part of her disguise, and the gentle tones of her voice. She used normal speech to avoid being observed, and while he knew she was speaking a rakshasi tongue—a dialect appropriate to the race they had disguised themselves as—she had enabled him to understand every word. He understood the many dialects spoken around him as well, and began to store much useful information and knowledge of the kingdom of rakshasas to report back to Rama. But after long precious moments had passed and he could still discern no clue as to where Sita might be, he began to grow restless. She sensed his impatience and paused before a tavern-like place into and out of which a constant stream of rakshasas came and went, each opening of the door releasing a fresh torrent of drunken laughter and raucous rakshasa music and sounds of dancing and carousing and brawling. Not to mention the stench of soma, honey wine, and several other kinds of inebriating drinks that he had no knowledge of. She informed him that it was a ‘pleasure-house’, a place where rakshasas frolicked in warm baths and relaxed their inhibitions. She attempted to coax him into going in with her, to partake of some of the ‘pleasures of Lanka’. He was shocked to find himself actually taking a step or two in the direction of the tavern. When he stopped, resisting her insistent tugging, she grew briefly petulant. She attempted to cajole and coax him so desperately that a small uneasy alarum began sounding within his mind's space.

His conscience spoke quietly, sternly: What are you doing, Maruti Anjaneya? You are not here to sample the temptations of Lanka. You are here on a service to Lord Rama. Have you forgotten? The lady Sita is in grave distress. You were to find her before nightfall and already the hour is grown late ...

He shook his head to clear it of the vapours and odours of sin and intoxication that had surrounded him; of the alluring perfume of the lady Lanka. For all her beauty, she was still no friend of his, and he had a mission to complete.

Aloud he said quietly: 'My lady, I believe there is only one place left to look. I mean to enter that tower and seek out the lady Sita.'

He nodded over his shoulder as he spoke, for they were in the shadow of the great tower itself now, only a few hundred yards below it.

She looked up at him, her eyes catching the light of fireworks crackling in the sky overhead. Again, he was momentarily distracted by her beauty and by the ethereal grace and nobility that she retained even in this unpleasing rakshasi form. Her moment of petulance had passed quickly, he noted with relief, and she had regained the air of sombre dignity that became her so well. 'You are wise beyond appearances, young one. That is precisely where she is.'

He stared at her. 'Then you knew her location all this while? And did not tell me?'

She flashed a dark smile, clearly relishing an opportunity to pay him back for not acquiescing to her entreaties a moment ago. 'You did not ask.'

Remember, said the voice in his head, she may call herself your friend, but she is not one yet. After all, she is Lanka.

Moments later, Hanuman and the lady Lanka stood at the base of the great white tower. He looked but could see no guards in sight. The area all around was empty, but only a hundred yards below, the carousing went on.

He glanced up again at the tower. It loomed up into the dark night sky. He sniffed suspiciously.

‘Can this truly be Ravana’s palace?’ he asked doubtfully.

‘Why?’ she asked in a challenging tone. ‘Because it does not have a plaque saying it is so?’ When he did not respond, she went on, ‘It is more than a tower, much more than meets the eye. But have no doubt, this is the domicile of the lord of Lanka. If it does not resemble a palace in the usual sense, then that is by choice.’ She added wryly, ‘Perhaps he designed it just so it would confuse intruders such as yourself.’

Paying her ironic tone no heed, he went around the base of the tower. The sounds of the city faded, and when he was on the far side, they were extinguished completely. He smelled something else though, a strange half-familiar odour. He crouched down, sniffing at the foot of the tower.

‘I smell iron,’ he said. ‘And sulphur. And other scents that do not seem to belong here.’

Her voice came from behind him. ‘There was a volcano on this site, not too long ago. It erupted some thirteen years ago, engulfing the remains of the old Lanka. This city you see laid out before you like a newly wed bride, this is the new Lanka, built over the ashes of that ancient city. And this tower stands on the very site of the old volcanic channel.’

He nodded. ‘That explains much. But what madness possessed the lord of Lanka to build his palace upon the site of a volcanic channel? A tower no less! Surely the foundation of this edifice must rest in a bed of lava.’

‘You underestimate his powers, young vanar. This edifice you call a tower, it is no construction of metal and stone as you can attest yourself.’

Having licked the Tower’s surface, he could only agree. ‘It is like no substance I have ever encountered before.’

‘Indeed. That is because it is not a tower at all. That is why it requires no foundation or structure in the usual sense. This, my handsome vanar friend, is the Pushpak, the great device of the gods.’

He stared up in newfound awe at the sky-reaching white monolith. ‘Pushpaka? The flying chariot of Lord Brahma?’

‘Not merely a chariot, but a device that obeys the commands of its master and takes any form, any shape that he desires. It was the property of Brahma once, but Kubera, treasurer of the devas and half-brother of Ravana won it as a gift from Brahma because of austerities he had performed. Later, Ravana wrested it away from him at the same time that he won Lanka itself in the great Yaksha war, along with all of Kubera’s great store of wealth. He has lost much of the wealth since then, but the Pushpak remains, serving him as he pleases. At present, Ravana desires it to assume the form of a great white tower, and so that is what it is. If he chooses, he can make it resemble an entire city, or shrink itself to the size of a single chariot to carry him across the ocean with the speed of the wind—or across worlds, if he desires.’

Hanuman took a step back from the tower, marvelling at its pearl-like perfection. ‘The very structure itself obeys his mind’s command.’

‘And none may enter or leave its environs unless he decrees it. This is why you see no guards outside the tower. He has no need of them, for the Pushpak itself is the most effective protector he could ever want.’

Hanuman nodded. ‘Surely then Sita devi is inside this place. I must enter at once. Already, the hour grows late.’

She chuckled softly. He turned to look at her sharply. She was laughing openly, but when he looked, she raised a hand to cover her mouth as a cultured lady would be expected to do. ‘Do you think to force your way in by brute force? Even the strength of a god will not be sufficient to tear a hole in the Pushpak’s defences.’

He was silent.

She took his silence as an indication that he was lost for words. ‘Oh, don’t be disheartened, Hanuman. You have done a great deal already. Much more than anyone could expect of a vanar, even one with such extraordinary gifts. Even Rama cannot fault you for having tried so hard and failed. This is no ordinary place and Ravana no ordinary foe. The gods themselves have lost to him before, and been slaves in his household in times past.’

Still, he was silent.

She came up to him and put a hand on his shoulder, touching him, caressing him. ‘There is nothing more you can accomplish here. Come, let us away. Stay the night with me and I will show you the true wonders of my land!’

His only response was to remove her hand from his shoulder. ‘I thank you for your assistance and grace, my lady. But I request you to leave me now.’

‘Leave you?’ Her voice was incredulous, shocked.

‘My purpose will not be thwarted by any distraction. I must proceed and fulfil my mission.’

‘Distraction?’ Her tone was sharper this time. ‘Is that how you perceive me? As a distraction?’

He looked at her. Her face had contorted with a new expression, an unattractive one. It made him wonder how he had ever thought her beautiful. It made him wary of his own feelings and her true intentions in accompanying him on his quest. ‘My lady, anything that delays me or draws me away from my true purpose ill serves my lord Rama’s cause. I thank you for your company and your guidance until now. But I realise that I must continue my journey alone. Pray, allow me to take my leave of you now.’

She stared at him scornfully. ‘And what do you expect to accomplish without me to guide you? Do you believe you can enter Ravana’s palace tower alone and unarmed, seek out the prisoner and carry her away without so much as a bleat of protest?’

He shrugged. ‘I will face what challenges may arise when they arise.’

He was looking directly at her eyes at that instant and saw something peculiar occur. For a moment, just a fraction of a second, they seemed to alter subtly, to become eyes like those of a jungle predator, like the great jungle cats that his vanar race feared and detested so much. Then, before he could be certain of it, they were as before once again.

‘I see that you are more resolute of purpose than I first believed,’ she said.

‘My lady,’ he said, growing restless. ‘I cannot dally here talking all night. Sita may be in grave distress. I must find her at once.’

She was silent a moment. ‘And you know that this will bring you up against the lord of rakshasas himself, will most surely earn you his wrath. Are you prepared to face Ravana and feel the blight of his anger?’

‘If need be, yes. And now, I take your leave.’

He turned back to the tower, considering the best place to strike and attempt to force an entry. He joined his hands together to make a double fist, intending to hammer at the wall and see if he could not batter a hole.

Before he could raise his hands to strike, the surface of the tower shimmered, like a reflection upon the surface of a sunlit lake, and a portal opened in the wall itself, large enough for him to pass through.

He turned to see the lady Lanka gesturing with a raised hand, a sardonic smile on her beautiful face. ‘Let us see if you can match your actions to your intentions, bold one. I am intrigued by your foolhardy courage. Few would dare to even dream of confronting Ravana under such circumstances, and none would survive such an encounter. But I am impressed by your dedication and your zeal. I will take you to the end of your quest and watch to see how you accomplish your goal.’

She stepped forward through the portal, turning to beckon him on. ‘Come, I will take you to your lady Sita.’

He hesitated, sniffing sharply. He did not trust the lady Lanka’s intentions any more. In point of truth, he had begun to doubt that she was what she claimed to be. And this whole capitulation and the ease of her entry into the tower, it all reeked of a trap. Beware, Anjaneya, his mind’s voice warned. It is for good reason that you are a sworn brahmacharya. You took the vow of celibacy because you knew that desire for the opposite sex can cloud a warrior’s judgement at crucial moments. From the very first moment she appeared, this being, whomever she might truly be, has manipulated you with great shrewdness and skill. You cannot trust her.

Every instinct in his body screamed that he was stepping into a trap.

But it was a trap that might just lead him closer to Sita.

With a grimace and a soft growl, he lowered his raised fists and leaped through the portal, into the tower.

EIGHT

He was plunged immediately into hell. Either hell or a heaven designed by perverse rakshasas.

He stood still, staring incredulously. Without realising it, he had changed back into his natural form, shocked by the sights and sounds that sprawled before him. His senses were overwhelmed, his mind ignited like a lump of camphor touched to an open flame.

‘What is this place?’ he heard himself whisper.

The lady’s voice caressed his ear, speaking in the same manner she had used before~~Call it what you will. Ravana calls it the Palace of Infinite Pleasures. A place where all your desires are fulfilled. A garden of earthly delights. A cornucopia of sensual satisfaction.~~

He breathed deeply, trying to clear his mind of the thick musk that enveloped him, and only inhaled more of the intoxicating odours of the chamber. Before him, vaster than anything he had ever seen before, lay a seemingly endless space. There was little doubt that the place within was far, far greater than the external dimensions of the tower suggested. That in itself did not surprise him; he knew it was a celestial device, capable of astonishing miracles. But he had not been prepared for what lay within its deceptively pristine white walls.

The space was filled with bodies writhing and twisting in the torment of sensual pleasure. Thousands upon thousands, perhaps even lakhs, of rakshasas of every shape and colour and race. All engrossed in a frenzy of sensual pleasuring.

~~Hanuman,~~ said the beautiful one who called herself Lanka. ~~You are a handsome and virile vanar. I am impressed by your bravery and your dedication. Come. Let us dally here awhile. I would share my charms with you.~~

He fought the impulses that warred within him. With each passing moment, he began to see more and more. What had seemed at first to be only one vast chamber was in fact a thousand chambers, each immeasurably vast. The entire Mount Mahendra could have been brought into this place and it would have been as an anthill. And the more he looked, the more he saw. And heard. And smelled. And felt. It was endless, without limits. Somehow, Ravana had contrived a place that only looked like a white tower from without. Within its walls was a space as vast as imagination itself: an endless unravelling of sexual excesses, played out by more rakshasas than could be counted.

The more he studied it, the more it threatened to overwhelm him. Just as a man fond of drink pauses when passing the open doorway of a tavern, tempted by the reek of liquor and the sights and sounds of the revelry within, so he too paused, wondering for a fraction of an instant what it might be to participate in this feast of the senses. It was only the briefest pause, not even a considering, let alone a yielding. But it was enough to let the ocean of sights and sounds press at the dam of his self-control and threaten to burst through like a raging flood.

He fought it furiously, with all his will and self-empowered strength, fought to regain his equilibrium the way a drowning man thrashes and twists his way back to the surface. The forces against him were too great.

Through his struggle, he felt the voice of the lady who called herself Lanka and whom he now knew was a rakshasi of some sort, seeking to insinuate itself through the chink in his mental armour, trying to wedge it open and let the flood come rushing through. On a more physical plane, he heard and saw and felt the rakshasas nearest to him approach, crawling and dragging themselves across the lushly carpeted floor, clutching at him, caressing his skin, calling him to join them in their depraved games, seducing.

He thrashed and twisted, clutched by a thousand blind hands. Tugged at by a million minds warped by an existence spent seeking only pure hedonistic pleasure.

~~Struggle is useless, my vigorous vanar. No being in all the three worlds possesses the ability to resist the allure of the palace of infinite pleasure. Even the devas hesitate to come here, for they fear they might never leave. Every fantasy you ever conceived can be fulfilled here, handsome Hanuman. It is futile to resist. Give yourself over to the call of your own libido and you will experience pleasure such as you never dreamed possible.~~

No, he shouted, I will never—

But no words came from his open, gasping mouth.

He flailed, tearing himself free of the clutching, reaching, caressing limbs that sought to bear him down, to crush him beneath the weight of his own subterranean desires, to awaken the reservoir of secret lust that every creature of flesh and blood must of necessity possess in order to procreate and further its species. The flailing was as much mental as physical. For every pair of hands he threw off, twisted free of, a thousand new pairs clasped him slickly. For every inflammatory incendiary sight and sound and scent he blocked, a million more rushed in to replace it. Now it seemed the very ground beneath his feet was made of living, writhing rakshasas, engaged in the vulgar execution of primal lusts. Every mote of air he breathed was filled with the musk of sexual predation. Every way he turned, everything he did, only increased the onslaught.

He cried wordlessly, caught in the bog of lust, sinking beneath the weight of a million nameless desires, his struggles only dragging him deeper into the quicksand.

He had been prepared to fight, to battle any number of opponents, wage war single-handedly if need be. He had been unalarmed by the flying mountain, by the giant sea serpent, had expected resistance, fighting, bloodshed. But this was a war for which he had no armour. A battle that he was not armed against. A struggle for which he had no defenses prepared.

Yet he fought on.

His head reeled, his senses swam. His sense of smell was overwhelmed, his mind assailed. He fought furiously, but it was as if he had been submerged in a bottomless ocean and was trying to swim his way back to the surface. He swam through the ocean, racked by storm winds, teeming with great creatures and aquatic marvels and wonders, seeking only to regain the surface and breathe clean natural air once more. But struggle as he may, he could not reach it. He was lost, lost in a world not of his understanding, succumbing to a struggle for which he had no means of retaliation.

Then a single word swam to the surface of his beleaguered mind.

Rama.

He repeated it, felt its graceful syllables upon his mind's tongue.

Rama.

It brought solace. The ocean paused in its churning turmoil, the flood abated a brief instant, the quicksand ceasing its relentless sucking.

Rama.

He recited it with adoring respect. Like a mantra against unseen evils.

Ramaramaramaramaramaramaramaramaramaramarama ...

‘Rama!’

The sound of his own voice was like the gasp of a drowning man, regaining the surface, gulping in his first breath of air after long moments of agony.

He repeated it again, firmer and more resolute. ‘Rama.’

The hands clutching at him, clasping him, caressing him, began to shrink away. The hordes seeking to pull him down, to drag him into their own perverse ocean of toxic sensuality drew back fearfully.

~~No, you fool. Your master cannot save you now. Only Ravana can help you. Say his name instead. Say Ravana's name aloud, call to him for help. He is the only master!~~

‘Rama,’ he said softly, reverentially.

And flexed his body.

They fell away like shackles unchained. A space grew around him, larger, widening with every bisyllabic repetition.

Ramaramaramaramama ...

~~You fool. You seek your own destruction. My cousin—I mean, Ravana, the lord of Lanka, will discover you if you say that name here. It is forbidden. Outlawed.’

‘RAMA!’ he boomed, his voice expanding to fill the length and breadth of the vast space.

They were screaming now, unable to bear the sound of the Forbidden Name. He repeated it over and over, relishing his power over them, at the manner in which each repetition leached the lust out of this hellish place and left it a little cleaner, less impure.

‘RAMA!’ The word echoed and reverberated.

~~Fool!~~ he heard her scream. ~~And I a bigger fool to bring you here in the first place. Pushpak, take us from here at once. Take us!~~

He blinked at the sudden alteration in the quality of light, at the abrupt seamless change of surroundings. One moment he had been there, in that bottomless hell of rakshasa fornication. The next moment he was standing in a great palatial mansion, multilevelled and richly ornamented. He took a tentative breath and was hugely relieved: the air was not pure or perfect by any means but it was free of the nauseating reek of excess at least.

He looked around and saw a creature perched upon a golden railing that bordered the marble-floored balcony on which he stood. It was a rakshasi of some feline variety, with beautiful golden fur and glowing cat-like eyes. He recognised those eyes at once—and the sensual flow of the form, if not the actual form itself.

‘Lady Lanka?’ he said ironically. ‘Why, what big claws and fangs you have.’

She snarled silently at him. ‘Do not mock me, vanar. I am Supanakha, cousin to Ravana himself. At a single word from me, he will tear your heart out and eat it in a single gulp.’

‘If you are so powerful, and your cousin so mighty, then why did you need to disguise yourself and attempt to deceive me?’

She flicked her tail irritably. ‘I thought you would make a good night’s diversion.’ She licked her chops pointedly. ‘You are a handsome specimen, for a vanar.’

‘And so you pretended to be Lady Lanka,’ he said, shaking his head. ‘The spirit of the land itself.’

She shrugged. ‘There was such a being once. Except she was a rakshasi named Simhika, and she wasn’t anything to look at. She liked to eat anything and anyone that ventured here. It was a long time ago, back when the world was new and few creatures moved upon the land. I borrowed a little from her ...’

‘And a lot from your own imagination.’

‘Actually, from yours,’ she said unexpectedly. She moved closer to him, exaggerating her femininity with an arching sensual prowl. ‘Did I not please you in that form? We could have spent a night in the palace of infinite pleasures, instead of my having to eat you alive.’

He smiled at her persistence. ‘And if I had succumbed to your depravity, what would you have done with me come morning?’

She cocked her head, pretending to think briefly. ‘Eaten you alive.’ She smiled dangerously. ‘But at least we would have enjoyed the night. Now, here we are.’

‘And where is that?’

She gestured over her shoulder, beyond the railing. ‘See for yourself.’

He kept his eyes on her as he walked to the railing, careful to keep enough distance should she try to leap. Looking down, he saw that they were on the balustrade of the upper level of a great palatial hall. The space below was a dazzling display of wealth and refinement. It was created in the fashion of rich luxury that mortals usually favoured—and that vanars were also wont to favour if they could but afford such luxury. Pillars of gold and silver adorned by carvings of animals and asuras. Stairways of gold inlaid with lapis and emerald and sapphire. Golden windows with delicate lattices. Enormous tables groaning beneath the weight of sumptuous banquets of exotic foods and drinks, the heavy remnants of some recent feast. Crystal floors decorated with pearls, ivory and coral. Magnificent embroidered carpets. Sweet birdsong music, divine fragrances, priceless fabrics ... Even at a glance he was impressed by the wealth and sophistication. Yet again, Lanka had surprised him. He wondered if palaces in Ayodhya or Gandahar were as tastefully luxuriant.

But the decor was just that, decor. The real surprise lay in the centre of the chamber below. Evidently, a great feast and celebration had taken place only recently. He could still scent the odours of the food on the table, the wine drunk and spilt. The revellers had taken a respite, stealing a short rest, no doubt before resuming their revels, or going on to more advanced celebrations.

Lying upon dozens of beds, divans, couches, futons, sofas, carpets, rugs and even across the jewelled floor, were hundreds of women. Beautiful, breathtaking women wearing all kinds of clothes and jewels and garlands, and many wearing nothing at all. After the depraved excesses he had witnessed in the palace of pleasures, this sight seemed barely offensive, but he could not help but observe that every one of the women were of exquisite beauty, by any standards, rakshasa, mortal or otherwise. They possessed a perfection of limb and complexion that would have transfixed any male of any species. Singly, they were extraordinary beauties; together, they were an invaluable harem.

Every one of them lay asleep. He scanned their faces quickly but efficiently, using his superior senses to scent out if any of them might be the one he sought. Yet, even as he did so, he prayed that Sita was not among them. For her presence in this menagerie of kept females would mean only one thing, and he could not bear to allow that meaning to penetrate his mind.

There was no sign of Sita.

But lying in the midst of them, splendidly splayed out in rich robes and jewels all disarrayed from his recent revels, sleeping as peacefully as his concubines, was the king of Lanka himself.

NINE

Ravana lay upon his great bed in his most private of chambers, asleep after a day filled with drink and sensual pleasures. He was adorned by more jewels than Hanuman had ever seen upon the person of a single being before. His arms, thick as flagpoles, were encircled by beautifully filigreed bracelets that only partially concealed the rakshasa's many battle wounds. As with any great legendary personage, Ravana's wounds and scars were as famous as his ten heads. Hanuman recognised the famous ripmark scar said to have been inflicted by the right tusk of Airavata, battle elephant of Lord Indra, during the rakshasa king's wars against the devas. On both his shoulders were the white slashes inflicted by Indra's vajra, the celestial thunderbolt. There were any number of other scars across his body, the evidence of countless encounters and battles against celestial beings as well as mortal. Hanuman craned his neck, peering over a curved section of the railing on which he perched, seeking a better view of Ravana's chest. At last he spied a diagonal slashing scar that was clearly of far recent vintage than the demonlord's other marks. He sucked in a breath. That scar had been inflicted by Dasaratha himself, father of Rama. Lakshman had told him the story of that fateful encounter during the last asura war. Dasaratha had barely escaped that encounter with his life; after his chariot was demolished by Ravana, he was carried off the battlefield wounded and unconscious by Rama's clan-mother Kaikeyi.

And now, here he was, in the most private chamber of Ravana's palace, staring down at the lord of all rakshasakind.

His blood seethed momentarily, thinking of all the pain and suffering this being had inflicted upon so many for so long. Upon his lord Rama. His paws curled into fists, and he felt himself start to expand. It took a great effort to control himself.

A soft chuckle by his ear made him turn with a snarl. He lunged at Supanakha. The shapeshifter leaped back, startled, but recovered at once. 'So,' she showed her teeth in hostile amusement. 'The vanar has claws too.'

‘She is not here,’ he said, hardly caring if his voice carried or not. The chamber was immense, and the railing on which he and Supanakha were standing was a good fifteen yards above the main floor of the chamber below. ‘Where is the lady Sita?’

She curled her tail over her rear, purring softly. ‘Are you sure she isn’t here? Have you looked closely enough?’ She leaped up to the railing again. ‘Perhaps you should take another look.’

‘Rakshasi,’ he said in a dangerous tone. ‘I will not tolerate your games any longer.’

She swished her tail, brushing it close enough to his face for him to feel the wind but not close enough to grab. ‘Why? Do you think your mistress is too scrupulous to sleep with the lord of Lanka?’

He snorted. ‘Sleep? She will not brook him touching one hair on her head. She is the paragon of wifely virtue.’

She chuckled. ‘You’ll be surprised how many paragons of wifely virtue are down there right now, lying drunk and thoroughly ravished.’

‘Then you do not understand the meaning of wifely virtue,’ he said, unprovoked by her taunting. ‘Sita is not among those who clings to morality because her sanskriti demands it, or because her elders impose it upon her. She does so because she is a self-fulfilled, self-empowered woman who values her own dignity. She has chosen to adhere to a code of ethics and morality, and having done so, she will not be moved a fraction of an inch from her position. Her rigidity is not demanded by her husband, her in-laws, or even her own family. It is her own desire for uprightness that makes her uphold this virtuous stance.’

Supanakha lost some of her taunting tone. Her tail flicked angrily. ‘Sure, she’s the queen of all virtue! But that doesn’t mean she’s superhuman and invulnerable. How do you know she has not succumbed to the forced embraces of my cousin? How do you know she has not been raped and ravished against her will?’

He smiled, undaunted. ‘Because she is not merely a woman of strong character, she is also a warrior-princess. She would defend her virtue just as a male warrior would defend his own dignity. Just as an Arya prince or king would rather have his head cut off than bow it before a being such as Ravana, or any asura chief, so also my lady Sita would fight to the very end rather than allow herself to be used against her will.'

Supanakha scowled. 'Methinks you think too highly of your precious lady. Perhaps you are mistaken in your fealty. Perhaps the lady is not half as honourable as you would like to believe.'

Hanuman unfolded his arms from across his chest and stared at her with narrowed eyes. 'Be careful, demoness. Your attempts to deceive me were acceptable, for you are my foe and were doing your duty in attempting to keep me from entering Lanka, and then, Ravana's palace. That is why I have allowed you to live until now. But do not make the mistake of insulting the name of my lady. I will not tolerate any slur against her good name.'

Supanakha snarled silently, letting him see all the way down her purple throat. Spittle flew from her lips. 'Too much self-righteousness makes a person imbalanced, vanar. Be careful that you know whereof you speak. You may have cause to doubt the veracity of your beliefs before this night is through.'

She turned and raced the length of the balcony, away from him. He was on her heels in a trice.

The shapeshifter led him a merry dance. He followed her through chamber after chamber much like the one in which he had seen the lord of rakshasas asleep. These were as richly invested and decorated. There were apartments with courtyards paved with gold and silver and pearls. Pools of every shape and size, filled with fountains of clear, sparkling water, jewelled steps leading into them, crystal bottoms and banks of coral and pearls. On their banks were trees such as he had never seen nor heard of before: gold-hued trees which glowed luminously in the semidarkness. Lotuses and lilies bloomed, and the cries of water birds were audible, even though he knew he was inside a great white tower, not a forest. The lines of illusion blurred further the more he pursued the demoness. He followed her through a mango grove where birdsong filled the air and the trees were made of gold and silver. Flowering trees bustling with bees drunk on nectar. Strutting peacocks pranced and preened. He saw entire townships, with stone-paved streets and crossroads and buildings and fortifications. There were rakshasas and rakshasis here too, although none seemed to be aware of him. He recognised other subservient peoples too—vidyadhari, beautiful servants and maids who obeyed the commands of the rakshasas. Gorgeous naga women with full, moon-round faces. There were wonders beyond counting. He saw hillocks with streams running down, lakes brimming with clear water with carved steps and gem-encrusted artificial banks, surrounded by landscaped gardens abounding in docile wildlife and covered with lavish pavilions.

Yet just as he was about to dismiss all these as clear signs of artifice, he came upon a samsapa tree, dense with leaves and creepers. He climbed the tree to taste the leaves and found them as real as he could make out. He was perplexed. Was all this real or an illusion? He knew that asura sorcery could achieve great feats of illusion, but this was a real samsapa tree, with real samsapa leaves and creepers. How could sorcery create something ostensibly natural? It defied everything he knew.

But this minor irritant was soon forgotten when he could not find the shapeshifter. He had seen her last at the foot of the tree, but by the time he reached her, she had vanished. He ranged up and down, in case she was hiding in the dense foliage or hanging from a creeper. But when he could neither see her nor scent her he began to fret. It was already night and he still had not found Sita.

He was overcome by a great thirst. The lake nearby was clear and inviting, and he went and drank from it without thinking. The water was wonderfully cool and sweet, and it refreshed him greatly. Only after his belly was full did he feel a twinge of misgiving. Perhaps he ought to have abstained from consuming anything. After all, this was the heart of Lanka. Despite all appearances, he was within the inner sanctum of Ravana, inside some artificial construct of the celestial vahan Pushpak. Perhaps he should not have eaten those leaves and drunk that water after all ...

His vision blurred. The lake shimmered, like steaming water in a mountain spa. The entire landscape rolled, then righted itself. His ears filled with strange sounds and voices, his nostrils twitched, scenting a myriad of scents too exotic to identify. His tongue felt numb and hot where he had tasted the juice of the samsapa leaves. They were not samsapa after all, he realised, his senses reeling. Nor was that lake water, water at all.

He struggled to stay upright, but found himself flat on his back a moment later. The sound of familiar laughter filled his ears. He tried to turn to see if it was the shapeshifter, but ended up falling flat on his face. He lay there, trying to raise his head to breathe. Moving any part of his body seemed impossible. For a moment, he panicked, thinking that he would suffocate to death under his own weight, suffocate and die.

A train of visions floated through his delirious, drugged mind, a psychedelic line of hallucinations. He saw himself dying, succumbing to the most trivial of ruses, duped by a rakshasi shapeshifter, killed by eating a few leaves and drinking some water. He saw Rama, waiting at the unfinished bridge, receiving news of his death—the hallucination did not clarify how Rama heard of this news—and losing all hope and motivation. He saw Rama dying, believing Sita already lost. And then Lakshman, dying too. He saw Rama's entire line extinguished—Bharat, Shatrugan, Kausalya, Sumitra, even the rehabilitated Kaikeyi. Then, Sugreeva, desolate at his failure to aid Rama in his quest, taking his own life the vanar way—by leaping from a cliff. And Sugreeva's wives, Ruma and Tara, killing themselves. Angad dying as well. And then all the vanars of Kiskindha throwing themselves to their deaths.

The vision was absurd in its exaggeration and lack of logic. Yet it carried a terrible foreboding, like a bad dream that seems utterly real and convincing at the time. He knew that it was the result of the unnatural leaves and water he had consumed but that knowledge alone did not help him throw off the vision. He felt his body struggling with the anguish of suffocation and knew that by simply moving a little to one side he could enable himself to breathe again. But that tiny effort seemed impossible. He heard someone laugh and recognised his own inner voice. He was laughing at himself, for being able to grow as large as a mountain and leap across an ocean, yet now unable to move a few inches to enable himself to breathe.

His mind swam with mad visions. They were worse in a sense than the earlier morass of sensual temptations into which he had been immersed. As one who had taken a vow of celibacy, he had long since mastered the art of deflecting sensual temptations. Even that epic assault in Ravana's palace of sensual pleasures had not been sufficient to break through his wall of self-will. But these were his own fears and anxieties, all too real and possible. Not a succumbing to temptation, merely a glimpse of things that could easily be. Still, he knew, these were no different from sensual temptations. They were a form of acute battlefield depression. A sinking of the soul into the quicksand of its own anxieties. The darkness that passed through a soldier's mind when the battle was going against his side, his lines routed, his comrades slain or screaming in anguish around him, his own lifeblood ebbing through his futile fingers, the knowledge that his general had been brought down, defeat certain.

A warm breath wafted upon his cheek, breath so redolent of rotten flesh that even the perfume of sorcery could not conceal its putridness. 'Still desire to see your lady Sita, vanar?' She laughed, exuding an amalgam of scents that swirled like colours in his brain, dancing and leaping madly in his drugged consciousness.

Yes, he tried to say. Yes, I will find her, even if it kills me. For that is why I came here. And that is what I will accomplish.

He remembered the phrase the vanar armies had used to cheer Rama at that first gathering. What were the words? Maryada ... He fought a new swirl of madness, visions of his family, his mother, his brothers and sisters, all dashing their brains out with rocks, howling and bleeding and broken. Maryada Purshottam ... The women lying sprawled across Ravana's chambers, all with faces resembling that of Sita. Each one of them opened her eyes and looked up at him, and each one smiled an obscene, sensual smile. Maryada Purshottam ...

'Maryada Purshottam Rama,' he said, gasping, his starved lungs gulping in precious breath.

Supanakha screamed and danced away as he sat up, gasping and heaving. 'Does nothing bring you down! You damned vanar! What are you made of, anyway? Stone and iron?'

He heaved, bringing out the contents of his stomach. It tasted vile and smelled worse, and he wondered how he could ever have been foolish enough to sample anything in this evil place of deception and desire, then it was all out, seeping over the sandy soil that still looked and felt and smelled so real. He sat up, then rose to his feet, gulping in great lungfuls of air. 'Maryada Purshottam Rama,' he said once more. 'I am the servant of Rama Who Achieves His Goals Against All Odds.'

Then he leaped through the air, startling the birds and deer of the artificial forest, and grasped the shapeshifter as she was still in mid-leap. Grasped her by the neck, in a grip so hard that were he to tighten it but a fraction, she would be broken-necked and dead at once.

'Now you will take me to my lady Sita,' he said.

TEN

Sita started at the sight of the creature that appeared before her. It was accompanied by the shape-shifting rakshasi she knew to be Ravana's cousin. Supanakha snapped at the sight of her, as if she would dearly love to leap at Sita and tear her throat out. But the other creature, the one standing like a man on two legs, had Supanakha by the throat in a grip so tight, Sita could see tears spring to the rakshasi's eyes. She subsided, snarling softly, and turned her head up to her captor.

'Here she is,' she said in a choked voice. 'Your precious lady. Now let me go.'

Still, the newcomer held onto Supanakha's neck. Sita stared cautiously, not knowing what to make of him. He looked not unlike an ape, but was less hairy, and with limbs formed to resemble a mortal more than a simian. His soft downy fur was golden in hue, and his body powerfully muscled, as if he was capable of uprooting a tree single-handedly or raising great boulders. He was taller than a mortal, and stood straighter than any ape or monkey she had ever seen. At once the word sprang unbidden to her lips: she may not have seen one before but she had grown up hearing of the species. 'A vanar ... ?' she asked.

To her surprise, he let go of Supanakha and joined his palms together. He went down on his knees and bowed to her first. 'Indeed, my lady,' he said in a voice as reverential as a Shaivite before his deity. 'I am Hanuman, the servant of Lord Rama, sent to seek you out.'

Her heart lifted with joy. But almost at once, she drew it back. Could it be true? What if it were another ruse of Ravana? Or the other rakshasas? After all, Supanakha was no friend of her's. She looked warily at the shapeshifter, twisting her neck as if to free it of a cramp. Supanakha saw her staring and narrowed her eyes, showing her teeth.

'What?' she snarled. 'Are you not happy to meet your champion? He came a great way to see you, you know. He leaped across the ocean, met the challenge of the flying mountain and the giant sea serpent, tunneled through the rocky foundations of the island of Lanka, strolled through the boulevards of Lanka, overcame the temptations of the palace of sensual pleasures, crept through Ravana's private bedchamber as he slept, and he even resisted the power of the Pushpak, all just to come here to find you. Aren't you going to greet him warmly at least?'

Hanuman cuffed the shapeshifter hard enough to send her flying through the grove. Supanakha squealed like a kitten, and landed with a bone-numbing thump against a tree trunk.

'Wretch!' she cried. 'Enjoy your little reunion while it lasts. When my brother finds you here, all your magic will not be enough to save you from his wrath.'

And with a snarl she vanished from the Ashoka grove.

Hanuman glanced worriedly in the direction she had gone. Then shook his head, dismissing her. 'She was untrustworthy. Besides, she has served her purpose by bringing me here.'

Turning to Sita, he lay down on the ground and prostrated himself before her. Touching her feet, he said, 'My lady, I beg your forgiveness for the delay in arriving. I pray I am not too late to save you from any suffering?'

She was overwhelmed. A part of her mind, already so overburdened by the strain of confinement and the tortures she had endured, reeled as if she had inhaled alcoholic vapours. She felt her senses reel, and tried to take a step back. Instead, she lost her balance and had to put her hand out to grasp the nearest tree to stay on her feet.

'My lady,' said the vanar, springing up from the ground. 'Are you well?' He would have caught her but he did not wish to so much as touch her arm as she was his master's wife.

She forced herself to breathe. 'No.' She exhaled raggedly. 'No, I am not well. But tell me. Where is Rama? Is he here too, on Lanka?'

The vanar's large face, so much like a man's yet also so much like an ape's, lost some of its natural handsome lustre. 'I regret he is not, my lady. He awaits us on the shores of the mainland. I have come alone.'

She shook her head, unable to understand. 'But then ... if you could come to Lanka, why not he? Why did he not come himself? Why did he send you?’

He lowered his head, understanding and empathising with her confusion and sadness. ‘My lady, I was bestowed with certain abilities that enable me to leap across the ocean and overcome other obstacles. It is by the grace of my lord Rama himself that I have achieved these feats. If it were at all possible, he would certainly have come himself. Since the day you were abducted, he has done nothing but struggle to reach Lanka and bring you back. Even now, he toils to complete a great bridge across the ocean to bring him and his army here to Lanka.’

Briefly, he explained to her about Rama’s alliance with Sugreeva and the vanar and bear armies that were coming to Lanka. Her disappointment was still as stark as a fresh wound on her face, but as he described Rama’s determination and leadership and the qualities that he had come to see during his tenure with her husband, the disappointment abated and he saw her face grow less sallow. He had been alarmed by his first sight of her. She was so different from the woman he had remembered from the time he had watched Rama and his group as they battled the rakshasas of Janasthana, he would not have recognised her in a crowd. She had grown so thin and pale, the very light in her eyes dimmed to tiny candlepoints instead of the gleaming torches of lifelight they had been then. It pained him grievously to see her in this state of near-starvation and despair, her body marked and scored with a hundred minor scratches and marks. Her clothes were ragged and dirty, her hair tangled and knotted and filled with dirt and fragments of dried leaves. His heart ached at the evidence of her sufferings.

‘I am glad he is well,’ she said when he had finished. ‘And Lakshman too. I am glad they are both well and healthy and strong yet.’

He did not want to contradict her but there was something in her tone that disturbed him. ‘He will be truly well only when you are by his side again, my lady. Recovering you has become the sole purpose of his existence now. I fear he cannot go on living without you.’

She sighed. The sound of it tore at his heart. She looked at him with great eyes filled with sadness. ‘Nor I without him. I know it for a fact, good Hanuman. Neither of us can live without the other.’

‘Then tarry no longer, my lady. Come, climb up on my back and hold on to my hair. I will expand myself to a size greater than this tower in which you lie imprisoned. And I will fly us both back to Rama. You will be free of this cursed lair of rakshasas and reunited with your husband.’

She looked at him with wide, hopeful eyes. ‘You could do such a thing?’ She shook her head, admonishing herself. ‘Of course you could. Why else would Rama choose you. And it is true, I heard what Supanakha said. Even if she was lying or being ironic, she would not have brought you here unless she feared you more than she feared her own cousin. I’m sorry, I do not mean to doubt your abilities. I am very tired and harried.’

‘Do not apologise, my lady,’ he said gently. ‘Even a chastisement from you would be a blessing to me. You are my master’s beloved wife, and I will do anything to serve and honour you. That is why I have come, to take you home.’

She still remained as she was, leaning against the Ashoka tree. ‘Rama once had abilities too. Great powers. He could have worked wonders, accomplished anything. He was given great celestial weapons as well, enough to wage war against this entire island of rakshasas. Yet he chose to set all aside, to pursue his life as a mere mortal, vulnerable, ordinary.’

Hanuman inclined his head. ‘I have heard tell of those sacrifices. Lord Rama and his brother Lord Lakshman gave up their Brahmanic abilities in order to unleash the weapon of Brahma at Mithila.’

Sita nodded. ‘There was no way to avoid that, he had to do it to repel Ravana’s asura army. The brahm-astra was the only force that could do it. But then later, when we were in exile, we encountered a great sage.’ She recounted the tale of their meeting with the Sage Anusuya, disguised as a low-caste berry gatherer. ‘Anusuya was so pleased with Rama’s lack of bias against any caste or creed, that she granted him powerful weapons. Yet Rama would not use those weapons. When we faced impending attack by a great number of rakshasas at Chitrakut and were sorely in need of aid, Lakshman and I pleaded with him to employ those weapons of Anusuya. But he refused, and later he revealed that he had given back the weapons. That he would survive with ordinary human skills, however best he could.’

‘And he did survive,’ Hanuman added gently. ‘Indeed, he did more than survive. He defeated fourteen thousand fierce Berserker rakshasas in the wilds of Janasthana, with only a handful of rebels and outlaws as his allies. He rid that entire region of demons. That is why his name is chanted first at every ritual in every hermitage in those places, for hundreds of Brahmins and brahmacharyas owe their lives and the continuation of their order to Rama’s championship.’

‘But it took fourteen long years. And at the end of those fourteen years, look at what happened? He won the rakshasa wars of Janasthana but in the end, this is the result. The king of rakshasas abducted me from our very home, as Rama and Lakshman watched helplessly. And here in Lanka, Rama is considered an unrighteous man who massacres species and races, and does not respect dharma. This is the reward we get for doing things the ordinary way.’

Hanuman saw and felt her anger and pain but could not understand what to say or do to assuage it. ‘What would you have him do, my lady? He did serve dharma, and he was and is a righteous man. He is the most righteous being I have ever known. He did what he had to, in the only way it could be done. What else would you have him do?’

‘Use his celestial gifts,’ she said. ‘Call on Anusuya. call on Brahmarishi Vishwamitra. Call on the devas. Call upon any and everyone who would help him. He will need their help to battle Ravana and his island of monsters. I have seen glimpses of Ravana’s power. He has regained much of the ground he lost fourteen years ago at Mithila. He is ready and waiting for Rama’s invasion. Indeed, he awaits him eagerly, like a bully looks forward to a smaller child’s opposition so that he may smite him down and show his own power.’

Hanuman shook his head, smiling. ‘If Ravana thinks that, then he is the one who will be smitten down. Rama is not a weak child. He is as powerful as any warlord in the three worlds. His fealty to dharma alone makes him the equal of all and sundry.’

‘Dharma, dharma,’ she cried out. ‘That is all I heard from Rama’s lips for fourteen years. And now you tell me the same words. Dharma is well and good, Hanumanji. But what about me? His wife, Sita? For my sake at least can he not call upon those countless boons that must be accrued on his account? With all the good he has done, surely some deva or sage will invest him with celestial weapons and powers sufficient to demolish Lanka?’

He was taken aback by her vehemence and passion. ‘I do not doubt it, my lady, but—’

‘Then ask him to do it! Tell him that Sita has not long to live. For I will not touch food nor drink, not so much as a drop of water, as long as I am in this hellish place. And if he wishes to recover me safe and sane, then he must act now. He must invoke the accrual of his good deeds and demand a great boon of power. Then he must crush Lanka and take me home with honour and dignity.’

Hanuman struggled to find a way to appease her. ‘He will do so, my lady. He is on the verge of crossing Lanka. The bridge is almost done. Within days—’

‘Days!’ She laughed, the ragged laugh of one who had reached the end of her tether and teeters on the brink of sanity. ‘I will not survive this night, let alone days.’

‘But there is no need for you to stay here, my lady. I will ferry us both back to Rama safe and sound. Then he will invade Lanka and crush it as you desire, without fear of harm coming to you.’

She shook her head. ‘What good will it do to destroy Lanka after I am rescued? Then history will only say once again that Rama conducted an excessive campaign, that he was hellbent upon the extermination of the rakshasa races, that he acted unrighteously and maliciously.’

‘History will tell the truth in the end,’ he said. ‘No matter how the rakshasas may distort it. My mother used to say that every man believes he is the hero of his own life story and that the villain is someone else. But try as he may, Ravana will not be able to conceal the truth. He has caused so much grief to so many.’

‘And so has Rama,’ she said. ‘For has he not massacred rakshasas by the thousands as well? Did they not have families and brethren and offspring too? Were they not missed and grieved for?’

He spread his hands. ‘My lady, if you judge him thusly then no king can ever be blameless. The only thing that matters is whether he fought to defend what he believed in or whether he instigated the conflict. And to the best of my knowledge, Rama always defended others and followed his dharma. Yes, I know you are weary of hearing that word, but there can be no other word to mean the same thing. Rama fought for dharma. While Ravana fought for his own selfish ends. History will know this as surely as they will know my lord Rama is spotless and blameless.’

She wrung her hands in despair. ‘Hanuman, you do not need to convince me of Rama’s integrity. I am not speaking of my own doubts or criticisms, I am speaking of the opinion of people at large, of history.’

He shrugged. ‘Let history judge as it will. I have no doubt that it will judge rightly. But even if it does not, should Rama then follow the unrighteous path merely because some people foolishly believe it is the righteous one? If a nation of rakshasas judges him the villain and their lord Ravana the hero, does that make it the truth?’

‘In their eyes, yes.’

‘But in the eyes of the supreme being, the one who is pure Brahman, the essence of which we are only parts, the truth will be known.’

He paused. This debate was taking a long time, and he had no doubt that the shapeshifter Supanakha had gone to raise the alarm. At any moment, they could be surrounded by rakshasas, making their exit not impossible but possibly dangerous to Sita. ‘My lady, I respect your opinion. But now is not the time to debate these matters. It is best that we depart from here at once. If you have any doubts about my abilities, please shed them. I am empowered to do great feats by the grace of my lord Rama himself. Come, climb upon my back and I shall bear you away to safety. Let us be gone before Ravana and his minions arrive with weapons of destruction.’

She sighed then. A great weary sigh as of one who had nothing else to say, no more strength to sustain her. ‘I cannot.’

‘My lady, I understand your weariness. My heart fills with sympathy for the suffering you have undergone. You must be harrowed, exhausted, beaten down by your treatment at the hands of these vile creatures. But I beg of you. Summon up your last reserves of strength. You need only to climb onto my back and cling on. I will do all the rest. No harm will befall you, this I swear in the name of Rama.’

She looked at him with kindness in her tired eyes. ‘Good Hanuman. You are truly a friend of Rama. You speak of him as if he was a deva. And perhaps he is. But you confuse my decision with my condition. I cannot go with you, my vanar friend.’

He stared at her. ‘Why not, my lady?’

Just then, a sound came from the far end of the forest. It was the shout of a rakshasa, a snarling howl. It was answered by others, and joined by the sound of many bodies thrashing heavily through the woods. They were heading towards the Ashoka grove, where Sita and Hanuman were. The alarm had been raised at last.

ELEVEN

‘My lady,’ Hanuman said urgently. ‘Please. Do not tarry any longer. Have faith in my lord Rama. If you desire vengeance against the rakshasas for what they have done to you, then have no fear. Rama will avenge this wrong done unto you a thousandfold. He will redress this crime of Ravana with just rewards. And history will record his exploits as being righteous and just. All will be well, I assure you.’

She smiled. And he saw that while her body might be at the point of collapse, her spirit was still strong. He saw her strength in her eyes. ‘I am not doubting Rama’s abilities, good vanar. I know my husband well. Once he sets his mind to something, he cannot be turned away from it. That is why he came to be known as Maryada Purshottam by all who knew him.’

‘Indeed,’ he exclaimed. ‘And he will be known as Maryada Purshottam for this rescue as well. For even though I only carry out his orders, yet it is as if he himself were here in Lanka, come to take you home.’ He softened his voice, kneeling before her again. ‘My lady, we may not have much time, that shape-shifting demoness has already raised the alarm. I can easily deal with any number of rakshasas. But I do not wish to endanger you by fighting in such close quarters. Come, let us depart quickly.'

She shook her head sadly. 'That is impossible, Hanuman. This is what I am trying to tell you for so long. I cannot leave Lanka with you. You must go alone back to Rama.'

He stared at her unbelievably. 'But why? What force compels you to stay?'

'The same force that drives Rama,' she said sadly. 'Dharma.'

The thrashing and shouting grew louder and fiercer. There were a great many rakshasas, evidently, and they were all converging on this grove, beating their way through the woods like a hunting party seeking out a wounded deer.

'My lady, I do not understand,' Hanuman said. 'Why will you not let me save you?'

'Because then everyone will say, history will say, that Rama could not even come to Lanka to rescue his own wife. He sent someone else instead. You and I know that Rama fears nothing and nobody. But Ravana will use this as yet another justification to paint Rama in an uncomely light. He will further disparage Rama's good name. And there is yet another reason. If I go with you, and am restored to Rama, then he will have to abandon his plan to invade Lanka. Indeed, knowing Rama, I do not doubt that he already hesitates to invade a kingdom and ravage its citizens only to rescue a single soul. Despite all the lies told about him in Lanka, Rama is a man who would rather subsist on herbs and leaves than slay a single deer. That is what makes him a great warrior: his love for peace.'

Hanuman was silent, struck dumb. Truly, Sita knew Rama better than anyone else.

'And I do wish Rama to invade Lanka. I wish him to storm its gates and frontiers and demolish its vain and over-proud armies. I wish him to wreak death and devastation upon this land and its people. To rid the earth of a vile corruption upon the body of Prithvi Maa, our Mother Earth. And he must destroy Ravana in fair and honest combat as well, proving once and for all, that Rama is the righteous one and Ravana is the enemy of dharma. For only then will the rakshasas, and the world, and history, accept beyond doubt that Rama is the champion of righteousness. And then, and only then, Hanuman, will I be restored to Rama. These are not my demands for my selfish need, for I would sorely like to go now with you to safety and not suffer a moment longer in this dread place. But it is my desire to see justice done to Rama's name and to see the earth rid of the menace of Ravana once and for all. So, go now, save yourself, and tell Rama this: "Sita remains in Lanka and awaits your righteous invasion; her imprisonment is the warrant that grants you the unassailable dharmic right to wage war with the rakshasas." This is why I stay, and this is why he must come here and wage war on Lanka.'

'But, my lady, you said you would not last even this night. How can I let you stay when I know you may not live even—'

She interrupted him sternly, as firm and as immovable as the earth itself. 'My life is no longer the only thing at stake here. Rama's honour is what matters most. Now, go, loyal friend of my husband. Go, fly. And take these, my last words, to Rama.'

Hanuman stared at her. He could not find any more words with which to express himself, for she had washed every last thought out of his mind, leaving only the awareness that she was right. One last possibility occurred to him. To pick her up forcibly and carry her back to Rama. But that was unthinkable. Not only because it would violate his own sense of dharma to forcibly lay hands upon the wife of his lord and friend, and because his vows of celibacy forbade him from even touching a female of any species against her will, but also because it would be an insult to her proud and righteous spirit. She was right. His rescuing her would take away Rama's only justification for waging this war. And this war must be waged. Not just for Sita's sake. But for Rama's. And for all mortalkind. Even, as Sita had said, for Prithvi Maa herself.

The first rakshasas broke through into the clearing. 'There!' he cried. 'There is the spy! Kill him!'

Hanuman shut down all faculty of thought, acting on instinct alone. He did not care about himself, for he knew he could not be killed as easily as that lone rakshasa might foolishly believe. He cared about Sita. If he fought a dozen or a hundred rakshasas here, with weapons flailing and bodies flying about, she would certainly be injured. The best thing he could do was to put as much distance between himself and her as soon as possible. Take the fight elsewhere.

He leaped high into the air, rising up, above the treetops, into the peculiarly illuminated sky of this artificial world that dressed itself in the garb of a forest, up and away.

He landed a mile or more away, thumping down in the middle of a flower bed in the heart of what looked like palace gardens. Neat rows of flowers extended in either direction, and an intricately carved wrought-iron fence ran along one side. Rakshasas patrolling the wall turned to stare at him, stunned. One of them, a larger, uglier specimen than the rest, shouted something unexpectedly sweet and melodious in a foreign tongue, and the rest lowered their spears and converged on Hanuman.

Kinkaras. He had heard of this tribe of rakshasas. They had once invaded the madhuvan gardens, where the vanars grew their healing herbs and brewed their honey wine. In his younger days, Hanuman and a band of other mischevious young vanars had raided the madhuvan one night, and got madly drunk on honey wine and then urinated all over the rose bushes, ‘to make them grow yellower!’ When discovered, all the vanars got a sound thrashing for their prank, but Hanuman got the worst of it for his own father was the keeper of the royal gardens. Kinkaras, his father had shouted over and over again, kinkaras do such mischief, vanars do not behave thus.

The kinkaras were much like other rakshasas he had seen before in Janasthana, except that their tribe favoured elaborate body and face painting and ornamentation. The kinkara rakshasa closest to him, advancing with his spear held like a javelin on his shoulder, was painted like a court dancer in some mythological re-enactment—curled lashes, heavily rouged cheeks and, kohl-accented eyes and all. He, or she, Hanuman couldn’t tell which it was, batted its heavily painted eyelashes at him and drew back its spear. Other kinkaras surrounded him, although, he couldn't help noticing, they seemed loath to step on the flowers.

He threw back his head, spread his arms and roared.

The kinkaras stumbled back hastily, almost impaling themselves on the spears of their comrades. The one with the spear held up screeched in dismay and threw the weapon, not the way it ought to be thrown, but straight up into the air, like a man unloosing a courier pigeon. The spear rose up and fell, its weighted point causing it to embed itself in the bed of marigolds in which Hanuman stood.

He roared again, loudly. The intention was not only to confuse the kinkaras but to draw away the rakshasas that had gone to the Ashoka grove. Without waiting to see what the kinkaras did next, he leapt up again, bounding to the top of the iron fence. He landed upon it nimbly, and looked to either side. Rakshasas were racing towards him from all points. The ones on the inside of the garden were kinkaras, the ones outside were clad in the same purple-black uniform he had seen others dressed in on his earlier passage through the myriad chambers of the palace-tower and which he had guessed were Ravana's palace guards. These latter ones seemed more aggressive than the kinkaras, shouting gruff orders and grouping in squads to advance upon him.

He raised his head and roared several times more, loud enough to be heard for miles around. When he was certain that every rakshasa within hearing distance, even those slightly deaf or feeble, were aware that the intruder was in the vicinity of the palace gardens and nowhere near the Ashoka grove, he made his next move.

Reaching down, he took hold of the iron fence and wrenched hard. With an extended groan of protest, the metal yielded slowly, bent, then snapped off. He stood up, a five-yard-length of iron fence in his hand, the ends jagged and curved like a mad imitation of a weapon. The rakshasas, compelled to keep a distance while he was roaring, took this as a brazen sign of aggression and came charging forward. Several threw spears, others hefted maces or wielded swords. More rushed in by the moment.

Hanuman raised up the iron fence like it was a shortsword, swinging it from side to side to deflect the spears flying through the air at him. The fence met each spear with a resounding clang, striking the missiles with force enough to throw them back. Some of them found rakshasa flesh and the unfortunate targets thrashed about screaming, or dropped dead or did both in quick succession. He roared once more, then leaped to the ground, landing with a thump on the forest side of the gate. Behind him, he could hear kinkaras calling out in their melodious, dainty dialect. No doubt, they were preparing to rush at him from behind, through the yards-wide gap in the fence he had just made. He lifted his makeshift weapon and swung it wildly at the oncoming rakshasas on both sides. Bodies flew through the air, broken, bleeding, screaming.

‘Come,’ he boomed, in a voice augmented by rage. ‘Come, you harrowers of Sita and enemies of Rama. Come, see how a vanar fights rakshasas.’

Captains shouted orders, pressing more soldiers into the attack. Rakshasas poured in from every side, surrounding Hanuman. Behind him, the kinkaras gained courage and attacked.

He expanded himself without thinking. Growing to twice, then thrice the size of the tallest rakshasas. Swinging the fence, he struck out in terrible, bloody blows, each strike impacting a half-dozen rakshasas or more, smashing skulls and bodies, shattering faces and helmets, snapping swords. He roared as he fought, feeling a rage fuelled not only by the righteous anger he felt at all rakshasas in general for their crimes over the ages, but at these ones in particular. For they guarded Sita, his lord Rama’s beloved. And that was crime enough for him. He struck again and again, growing larger with each blow, louder with each bellow. Rakshasas died every time he struck. And still more came. And still he flailed on, slaying, slaughtering.

Ravana examined the two silk body garments held up by rakshasis, comparing one with the other, with the elegant ease of a man dressing to attend a royal ball.

Supanakha stalked the floor, her tail whipping back and forth like a cat-o-nine-tails with a life of its own. ‘I tell you the vanar has invaded the tower and you waste time dressing? Doesn’t it worry you?’

He ignored her while he continued to decide between the two garments. Finally, he chose the red one with purple piping. ‘Worry?’ he said distractedly. ‘A mere vanar? Why should I worry about a monkey-man?’

‘Because he’s not any ordinary monkey-man, cousin. You saw what he could do when he crossed the ocean. And I tried my best to deceive him, seduce him, tempt him, but he still resisted everything. I even brought him here in the hope that he would be stupid enough to try to assassinate you while you took your beauty nap.’

He turned a head to her, cocking its eyebrows. ‘Are you upset that you couldn’t seduce him or that he didn’t try to assassinate me?’ He chuckled. ‘Both, no doubt.’

‘He’s with Sita. He could carry her off and fly back to the mainland! Doesn’t that bother you? Don’t you want to at least try to stop him?’

He allowed the rakshasis around him to cast off his garments, standing naked in the centre of the bedchamber. Supanakha paused in her stalking, her eyes examining his body’s nether parts with a feral hunger that was both sexual and malevolent. The rakshasis began to anoint his body with oils, massaging every inch of his body with reverential, adoring care. ‘He will not.’

‘How do you know?’

He chuckled softly at her naivety, and at her frustration. ‘I am Ravana. I know.’

She flicked her tail angrily, tumbling a vase that shattered on the polished stone floor. Rakshasis shot her hateful glances, but made no sounds of protest. They began to clean up the shards quickly, efficiently, removing all traces within moments. Other rakshasis continued to play music and others danced or entwined themselves around each other sensuously for the amusement of the lord of Lanka. Supanakha snarled, impatient with Ravana’s refusal to take her seriously. ‘He didn’t come here for the sun and the climate, cousin. He means to take the woman back with him. I tell you. I have never seen any being so single-minded and determined to fulfil his will before.’

‘Never?’

She paused, thinking. ‘You mean, Rama. Well, apart from Rama, I’ve never seen anyone else so hellbent on accomplishing the impossible.’

He gestured to the rakshasis. They held up the robe for him to slip his arms through. She watched with fascination as he slipped all six arms into the appropriate holes with practised ease, then folded the lower pairs of arms into the slots in his own body. ‘Yet you do acknowledge that his task is impossible.’

She grunted. ‘I would have thought so until today. But then, until today I also thought that it was impossible for any virile male to resist the temptations of the palace of sensual pleasures.’

He allowed the rakshasis to tie the sash around his waist and chest. Then place plates of armour upon his arms and chest and midriff. ‘Tapasvi sadhus can resist sensual temptations. My pious brother Vibhisena resists the temptations of Lanka daily. Any man who devotes himself to raj-yoga can do it. Why, I myself abstained from sex and from consuming flesh or wine for a thousand years as tapasya. That was how I obtained my boons from Lord Brahma and Lord Shiva.’

‘But sadhus and pious penitents don’t come storming into the lair of Ravana alone and unarmed,’ she snarled. ‘What must I say to convince you? Why will you not take this vanar seriously? I tell you, he is a threat to us all.’

‘So what would you have me do?’ he asked, as the rakshasis bound tightly the straps of his armour and strapped on his boots.

‘Destroy him!’ she said. ‘Fight him and smash the leaping fool before he gets out of hand.’

‘There are a thousand palace guards already taking care of him. And the entire kinkara tribe is at him because he violated their precious gardens. Would that be enough to sate your anxieties?’

‘I don’t know,’ she snapped. ‘I told you. That’s what worries me. I have never encountered anything like this vanar before. His zeal is fanatical. He chants—,’ she paused. She had been about to say the one name that might make Ravana lose his elegant demeanour. ‘—his master’s name as if it were one of those secret Sanskrit mantras the mortal sages use ... ’

‘Astras,’ he supplied, then paused to swat aside a trio of rakshasis who were trying to raise his elaborately designed ten-part armoured headpiece to his heads. His strength was such that they fell back with broken bones and serious bruises, but none of them raised so much as a whimper of protest. They removed themselves from the chamber in submissive silence. Ravana took the headpiece and put it on his heads himself. Supanakha thought the rakshasis must be new additions to his harem, or over-eager to serve their master. Everyone who knew Ravana ought to know that he never permitted his heads to be touched by anyone, not even by his own wife Mandodhari during the most intimate moments.

‘Yes,’ she went on. ‘Like astras. And reciting just that one word, his master’s name, seems to empower him enormously, give him tremendous strength and energy. When he gets into that state, I feel like he could do anything. Face any opponent.’

‘Any opponent?’ he asked, turning to face her, fully dressed and armoured now. He made a formidable sight.

She gave him a smile that was also a snarl. ‘Yes. That is what I feel, cousin. Of course,’ she smiled sardonically. ‘If you disagree, you can always prove me wrong.’

He chuckled. ‘I intend to.’

TWELVE

When the rakshasas withdrew to regroup, Hanuman paused to take stock of his situation. Bodies lay piled in heaps all around him. The cries of grievously wounded rakshasas filled the air. The fence iron he had wielded so lethally was bent beyond all recognition, the wrought curves coated with a patina of rakshasa blood and fluids so that it seemed painted scarlet rather than black. On the garden side of the fence, kinkaras lay dead or howling in agony for yards around. Once stung, the foppish painted rakshasas also fought bravely and intelligently, using a peculiar spearjabbing action that he had not seen before in battle. He had noted it to pass on to the other generals when he returned.

The air around him stank of rakshasa effluents and his own copious sweat. He was some five or six times his usual size, though he did not recall growing to that extent. He wiped his forehead with the back of his hand, clearing away sweat and blood. He was stained all over with the blood of his enemies, and both his feet rested on the corpses of rakshasas. A palace guard stirred underfoot, moaning, and he jabbed the edge of the fence down, dispatching the poor fellow to a speedy end. Even rakshasas did not deserve to linger in agony.

The rakshasas were regrouping, creeping up to him steadily while he seemed distracted. They were more respectful of him now, neither shouting nor daring to launch individual attacks. They came in one close group, clustered together for courage. He spied them out of the corners of his eyes, coming from both sides. He ignored them and went on thinking.

He considered his options. What was the best thing to do next? Thanks to that devious demoness Supanakha, Ravana undoubtedly knew already that he was here to fetch Sita. The lord of rakshasas would expect him to return to the Ashoka grove and attempt to carry her away. Indeed, that was what he wished with all his heart to do. But since that option had been closed to him by Sita's own decision, he must not return there. To do so would only increase the guard around Sita and probably endanger and harry her further.

He had to show them that he was after other targets.

He inhaled, breathing in deeply enough to fill his lungs. Then, crouching to tighten his thighs like iron springs, he leaped up, away from the direction of the Ashoka grove, towards the far side of the forest level.

The rakshasas, who had crept within a yard or two of him, fell back in startled horror. He saw their surprised faces reduce to dots as he flew up high, then they were lost behind him in the dense forest.

He recalled how he had followed Supanakha through the many levels and worlds of this magical tower before. It was as if he had simply willed the tower to grant him access to the next level, and the next, and it had yielded without protest, letting him pass through the sorcerous membranes that divided them, without opposition.

He did the same thing, passing from the forest level on which Sita was held to the next. This was a natural landscape too, an enormous shining lake and a township on its banks. He passed through it and to the next, and the next. And so on. It took him a while, but finally he found what he was seeking.

The palace of sensual pleasures.

The rakshasas turned to greet him effusively, thinking mistakenly that he had returned to correct his earlier lapse, that he was ready now to succumb to the potent lure of this realm's fleshly temptations.

He roared and swung the twisted blood-spattered iron fence about to show them he meant war, not love. He smashed it into domes and cupolas, destroying pleasure houses and apartments, shattering marble floors and fabulous chandeliers. The rakshasas understood his intent then, and ran screaming before him. Suddenly, individual survival seemed more important than the perpetuation of the species—if that was their excuse for what they did here.

He rampaged through the palace of pleasure.

Ravana stepped through the portal directly onto the royal dais in Lanka's court hall. The agitated discussion that was raging ended at once. The assembled rakshasas turned to greet their king, bowing to pay him obeisance. He seated himself on the throne without further ceremony, and gave the rest permission to be seated. The great hall wore a deserted look, except for a dozen-odd seats near the dais that were occupied. He had called for only his war council to be present. The seated rakshasa commanders and generals looked at one another; nobody ever wanted to be the first to speak when Ravana convened a council.

He looked down at them impassively. 'It would be helpful if someone provided an update.'

War Marshal Prahasta rose to his feet. The kumbha-rakshasa was old but still vigorous. He towered above the others with the natural size and height advantage of all kumbhas, two and a half times as tall and twice the girth of most rakshasas. His uniform gleamed with gold-plated armour, set off by the rows upon rows of tiny shrunken heads dangling like medals from his lapels and chest ridges. They were the symbols of his victories, each shrunken head belonging to the leader of the force he had defeated in battle. More than two-thirds of the skulls belonged to various asura races, including rakshasas; the rest were of various animal species; perhaps a tenth were mortal.

Prahasta's hollow mouth horns twitched and exuded ichor before he spoke. 'My lord, the vanar has invaded the palace of pleasures and caused much destruction.' From his laconic tone, he could have been describing the completion of a municipal street-paving project. War Marshal Prahasta's inclinations were martial rather than hedonistic.

'The damned monkey has completely demolished the pleasure realm.' This voice, betraying more emotion, came from right beside Prahasta, spoken by a younger but no less impressively sized kumbha. Jambumali was Prahasta's son as well as vice-marshal, and he strongly resembled his father in physical appearance, but in every other respect, the two were as unlike as could be. While Prahasta had never stepped into the pleasure realm, Jambumali spent most of his leisure hours there. It was quite natural he would be upset. His own mouth horns twitched vigorously, exuding several viscous droplets of ichor. 'My captains tell me he seemed to take particular delight in destroying property rather than taking lives.'

'But he showed no reticence in taking lives in the upper levels,' noted his father beside him. Prahasta went on: 'It seems he follows the Kshatriya code of warfare. He only fights those who are armed, or who attack him first. I would not have believed until today that a vanar existed who even knew what the Kshatriya code was. It seems this is a most unusual breed we are dealing with. I recommend caution.'

Ravana allowed one of his heads to show amusement at this assessment. 'Not a breed, Prahasta, merely an aberration. And one that will have no opportunity to multiply.' He paused, probing the intelligence of the Pushpak with his mind. 'I see that he is currently heading through the rustic realms at a ripping pace.’ He paused. ‘And as Jambumali pointed out, he seems to be focusing his energy on destroying property rather than taking lives.’ He followed the vanar’s progress through the medium of the Pushpak for several moments, then saw something that made him snort. ‘Except when he is challenged or attacked, at which point he’s quite willing to do violence. Indeed, Prahasta, it seems we have here a cultured vanar, if such a thing is possible.’ He followed the vanar for a few minutes more, commenting on his movements to his council, then suddenly he frowned. ‘He’s changed direction. He sees something. What does he see?’ He felt an interference in the medium and understood at once. ‘The clever monkey, he’s using the Pushpak’s powers as well as his own to seek out a destination. But what place is he seeking?’ After a moment or two, ‘On the move again. He’s ... ah. I see where he’s going.’ Scowls darkened several of his faces. ‘He’s heading towards the bhakti level. He’s going to the worship halls.’

Several of his generals exchanged glances. ‘My lord,’ said General Bhasakarna, rising to his feet. ‘If he wreaks havoc in the worship hall, it will be seen as a most inauspicious omen by the people. He must be stopped at once.’

Ravana grunted. ‘I don’t give a hang for omens, General. But we are agreed in one respect. He must be stopped. Prahasta, take your kumbhas and block his way. I am instructing the Pushpak to transport them instantaneously. You go as well and ensure that the monkey-brained fool does not reach the prayer hall.’

Prahasta rose without a single word, turned, and vanished— into a portal that disappeared as soon as he had passed through.

Supanakha purred from beside Ravana’s throne. He glanced at her with a half-smile on one face, knowing what she desired. ‘Ah, yes, cousin. You like to watch, don’t you? I think watching this will be instructive for us all.’

He clapped his hands. At once, the many kinkara rakshasas kneeling below the dais fetched the large clay bowl filled with water. Ravana rose from his throne and stood before the bowl, uttering the mantras of conjuring. The contents of the bowl rose, and swirled, glimmering mistily. The image of Hanuman appeared upon the water-screen, leaping through the air with a mangled piece of unidentifiable metal in his hands that seemed to be a piece of an iron gate or fence. The vanar landed with a resounding thump upon a green, grassy hillock, looked around to assess his surroundings, and began bounding uphill.

Ravana gestured again. The kinkaras moved forward at once, serving goblets of wine to the ministers of war. Their painted faces glanced occasionally at the water-screen conjured by Ravana, stealing glances at the vanar. Ravana noted their stealthy looks. So. Word of the vanar's massacre of the kinkaras in the garden realm had reached down here already. He grimaced and snapped his fingers, dismissing the kinkaras. Then he raised his cup in a toast.

'Generals, tilt your cups while you watch the show,' he said. 'And make sure you drain them empty. Very shortly, we shall fill them to the brim with fresh vanar blood.'

Hanuman stopped halfway up the hill. He looked at the stone edifice on the top. It looked vaguely familiar. Almost at once, he knew where he had seen it before. When flying towards Lanka. A stone monolithic temple on the top of a mountain near the southern coast of the island. It bore the unmistakable blackstone austerity of a Shiva mandir. But this temple was within the heart of the tower-palace. Yet it looked the same. He looked around, sniffing; then scratched the grass, dislodging soil, and raising a clod to his nostrils to sniff at that as well. Waugh! If that was real earth, then he was a monkey's uncle! He tossed the clod away disdainfully. More of the Pushpak's illusions. Ravana had used the magic of the Pushpak combined with his own asura maya to create a virtual city within the city of Lanka itself. While some areas, like the pleasure realm, were wholly the product of his twisted imagination, others, like this replica of the stone temple from southern Lanka, were merely picture-perfect imitations. This was no more a real temple than this soil was real earth. He was relieved. The idea of finding the rakshasa's prayer halls had been an inspired one, but he had no desire to desecrate genuine shrines.

But this was different. He reduced himself so he would be small enough to enter the temple and bounded the last few yards, roaring loudly. He was rewarded by a flurry of shouts and yells of outrage as he was seen by the long line of rakshasas waiting to go in for their daily worship—or coming out after having done their ishtaa. Several of them dropped their prayer thalis and drew their weapons, coming towards him. Good. He was tired of just beating down pillars and knocking over buildings. It would be nice to have some real opposition.

The rakshasas emerging from the temple didn't provide much opposition though. He tore his way through them in a few moments. And then he was at the temple itself. He let a crowd of screaming Brahmin rakshasas, all clad in pristine white and red-ochre, and with caste marks on their foreheads and threads around their torsos, leave the premises unharmed. They ran down the hill, screaming and calling to the devas for help. He was amused to hear at least one call out to the wind god to save them from the 'monkey invaders'. Yes, Lord Marut would certainly save them. By demolishing this mockery of faith.

He said a silent prayer to Lord Shiva, asking his forgiveness as well as his support in demolishing this phoney edifice. To his relief, the dark god of destruction did not respond or appear to block his path, which in his mind constituted approval. As soon as he crossed the threshold and entered the temple proper, he saw why. The temple, although a perfect replica externally, was a completely different affair on the inside. Gold pillars and jewelled walls, gem-studded polished stone floors, pearl and opal carvings, naked representations of devas and devis ... It was an obscene mockery of what a real Shiva temple ought to be. He had no doubt that the real temple on the southern mountain was nothing like this. This was Ravana's doing. His way of subverting true faith with vulgar displays of wealth. In its own way, it was no less obscene than the palace of pleasures. A Shiva temple, of all places, was required to be as austere and simple as possible. Black stone alone was to be used, and even the effigy of the lord was to be carved as little as possible. Ideally, a lingam, the symbol of Lord Shiva, was to be installed as it was, uncut and unpolished, in the central space of the shrine.

But this place was a travesty. He expanded his size, and began roaring loudly to coax the priests and purohitas into leaving. They stared at him incredulously, clutching thalis filled with precious stones, gold, and other rich offerings. Hanuman took hold of a golden pillar, wrenching it loose with a loud grating noise, and began flailing around. The priests ran screaming, not too much in a hurry to remember to carry their precious ‘offerings’ with them. Two of them even managed to carry out a whole chest groaning with the weight of gold anklets and bangles and gems. Hanuman let them go without hurting any. He was busy swinging the pillar around.

The temple collapsed around him with a thunderous clatter. He emerged from the dust and debris, the pillar still clutched in one fist.

An army was waiting for him.

THIRTEEN

If not an army, then a legion at least. He estimated several thousands of rakshasas lined up in neat formations, armoured and armed. They were not the painted dainties he had seen before, nor the ordinary run-of-the-mill animal-faced ones that were ubiquitous in Lanka. These were huge fellows (and females too, he noted), three or four yards in height, half as much in width, and they resembled their smaller rakshasa brethren only superficially. From the burning intensity of their eyes, visible through the slits in their headgear, they seemed to have more fighting spirit than the smaller rakshasas too. And far more discipline. While he had been demolishing the phoney temple, they had cleared the area of all unarmed rakshasas and had ringed him in completely. If he wanted, he could leap over them and be a hundred miles away, or as far as one could go within this sorcerous illusion of a place. But why would he do that and disappoint all these smartly lined-up, eager-to-fight demonfaces? No. He would stay and fight.

He swept his gaze across the massed ranks and stopped at one face. He had no doubt that that was the leader. He was an impressive fellow, all armoured in gold—no, surely it couldn’t be solid gold, that would be as effective as tinfoil, it was probably gold-plated iron armour—and with a headgear that resembled some mangled hybrid between a rhinoceros and an elephant. But it was the rakshasa's face that caught his attention. The fellow displayed none of the seething ichor-dripping hatred that seethed in every other face in the ranks lined up before him. Only a dispassionate curiosity. As if he were some new breed of insect the rakshasa was seeing for the first time, and it would be interesting to see what colour his insides might be.

Hanuman looked around. A gentle wind was blowing. It felt cool and refreshing on his sweaty body. Fascinating how cleverly real this illusory world could be. Virtually as real as the real Lanka outside.

Time to show the Lankans that there were other things and beings as wondrous as those in their island-kingdom. Forces greater than even the most bewitching asura illusion.

He bared his chest and beat it once with the gold pillar. The sound it made was like a dhol-drum being beaten with a hollow stick.

'I am Hanuman,' he roared. 'Servant of the mighty Rama, King of Kosala, saviour of mortalkind, Rama the magnificent. I am the son of the wind and the chosen slayer of rakshasas. I came here to bring you the message of my lord Rama. In abducting Rama's wife Sita and bringing her here to Lanka against her will, your master Ravana has committed a grave transgression. My lord is coming here soon, bringing an army of vanars like myself. If your lord Ravana does not repent for his crime and release the lady Sita honourably before the sun rises on this land tomorrow, then I will destroy your kingdom and kill every last rakshasa who comes in my way. And then I shall leave, and when I return, a million vanars like myself will come with me, led by our lord Rama, and we will wreak such devastation upon your homeland that no rakshasa will survive to see the dawn of another day. How say you now? Speak!'

For a long moment, there was no response from the assembled rakshasas. Unless all that twitching of the slimy hornlike appendages over their mouths qualified as a response. Those appendages twitched and quivered furiously, dripping a slick viscous exudation the way a deer in heat exuded kasturi. Although Hanuman did not think that these exudations would smell as enticing as kasturi.

Then the leader, the one with all the gold-plated armour and the hundreds of tiny skulls dangling like decorations upon his torso, opened his own mouthhorns and spoke. ‘I am Prahasta, War Marshal of Lanka. We are kumbha-rakshasas, loyal to Ravana. We will not exchange words with you or trade terms. We have come to apprehend you, monkey-man. Surrender and state your demands to Lord Ravana if you dare. Resist us and you face death.’

The leader’s mouthhorns twitched once, then held still. But the appendages of his soldiers moved frantically. Hanuman understood that it was their way of expressing anger. So they wanted war. So be it. He would express his anger to them as well.

Hanuman beat his chest with the pillar again and yet again, roaring out the exclamation that was now his battle cry. ‘Jai Shri Rama!’ He shook the pillar at them, to make his response utterly clear.

The leader of the rakshasas opened his mouth appendages again and issued a loud, hoarse bleating cry. At once the first four rows of oversized rakshasas detached themselves from the rest of the contingent and lumbered forward. The line was perhaps a hundred head wide, which meant that four hundred rakshasas were charging him in this first assault. They gathered speed as they came, trundling like a herd of rhinoceros charging at a prey. The resemblance to rhinos became more blatant when they lowered their heads and pointed their long, tapering, blackbone horns. The tips of those horns, Hanuman saw, were sharp enough to rip open flesh and gore through a body.

He expanded himself at once, stopping when he was roughly the same size as any one of the rakshasas. He could have made himself a hundred times larger—or a thousand—if he desired. But he wished to make this as fair a fight as possible. It was time to send a message to Lanka, one that would be heard and taken seriously. Monkey-man, the rakshasa leader had called him. Monkey-man indeed!

The charging rakshasa lines were almost at him when he made his move. Instead of waiting for them to come the rest of the distance, he charged at them.

Swinging the gold pillar, he struck out at the frontline. The result was not quite the same as when he had struck out at the normal-sized rakshasas with the broken fence. These ones— kumbha-rakshasas, the leader had called them—were far sturdier and heavier. The pillar struck them with the impact of a mace striking an elm tree trunk. The ones who were struck directly grunted loudly in protest, their mouth appendages spewing copious amounts of that same greenish-black ichor. But they kept coming. Over their heads, he saw the leader of the kumbharakshasas throw his head back and issue a chugging sound that could only mean some form of laughter.

The line slammed into him. The lowered horns struck him like a bunch of pointed swords. With that much force and momentum, they probably expected to gore him through and through and toss him back over their shoulders, like a herd of bulls throwing a monkey. They barrelled into him with enough force to break down a yard-thick stone wall.

He absorbed the impact and stood his ground. With his vision-control, he witnessed it as if it were taking place over several moments instead of in just a fleeting instant.

Their horns crumpled first. Some broke, snapping off and leaving ragged stumps, others crumpled, and one horn tore off at the base, leaving a gaping hole that gushed blood. Then their headgear, some variety of special armour with eyelets to allow their horns to emerge, shattered. Made of some variety of bone, they crumpled and smashed into powdery fragments. And then their heads broke, skulls cracking, breaking, shattering as well. One of them struck Hanuman's ribs with a force hard enough to press his own head back into his torso.

The entire frontline crumpled, dropping dead on the spot.

Those who had not struck Hanuman directly were already into their follow-through. They swung their enormous curved blades, a cross between scimitars and battleaxes. The blades had the same effect on Hanuman's body as the horns and headgear. They shattered like glass, fragments driven helter skelter. Some were driven back into the faces and eyes and bodies of their wielders, dropping more kumbha-rakshasas.

Then Hanuman raised the pillar again and struck out. This time, he used much greater force. This time, the kumbharakshasas flew into the air no differently than the ordinary smaller rakshasas had flown earlier. He swung the pillar again and again, toppling kumbha-rakshasas like so many skittles.

A moment later, he was done. He stopped and lowered the pillar, stepping back to examine the results.

Several hundred kumbha-rakshasas lay dead, strewn in a wide sweeping arc that ranged from a yard before him to several dozen yards in every direction. The ranks of the remaining kumbha-rakshasas had been broken in places, disturbed by the bodies of those he had sent flying. They were repairing those breaks as quickly as possible, deeply entrenched military discipline keeping them efficient. But he could see from the face of their leader and from the change in the eyes—wider now, less angry, more shocked—that his unexpected superiority had not been what they had expected.

‘Rakshasas,’ he roared. ‘Once more I entreat you. Petition your master Ravana to release the lady Sita and show repentance for his transgression. Or face my wrath and see your kingdom destroyed. This is my last warning to you. I am Hanuman, servant of Lord Rama of Ayodhya.’

Again, that quivering of the hornlike mouth appendages. Now that he had engaged them in close combat, he knew that the things around their mouths were horns only in shape; in substance, they were cartiligious growths that were partly nostril-like in function and partly lip-like appendages that covered their mouths. Their appendages were quivering rapidly. He took that to mean extreme shock and outrage.

‘How do you answer?’ he called again.

Their leader answered for them all. ‘Kumbha-rakshasas!’ he thundered in a hoarse but powerful voice. ‘Kill the invader! All tribes, charge!’

With a roar of approval, the entire force charged at Hanuman.

Ravana threw the goblet of wine at the water-screen. The heavy gem-encrusted gold cup passed through the image of Hanuman slaying the last of the kumbha-rakshasas and flew on to strike the head of a bowing kinkara with a dull thud. The rakshasa reeled, blood streaming from his head, and fell back on the floor. His companions to either side bowed quickly, picked up their fallen comrade and removed him from the hall. Ravana failed to even notice the incident. His sunny disposition had given way to a foul mood as abruptly as hot milk curdled when sour lime was squeezed into it. Supanakha kept her distance; she knew from experience that someone would end up on the receiving end of that mood, and she had no desire to be the unlucky one.

Rising from his seat, Ravana gestured sorcerously and muttered a shloka in a tone that sounded as if he were cursing rather than incantating. The water-screen collapsed with a splash. Supanakha was far enough for drops not to land on her, but she winced anyway.

‘My lord.’

Vice-marshal Jambumali was on his feet. His face appendages quivered at the memory of the sight of his father and fellow kumbhas being slaughtered. ‘My lord, permission to go and confront the vanar.’

Ravana’s only response was to gesture, opening a portal. Jambumali went through it and disappeared. Supanakha leaped down from the dais. One of Ravana’s heads turned to track her.

‘Where are you going, cousin?’

She flicked her tail. ‘I want to see. I’ve never seen kumbhas being slaughtered like deer or rabbit. Besides,’ she licked her lips. ‘A lot of good meat will go to waste.’

He plucked a knife out of mid-air and flung it at her. She scampered, racing into the portal just before it slid shut, turning sharply to the left as she went through. The knife came with her, missed her right ear narrowly and imbedded itself in the earth with a snick.

The smell of blood assailed her senses. It was ripe, powerful, thick in the air. And it was all kumbha blood. She breathed it in, relishing the scent. It had been a long time since rakshasas had been forbidden from eating the flesh of other rakshasas, even when that act was part of a victory ritual in the time-honoured tradition of tribe wars and clan wars. And among all the tribes and clans, she particularly loved kumbha flesh. Only kinkara meat was sweeter. But Jambumali was already racing up the hillside and she wanted to see how he handled the vanar. Almost regretfully, she raced up the hillside after the vice-marshal. He reached the top just yards before her.

‘Vanar!’ he cried, his voice tinged with hysteria. ‘You have slain all my kinsmen, destroyed my entire tribe. These were the finest warriors that ever lived in all the three worlds.’

Supanakha scoured the hillside sharply, seeking out the vanar. For a moment, she almost didn’t recognise him, splattered with blood and surrounded by kumbha corpses as he was. Then she recognised the familiar proboscis shape of his mouth and the unmistakably monkey-like tail curled upward behind him, like a bow without a string. He stood as still as a statue washed in blood, amidst the carnage of his encounter with the kumbhas.

He seemed unimpressed by Jambumali’s words. ‘Not the finest,’ he said. Then, to Supanakha’s surprise, a tinge of sorrow flickered across his features. ‘But worthy opponents, no less. I appealed to them not to fight me. They would not heed my warning. Will you?’

Jambumali responded with a bellow of outrage. ‘My father lies there, murdered by your hand. There can be no armistice between us.’

Hanuman sighed, lowering the battered and bloodied gold pillar that he had wielded as a mace. ‘I beg you, reconsider. As a vanar, I have no compunction about slaughtering rakshasas by the thousandfold. But my lord Rama abhors needless taking of lives, and as his servant, I respect his wishes. Pray, take my petition to your lord Ravana and end this violence.’

‘Liar,’ Jambumali said, his face appendages shaking so much that ichor flew to either side like raindrops from a shaking bough. He had strung his bow while speaking and now raised it, pointing an arrow at Hanuman. ‘If you are half as treacherous as your lord Rama, then even the lowest serpent that creeps on the ground would not hold truck with your assurances. Any servant of that dastardly villain cannot be a person of any honour. In killing you, I will be ridding the world of a vile spy of the worst mortal that ever lived.'

Supanakha saw Hanuman's eyes widen with surprise, then shock, then anger at Jambumali's words. 'How dare you speak of my lord Rama thus! It is your lord Ravana who is the villain. Is he not satisfied with his transgressions against my lord that he should have poisoned the minds of all rakshasas as well?'

'Silence,' Jambumali said, his quivering ceasing as he stilled himself in preparation for the loosing of his arrow. 'I will hear no more lies and deceit from your monkey lips. Defend yourself if you can.'

And he loosed the arrow so forcefully that Supanakha could feel the vibrations from the bowstring ringing in her teeth. The arrow went through Hanuman's left shoulder, its iron head striking bone with a sickening sound. Supanakha licked her lips. So the vanar's skin could be pierced after all. How interesting. But then why had the weapons of the other kumbhas had no effect?

Hanuman ground his teeth, clearly feeling the pain of the wound, but he neither looked at nor touched the arrow in his shoulder. 'One more time I appeal to you,' he said, 'and it is for the sake of my lord Rama that I grant you this final opportunity to redeem yourself. Will you not go to Ravana and tell him my petition?'

Jambumali had strung another arrow, this one with a crescent shaped head. Its sharp blade gleamed like the moon in a midnight-black sky. 'Save your breath, vanar,' he said through gritted teeth. 'It is the last you will breathe.'

He loosed the second arrow. It took Hanuman in the chest, embedding itself with a sound that made even Supanakha wince.

Blood flew from the wound, splattering across the vanar's body, still wet with kumbha blood and ichor.

Still, Hanuman took no note of the arrow, even though she knew the wound must hurt him terribly.

‘You have not given me a proper answer,’ the vanar said. ‘Therefore, I still raise no arms against you. Tell me. Will you or will you not?’

Jambumali loosed three arrows at once. These were decorated with plumes, Supanakha noted with delight. They struck the vanar on different parts of his body. One hit Hanuman in the belly, another took him in the thigh, and a third struck the flesh between his neck and his shoulder. All three went deep, their plumed barbs pointed outward. Removing them would mean losing lumps of flesh, she thought excitedly. The very idea made her giddy. She wondered what vanar flesh tasted like. Even better, she wondered what living vanar flesh tasted like.

Hanuman raised his hand, holding out his palm in the universal gesture to halt. ‘Why do you persist in assailing me, kumbha-rakshasa? I seek only to know your answer. Do you not honour the rules of war in Lanka? It is not meet to assault an opponent when he still wishes to speak words with you.’

Jambumali looked over the top of his bow, his face noting each wound on the vanar’s body with evident pleasure. ‘Do not speak to me of the rules of war and the code of Kshatriyas, vanar. You are the servant of Rama. And when Rama himself is without honour, where is the question of honouring his servant.’

He loosed four more arrows in quick succession. Each one struck Hanuman in a vital part, went deep, and drew copious amounts of blood. Supanakha could barely see a limb of the vanar that had no arrows sticking out of it now. Jambumali shouted as he loosed the arrows. ‘Still, if you still foolishly await a response, then here is my answer. No. No. No. And yet again, no.’

Hanuman took the arrows with the same stoic grit. But the instant the kumbha-rakshasa had finished speaking, he raised the gold pillar and said in a voice so quiet, Supanakha almost did not hear the words. ‘So be it, abuser of Rama’s name.’

Hanuman lofted the gold pillar the way any ordinary soldier might lift a javelin for throwing. He leaned back, then flung the pillar directly at the spot where Jambumali stood, some fifty yards distant.

The vice-marshal was already stringing a fresh clutch of arrows, each with different heads. The gold pillar flew through the air as smoothly and directly as any javelin. It struck the kumbha-rakshasa's chest with such force that Supanakha could hear the very veins in the vice-marshal's body burst. Jambumali's body was shattered so completely that his arms, his legs, his head, all flew in separate directions. His chest was riven through and through, the pillar going through his body and passing out from the other side. His quiver full of arrows fell to bits. And still the pillar flew on, like a javelin that had merely passed through a thin sheet of parchment. Supanakha turned her head in wonder as it sped over her, and flew on across the valley. She saw it arc downwards on the far side where it embedded itself firmly in the soil there, some thousand yards away.

FOURTEEN

Ravana roared in fury. 'Sons of whores and donkeys. Can none of you face down a single vanar? Shame on the clans that bred you all!'

Portals opened and shut constantly as the sabha hall continued to fill with new arrivals. News of the vanar's destruction of the palace of pleasures and the prayer level, and his shocking victory over the kumbhas had spread, and all of Ravana's ministers had come at once. The water-screen had been resurrected by the king for no other reason than the need to know what was happening. The hall full of rakshasas shuddered at the demonlord's rage. He stalked the dais like a hungry lion, wounded and caged. His heads babbled incoherently to one another or to themselves like a roomful of mad philosophers.

'Do none of you possess the ability to dispatch a single foe? This is but one vanar! One! What will you do when Rama's army arrives? How will you face a million like this one?'

Nobody dared venture an answer. Finally, furious and frustrated, he turned and set his ten heads to scanning the congregation. All sat up straight and silent under their lord's scrutiny, but several looked as though they wished they could shrink or turn invisible.

Ravana's eyes fell upon the clutch of seven high-backed seats that bore the noble bottoms of the ministry of Lanka. They represented the seven chief tribes of rakshasas.

'Ministers,' he said.

The seven looked at one another with varying expressions of disbelief and shock. The seniormost among them protested in quivering tones: 'Your majesty, we are skilled in the arts of governance, not war. We cannot—'

'Save the craven apologies,' he said. 'I want to send the vanar someone capable of killing him, not boring him to death. Each of you has an eldest son serving in my armed forces. Each a champion warrior and a leader of other warriors. Send your seven sons to battle the vanar. The one who defeats him shall replace Jambumali as vice-marshal, and his father will take Prahasta's place as marshal of the armies of Lanka.'

If there were protests on their lips, they were quickly swallowed. The rewards dangled before their greedy eyes might not have been worth risking their own lives for, but they were certainly worth risking the lives of their eldest sons. Like all the nobles of Lanka, each of them numbered their heirs in the hundreds. 'It will be our patriotic duty to do so,' said the spokesperson, bowing low enough to touch the ground with his split trunk.

She was within ten yards of him when he spoke.

'Among my people, those who feed on the flesh of their own kind are considered worthy of only the lowest levels of Naraka.'

She stopped feeding, her mouth filled with a hunk of steaming kumbha innards, and looked up hatefully. He stood with his back to her, silhouetted against the bright unearthly sky. She spat out the mouthful. There was plenty more where that had come from. 'I'm only eating the remains, vanar. You're the one who slaughtered them. Isn't killing against your karma too?'

'Not when it is for the sake of dharma.'

‘Dharma!’ She issued a laugh that brought out the streak of hyena in her. It echoed across the valley. ‘Is that your excuse for everything? Do anything, kill anyone, take what you like, just lay the blame at dharma’s feet? You know, the way you and your mortal masters bandy about that term, it sounds a very convenient excuse to cover up your own crimes.’

He turned to look at her. But there was no anger in his eyes, only the sadness she had seen earlier when he had finally deigned to defend himself against Jambumali. It startled her. She had seen that exact same look in Rama’s eyes once. ‘What is your role in this, shapeshifter? I do not think you serve Ravana because you need to. You pursue some other agenda, do you not? What is that? What is it you really want?’

She laughed again, this time nervously. She had not expected such a personal observation. ‘I want what every rakshasa wants. Wine, sex, meat.’ The answer sounded weak even to her own ears.

He watched her with narrowed eyes, a new look coming over his face. ‘Power. I think it is power, is it not? Ravana is beholden to you for some reason. That is why, at your urging he came to Panchvati and kidnapped my lady Sita. He is responsible for the crime, but you are responsible for instigating him to commit it. Why did you do that?’

She spat out a morsel of gristle. She hated gristle. ‘I don’t have time to teach you history, vanar. Perhaps someday, if I decide to compose my memoirs ... ’ She smiled artfully. ‘Though I doubt you will live long enough to hear the full story.’

He watched her with a bemused, half-distracted expression. ‘It is Rama himself, is it not? In your own way, you are as besotted with my lord as I am. And your obsession has somehow infected Ravana as well. What was once a simple antagonism has turned into a personal vendetta for the lord of Lanka. That is why, even though he possesses Sita, he will not rape or harm her bodily. Because it is not Sita he desires at all. She was only the means to an end, suggested by your devious mind. It is in fact Rama he wishes to draw here, using Sita as the lure. You have infected your cousin. Now he too is obsessed with Rama and his obsession drives him to any lengths.’

She snarled. ‘You babble too much, vanar. It shows your monkey roots. Go hop on a tree and pick your fleas. Better yet, pick up your tail and take your tall tales back where you came from. Go! Shoo! Leave me to my feast!’ She dipped her head to the open belly of the kumbha she had been feeding on.

She felt the rumbling through her paws and at first she thought it was he, finally losing his temper with her and pounding his way nearer, to kill her. But when she looked up, she saw him gazing towards the west, at the ridgeline over the hills. A dustcloud was growing larger. She flicked her ears and caught the sound. ‘Chariots. It seems I might get vanar flesh to feed on after all. Unless you decide to take my advice and leave Lanka first.’

He did not reply. She felt chagrined that he would turn his back on her so carelessly. It gave her half a mind to sneak up and leap at him. But then she recalled the way he had withstood the temptations of the palace of pleasures, and the power of the Pushpak as well as Ravana’s sorcery. That had impressed her far more than his prowess as a fighter. She had seen enough great warriors to know that the greatest battles were fought in the mind and spirit, not on the battlefield. Besides, he had come close to the truth when he said that she was not a servant of Ravana, even though she happened to serve him. That subtle difference had also earned her grudging respect for the vanar. Let Ravana’s many minions throw themselves at him. She would watch. And maybe feed on the spoils later.

She bounded away, finding a sala tree several dozen yards away onto which she climbed easily, creeping to the end of a branch and perching there, her whiskered chin on her claws.

Hanuman tried to feel some regret at this turn of events. It had not been his mission to come to Lanka and slaughter rakshasas. But he kept recalling Sita’s lean, starved appearance, her bony aspect, her pale, shocked face, those blankly staring eyes, the scores of tiny marks all over her arms. She had suffered. Not a direct assault or ravishment, it was true, nor even physical torture of the nailbeds-and-wheels variety, but that did not diminish her suffering one whit. Her mind and spirit had been battered.

The Sita he recalled from Janasthana was a proud, vigorous, warrior-queen in exile. Capable of facing ten thousand rakshasas and battling them, shoulder to shoulder with her husband and brother-in-law. That Sita had been under great duress too, in exile, deprived of her rightful place of luxury and power, constantly on the run from demons, constantly battling the wilderness, the rakshasas, her fate. But she had been happy. Healthy. Vigorous. Strong. He could picture her crowned with the coconut-shell tiara of a queen of Ayodhya—or whatever mortal queens wore to signify regency—seated beside Rama on the Sunwood throne of that great Arya nation.

But the Sita he had found in Lanka had been a pale shadow of that woman. A half-starved, beaten-down, spirit-battered person who was sustaining herself on faith and courage alone. A woman who understood, as he did, that the battle for dharma was more important than the battle for survival. Her last words still rang in his ears. My life is no longer the only thing at stake here. Rama's honour is what matters most. Now, go, loyal friend of my husband. Go, fly. And take these, my last words, to Rama.

They were the words of a woman who was prepared to die for her husband's and her own honour rather take the easy way out and save her mortal body. Despite her admonition to him to leave, despite the fact that he knew that Rama must be waiting in agony for his return, even though he knew that Ravana would sooner give up his ten heads than let his prize catch go, he had still lingered here in this kingdom of demons. Because he knew that those last words had not been a slip of her tongue. She was facing death shortly. And if there was even the slimmest chance that he could prevent that, then he would do anything and everything he could.

The dustcloud materialised into a clutch of chariots. Beautiful, burnished things they were, like all else he had seen in Lanka. Golden arched, gem-studded, and designed like masterpieces of art rather than mere horse-drawn vehicles for transportation. He counted seven and almost felt disappointed. Was that all? Well, these fellows must be good warriors, or they would not have sent only seven. He inhaled deeply, cleansing his mind of all distractions, and strode forward to give the approaching enemies more accessible routes to attack him.

Supanakha recognised the seven charioteers who approached. They were all renowned fighters, masters of archery and macecraft and ... of all kinds of weaponry and fighting. Each of them represented one of the seven major tribes of the rakshasa race, which was to say, the seven tribes that had survived. Their chariots were adorned with satin banners decorated with the sigil and totem of their tribes. She also noted that they were the sons of Ravana's seven ministers of governance, which meant they had inherited not only their father's ambitions but their rivalries as well. A smile flickered on her face. Ravana must have offered a hefty reward to the one who would down the vanar. It would add an element of competitiveness that would spice up the encounter.

They had obviously been informed of the vanar's exploits already. None made any attempt to halt and parley, or to give the vanar any opportunity to do so. Instead, all seven drove their chariots straight at Hanuman, converging on him like a pack of wolves upon a bleeding carcass. As they approached, she heard shouts and caught snatches of words in several rakshasa dialects. They were egging each other on, taunting one another with boastful claims of who would be the first to draw blood, the first to chop off a limb, and so on.

Hanuman stood impassively, facing their charge without any attempt to defend himself. He had no weapon in his hands, Supanakha noted. Not for want of them; there were any number of weapons at hand. The hundreds of slain kumbhas lying about had no need of them anymore. But the vanar stood barehanded and straight-backed, staring at the oncoming chariot charge without a flicker of emotion.

His body still bore the heads of the arrows shot into him by Jambumali. He had made no attempt to remove these either. Those wounds would be enough to down any warrior, mortal, deva, rakshasa—or vanar. But Hanuman seemed not to notice or care about them at all. Blood oozed from several places on his body, staining him further. Against the lush, green grass of the hillside, he appeared to be a statue carved out of red marble.

As the charioteers came within arrowshot, they drew their bows and began firing. They used the tactic of most chariot-archers during battle, each shooting several arrows at once. A slew of arrows flew towards Hanuman.

At the same time, the vanar moved forward, starting to run towards the chariots.

The first hail of arrows fell to earth. Hanuman was already yards ahead when they landed, bristling harmlessly on the grassy soil. He picked up speed, running faster. He still had not expanded himself, she noted, and wondered why. Then she understood: fair play. These stupid mortals and their dharmic principles. It was the reason why the vanar had allowed Jambumali to shoot him full of arrows before retaliating, and it was the reason why he was restraining his use of powers now.

The charioteers loosed again, this time aiming far lower, to anticipate the target moving towards them. The arrows flew in a line parallel with the ground. Hanuman increased his pace rather than slowing, running into the hail of arrows. Supanakha watched with great interest: the vanar would resemble a hedgehog's rear after that lot landed.

Then Hanuman increased speed so much, he literally became a blur. He vibrated at such speed that he was able to dodge the arrows, moving faster than them, and skirting each one deftly. It almost looked like he was passing through the shower of missiles and they were passing through him, but Supanakha understood at once that he was in fact dodging them but at a speed so great that the naked eye could not actually see him move.

The charioteers had grown silent. They had loosed enough arrows already to slow down a legion. And the vanar was still unharmed—unharmed by their arrows at least—and still coming directly at them.

They discarded their bows quickly, taking up a variety of weapons. They spurred their horses on with their free hands, aiming to do what every charioteer does in a battle charge: run their opponent down.

Hanuman leaped into the air. He did not fly above them, though he could. Nor did he fly past them, as he also could have done. He flew at them.

The vanar leaped directly at the closest approaching chariot, and kicked out with his bare feet. The gold-adorned cupola was torn from its stand so hard, it went flying away like a discus. Hanuman landed on the rim of the chariot's front well, and balanced there as easily as a thin monkey on a fat branch. The charioteer, a young sarpa rakshasa named Anjunani that Supanakha had once spent a pleasant hour or two with in the palace of pleasures, swung a mace edged with curved blades at the vanar's thigh.

Hanuman got inside the angle of the blow and grasped the rakshasa's arm. He snapped it off like a twig, wrenching it loose from its shocked owner's body. He backhanded the arm, mace and all, at its owner, smashing his face and torso like an overripe blood-orange. A shower of rakshasa blood exploded into the sunlit air.

Before the rakshasa's spraying blood had touched the ground, Hanuman had already leaped into the air. He lunged directly at the next chariot. The driver of this one was holding a longspear tipped with a barbed point. Hanuman caught hold of the spear and drove it back into the owner, putting his entire weight behind it. The blunt wooden end of the spear gored into the rakshasa's neck and spewed out the other side. Before the rakshasa could fall back into his chariot, Hanuman had already leaped again to the next one.

Supanakha watched in admiring amazement as the vanar flew and whirled through the air, crushing one charioteerrakshasa's head with his thighs—his thighs!—as he fended off the sword thrusts of another with his bare hands, then tore the banner pole from a chariot and used it as a spear, thrust straight into the heart of the sword-wielder. Another rakshasa whirled a bladed throwing ball overhead. Before he could loose it, Hanuman lunged at his feet, grabbed his legs, picked him up bodily, then whirled him about, weapon and all. The last two attacked him together from front and rear simultaneously, displaying a rare moment of inter-tribe solidarity. Hanuman threw himself backwards feet-first at the one behind him, caught his neck between his feet, then flew forward and grasped the throat of the other one. Then he somersaulted sideways, slamming both bodies into the ground with enough force to break both in half. Somersaulting once more, he landed on his feet on soft grass in a shower of rakshasa blood.

FIFTEEN

Mandodhari frowned at her brother-in-law. Vibhisena was visibly excited, something she had not seen very often before. She was wary as she came out of her bedchamber to receive him in the parlour, assuming that he was going to press the case for Sita once again. If so, she was ready to throw him out at once. She had no wish to hear the mortal woman's name uttered again, in any connection. But the first words from his mouth had nothing to do with Rama's wife.

‘An emissary from Rama is here, inside the tower,’ he said without preamble or formal greetings, another significant departure. ‘He is on a rampage.’

She gestured at her sakhis to leave them alone. Vikata scowled. The rakshasi had been ill-tempered ever since the scene in the court. Being chain-whipped by a mortal, that too an unarmed, half-starved, human female, had not done much for the sakhi's ego. Mandodhari had no doubt that if she were not kept within constant of her mistress, Vikata would have no compunctions in stealing back upstairs to the prisoner's level and tearing Sita to bloody shreds with her nails and her teeth. She would face Ravana's wrath afterwards, and would be condemned to a painful and quick death, but that would not matter. Rakshasis like Vikata were accustomed to killing first and thinking later. Mandodhari cared a hang if that had happened, but even though she didn't mind Sita being eaten alive by Vikata, she looked forward more to seeing the mortal woman publicly paraded and then executed as a criminal of the state. So, since there was a tussle between the mistress's preferred way of seeing the mortal prisoner die and the sakhi's, naturally the mistress had won. But only just.

Vikata left the queen's palace apartments in bad humour. If it were possible to slam a door, she would have done so. As it was, the Pushpak's portal slid shut behind her as silently and smoothly as ever.

Mandodhari looked at her brother-in-law. He was so excited, his hands were trembling. ‘Sit down, Vibhisena,’ she said shortly. She had not enjoyed their last conversation. If she entertained him now, it was only because she knew that she had won the battle of wills. And after all, he was still her brother-in-law. Even if he was a mortal-lover.

He sat down. His thighs twitched and he placed his hands on his lap, trying to still the twitching. ‘It is a vanar. Named Hanuman. He is empowered by some Brahman shakti given to him by Rama.’

‘A vanar,’ she repeated tonelessly. ‘That’s the species of animal that looks like and lives like monkeys and apes, isn’t it? And you say he has gone on a rampage? Here in Lanka?’ She felt a smile come to her face. ‘What kind of rampage? Smashing glass and china? Stealing sweetmeats from the kitchen?’

He did not laugh or smile. ‘No, my sister-in-law. He has destroyed the palace of pleasures, and the prayer world, and several other levels and realms that even I had not known existed. It seems he has ranged freely through the realms of the tower, destroying and demolishing everything in sight. He has caused a great deal of destruction.’

She raised her eyebrows. It sounded like the subject of a comic street performance, one of those things where feeble-minded rakshasas tumbled and danced and smashed open their skulls or cut off fingers to get a few laughs from their equally feeble street audiences. ‘Are you sure your information is correct, Vibhisena?’

He nodded vigorously, wiping sweat from his neck with the end of his anga-vastra. It was practically drenched with perspiration, she noted, as were the rest of his garments. ‘Aye, milady. It is the talk of Lanka. Did your sakhis not tell you about it? But then, they deliberately keep you ill-informed and spy on you for Ravana.’ He shook his head as she opened her mouth to protest. ‘No, let us not argue now. I only came to tell you these things because I wish you to come with me to Ravana.’

‘Why?’ she asked suspiciously.

‘Because he is out of control. He does not understand the vanar’s powers and he will not listen to anyone who tries to tell him. I have already tried thrice to gain access to the throne room, but he has barred me.’

‘I am not surprised,’ she said. ‘This sounds to me like a matter for the royal guard.’

He clucked his tongue impatiently. ‘The royal guard is almost completely destroyed. So are the kinkaras.’

She blinked. ‘What? Destroyed? By whom?’

‘By the vanar, my lady, did you not hear what I said earlier? He is on a rampage! Blood and destruction. He will destroy all of Lanka if he is not stopped. But Ravana thinks he can be stopped by brute force, and that is completely absurd. He does not understand the extent of this creature’s powers.’

She leaned forward, stunned. ‘Are you telling me that this vanar intruder, an emissary from Rama, has single-handedly killed the royal guard and the kinkaras?’

‘And Marshal Prahasta. His son Jambumali. One entire kumbha-rakshasa legion. The seven champions of our seven ministers. And now Ravana has ordered five more legions, led by five generals, to join the attack. And they are being slaughtered as well.’

She rose to her feet, her hands flying to her mouth in disbelief. ‘But this is impossible. A single enemy? A vanar? How?’

‘He is the son of the wind god, Vayu. But his powers were realised and activated only because of his devotion to Rama. He fights for dharma. He came here to ask that Sita be released and permitted to go back with him. But Ravana will not even listen to his petition. He thinks that by throwing armies and warriors at him, he can destroy the vanar. He does not understand that this is no mere warrior.’

She looked around, unable to process this flood of shocking news. ‘Why was I not told about this—’ She stopped herself. Perhaps there was some truth in Vibhisena’s accusations after all. All this while, she had thought she was the one keeping an eye on Vikata. What if it had been the other way around? ‘But even if I agree with you, Vibhisena, what do you expect me to do? Ravana is handling the situation, isn’t he? Even I don’t presume to match his knowledge of military matters. This is beyond me, or even you.’

He sighed, wringing his hands. ‘My lady, he knows that he cannot deal with the vanar by force alone. That is why, even after sending in the five generals and their legions, he has still sent for two more warriors.’

‘So?’

He looked at her with large, unhappy eyes. ‘He has sent for your sons, Indrajit and Akshay Kumar. He intends to send them in to battle the vanar. And if they do so, they will be killed just like the others. Only you can stop him. Not as a wife, or as a queen. But as a mother.’

Supanakha howled with glee at the sight of the five generals of Lanka lying on the battlefield. The entire level, once nothing more than an idyllic rustic landscape, a perfect replica of the southern part of Lanka, had been turned into one vast charnel house. She scanned the hundreds upon hundreds of corpses of foot-soldiers of various rakshasa tribes, shattered chariots, slain broken-surs and horses. It looked like the aftermath of a clash between two sizeable armies. Hard to believe that one vanar had wreaked so much death and destruction.

Hanuman was standing in the midst of the carnage, looking at the bodies of the fallen generals. He turned his head as she approached cautiously, pausing now and then to take a nip from one, a lick of another. ‘I tried to tell them. But they would not listen. Why will nobody hear my plea? Do they wish me to destroy the whole of Lanka?’

Supanakha chuckled.

He looked at her. ‘Why do you laugh? Do you find the death of your fellow rakshasas amusing?’

‘Rakshasas, mortals, devas, asuras ... they all die sometime or other,’ she said matter-of-factly. ‘I don’t let myself get upset over it. I was laughing at your hubris.’

‘Hubris?’

‘Do you really think this is all of Lanka?’ She gestured with a nod of her head and a grin. ‘This is all illusion, a non-place created by the Pushpak. Nothing you do here will destroy the real Lanka.’

He pointed at the field strewn with corpses. ‘Are all these illusions too? Non-rakshasas?’

She lost her smile. ‘They’re real. And yes, they were some of Ravana’s best warriors. But mark my words, I said ‘some of’. He has many more champions to replace these. You haven’t yet faced the worst yet. He’s underestimated you, that’s all.’

Hanuman regarded her thoughtfully. ‘Who are the best, then?’

She chortled. ‘Think I would tell you that? Not in a million years! I enjoy watching you slay his incompetent goons. I’m sure sooner or later he’ll send a couple slightly less incompetent ones your way. You’ll find out for yourself.’

He shook his head. ‘I will kill them all. No rakshasa will stop me.’

She arched her eyebrows. ‘Vain for a vanar, aren’t you? You don’t know what Ravana is really capable of, my simian friend. And you haven’t even seen his real champions. Why, take just one for instance. Kumbha—’ She broke off. ‘You almost tricked me there.’ She grinned. ‘Anyway. Once Ravana’s oversized ego accepts that you’re more than the run-of-the-mill warrior, you’ll have your chance to test that assumption to the limit.’

She cocked her ears. The sound of a conch shell blowing was audible. It was coming from just over the next rise. ‘I think you may get your chance sooner than you think.’

She backed away, then stopped and looked back. He was still standing in the same place, as if rooted to the ground. ‘In case I don’t get an opportunity to exchange pleasantries with you again, let me take this time to say that you aren’t half bad at all. The last opponent I saw who could harry Ravana’s forces so skilfully was ... Rama.’

He looked pleased at that. She chuckled and scampered away to find a safe perch from which to observe the next round in this conflict.

Ravana was pacing the throne dais when Mandodhari burst in. She came in the old-fashioned way, through the door. The surprised sentries on duty had to dance aside to avoid being struck by the doors. She strode up the carpeted aisle, her white robes billowing, face as dark with fury as a stormcloud over a black ocean. Vibhisena followed behind her, wringing his hands and muttering mantras.

The assembled ministers and generals turned to look at her with only slight curiosity. Everyone's attention was riveted on the image depicted upon the water-screen. Few were seated. Most stood about, anxious looks on their faces. Several wore fixed snarls on their snouted faces, others expressions of shocked disbelief.

Mandodhari stopped before the water-screen. It showed the vanar Hanuman standing alone in a field of corpses. The devastation was considerable. Off to one side, a feline figure scampered to the silhouette of a tree and leaped up, climbing to the top where she perched on a branch. Despite the sorcerous clarity of the image, it was not possible to make out the identity of each and every corpse, but she didn't have to recognise them all to understand the scope and significance implied by the image.

'A single vanar,' she said. 'Unarmed.'

Ravana threw down the goblet from which he was drinking. It bounced hard on the stone floor, the metal rim crumpling with the force of the throw, and settled with a ringing echo on its side.

'What does he want?' she asked her husband.

Every pair of eyes, and several trios of eyes, turned to Ravana.

'What do you think he wants?' he growled.

'And is she worth all this?' she asked indicating the field full of corpses.

He waved dismissively. 'This is not about her anymore. It is a question of dealing with an intrusion.'

'An intrusion?' she repeated. 'Is that what you call it? It looks more like an invasion to me.'

Ravana glowered down at her with three of his heads. The others seemed to be muttering arcane things to each other or to invisible persons. 'It will be dealt with. Within the hour, I will have the vanar bound in chains and paraded through the city streets. Then he will be executed.'

‘Along with the mortal woman?’ she asked.

He turned away, avoiding her gaze. ‘Let us deal with this impudence first. The mortal woman is no immediate threat.’

She stared at him until she felt that her gaze must bore through his back and pierce his flesh. But then she recalled the real reason she had come here. In that sense, he was right. The mortal woman could wait awhile. There were other things more pressing to deal with first.

‘I am told you sent for my sons.’ She kept her voice calm.

He turned to face her again. ‘What of it?’

‘And that you intend to order them to go into battle against this invader ... intruder ... whatever you wish to call him.’

‘Lanka is as much under their protection as mine. They have a right to defend their kingdom against this intrusion. They are, after all, princes of Lanka.’

‘And you are, after all, king of Lanka,’ she responded, more than a little curtly.

He stared down at her, ignoring the mild buzzing that had started in the rear of the hall. ‘Your point being?’

‘That you are the chief defender of this kingdom. If you can justify sending Akshay and Indrajit, then you can send yourself as well.’

A long moment of stunned silence passed. The buzzing in the rear was replaced by a sense that most of the occupants of the hall were holding their breath.

‘You expect me, Ravana, lord of Lanka, to go and personally deal with a single intruder?’ he asked with deceptive mildness. She could see the rage dancing in his eyes, leaping from face to face too quickly to be noticed easily unless you knew where to look. And she knew exactly where to look, oh she knew all too well. ‘What next? When a dog comes to the city gates and urinates, will you expect me to go flick a stick at him too?’

She walked up the steps of the dais. Even when she stood at the top, on the same level as he, he was still a good two heads taller. Well, for that matter, he was a good ten heads taller! But she felt better, if only for having asserted her queenly prerogative. ‘I expect you not to put my sons into any situation into which you would not put yourself.’

He stared at her so long and so silently that she was certain that this time she had overstepped the invisible line that had always encircled her in their relationship. She expected a mantra to issue from one of his pairs of lips at any moment, blasting her into a charred skeleton, or a fist to swing out, smashing her dead with a single blow. Things had always been that fragile between them, only one utterance or a single blow away from the end. Yet she knew that if she did not assert herself, constantly test the limits, she would be diminished daily, ground down into the earth, until finally one day she would wake up to find that she had no more power than a hogtied joy-slave in a bidsem rakshasa’s cellar.

But his anger dissipated suddenly. His eyes, smouldering until now, turned opaque and moved away from her, looking over her shoulder at something in the sabha hall.

‘Of course,’ he said. ‘Any risk I would bid them undertake, I would be willing to undertake myself. They are my sons too, after all.’

She almost sighed with relief. She had won another battle, however minuscule. ‘Then we are agreed. You will not send Akshay Kumar and Indrajit to face this vanar.’

He laughed. ‘Perhaps you misheard me,’ he said, then glanced at the left of the dais where she knew Vibhisena was standing. ‘Or perhaps your sources of information are too slow. Our sons have already gone to face the vanar.’

‘What!’ she cried out despite herself. ‘But you just promised me—’

‘I promised you that I would not send them to do this if I was not willing to do it myself. And I stand by that. If they should fail, which I doubt very strongly, then you have my word. The next opponent I will send to face this vanar will be I, myself.’ He strode past her. ‘Now let us see how our sons fare in this unequal battle.’

She turned to see the thing he had been staring at over her shoulder. The water-screen. It depicted Hanuman facing a single chariot. Even in this diminished depiction, she could not fail to recognise the sigil and banner of her younger son, Akshay Kumar.

SIXTEEN

Hanuman knew that the opponent who came to face him now was someone of greater significance than all the others who had come before. He knew this because even before the distant rumble of the chariot came to his ears, the ground beneath his feet began to groan. Until now, the sun had traversed a course similar to the real sun in a real sky. It had been sometime in the late morning when he had entered this level of the tower, and by now it had moved perhaps an hour or so westwards. But now, even as the earth groaned underfoot, the sun began to visibly dim, its solar light dulled to a matty glow, like a lantern before which a mesh screen had been positioned. The wind which had been wafting gently until now, suddenly died down, leaving a stillness that was accentuated by the utter absence of insect or bird sound. Somewhere in the distant west, came the sound of an ocean swelling and crashing against a rocky shore. And the silhouetted mountain range along the northern horizon trembled and boomed, as if with great avalanches. Finally, the sky itself thrummed and boomed and clashed though no stormclouds were visible, nor any other visible cause.

He thought of asking the shapeshifter who his latest opponent was, then thought better of it. Would knowing change anything? He would still have to fight and slay, no matter who it was. Better then that he faced the challenger as just a warrior, and ignore the light-and-sound show as yet another boastful flaunting of rakshasa maya.

He flexed his muscles and without consciously debating the choice, began to expand himself. It seemed warranted. He swelled with strength and power, growing to only a few times his size. When he was perhaps the height of a mature oak tree, he stopped, spread his legs to anchor himself, and slapped the insides of his thighs to get the blood circulating, an old wrestling habit from his young days in the akhada. Something made him think of Sakra and his cheeka, and a small smile tweaked his mouth.

He was standing that way when the chariot came into view. It brought no dustcloud, which was yet another indication of the driver's importance. It was an impressive machine. Six wheeled, drawn by a team of seven horses, and ornamented in gold and platinum with massive fist-sized diamonds studded throughout its length. Even the slice spokes on the hubs of the wheels, designed to slice off limbs as the chariot passed through close-ranked legions, were made of gold alloy spokes tipped with razor-pointed diamonds. Not a mote of dust rose in the wake of its smoothly rolling wheels.

The rider himself was virtually concealed in the fortress-like well of the chariot. A suit of armour could hardly have protected him better, so artfully was the chariot designed. All Hanuman could see of his opponent was a small section of his face and a strip of his chest at a little below shoulder height—the space through which the charioteer would shoot his arrows.

The chariot paused when it was half a mile out. Hanuman waited. The stillness of the air made the artificiality of this world more obvious than ever; a peculiar odour, like camphor mingled with rusted iron tingled his nostrils, cutting through the charnel stench of the battlefield.

After a pause during which the sky continued to boom and echo, and the earth beneath his feet groaned like an unoiled hinge to the netherworld, the challenger made his first move.

Three arrows emerged in quick succession from the well of the chariot, arcing towards Hanuman's position. They were too far to reach him, as the archer must surely know, but he soon saw that it was not the warrior's intent to inflict damage upon his body, but to arouse his fear.

The first arrow plummeted sharply downwards, to strike the earth. The second flew up towards the sky, in a trajectory that should have been impossible. And the third sped straight on, as if aimed precisely at some unseen object midway between Hanuman and the charioteer.

As soon as the first arrow struck the ground, a great gnashing sound erupted from the earth, followed by a spume of dark fluid that rose a hundred yards high before falling back upon itself. At the same instant, the arrow that flew upward disappeared, and a clashing sound reverberated, followed by a release of the same dark fluid from a puncture in the fabric of the blue sky. The fluid spewing down from the hole in the sky met the top of the plume rising from the earth to form an uninterrupted line.

The third arrow, arcing directly towards Hanuman, stopped perhaps five hundred yards short, as if it had struck something in mid-air. A scream of anguish, like the wail of a cyclonic wind in a seaside storm, issued forth, and a great wind sprang up, blowing in every direction at once.

Hanuman pressed his feet down firmly and hunkered lower to keep his balance.

He was impressed by the demonstration of the charioteer's powers. The archer had displayed the extent of his prowess by firing arrows straight at the earth, the sky and the wind. All three had struck home, injuring their targets. It was no mean feat to be able to wound three of the elemental devas, Prithvi, Akasa and Vayu. Only someone gifted with divine astras could accomplish such a feat.

But he would have been more impressed had the demonstration not been conducted within Ravana's sorcerous tower. In this magical place, part tower, part palace and part multiple-worlds, anything was possible. For everything was controlled by the Pushpak. And the Pushpak obeyed Ravana's will. Despite the impressiveness of this display, neither Prithvi, Akasa nor Vayu had been involved. The archer's arrows had only struck the Pushpak's illusions. That was the essence of maya, the web of illusions that passed for reality in this world of rakshasas.

In a typical battle situation, where one famed opponent had displayed his own powers and challenged his adversary, the other warrior would usually respond with a display of his own strength and skill. This exchange of demonstrations and displays could continue for hours, with each party seeking to outstage the other through increasingly impossible feats. Finally, when they joined arms through mutual accedence, the fight itself was only a culmination of that long stand-off.

But this was not the real world, nor was this a typical battle situation. Hanuman had no intention of acknowledging his opponent's strength and skill. Indeed, he abhorred and despised such a vulgar display conducted gratuitously within the auspices of one's own controlled environment.

He roared with thunder and leaped forward. In two great leaps, he reached the spot where the third arrow had ostensibly struck the wind god, his own father. He wrenched the arrow out of mid-air and snapped it in two. The wailing wind died down immediately. Then he crouched down and leaped up high, miles high, to the spot where the second arrow seemed to have embedded itself in the navel of the sky god. He wrenched that arrow out too, crushing it like a toothpick into fragments. And as he fell to earth, he pounded the spot where the first arrow had struck the back of Prithvi Maa, Mother Earth.

Both the upward spume and the falling shower of dark fluid, ostensibly blood from the wounds of sky and earth, ceased to a trickle and died out.

Silence and stillness reigned again.

He turned and faced the chariot, now less than half a mile away. He could see the whites of the charioteer's eyes, watching through the slot in the well. There was respect in that gaze, and amazement too. He thought that perhaps the rakshasa ensconced in that diamantine chariot had never seen nor heard of a vanar of such capabilities before. The battlefield strewn with corpses was no doubt an added consideration. Well, he was about to give him another reason to goggle.

Supanakha munched on the haunch of a rakshasa as she watched the one-on-one fight. Hanuman probably didn't know or care whom he faced, but that chariot belonged to Ravana's younger son, Akshay Kumar. Now there was a rakshasa who defined the word handsome. She mulled on the encounters she had enjoyed with him. Akshay Kumar ranked high on her personal chart of sexual prowess.

She hoped his prowess on the battlefield matched his excellence in the boudoir.

The vanar was standing about half a mile from Akshay Kumar's chariot, staring at it. He seemed to be narrowing his eyes, concentrating his gaze. Was he trying to see through the slots in the chariot-well, to lock eyes with his opponent?

She continued watching, unable to see anything of any note happening.

Then, it began. At first, there was only a snicker from the lead horse, a magnificent stallion a whole head taller than the rest of the team. His snicker turned into a whinny as he turned his head this way, then that, as if trying to avoid a pesky gnat. That horse was much too well-trained for battle to act that way. There must be something much more serious than a gnat bothering him, but for the life of her she couldn't tell what it was.

Then she saw a spot brighten on the front of the chariot-well, bang in the centre where the prince of Lanka's sigil was embossed. The sigil seemed to be glowing. She thought at first it was only a reflection of the sun, which had begun to shine brightly again now, but the position of the chariot was wrong for it to be catching the sun's rays. Still, the sigil glowed, brighter and brighter, until it turned red-hot, then white-hot. The lead horse whinnied in a tone that suggested real alarm, not irritation, and now the alarm spread to its mates as well, who began to toss and turn their heads and stamp their hooves. One horse turned his head inwards, and for a moment, she saw the loose hair on its mane suddenly ignite, as if lit by a sun's ray passed through a dense glass. It cried out in panic, wanting to bolt, but the discipline drilled into it, and the stoic stubbornness of the lead horse stayed the team.

The sigil burst into flames.

Supanakha caught her breath. For once, even she was amazed.

What level of heat did it take to set solid metal on fire? She had no idea but thought it must be volcanic. How could such heat be striking Akshay Kumar's chariot? Where was it coming from?

Fool, she told herself, turning her eyes to the vanar. Where else do you think?

As she watched, Hanuman tilted his head very slightly, as if tracking something with his eyes. The fire on the chariot moved in a straight line, like a slash drawn by a magical sword, cutting across the front of the chariot-well. Inside the well, Akshay Kumar cried out in a startled tone, and through the slot, she saw him backing away hurriedly.

The vanar turned his head to one side, then slowly downwards, then the other way. She kept glancing from him to the chariot and back again, trying to make out what he was doing. Then, she understood. He was using some kind of heat power from his eyes to cut out the entire chariot-well.

In moments, the entire front of the chariot's armoured well fell in a heap of steaming, overheated metal to the ground. The terrified horses went wild as pieces of half-molten metal fell by their flanks and lay sizzling on the grassy field.

From an elaborately fortified riding machine, the chariot had been reduced to a ludicrous-looking open horse cart. Its owner, Akshay Kumar, stood exposed on the platform, reins clutched in his fists as he sought to regain control of his team. He was armoured lightly, as was his style, and she could clearly see his handsome face. He was staring white-eyed at the vanar, unable to believe what had just happened.

Then he rallied. With a yell to his horses, a rakshasa shloka popular for its efficacy in calming mounts, he regrouped their heads, then yanked on the rein to the leader. With a snort of relief, the horse whinnied a command to its fellows and the entire team moved forward, hooves pounding. The chariot rolled smoothly enough, undamaged in any other way, driving directly at the vanar.

Supanakha expected the vanar to simply use his heat-gaze to blast Akshay Kumar. If he could burn through metal like a welding flame, he could surely scorch the rakshasa to ashes easily. But Hanuman did no such thing. Instead, he simply stood and waited for Akshay Kumar to come to him.

Akshay Kumar had recovered his wits. The team set on their course, he took up his bow and began his onslaught without further ceremony or preamble. He shot a hail of arrows that might have been shot by an entire legion of archers. Hundreds of missiles of varied types, sickle-headed, barb-headed, snake-headed, flew towards Hanuman.

They fell upon the vanar as hail upon a mountain.

None pierced the vanar's skin. Just as no other weapon had pierced it apart from the dozen-odd arrows shot by Jambumali during the parley. But even so, Supanakha winced. Even if the vanar could harden his skin to resist penetration, those arrows must still hurt. From the impassive look on the vanar's face, you could hardly tell.

Akshay Kumar loosed a second onslaught. These sped directly at the vanar, twisting, turning, writhing, and sought to enter his upper orifices. They sped straight towards his nostrils, his ears, his eyes, seeking to enter through the natural channels. That was brilliant, she thought.

Hanuman only shook his head once, vigorously. The arrows struck his face and head and neck and fell off harmlessly, like a shower of pine needles.

There was no time for a third loosing. The chariot had reached the vanar's feet by now.

Bending down, Hanuman opened his fist, the size of an elephant's flank, and slapped the chariot's horse team.

The chariot, horses and all, was suddenly diverted from its headlong charge, to fly sideways, tumbling over and over, until it came to rest a hundred yards away. Akshay Kumar, ever nimble and quick on his feet, leaped from it the moment the vanar struck, and rolled, rising to his feet even before the chariot stopped tumbling. Every last one of the horses was dead, struck lifeless with the vanar's single blow. Akshay looked at them and turned his attention back to his opponent.

He drew his sword and charged towards Hanuman like a wild boar in the deep Southwoods. He didn't waste his breath on any war cry.

Hanuman didn't waste his breath either. Not bothering to roar or perform any of the preliminary shows of strength that he had used against the larger groups of foes, he raced forward to meet Akshay Kumar.

The difference in their sizes was so immense that to Supanakha they resembled a boar charging an elephant. Still, even a boar as skilful as Akshay Kumar with his sword could rip out the elephant's intestines with one well-aimed slash.

Akshay Kumar sprang through the air, leaping up to aim himself at the vanar's groin. Supanakha saw what he intended: he would launch himself at the vanar, and feint, twisting in one direction while slashing in the other.

And then they would know whether the vanar's groin and lower belly were as resistant to pointed blades as the rest of his body.

But Hanuman's hand flashed out, quicker than the rakshasa, quicker than his sword as well, and the next thing Supanakha saw was Akshay Kumar clutched by his feet, in Hanuman's fists. The vanar swung the rakshasa around in a circle, leaping to turn himself round. He swung and spun, leaped and turned, increasing speed until both he and his victim were but a blur, like a gigantic top spinning madly around on the field. Supanakha tried to count how many times he whirled around, but lost count at once. The vanar turned and turned, until she thought Akshay Kumar's brain must be addled and turned to mush from the speed and the motion alone. A hundred times? No, much more. Five hundred? Six? Closer to a thousand, she thought. And there was something significant about the number one thousand and eight, wasn't there? She had no way to know for certain, but that was as good a number as any to guess.

A thousand and eight times Hanuman swung Akshay Kumar around.

Supanakha expected him to release the rakshasa. She was looking forward to seeing how far Akshay Kumar flew. She guessed a yojana, but any multiple was possible.

Instead, Hanuman twisted the rakshasa's body over his shoulder the last time, and smashed it into the ground.

She felt the impact all the way up on the tree. The branch on which she sat shuddered, and lost a few dried leaves. The Pushpak had been imitating late autumn in this level.

The place where Akshay Kumar was smashed down looked like the chopping block of an abattoir. The ground was flattened in a roughly rakshasa-shaped pattern. But there the resemblance to any form or structure ended. So forcefully was the rakshasa smashed down that his sinews, muscles, entrails, eyes, bones, head, limbs, and his blood were all commingled into one formless heap.

SEVENTEEN

No sooner had Hanuman killed Akshay Kumar than he heard a sound from nearby. It came from the place where the bodies of the kumbha-rakshasas lay. He frowned but could not see anything clearly, so crowded with bodies and debris was that part of the field. He leaped up and over Akshay Kumar's fallen chariot, landing with a thump in the midst of the slaughtered kumbha bodies. Unlike in the real world, no flies or other flying or crawling insects had begun swarming over the corpses yet, nor were there any scavengers circling in the sky above. They lay much as they had when slain. He looked around, seeking the source of the sound.

He saw an arm move. A forearm, with the six fingers of a rakshasa hand at its end, wriggling fitfully.

It was buried beneath a pile of kumbha corpses and the torso of one of the misshapen-headed creatures that seemed as ubiquitous in Lanka as camels in the desert. He picked up the bodies and tossed them aside. Beneath the third one he found the source of the sound. It was a kumbha-rakshasa, still alive. From the looks of him, and the still-bleeding gash on his head, he had been knocked unconscious and then buried beneath a pile of his fellows. Hanuman looked closer, then saw that he was the kumbha who had spoken to him first, the leader who had called himself War Marshal Prahasta.

The kumbha retched, coughed violently, then opened his eyes, wiping them clear of blood with the back of his scaly hand. He stared up unseeingly at first, then focussed on Hanuman, and blanched.

Hanuman bunched his hand into a fist. A little tap on the head and the kumbha would be oatmeal like the rest of them. The kumbha, too weak and shaken to defend himself, closed his eyes, breathing fitfully.

After a moment, Hanuman lowered the fist, and allowed it to open. The kumbha sensed something and opened his eyes. Hanuman stretched out his hand, offering it to the kumbha. The rakshasa stared at it dumbly for a moment, and wheezed and turned over on his side, struggling to rise of his own accord. The effort was futile. His legs were trapped beneath the torso of his fallen mount, thrice his own weight. Hanuman let him thrash and twist futilely for a moment, then waited. Finally, the marshal turned back to look at him, purple eyes blazing with humiliation and fury, and reached up to take the vanar's hand. Hanuman closed his own oversized hand around the kumbha's like a father holding his child's hand, and yanked him bodily out of the pile.

The marshal groaned loudly, then sighed with surprise as he found himself upon his feet again. He seemed unharmed in any other way except for the gash on the head, which was not fatal. He glared at Hanuman.

Before either of them could say a word, the rumbling of a chariot came to their ears.

Hanuman strode away from the kumbha, turning his back upon the rakshasa uncaringly. Behind him, he heard the marshal gasp and exclaim in horror as he saw the carnage and slaughter that had occurred after he had fallen unconscious. The kumbha cried out as he recognised each fallen compatriot. 'Jambumali, my son! The five generals! And Akshay Kumar too!'

Hanuman ignored him and watched the approaching chariot. It was the complete antithesis of the one ridden by Akshay Kumar. No gaudy golden plates or fancy carvings. This chariot was jet black with a simple silver-embossed sigil on the front of its barely waist-high well. It was large enough to accommodate only a single rider, built for speed and manoeuvrability rather than to pound foot soldiers into the ground. It was drawn by a team of four splendid white horses who moved with a gait that was poetry to behold. A warrior's chariot, not a poseur's.

The charioteer proved himself as undesiring of artifice as his vehicle. He wasted no time on demonstrations or protocol. He was armed with a bow, Hanuman saw, and the moment he came within arrowshot, he slowed his chariot and aimed a single arrow at Hanuman. As he put the arrow to the bow, he whispered a mantra to the tip, then took careful aim. The air shimmered, the world shook, and a great rumbling erupted from deep within the ground. Hanuman frowned. He was inured to rakshasa sorcery by now; but something about the very simplicity and directness of this rakshasa's method rang true.

'Vanar,' the charioteer called in a clear but grating rakshasa voice. 'I will fire but one missile at you. But one is sufficient to accomplish that which a thousand have failed to do before it. This arrow I have strung to my bow is empowered with a mantra you must surely have heard tell of. It is the famed dev-astra of Lord Brahma. The same which your master Rama unleashed upon my father's armies at Mithila fourteen years ago. If you believe yourself capable of withstanding its celestial power, then face it by all means. But if you will, I have orders from my father to take you as my captive and bring you before him. Tell me, what is your will?'

Hanuman sensed that this warrior spoke the truth. Of all the rakshasas who had faced him thus far, he felt that this one was the mightiest. If he was indeed wielding the famed brahmastra, then there was only one response to his query. But he still had one doubt. 'The brahm-astra once spoken and unleashed, cannot be recalled. If you have uttered the sacred mantra already, then why do you tarry? Unleash it and let what will be, be.'

The rakshasa answered in a steady voice, without anger or impatience. 'I have spoken only one part of the mantra. The rest remains to be uttered. So tell me quickly, shall I unleash Brahma's weapon or will you yield gracefully?'

Hanuman did not have to think very long. With a great sigh of relief, he let his hands fall by his sides, and allowed his specially enhanced strength to leave his body. At once, his size diminished and he became his normal vanar size once more. He held out his hands in the attitude of a supplicant, offering them to be bound.

'I will not resist the weapon of Brahma. It has been ordained that I should be overcome by His celestial power, and His alone. Therefore, I am prepared to endure submission to your superior might. Take me as your captive. But first tell me only one thing, rakshasa. What is your name and calling? For no ordinary Kshatriya is usually given the right to wield the greatest weapon of all. Who are you and what is your claim to fame?'

The rakshasa leaped from his chariot, putting his bow and the arrow back in his rig. He approached Hanuman with a grim expression on his face. 'I am known as Indrajit,' he said shortly. 'He Who Defeated Lord Indra in combat. That is one of my many claims to fame. I have overcome many devas by my prowess on the battlefield and in single combat, both unarmed as well as armed with a variety of weapons. Several of those devas have then been compelled to serve in my household as servants to me and my father and brother, for the victories belonged to all three of us jointly.' He paused, then added as an afterthought. 'I am also sometimes known as the eldest son of Ravana.'

Hanuman nodded. 'I had no doubt that you were someone highly placed. The crown prince of Lanka no less. It is not dishonourable for a warrior to place himself in the custody of another warrior who has a superior reputation and wields a weapon so great.'

Indrajit looked at him with lowered brow, his lashes almost concealing his dark eyes. The rakshasa was not handsome, like his younger brother, but there was a powerful menace in his aspect that recalled his father's terrifying visage. 'You are arrogant, vanar. That will be your downfall. Just because you are empowered with your father's gifts does not make you a great warrior. You have a long way to go and much, much more experience to gather before you become worthy of facing a Kshatriya of my stature. Although, under the present circumstances, I doubt you will have the opportunity to gain that experience.'

Hanuman shrugged. 'I could take offence at your words, but I shall not. You speak mostly the truth. I am not arrogant, Prince Indrajit. Yes, I am complacent in my powers, but it is my faith in my lord Rama that gives me this complacency and supreme confidence. I possessed my father's gifts for all my life but they were worthless to me until Rama put his faith and trust in me and awakened my hidden shakti. As for experience, no doubt I will gain much much more, just as you say. And I look forward to facing Kshatriyas not only of your stature, but even greater than yourself! For what good is experience without ambition?'

Indrajit's heavy brow lowered further, until his eyes were visible only as slits through two smouldering black-red coals. 'My orders were to take you captive, vanar, not kill you. And I always follow the orders of my superior. But you would be wise not to test my resolve. Especially when the body of my brother lies only yards away.'

Hanuman stared back at him levelly, neither challenging him nor submitting. He made it clear that he was submitting himself of his own accord, not out of fear or compromise.

Indrajit stared back, the embers of his eyes glowering more fiercely the longer he stared.

War Marshal Prahasta coughed loudly, breaking the standoff. 'My lord prince, it would be best if we move quickly.' He did not need to add anything more; the implication was obvious: Before one of you loses control.

Indrajit stepped back, keeping his eyes still on the vanar. He did not waste time asking Prahasta how he had survived. He was a soldier, accustomed only to taking orders and giving orders. 'Tie his hands,' he said curtly.

Prahasta started to protest, then stopped. Without another word, he found a bloodied sash that had belonged to a kumbha and used it to bind Hanuman's hands. The vanar gave him no trouble, but Prahasta finished the job without once looking at the vanar's face, and when he was done, he moved backward stiffly but not slowly.

Indrajit stepped forward, raised his chainmailed fist and smashed it into Hanuman's face. 'Now we shall show you how we treat intruders in our kingdom.'

Hanuman felt a trickle of blood escape the cut on his lip inflicted by the rakshasa's horned sixth finger but remained standing as he was. He said calmly to Indrajit, 'Will you take me to Ravana now?'

Indrajit turned to look at him with smouldering eyes. 'Aye, that I will. Those are my orders.'

He looked around and saw a mace lying beside the body of a slain general. He picked it up, hefting it easily. He was magnificently muscled, with evident power and familiarity with warfare. He raised the mace and swung it hard, striking Hanuman across the abdomen. This time, Hanuman could not help but bend over from the pain and impact of the blow. His stomach felt as if it had been pressed against his spine.

'But first,' Indrajit said, raising the mace again, 'I have a few lessons to teach you about pain and endurance.'

He brought the mace down again on Hanuman's body. And again. And again.

Supanakha sighed with disappointment as Indrajit continued to batter and pound Hanuman with the studied efficiency of one who had done the same thing hundreds of times before in his life and knew just how to inflict the maximum pain. Not because she cared about the vanar. But because she had enjoyed the battles. She always felt let down when the fighting ended. Despite all the victory marches of history and the grandiloquent claims of supremacy, the truth was that nobody ever really won a war or any conflict. It was only the bloody brutality of war itself that mattered in the end; the song of blood and pain. And that was what she loved most, the song.

She watched for a while longer. Indrajit was thorough in the beating he administered, as he was in everything he did, be it drinking, eating, statecraft, warmongering, or fornication. He was not as inventive or innovative a lover as Akshay Kumar had been; which reminded her, she would miss Akshay. Oh well, once this was over, and the palace of pleasures had been rebuilt, she would surely find some new lover to help her get over the ‘grief’ of her ‘loss’. More likely, she would find several hundred new lovers!

She slipped down the tree and called up a portal. This part of the show was over. It was time to go backstage and see what the dramatist had in store for the next act.

Mandodhari was beside herself. Yet she knew better than to unleash her grief before a hall full of Lanka’s top military and ministerial rakshasas. If she gave in to the black darkness that threatened to overwhelm her now, she would be branded a weakling and a ‘civilian’, the worst epithets any rakshasa could be given. For the rakshasa race, war was the natural way of life. Peace was abhorrent, undesirable. Even the pacifists, of whom there were a small but steadily growing number these days, tempered their talk with phrases like ‘preventive action’ and ‘positive force’. But the truth was her son was dead, and nothing would bring him back.

She uncovered her face and forced herself to sit up straighter. She had slumped back into her seat the instant Akshay was killed, and after witnessing his gruesome end, she didn't have the heart to raise her eyes to that water-screen again. Her mind must have blanked out for several moments, because when she roused herself from her inward-looking reverie, the image showed the vanar bound and lying on the floor of a chariot at the feet of the charioteer, Indrajit. Her eldest son was driving his team fast but not too fast, with his customary efficiency. War Marshal Prahasta was standing on the running board of the chariot, clinging on with a fierceness that suggested it had been a very long time since Lanka's chief warlord had travelled in such discomfort. She cared a hang for the marshal's comfort. He had survived while her son had perished. Damn him. Damn all these warmongers. What did they ever achieve except death and destruction? What use were all their marble monuments and statues and speeches and medals in the face of the grieving mothers of the slain, or the orphaned children, or the desolate wives?

She fought back tears as Indrajit passed through a portal and rode towards two enormous wooden doors lined with gold. She recognised them belatedly as the doors to this very sabha hall, just as they crashed open across the chamber, and the chariot entered, the horses neighing and shying as Indrajit rode them without a pause through the crowded room. Several of Lanka's seniormost military commanders and chief dignitaries were forced to make undignified leaps and jumps to escape being run over by the chariot but Indrajit drove all the way to the foot of the royal dais without any mishap. Marshal Prahasta stepped off the running board with a great sigh, all but collapsing on the spot.

Indrajit picked up the vanar, now bound and tied hand and foot with a variety of sashes, belts and even the partly severed chain of a chain-mace. He carried the being that had been the cause of so much devastation—and the death of her youngest son—up the steps of the dais and deposited him roughly at the feet of the blackwood throne.

‘As ordered, my lord, I bring you the vanar, bound and tied and incapable of further violence.’

Ravana remained seated on his throne. The king of Lanka seemed to be in a reverie of his own, Mandodhari saw. For once, his heads were neither babbling nor arguing. In fact, every last one of them seemed present in their consciousness, focussed on the here and now. The water-screen had been dismissed a moment earlier, before Indrajit's chariot reached the dais, and the bowl removed. But now he sat stone still, gazing at the vanar at his feet with ten expressionless faces.

EIGHTEEN

Vibhisena felt outraged at the sight of Hanuman. The vanar had been badly beaten by Indrajit. He had watched the water screen with chagrin as the beating was administered and even the reduced size and distance had not diminished the brutality of the beating. Even now, Indrajit yanked the chain with his fist, tightening the noose-like coils around the poor fellow's throat as if he would hang the beast here and now. And still the vanar managed to make not a sound of protest, but stood ramrod straight, in the same stoic silence he had maintained throughout the beating. His face, already coated thickly with the blood and ichor of the many opponents he had slain, was now wet with his own freely running blood as well. The ends of the many arrows he had taken during the parley with Jambumali—which, Vibhisena felt strongly, had been rudely violated by the vicemarshal—still protruded from various parts of his body. Indrajit, in his typical meticulous way, had pointedly aimed the mace at those places, snapping off the heads of some arrows, and driving some further into the vanar's flesh and organs. Vibhisena longed to protest and lament such abominable behaviour; even an enemy deserved to be treated with dignity once he surrendered with grace. But he knew the futility of attempting such a protest. After the massacre the vanar had perpetrated, every rakshasa in Lanka lusted for only one thing: his execution. If I were king, he thought with cold rage, then stopped himself ... He was not king. And likely would never be.

He watched as Hanuman gazed up at the rakshasa who was king with a curious expression on his vanar features. There seemed to be no rancour or malice in that gaze. Indeed, the vanar seemed almost to be ... admiring? Or something close to admiring Ravana.

He wondered what thoughts were passing through that simian-like head right now. With the power he had seen displayed in the battles, the vanar could undoubtedly give even Ravana a good fight. Yet he had submitted so meekly, so graciously. Why? Because he wished to be brought here before Ravana? That was what he had said, over and over again, but of course nobody had paid him any heed, until the body count was sufficiently high to earn him grudging attention. And now that he was here? Would he only talk and entreat Ravana? Or ...

Vibhisena leaned forward, holding his silence until he could learn what the vanar intended to do next.

Hanuman gazed up at the king of Lanka in adoration. He was not ashamed of what he felt. The lord of rakshasas was worthy of such an adoration. Ravana sat upon his great throne like a king of kings. His jewels were dazzling, his armour unmatched, his body had been anointed with rare red sandalpaste, his golden pearl-studded crown sat upon his central head like a ring of solar fire. His rack of ten heads upon his immense neck were awe-inspiring, any one could have been the face of a great king; together, they presented an aspect that was unmatched by any ten kings. He blazed with his own splendour, serene and certain in his own power. The shakti in his spirit was palpable, illuminating him like a great shroud that pulsed with different hues of throbbing light.

How magnificent he is, Hanuman thought. What beauty, what grace and dignity. To his eyes, Ravana seemed to have all the qualities of a great king. It was possible to understand now, gazing at the rakshasa king in person, how this single being had acquired the stature of such a great legend, a mythology unto himself. For the first time it occurred to Hanuman that had Ravana not been unrighteous and violated dharma so relentlessly, he may well have been made protector of the three worlds by the devas themselves. Lord Indra himself would respect such a warrior, and gladly grant him all the wealth and power he desired, for no other ruler could command as much respect and adoration as Ravana.

His beauty is beyond reckoning, Hanuman thought. He is the most beautiful being created since the beginning of time. Even the terrible things he has done, the heinous crimes he is capable of, only add to his beauty. Is not the tiger that slays without forethought or hesitation beautiful in the dark, dappled, mangrove forests? Is not the great bull elephant, trampler of serpents and ravisher of any cow elephant that catches his fancy undeniably beautiful in his lustful rage? Is not the serpent himself, with his diamond-patterned scales and wedge-shaped head, and terrible, hypnotic eyes, those fangs dripping deadly venom, capable of bringing death with a single strike, beautiful? Is not the pale floating predator that glides through the valleys of the undersea world, his jaws opening and closing endlessly, killing and consuming without measure like a primordial killing machine, perfect in his elegant simplicity, beautiful?

He is beautiful. If only he was righteous. If only he was a faithful adherent of dharma. If only he was respectful of the sanctity of all life and a seeker of peace and knowledge. If only he was not an abductor of other men's wives and slayer of innocent souls.

But then, he thought to himself, if he was not all these things, if he had not done what he had done, had not the nature that he did possess, then he would not be Ravana at all. Then he would be ... Rama. Or something close to Rama. A virtuous warrior beyond compare.

And in that moment of insight, he came upon a realisation that was beyond thought or knowledge. It was pure wisdom itself. The ultimate goal of all study and worship. A fragment of pure Brahman. If he could but verbalise it, he would know truly what Ravana was, and why a being so beautiful was capable of such ugly acts. And knowing that, he would know the deepest secret of the rakshasa king, the one thing that nobody else had ever found out about Ravana. The secret of his true strength.

And the secret of his true weakness.

The hall was growing impatient and agitated. Prahasta could not understand why Ravana was not speaking or doing anything. The king just sat there, staring blankly at the vanar. And the vanar stood there and gazed back at the lord of Lanka with a look of, well, he did not know what that look meant. But it was not hatred. That much he was sure of.

It was almost as if both Ravana and Hanuman were locked in some mental bond, examining each other like two great sages who had progressed past the point of words and spoken language and communicated through pure thought alone.

He stepped forward, clearing his throat and speaking in a cautious voice.

‘My lord, with your permission, may we question the vanar about his actions?’

‘Yes,’ a voice shouted from behind Prahasta. ‘He has much to answer for.’

‘He deserves to be tortured and broken into pieces,’ shouted another voice.

‘He should be executed at once, right here and now.’

‘No. He should be eaten alive, a piece at a time, every day, so he suffers for the longest time possible.’

‘He should be—’

‘We must—’

‘Let us—’

‘Make him—’

The chorus of angry shouts grew louder, clamouring for inventive and progressively more horrible punishments to be inflicted upon the vanar, all eventually ending in his death. Prahasta turned to face the hall and tried to restore order by calling out in a commanding voice. But everyone was seeking to be heard by Ravana, using the opportunity to show their fealty and initiative. Many of them, he thought bitterly, felt guilty that they had not had the opportunity to fight the vanar and die as so many others had. As his son had.

‘Enough.’ Ravana’s single word sliced through the cacophony like a volcanic-glass blade through coarse cloth. Silence fell on the hall. Prahasta saw his king raise a head or three to scan the assembly. One pair of eyes found him, bored into him, then was joined by two more pairs. Ravana pointed a single finger at him. ‘War Marshal, proceed.’

Prahasta thought that was an abrupt command even by Ravana’s curt standards. But he wasn’t about to argue. Every warlord and minister in the chamber was looking for an opportunity to turn this situation to his or her own advantage, or at the very least, to show solidarity and competence. There were at least half a dozen high ranks to be filled, and if Ravana's previous attitude to failure was any basis to judge by, then more heads could roll before the night turned. He bowed and spoke swiftly, 'Your Majesty, it would be my privilege. As a firsthand witness to the damage caused by this intruder, and as one who faced him and lived to tell the tale, I am entitled to interrogate him personally.'

He paused, aware that every rakshasa eye in the room was glaring jealously at him now. 'However, in view of the fact that the situation is one that concerns the entire nation, I shall conduct my inquiry right here and now, before the entire body of governance. With your leave, of course,' he added quickly.

Ravana gestured impatiently. The king was still staring at the vanar whose gaze seemed riveted to Ravana. Prahasta went up to Indrajit and held out his hand for the end of the chain by which the prince held the prisoner. Indrajit looked at him darkly but handed over the chain. He went and took his seat on the dais, watched by his mother whose eyes shone wetly.

Prahasta rattled the chain to attract the vanar's attention. Hanuman seemed barely aware of him, and only by yanking the chain hard enough to choke off breath could the marshal get the prisoner to even glance at him once.

'Speak. Identify yourself. Who are you and why did you come to our land?'

Hanuman looked at him unseeingly. Slowly, in stages, the vanar seemed to return to his senses like a person returning from a deep trance. He sighed, releasing a long-held breath, then spoke. Utter silence prevailed as every rakshasa in the hall hung on to his every word.

'If you would know the answers to these questions, then you must grant me leave to tell the whole answer. I have heard some things spoken about my lord Rama that are patently untrue. It saddened my heart to hear such lies and slander about a man so pure of heart and deed. If you will hear the truth about Rama, I will speak gladly. If not, then do with me as you will.'

Prahasta regarded the vanar. 'First answer the questions I have put to you.'

‘I am Hanuman, a vanar. Son of the wind god Marut and Anjana, who was once an apsara in Indra’s court before she was cursed to spend a lifetime as a vanar. I leaped a distance of a hundred yojanas or more to fly across the ocean here to Lanka.’

Prahasta held up his hand to still the commotion that erupted in the wake of this extraordinary revelation. ‘Are you an emissary of the mortal named Rama?’

‘I am his servant.’

‘So you represent his will here?’

‘It is at Rama’s behest that I come here to Lanka.’

‘Very well. What is it you wish to tell us about your master?’

‘The truth.’

Prahasta read the rumbling of discontent in the hall and interpreted it carefully. He injected the appropriate amount of scorn into his voice as he said, ‘Why should we listen to you? You have slain a great many of our warriors and wreaked great destruction in our land. You are now an enemy of the kingdom. Why should we sit here listening rather than put an end to your life at once?’

Hanuman considered the question for a moment. ‘Every warrior is prepared to die. But to die for a purpose is far more honourable than simply to die unknowingly. If you would know the reason why I slew your rakshasas, then listen to my words. If you do not desire to know, then do with me as you will. I have already surrendered my life to you.’

Prahasta glanced quickly around the chamber. There was grudging silence now and even the glowering stares held a tinge of curiosity. ‘Very well, vanar. As you are an emissary of the arch enemy of Lanka, and since we rakshasas honour the rules of war, we will hear your words. Make them brief and quick though. And bear in mind that no insult to any Lankan will be brooked here. Speak one ill word against any of us, and you will speak no more.’

Hanuman nodded once. ‘It is gracious of you to hear me out. I begin then, taking the name of my lord Rama.’

And he began to tell, in as brief a manner as he could, the story of Rama, sketching out the bare facts of his life. Prahasta was surprised to find himself listening with greater interest than he could have expected. From the relative silence in the hall, the same applied to the rest.

When he spoke of Ravana, every rakshasa in the hall listened intently. Even Prahasta was ready to respond should the vanar speak a single syllable of abuse. He knew that his own reputation, and likely his life, might rest on any such utterance. But he had permitted the vanar to speak and he must allow the prisoner a fair opportunity now.

To his amazement, Hanuman began praising Ravana. He lavished compliment after compliment upon the lord of Lanka, extolling him in such elaborate detail that Prahasta had to remind himself that this was the same being that had killed Ravana’s son only a little while earlier. And what was even more amazing, Hanuman seemed to mean every word he spoke. The vanar genuinely felt strongly that the king of rakshasas was an honourable and noble being at heart, that except for a wilful choice to pursue certain courses of action—‘paths of karma’ Hanuman termed them—for as-yet-inscrutable reasons that ‘he alone knows’, the lord of Lanka was a great personage deserving to be recorded as one of history’s greatest monarchs. This unexpected extolling drew drawn breaths and startled grunts and stares from around the hall. Even Mandodhari and Indrajit seemed to be puzzled and confused by it. Only Ravana remained as he was, staring impassively and silently with all his ten faces at the vanar, his expressions inscrutable.

Finally, Hanuman drew a long breath and added: ‘All that you need to know, you know. All that remains now is for your king to release the lady Sita and allow her to return home to her husband Rama. You may view this as a warning if you will or as a gentle offering of friendly advice. Release Sita, and you may yet be spared the coming devastation. Ignore this message, and not a single one of you will live to see the end of this long night of death.’

There was a long drawn-out pause, largely because of the vanar's shocking praises of Ravana. Prahasta himself had to take several moments to consider how best to proceed next. On one hand, the vanar had committed unspeakable outrages against the kingdom—for pity's sake, he had killed his own son, Jambumali, in the prime of his life. A veteran soldier who lived by the code of warfare, Prahasta could not possibly see the creature as anything other than an enemy, and as an enemy, he deserved the harshest penalty available. But on the other hand, so effusive had been his outpouring of praise for Ravana, so well-balanced his tale of Rama and the conflicts between the two over the years, so reasonable and empathetic his narration, that it had raised doubts that Prahasta never thought he could feel. The vanar had professed to speak the truth. And if that was the truth, then Rama was not the villainous, unrighteous dastard that they had all taken him to be, nor was their own lord Ravana the villain of the piece too. In fact, to hear Hanuman tell the tale, there was no clear black and white here. Only greys, with both Rama and Ravana painted in alluring and admirable shades ranging from pristine ivory to soft shadowy damask. Prahasta was finally facing the one choice no soldier should ever have to face: a genuine moral dilemma. And like all trained soldiers, he was incapable of solving the dilemma. For a soldier's only purpose is to follow orders. And in dharma, in morality, in the realm of spiritual truth, there are no orders or directions. Only guidelines and multiple choices, each one right in its own way, none wholly incorrect or 'wrong'.

At a loss, he turned finally to the throne. 'My lord, you have heard the testimony of the emissary. What is your will now?'

Ravana spoke at once, without hesitation or any flicker of doubt. 'Put him to death at once.'

NINETEEN

After a moment of confused silence, during which everyone looked at each other to see how the other was responding, a ragged chorus of 'Ayes' broke out, followed soon after by a ragged but rousing roar of approval. Execution was always popular in Lanka.

Vibhisena sprang to his feet. ‘My lord Ravana, on what grounds do you demand the execution of the vanar? It is neither moral nor sanctioned by the rules of war. The moral aspect is open to all of us to judge. And Marshal Prahasta will testify to the veracity of the Kshatriya code that would never permit such a thing.’

But Marshal Prahasta was listening to the roars of the assembly and the silence of his king rather than the voice of his own conscience, and he kept silent, his eyes averted. Vibhisena strode up to the marshal, forcing him to meet his eyes. ‘Prahasta, you are an honourable warrior. Speak! Is it right that we execute an emissary sent to us by another king? Is it not a violation of the rules of warfare?’

Prahasta glanced around nervously, but found the gumption to speak. ‘That is so, Minister, but there are extenuating circumstances here ...’

‘If you mean the destruction and violence wrought by the vanar, then yes, I accept that,’ Vibhisena said. ‘Punish him for those acts. Disfigure him. Scourge him. Shave his head and brand him and parade him through the streets! But you cannot take his life!’

Someone shouted angrily, ‘What if we had killed him on the field, as he killed our rakshasas? Would not that have been acceptable under the rules of warfare, brother Vibhisena?’

‘Yes,’ Vibhisena agreed. ‘That was acceptable. But that is not what we are discussing here. The vanar surrendered gracefully, and put himself in our hands, so he could deliver his missive from Rama. In fact, he made it clear from the very outset that he had no wish to fight, but none would heed his entreaties and bring him here to be heard. So he fought on as any warrior would.’

‘Then he must be treated as a warrior, not an emissary,’ said another objector.

‘Aye,’ echoed several others.

Vibhisena turned to Ravana. ‘My lord, you have heard the vanar praise your character and your true nature. You yourself know that you are famed throughout the asura races for your wisdom and kingship. Do not let this travesty of justice be implemented. Do what is just and fair.'

Indrajit sprang to his feet. 'My father is doing just that,' he said. 'He is implementing a wise and just decision. If you respect his kingship, then do not presume to question his verdict. Let the vanar be put to death.'

A chorus of resounding approval seconded his words.

Vibhisena continued to appeal to Ravana directly, ignoring everyone else. 'My lord, my king ...' he added forcefully, 'my brother. I feel the pain of Akshay Kumar's death too. He was my nephew as well. I have watched him grow and play and learn. I share my sister's grief at his loss. But he was a warrior. And he died a warrior's death. He will be honoured and commemorated forever. His name will come to be taken by any hero who seeks to prove that he is the epitome of beauty, grace and martial skill. But you are not only a father. You are a king first and foremost, and as a king, it is your moral duty to put righteousness before your personal ends. If you desire revenge, then go seek the persons who sent this emissary here. Fight Rama! Kill Rama if you will. Or better yet, send out emissaries of your own, tell them to go to Rama's camp and wage a battle with his forces. But if you do this, if you kill this emissary after he has surrendered peaceably and trusted your fairness and morality, then you will be casting a slur on your name that will never be erased. You have heard how highly this vanar thinks of you, how effusive his praises. He considers you a paragon of dharma, as virtuous a personage as his own master, whom he compares to a deva. That is akin to calling you a deva too! How can you repay such veneration with vengeance? I pray to you, reconsider your judgement. Inflict any pain or penalty upon this vanar for the violence he has done, but do not put him to death and spoil your own good name.'

The court exploded in a flurry of outrage, some rakshasas spewing ichor and venom and others yelling at a hundred different pitches until the din was deafening.

Ravana raised a finger.

Silence fell as suddenly as a dropped stone.

‘I have listened to your arguments, Vibhisena. And for once, I agree with you. The vanar’s actions are deserving of punishment. But because he is an emissary and because he willingly submitted himself and allowed himself to be bound and brought here, it would be morally reprehensible to execute him. He will not be killed. Instead, we will punish him in another way, appropriate to his actions.’

The silence continued, but its quality altered to one of stunned shock. Nobody could believe what they were hearing, least of all Vibhisena himself.

He found his voice at last. ‘You are great and merciful, my lord Ravana. You will be eternally praised for your wisdom shown at this juncture of history. Your name will be recorded and remembered for all posterity as a king who upheld dharma and the laws of warcraft.’

He turned to Hanuman, beaming happily at the vanar. ‘Messenger of Rama, remember this day well. For it is the day your life was spared by a righteous king.’

Hanuman dipped his head. ‘I did not doubt it.’ He looked up at Ravana.

Indrajit stared from the vanar to Vibhisena, then at his father. The look of disbelief on his features was priceless. The prince was a fighting man, better suited to the battlefield than the parlour—or the sabha hall. He seemed not to know how to deal with this turnaround. He turned to look at his mother. Vibhisena saw his lips tremble.

Mandodhari rose and came to her son’s aid. ‘My king,’ she said in a tone that could have passed for either arctic coldness or volcanic rage. ‘If this is your judgement, then permit me to inquire, what is the punishment you desire to be implemented on the vanar, appropriate to his actions?’

She did not have to spell out the reason why she had emphasised that last phrase. Vibhisena could see the hurt in her heart, the pain of a mother who had seen her youngest, and in many ways her best, son slaughtered like any common foot-soldier in a minute’s work by the vanar. He felt a moment’s guilt at his arguments, the more so because he had won so unexpectedly, but he stayed his course, firmly resolved that he had done the right thing. This reversal of verdict, however painful it might be to his sister personally, was one small reparation for all the wrongs that had been done to Rama and his family by Ravana and his minions.

Ravana turned his rack of heads to Mandodhari. He still remained aloof, detached from the passion and fury of the arguments that had been raised. Vibhisena did not understand it, especially since Ravana was usually the most passionate of personalities. But a part of him felt glad of it. Perhaps the vanar was right after all. He had perceived a side of his brother that even he, Vibhisena, the eternal optimist and positivist, had all but forgotten existed. Perhaps Ravana was balancing his karma after all.

‘Vibhisena said earlier that the code of warfare dictates that an emissary who commits bodily harm or violence upon the people to whom he brings his missive, can be treated harshly. He can be beaten, whipped, injured, interrogated, shaven and branded, and humiliated. The vanar has already been soundly beaten by Indrajit. And as any of you who have ever faced my son in combat must know, a beating at Indrajit’s hands is less preferable than death at the hands of most other warriors.’ One of his heads smiled a very small smile as it looked at Indrajit. ‘He does not know when to stop.’

‘Is that all?’ Mandodhari asked incredulously. ‘He has been beaten and that is punishment enough?’

The smiling head lost its smile. Ravana looked at Hanuman. ‘Vanar. What is the part of your body that is most precious to you?’

Hanuman bowed his head, thinking. Vibhisena was flooded with a rush of warmth at the vanar’s sincerity. He will answer truthfully, he thought, even though the information he provides may lead to a terrible result.

‘A vanar’s tail is the most prized part of his body,’ Hanuman replied. ‘Some vanars even believe it is the repository of all their strength and virility. At the very least, a tail is a symbol of pride and beauty, and a means of gauging stature among my kind.’

Ravana received this information without any change in expression. ‘And what is the weapon that you fear the most?’

Hanuman sighed. ‘We vanars do not like to admit to our links to the monkey races, but the truth is that we are more closely linked to them than to any other race or species. And like all monkeykind, we mortally dread fire. Even today, we will prefer to eat our food uncooked than go near a flame. I have overcome that innate fear to a large extent, thanks to my self-mastery. But deep within me, it resides still. I have an abiding fear of it and I believe that whenever I die, my destruction will be brought about by the weapon of Agni, Lord of Flame.’

Ravana seemed pleased with the answer.

‘In that case,’ he said, ‘we shall set your tail on fire and burn it off. And when it is scorched to a stub, you will be sent back to your master. Let your friends and family and comrades see you with your burned stub of a tail, pathetic and miserable. It will also mark you out on the field of battle so that one of us may seek you out easily and take revenge for the slaying of our fallen mates.’

Vibhisena stared up at Ravana. For the second time in the short span of a few moments, his brother had performed a remarkable thing. He had given a perfect judgement. Not only was his chosen penalty truly fitting and sanctioned by the terms of the warrior’s code, it was shrewd as well. Among the rakshasa races, maiming or crippling was considered more humiliating than death. There were virtually no crippled rakshasas in Lanka, because none who suffered such injuries in war or accident could bear to go on living afterwards. And even those few who dared to outrage the mores of their culture by continuing to live—a right which Vibhisena and his Brahmin comrades defended vigorously against all odds—those unfortunate cripples often met sudden ends, mostly at the hands of their own family members. By ordering that the vanar’s most prized limb should be destroyed, Ravana would not only fulfil the demands of dharma and just kingship, he would earn the respect of all rakshasas.

The cheers of acceptance and approval that greeted the decision confirmed Vibhisena’s assessment.

But there was one thing that tainted the beauty of Ravana’s judgement.

Fire rarely restricted itself to one place. Even though the royal edict called for only the vanar’s tail to be set on flame, how would they ensure that the vanar himself was not wholly consumed by the fire, or at the very least, injured in other parts of his body as well. Vibhisena looked at the vanar, covered with a liberal coating of furry hair all over, right to the tip of his long bushy tail, and thought that Ravana might well have outsmarted them all.

Sita was ready when they came for her. She had said her final prayers and prepared her mind and spirit for the end. She had not doubted that it would come soon. After the fracas at the Ashoka grove and the escape of the vanar, she had been escorted quickly but non-violently to a new place. It was a cold, stark place, for all that it was made of marble and lined with great white pillars and the ceiling was so endlessly high that she could actually see clouds—real clouds—drifting high above. There was no relief, no greenery around or soil beneath her feet, even though she knew everything here was only artificial, and even the pillars held nothing up. It was a museum without any displays, a prison that entrapped because it was as vast and empty as a desert, with nowhere to run to.

Even the guards who had ordered her to accompany them through the magic portal that led here kept their distance, standing in a great wide circle several hundred yards away, their backs turned to her, spears and swords held ready, as if they expected an army of vanars to attempt to rescue her at any minute. She walked the cold marble floor endlessly, then sat and prayed to calm her soul. She did not know what had happened to Hanuman. Had he left Lanka as yet? Had he been captured, killed, wounded, imprisoned? A variety of alternatives passed through her mind as the hours passed. She received no information, nobody spoke to her. Even the guards who brought her food and drink at regular intervals, neither of which she touched, simply put the vessels down on the marble floor and went back through the portal, which winked shut at once.

The portal opened now, letting in light of a different hue from the white, colourless, mindless illumination of this hellish place. But instead of the guards she had been expecting to lead her to her promised execution, Ravana himself stepped through. He was alone.

The portal shut behind him and he came forward, stopping several yards away.

‘Have you considered my offer?’

She rose to her feet. She wished to look up to him as little as possible. Even so, she still had to raise her gaze by over a yard above her normal line of sight. ‘It was not an offer worthy of consideration.’

He was silent a moment. ‘I expected you to be wiser than this.’

‘I am as you find me, neither more nor less. Perhaps you expected me to be something that I am not.’

‘I expected you to be considerate of the life of your unborn child.’

She clenched her jaw to keep from shouting. It galled her that he even knew of the life she bore in her womb. How dare he speak of it with such feigned gentleness. As if he cared what happened to her or her offspring? ‘Our child,’ she said levelly, ‘is Rama’s and my responsibility, not your concern.’

‘But it is my concern. For you are condemned to be executed. And if you are executed, then your unborn child will die as well. But that need not come to pass.’

She permitted herself a bitter smile. ‘I was not the one who condemned us to death. If I recall correctly, you were the one who had a hand in that verdict.’

‘It was my people’s choice. They were baying for the blood of the vanar too. After the havoc he wreaked in my palace, they wished him to be executed summarily as well. But my better judgement prevailed over the mob mentality. I said that it would be wrong to slay an emissary. He was allowed to deliver his message, and now he is being allowed to return to your husband.’

Her heart increased pace so suddenly, her head began to swim. Could it be true? ‘Return?’

‘Yes,’ he said. ‘Despite your misconceptions and prejudicial bias towards rakshasas, we are an honourable race. In fact, if you like, you can view the vanar's punishment and his return with your own eyes. I can arrange it.'

'Punishment?'

'The rules of war call for an emissary who has instigated violence to be punished. He himself was allowed to choose the method of his punishment. It is nothing very severe.'

She did not ask the obvious question, merely waited in silence till one of his faces smiled slyly and said, 'His tail is to be set on fire.'

She was surprised. That really did not sound very severe. After all, she was condemned to be eaten alive. A tail-burning paled in comparison.

'Will you watch it?' he asked. 'It is time.'

Without waiting for her answer, he gestured sorcerously, and the marble floor several yards before her split with a resounding crack, as if struck by invisible lightning. The crack travelled to the left and the right, until the entire area in which they stood was riven by a great crevasse. A deep rumbling came from far beneath her feet, and then the crevasse expanded itself with a methodical grinding motion, the two halves of the realm separating as neatly as a stone door being drawn open by unseen winches and gears, hauled by invisible horses. But even a million horses could hardly move such a great weight, for, she realised suddenly, the entire tower was cracking open, split into two perfect halves vertically. A railing emerged from the edge of the crevasse before her, rising to sufficient height that someone as tall as she could lean upon it and look over the edge without fear of falling.

Ravana walked with her to this balustrade, as she peered over, hardly knowing whether to be afraid or excited by what she might see.

TWENTY

Hanuman experienced a moment of pure terror as the flame was brought towards him. His hands were still bound before him, and his legs shackled loosely. They had wrapped his tail in coarse cloth rags and dipped the whole in oil. He felt more constricted by the binding of his tail than by the bindings on his wrists or the shackles on his feet. But when they lit the torch and carried it towards him, he forgot about everything else. For one heart-stopping moment, the flame was all he saw, flickering, like the hungry tongue of a primordial beast, licking the air, feeding on it greedily, seeking to consume. He reverted to the state he had been in when he first began spying on Rama in the wilds of Janasthana, a scraggly vanar only one step removed from a monkey, terrified of his own shadow at sunset and sunup.

They had brought him to the lowermost level of the tower. He recognised some signs from the time he had walked around the tower's base with the shapeshifter, sniffing and examining its substance. Then the tower itself had cracked apart and the two halves separated. Looking up, he could see the whole length of it, all the levels visible, hundreds upon hundreds, rising up to the very clouds. It was a kingdom unto itself.

But he was about to be taken through the old city. The real Lanka. The wide boulevard before him was filled to bursting with rakshasas, citizens and soldiers alike—in Lanka, there was little difference between the two, because when war came, all fought side by side, even younguns. The windows and galleries and balconies of the mansions and houses lining the street were filled with watchers too, eager to watch the slayer of Akshay Kumar being punished. Although punished was not the word he heard repeated often, over and over again. The word he heard was 'executed'. His suspicions had grown when his tail was bound in cloth. And when it was dipped in oil, they were confirmed. Once his tail was set on fire, there was no way he could prevent the fire from spreading to the rest of his fur. He had thought Ravana's change of verdict a sign of the rakshasa's fairness and just wisdom. He now thought otherwise.

But he had permitted this. It was a fair verdict in thought, if not in implementation. Even the Brahmin rakshasa who had argued his case so heatedly had said that an emissary who committed violence must be punished. He had known as much, it was why he had submitted to Indrajit's brutal battering. All that mattered then was delivering his missive to Ravana personally, and he had done so.

The rakshasa holding him tight and the one holding the torch were kumbha-rakshasas. Myriad reflections of the torchlight danced in their serpentine eyes.

‘This is to repay you for the slaying of Jambumali, best-born of all kumbhas. And the slaughter of our comrades.’ His companion snarled, twisting Hanuman’s arms behind his back with his powerful claws. The reek of his breath filled the vanar’s nostrils. ‘If you ask me, even this is too good for you. If it were up to us kumbhas, we would ask that our lord be awakened.’

‘Aye,’ said a third kumbha. ‘Then we could see how boldly he faces Kumbhakarna himself!’

The first kumbha made a lewd comment about vanars wetting their nether fur at the very sight of Kumbhakarna, then from somewhere on a level above, the watching war marshal Prahasta called them to attention. They shut up.

Prahasta read out a short proclamation, announcing the names of the commanding rakshasas slain by Hanuman and the legions he had slain. He ended with the name of Akshay Kumar, at which the crowd roared angrily. They were echoed by roaring for yojanas around. It sounded like every single living rakshasa in the city-state of Lanka was out to watch him being cremated alive.

Then a chant began, slowly at first, and halting, rising gradually, then building into a crescendo that filled the sky and seemed to reach up to the clouds themselves. It was a repetition of two simple words, over and over:

‘Burn him! Burn him! Burn him! Burn him!’

So intense was the wave of hatred that emanated from their screaming throats that the very flame of the torch tilted away.

Some order or gesture from up on the tower silenced them. They fell quiet, eyes gleaming and glistening eagerly.

The voice of Prahasta ordered the kumbhas to light the vanar’s tail.

Hanuman saw the kumbha holding the flickering torch leer one last time at him as he walked around behind him. When he went out of sight, he felt his heart sink. And for one brief instant, he felt utterly alone, misunderstood, incompetent, useless, pathetic. He was only a vanar after all. His father and mother were dead. He had finally found a being who believed in him enough to entrust him with a great responsibility, given him this one mission to fulfil, and he had failed in that. Failed utterly. Sita was still Ravana's prisoner, so bereft of hope that she herself did not expect to survive until Rama arrived. And Lanka's forces were far, far greater than any of them had ever imagined. Through his visionary powers, he had seen entire levels where great armies of rakshasas drilled and trained endlessly, lakhs upon lakhs of them, millions all told. His fellow vanars would be sadly outmatched. The bears might fare better, but on the whole, Rama's army was little more than a great gathering of ... animals. There was no other word for it. Unarmed, untrained-in-warfare animals. These were rakshasas, the fiercest fighting race in the three worlds. Led by Ravana, the being who had invaded even the heavenly realm and destroyed Indraloka. His son was named Indrajit because he had defeated Lord Indra himself, the god of warfare! Even if Nala's bridge was completed quickly and the armies of Rama crossed to Lanka soon enough to save the lady Sita, it would be a slaughter rather than a battle.

Unless.

He felt the heat of the torch at the tip of his tail. He smelled the crisp pungent reek of his own fur burning, the smells of his own sweat and bodily odour mingled with the oil and the unmistakable stinging stench of the fire itself, for as every vanar knew, each fire has its own smell. His fire smelled like a charred corpse.

Unless he could return to Rama, and tell him what he had learned about Ravana, about his forces, about his magic. About his secret.

The tip of the tail caught, then the edge of the cloth, and then the oil itself ignited, and the whole went up in a roar. The crowd echoed the roar and the din was deafening. The kumbhas laughed in his ears, their foul spittle falling onto his face, his snout.

Unless he could even the odds a little. Tip the balance just so. And in the process, show them that even a single vanar armed with weapons of faith and dharma, could stand up to their combined might. That way, when Rama arrived, the armies of Lanka might hesitate a fraction before starting the slaughter, and in such a war, even that tiny fraction of doubt could be leveraged into an advantage.

And there was a chance he could do a bit more than that as well.

He felt the fire scorch his entire tail now, the whole length of it burning quite thoroughly. The kumbhas had turned him around, so all the watching hordes could see. He was forced to show his back to the boulevard, which made him face the tower. It lay yawning like a length of bread split open and put to stand on its end. He could see tiny antlike shadows of rakshasas on every one of the hundreds of levels, waving and cheering and applauding, and chanting. Burn, vanar, burn, they were chanting. The guards continued hustling him till he had completed the full turn and was facing the boulevard again. Now he was truly a dancing monkey act put on display for the viewing pleasure of millions.

‘Burn, vanar, burn!’ they sang.

And he felt the excruciating agony of his tail, his flesh and blood and skin and fur, that part of himself that was to a vanar no less than a hand or a leg, even more valuable than those limbs, for it was the mark of a vanar, his badge of race.

‘BURN, VANAR, BURN!’

And now the fire was creeping up to the top of its length, to the place where the tail met his lower spine. In another instant, his nether fur would ignite and then he would be lost.

He closed his eyes, shut out the deafening roar, and focussed. Willing his tail to do as he desired. A simple enough thing for a vanar who had mastered his inner powers. Who had overcome his self-doubt and realised his true self-worth. A vanar who served ...

‘Rama.’

The kumbhas were the first to see it. One of them said something to the others, who bent and peered and stared disbelievingly. Then all three of them squatted down and tried to get a better look at what was happening. Then, as one, they looked up at his face, and the look on their faces was not disbelief, but fear.

He was the slayer of Akshay Kumar. And Jambumali. And the five generals. And legions of fierce rakshasa warriors.

The kumbhas backed away. A shout from above made them glance up briefly. It was Prahasta, inquiring about what was going on. They shouted an incomprehensible reply, then pointed to Hanuman, to the tail. Then they backed away, almost falling over in their eagerness to put as much distance between themselves and the vanar. Prahasta yelled at them furiously, ordering them to stop.

He had crushed Mount Mahendra beneath his feet, leaped a hundred yojanas across the ocean, confronted the flying mountain, and outwitted the great sea-serpent. He had endured the temptations of the palace of pleasures and the realm of intoxication and had triumphed over both.

The crowd saw it now. The chanting died out and they began to shout to one another, pointing, gesticulating, staring. Hanuman took one step forward, then another, then yet another. The fire was no longer lapping at his back, it was well away from him.

He took several steps away, then stopped and looked back.

The burning end of his tail, still wrapped in oiled cloth, lay back there, several yards behind. The rest of its length, extending to his back, trailed along the street. As he watched, the flames spread further, like a fire finding its way along the length of a fuse.

It needed to be longer. Much longer.

He willed it once again. Growing it. It took a great effort to grow just the tail, not all of himself. But he did it. The tail grew ten yards, then twenty, then forty ... And kept on growing.

He began to walk towards the crowd. Directly at the hordes of watching rakshasas.

They parted quickly, to make a pathway for him to pass through. All of them were in awe of him, staring at the slayer of their great champions. Some at the back of the crowd peeled away and ran. Those at the fore and centre had no choice and in any case, they were too eager now to see what he did next.

He walked down the street, his tail growing longer and longer behind him, the fire growing at almost the same pace. Then he began to run, to leap, and bound. Now he allowed himself to grow. To expand himself. Twice his size. Four times. His chains and bindings fell to pieces like confetti. A dozen times. A hundred times ...

The crowds broke at last. They began to run, screaming from the giant vanar with the leagues-long burning tail.

He laughed and laughed at their fear. At their panic. They stampeded. Not a single one dared stop and confront him. The whole scenario was too bizarre for them to comprehend. A giant vanar, growing larger every eyewink, with a burning tail now a mile in length, now two miles, now ten ... What were they supposed to do? How were they supposed to fight him?

He flew up into the air, the size of a mountain now. But still he continued growing, his tail elongating at as fast a rate. It snaked through the whole of Lanka now, like an endless serpentine coil, burning. He twitched it this way, and a street full of marble mansions went up in flames. He flicked it that way, and an avenue of stables blazed. Houses, palaces, camps, parks, he set them all on fire. In mere moments, the whole of Lanka was burning. The fire lit up the night sky for yojanas around, illuminating even the night-darkened ocean's white swells beyond.

He stood in the midst of the burning city, and continued to expand himself. His head rose so high, he could barely hear the screams of the frightened, stampeding Lankans any longer. They were far below, minuscule pawns in a great game of fire and death.

He faced the tower. He was still only half its height.

He grew faster, shooting up through the clouds, to the stars.

Finally, when the clouds were around his waist, and the city below was barely visible, when the back of his feet rested on the gritty edge of Lanka's southern shore, he was head-to-head with the tower.

On the uppermost level, in a realm of pristine whiteness, the lady Sita was standing, leaning upon a balustrade of white marble.

Hanuman bowed to the lady Sita, folding his palms together. ‘My lady, I am relieved that you are safe from the fire. I would not wish you to be harmed by it.’

She smiled and returned his greeting. ‘The lord Ravana is good enough to keep me safe. At least so long as he desires me kept safe.’ She glanced around, as if making sure the subject of her words was not standing behind her. ‘He was here until but a moment ago. I think he has gone to attempt to undo the havoc you have caused.’ She smiled, and his heart leaped to see her smile, so wondrous a thing it was to behold. ‘Again.’

‘It is my parting gift to you, my lady,’ he said. ‘Now, I will go back to Rama and tell him that I have seen you here safe and sound and much else besides.’

‘Go, my brave Hanuman. And tell him to come quickly. And then let him wreak havoc too. You have lit the funeral pyre of Lanka. Rama must inter the corpse and turn it to ashes.’

He bowed one last time, then said to her. ‘My lady, hold on tightly to the railing before you.’

She did as he asked, without questioning. He reached out and grasped a great section of the marbled level, then wrenched it apart from the rest of the tower. It came free with a peculiar screaming sound, not like marble cracking, but like metal being torn apart by a great force. He turned and sought out a place near the outer wall of Lanka which he recognised even from so high by the shining gold and many gems all of which reflected the flames of the burning city. He put down the section of marble floor there, so gently that the lady Sita was not discomfited one bit. She smiled up at him.

Then he turned back to face the tower, crouched down, and leaped.

He landed on top of the tower itself. He teetered there a moment, getting his balance. When he was sure of his equilibrium, he crouched down, then hopped. He rose up a few leagues, then landed on the tower. It groaned and protested loudly. He leaped again, then came thumping down on it. It screamed now. He continued jumping up and down, just as he had done before departing from the mainland earlier in the day, building up momentum for his great flight across the ocean. Each time he leaped up higher, and each time he came down, he crushed the tower further. It began to shudder, then to collapse onto itself, entire levels demolished, pushed one into the other. The entire island thundered and echoed with the reverberations of his jumps, and the screaming rakshasas fleeing the flames below were further startled by the amazing sight of the giant Hanuman jumping up and down, pounding on the great tower.

Finally, he launched himself into the air. 'Jai Shri Rama', he bellowed.

Looking back over his shoulder, he saw that he had pounded the tower into the ground on which it had stood. All that remained of it was debris and shattered fragments. Soon, even that was obscured by the gouting smoke from a thousand fires. He let his long trailing tail fall into the ocean, dousing the fire. He relished the cool relief for a moment, then drew his tail into himself, to a length proportionate to his size, and sighed. The night wind was cool and refreshing on his face and limbs. The sky was clear and cloudless. And the ocean stretched before him, vast and dark and empty, a desert of brine demanding to be crossed.

He flew back to Rama.

Invocation

Ganesa, lead well this army of words

Dedication

*For Biki and Bithika Banker,
The Gemini twins.
One saved my life,
The other gave me
Two new ones.*

*For Ayush Yoda Banker, Friend, son, Jedi Master.
When you were born,
I was born again.*

*For Yashka Banker,
Devi, daughter, princess.
You made me believe in luck again,
And, more important, in love.*

Epigraph

*Om Bhur Bhuvah Swah: Tat Savitur Varenyam
Bhargo Devasya Dhimahi
Dhiyo yo nah prachodayat*

Maha-mantra Gayatri

(whispered into the ears of newborn infants at their naming ceremony)

INTRODUCTION

Adi-kavya: The first retelling

Some three thousand years ago, a sage named Valmiki lived in a remote forest ashram, practising austerities with his disciples. One day, the wandering sage Narada visited the ashram and was asked by Valmiki if he knew of a perfect man. Narada said, indeed, he did know of such a person, and then told Valmiki and his disciples a story of an ideal man.

Some days later, Valmiki happened to witness a hunter killing a kraunchya bird. The crane's partner was left desolate, and cried inconsolably. Valmiki was overwhelmed by anger at the hunter's action, and sorrow at the bird's loss. He felt driven to do something rash, but controlled himself with difficulty.

After his anger and sorrow subsided, he questioned his outburst. After so many years of practising meditation and austerities, he had still not been able to master his own emotions. Was it even possible to do so? Could any person truly become a master of his passions? For a while he despaired, but then he recalled the story Narada had told him. He thought about the implications of the story, about the choices made by the protagonist and how he had indeed shown great mastery of his own thoughts, words, deeds and feelings. Valmiki felt inspired by the recollection and was filled with a calm serenity such as he had never felt before.

As he recollected the tale of that perfect man of whom Narada had spoken, he found himself reciting it in a particular cadence and rhythm. He realized that this rhythm or metre corresponded to the warbling cries of the kraunchya bird, as if in tribute to the loss that had inspired his recollection. At once, he resolved to compose his own version of the story, using the new form of metre, that others might hear it and be as inspired as he was.

But Narada's story was only a bare narration of the events, a mere plot outline as we would call it today. In order to make the story attractive and memorable to ordinary listeners, Valmiki would have to add and embellish considerably, filling in details and inventing incidents from his own imagination. He would have to dramatize the whole story in order to bring out the powerful dilemmas faced by the protagonist.

But what right did he have to do so? After all, this was not his story. It was a tale told to him. A tale of a real man and real events. How could he make up his own version of the story?

At this point, Valmiki was visited by Lord Brahma Himself.

The Creator told him to set his worries aside and begin composing the work he had in mind. Here is how Valmiki quoted Brahma's exhortation to him, in an introductory passage not unlike this one that you are reading right now:

Recite the tale of Rama ... as you heard it told by Narada. Recite the deeds of Rama that are already known as well as those that are not, his adventures ... his battles ... the acts of Sita, known and unknown. Whatever you do not know will become known to you. Never will your words be inappropriate. Tell Rama's story ... that it may prevail on earth for as long as the mountains and the rivers exist.

Valmiki needed no further urging. He began composing his poem.

He titled it, Rama-yana, meaning literally, The Movements (or Travels) of Rama.

Foretelling the future

The first thing Valmiki realized on completing his composition was that it was incomplete. What good was a story without anyone to tell it to? In the tradition of his age, a bard would normally recite his compositions himself, perhaps earning some favour or payment in coin or kind, more often rewarded only with the appreciation of his listeners. But Valmiki knew that while the form of the story was his creation, the story itself belonged to all his countrymen. He recalled Brahma's exhortation that Rama's story must prevail on earth for as long as the mountains and the rivers exist.

So he taught it to his disciples, among whose number were two young boys whose mother had sought sanctuary with him years ago. Those two boys, Luv and Kusa, then travelled from place to place, reciting the Ramayana as composed by their guru.

In time, fate brought them before the very Rama described in the poem. Rama knew at once that the poem referred to him and understood that these boys could be none other than his sons by the banished Sita. Called upon by the curious king, Valmiki himself then appeared before Rama and entreated him to take back Sita.

Later, Rama asked Valmiki to compose an additional part to the poem, so that he himself, Rama Chandra, might know what would happen to him in future. Valmiki obeyed this extraordinary command, and this supplementary section became the Uttara Kaand of his poem.

Valmiki's Sanskrit rendition of the tale was a brilliant work by any standards, ancient or modern. Its charm, beauty and originality can never be matched. It is a true masterpiece of world literature, the 'adi-kavya' which stands as the fountainhead of our great cultural record. Even today, thousands of years after its composition, it remains unsurpassed.

And yet, when we narrate the story of the Ramayana today, it is not Valmiki's Sanskrit shlokas that we recite. Few of us today have even read Valmiki's immortal composition in its original. Most have not even read an abridgement. Indeed, an unabridged Ramayana itself, reproducing Valmiki's verse without alteration or revisions, is almost impossible to find. Even the most learned of scholars, steeped in a lifetime of study of ancient Sanskrit literature, maintain that the versions of Valmiki's poem that exist today have been revised and added to by later hands. Some believe that the first and seventh kaands, as well as a number of passages within the other kaands, were all inserted by later writers who preferred to remain anonymous.

Perhaps the earliest retelling of Valmiki's poem is to be found in the pages of that vast ocean of stories we call the Mahabharata. When Krishna Dwaipayana-Vyasa, more popularly known today as Ved Vyasa, composed his equally legendary epic, he retold the story of the Ramayana in one passage. His retelling differs in small but significant ways.

Sometime later, the burgeoning Buddhist literature, usually composed in the Pali dialect, also included stories from the Ramayana, recast in a somewhat different light. Indeed, Buddhist literature redefined the term dharma itself, restating it as dhamma and changing the definition of this and several other core concepts.

In the eleventh century, a Tamil poet named Kamban undertook his own retelling of the Ramayana legend. Starting out with what seems to have been an attempt to translate Valmiki's Ramayana, Kamban nevertheless deviated dramatically from his source material. In Kamban's Ramayana, entire episodes are deleted, new ones appear, people and places are renamed or changed altogether, and even the order of some major events is revised. Most of all, Kamban's Ramayana relocates the entire story in a milieu that is recognizably eleventh-century Tamil Nadu in its geography, history, clothes, customs, etc., rather than the north Indian milieu of Valmiki's Sanskrit original. It is essentially a whole new Ramayana, retold in a far more passionate, rich and colourful idiom.

A few centuries later, Sant Tulsidas undertook his interpretation of the epic. Tulsidas went so far as to title his work Ramcharitramanas, rather than calling it the Ramayana.

By doing so, he signalled that he was not undertaking a faithful translation, but a wholly new variation of his own creation. The differences are substantial.

In art, sculpture, musical renditions, even in dance, mime and street theatrical performances, the story of Valmiki's great poem has been retold over and over, in countless different variations, some with minor alterations, others with major deviations. The tradition of retellings continues even in modern times, through television serials, films, puppet theatre, children's versions, cartoons, poetry, pop music and, of course, in the tradition of Ramlila enactments across the country every year.

Yet how many of these are faithful to Valmiki? How many, if any at all, actually refer to the original Sanskrit text, or even attempt to seek out that text?

Should they even do so?

So many Ramayanas

Does a grandmother consult Valmiki's Ramayana before she retells the tale to her grandchildren at night? When she imitates a rakshasa's roar or Ravana's laugh, or Sita's tears, or Rama's stoic manner, whom does she base her performance on? When an actor portrays Rama in a television serial, or a Ramlila performer enacts a scene, or a sculptor chisels a likeness, a painter a sketch, whom do they all refer to? There were no illustrations in Valmiki's Ramayana. No existing portraits of Rama survive from that age, no recordings of his voice or video records of his deeds.

Indeed, many of the episodes or 'moments' we believe are from Valmiki's Ramayana are not even present in the original Sanskrit work. They are the result of later retellers, often derived from their own imagination. One instance is the 'seema rekha' believed to have been drawn by Lakshman before leaving Sita in the hut. No mention of this incident exists in Valmiki's Ramayana.

Then there is the constant process of revision that has altered even those scenes that remain constant through various retellings. For example, take the scene where Sita entreats Rama to allow her to accompany him into exile. In Valmiki's Ramayana, when Rama tells Sita he has to go into exile, and she asks him to allow her to go with him, he refuses outright. At first, Sita pleads with him and cries earnest tears, but when Rama remains adamant, she grows angry and rebukes him in shockingly harsh terms. She refers to him as a 'woman disguised as a man', says that 'the world is wrong when they say that there is no one greater than Rama', calls him 'depressed and frightened', 'an actor playing a role', and other choice epithets. It is one of the longer scenes in Valmiki's Ramayana, almost equalling in length the entire narration of Rama's early childhood years!

Tamil poet Kamban retells this incident in his more compressed, volatile, rich style, reducing Sita's objections to a couple of brief rebukes: 'Could it be that the real reason [for Rama not taking her into exile] is that with me left behind, you'll be free to enjoy yourself in the forest?'

By the time we reach Sant Tulsidas's recension, Sita's rebukes are reduced to a few tearful admonitions and appeals. Were these changes the result of the change in the socially accepted standards of behaviour between men and women in our country? Quite possibly. Tulsidas's Ramcharitramanas depicts a world quite different from that which Valmiki or even Kamban depict. In fact, each of these three versions differs so drastically in terms of the language used, the clothes worn, the various social and cultural references, that they seem almost independent of one another.

Perhaps the most popularly known version in more recent times is a simplified English translation of a series of Tamil retellings of selected episodes of the Kamban version, serialized in a children's magazine about fifty years ago. This version by C. Rajagopalachari, aka Rajaji, was my favourite version as a child too. It was only much later that I found, through my own extensive research that my beloved Rajaji version left out whole chunks of the original story and simplified other parts considerably. Still later, I was sorely disappointed by yet another version by an otherwise great writer, R. K. Narayan. In his severely abridged retelling, the story is dealt with in a manner so rushed and abbreviated, it is reduced to a moral fable rather than the rich, powerful, mythic epic that Valmiki created.

English scholar William S. Buck's nineteenth-century version, dubiously regarded as a classic by English scholars, reads like it might have been composed under the influence of certain intoxicants: in one significant departure from Indian versions, Guha, the tribal chief of the Nisada fisherfolk, without discernible reason, spews a diatribe against Brahmins, and ends by kicking a statue of Lord Shiva. To add further confusion, in the illustration accompanying this chapter, Guha is shown kicking what appears to be a statue of Buddha!

If you travel outside India, farther east, you will find more versions of the Ramayana that are so far removed from Valmiki, that some are barely recognizable as the same story. In one recent study of these various versions of the epic across the different cultures of Asia, an ageing Muslim woman in Indonesia is surprised to learn from the author that we have our own Ramayana in India also! The kings of Thailand are always named Rama along with other dynastic titles, and consider themselves to be direct descendants of Rama Chandra. The largest Rama temple, an inspiring ruin even today, is situated not in India, or even in Nepal, the only nation that takes Hinduism as its official religion, but in Cambodia. It is called Angkor Vat.

In fact, it is now possible to say that there are as many Ramayanas as there are people who know the tale, or claim to know it. And no two versions are exactly alike.

My Ramayana: a personal odyssey

And yet, would we rather have this democratic melange of versions and variations, or would we rather have a half-remembered, extinct tale recollected only dimly, like a mostly forgotten myth that we can recall only fragments of?

Valmiki's 'original' Ramayana was written in Sanskrit, the language of his time and in an idiom that was highly modern for its age. In fact, it was so avant garde in its style—the kraunchya inspired shloka metre—that it was considered 'adi' or the first of its kind. Today, few people except dedicated scholars can understand or read it in its original form—and even they often disagree vehemently about their interpretations of the dense archaic Sanskrit text!

Kamban's overblown rhetoric and colourful descriptions, while magnificently inspired and appropriate for its age, are equally anachronistic in today's times.

Tulsidas's interpretation, while rightfully regarded as a sacred text, can seem somewhat heavy-handed in its depiction of man–woman relationships. It is more of a religious tribute to Lord Rama's divinity than a realistic retelling of the story itself.

In Ved Vyasa's version, the devices of ill-intentioned Manthara, misguided Kaikeyi and reprehensible Ravana are not the ultimate cause of Rama's misfortunes. In fact, it is not due to the asuras either. It is Brahma himself, using the mortal avatar of Vishnu to cleanse the world of evil, as perpetuated by Ravana and his asuras, in order to maintain the eternal balance of good and evil.

My reasons for attempting this retelling were simple and intensely personal. As a child of an intensely unhappy broken marriage, a violently bitter failure of parents of two different cultures (Anglo-Indian Christian and Gujarati Hindu) to accept their differences and find common ground, I turned to literature for solace. My first readings were, by accident, in the realm of mythology. So inspired was I by the simple power and heroic victories of those ancient ur-tales, I decided to become a writer and tell stories of my own that would be as great, as inspiring to others. To attempt, if possible, to bridge cultures, and knit together disparate lives by showing the common struggle and strife and, ultimately, triumph of all human souls.

I was barely a boy then. Thirty-odd years of living and battling life later, albeit not as colourful as Valmiki's thieving and dacoit years, I was moved by a powerful inexplicable urge to read the Ramayana once more. Every version I read seemed to lack something, that vital something that I can only describe as the 'connection' to the work. In a troubled phase, battling with moral conundrums of my own, I set to writing my own version of the events. My mind exploded with images, scenes, entire conversations between characters. I saw, I heard, I felt ... I wrote. Was I exhorted by Brahma Himself? Probably not! I had no reader in mind, except myself—and everyone. I changed as a person over the course of that writing. I found peace, or a kind of peace. I saw how people could devote their lives to worshipping Rama, or Krishna, or Devi for that matter, my own special 'Maa'. But I also felt that this story was beyond religion, beyond nationality, beyond race, colour, or creed.

Undertaking to retell a story as great and as precious as our classic adikavya is not an enterprise lightly attempted. The first thing I did was study every available edition of previous retellings to know what had been done before, the differences between various retellings, and attempt to understand why. I also spoke extensively to people known and unknown about their knowledge of the poem, in an attempt to trace how millennia of verbal retellings have altered the perception of the tale. One of the most striking things was that most people had never actually read the ‘original’ Valmiki Ramayana. Indeed, most people considered Ramcharitramanas by Tulsidas to be ‘the Ramayana’, and assumed it was an accurate reprise of the Sanskrit work. Nothing could be farther from the truth.

For instance, Valmiki’s Ramayana depicts Dasaratha as having three hundred and fifty concubines in addition to his three titled wives. In keeping with the kingly practices of that age, the ageing raja’s predilection for the fairer sex is depicted honestly and without any sense of misogyny. Valmiki neither comments on nor criticizes Dasaratha’s fondness for fleshly pleasures, he simply states it.

When Rama takes leave of his father before going into exile, he does so in the palace of concubines, and all of them weep copiously for the exiled son of their master. When Valmiki describes women, he does so by enumerating the virtues of each part of their anatomy. There is no sense of embarrassment or male chauvinism evident here: he is simply extolling the beauty of the women characters, just as he does for the male characters like Rama and Hanuman and, yes, even Ravana. Even in Kamban’s version, the women are depicted in such ripe, full-blown language, that a modern reader like myself blushes in embarrassment. Yet the writer exhibits no awkwardness or prurience in these passages—he is simply describing them as he perceived them in the garb and fashion of his time.

By the time we reach Tulsidas and later versions, Rama is no less than a god in human avatar. And in keeping with this foreknowledge, all related characters are depicted accordingly.

So Dasaratha’s fleshly indulgences take a backseat, the women are portrayed fully clad and demure in appearance, and their beauty is ethereal rather than earthly.

How was I to approach my retelling? On one hand, the Ramayana was now regarded not as a Sanskrit epic of real events that occurred in ancient India, but as a moral fable of the actions of a human avatar of Vishnu. On the other hand, I felt the need to bring to life the ancient world of epic India in all its glory and magnificence, to explore the human drama as well as the divinity that drove it, to show the nuances of word and action and choice rather than a black-and-white depiction of good versus evil. More importantly, what could I offer that was fresh and new, yet faithful to the spirit of the original story? How could I ensure that all events and characters were depicted respectfully yet realistically?

There was little point in simply repeating any version that had gone before—those already existed, and those who desired to read the Ramayana in any one of its various forms could simply pick up one of those previous versions.

But what had never been done before was a complete, or ‘sampoorn’, Ramayana, incorporating the various, often contradictory aspects of the various Indian retellers (I wasn’t interested in foreign perspectives, frankly), while attempting to put us into the minds and hearts of the various characters. To go beyond a simple plot reprise and bring the whole story, the whole world of ancient India, alive. To do what every verbal reteller attempts, or any classical dancer does: make the story live again.

In order to do this, I chose a modern idiom. I simply used the way I speak, an amalgam of English–Hindi–Urdu–Sanskrit, and various other terms from Indian languages. I deliberately used anachronisms like the terms ‘abs’ or ‘morph’. I based every section, every scene, every character’s dialogues and actions on the previous Ramayanas, be it Valmiki, Kamban, Tulsidas, or Vyasa, and even the various Puranas. Everything you read here is based on actual research, or my interpretation of some detail noted in a previous work. The presentation, of course, is wholly original and my own.

Take the example of the scene of Sita entreating Rama to let her accompany him into exile. In my retelling, I sought to explore the relationship between Rama and Sita at a level that is beyond the physical or social plane. I believed that their's was a love that was eternally destined, and that their bond surpassed all human ties. At one level, yes, I believed that they were Vishnu and Lakshmi. Yet, in the avatars they were currently in, they were Rama and Sita, two young people caught up in a time of great turmoil and strife, subjected to hard, difficult choices. Whatever their divine backgrounds and karma, here and now, they had to play out their parts one moment at a time, as real, flesh-and-blood people.

I adopted an approach that was realistic, putting myself (and thereby the reader) into the feelings and thoughts of both Rama and Sita at that moment of choice. I felt the intensity of their pain, the great sorrow and confusion, the frustration at events beyond their control, and also their ultimate acceptance of what was right, what must be done, of dharma. In my version, they argue as young couples will at such a time, they express their anger and mixed emotions, but in the end, it is not only through duty and dharma that she appeals to him. In the end, she appeals to him as a wife who is secure in the knowledge that her husband loves her sincerely, and that the bond that ties them is not merely one of duty or a formal social knot of matrimony, but of true love. After the tears, after all other avenues have been mutually discussed and discarded, she simply says his name and appeals to him, as a wife, a lover, and as his dearest friend:

‘Rama,’ she said. She raised her arms to him, asking, not pleading. ‘Then let me go with you.’

And he agrees. Not as a god, an avatar, or even a prince. But as a man who loves her and respects her. And needs her.

In the footsteps of giants
Let me be clear.

This is not Valmiki's story. Nor Kamban's. Nor Tulsidas's.

Nor Vyasa's. Nor R.K. Narayan's. Nor Rajaji's charming, abridged children's version.

It is Rama's story. And Rama's story belongs to every one of us. Black, brown, white, or albino. Old or young. Male or female. Hindu, Christian, Muslim, or whatever faith you espouse. I was once asked at a press conference to comment on the Babri Masjid demolition and its relation to my Ramayana. My answer was that the Ramayana had stood for three thousand years, and would stand for all infinity. Ayodhya, in my opinion, is not just a place in north-central Uttar Pradesh. It is a place in our hearts. And in that most sacred of places, it will live forever, burnished and beautiful as no temple of consecrated bricks can ever be. When Rama himself heard Luv and Kusa recite Valmiki's Ramayana for the first time, even he, the protagonist of the story, was flabbergasted by the sage's version of the events—after all, even he had not known what happened to Sita after her exile, nor the childhood of Luv and Kusa, nor had he heard their mother's version of events narrated so eloquently until then. And in commanding Valmiki to compose the section about future events, Rama himself added his seal of authority to Valmiki, adding weight to Brahma's exhortation to recite the deeds of Rama that were already known 'as well as those that are not'.

And so the tradition of telling and retelling the Ramayana began. It is that tradition that Kampan, Tulsidas, Vyasa, and so many others were following. It is through the works of these bards through the ages that this great tale continues to exist among us. If it changes shape and structure, form and even content, it is because that is the nature of the story itself: it inspires the teller to bring fresh insights to each new version, bringing us ever closer to understanding Rama himself.

This is why it must be told, and retold, an infinite number of times.

By me.

By you.

By grandmothers to their grandchildren.

By people everywhere, regardless of their identity.

The first time I was told the Ramayana, it was on my grandfather's knee. He was excessively fond of chewing tambaku paan and his breath was redolent of its aroma. Because I loved lions, he infused any number of lions in his Ramayana retellings—Rama fought lions, Sita fought them, I think even Manthara was cowed down by one at one point! My grandfather's name, incidentally, was Ramchandra Banker. He died of throat cancer caused by his tobacco-chewing habit. But before his throat ceased working, he had passed on the tale to me.

And now, I pass it on to you. If you desire, and only if, then read this book. I believe if you are ready to read it, the tale will call out to you, as it did to me. If that happens, you are in for a great treat. Know that the version of the Ramayana retold within these pages is a living, breathing, new-born avatar of the tale itself. Told by a living author in a living idiom. It is my humble attempt to do for this great story what writers down the ages have done with it in their times.

Maazi naroti

In closing, I'd like to quote briefly from two venerable authors who have walked similar paths.

The first is K.M. Munshi whose Krishnavatara series remains a benchmark of the genre of modern retellings of ancient tales. These lines are from Munshi's own Introduction to the Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan edition of 1972:

In the course of this adventure, I had often to depart from legend and myth, for such a reconstruction by a modern author must necessarily involve the exercise of whatever little imagination he has. I trust He will forgive me for the liberty I am taking, but I must write of Him as I see Him in my imagination.

I could not have said it better.

Yuganta, Iravati Karve's landmark Sahitya Akademi Award-winning study of the Mahabharata, packs more valuable insights into its slender 220-page pocket-sized edition (Disha) than any ten encyclopaedias. In arguably the finest essay of the book, 'Draupadi', she includes this footnote:

'The discussion up to this point is based on the critical edition of the Mahabharata. What follows is my naroti [naroti = a dry coconut shell, i.e. a worthless thing. The word 'naroti' was first used in this sense by the poet Eknath].'

In the free musings of Karve's mind, we learn more about Vyasa's formidable epic than from most encyclopaedic theses. For only from free thought can come truly progressive ideas.

In that spirit, I urge readers to consider my dried coconut shell reworking of the Ramayana in the same spirit.

If anything in the following pages pleases you, thank those great forebears in whose giant footsteps I placed my own small feet.

If any parts displease you, then please blame them on my inadequate talents, not on the tale.

A handwritten signature in black ink that reads "Ashok K. Banker". The signature is written in a cursive style and is positioned above a horizontal line.

ASHOK K. BANKER

Mumbai

April 2005

KAAND 1

ONE

Rama.

From a thousand yards above the ground, the lord of Lanka surveyed his kingdom. Lanka, beautiful Lanka, lay in a shambles. The great sprawling city-state, so recently recast in a pristine white avatar, was a morass of smoke and ash and the smouldering embers of a thousand fires. Seen from this high vantage point, the city's aspect appeared as the face of a once-beautiful courtesan, besmirched and soot-blackened, scarred and dishevelled. Long lines of dark, scorched ground marked the trail of the vanar's burning, like mascara left in the tracks of dried tears. Lanka's beauty was marred beyond recognition. Rama is responsible for all this.

Smoke curled skywards from still-seething hotspots that only yesterday had been palatial mansions and fabulous estates. Virtually all of the city's finer structures, being clustered close by the innermost ring of the city, near the tower palace of the king, were either destroyed, rendered uninhabitable, or hideously scarred. The unusual nature of the source of the fire meant that even miles out from the centre, entire neighbourhoods had been ravaged, as if whipped by an uncaring lash applied by a blind scourge-master.

Oddly enough, the farther out he looked, the less evidence of fire damage he saw. The most modest residential tenements, entire colonies comprised of the closely clustered cave-like rock-and-mud houses that rakshasas traditionally favoured, had escaped unscathed. This was probably because these poorer localities were on the outskirts of the city, some as much as a full yojana from the heart of the metropolis, and separated by ponds, lakes, and tributaries of the rivulets that snaked their way down from the mountain ranges to the south.

And farther out still, where the few farming tribes lived, using hybrids and half-breeds for farm labour—for rakshasas did not herd or cultivate—the rich plantations of savouries and spices were completely untouched by the vanar's antics.

No, not the vanar.

Rama.

The vanar only acted as his emissary, carrying out his orders. This was Rama's hand at work.

He finally deigned to lower his gaze to the place directly below the hovering craft which bore him aloft. To the spot where the great white tower had stood.

His self-control was tested to the limit. The site of the greatest edifice ever raised in this world, the soaring white and gold tower constructed through the power of his asura maya and the ingenuity of the Pushpak, the celestial device, was nothing more than a blemish now. He had scarcely believed his eyes when the vanar had expanded himself and leaped upon the tower's peak, pounding it down, down, until it was crushed into its very foundations. How could the monkey-being have escaped the sorcerous spell he had wound around him? The chains with which the vanar had been secured were ensorcelled as well, and yet, when it pleased him, the creature had simply shrugged them to pieces, as if they were nothing more than paper fetters. But it was the power and size of the vanar that had taken him by surprise. Even the vanar's antics in the realms of the tower, the great slaughter he had wrought on those sorcerous levels, had not prepared him for something of this magnitude. To grow himself so large that he could pound the tower into the ground thus, that was beyond Ravana's expectations.

Hanuman.

He had underestimated the vanar from the very beginning, he admitted now with chagrin—but he admitted it only to himself.

The vanar was a tool of Rama. But a dangerous tool. It would take some scheming to eliminate him. And before he was eliminated, he must be made to pay for what he had done here. Pay with blood and agony. When the time came to face him again, Ravana would not make the mistake of sending out ordinary rakshasas to deal with him; he would call on someone who was more than Hanuman's equal in size as well as strength. Someone who could pound him down into the earth as he had pounded the tower.

Time, then. Time to awaken the killing machine. And prepare to let loose the hounds of hell.

‘Rakshasa.’

Her voice was small and soft. Weak. For she continued to fast despite all his entreaties and admonitions. Yet she retained the ability to command his attention.

He turned. She stood in the cupola of the flying vehicle, wan and pale, a sallow shadow of the woman he had carried away from the wilds of Panchvati. Her eyes were clear and met his own without hesitation. He corrected himself: weak, yes, but in body only. In spirit, she was as strong as ever.

‘Do you yield now?’ she asked. As quietly, as proudly, as would a warrior-queen on a battlefield, with her armies around her, her spearpoint at his throat, and near-mortal wounds on his person.

He admired her pride. Respected her strength of will. And there was that stirring in his breast he had begun to feel every time he set eyes upon her. Could it be, that despite everything, he had come to feel a smidgen, a smattering, just a smear or a swab of some deeper emotion? Why else did he find the sight of her heart-shaped face, those sallow cheeks and dusky eyes, undimmed and unafraid even after all her travails, so hypnotic? Why did he find himself unwilling to use force to ravish her even though that was his right by sheer fact of possession, by rakshasa law. Why did he, instead, feel so desperately inclined to prove himself to her, to show her somehow that he was every bit the king that Rama would never be? To earn her respect and hope to win her over peaceably instead? And why was it that after each encounter with her, he always felt himself lacking in some immeasurable way, as if his best efforts to turn her feelings in his favour were futile? Why should what she felt even matter?

‘Yield?’ he repeated. ‘You expect me to yield? Why? Because your husband’s monkey messenger danced a fire-jig through my city? Tore through a few legions and yes, slew a few good warriors and even my youngest son? So you think I should therefore yield and surrender all?’

She kept her chin high, painfully thin though it was. ‘I meant only that you yield this particular round. Surrender me to be returned to Rama. Perhaps then I may appeal to his clemency on your behalf.’

He almost laughed. But she was so earnest, so bright-eyed and proud of her champion's exploits. He had seen her looking too. Gazing round-eyed at the destruction wrought by a single vanar in one night. And he knew of the conversation between Hanuman and her the night before, wherein the vanar had pleaded with her to go back with him and she had refused, had insisted that Rama come himself to fight for her release, to restore his honour. 'This is a tired argument, Princess. Rest it. If you wish to discuss clemency, then it is my clemency towards your husband and his people that you should demand. I do not deny that the vanar committed more havoc than I expected. I expect you will find it was more than even your precious Rama expected. But such surprises are part of the game of war. The vanar was an unexpected hand your husband played. It was also the last hand he played. There will be no more war games now. Only a massacre. Of Rama and his forces.'

She looked upon him, unperturbed by his words. He observed the way her eyes flitted from one face of his to another in quick succession. She was a clever one too. She had begun to understand his secret. 'Once Rama and his forces arrive on the shores of Lanka, you will be done for. This burning was only a prelude to the final devastation that will be unleashed. But you will not understand. I see that even with this evidence you still do not comprehend the full extent of his powers. So be it. Let Rama come to Lanka. And then suffer the consequences. Just remember that I warned you and gave you every chance to relent and repent. And you refused.'

And incredibly, she turned her back upon him. On him! Who was the captor here and who the captive? Her courage was admirable, her audacity marvellous to behold. He chuckled despite himself. Her back stiffened at the sound but she did not turn back to face him even after he began speaking.

'Princess Sita, you delude yourself. Or perhaps you assume that because you have been in Lanka awhile and seen a few of its sights you know all there is to be known about this kingdom and about me. You would be in grave error to think thus. The truth is, you do not realise the full extent of my powers! Perhaps it is time you were given a glimpse that you may better understand what your husband and his monkeys and bears are up against.'

He willed the Pushpak to take them down, down to the wrecked tower. He had the satisfaction of hearing her gasp as the vehicle fell out of the sky like a stone falling to earth. Even though the Pushpak protected those that rode within it, it could not influence the way the sudden loss of height affected them; and he felt the loss in height cause a buzzing even in his ears. In her depleted state and delicate condition, it would probably cause vertigo, nausea. It gave him malicious pleasure to let the Pushpak fall faster instead of slowing down as they reached the ground. From the head on the extreme left side of his rack, he watched her discreetly. She turned deathly pale and held on to a golden pole to support herself, but she did not utter another sound of protest, nor appeal to him. Ah, what a woman. She was wasted on Rama.

As they fell to earth, he continued to watch her. She could see now that they were heading straight for the ruins of the tower. Hurling. Yet, she did not flinch or turn away. Merely gazed steadily at the rapidly approaching ground. In that instant, he almost hated her. Hated the calm, serene steadfastness she displayed in the face of certain danger, the stoic resolve, the unwavering assurance. Rama! Waugh! How could she even think for a minute that the mortal would stand a ghost of a chance against him, Ravana? Did she not know Ravana's history of triumphs? The long roll-call of foes he had slain and defeated? The ...

He snarled softly to himself. He would show her. He would make her tremble at his might and power. Before this game was played out, she would beg for mercy. Plead to be given another chance. To grace his bed, if only for a night. She would bow and cower and ...

The ruins parted like the petals of a giant flower, opening a space just wide enough for the sky-chariot to fit through, and the Pushpak slipped in snugly. Darkness overwhelmed them as they moved beneath the surface, and even he felt the thrill of travelling at such speed without being able to see where they were going, or what lay ahead. The Pushpak was infallible, of course, but that still did not keep the hackles on his necks from rising. The darkness was absolute, impenetrable. He probed with his other senses and smelled her fear, fear not just for her own person, but for the unborn life within her. That was something she cared intensely about, the child in her womb. It was her only weakness. Perhaps if he threatened to kill the child ... or to harm it, maim it, endanger it ... ?

They emerged into a brightly lit place. After several moments of darkness, the light seemed blinding. One of Ravana's faces grinned when he saw Sita throw her hand over her face, shielding her eyes. It was good to see her respond in some way other than haughty posturing and misplaced pride. As the Pushpak slowed, hovering in mid-air, she sensed the change and uncovered her face. He watched as she blinked several times, unable at first to accept what she was seeing.

One of his heads looked down at the view that greeted her stunned eyes, attempting to see things from her perspective. They were floating near the ceiling of a great subterranean cavern, so vast that the bottom lay almost a mile below, and the walls as far apart. It was roughly hewn, jagged spurs of mineral rock and blackstone giving the walls a shadowy texture that held the light in pockets and crevices. It made the whole cavern seem eerie, as if anything could be lurking in any one of the million shadows. At the bottom, the floor was covered with a great number of what seemed to be little egg-shaped rocks standing on end. He knew, of course, that they were not rocks at all. He gave her time to absorb what she was seeing. She peered down at the floor, frowned, unable to quite make out what the objects below were, then looked up at him. Already she had regained her queen-like composure. She waited with supreme patience, clearly expecting an explanation. He decided to provide one.

‘Watch now, Princess. See for yourself why Lanka is the most perfect breeding ground for the rakshasa race in all this mortal realm.’

She stared dispassionately at him, coldly, as if unimpressed by his words, but he saw her eyes flicker from one to another of his many aspects, and in that flicker he sensed uncertainty. Fear of the unknown. Mortalkind's oldest phobia. It was gone almost at once. Outwardly, she seemed never to have lost her composure. She glanced down carelessly as if unimpressed by anything she saw or might see, as if nothing he did or showed her could possibly matter.

He allowed himself a smile of bemusement, admiring her resilience. What impudence. What spirit. What a woman.

He raised his arms, all six of them, for the mantras were complex and required a great deal of his energies, physical as well as spiritual. He began the complex four-by-four chant, one of his faces watching her react with pleasing shock to the familiar Sanskrit shlokas. No doubt she had heard the mantras recited before, or had heard of them. She was a well-educated one, his Sita. It was yet another of the many qualities that endeared her to him. She respected the Vedic arts and the shastras. The sacred Vedic tradition of upa-ni-sad, which few of the women he bedded even knew meant literally 'learning at the feet of the guru'. Once all this was over, he would be her guru, and he would teach her all he knew. Well, perhaps not all. But a great deal. Enough to make her a potent enough sorceress that she might keep pace with him. What marvellous magicks they could weave together. She would not even have to sit at his feet.

It had long been his bane that Mandodhari strongly disapproved of asura maya and went so far as to attempt to ban his use of it in her presence when they were alone together. Not that he actually heeded her words—he merely concealed the fact that he was using sorcery, and went on using it nevertheless. But with Sita, he felt hopeful that she might learn to love the wielding of power, the unleashing of shakti, and that he might finally have a partner in magick. He watched her with one of his faces as she fought to blank out her expression once more, trying not to respond to the sound of the Sanskrit mantras flowing from his many tongues, which must seem an act verging on blasphemy to her mortal ears. He relished her discomfiture, and his mastery of the shlokas. Perhaps now she would begin to understand: Things were not always black and white as most foolishly believed. He was no less adept in the arts of brahmancraft than any brahmarishi of her race. The only difference was that he used the power to meet very different ends. He saw the confusion reflected on her wan, pale, but still beautiful features, and loved her more than ever for her exquisitely mortal weaknesses.

Then he lost himself in the chanting, in the sheer beauty and throbbing power of the shlokas. He surrendered himself to the flow of Brahman, black and viscous, like a river of oil that came from beyond and passed through his being, roaring through his veins, rushing out of his mouth and eyes and nostrils, igniting and forming a flaming torrent that he released into the cavern. The river of Brahman fire fell like a waterfall from the Pushpak, the intensity of its light dispelling all shadows, illuminating the cavern in a searing light more bright than noon sunlight. It fell to the bottom of the cavern, and spread like a raging river breaking its banks, washing through the countless lines of oblong stones, rising to engulf them, flowing over them.

In moments, the entire floor of the subterranean cavern was flooded with the shakti he had conjured. It washed up at the walls, splashing against them like waves against a rocky cliff. He increased the pace of the chanting, accelerating the powerful flow. The liquid Brahman in the cavern below seethed and boiled, erupting in goutts and splashes. The rock-like objects embedded in the ground began to tremble, then shiver, then shake violently. One by one, they began to explode.

TWO

Despite her determination to give her captor no satisfaction, Sita felt compelled to watch the scene unfolding in the cavern.

What were those rock-like things? What power was he unleashing? She had recognised some of the shlokas he was chanting, as part of a great and powerful maha-mantra; only the most elevated of Brahmins could acquire knowledge of such verses. How could a king of demons come by such sacred learning? Just when she thought she had seen and learned all there was to know about Ravana, he surprised her once more. As his chanting increased in intensity, she made out several different voices speaking separate mantras all at once. No wonder he was such a powerful sorcerer. He could work ten different spells at once—in perfect coordination—something that even ten independently potent brahmarishis might not be able to accomplish with such precision. It was strange and troubling to hear a being as evil as this reveal such great depth of knowledge and prowess in the craft of wielding Brahman shakti. What was this Ravana truly? He was not just the black-hearted demonlord that everyone assumed he was. There were so many levels to him, so many faces, that it was hard to tell which was the real Ravana. Perhaps they all were Ravana.

Now, she watched spellbound as the Brahman fluid he had released into the cavern flooded the entire floor of the enormous chamber. The viscous, smoking, blue liquid gouted and boiled like molten lava freshly erupted, precipitating a reaction in the egg-shaped rocks. She watched as entire rows of the eggrocks burst open, each spewing out sticky strings of amber-hued ichor. The top of each rock ripped open like a flower bud violently blossoming. And as she watched with growing horror, a creature emerged from the exploded apertures of each eggrock.

She saw one such creature appear from the blasted top of a rock, writhing and twisting, forcing its way out into the open. It was sheathed in a honeyed webbing that dripped thick strands of amber ichor. It tore open the webbing, ripping off strands and clumps to fling them aside, and gained its full stature, standing on two nether limbs. Its yellow, lizard-like eyes blinked open, recording its first sights. Looking around with an expression of snarling hostility, it raised its head and roared out a cry of terrible anguish. If this was a birthing, then the creature that had been born seemed to resent its very existence.

The cavern filled with the roars of the newly birthed creatures.

As Ravana finished the chanting that had completed the birthing process, she saw his ten pairs of eyes open again, witnessing what he had wrought. She could see them flicking this way, then that, rising to the horizon of the vast sculpted chamber, then scanning the other way to the far end. The rows of eggrocks extended from end to end, hundreds of thousands of them. All hatching explosively in successive rows, as the Brahman waves washed over them, birthing the lord of Lanka's horrific creations. As the first ones trampled on the egg-like things from which they had hatched, they looked around at their surroundings. Instinctively, drawn by the flow of Brahman that still bound him to them, the shakti that had been responsible for birthing them all, they began to raise their eyes to the celestial sky-chariot floating high above them, sensing that their creator and master was there. They raised their dripping snouts and growled, showing their gratitude and pledging their allegiance.

One of Ravana's heads muttered an incoherent command, and at once the Pushpak began descending. This time, Sita was ready for just such a move and did not give him the satisfaction of hearing her gasp as she had done before. Still, she felt the vertigo that had plagued her earlier torment her again, making her feel as if she were plunging down an endless spiral. She gripped the golden pillar of the vahan and kept up a stoic front. Dignity and self-worth were her last bastion.

Ravana slowed the Pushpak several hundred yards above the floor of the cavern. High enough to afford a view of all his newborn creations, yet low enough that they might see him and know their master.

And their father. For each and every one of these beings was created from his own seed. The seed of Ravana. Sita knew this without being told, because each of the rakshasa creations below resembled one face or another of Ravana himself.

As if to confirm this very fact, Ravana spoke softly. ‘Behold, my children,’ he said.

She said nothing in response. But her eyes were riveted to the sight of the hordes below. Even at this distance she could tell that each of those rakshasas below was larger, stronger and more powerful than any of the other rakshasas in Lanka.

‘This is the new army of Lanka,’ Ravana added. ‘They are the children of my mind, and will do my bidding, whatever it may be. They know neither fear, nor pain, nor retreat. These are the forces your husband will have to face.’ He paused and added deliberately, ‘If he is able to come to Lanka.’

At those last words, she responded at last. Turning her head slowly so as not to upset the delicate balance of her depleted senses, she said in a soft but clear voice, ‘Rama will come. Do not doubt that. Even if you assemble all the rakshasas that have existed since the beginning of time, Rama will come and face them all. No force you create can stop him now.’

He chuckled. ‘Your audacity is impressive, and your naive fealty is touching. But both are sadly misplaced. These are no ordinary rakshasas. They are touched by the power of the gods themselves.’

She could not help her expression. ‘The gods?’

‘Yes, my lady Sita. The gods themselves are arrayed on the side of Lanka in this conflict. This new breed of rakshasas you see before you is only one of the many ways in which we are empowered by celestial forces.’

She stared at him, shifting her gaze from face to face, trying to tell if he was lying. She could not be sure by his facial expressions alone, so diverse and unrelated were they all, but there was something in his words that was compelling. And she had seen ample evidence of how even rakshasas could be devout and suffer austerities. Could he be telling the truth? It made her heart sink. Surely the devas could not be aligned against Rama and his forces.

He smiled at her discomfiture. ‘Do not tax yourself, Princess. I will show you more evidence of how the devas assist us.’

He willed the Pushpak to fly. The vehicle zoomed across the cavern at a speed so great, the rock walls blurred past. She sucked in a silent breath, feeling the pit of her belly, so painfully deprived of nourishment, pressing back—against her very spine, it seemed. She said a silent prayer to the goddess for her unborn offspring, and exerted all her willpower to remain standing upright. Even so, she could feel the blood draining from her face and her head grew dizzy again. She almost blacked out as they sped at an enormous velocity towards the far wall of the cavern where, she now spied, a tunnel existed, hitherto hidden by the long shadows cast by the unnatural light.

A great roar rose from behind them as they reached the far end of the cavern, a host of rakshasas cheering their lord and creator. And then they had left the roaring hordes in the cavern behind and were flying at nauseating speed through a tunnel almost half as vast as the chamber they had left. She had a moment or two to wonder what it would feel like to simply let herself fall over the railing of the vahan, to plunge down those several hundred feet to land on bone-shattering bedrock. It almost seemed tempting. But she suspected that Ravana would be able to catch her easily before she fell, and would derive great satisfaction from her weakness—and her despair.

So she gritted her teeth and held on. She had meant what she had said. Rama would come. Hanuman’s visit had made her certain of that now. The vanar’s incredible adventures in Lanka had filled her with hope that was food itself to her battered soul. Rama would come. And whatever Ravana threw at him, he would face it and defeat it, and teach this arrogant, malevolent, shloka-spouting monstrosity a lesson such as he had never been taught before. He Who Made The Universe Scream would himself be made to scream. She held on to the pillar with all her strength, buoyed by the conviction that the day of her release was approaching fast. Rama would come.

Her vision began to dim. She blinked, worried that she was losing consciousness. Then she realised that it was not her vision but the surroundings that were darkening. She looked back and saw the illumination from the cavern they had departed far behind, receded now to a tiny thumb-sized aperture. From the sharp upward position of the light behind them, she could also tell that they were plunging deep down into the earth, perhaps miles deeper. Turning back to look ahead, she saw they were approaching an area of utter darkness, a cavern that was not illuminated by Ravana's sorcerous light. She sensed a subtle shift in the air as the Pushpak emerged from the tunnel into this new cavern and then they were swallowed up by darkness.

'I will arrange for illumination in a moment,' Ravana's voice said out of the abyss. 'Do not be alarmed.'

She did not dignify that with a response. But the truth was, her skin was creeping. A peculiar smell had assailed her senses. It was sickeningly familiar. The smell of rakshasa but somehow subtly different. An odour of decayed flesh and mulch like no other odour on earth. Like deep Southwoods boars' offal and blood. Like stag musk on the bark of a pine trunk. Like river-fish guts left in the sun for days. It reminded her, oddly, of the lingering odour in the stables in the Princess Palace of Mithila, except that whatever creature was stabled here was neither horse nor elephant.

She heard Ravana's voice uttering new shlokas.

At first she thought it was another cavern filled with eggrocks, and that he would repeat the same 'awakening' ritual he had used earlier.

Suddenly, the cavern was filled with light, forcing her to blink, coronas filling her hunger-dazed pupils.

And she saw that she had been both right as well as wrong.

The cavern was indeed filled with rakshasa. But not a whole horde of them. Just one.

‘Devi, protect us,’ she whispered despite herself.

Ravana chuckled. ‘You will excuse my brother’s inability to greet you, Princess. He tends to sleep a great deal. It is the natural consequence of an old curse, but the upside of that curse is his enormous size, which, as you might well imagine, can be quite a formidable advantage in a battle.’

He paused and gestured in the air. ‘And now, I think, it is time to initiate the process of awakening him. Something that can take anywhere from hours to days, depending on the urgency of the matter. It is now almost five months into his usual sleep-cycle, only a month or so short of his full sleep period, but that does not make it any easier. I think you would not like to be present when he awakens. It often proves to be fatal.’

Sita saw that the floor of the cavern was now covered with several hundred kumbha-rakshasas running to and fro, pointing up at the flying chariot and shouting orders. A horde of them formed into companies before a towering object at least a hundred feet high; that object was the sleeping rakshasa’s outflung hand.

She could not begin to comprehend the sheer size of a being that large. The very cavern itself was so enormous, it seemed that if she were to look up she would see the sky itself, and the far end of it was like the horizon seen from an open shore. As for the being lying prone in the cavern, its proportions were beyond comprehension. She had thought Hanuman’s amazing expansion incredible. This creature’s size belittled even that miraculous feat.

‘I give you Kumbhakarna,’ Ravana said. ‘My brother. Once he is fully awake, I will introduce you properly to him. He will be pleased to meet his new sister-in-law.’

Before Sita could respond or react to that last comment, the vahan was moving again, hurtling forward at fantastic speed. It was all she could do to hold on and keep her balance.

As they entered yet another tunnel and were embraced by pitch darkness, she used the opportunity to shut her eyes and try to regain her calm. Why was Ravana showing her all these things? To demonstrate his great military strength, of course, and to boast of his superiority in battle over Rama's forces. But also because he truly believed he would triumph in the coming war. His tone was one less of condescending superiority than of supreme complacency. He believed he would win. That he would defeat Rama and outlive him. And because he believed it, he was wooing her, Sita. For that was the part of his aspect that had puzzled her until now, and which she now understood. This was not a king displaying his military might; it was a paramour showing his betrothed the power of the man who was wooing her. She didn't know which made her more frightened, the fact that Ravana believed he would defeat Rama in battle, or the fact that he believed that he could win her heart.

She sensed intense bright light upon her closed eyelids, and opened her eyes.

They were emerging from a cave-mouth overlooking the ocean. The bright sky and sea were blinding at first, causing her to blink, but the openness was a comfort after those subterranean caverns. She had feared he would take her still deeper and deeper, to the very depths of hell itself. For it was rumoured that Lanka had once been, and perhaps was still, a conduit to the nether realms. She had seen no hard evidence of that since coming here, and if she understood correctly what little she had heard, then the portal to the underworld had closed some fourteen years ago, when Lanka had been destroyed in the asura race riots and Vibhisena had resurrected Ravana in the volcano. But the very knowledge that she was in a place where there had once existed a pathway to the hellish realms was frightening.

But this was no hell-mouth, only a seashore. Filled with sunlight and the tangy smell of ocean and nature's rich, refreshing goodness. The rumours were true, then; whatever had once been here had been closed years ago.

She breathed in the fresh, cool sea air, relishing the warmth of the sunlight upon her face and arms. It was autumn now, and the wind was bracing despite the fact that the sun was high in the morning sky, but she did not mind the cold at all. It made her feel alive and free. If she looked upward and outward, ignoring the Pushpak's lines, and the ten-headed being who controlled it, she could almost believe she was free.

Ravana began chanting again. This time, she neither recognised the shlokas nor understood them. It was a mantra foreign to her education. She was not even sure if it was Sanskrit or some even more ancient tongue.

Almost at once, the sky began to darken, the sun was shrouded by clouds, and the ocean began churning and seething. She gulped drily. Ravana's powers were far greater than anything she had imagined. She stole a glance and saw that all ten pairs of the demonlord's eyes were tightly shut. A jet black onyx-like stone embedded in the bone of his grotesquely muscled chest glowed brightly with power.

The chanting went on for a long time, and all the while the ocean grew wilder and more furious, like a typhoon brewing.

Then Ravana opened his eyes and lightning flashed in the stormy sky, thunder gnashed its teeth mightily, and the ocean itself rose in a great torrent to stand in a body several hundreds of feet high. Sita had thought she had seen impossible sights already. But this was beyond the limits of her expectations. Even without having witnessed such a thing with her own eyes before, she knew what she was seeing. That great anthropomorphically shaped body of sea water standing before them could be none other than—

'Varuna, lord of the sea,' Ravana cried out. 'I call upon you to honour your vow to serve me in my hour of need.'

A deep rumbling came from the standing body of water. Sita sensed banked anger in that sound, but also resentful obedience. 'What is your wish, lord of Lanka?'

Ravana pointed towards the far horizon. 'There, upon the mainland, my nemesis Rama Chandra and his army of vanars and bears are building a bridge to cross the ocean and invade my kingdom. I command you, Varuna-deva, to raise a tidal storm great enough to destroy that bridge and decimate my foes.'

For several moments, the wind howled, lightning flashed and thunder growled. The sound of the ocean god replying was like the voice of the ocean itself speaking, a watery rasping. 'It shall be done.'

And, to Sita's horror, the watery effigy of Varuna turned away and began moving, taking the typhoon storm and wind and lightning and thunder with him, moving towards the mainland to where Ravana had pointed.

Ravana laughed then. Laughed at his own power and at Sita's horrified expression. He was looking at her with unbridled pleasure. 'Finally,' he said. 'Finally you begin to understand, Princess. No power on earth, no being, can oppose me and survive. As you see, the devas themselves serve me. Forget Rama now. For once Varuna-deva pits the power of the ocean against him, neither Rama, nor his empowered vanar Hanuman, nor all the vanars and bears in the world can hope to win. Your hopes of rescue are doomed to end in a watery grave, my beloved Sita. Along with your husband and brother-in-law and all their forces. You have only one way left to ensure your survival and the survival of your unborn child. Relent now, repent, and be my bride. Refuse, and I shall take you by force, ravaging you the way Lord Varuna's oceanic powers will ravage your husband's forces.'

THREE

Vibhisena found Mandodhari in the old enclave. She had left her chariot and entourage at the corner of the avenue and gone ahead on foot. Charred refuse littered the roads, and the stench of burning was everywhere. He had to search through a score of narrow by-lanes before he found her in a small clearing, listening to a group of less fortunate citizens vent their woes. He saw her eyes find him and then look away, her mouth pursed disapprovingly, lips curled around her horn-teeth.

It took him several more moments to get her attention, and even when he did, she seemed to deliberately avoid him yet again. He knew then that her mind was already made up, and once that happened, virtually nothing he said would dissuade her. He had no choice but to try. There was too much at stake.

She was speaking to the angry citizenry about arming themselves and preparing for the coming conflict, when she turned her attention suddenly, unexpectedly to him. ‘And in case you still have doubts that the mortals will invade, then hear what Ravana’s own brother, Pundit Vibhisena has to say.’ She gave him his priestly title with an underscoring of scorn, making her antagonism unmistakable.

Suddenly, a hundred or more rakshasa heads turned to stare yellow-eyed and red-pupilled in his direction. Snouts sniffed the air, scenting him suspiciously. He took a step backwards, shocked at the wave of hostility he sensed.

‘Go ahead then, brother-in-law,’ Mandodhari declared, loudly enough for the entire neighbourhood to hear. ‘Tell our fellow Lankans what you have been telling me these past few days. Tell them why we should lay down our arms and bow before the mortal invader Rama when he comes, and recapitulate our crimes and transgressions against humanity. Tell them how we must grovel on our bellies and beg for his forgiveness.’

Snorts and chuffs of derision and anger sounded across the square. Vibhisena sought words that would calm the resentful crowd rather than inflame it further. ‘I do not say that we should beg or grovel before mortals,’ he said uncertainly. ‘Only that we should accept our mistakes and attempt not to make new ones.’

Someone from the crowd said with a gruff growl, ‘You spoke in favour of the vanar emissary too, did you not, Brahmin? It was your meddling that stopped his execution and transmuted his sentence ... which left him free to wreak havoc upon our kingdom! Are you still so full of mortal-love even now that you do not see what destruction your blessed Rama has wrought upon our lands?’

A chorus of angry voices ayeed the unknown speaker. Vibhisena tried to keep his voice calm as he sought a cogent reply. ‘The vanar only what he had to in order to defend himself. We were the original transgressors. He came here as a messenger of peace, offering terms. We chose instead to beat him, bind him, and then torture him. After that, we cannot fault him for having done what he did to redress the wrong.’

Cries and howls of protest greeted this attempt at mollification. ‘And what would you have us do now?’ shouted another voice, this one female. ‘Go run after him and kiss his scorched tail and beg his forgiveness?’

Angry laughs met that one.

Vibhisena looked around nervously. ‘Violence begets violence. We were the original transgressors when our lord Ravana abducted the wife of the mortal Rama. If we appeal to him to return her forthwith, we may yet prevent a terrible, tragic war. You have seen what havoc a single vanar emissary could accomplish. Imagine what an entire army led by Rama would do to Lanka.’

‘So now you’re speaking for the mortal, are you? It wasn’t enough that you stood up for the vanar, now you want to betray your own people for a mortal barbarian who invades our land through no fault of ours! How dare you!’

‘He is not a barbarian,’ Vibhisena protested. ‘He is only coming to retrieve his wife—’

Mandodhari’s voice cut him off curtly. ‘If Rama only wished to retrieve his wife, he could have had the vanar do that for him.’ She gestured at the destruction around her. ‘He seemed to have power enough to do as he pleased here, how hard could it have been for him to take the woman Sita back with him? But instead of doing that, he rampaged and nearly destroyed Lanka. I say that puts the lie to your words, Vibhisena. Neither the vanar nor his mortal master wants peace. They want war. And so we have no choice but to give them war. For Lanka will not stand by and be attacked twice by such treacherous outsiders. This time, when your mortal friends arrive at our shores, we shall be ready to repel them, shall we not, my people?’

‘AYE!’ rose the resounding cry.

Vibhisena shook his head in dismay. He tried to find something to say that would counter Mandodhari’s argument. But when he opened his mouth to speak, Mandodhari cut him off yet again.

‘I think you have said enough already, brother-in-law,’ she said. ‘I should not have listened to you yesterday when you came to speak to me on behalf of the woman and the vanar. Nor should the council have listened to you. We were fools, all of us, to be taken in by your pleas at the vanar’s helplessness, were we not?’ She gestured at the destruction around them. ‘Helpless enough to wreak havoc upon our beautiful city-kingdom, it would appear.’

‘You don’t understand,’ he said, keenly aware of the angry eyes glaring at him from every side. The mob would like nothing better than to take the cost of their demolished homes and property from his own skin. And they were already past the point of anger. ‘We cannot blame the vanar for this.’

Mandodhari interrupted his next words. ‘And now he cannot fault us for doing what we must to defend ourselves against such future insidious attacks. Nor should you, Vibhisena, defend him or the other enemies of Lanka any longer. Why do you insist on taking the side of the mortals? Do you not feel for your own scorched people? Do you not care about the plight of rakshasas? Are only mortals and their vanar supporters in the right always? Are we nothing in your opinion?’ Her eyes flashed with anger and pain. ‘Have you forgotten that this same vanar emissary heinously murdered my younger son and your own nephew, Akshay Kumar?’

‘Mandodhari,’ he sighed, ‘I have not come here to argue with you.’

Someone in the crowd shouted, ‘Then why have you come, Brahmin?’

He appealed to his sister-in-law one more time.

‘If I could speak with you privately ...’

‘Anything you have to say to me, say to Lanka as well,’ she said coldly. ‘I am a servant of my people. As are you, brother of Ravana. Or have you forgotten that?’

He gathered up his courage and attempted one last time to breathe reason into the smouldering bonfire. ‘Then hear me well, all of you. Queen Mandodhari asks me if I care for you all. Of course I care. I care for Lanka as nobody else does. My every waking moment is spent in prayer, invoking the blessings of the devas upon our land—’ ‘Prayer! As if that ever solved anything!’ a rakshasa said scornfully.

‘My friends, fellow Lankans,’ he cried, ‘You must believe me. I speak with concern for your welfare. We must cease this futile conflict here and now. We must make peace with the mortal Rama and his forces at once.’

Someone yelled an obscene suggestion as to what Vibhisena ought to do with his mortal friends.

Mandodhari folded her arms across her chest as she watched Vibhisena’s discomfiture. A smile cut across her formidable features. ‘And why do you think we should do this?’

‘Because if a single vanar can wreak such havoc, imagine what an entire army can do. Imagine what Rama himself is capable of. Do you really wish to see Lanka destroyed? Not just the bricks-and-mortar city-kingdom that you so lovingly rebuilt from the ashes fourteen years ago, but the very land you call home. Would you want to see all our people massacred?’

She laughed at him in disbelief, her eyes flashing jewels of cold fury. ‘You are beyond belief, my brother-in-law. Do you truly believe this Rama and his army are capable of invading Lanka and wiping us out? And yet, you speak of him as if he were some paragon of dharma? How do you reconcile committing genocide with upholding dharma?’

‘What choice would he have? What choice are we giving him? Unless we appeal to Ravana to return Sita devi at once and end this futile war before it begins.’

‘Sita devi?’ she repeated the words with open contempt. ‘You speak of her as if she were a goddess incarnate, not a mere trollop of a human.’

Vibhisena realised he might have gone too far in his enthusiasm. ‘Mandodhari, I know how much you love Lanka. Do you really wish to see it wiped off the face of the world? Please, I beg of you, come with me now to Ravana before it is too late. Let us appeal to him one more time. Perhaps now he will see reason.’

She looked at him scornfully. ‘Why do you need me at all? Why not go to him directly?’

He sighed. ‘Because he will not give me an audience any more. His doors are shut to me.’

She looked at him for a long, silent moment, her eyes glinting, reflecting the embers of some distant fire still smouldering on a hilltop behind him. Finally, when she spoke, her voice was as ice shaped to form a dagger. It drove into his consciousness without resistance. ‘Vibhisena, you are my husband’s brother. For that reason you have been forgiven many things. But treason and betrayal are beyond forgiveness. I advise you to leave my side and go back to your Brahminical rituals and prayers. You are wasting your time here arguing your case. I do not wish to hear another word you have to say. And I do not think anyone here can bear to listen to your insidious words a moment longer.’

‘Aye,’ growled one of the rakshasas who had spoken out earlier. ‘You but give the word, my queen, and we shall tear him apart limb from limb.’

‘Even Ravana’s brother has no right to utter such treason in Lanka,’ said another.

Several others voiced their assent loudly and shrilly. Some raised their snouts and roared their anger as well.

Vibhisena looked around. He could smell blood-rage now in the mob. If he tarried here any longer, they would not use words to attack him. It would be claws and jaws.

He turned and started back the way he had come. The crowd jostled and shoved him as he went, but grudgingly allowed him to pass. He knew this was because of Mandodhari’s presence. Were she to but give the word, he would be ripped to shreds in moments. Furious silence engulfed him as he made his way out of the square and back to where he had left his chariot. As he boarded it, he heard Mandodhari’s voice ring out, loud and clear across the packed square.

‘There is no place left for you in Lanka now, Vibhisena. Go now. Go to your beloved Rama. Go! Lanka has no need of you any longer.’

He boarded the chariot and rode away without looking back.

Ravana gestured and dispelled the image in the standing water. The sheet of fluid, suspended in mid-air by his sorcery, fell back into the earthen bowl from which it had been summoned to rise. The three dimensional image projected upon the particles of water vanished as well. Ravana turned to look at Supanakha, his faces beaming.

‘I think my wife has finally found her mettle, cousin. Did you see how she defended me in that debate? Like a lioness protecting her wounded mate!’

‘You brainwashed her well,’ she said slyly.

All but one of Ravana’s heads lost their smiles. Supanakha cowered and displayed an appropriately apologetic expression: Ravana had been sullen and withdrawn since returning from the long morning ‘session’ with Rama’s wife. She wished she had the water-curtain to see what had transpired between them. Whatever it was, it had not improved Ravana’s temper, already visibly provoked by the devastation left behind by the vanar.

He controlled himself with an effort and continued brusquely, ‘She has seen and heard all that transpired with her own senses, judged it herself, and come to her own conclusions. You call that brainwashing?’

She glanced up cautiously. ‘Persuaded, then. You talked her out of her suspicions very effectively. I thought she was angry enough to turn traitor on you after that debacle in the sabha hall.’

He snorted. ‘Mandodhari? Never. My brother dear, though— that’s another matter. What she said to him just now stung deep, you could see that from the look on his face. Because it is true. My brother was born wishing he was a mortal instead of a rakshasa. Sometimes I wish he would turn traitor on me.’

‘You wish?’ She leaped up on the edge of the large bowl, gripping it with her claws. ‘Why? So you could kill him?’

‘I can’t kill my own brother, Supanakha. Whatever he says or does, he is still my flesh and blood. It would be dishonourable.’ He seemed distracted, as his heads turned their attention to other matters. The conference was over, she observed silently. It was often like this with Ravana: all his heads would come together briefly to confer on some matter which was of greater importance than others, then some or most would go back to other preoccupations. ‘No. I wish he would realise himself more completely.’

She cocked her head, not sure whether to ask or wait for his meaning to become clearer. Waiting seemed wiser. He was never too patient when the heads were busy elsewhere.

He went on without noticing her lack of comprehension.

‘He believes that I am the villain of this whole piece, he has made that obvious from his actions in the tower when he went to see Rama’s wife, and from his confrontation with Mandodhari afterwards. I love the way she threw his own philosophical posturing back in his face. He always takes the high road but this time he’s about to learn that the high road is a lonely one that leads to only one place.’

When he didn’t continue for several moments, she prompted him cautiously. ‘And which place is that?’

He glanced at her as if recalling suddenly that he had been speaking to her and not simply airing his thoughts aloud. ‘Banishment.’

Before she could ask a question, he clapped his hands and sent a servant scurrying to fetch someone. Shortly afterwards, General Vajradanta arrived. Supanakha perked up a little. Vajradanta was a short, massively broad rakshasa who had one strikingly unique feature: his teeth were diamantine. As the result of a boon granted to his mother at his birth, he could bite through anything. She had once seen him accept a challenge to cut through a diamond. He had crunched the gem into bits, then chewed up the pieces like any other rakshasa might chew soft human marrow bones.

Ravana issued a series of terse instructions, then asked the general to repeat them. Vajradanta did so, grinning his trademark smile. His teeth flashed brilliantly, blindingly, against his greenish-white skin. He asked when Ravana wished the order to be carried out.

‘At once,’ Ravana replied tersely, already busy with other matters, his heads warring over some new issue, speaking a half-dozen different tongues at once, none of which Supanakha had ever heard spoken before, by rakshasa, human or animal.

She waited for a pause in the debate to ask carefully: ‘Is that part of your plan? Or are you just upset with him because he went and tried to turn Mandodhari against you again?’

‘He could no sooner turn Mandodhari against me than he could service a dozen kinkaras at once, cousin dearest. Everything you see unfolding before you, including Vibhisena’s foolish posturings, are all part of the greater game that began long ago. Back when the world was young and none of us was what we are today.’

She had no idea what he meant, but she had a feeling it would not be advisable to ask him to explain. She satisfied herself by pointing a paw at the urn of water. ‘Could I see?’

He sighed impatiently and gestured. The water flew up, hanging in mid-air like a sheer curtain. A flickering of colours ran through the mass, then particles of water rearranged themselves to form a solid-looking three-dimensional image. This picture was of Vibhisena, riding his chariot back to Lanka. He reached the main road leading into the city and saw General Vajradanta and the line of kinkaras blocking his way. Alighting from the chariot, he strode up to the general, who remained seated arrogantly on his broken-sur, leaving no doubt about who was in command here.

For some reason, Ravana had neglected to provide sound for this scene, unlike earlier when they had been able to hear every word that Mandodhari and Vibhisena exchanged. Supanakha glanced around, but her cousin looked even more preoccupied, his heads engaged in some fierce unintelligible debate. She decided to watch and interpret the scene for herself. In any case, there was not much of a scene. Even as she watched, General Vajradanta spoke a few direct sentences to Vibhisena, who then reacted with visible shock. He tried to ask a question, or argue some point, upon which Vajradanta gestured to the kinkaras who strode forward in perfect formation, lowering their spears to attack position. Vibhisena, never a fighter, blanched and retreated hurriedly to his chariot. Vajradanta shouted something to him, the leer on his face suggesting that he was enjoying exercising such power over a member of the royal family, a Pulastya rakshasa no less. His fellow clan-rakshasas, the other kinkaras, cracked mirroring leers as Vibhisena turned his chariot around and rode back the way he had come.

The images on the water flickered and vanished. The water fell back into the urn. Supanakha was much closer this time, and had to leap back three yards to avoid being splashed. Had even a drop of the sacred ganga-jal touched her ... She had no wish to even know what the effect might be of such sanctified Ganges water upon an asura like herself. She knew Ravana had deliberately tried to splash her for her impudence in demanding that he show her the encounter between Vibhisena and Vajradanta.

She did not mind. It was worth it to see Vibhisena sent into exile and yet another phase of Ravana's grand game unfold. She had played no small part in that game. And her role would continue, their little skirmishes and disagreements notwithstanding. In fact, their make-up sessions were often worth the fights themselves. Vibhisena, on the other hand, was out of the picture completely. She smiled a catty smile, licking her fur, relishing the memory of the look on his face when Vajradanta had told him that he had been banished from Lanka for conspiring against the king, and must leave its shores at once, never to return, on pain of death. Banishment from his homeland, for seeking to save it. Serve the self-righteous fool right. Where had he thought he was anyway? Ayodhya? Hah!

But the bigger question was why Ravana had let him go. It was not like the lord of Lanka to spare even his own brother in the face of such treasonous rebellion. No, she thought craftily, twirling her bushy tail around the vessel of ganga-jal without actually daring to touch a drop of the sacred fluid, if Ravana had allowed Vibhisena to go and join his enemies, then surely that too was part of some greater plan. Ravana had a reason for everything. Even sparing his own brother's life.

Some time later, with a heavy heart and an even heavier conscience, Vibhisena made his way downhill to the narrow strait that bordered the northernmost shore of Lanka. Four trusted clansmen, rakshasas loyal to his branch of the family for generations, waited there. They had secured the boat he had requested, a simple fishing craft that bobbed up and down in the calm waters of the strait. It was well into morning by this time. He had tried fervently to secure an audience with Ravana, but the hostility that met his every effort spoke more eloquently than any angry refusal might have done. His brother's doors were closed to him, figuratively and literally. But more than that, he suspected, nobody knew exactly where the lord of Lanka was just then. Ravana had last been seen travelling in a section of the Pushpak with the mortal prisoner Sita. They had gone towards the cave-mountain sometime around dawn. Nobody had seen them since. Vibhisena had no means to follow them there, and even if he had, there was no guarantee that they might not return before he even descended into the mountain: he could hardly keep pace with the celestial vahan.

Everywhere in Lanka, there was frenetic activity. On Ravana's instructions, his generals were overseeing the largest mobilisation of military forces on the island that Vibhisena had ever witnessed. Never before had Lanka been threatened by invasion. He shuddered to think of the coming war.

He paused now by the shore, looking back. Had he done everything within his power to champion the cause of peace and dharma? Was there naught he could do to prevent the coming calamity? It seemed unlikely. Mandodhari's anger and the resentment of his own people had scorched him. If she, his closest ally, could threaten him thus, then he had no doubt that the ordinary rank and file would not hesitate to tear him apart. He had been a stranger in a strange land too long. It was time now to throw in his lot with those who understood the language he spoke, those who respected the value of dharma and all that was right and true in this world. Only thus could dharma be restored to Lanka and the island-kingdom restored to its former glory.

He climbed into the boat as the other rakshasas held it steady. Once he was aboard, they clambered in as well, and pushed off from the shore. Rowing strongly, they steered it out of the tide's pull, out to sea. In a short while, they were upon the ocean, leaving Lanka behind, and starting forth across the vast waters in the direction of the mainland. Vibhisena spoke a shloka ensuring safe passage then tried to still the immense weeping of his heart. It filled him with anguish to do this, yet he had no other choice. He must leave Lanka in order to save it.

He was almost a full yojana out to sea, making good progress northwards, when the genial ocean wind suddenly fell still and their boat was becalmed. A chill foreboding filled his heart. He was reciting the Tataka maha-mantra when the gigantic shadow rose behind him in the distance, looming larger as it approached like a juggernaut.

FOUR

At dusk, they had glimpsed the first ominous signs.

The western sky turned an angry red, slashes of crimson painting the horizon like a wound inflicted by an angry tiger.

Clouds gathered in the south-west, black and brooding and threatening rain. Thunder growled in the distance and occasional glimpses of lightning flickered at the extremities of Rama's vision, too far to be seen directly. Wind dervishes sprang up, hurling rock dust and sand into their eyes, blinding them all, and making the bears sneeze violently. The singing stopped here, then there, until finally all grew silent.

Various omens were spotted: a flock of a certain variety of birds flying in an inauspicious direction; dead fish floating on the surface of the sea; left eyes twitching—or was it right eyes; an unseasonal star that could only be Rahu or Ketu, the two most feared stellar deities in the firmament. Someone came scurrying up, shouting about a wild elephant that had run amuck in the woods, trampling an entire unit of vanars. About bears who had been killed by vampire bats. The mood, so cheerful and optimistic until now, turned sour and gloomy.

Lakshman dismissed all harbingers of doom and sighters of omens point-blank, refusing to hear such superstitious talk. When they persisted, he grew somewhat irritated and told them to be rational. Rama kept his silence, knowing that people would believe what they desired, no matter how logical or illogical. But when Lakshman turned to him at last and asked him to speak aloud and dispel the unease that everyone was feeling, he was reluctant to do so. He felt something too, though he could not say what it was. A sense that something had changed during the course of the day. It was not only that he was waiting for Hanuman's return, it was something greater than the vanar's mission. Something that involved the forces that governed the universe itself. There was a disturbance at the most primordial level of existence, in the ether itself.

Sundown found him standing on a ridge overlooking that part of the shore where the bridge-building was in progress. Workers were still passing on rocks, egged on by Nala, who leaped up and down in agitation, seeking to get every last moment's work while there was yet light enough to see by. Lakshman had stalked off to have a word with Sugreeva about calming down his vanars and quelling the rumours of ill omens.

As night fell, the weather worsened, as did the mood of the vanars and the bears. Petty squabbles broke out between vanar factions, between the two species, and even amongst close comrades. Insects filled the air, adding to the irritation and frustration. A dead kraunchya bird fell out of the sky and nobody would touch it. It attracted a riot of gulls, fighting over its pink innards. Its desolate mate wheeled overhead, wailing its throaty cry. The ocean grew angrier, the waves sloshing so high over the bridge that even Nala agreed dismally to call off work for the day. They had made some progress despite all the distractions, but it was nowhere near what they ought to have accomplished.

Would it ever be enough? Rama had wondered, standing on a ridge overlooking the shore. Had he taken on a task that was foolish rather than just foolhardy? Building a bridge across the ocean? Taking an army of vanars and bears to Lanka? Invading the realm of rakshasas? The gathering storm mirrored his own inner turmoil, and like the storm, he banked his anger, keeping a tight hold of the rage that lay always just beneath the surface.

What people failed to understand about him, even Lakshman, was not that he did not feel rage or grief or desire, but that he ruled these emotions, they did not rule him. Perhaps it was because so much excess had been committed in his childhood and youth, so much self-indulgence displayed, that he had learned from a very young age to keep his portions small, to eat and feel and live in little manageable increments, never taking on more than he could chew at one time, never demanding, never having more on his plate than he could comfortably eat.

But this was not one of those times. He felt overwhelmed by the sheer scale of what he had undertaken. An invasion? For what? To regain his lost love? But that was his loss, was it not? What did it have to do with all these innocents? If a queen was abducted by another king, did her husband have the right to wage war against the other's kingdom? To slaughter thousands, maybe hundreds of thousands, only to avenge his and his wife's honour? He knew the inevitable argument: that a queen's honour, or a king's, was the people's honour as well, the kingdom's honour. But here he had no kingdom. These were not his people. Yet they fought for him, pitted their lives against the forces of nature, against impossible odds, against stones and sea and storms, and for what? For honour? Was honour worth the cost of so many lives?

In an ideal world, he would call Ravana to arms and face him alone, resolving the issue once and for all. But that choice had not been given to him. To reach Ravana, he needed to cross the ocean and wade through a kingdom full of rakshasas. To do that, he needed an army. This was that army. That was all there was to it. Shut up your conscience and fight, his sword-master had always told him. Morality belongs in the sabha hall, not on the battlefield. When a sword is drawn, the time for thinking is past.

Perhaps that was why Rama had always preferred the bow. One could think when using the bow. One could pause, or replace the arrow, unfired, into its quiver. An arrow could afford to have a conscience, up to a point. A sword had only a cutting edge.

When the evening star reached its zenith and began its downward descent, he felt the first prickings of despair. He had faith in Hanuman, but clearly there were forces at work here that were far greater than any one individual, however dedicated he might be.

The storm brewed like a cauldron of broth, clouds seething in the western sky, the fading twilight turning the rim of the world vermilion and purple.

The air turned so electric with impending lightning that the hair on the back of his hands and the nape of his neck felt as if it might burst into flame. Slowly, in angry, reluctant stages, night fell like a sullen youth performing a punitive chore.

Rama stood, wrapped in darkness, bound by the ropes of his own self-doubt, drawing the cloak of conscience close around him. Dharma was his only defence against an irrational, unreasoning world. In dharma he found solace; in karma, the commission of duty, he burned the vestiges of past misdeeds and rebuilt his store of Brahman.

He lost track of time. Yet, when a voice spoke in his right ear, he knew it was Jambavan. Even the wind and the angry sea and the brewing storm could not overwhelm the smell of bear sweat, fish and honey that pervaded the rksha.

‘Hubris,’ said the bear lord.

Rama looked at him. ‘Hubris?’

‘Defiance of the gods,’ Jambavan explained. ‘Daring to attempt a feat that rivals the actions of the devas themselves. Transgressing the limits of mortal or animal behaviour to achieve something miraculous, godlike.’

Rama thought of all the things he had done during his life that could be classified as such. He could think of several. But he had a feeling it was not his actions Jambavan was referring to. ‘Hanuman?’

The dark snout dipped.

‘Do you know how he fared?’ Rama asked hopefully. ‘Whether his journey was successful or no? Is he there in Lanka yet? Was he able to—’

Jambavan sighed and shook his head. ‘That is beyond my powers, lad. Yet I know this much. He has faced many obstacles on the way to Lanka. It has not been as simple as leaping from branch to branch after all.’ He snorted in self-derision. ‘Not that I ever meant it would be.’

Rama’s heart pounded. ‘Obstacles? But he did—’

‘Reach Lanka? I do not know, Rama. I would like to think so. But in attempting this leap, he provoked the powers that be. By calling upon his own hidden strengths, he has awakened great forces. Forces which may be jealous of his gifts. And other forces which may be more sympathetic to Lanka’s cause than our own. These sleeping giants would no doubt have revealed themselves to us in due course. On the other hand, it is also possible that they might have gone on sleeping and never been called into play. Now their awakened shakti is formidable and far greater than what is needed to crush us all.’

The bear lord waved a hirsute paw at the beach swarming with vanars and bears bedding down for the night. Growls and snarls of discontent rippled through the camp, as the two species shared their mutual unhappiness at the inauspicious weather. ‘But by invoking his celestial gifts, Hanuman has awakened them all at once. Challenged them unwittingly. The signs and omens our people speak of are not wild imaginings or superstitious illogic. They are signs of the struggle waged by our friend out there.’ The bear indicated the open sea. ‘He has fought many battles today. That much is certain. And yet the greatest battle of all remains to be fought. Tomorrow.’

‘Tomorrow?’ Rama’s heart lurched. ‘Then you believe he will not return tonight with Sita?’

Jambavan laid a paw on Rama’s shoulder. The bear’s paw was very warm to the touch, and very heavy. ‘Have faith, Rama. Hanuman has faith in you. He believes you are blessed by the devas. So in turn you must sustain your faith in him. Trust in him and believe that he will triumph over all odds. I only wish to warn you that all may not turn out as we desire.’

Rama made to speak again, but the bear king raised a single talon. ‘I do not know of Sita’s fate. I speak of the forces that swirl around us all. You well know that this conflict is not simply about a jealous lover seeking the return of his beloved, nor his desire for redressal. There are forces here at work that are beyond even my understanding ... ’ he paused and scratched his loins a moment. ‘Well, perhaps not beyond my understanding, but surely beyond anyone else’s. This pot was first brewed long before you, or Ravana, or even I were placed upon this mortal realm, Rama. It is a game of gods and demons. Devas and asura lords. We are only playing out our part in this one chapter of an epic history.’

Rama found little comfort in the bear king’s words. ‘Then ... what am I to do?’

Jambavan’s furry features twitched in a grunting smile. ‘Do? Ever the Kshatriya, eager to act. The time for action will come soon, Rama. Sooner than you expect. There is plenty to be done. And I have no doubt you will do your task well enough.’

‘But?’ Rama asked, for the word was implicit in the bear’s tone.

Jambavan scratched his lower back and sighed with relief. ‘What is to be is to be. What good will it serve us today to know we die tomorrow?’

He saw Rama’s face and emitted a choked laugh. ‘By that I do not mean that we will die tomorrow. I am speaking figuratively.’

Rama made no comment.

Jambavan sighed again, exuding a strong odour of crab meat. ‘In any case, we must now await our champion Hanuman’s return. I will keep vigil with you by going into the caves and making an offering to the devas. I have already asked my hunters to collect the necessary items. We shall pursue this course further when the lord of light returns to show us the world again.’

Thunder rumbled in the distance as he turned to go. He paused. ‘The ocean deities are angry with us. Perhaps they were frustrated in their attempts to halt Hanuman on his epic journey. Soon, I think they will turn their power upon us puny beings.’

Rama frowned. ‘What must we do, then?’

Jambavan’s beady eyes flashed with a dark light. ‘We will do what mortal beings must do when they commit hubris, my friend. We will die. But do not be alarmed, for in a sense, our very existence is an act of hubris. All of us—feeble, futile mortal fleshbags—tempt the forces that be merely by staying alive. What else is life itself, living in the face of natural odds, if not the defiance of celestial power? It is the ultimate hubris.’

Rama remained on the ridge after Jambavan had gone. After a long while, Lakshman came and stood beside him, sharing his vigil. Together, they waited as the night grew darker and colder. The storm brooded with them, mirroring the discontent simmering within their hearts.

Towards dawn, as the sky lightened again to an angry shade of deep blue streaked with vermilion, they saw something appear on the horizon. It grew steadily, and finally coalesced into the silhouette of a flying being without wings. The armies were already stirring, restless from an uneasy night's respite. A sleepy, questioning cheeka sounded from the beach, followed by a string of enthusiastic yelps and cries. The excitement built into a roar as the skies brightened and the approaching silhouette grew larger and closer.

It was almost sunrise when Hanuman became clearly discernible. He slowed his approach and reduced his size, hovering in mid-air with an ease that was wonderful to behold and which revealed the control he had acquired over his abilities since his departure. As easily as a feather drifting to earth, he descended to land softly upon the ridge where Rama and Lakshman stood. He was his normal size by this time.

His first act was to bend down and touch Rama's feet reverentially, taking his lord's blessings.

Rama took hold of his shoulders, pulled him up, and embraced him warmly.

FIVE

The anxious crowd looked on as Hanuman prepared to speak. His eyes found his king, Sugreeva, Prince Angad, his brother Sakra, and so many other familiar faces. His heart ached at seeing them again. For a moment, he wished he had stayed in Lanka, continuing to battle on. It would be easier than explaining his failure. But his lord Rama's face was so calm and devoid of the anxiety that he saw on every other face that it shamed him. Rama had not asked him even once about Sita. His only queries thus far had been about Hanuman's own welfare, about the minor cuts and bruises his body displayed, the charred end of his tail.

'My lord Rama,' he said. 'As you can see from the fact that I return alone, unaccompanied, I have failed in my primary mission. I was unable to bring back the lady Sita. For this, I ask your forgiveness. I regret I could not do as you expected me to, my lord.'

Rama replied in a level voice. 'I know you must have done your best to save her, my friend. It is all I expected of you. Beyond that, a person's fate depends on his or her own karma. If Sita's karma decreed that she was not to be saved, then that is that. Neither you nor even I myself could have saved her then.'

Hanuman read the fatalism in his master's words and shook his head quickly. 'No, my lord. It is not as you fear. The lady Sita is alive and well. Not in the best of health perhaps, for she fasts out of choice, and has endured many hardships, but she is alive and in her wits yet. She has not been physically violated by man or weapon. I cannot claim to know for certain how she fared after I left Lanka, but I would warrant that she is yet alive and maintained carefully as a precious hostage. For if my understanding of his methods is correct, then Ravana intends to use her as a pawn in the war ahead, and it is for this reason that he shall keep her alive until the very end.'

The collective sigh of relief that rose from the assembled vanars and bears seemed to express Rama's own inexpressible joy at this news. For the first time since he had known the mortal yodha, Hanuman saw a bright light spark in Rama's deep brown eyes. 'Is it true then, my friend? She is safe and well? Unharmd and unhurt? My love, my wife, my Sita?'

Hanuman felt greatly reassured to see the light of joy in his lord's eyes. He hesitated, choosing his words carefully to avoid giving a falsely optimistic impression. 'I would not say unharmd and unhurt, my lord. Nor safe and well. For she has suffered great mental torture and agony at the hands of the rakshasis set to guard her, and far more psychological battering by Ravana, his wife, and the antics of the Lankan court.'

'The Lankan court?' Lakshman asked. His eyes were as bright as Rama's but with a feverish glint that was absent in his brother's gaze.

‘Aye, my lord Lakshman. It seems that when Vibhisena, brother of Ravana, an apparently pious Brahmin rakshasa, attempted to defend her rights and see that the lady Sita was fed and better cared for, it created dissent and resulted in one of the more sympathetic rakshasis being murdered. But the lady Sita was falsely blamed for the murder.’

Cries of outrage rose from the assembled listeners.

‘Tell us all,’ Rama said. ‘Start at the beginning, from the time you departed this shore, and tell us everything that befell you during your time in Lanka.’

Hanuman did as Rama said. He recounted the whole story, from his flight across the ocean, the encounters with the flying mountain Mainika, how he outwitted the sea serpent Sarasa, his landing at Lanka, tunnelling up through the labyrinthine catacombs, his first view of the golden city, resplendent and breathtaking in its beauty, the appearance of the ethereal being whom he believed at first to be a benign spirit, her leading him on a tour of the city and its sights as he searched for Sita. He related how he entered the great tower palace, the wondrous sights he beheld within that sorcerously created edifice, the endless magical realms contained within, the wicked temptations and tricks that sought to deprive him of his self-control and break his brahmacharya vow of chastity, and the eventual exposure of the ethereal spirit as a solid flesh-and-blood asura, a shape-shifting cousin of Ravana himself, sent to lead him astray. At the mention of Supanakha’s name, Rama and Lakshman exchanged grim glances.

Hanuman went on to tell the rapt assemblage of his sighting of Ravana himself, surrounded by exquisitely beautiful people and things. Then of his sighting of the lady Sita, his conversation with her, her anguish at the lies that the Lankans had poured upon Rama’s good name, her determined resolve to have Rama come to Lanka in person and fight to redress the wrong done unto them both, to clear his name and prove his worth, Hanuman’s own impassioned pleas to her to come back with him and her proud refusal. He then described the battles he had fought with the rakshasas, the destruction he had wrought, the champions he had slaughtered. Cheers of exultation rose from his enraptured comrades, both vanars as well as bears, and when he described his capture by Ravana’s eldest son, Indrajit, a great sigh of disappointment rose from the beach. He described his trial in the Lankan court, the passionate defence put up by Vibhisena, the court's glee at the announcement of Hanuman's execution, and Ravana's unexpected revision of the verdict and its transmutation to the deceptively simple punishment of the burning of his tail, actually intended to be no less than a death sentence in itself. He narrated how he turned the tables and wreaked havoc on Lanka, burning and destroying, ending with the destruction of the great tower, and his final appeal to the lady Sita. As he described his last sight of Sita, haggard from fasting and smirched by her imprisonment, yet proud and strong even in that time of ultimate crisis, the congregation was stonily silent. He saw tears glinting in the eyes of Angad, Nala and Sakra, and even the bears sniffled.

A silence descended on the shore, broken only by the sound of the ocean. The sun had risen to a good height, and the warm sunlight bathing them all brought a welcome respite from the chill autumn air. The gloom of the evening and night before had passed, and the brewing storm seemed to have dissipated. Except for a discolouration on the western horizon, like a bruise on an otherwise flawless body, the sky was a perfect cerulean blue.

Rama was the first to speak. He rose to his feet so he could be seen by as many as possible. 'No one could have accomplished as much as Hanuman, not even in their wildest imaginations. Not only did he save the life of my beloved wife Sita and deflect the crisis she faced last night, but he wreaked more havoc in Lanka than an entire army! Let it always be known and remembered that his accomplishments on this mission went far above and beyond the call of his given task. As and when I return to my homeland, I will see to it that his exploits are enscribed and stored for posterity in the chronicles of our time. May his name be remembered even above my own, for by serving me, he made me, my brother, my wife, my entire dynasty proud. From now to time immemorial, let it be known that the name Hanuman stands for the most loyal of servants and friends, he who risks his own life and does impossible things to show his fealty.

'Would that I had the wealth of a kingdom at my disposal, to reward him as I would wish to. Would that I possessed a whole nation's treasure, to gift him as a sign of my gratitude. But for now, this affectionate embrace is all I have to give him. Hanuman, my friend, my loyal soldier, Sita's brave champion, my brother in heart and mind and spirit, take this embrace as a token of my immeasurable gratitude and love.'

Hanuman was surprised to find that his legs trembled when he stood. He felt hot tears spill from his eyes as he accepted Rama's tight embrace. 'My lord,' he said over and over again, 'my lord, my lord, my lord, would that I had served you better.'

Rama shook his head and wiped Hanuman's tears with his own fingers, gently, like an elder brother comforting a young sibling. 'You served me best of all when you returned safely.'

Lakshman embraced Hanuman as well. 'Truly, Maruti,' he said in a heartfelt tone, referring to Hanuman's paternal name, after the deva of wind, Marut, 'no one could have done more. The deeds you accomplished in Lanka shall never be forgotten. Never.'

Loud cheers greeted these words, and hoarse cries of support showed how moved the soldiers were as well. Hanuman was not surprised to find glistening eyes in the vanar ranks, for he knew his people were sentimental, but he was astonished at the copious tears flowing down the faces of the bears, dampening their fur and leaving streaks on their dust-covered cheeks. He scanned the scores of faces staring up at him, extending the length of the beach and far beyond, to the point where thousands could see neither him nor Rama and Lakshman, and only knew what was transpiring because of their compatriots who passed on descriptions of what was said and done here. He sensed that they desired him to say a word or two in response to Rama and Lakshman's effusive praises.

'All I did was in the name of Rama,' he said. 'I would do ten times as much in a trice. For my lord is a just and true man and he has been wronged.' He paused. 'Woefully wronged! My brothers and sisters, when I heard the lies they spoke against Rama, it made my blood turn to fire. Everything they have done against him and his loved ones, every transgression they have visited upon Rama's family, they blame him of doing against them! Imagine! They abduct his wife without cause or provocation and then they blame him for raising an army to get her back.'

Tell me, my comrades, are we wrong to go to Lanka and fight for our mortal friend's honour?'

The reply came in a multitude of vanar and bear dialects and varieties of grunts, all of which added up to one deafening 'Nay!' that made crowds of gulls rise up shrieking in protest and wheel about the sky.

'I tell you, rarely has such a righteous war been waged, against those deserving of the harshest penalties possible. I urge each and every one of you, do not be overly impressed by my accomplishments in Lanka. Yes, I slew a good many rakshasas, and will slay a good many more when the opportunity presents itself again. But what I did, each one of you can do as well, in your own way, big or small, great or modest. For each of you is armed with the shield of righteousness and the sword of dharma, and our success is assured in the end. No matter what the cost, no matter how great the price, we will reach Lanka and battle the minions of Ravana until they yield or until they are all slain, the choice is theirs. Are you with me?'

'Aye!' came the response. The gulls kept flying and shrieking.

'Then, my friends,' Hanuman declared solemnly, the pauses between his words filled with the sounds of the ocean and the birds and the waves of whispers that carried his pronouncements to the rear ranks, miles away, 'with my lord Rama's blessings, I urge you return to the work of bridge-building without delay. For the sooner we complete Nala's bridge, the sooner we shall reach Lankan shores. And the sooner will our just cause triumph. Let us raise our voices together and ask strength for our limbs and hearts by chanting the name of our mortal lord thrice ... Say now, Jai Shri Rama!'

'JAI SHRI RAMA!' chorused the armies of Hanuman.

'Jai Shri Rama,' he repeated. And they echoed him. And once more.

Then, with a great inhalation of breath, Hanuman expanded himself. Still expanding, he leaped off the ridge, landing thirty feet below on the beach. He sprang forward at a run, racing onto the bridge, to the end of the promontory, growing even as he ran. In his wake, the vanars and bears followed, roaring like an ocean unto themselves.

SIX

Hanuman was the first to sight the coming calamity. Expanded to a hundred times his normal size, he was working with feverish speed. Gathering enormous handfuls of rocks from the debris of Mount Mahendra, leaping out into the ocean, depositing the load into the sea as carefully as possible to avoid splashing his comrades on the promontory, then leaping back to the shore to collect more rocks, he had extended the bridge by more than a mile in the time it had taken the sun to rise a finger's width. The other vanars and the bears worked at filling the irregularities in the piles he dumped, smoothing the surface to make traversing easier. His example was a great source of inspiration to them all, and everyone worked as if their lives depended on it. Never before had he seen his people labour with such discipline and dedication, like ants more than vanars. And the bears? They toiled in perfect harmony with their vanar comrades as if the two species had always been accustomed to working thus together, shoulder to shoulder. It warmed his heart to see such cooperation and camaraderie.

At the rate they were working, Nala was confident they would reach Lanka within a day or two at the most. Already, from his superior vantage point, Hanuman estimated that they would approach the halfway point by noon today. Which would leave perhaps fifty yojanas more to go. If he could fill in another twenty or twenty-five yojanas before nightfall, they would surely be in Lanka tomorrow.

He was depositing a load of rocks into the sea at the outer extremity of the promontory, when he felt the disturbance. It came to him first as a kind of trembling. He felt the very ground beneath the ocean, some four hundred feet below the surface at that point, shudder as if in the grip of an earthquake. He was waist deep in the brine, and had dropped half his load. He frowned, wondering if perhaps he was mistaking the impact of the rocks he was unloading for something else, and paused, waiting. Half a mile towards shore, the vanars and bears working on the promontory continued singing cheerily, suspecting nothing. He felt a tickling by his right calf, in the swirling silt of the ocean floor, as one of the ocean's many denizens brushed past him. The water at his waist waxed alternately warm and cold as currents intermingled. In the distance, a herd of sea giants spouted fountains of water.

Then it came again. This time the trembling was so intense he had to spread his feet wider to keep his balance. Some of the rocks he was holding trickled through his fingers, splashing into the water. On the promontory the singing faltered, then stopped, as his comrades sensed something amiss. He saw faces turning to look up at him, everyone assuming that he had done something to cause the phenomenon. But then came a shuddering so violent that even he was almost knocked off his feet. He flailed his arms to get back his balance, dropping the rocks. On the promontory, thousands of vanars and bears scurried like ants in confusion, trying to get back to the safety of solid land. He saw a few lose their footing and fall, splashing and gasping, into the sea. Their comrades stopped at once to help them.

He turned, sloshing water and sending a cluster of white-finned predators scuttling out of his way. Facing the western horizon, towards Lanka, he peered into the distance. He could see nothing alarming. Just the sunlit ocean, stretching endlessly. A faint tremor shook the earth underfoot again, the ocean sloshed against his waist, and he heard the startled cries from the promontory behind him. Several called out to him, asking what was happening. He had no answer to give them.

He continued to watch the western horizon, until finally, he saw something, a faint shadow, like a dusky ripple in a field of otherwise perfectly aligned kusa grass. On land that meant a predator lurking beneath the grass but he could not fathom what it might mean here in the brine desert. It curled softly at the very limit of vision, like a shadow of the horizon separating from its master. He watched it with growing bafflement, unable to relate it to anything in his store of knowledge. He felt something tickling his shoulder and looked around to see a cloud nudging past. He had inadvertently been expanding himself further while watching the horizon. He was now several hundreds of yards tall, and the ocean lapped around his thighs just above his knees.

He looked at the horizon again. The shadow-like curl had grown farther removed from the horizon, the distinction much clearer now. As he watched, it grew more pronounced, the separation between it and the horizon wider and wider, until it began to resemble something so familiar that he wondered how he had not recognised it at once. It was a wave, nothing more, nothing less. Simply a wave. But in order for it to be visible at this great distance, it must be a wave of some magnitude. A wave great enough to ...

He turned and looked back at the bridge. His fellows were still scurrying back to land. Good. A few had stopped to look back and were gawking at the horizon—they were able to glimpse the curl of the wave too. He saw Sakra among those watching.

‘Get off the bridge,’ he said, hearing his own voice booming. ‘Everyone, go into the woods. Hurry!’

Still some fools remained, staring dumbly up at him. ‘Go!’ he shouted.

The stragglers leaped up and down, squawking more out of fear of their giant brother than the coming tidal wave, and loped back across the bridge. Hanuman sloshed through the ocean, disrupting the schools of fish that were swimming around madly in confusion. It occurred to him that the wave was no natural phenomenon. Had it been so, then surely the marine life would have sensed it. Even land creatures would have known there was something amiss well in advance and sought cover. There were warning signs when such things came, little changes in weather and air and in the patterns of insect and bird life. The fact that nobody had sensed its coming left no doubt in his mind that this was no natural thing; it was the product of sorcerous intervention. And he did not have to think twice to know who was responsible.

When he was within hailing distance of the shore, he discerned Rama and Lakshman standing on the ridge, attempting to bring some order to the chaos on the beach. Vanars and bears swarmed across the shore front in organised confusion.

‘Rama,’ Hanuman said, ‘you must seek cover quickly. Ravana has sent the ocean to attack us.’

Even at this distance, he could read incredulity in Rama’s response. He had to attune his hearing to catch Rama’s words above the cacophony of his comrades.

‘Sagara?’ Rama said. ‘But why would—’

‘Not Sagara, Varuna,’ Hanuman interjected. Sagara was the ancient one who dug up the cavities in the earth that were later filled by the great flood and became the oceans, making his name synonymous with the word ocean itself. While Varuna was the deva who ruled over the waters of the ocean world and all creatures residing within those waters. ‘Varuna-deva is beholden to Ravana and must do his bidding. He sends a great tide now to destroy our bridge and thwart our attempts to cross to Lanka. You must save yourself. Perhaps if you go into the forest you may outrun the wave.’

But Rama remained standing still, staring out at the sea. Hanuman looked back over his shoulder. The curling shadow was much taller now. It was impossible to tell height and size accurately at this distance, but he thought that the wave might well be a hundred yards high or greater. What shocked him more was the distance the wave had travelled in the few moments he had turned his back on it. That itself hinted at the great speed at which the body of water was travelling towards them.

He turned back to Rama. ‘My lord, there is no time to run now. Let me carry you to safety. Climb upon my hands and I will bear you away high in the sky where even the tallest wave cannot reach.’

He knelt down in the sea, ignoring the gritty rocks of the undersea floor digging into his knees, and held out his hands, palms upward, for Rama and Lakshman to climb onto. The chaos on the beach grew cacophonous as the vanars and bears began to succumb to naked panic. Lakshman’s stentorian voice cut through the noise, issuing stern, crisp orders to the generals, and the clan and tribe chiefs. Rama’s attention continued to remain on the melee even as Hanuman waited. The vanar stole a glance over his shoulder. The curl continued to rise higher as it approached at a relentless rate. The entire horizon was one thick undulating shadow now. Probing with his heightened senses, he could catch the sound now, a deep subsonic rumbling, like a great shuffling in the bowels of the earth. It made him feel sick to the stomach. What havoc would a wave of that size wreak once it struck the shore? How far inland would his vanar fellows and bear mates have to flee in order to reach even minimum safety?

‘Rama,’ he called out, loud enough to be heard over the cacophony. ‘You must come now, while there is still time. I urge you, my lord. Let me save you.’

Rama finished speaking to Nala, a pale, stunned-looking Nala who was trying his best to listen to the mortal leader while avoiding the sight of the oncoming peril visible behind Rama. Nala nodded briskly, then turned and loped away, calling out in the vanar tongue. Several of his bridge-builder chiefs listened to what he had to say and began calling out as well, passing on the words of Lord Rama. Hanuman did not know whether to feel touched by this show of obedience and faith in the face of certain disaster, or to admire the great loyalty that Rama had come to command in so short a time.

Only then did Rama turn to Hanuman. His care-worn face looked up at the vanar’s towering visage. ‘Maruti, my friend. Save as many as you can. Act now, quickly!’

‘My lord, even at my largest size, I cannot save them all. But if I save you, I may yet achieve something worthwhile. I beg you, Rama. Climb upon my hand and let me take you to the skies.’

Rama smiled wistfully, yet, Hanuman saw, his eyes remained hard and determined. This was Rama the master warrior he had glimpsed in the clearing before the battle of Janasthana, the Rama who would stand and fight to the death against impossible odds rather than flee and save himself. Rama, yodha among yodhas. ‘I stand with my brethren, Anjaneya. It is my place.’

Hanuman looked back over his shoulder. The horizon was a dense charcoal scrawl drawn by an old vanar with a shaking paw. The wave was gathering more water mass as it came, as if it knew that the longer it took to reach the shore, the greater the destruction it would unleash. A wind began to blow without warning, driven towards them by the approaching juggernaut. He felt the chill of distant polar oceans in the touch of that wind, an unnatural chill that ought never to have reached these warm tropical climes. This was no mere wind; it reeked of asura sorcery. He clenched his great teeth in chagrin at the thought of Ravana’s vile act of cowardice: for was it not cowardice to unleash death and destruction from afar, anonymously, instead of showing your opponent your face before striking?

He turned back to face Rama, folding his hands entreatingly. ‘My lord. Reconsider one last time. All these warriors,’ he indicated the melee on the beach and in the palm groves beyond as his comrades fled in as orderly a fashion as they could muster, ‘depend on your leadership. If something should happen to you, how would we go on? Who will rescue your hapless wife Sita from the clutches of Ravana? Who will avenge the wrong and dishonour done unto your family?’

The wind rose fiercely, buffeting Rama and Lakshman hard enough to make them sway. They spread their legs and stood their ground. Near their position, Hanuman saw Sakra struggling to hold his posture erect—in imitation of his brother, as usual—and failing. The little vanar tumbled several times, then regained his footing and crouched down, fighting to stay upright, issuing a string of outraged cheekas at the elements. The chaos on the beach had resolved into something resembling a battle plan, with a surprisingly large number already vanished into the groves. Yet, many remained. Far too many. Hanuman saw, unsurprised, that many of those that were still on the beach were simply standing firm, like Sakra, determined not to run so long as their lord and leader stayed. Angad and Sugreeva were among this number, as were Jambavan and his lieutenants. The bear king was closest to Rama’s position, his dark face inscrutable, bear eyes glinting in the dull, gloomy light. The wind roared, raising sand dervishes that swirled around them all.

Rama shouted to make himself heard above the roaring wind. ‘We cannot all escape in time. And I will not abandon my soldiers to save myself.’

Hanuman stared down in dismay. ‘But you may ... ’ he could not bring himself to speak of Rama being killed, ‘ ... you may come to harm, my lord, if you stay here.’

Rama’s answer was torn ragged by the storm, but Hanuman was able to catch the frayed words. ‘We are at war, Anjaneya. We would not flee from an army of rakshasas. Why should we flee from the lord of the ocean?’

Hanuman was spellbound by the strength of Rama’s resolve, struck speechless by his conviction in the face of imminent death.

Rama shouted again. 'Save as many as you can. I make my stand here.'

The pitch of the wind changed then, as if protesting Rama's unwillingness to bow down, and a veritable typhoon blew across the beach, raising a cloud of sand so blinding that all of them, mortal, vanar and bear, had to cover their eyes and mouths with the backs of their hands and struggle just to remain standing. The howls and cries of fleeing vanars and bears came to Hanuman on the wind, like the ghosts of departed souls screaming on their last journey down to the underworld. He was filled with great despair and frustration on one hand, and great pride and boundless love on the other.

He turned away from Rama and strode out into the ocean, now choppy and ragged in anticipation of the coming tidal wave. The water level had dropped to the extent that the bed of the ocean was bared for several hundred yards out, leaving gasping, thrashing fish and sea creatures beached. At the edge of the new tideline, still receding as he strode out, the foaming water teemed with frenzied sea beings, maddened by their awareness of the coming devastation. He stopped at the tideline, lowering himself to sit on the soft, yielding sand.

He expanded himself as far as he could, refusing to accept any limits. He ignored the banshee shriek of the typhoon, the fury of the ocean churning around him, the whitefins and sea serpents and other devilish creatures of the ocean that bit and stung and jabbed at his body underwater, whether on the command of the lord of Lanka or simply maddened by the storm and chaos, he did not know.

He lay on his side, putting his back to the frothing ocean. He was large enough by then that the water level only came up to his chest. A good hundred feet of his body still rose above the surface. He did not think that would be enough to stop the tidal wave, but it would surely thwart it somewhat.

He could see the beach from where he lay, could just make out Rama and Lakshman's silhouettes in the garish crimson-and-cerulean-tinted light of the typhoon-shadowed sky. They stood like warriors at the head of an army. The way he had seen them stand on the mound at Janasthana, awaiting the arrival of the rakshasa hordes.

Then he was forced to shut his eyes to keep the wind-flung sand and brine from blinding him. The last thing he saw was the world growing dark. The roaring from behind grew too enormous to comprehend, a sound beyond deafening. His last prayer was that his gigantic body should be enough to protect Rama and the others from the worst of this calamity. Then the wave struck him with the force of a hundred thousand sledgehammers, and he saw no more.

SEVEN

Rama regained consciousness to find himself lying on a grassy patch, palm fronds scattered across his body and face, and sand in his nostrils, mouth, eyes, and ears, a veritable dune formed against the side of his body. He plucked away the palm fronds from his face to find himself staring up at an azure blue sky as clear as crystal. The sound of the ocean washed across the background of his mind, omnipresent, but the absence of other sounds was stark, chilling. No birds called out. No vanars cheeked or chattered or yelled. No bears grunted or chuffed. No sounds of stones being thrown or sand crunching under a million paws. No sound at all, except the incessant washing of waves on the beach, and the kind of stillness that came after a bloody battle.

He raised himself slowly, seeking out any damage to his person. Apart from a bruised shoulder and several sore spots on his ribs, thighs and hip, he seemed unharmed. He pushed aside the palm fronds and debris and rose unsteadily to his feet.

The first thing that assailed him was the stench of fish. It came on the soft wind that blew from the sea, as if this were just another late summer afternoon and he were rising from an unscheduled nap. The stench was unbearable. Rotten, putrefying, stomach-churning, it resembled the gassy smell from the decaying remains of the beached sea elephant they had come across some days earlier, multiplied a thousandfold.

He turned around, seeking to get his bearings by spying out the palm groves and the trampled debris of Mount Mahendra, then turned again a second time, until he was back where he had started, facing south. Only then did he understand that the entire landscape had been altered beyond recognition. The grassy patch where he had regained consciousness was in fact the spot where the palm grove had stood, the same bat-ridden grove in which he and Lakshman and the bear and vanar leaders had held their conferences. The grove was razed clear, every single tree uprooted or broken off close to the ground. Looking northwards, he saw that the entire shoreline with its waving masses of palms had been ravaged as well. Bare, denuded grassy patches lay open to the skies, covered with the broken remains of the trees that had once grown there.

And not all the broken remains were of trees.

Rama choked back a cry as he looked down the length of the beach. The sand was covered with corpses as far as the eye could see. It was no less than the aftermath of a battle. Vanars and bears lay alongside, upon and beneath the carcasses of a hundred different varieties of sea creatures. Some were merely fish of different sizes, shapes and colours, others were beasts he had no name for, had never known existed. They were the source of the stench. Their putrefaction was far quicker and more advanced than that of the mammalian corpses. With the sun beating down on the denuded shore, they were decomposing visibly.

Rama staggered across the ravaged beach, seeking out any who might still be alive. All he saw were the dead, shattered, broken, torn-open bodies of his faithful followers. His soldiers. These vanars and bears had dedicated their every waking minute to his work, had committed their very lives to his cause. They had been willing to venture across the most feared place of all their legends—the great sea desert—to invade the most terrible place in all the known world: Lanka. They had been prepared to battle the demon races and face beings many times their size and strength, to wage war until they were all massacred, or until the other side yielded. They had chosen to live and die fighting for him. And now, instead of dying the deaths they deserved, as brave warriors on a battlefield, they had fallen before striking a single blow, struck down by a foe that had no soul, no motive, no cause.

It was not right.

He stood in the midst of that vast desolation, surrounded by more bodies than he could see at one glance, more death than he had seen before in his life, more casualties than were caused by most battles, and he knew that it was not right.

It was not right and he could not tolerate it.

‘Varuna.’

Lakshman almost dropped the stone he had been lifting off the body of a bear. The stone was one of several that had been separated from the bridge and washed ashore by the incoming tidal wave. He had not thought the bear could have survived such a weight falling upon it but he had seen the poor creature’s hind paws twitch several times, and had thought that perhaps he or she might still be alive but unable to call for help. So he and a handful of vanars and bears, all ragged and each one injured in some way, had pitted their strength together to raise the slab-like stone—only to find that the bear, poor thing, was quite dead, and the twitching had been caused by a sea creature that was in the pool of water in which the bear lay, thrashing in its last throes of life beneath the bear’s corpse. It was the third such rescue attempt Lakshman had participated in, and all three had turned out thus. He was just about to lower the stone to the ground again when Rama’s cry pierced the deathly still air. The vanar beside him cheekaed, and lost its grip on the stone. Lakshman’s back strained as the extra burden shifted to him.

A moment later, bent over and straining with all his might, he released his hold on the stone at last, stood upright, and turned. His keen eyes easily found Rama’s silhouette striding across the beach, backlit by a gloomy charcoal-grey sky. The air was still rent by the moans and whimpers of thousands of injured and dying creatures, and a veritable cloud of gulls was starting to collect overhead as well as on the fringes of the arc of destruction wrought by the tidal wave. The mindlessness of their cries, seeing the devastation below only in terms of their own selfish need for food, was a cruel requiem to the fallen dead. Lakshman made his way across the beach with grim purpose, his mood matched by the gloom that had fallen upon the world in the wake of the killing wave.

At the edge of the beach littered with countless corpses and the crawling bodies of grievously injured vanars and bears, Rama stood, staring out to sea, his profile windblown and dark, dark even against the stormy grey sky.

A corona of faintly blueish light seemed to shimmer around the outline of Rama's form, and Lakshman blinked, trying to clear his vision. When it persisted, he took it to be a trick of the erratic light. Rama's voice rose clear and strong, buoyed by a cold, relentless rage that Lakshman had not heard in his brother's voice for a long while.

'Varuna, lord of the ocean,' Rama called out, in a tone that was neither a shout nor a challenge, merely a command. 'Show yourself to me. I, Rama Chandra of Ayodhya, son of Dasaratha and grandson of Aja, of the line of Manu and Ikshwaku, going back to Surya Himself ... I command you, show yourself!'

Across the ravaged beach, and at the edges of the pathetically denuded land where thickets and groves had once stood, fallen vanars and bears began to stir. Still stunned by the disaster that had befallen them, still grieving for lost comrades and blood-kin, still reeling from the sheer scale of the calamity as well as its unexpectedness, nevertheless they all responded to the voice of their lord and leader. Perhaps some took comfort merely from knowing that Rama was alive and well, that he at least had survived the disaster. Others rallied their shaken morale around the unbowed strength of the mortal warrior.

All responded to the cold steel in Rama's voice, that tone that could command armies and devastate entire realms, for the myth of Rama was already greater than the reality, and day by day the legends of his deeds grew, embellished and enhanced with each repetition. Regaining their feet slowly, dragging injured limbs, shaking addled heads and gathering scattered wits, they shambled towards the mortal in whose service they had come here to the edge of the known world, to this place where death had decimated their beloved brethren without so much as a battle cry for warning. Shuffling and limping they came, gathering mutely around Rama, a funeral procession with no destination.

'Varuna,' Rama called, and this time Lakshman felt that the very sky responded, clouds overhead churning like curds in an earthen pot. Thunder growled somewhere far across the horizon, as if giants asleep beneath the ocean stirred uneasily at Rama's call. 'Show yourself!'

And still the ocean remained empty.

Rama raised his hands to the sky in the universal gesture of supplication.

'If Varuna will not hear me, then you must, O lord of Kailasha. Hear this plea of your servant and your devotee. I call upon you to mete out justice at this unholy act of cowardice. See for yourself, my lord Mahadev, what the ocean lord has wrought here upon this shore today. What destruction he has wreaked upon innocent lives. And at whose urging? Is this right, I ask? Is it meet that he be permitted to unleash such a heartless massacre on behalf of the lord of Lanka? He must pay for this act of transgression! He must pay for it by the loss of his very power itself!'

The sky boiled, clouds churning, and the very air around them all seemed to grow thick with fear. Lakshman stared at his brother in disbelief. Rama's aspect had turned so awful, he could barely look upon his own brother without blanching. There was an aura of power around Rama that was unmistakable now. That was no trick of the light, it was Brahman shakti itself manifesting itself. He had seen it often enough before to know it for certain. Nor was Rama's anger mere mortal rage; it was sacred fury. And the very elements were now responding to the righteousness of Rama's appeal.

Rama went on, his voice the voice of death itself, his tone as cold as a sword's blade dipped into a glacial pool.

'Once, the lady Anasuya granted me a bow,' he said, in a voice that seemed to carry for yojanas, by what means, Lakshman knew not. He listened, enraptured by the words, and by the force of Rama's will, speaking directly to the gods themselves. 'She gave me that great weapon that once belonged to the lord of Vaikuntha, great Vishnu. Use it as if it were your own, she said. And she granted me use of a single arrow as well. That missile that once belonged to Lord Shiva Himself. These weapons she gifted me, and told me to use them wisely in the service of dharma only, never for personal gain or revenge. Even when confronted with an army of fourteen thousand rakshasas in the wilds of Chitrakut, I did not use those weapons. I bade her take them back and keep them safe, so that I might not be tempted to use them for an unrighteous selfish cause.

‘But today, seeing the heinous misuse of his power by Varuna and the grievous suffering of my innocent vanar and bear brethren, I call upon Anasuya the Wise and Beautiful to grant me use of those weapons again. If Varuna has done wrong, and my cause now is just and righteous, then in the name of dharma, let me have the Bow of Vishnu and the Arrow of Shiva once again!’

He was answered by the twin forces of thunder and lightning. The one boomed deafeningly in the dusky sky, so as to make the assembled vanars and bears shudder and clap paws over their eyes and ears in fright. The other snaked down like a living serpent of energy, to strike at a point on the sandy beach mere yards before Rama’s feet. The impact blazed blindingly bright for an instant, searing Lakshman’s mind with an imprint of the whole scene, as if the image were burned into the backs of his eyes themselves. The sky boiled and churned, and all grew so dark that Lakshman had to strain to keep sight of Rama. He saw his brother reach up at the instant the lightning struck, as if he knew it would strike, and when the flash had burned its brightest and faded away, leaving Lakshman dazed and dazzled, Rama stood bearing in one hand a great ancient bow and in the other a single arrow that gleamed and reflected light in diamantine hues, even though there was no light upon this dusk-enshrouded beachfront.

Rama raised the bow and arrow to the sky. He chanted a famous Sanskrit shloka praising the devas. Those of the assembled armies, bedraggled and shaken though they were, who knew the shloka in question, chanted with him, their voices suffused with awe and wonder. Slowly, the fear that had struck them senseless was being replaced by a fury that seemed to Lakshman to match Rama’s own.

Then Rama took the bow and put the arrow to its string.

He directed the arrow out to sea.

Aiming it in the direction from which the killer wave had come.

‘Varuna does not heed my calls,’ he said. And his voice echoed the thunder itself now. ‘Varuna is a coward who strikes at innocent vanars and bears and then scuttles back to his deep watery bed to hide. Varuna has performed an unrighteous act and aided the lord of Lanka in executing a massacre that is against dharma itself. Therefore, I shall have no sympathy for him as I use these weapons to unleash the wrath of the devas upon his marine world.’

Rama turned to look towards where Lakshman stood. His eyes found his brother at once, despite the dullness of the light and the hordes standing around him. Again Lakshman thought he saw the blue light of Brahman shakti flash from Rama’s pupils; but it could not be so—the ability to channel the power of Brahman had been lost to Rama after the unleashing of the brahmastra at Mithila. And yet, Rama’s voice, form, his entire aspect, all blazed with the inner strength of divine shakti.

‘Lakshman! My brother. Watch as I use the weapons of Shiva and Vishnu to decimate the creatures of the ocean world just as their lord decimated our noble followers. Today I shall declare war upon this great ocean. I shall destroy all life within its waters, render those waters poisonous and uninhabitable. And after every creature has suffered and cried out in torment and died a terrible painful death, I shall cause those waters to dry up for ever. The ocean thinks that because I have respected his territory, because we have laboured painstakingly these past several days to build this bridge to span his vastness, that we are pathetic and puny. He mistakes our respect for weakness. Our patience for pacifism. You know how patient I have been. How I have sought peace rather than war. How I have used sweat and muscle and hard work rather than resort to the easy power of Brahman shakti or even use of godly weapons. You have been witness to my forbearance, Lakshman. Now bear witness to my justice.’

And Rama raised the bow and unleashed the arrow. At that very instant, the sky turned utterly black, as if a light had been snuffed out. In that preternatural darkness, the only thing left visible was that single arrow, a yard’s length of reed-thin wood blazing white as lightning. It rent the darkness like a needle piercing a finely woven black fabric, and Lakshman felt he could hear its passage across the void. The arrow rose, arcing, then fell far out to sea—or where the sea had been before the world had turned black. It fell into the void and there was a terrible tearing sound, as if the very fabric of the universe was being ripped open.

EIGHT

The void was ablaze.

The darkness that had extinguished the view of the ocean was replaced by the illumination of numerous fires ... countless fires.

Even though it had been no more than late afternoon when the tidal wave had struck, the sky was now pitch dark. Glancing up, Lakshman could see lightning webbing the cloud-enshrouded sky, like the flicking tongues of a hundred invisible serpents.

Below, in the place where a sunlit ocean had lain not long before, there was now a burning sea.

The armies of vanars and bears, reassembled to watch Rama wreak his ire upon the ocean lord, gasped with astonishment. They had never seen such shakti unleashed, such phenomena revealed. As Lakshman stared at the ocean, at the unnaturally shrouded and benighted sky, he realised that neither had he. Certainly, he had seen some amazing sights in the past fourteen years, but nothing quite like this.

The ocean was ablaze. Like some great city on a vast plain, torched by an invading army, some immeasurably vast metropolis sprawled across countless yojanas, the kingdom of the sea lord was burning in patches and pockets. Sea creatures threw themselves up out of the waters, seeking to escape the supernatural fire that scorched and charred them below, only to fall back helplessly, screaming their exotic cries and wails. Enormous sea elephants, frenzied white jagged-toothed predators, rainbow-hued fish of varied sizes, sea serpents, fleshy tentacled creatures, orange-shelled crustaceans with claws and feelers, all thrashed and churned in agony, caught in the many pockets of divine fire that blazed phosphorescently, turning the grey-blue ocean white as salt where it worked its cruel magic. He saw one great charcoal-grey beast rise up, water pluming from a spout-hole on the top of its head, wailing its distress. Then it fell back and was engulfed by a pocket of greedy white flame.

Lakshman looked around in disbelief, sweeping the sea from end to end, turning almost fully to either side to take in the sheer scale of the spectacle unfolding before him. For as far as his eyes could see, from one extreme to the other, from the point nearest the shore to the farthest line of the horizon, the ocean was afire.

Could all this be the work of one arrow? A single stick of wood?

But of course.

It was the Arrow of Shiva. Fired from the Bow of Vishnu.

These were dev-astras. Weapons of the gods. Once, he had been given the power to work such weapons too. He had felt the unspeakable potency of their unleashing, the throbbing in every cell and fibre of his being, the sheer intimacy that he shared with the force of existence itself when he unleashed those astras. He had felt as if he could accomplish anything, destroy anyone, wreak any vengeance imaginable.

He believed that the sight before his eyes was no illusion. It was the wrath of the devas unleashed upon the ocean as punishment for misusing its power in the service of the lord of Lanka.

‘Varuna!’ Rama called again, and this time his voice was so terrible, even his own armies shrank away from him. ‘For the last time, show yourself. Or reap the harvest of your misdeed!’

And he raised the Arrow of Shiva once more to the Bow, directing it at the tormented ocean. For no matter how many times it was fired, the arrow would always reappear magically in the sender’s hand in an instant. This Lakshman knew without being told, for it was the way of such dev-astras to be eternally replenished.

Rama pulled back upon the Arrow, stretching the cord of the Bow to its limit. Even from where he stood, several yards distant, Lakshman could feel the shakti of the Bow vibrating in the air. The energy winding up, thrumming with power, preparing to unleash another miasma of destruction. He looked out upon the blazing ocean and the torment of the sea denizens and almost felt sympathy for their plight. If a single loosing of the celestial arrow could wreak such havoc, what would a second loosing accomplish? Or three, or four, or more? Truly, it would be as Rama had threatened: the ocean world itself would be rendered desolate and devastated, uninhabitable for aeons to come.

At the very last instant before Rama was about to loose the Arrow a second time, a great commotion occurred far out to sea. The waters boiled and seethed, great gouts exploding and splashing this way and that. The dying creatures around that spot thrashed and struggled pitifully to leave the region.

Then, with an immense rending sound, as if a mountain was being torn apart rather than an ocean split, a great mass rose up out of the ocean waters.

It rose and rose, filling the benighted sky with its hulking shape. Then stopped rising, and stood, shaking.

Water cascaded from its form, splashing back into the sea. There were patches where it was afire too, white flames licking greedily at its upper torso and limbs, for they could not be called a chest and arms. Great sea serpents, their undulating lengths burnished gold, coiled around the being's limbs and body, hissing and screaming, for they too were tormented by the celestial flames ignited by Shiva's Arrow. The body of the sea lord shimmered and shone with dazzling intensity, like a rainbow that could be seen and yet not seen wholly. It was smooth as an emerald and as translucent. It seemed to be clad in a variety of weeds such as might be found at the bottom of a river or ocean, except that they were brackish red rather than mulchy green. A colourful vine adorned its upper torso, like a garland of flowers. But the vine-garland moved, and Lakshman saw that it was also a variety of sea serpent, fat and thick with age and excess, like a favoured pet. Its multiple eyes glimmered like glowing coals in a bed of mud.

The sea lord himself was somewhat masculine in aspect, but Lakshman felt instinctively that to attribute mortal masculinity— or femininity—to such a being was impossible. It was more anima than creature. A being composed more of water and weed than blood and flesh. Its aspect was terrible to behold, like that of any deva manifesting itself. The assembled vanars and bears on the shore stared up, swaying slowly like drunken beings, mesmerised by the sight. They would have fled had it not been their own lord who had called upon the ocean lord to manifest itself.

Lakshman looked towards Rama and saw that he still held the Arrow strung in the Bow, the cord as tightly wound. Only a very faint tremor in Rama's shoulder and arm muscles betrayed the strain of holding that great weapon for so many moments. Lakshman could hardly imagine the strength involved in holding the cord of such a bow for more than a fraction of a second. And still Rama held it, pointing it directly at the top of the form of the being that stood towering above him in the blazing ocean.

‘Varuna. So you deign to make yourself manifest at last. Speak then. Or suffer the effect of a second assault from this celestial arrow.’

The sea lord moved forward in such a manner that Lakshman almost shouted out to warn Rama. Water sloshed before its shell-encrusted lower limbs. Lakshman opened his mouth to shout a warning, then watched in amazement as the sea lord bowed the top of his head and joined two of his many serpentine limbs in a manner that almost resembled a namaskaram. When he spoke, his voice was the voice of a thousand sea elephants, wailing and moaning and trumpeting their distress; it was the voice of water itself, gurgling and splashing and thundering like waves upon a rocky shore.

‘Rama,’ he said. ‘I am but a force of nature. Like the sky, the earth, the wind ... like fire. I am water itself made manifest. And I too have my own nature. Just as fire will burn flesh that is put into it, so also must I embrace and engulf any thing that enters my body, swallowing it whole and digesting it slowly, more slowly than fire, yet much faster than earth, or wind, or sky.’

Rama lowered the Bow slightly, loosening his grip upon the cord. Yet, Lakshman noted, he did not put the Bow down, or release the Arrow from the cord yet. He kept it lowered by his side, ready to be deployed again at a moment's notice.

‘Varuna,’ Rama said quietly, though that quiet tone somehow carried to the farthest vanar or bear in the great throng behind him. ‘Do not justify your misdeeds as part of your nature. What you did earlier, when you unleashed that tidal wave of destruction upon my followers, that was no force of nature. It was the work of asura sorcery. You obeyed the diktat of Ravana, lord of Lanka, and in doing so you have brought my wrath upon yourself. You have already seen what I can accomplish with the loosing of this arrow but a single time. Tell me one reason why I should not unleash it again, and yet again, and again, until I have destroyed every last vestige of life in your vast holdings. Tell me why I should not wipe out the ocean itself from this world?’

Something thrashed in the ocean behind Varuna. Lakshman looked and made out an appendage like the fins that served fish as tails and feet both. Varuna’s upper body trembled as well, and the serpents entwined around the sea lord’s body writhed and hissed desperately. Even the great ancient one coiled around Varuna’s neck raised its thick head slowly, with great effort, and gazed upon Rama with its myriad eyes. Lakshman thought he could even guess what that ancient being must be thinking: Who is this mortal who threatens my lord himself with extinction? What favour does he have with the devas that he possesses the shakti to unleash such destruction?

Almost as if sensing Lakshman’s thoughts, the ancient one turned its head slightly, looking at him now. He felt a force probe his mind, alien tendrils of energy penetrating to his innermost thoughts. It was no less intrusive than if a real flesh-and-blood sea serpent had coiled its slippery length around his limbs and bared its venomous fangs at his face. He could almost smell the breath of the ancient serpent upon his face, the stench of the deepest oceans, of rotten fish that it took a thousand years to digest, of things he had no name for, nor words to describe.

Who? asked the ancient one directly to his mind. Just that one question, blindly probing, demanding with the arrogance of one whose power and wisdom were so great, it had never needed to explain itself. WHO?

Rama, he heard himself respond defiantly, in the caverns of his mind. He is Rama, dharma incarnate. And I am his brother Lakshmana. Underestimate us at your own peril.

He felt the ancient one observe him for an instant more, then turn its head again to look at Rama once again. Lakshman sensed the passing of some wordless communication between it and Varuna. After a moment, when the sea lord spoke again, he sounded chastised.

‘Rama, what you say is true. In your present state, you are omniscient. There is no use my denying anything to you. I did indeed obey the command of the lord of Lanka and executed his will. I sent the wave to destroy your soldiers and your bridge. But I had no choice. I was powerless to disobey the king of rakshasas. For in another age, he invaded the realms of the devas and defeated them in open battle. His asura armies wreaked unspeakable horrors upon the devas and the other denizens of the heavenly realms. They were prepared to offer him anything to rid themselves of his foul presence. In return for leaving those realms, he secured several boons, including the services of many devas themselves. My service to him was part of that war-bond. When he commanded me, I had no choice but to fulfil his desire. I see now that I did wrong, that I have caused grievous harm to your people, and to your bridge, which now lies broken. I assure you, now that my bond to Ravana is fulfilled, he has no more power over me. I shall not cause another wave to rise. I will take no more steps to cause you harm.’

Rama laughed shortly. Lakshman frowned. He had heard that very laugh before, when Rama had confronted the giantess Tataka in the wilds of Bhayanak-van, fourteen years ago. But Rama had been infused with the power of the maha-mantras Bala and Atibala then, an indestructible machine driven by the universal force of Brahman shakti. How could he have regained that shakti?

‘You will not dare harm me now, Varuna. For I wield the weapons of Vishnu and Shiva that can cause the destruction of your entire realm and all species that dwell within it. Do not offer me irrelevant assurances. Tell me instead, why should I not punish you for your heinous massacre of my innocent followers? Why should I stay my hand? Answer me well, and wisely, lord of the seas, or you will soon have no power to form words at all!’

And Rama raised the bow once again, aiming it directly at Varuna himself.

Lakshman saw the ancient serpent's myriad eyes gleam darkly, as it stared at the shocking impudence of this mortal. Varuna himself took a step back, the ocean sloshing like water in an arghya bowl. His followers screamed and wailed and thrashed, seeking to swim away from him, to distance themselves from the destruction that would certainly come if Rama loosed the arrow a second time.

'Pray hear my plea,' Varuna said, and its watery voice trembled audibly. 'Do not loose your arrow upon me, good Rama. I am repentant for my transgression. I have committed great wrong by taking the lives of your followers and destroying your bridge.'

'Mere apologies will not restore their lives, nor rebuild my bridge!' Rama shouted. Thunder echoed him, crashing in the skies above. Lightning flashed, striking the body of the ocean lord in three separate spots. Small fires burst out at each of the three places; one stroke of lightning cut a serpent in half, and both halves fell writhing, splashing into the ocean. 'You must do better than that, Ocean Lord! You must pay the price for your mistake!'

'Rama,' Varuna pleaded. 'I beseech you. Do not loose your arrow. It will destroy all ocean life on this mortal realm. It will end the lineage of countless species for all time. The very future of this realm will be altered, for the oceans are integral to the survival and sustenance of the realm itself, and of the other species that inhabit it, including your own mortal fellows.'

'You did not care how many vanars or bears or mortals you killed when you obeyed Ravana's order and unleashed your wave,' Rama replied. 'Where was your sympathy for living things then, Varuna? Why should you expect me to care now?'

'Wait, Rama!' Varuna cried. 'Wait but a moment! I will make amends for my wrongdoing. I will atone for it by aiding you in your mission. I have offended you grievously by acting on behalf of the lord of Lanka. I did so under duress and unwillingly. Now I will act on your behalf and do ten times more for you than I did for him. I will be as your servant, and serve you loyally, and do your bidding. I will do so joyously and willingly. My powers are great. Use them. Use them to undo the destruction wrought by Ravana's diktat to me. Use the very same powers against him!'

At these words, Rama cocked his head slowly to one side, deliberating. The armies of vanars and bears waited for his answer with bated breath. The ocean lord waited. The denizens of the sea waited. The sky, the clouds, the wind, the earth, all waited.

After a long moment, Rama lowered the Bow and released the Arrow from the cord.

NINE

Hanuman regained consciousness to find himself lying on an immense grey bed. The sun was shining in the sky again, wisps of clouds drifted lazily overhead, and high above, the silhouette of a flock of birds resembled the shape of a mountain peak turned sideways. He sat up, and found himself reduced to his normal vanar size. He looked around, trying to get his bearings. How long had he been unconscious? Where was he now? What had happened when the wave struck? Rama! Lakshman! His lords Sugreeva and Angad!

~be calm land-being your friends are safe and well~

He started, unable to discern what being had spoken to him and by what means. The words seemed to enter into his mind directly without being uttered as sounds to be captured by his organs of hearing. Yet he did not feel alarmed, for the 'voice', if it could be called that, seemed benign and benevolent, much like a wise, ancient silver-back elder of his own race.

~I am called greyback and it is upon my back that you are resting~

He looked down. And realised that the immense grey raft-like thing he was floating upon was no raft or shelf of rock, but a living being. He recalled the great sea elephants he had seen in the ocean, spouting high plumes of water and calling out to each other in strange high-pitched tones. This was one of them, then. Still, he was cautious and suspicious. The lord of asuras had many minions, and they could assume many forms and avatars.

‘Where am I? Where is my lord Rama, and all my comrades?’

~you will see them very soon ~at the great Rama Chandra’s command
~my lord Varuna asked me to bear you aloft and keep you here in the event that Ravana attempts another assault upon your people ~Rama wishes you to remain here until he orders otherwise~

At the mention of Rama, Hanuman allowed himself to relax somewhat.
There was something in the greyback’s tone that made him want to believe the sea beast’s mindvoice.

‘Then it was Ravana who unleashed the wave upon us?’ Hanuman asked angrily, clenching his fists and baring his teeth. ‘The craven. To use asura shakti to kill from afar instead of daring to face my lord in person. Only a coward would wreak havoc thus, without staining his hands with the blood of his foes.’

~indeed ~and for this same reason your lord Rama was infuriated beyond measure ~he resorted to celestial weaponry and was about to wreak havoc upon the oceans as chastisement for killing so many of his followers~

Hanuman felt the great greybacked sea being shudder, its entire body rippling as it trembled in fear of Rama’s wrath. He felt his own heart shudder as well, not in fear of Rama but in empathy for his fellows.
Killing so many ... ‘My people are in distress, then,’ he cried aloud. ‘They are in need of my help. I must go to their aid at once.’

~ease your heart my friend ~I understand your pain ~ but there is nothing you can do now~

And in the same fashion, speaking directly to his mind, the ocean being explained to him all that had transpired since the arrival of the devastating wave.

Hanuman’s heart ached to think of all those fallen comrades. How could he have lain unconscious when his fellows needed his help? He felt wretched and would have expanded himself and leaped off the greyback to fly back to the mainland shore at that very instant. But the wise sea creature reassured him that his efforts had saved countless lives, and after taking the brunt of the great wave on his own person, it had been necessary for him to rest and recover his strength. Now there was no need for him to fly to the shore.

‘But my lord will have need of me,’ he protested. ‘I am well enough now, I must go to Rama at once, and do what I can to repair the broken bridge. We have lost precious time already, and must redouble our efforts if we are to reach Lanka and avenge my lady Sita’s dishonour.’

~my brave and big-hearted friend~go then~fly up as high as you will and see for yourself ~see for yourself what your lord Rama has achieved through showing mercy to Lord Varuna and us ocean denizens ~see how we are serving your lord’s purpose in exchange for his sparing our lives and the ocean world~

Hanuman needed no further encouragement. He took a deep breath and expanded himself. As he grew, he crouched down and used the back of the sea creature to launch himself up into the air. Had he waited too long and grown too large, he feared that he might injure the greyback with his weight and force. Even so, he felt the greyback’s immense body dip briefly beneath the surface and the ocean waters slosh noisily in his wake, then he was aloft and rising rapidly, up past the clouds, the highflying flocks of birds—who squawked and broke their neat formation to disperse, protesting angrily—until he was high enough to see for yojanas in every direction. He looked in the direction of the mainland, heart clenching at what he might witness.

And he saw an amazing sight.

Rama’s bridge was indeed broken. Dislocated by the tsunami wave, the great rocks that he and his compatriots had laboured so long and hard, and at such terrible cost, to drag and drop into place, were dispersed, fallen into the ocean, tumbled higgledly-piggledly here and there. It would be impossible for the vanars and bears to dive into the water and raise them up again. They would have had to start anew, bringing new boulders, and rebuilding the bridge almost from the start. It would be a daunting, near impossible task.

But there was no need to do so.

For a new bridge had been constructed. A bridge of greybacks like the one who had borne Hanuman aloft just now, lined up in the ocean from the mainland shore all the way up to the spot where Hanuman's greyback was still floating and spouting water from the breathing hole in its head, and beyond, all the way to Lanka. Most were submerged beneath the surface of the water, waiting to be told to rise. But from his high vantage point in the sky, wafted by a gentle sea breeze, the line of greybeings looked like a great grey bridge across the ocean, as solid as any bridge of rock or wood. From time to time, one of them would raise his or her head slightly and spout a fountain of water high into the air, issuing a deep, reverberating call that was answered by many other greybacks along the long line.

It was an astonishing, beautiful sight.

As he hovered, marvelling at this miracle of nature, Hanuman heard the greybeing on whose back he had been resting, issue a high tone almost too intense for mortal ears to catch. To his vanar ears, familiar only with creatures of the jungle and the plains, the sound resembled the lowing of an elephant leader to its tribe. In answer, the long line of greybacks lowed back. Somehow, he could follow the broad gist of their communication, if not every subtle nuance. There were cows and bulls among them too, he understood then, just like among warm-blooded creatures on land, there were even young ones and elderly ones, although the eldest were of an age far greater than any vanar could ever hope to live ... And the eldest, wisest, and greatest of them all was the cow who had held him aloft, and from the tone of their response, he could tell that the great line of greybacks revered her and obeyed her every wish. She was the leader of the ocean tribe, then.

On the great matriarch's order, the entire line of greybacks elevated themselves out of the water, just high enough to provide a natural bridge some two yards above the level of the ocean, enough to provide a platform for vanars and bears and his lords to walk upon and cross as safely and comfortably—nay, much more safely and comfortably, for unlike rocks, the backs of these greybeings were smooth and flat— creating a perfect natural bridge all the way to Lanka.

Lakshman watched as the vanar forces lined up in an orderly fashion, their usual vanar exuberance tempered somewhat by the ravages of the tidal wave and the loss of their fellows. Angad and the generals of the various armies were organising them into a queue of two abreast, for though the bridge of greybacks was wide and flat enough to make crossing easy, it was not wide enough for the armies to simply race across pell-mell, as they were clearly keen to do in their newfound anger. The bear chiefs were grunting and squealing at their forces to get them to form a similar queue.

A row of northern bears with their characteristic light-hued fur, almost silvery white in the sunlight, shambled to the fore, jostling past their fellow bears to forcibly make place for a third row, even though they knew quite well that the command had called for only two bears and two vanars to cross at one time. Lakshman paused and succinctly but grimly spelled out the likely consequences of disobedience to the chief of the northern bears. The bear glowered down at Lakshman, his snarling jaws dripping threads of spittle, then turned and raised his head, issuing great grunting commands to his tribe-fellows. With lowing moans of protest they all turned and shuffled after him to the back of the long line, stretching now far beyond the ragged line of debris that marked where the treeline had stood before the wave struck.

Lakshman intervened in one or two other similar instances where vanars or bears who had lost companions to the killer wave were somewhat overeager to cross and have first strike at the rakshasa hordes, but on neither occasion did he have to use force. Simmering though their rage was at the unfair misuse of natural elements to strike down unsuspecting warriors, they knew better than to transfer that rage to the very mortal leaders who would grant them the revenge they now sought. After a few more carefully spoken stern commands and crisp orders passed down the lines, the vanars and bears subsided into an orderly routine, stepping down the beach in pairs. Lakshman turned and noted that the first line of four soldiers—two vanars and two bears abreast—was at the point where the first greyback floated in the water, waiting. The ocean lord had stilled the waves nearest to the shore to allow the armies to board the bridge without mishap. Although Varuna was no longer in sight—Lakshman suspected that the deva could not maintain that physical form for long—his presence was palpable, keeping the elements of the sea and its environs tightly leashed and wholly benign towards Rama's forces.

Rama.

Lakshman turned and sought out his brother. There he was, at the high northern end of the beach, conferring with Jambavan and Sugreeva and the other elder bears and vanars. His war council. He had asked Lakshman to join them too but Lakshman had answered gruffly that he would first oversee the preparations for the crossing. Rama had nodded without questioning him further, but Lakshman had seen him glance briefly in his direction as he walked away, his eyes seeing all, noting everything. Nothing escaped Rama's attention. Not even at a time like this. Certainly not the barely restrained resentment his brother was harbouring.

Lakshman clenched both his fists, then released them along with an exhalation of breath, trying to rid himself of that very resentment. It was futile. He would have to have words with Rama. He needed to know certain things, to hear the answers to the questions that were eating him alive. He knew that this was not the time to pose these questions, to demand Rama's attention for even a brief moment, but he also knew that he could not concentrate on his duties until he had confronted his brother and received those answers to his fullest satisfaction.

Better then to do it now and get it over with.

He walked towards the knoll upon which Rama and his councillors were gathered. They were looking at the sand, where one of the vanar generals had been drawing lines and arrows to indicate strategy. It was Satabali. The elder vanar was crouched on the sand, pointing with a stick at various points on a crude map of what could only be Lanka, or a rough indication of what they presumed to be the island-kingdom's layout. The other vanar generals, Nila, Susena and Vinata, crouched around the map while Angad stood by with a stick of his own and a frown marring his golden furred features. Rama, Sugreeva and Jambavan stood facing the map, listening carefully. Kambunara and the other bear generals were standing behind and around them, tall enough to be able to see over the heads of the vanars easily.

Lakshman spared the map a glance, walking around the knot of vanars and bears. He listened to Satabali's laboriously detailed war plan as he walked. It was a good plan, not unlike classic siege-breaking strategies that mortals also used, and which Lakshman and his brothers had studied back in Ayodhya during the military part of their education. But Lakshman could easily see the flaw in the plan, and knew that Rama saw it too; indeed, Rama must have seen the flaw within moments of Satabali starting to expound it, yet he had listened these past moments and was listening still, patiently and with evident interest. Lakshman did not understand how Rama could be so patient with what was clearly an irrelevant course of action. There was no point in discussing a siege-breaking strategy because there would be no siege. He restrained the urge to interrupt the elderly vanar's droning, meticulous explanation, and stopped at the far end of the circle from Rama.

Now he could look across the sand-map and see Rama directly, face-to-face.

Rama continued to listen intently to Satabali's explanation. Finally, the general wound down and his flow of words petered out. He stood erect, the stick clutched by his side, like the military veteran he was, awaiting his commander's response to his suggestions.

Rama spoke a few well-chosen words of praise and admiration for the plan, and for Satabali's astuteness in applying it to the current scenario. He also thanked the other vanar and bear generals for laying out their excellent suggestions, and promised that he would take all their ideas into consideration when planning the actual assault on Lanka. He finished by saying, 'We shall make our final decision once we are on the far side of the ocean and have reviewed the lie of the land.'

The generals nodded approvingly and Rama turned his attention to Lakshman. Although Lakshman knew that Rama had been aware of him from the very instant he had stepped into his field of view, if not before, it was only now that Rama permitted himself to raise his eyes and look directly at him. 'And now, my brother would have words with me. If you will grant us a few moments in private ...'

‘We shall go and prepare for the crossing, Lord Rama. But we shall await your command to begin,’ Sugreeva said. The vanar king looked wan and weary, his injuries from the wave no doubt adding to his age and ailing health. Still, he bore himself proudly as he walked stiffly with his son and the others towards the quadruple lines snaking up the beach.

Lakshman walked around the sand-map slowly, keeping his eyes on the sketch of Lanka. ‘I apologise if I am distracting you at this crucial time, Rama,’ he said softly.

Rama shook his head. ‘You have nothing to apologise for. You are my brother. We command this army, this campaign, together. Whatever you have to say is not a distraction, it is a necessity. Speak your mind, Lakshman, my brother.’

Lakshman stopped and looked up at Rama. Suddenly, without warning, the anger he had been suppressing the past several hours flared into flame. He fought to restrain it, but it was hard enough not to raise his voice and howl his anguish. When at last he spoke, his voice was pitched evenly, just loud enough to be heard above the inevitable background sound of a million-plus vanars and bears jostling and preparing for the great crossing. But he could hear the pain and confusion in his tone, and knew that Rama heard every nuance as well.

‘Why, Rama?’ he asked. ‘Why did you do it? Why did you betray Sita and me and yourself? Why did you deceive us all these years?’

TEN

Rama regarded Lakshman calmly. He had expected this very outburst from his brother. It was testimony to Lakshman’s age and maturity that he had waited this long to broach the topic. Now, he could wait no longer. It would do no good to suggest to him, however gently, that they should speak of this later, that there was a great deal of arduous work ahead, or that it would do no good for the vanars and bears to see their mortal devas—for, like it or not, they now regarded himself and Lakshman as nothing less than demigods or avatars —bickering thus. But he knew his brother well enough to know that Lakshman could not be persuaded to wait. Best to deal with this quickly and be done with it.

‘Lakshman,’ he said gently, ‘I understand your ire. You wonder how I was able to summon the shakti to call up Varunadeva, and challenge him with annihilation. That is what troubles you, is it not? How did I come by such power? For after unleashing the brahm-astra at Mithila, to repel the asura armies of Ravana, both you and I were divested of the maha-shakti of Bala and Atibala which Brahmarishi Vishwamitra had infused into us, as well as the several dev-astras he imparted to us. Indeed, we were denuded of all Brahman shakti forever. For that was the heavy price we had to pay for unleashing the ultimate weapon of all, the weapon of mighty Brahma the Creator Himself. So how was it that today, long years after that divestment at Mithila, I was able to summon up such shakti as would compel the lord of the oceans himself to take physical form and show himself to me, and enable me to threaten his vastness with destruction on a scale so terrible that it would be beyond even his divine powers to prevent? This is the question that burns within your breast, is it not? How was it that I was able to summon up such great power at will today, when Brahmarishi Vishwamitra said quite explicitly that we would not be able to do so for the rest of our mortal lives?’

Lakshman’s face, drawn and angular from years of hard forest living, stared back at him with blazing eyes. ‘Yes, Rama. That is the first question that I wish to hear answered: How? How did you come by such immense shakti?’

Rama was about to answer, when Lakshman held up his hand.

‘No, brother.’ He shook his head grimly. ‘Do not speak just yet. For I fear that once your words flow, they will sweep away all my objections the way the Sarayu in spate carries away a sapling torn from its roots. Allow me to speak a few moments longer. You have already spoken my question for me. Now, allow me, if you will, to attempt to voice your answer.’

Rama inclined his head in acquiescence.

Lakshman went on. ‘The answer that I propose, for I have thought this over carefully these past hours as the ocean lord’s great greybacks arranged themselves to form the bridge that awaits our armies ... the answer I propose to my own question is itself a question. Bear with me as I speak my thoughts aloud, for I have not your skill at wordcraft, my older and wiser brother.' He paused, staring out at the horizon for a moment before going on. 'At first, when I saw you unleash such great power, not just shakti but maha shakti, I was dumbstruck. I could not believe my eyes. Then, when I saw you wield that celestial bow and arrow, I recalled their shape and form at once.'

Rama nodded. Weaponry had always been Lakshman's strong point; even as a youth, he had been able to point out subtle differences in weapon-crafting and gauge the possible effect those alterations could make to the eventual deployment. And the celestial bow and arrow he spoke of were truly distinctive—their like did not exist anywhere else in the universe. Rama could imagine the shock that Lakshman must have felt on seeing Rama wield those great weapons unexpectedly.

Lakshman turned to look at him, his eyes penetrating, accusing. 'And I knew at once where I had seen those weapons before. Which raised the question in my mind ... nay, not a question, but a conjecture, a theory ... Could it be possible, my brother—and correct me if I err—could it be possible that you have been in possession of this maha-shakti all along? That it was in fact given to you by the sage Anasuya fourteen long years ago, in the wilderness of Chitrakut? At the very beginning of our exile, when we encountered her in the guise of an old low-caste woman and you gladly shared her half-bitten berries with her, unwittingly earning her love and admiration and passing the test she had devised to judge you by? Could it be that the gifts she rendered unto you as a reward for your passing her test, that celestially endowed Bow of Vishnu and the Arrow of Shiva, those weapons which you then claimed to have returned to her, and which you refused to use against the hordes of rakshasas in Chitrakut who were hell-bent on destroying us to avenge the alleged humiliation we inflicted upon their sister Supanakha the seductress ... could it be that you never truly returned those weapons at all? That they remained with you all this while, invisible, suspended in the celestial realm beyond the vision or reach of any physical being yet accessible to you at any instant through a mere exertion of your will? That these weapons, which all these assembled armies,' sweeping his arm to take in the vanars and bears lined up for miles along the shoreline, ‘and I saw you use but a few hours ago, these weapons of divine shakti, were within your reach all these years?’

Rama knew that the more he resisted Lakshman’s anger, the more he would fuel it, just as a strong wind only whips a forest fire into greater ferocity. So he replied quietly, simply, ‘Yes. Everything you say is true.’

Lakshman stared at him a moment longer. Then he turned away and looked up at the sky, then out to sea, then down at the sea. He started to turn away, as if he would walk off down the length of the beach, then stopped and turned back. He shook his head, in bewilderment and in the sorrow of perceived betrayal—for Rama could see that Lakshman took this to be a betrayal of sorts, a betrayal of the close bond that existed between them, of the immutable trust they had for each other. When he spoke, his voice had no anger in it any more, only sorrow and hurt. ‘Why, Rama? Why did you not confide in me back at Chitrakut? Why did you keep this a secret from me for so many years? All those battles and conflicts, all those endless days and nights spent crawling around on our bellies in the dank wilderness, watching our fellows slaughtered by hideous fiends, never knowing a moment’s rest, a night’s sleep, a day’s peace, watching children—mere babes, some—die needlessly, uselessly ... Why? We could have annihilated the rakshasas ... wiped them out, and passed the years of our exile in lazy indolence.’ A spark of memory flashed in his eyes, causing him to raise his voice slightly, angrily. ‘We could have saved Sita! She would not be in Ravana’s clutches today. Nor would we have had to raise this army and suffer this new set of tortuous challenges, building a bridge, crossing the ocean, waging war with the entire rakshasa race. We would still be in peaceful Panchvati, passing the last of our days in blissful harmony with the creatures of the forest, and in a few weeks, days barely now, we would be on our way home to Ayodhya. None of this needed to have happened. It could all have been prevented. You had the power, Rama. You had it in the palm of your hands. You possessed such great, immense maha-shakti, and yet you concealed it from me. From Sita, even. From everyone. And instead of sparing us all that fighting, those many battles, and now, this war that lies ahead, you chose to keep this a secret. Why, Rama? Why did you let us undergo all this suffering when it could have been prevented?’

Rama's heart ached to see his brother's anguish. He wanted to embrace Lakshman, to put his heart against his heart and calm his anger, soothe his pain. He wanted to do as he had done when they were little children, striplings, and he would simply hug Lakshman and hold him until his tears ceased, when words had not been needed to explain things, and their eyes had voiced the feelings that language could never transport. But such was the burden of adulthood, of maturity, that he was compelled to attempt to use that very inconsistent mode of communication to convey his reasons to Lakshman, to put those inexpressible emotions into clumsy words, and try to convey a lifetime of love in a few quick utterances of sounds and pauses. Language was not invented to convey such things, but still, language was the only mode he could use.

'Brother,' he said softly, 'you know that I love you more than life itself. You are not merely my half-brother but my soul-brother, half-moon to my own half-moon, without whom I am no more complete than day can be complete without the sun, nor night without the stars. I would sooner hurt myself than hurt you.'

Lakshman looked at him, tears welling up in his eyes, yet none spilling. He exhaled and said, sadly, 'And yet you did hurt me. You lied to me. You betrayed me.'

'No! I never lied. I told you something that day in Chitrakut, fourteen years ago, at the river, when we were making our stand together against the hordes who were seeking to cross, led by Khara and Dushana at the time, if you recall.'

Lakshman snorted. 'Of course I recall. I recall it by the scars on my body, and by the scars on your own self. I recall it because had Ratnakara and the other bandits and outlaws not come when they did, we would have been overwhelmed by the sheer numbers of the enemy. And now I shall recall it always as the fight we fought even though we did not need to, but were compelled to because you deceived me, by not using your celestial gifts, and by lying to me that you did not have them any more.'

'Then you must recall that I did not lie to you, Lakshman. I told you then that those weapons were given to me strictly for use in enforcing dharma. Not for personal protection or whim. I told you these things then. Perhaps

I did not emphasise that as and when the day came that I was called upon to enforce dharma, those weapons would be made available to me again ...

‘In that conflict, we were weaponless—I could no more resort to these weapons for that battle, or any of the battles in the wilderness during our years of exile, than I could summon the armies of the Kosala nation to aid us. Surely you understand that?’

‘I understand that you had access to a means that could have saved untold bloodshed, loss of life and suffering. Yet you chose not to resort to those means.’

‘For the sake of dharma, I could not!’ Rama forced his voice to remain even, difficult though it was. ‘That was a personal fight for personal reasons. You and I attacked Supanakha and mutilated her. For a rakshasi of her breed, it was a greater humiliation than death itself. She called upon her brethren to avenge her humiliation. There was no law of dharma to defend or uphold. It was merely a disagreement between two parties acting for their own selfish reasons.’

‘Selfish? Personal? If that was selfish and personal, then what made today’s display an act of dharma? If you could not use it to defend us against the hordes in Chitrakut and Janasthana, then why did you use it today?’

‘Because it was not to protect myself or my loved ones. It was to protect these hundreds of thousands of innocent vanars and bears, to defend them against a force too great for them to face and survive. Varuna-deva violated dharma by using his immense shakti to attack these innocents. Had he only sunk the bridge, perhaps it would have been acceptable. But by taking innocent lives ... Why do you shake your head, Lakshman? Do you not see the point I am trying to make?’

‘How is it dharma to protect these vanars and bears ... these innocent vanars and bears who have come knowingly and wilfully to wage war upon the rakshasa race ... but not dharma to protect those innocent outlaws who stood by us at Janasthana and died fighting the same race of rakshasas?’

Rama sighed. ‘Because the cause these armies are assembled here to fight today is a struggle to uphold dharma, whereas our cause back in Janasthana was merely our personal survival.’

Lakshman shook his head. ‘I do not follow you, Rama. If we are upholders of dharma, if we and our followers were soldiers of dharma, then even our personal survival is righteous under dharma, is it not?’

Rama said slowly, ‘It is our duty to defend dharma. It is not dharma’s task to defend us.’ He added sadly, ‘I agree, it is a hard bargain. But it is the one we swore to uphold from the moment we were born Kshatriyas.’

Lakshman was silent a long moment. He looked out to sea, the wind rippling his matted hair, loosed from its usual knotted pile and set free by his exertions after the striking of the wave. A number of cuts and bruises marked where he had been scored or scraped, some crusted with dried blood. His face was as stony as the statue of Manu the Lawmaker, forebear of the Ikshwaku dynasty, back in the great hall at Ayodhya. Some day, Rama thought, his likeness would be carved into a statue as well, and placed among those effigies of their ancestors. He would ask the stonecarver to attempt to capture this expression, this look, of great strength, and great frustration. For that was Lakshman: a man compelled to leave his wife, his mother, his kingdom, everything he loved and possessed, and to go into exile for fourteen long, hard years in the wilderness, and to fight endless wars against hideous beasts. This was the life he had endured for his brother’s sake. And yet, Rama had had to artfully conceal from him all this while the truth about the celestial weapons, for had Lakshman known that he still possessed them, he would have demanded that Rama use them—nay, beseeched him, even. And it would have torn Rama’s heart to refuse him. As it tore his heart now, to see Lakshman accept even this revelation that his brother had kept this great secret from him for nigh on fourteen years, for Lakshman had accepted it now, he saw, accepted and absorbed it, and was preparing himself to continue being the brother he always was: loyal, and unshakeable as a rock.

Lakshman turned to him at last, his eyes reflecting the cold, glacial depths of the Sarayu in winter, when great spears of ice floated downriver from the Himalayan heights and gnashed and crashed their way past the rolling hills around Ayodhya. He folded his hands and inclined his head to Rama. ‘Rama, you did as you saw fit. You upheld dharma, as you always do. How can I find fault with you when you did nothing wrong? I apologise for questioning your motives. Please forgive my impudence. I shall go and see to the crossing and await your further orders.’

And without another word, he turned and began walking down to the shoreline, to where the ranks of vanars and bears were waiting impatiently.

Rama started to call out to him. He heard the word ‘Lakshman’ escape his lips once, only to be torn away by the wind that had sprung up. But Lakshman kept walking. And Rama held his silence. He waited a moment or two, willing the cry in his heart’s cave to quiet itself. Then he began walking down to the head of the lines, to give the order they were all waiting to hear.

ELEVEN

After so much effort and struggle, after so many lives expended— first in the bridge-building, and then taken by the tsunami—the long-awaited crossing itself began without any further difficulty. Under Rama’s crisply issued instructions, and the watchful gaze of Hanuman above, the vanars and bears went forth upon the line of greybacks, four abreast, and made their way steadily across the ocean.

Both species were uneasy and nervous at first. But they had had many days to grow accustomed to the idea that this crossing would be made, and the toll their fallen comrades had paid made it seem like a victory in itself. The bears were somewhat more confident than the vanars, since they were used to crossing rivers and streams in search of fresh fish, and after a few uneasy moments spent testing their footing upon the very smooth backs of the great sea beasts—a process which involved dropping to all fours and sniffing suspiciously, perhaps even eagerly, at the greybacks, who of course reeked of fish—the first score of bears turned and bellowed encouragement to their comrades. The bellows were passed up the bear lines, all the way up the beach and miles inland, echoing for several minutes. Then the first bears grunted and ambled forward. After a while, they dropped to all fours again and galloped merrily, racing across the ocean as if they had done this all their lives.

The vanars were more skittish. The first ones in the lines spent many moments peering over this side and that at the ocean that lay only a few yards below the surface upon which they stood, then cheekaed in mortification when a wave crashed into the side of the greybacks and a little foam splashed onto them. It took stern orders from their generals to get them to emulate their bear comrades and move across the ocean. Finally, Rama himself came forward to speak. He reminded them that he had offered prayers to Lord Ganesha himself, the elephant-headed deva of auspicious beginnings, remover of obstacles, and pointed to the spot in the ocean where he had floated a mud effigy that Nala had quickly but expertly shaped despite his injured foot and broken arm. The effigy was all but vanished by then, dissolved in the water, but it so chanced that the spot where Rama had immersed it was calm and in the lee of the greyback line. He pointed this out as proof that the Tusked One had blessed their crossing and would grant them safe passage without hindrances. That breathed great courage into the vanars' hearts, and when Rama spoke quietly to Angad, the prince of Kiskindha took up a familiar vanar travelling chant praising their great ancestors. The nervous vanars in the front line immediately took up the chant and in a few moments, were tramping their way across the sea, still watchful of the licking waves to either side. They soon fell into a rhythm and in only a few more minutes had caught up with their bear comrades.

After that, it was nothing but repetition by rote. Those behind were reassured by the knowledge that their fellows had already gone forth and were crossing safely. And with each tribe that crossed, the ones behind made it a matter of pride to show that they could cross just as bravely. In a few hours, the crossing was proceeding exceedingly well. Varuna-deva lived up to his promise: the ocean remained sedate and calm, with only the natural movement of the tides stirring its immense vastness; the air was cool and refreshing, the sky above remained a clear cerulean blue, with only an occasional cloud to be glimpsed. The chanting of the vanars filled the air for miles, counterpointed by the almost musical grunting and snorting of the bears—at times almost seeming like a song of their own—and the gentle high-pitched lowing of the greybacks was a beautiful exotic accompaniment to the orchestra of sounds that lent an auspicious air to the crossing of the armies.

Rama and Lakshman, once they had made sure the crossing was proceeding efficiently, made their way to the head of the lines, sprinting to easily overtake the bears and vanars, their long-legged strides carrying them ‘with the speed of the wind’, according to the awed vanars and bears. Rama heard this comment and many others and hardly knew whether to smile or to sigh; he was resigned to the knowledge that virtually everything they did would be turned into lore and legend, with all the accompanying flights of imagination and exaggeration that poetic licence allowed.

He glanced briefly at Lakshman as they ran steadily alongside the quadruple lines. A little water that sloshed over the top of the ‘bridge’ splashed underfoot—apparently, the greybacks needed to remain as deeply immersed as possible, which meant that the ‘bridge’ would dip slowly upwards and downwards from time to time, in sections. But it was done so cautiously that even the vanars did not heed it ... much.

Lakshman’s face, hardened and intensified to the point where he barely resembled the Lakshman that Rama recalled from Ayodhya—just as Rama himself barely resembled his own earlier self, no doubt—did not display any anger or resentment outwardly; but then again, these past several years, he too had learned to control his emotions well. Rama thought Lakshman had accepted his explanation about his concealing his Brahmanic shakti for so many years, but he still worried that his brother harboured some small unvoiced resentment. Once the war was over, he would try to make amends. Once the war was over ... There was so much he wished to do once the war was over. But now was not the time to think of that. Now he must keep his attention focussed on the task at hand. Clear his mind of all extraneous distractions and concentrate his energies only upon the here and now. Most of all, he must allow himself to celebrate this small but significant progress: finally, they were crossing!

Soon, they would set foot on Lankan soil ... and then the final conflict would be joined. He bit back the image of Sita, bound and trussed and scored with multiple injuries, the way Hanuman had seen her last, before it threatened to overwhelm his natural resolve.

He and Lakshman reached the head of the line and slowed just enough to set a strong pace for the lines without taxing the vanars and bears. It was a long crossing, and it would be better accomplished if they paced themselves accordingly. After the first yojana or so, the vanars and bears perhaps realised this as well, for the chanting faded out gradually, and in time, the gentle lapping of the waves against the sides of the greybacks and the occasional lowing of the sea beasts themselves were the only sounds audible—that, and the relentless chuffing of the bears' breathing, of course.

There were few birds visible this far out, and for as far as one could see in every direction there was only ocean, ocean, and more ocean. The sunlight glittered off distant waves, turning them into patches of gold and silver, and occasionally, the watery expanse was broken by the presence of other sea creatures, akin to the greybacks but much smaller and with tapered snouts and finned backs, that appeared and disappeared alongside the bridge, their large black eyes staring curiously at this odd procession traversing the surface of their world. They seemed far too intelligent to be mere fish, Rama thought, and he suspected they were a higher species of ocean dwellers, more akin to the greybacks than to the vast schools of silvery fish that darted under the surface. Neither the vanars nor the bears made any comment on these snouted sea bulls—for that was how Rama thought of them—but on glancing back once, he caught a large brown bear licking his lips hungrily as he gazed at the snouted bulls dipping into and out of the ocean. This, despite the fact that the bears had found enough drowned fish after the tsunami to feed them for a week. He shook his head, smiling to himself. Bears would be bears.

He caught Lakshman glancing at him curiously and turned to share the smile and the thought with him. But Lakshman turned away at once, looking in the other direction, and the smile fell from Rama's face. He resigned himself to a silent crossing.

They had covered perhaps a yojana and a half thus, when Lakshman slowed to a halt, pointing. He said sharply, 'Rama.'

Rama was already alert. He had known something was potentially amiss by Hanuman's reaction. Until just now, the vanar had flown back and forth along the length of the bridge—or rather, that part of the bridge which his comrades had covered already—making sure that nothing untoward happened to delay their progress. Once or twice, Rama had seen him swoop down, like a hawk falling out of the sky in pursuit of a long-watched prey, and pluck out some unfortunate, or mischievous, vanar from the ocean into which he'd fallen, restoring him to the line. But mostly, the vanar had only had to patrol the bridge, remaining at a height of about a mile above the sea level, visible only as a speck from down here. But a fraction before Lakshman had slowed and pointed, Rama had glimpsed Hanuman swooping down out of the sky. From the trajectory of his descent, he was not diving to rescue another fallen soldier; rather he was heading for a point some few hundred yards away from the bridge itself, far to their right, out in the open sea itself.

Rama acknowledged his brother's warning and indicated the diving speck that was Hanuman. He slowed down, gesturing to the lines behind to slow down as well. The orders were passed down the line by the generals and tribe captains, positioned a few dozen yards apart to make conveyance of such instructions easy, and gradually, the juggernaut of Rama's army ground to a halt. There were eager queries and grunts of curiosity down the line, answered only by firm admonishments from the leaders to maintain silence and hold positions. A few of the bolder vanars, filled with a false confidence from their hours of traversing the salt desert, used the opportunity to peek over the edge of the 'bridge'. 'See there,' Rama heard one of them tell the others, 'I told you, there are no sea serpents waiting to swallow us. Those were just things our mothers told us to get us to keep away!'

Just then something surged up out of the water, and the trio of vanars screeched and fell back over themselves. It was only one of the snouted sea bulls hoping to make friends with the land beings, but the vanars thought it was a sea serpent come to swallow them all whole. Rama admonished them with an upheld hand and a stern glance, and they subsided at once, scrambling back into formation in their lines, still trembling from their encounter. The friendly sea bull uttered an inquiring honk, peering over the top of the greyback, then, when nobody responded to its overture, sank back with a disappointed bleat.

Rama ignored this trivial distraction and focussed his gaze upon the part of the ocean where Hanuman was descending with great speed. He could see something there now that he knew where to look. Something that was not a trick of the sunlight and cloud shadow, but an object suspended upon the water itself. Some kind of craft floating on the sea. And where there was a craft, it stood to reason there would be someone aboard it.

His pulse quickened slightly. Had Ravana launched an armada to repel their crossing, it would have been far greater than that single small speck. And the ocean denizens, if not Hanuman himself, would have warned them against it long before now. Whatever that craft was, it was isolated, and posed them no harm.

Or so he hoped.

At first, Hanuman took the object to be a piece of driftwood. And indeed, it was not much more than driftwood. As he descended, he saw that it was a boat of Lankan design. He had seen many such on his trip to the island-kingdom, but none so small or pathetic. Its ribbing was visible, ocean water sloshing through to fill the bottom of the craft, and its single sail was tattered to shreds. It appeared to be occupied by five persons, but even from here, he could see only one of them showing any signs of life. The other four lay sprawled in postures so decrepit, he felt certain they must be dead. There were a few scavenger birds floating on the waves nearby, crying out occasionally. It was the presence of these birds and their calls that had alerted him a moment earlier. From the looks of it, the craft appeared to have survived some terrible sea storm, perhaps even the very tsunami that had devastated his comrades on the beach.

He reduced himself until he was only three or four times more than his normal size and slowed his descent until he was hovering perhaps a dozen yards above the water, examining the battered craft intently for signs of deceit. After all, those were rakshasas in the boat, and for all he knew, this could be some new ploy by Ravana to obstruct their crossing. He set his jaw firmly. If this was indeed another ploy by the lord of rakshasas, he would not have a chance to do more than show his hand. At the first sign of peril, Hanuman would crush this boat and its occupants like ...

One of the rakshasas stirred.

Hanuman dropped a yard or two lower, examining the Lankan, his fists ready to pound anything that posed a threat. But the creature only turned its head and moaned groggily. It seemed to be half out of its senses, weakened from exposure or injury, he could not tell which, and despite his best efforts, he could not find any weapon upon the rakshasa's person, nor upon any of the other four wretches lying around him in the half-sunken craft. The rakshasa moaned a second time, turning his head upward, eyes shut tightly against the relentless sun, and it was with a small frisson of surprise that Hanuman realised he understood the Lankan word the creature was speaking: it was asking for water. With another small start, he found that he recognized the rakshasa.

He flew around the boat a few times, circling it and examining it from every angle. He could find no evidence of weaponry or subterfuge. The craft was what it appeared to be: a damaged Lankan fishing boat with four dead rakshasas and one barely alive.

Certain that there was nothing in the craft that could endanger his lords Rama and Lakshman, he dropped down to the level of the ocean, waves licking briefly at his bare feet, the water surprisingly cool even in the noonday sun, and hefted up the entire craft, rakshasas and all. Water splashed as the craft broke free of the ocean, pouring down his arms and body as he lifted the boat and flew with it to Rama.

TWELVE

Angad called for the section leaders to maintain order in the ranks. The flurry of excitement that had broken out when Hanuman brought the Lankan boat with its passengers, died down. As the vanar prince saw to it that discipline was maintained, Rama and Lakshman conferred with the other generals and chiefs about what Hanuman had found.

The four dead rakshasas had been consigned to watery graves along with the battered craft in which the vanar had found them, while the lone survivor had been given the water he was moaning for so pathetically, and made somewhat more comfortable. He now sat propped up on the 'bridge' itself where Hanuman had deposited him gently several moments ago.

The vanars shot baleful glances in his direction. 'He is a spy sent to assassinate you, Lord Rama,' General Sarabha said. 'Do not go within ten yards of him.'

The other generals also concurred, with varying degrees of suspicion. Only Sugreeva held his silence. Rama looked at him. 'Your Majesty? What is your advice?'

Sugreeva looked at him wearily. 'You are wiser than I, Rama. You must trust your own judgement in this matter, as in all else. Bear in mind that we vanars are greatly biased against rakshasas.'

'And yet Hanuman speaks in this rakshasa's favour,' Jambavan said gruffly. The king of bears regarded the prone form of the survivor, looking more like a washed-up piece of debris than a dangerous assassin. Hanuman was squatting beside him, holding a skin of water for him to sip on slowly. 'No vanar has as much cause to hate them as he does. Nor knows them better. Yet he calls this one a friend and an honourable Brahmin!'

Rama looked at the albino Lankan sipping water with obvious gratitude from Hanuman's hands. A cordon of vanars and bears stood around them, spears held at the ready. They seemed somewhat overzealous. The lone rakshasa, battered and exhausted as he was, looked as if he could barely stand, let alone pose any threat to anyone. He had told Hanuman that he had set out for the mainland shore in the first boat he could get his hands on, accompanied by four good rakshasas to man the vessel. They were caught almost at once in the tsunami sent to destroy Rama's bridge and had been battered by the unnatural fury of the ocean. The four others had drowned despite being on the boat, for such was the quantity of water that had fallen upon them. The albino had survived miraculously but had no means to row himself to either shore.

Rama came to a decision.

'I will have words with the rakshasa,' he said. 'I request you all to stand back and let me speak with him. Lakshman, you alone will come with me. This is a task better suited to two than ten.'

Nobody argued, although the vanars looked unhappy and General Sarabha looked as if he would rather run the rakshasa through with a spear than talk with him. Rama and Lakshman went towards the head of the lines where the rakshasa was now sitting up, assisted by Hanuman. They both looked up as Rama and Lakshman approached. At once, the rakshasa joined his hands together in a namaskaram of greeting. Hanuman stood to receive them.

‘His name is Vibhisena,’ Hanuman said. He pronounced the name ‘Vibhishun’ which was probably the way he had heard it spoken back in Lanka, Rama guessed. ‘He is the brother of Ravana. And the one I spoke of to you upon my return, Lord Rama. The one who championed my lady Sita’s cause with such dedication, opposing even the king of Lanka in his own court to the point of endangering his own life. I believe him to be an ally and a man of honour, perhaps the most honourable rakshasa in Lanka.’

Rama nodded. ‘Then I shall treat him with the respect he deserves. The enemy who supports us at a time of great crisis is preferable to the friend who turns his back upon us at the first sign of trouble.’

At these words, the pale-skinned rakshasa looked up at Rama with a strange light in his watery eyes. ‘Truly,’ he said weakly, his rakshasa mouth and tongue forming the words oddly but lucidly enough, ‘I expected no less from the great warrior of dharma. It is my everlasting privilege to meet you, great and virtuous Rama Chandra of Ayodhya. And this must surely be your equally renowned brother, Sumitra-putra Lakshmana, who sacrificed all to accompany you into exile fourteen years ago.’

Lakshman’s eyes narrowed. ‘It seems you know a great deal about us, Lankan.’

Vibhisena shrugged weakly. ‘Who does not know the tale of Rama’s great sacrifice and unjust banishment? It is the misfortune of the rakshasa race that we are relegated to playing the role of the villains in your great life history.’

Lakshman frowned. ‘Tell us then, why did one of you villains suddenly leave Lanka and come seeking us?’

Rama said softly, 'Lakshman, if Hanuman has vouched for him, then that is reason enough for us to trust him. We should not question him so roughly.'

Vibhisena's eyes gazed up at Rama. 'Permit me to answer, Lord Rama. Your brother is fully justified in questioning me. I know full well he means no offence by these questions, he seeks only to apprise himself of my motives.' He turned to Lakshman. 'My lord Lakshman. I am but a devout Brahmin rakshasa seeking to find peace in this time of great madness and war. My only mission is to aid you and your illustrious brother in your righteous effort.'

Lakshman looked suspiciously at the rakshasa. 'You pick a strange time and place to show your support, Lankan. How do we know you are not here to delay us in our crossing? Perhaps you were sent here to stall us, and give your brother time to put some fiendish new plan into effect?'

Vibhisena shook his head in denial. 'My lords, my brother and I have always held widely differing views on many matters, this is no secret. Hanuman here has witnessed how fiercely I opposed him in his own council. The only reason Ravana tolerated me this long was because even he has not sunk so deeply into arrogance that he would execute his own flesh and blood. But on the matter of the abduction of Sita, he and I have finally parted ways. I have sworn to remain in exile for ever rather than live in a land where such acts are tolerated. So it was that after Hanuman departed Lanka, I too resolved to leave and to offer my services to Lord Rama. For I was greatly impressed by Hanuman's valour and the manner in which he bore himself while in our kingdom. If the messenger is such a great being, I thought, what might his master be like? Had I intended you any harm, why would I have set sail on the very sea upon which Ravana was about to wreak his sorcerous havoc? It was perhaps an ill-conceived voyage and I am no shrewd planner of such jaunts, but the devas have seen fit to spare my life and bring me to your feet. And here I lie, prepared to serve you as best I can.'

Still, Lakshman persisted. 'Even so, how can we trust you? A brother who betrays his own flesh and blood. A rakshasa who joins with his enemies against his own race. A traitor and a turncoat.'

Vibhisena bowed his head sadly. ‘What you say is all true, and it shames me to admit it. But Ravana violated dharma by abducting Sita, and after that great transgression, he has continued to violate dharma in one misdeed after another. I cannot stand by and watch him without doing anything.’ He looked away for a moment, his eyes distant. ‘I have stood by silently for far too long as it is.’

Lakshman looked at him sceptically. ‘So you are doing this in order to uphold dharma?’

‘Yes,’ the rakshasa answered simply. ‘For dharma is above relationships, above brotherhood even, above race and caste and creed and community. It is my sense of dharma that makes me now turn against my people and my own brother.’

Lakshman was silent for a moment. Then he glanced up at Rama as if to say, Well? What next?

Rama addressed the rakshasa gently. ‘You seek sanctuary, then? Protection from your brother’s ire?’

‘Nay, my lord. I seek to aid you in your war. I ask for no sanctuary, or favours. I wish only to help you win your righteous cause.’

‘How so?’

‘My lord, you are unfamiliar with Lanka, and unfamiliar with Ravana’s military wiles. I have watched him wage war many times. I can impart to you a great deal of insight regarding the lie of the land and his strategies of war.’

Rama forced himself to inject a modicum of doubt into his next query: ‘You would aid us in killing your own countrymen and overrunning your kingdom?’

‘Only in the hope that by bringing this ill-desired conflict to a swift close, I may spare much needless bloodshed. The sooner peace is restored to Lanka, the happier I shall be. Ravana does not seek an early peace. In his current state of mind, he would relish war to be the only condition of existence. If left to him, he would sooner let every last rakshasa in Lanka die fighting than allow peace to reclaim the land. I hope that by aiding you, I shall break this endless cycle of violence and restore Lanka to the beautiful, peaceful land it once used to be.’

Rama was silent for a moment, contemplating what the rakshasa had said. He looked at Hanuman. Then at Lakshman. Then back at the long lines of vanars and bears stretching out across the ocean, waiting for his command. This decision could not take all day. He had to choose swiftly and decisively. He knew already what he must do. He spoke once more to the rakshasa, this time without any trace of suspicion or doubt.

‘My good Vibhisena, I apologise if my brother’s questioning was somewhat harsh. We are at war with your race and your appearance here was most unexpected. We would be foolish not to suspect something amiss.’

Vibhisena shook his head in dismay. ‘Nay, my lord Rama. You owe me no apologies. Lakshman was well within his rights to question me. After all that you have endured at the hands of my brother and his fellow rakshasas, I am astonished at how graciously you have treated me. In contrast, I am ashamed of how my people to be treated your own emissary Hanuman in Lanka. Sadly, it is such misdeeds that bring shame to the name of rakshasas.’

Rama held out his hand. ‘Then let us make a fresh start towards a new era of peaceful friendship. Perhaps all rakshasas and mortals cannot be friends, but we can prove to be the exception. I accept the hand of friendship you offer so graciously.’

Vibhisena clasped the hand Rama proffered him, tears streaking down the sides of his face. ‘I thank you, Rama. And I salute your greatness. Truly, all the great praises Hanuman heaped upon your name in my brother’s court were no more than the honest truth. You are truly a deva among mortals.’

Rama brushed aside the compliments, continuing hurriedly, ‘You are now a part of my forces, and will travel with us. However, I do not wish to delay the crossing of my armies any longer. Let us proceed to Lanka and we may speak further once we reach those shores.’

Vibhisena nodded. ‘That is wise. The sooner we reach Lanka, the better your chances of victory. Come, then. I do not wish to be the cause of any further delay to you.’ He struggled to raise himself to his feet, his nether limbs wobbling unsteadily with the effort.

Rama turned to Hanuman. ‘My friend, our new friend and ally is clearly in no condition to keep pace with us on our march. If you will do me the courtesy of carrying the noble Lankan, we shall make better time. Vibhisena, my new friend, please think of this as a friendly support. You are drained of strength, and incapable of running at the speed we must maintain to reach Lanka before nightfall.’

Vibhisena raised no objection. Hanuman bent down and hefted the prone rakshasa as easily as he might have picked up a small child. He placed Vibhisena on his shoulder, making him comfortable. Vibhisena’s pale face reflected his gratitude and pleasure at being accepted as well as at the mode of conveyance.

Rama turned back to the others. From the look on Jambavan’s face, the bear king seemed pleased rather than displeased at his decision. Only General Sarabha still looked sour, but Rama dismissed that as the inbred vanar distrust of all rakshasas. ‘Lakshman,’ he said quietly, ‘give the order to resume the march.’

Lakshman issued the order smartly. It was taken up by Prince Angad, then passed along the line. Rama could hear the shouts proceeding in stages down the yojanas-long ranks. Finally, slowly, like a juggernaut starting up, the procession began to resume its forward motion. In a few more moments, it had achieved a pace akin to a man walking steadily. And in another several moments, Rama and Lakshman were running, then sprinting. Rama found the rhythm he had been marking before, just enough to keep the armies moving briskly, yet not so great that the lines would tire and fall behind. Soon, the great procession was proceeding at a swift pace across the ‘bridge’. In the water, the greybacks lowed and called down the line, passing on the word that the army was on the move again.

THIRTEEN

Lanka.

The island-kingdom loomed before them on the horizon, proud and magnificent, a pearl set in a bed of lush, green velvet surrounded by a perfect azure sea. Even from miles away, its beauty was unmistakable. Rama allowed himself to slacken his pace, Lakshman slowing down beside him. The generals passed on the word that they were halting, while the rank and file muttered in awed consternation at the sight of their dreaded destination. Below their feet, the greybacks lowed. The sun, low in the western sky, illuminated the island-kingdom in a beatific golden light, the ocean calm and still around it, glistening peacefully in the slanting sunshine. Birds flew around the crown of cliffs that ringed the northern shores, and the lush, green flora on the hills that rose up was dotted with patches of red palas flowers in bloom.

It looked so tranquil, so alluring, like a haven of respite, rather than a lair of rakshasas.

‘It must be Ravana’s vile sorcery,’ Lakshman said doubtfully. ‘He has altered the aspect of the land to appear beautiful and inviting, in order to deceive us.’

‘Nay, Lakshman,’ Rama said. ‘I do not think this is Ravana’s doing. I think this is Lanka’s own natural beauty. After all, do not forget, the legends say that Lanka was a great and beautiful land long before Ravana made it his home. We are so accustomed to thinking of it as a den of asuras that it is easy to forget that the land itself is not evil, only those who occupy it presently.’

Hanuman came up, bearing his passenger upon his shoulders. Vibhisena, who had heard Rama’s last words, said, ‘Indeed, Rama. You speak truly. Lanka is a great and beautiful land, rich in resources and bountiful in harvest. If you think it beautiful now, what might you have thought had you seen it a few thousand years earlier, when my half-brother Kubera ruled it.’

‘Kuber,’ Lakshman said thoughtfully. ‘He is the treasurer of the devas, is he not?’

‘He is. A veritable lord of wealth. Ravana invaded his inner sanctum in the realm of the devas, decimating his army of yaksas, and stole from him his celestial vehicle Pushpak as well as a large share of his great treasure trove of wealth. Then he usurped Lanka, which Kuber had been given as a gift by the devas for his many services, and proceeded to turn it into a living hell on the mortal plane.’ He sighed. ‘It was only after Ravana was incapacitated during the last fourteen years that my sister-in-law Mandodhari was able to repair some of the damage he had wrought to its natural beauty. What you see before you now is only a pale shadow of the Lanka that once used to be.’

‘And shall be again,’ Rama said quietly.

Lakshman looked at him.

Rama looked back, nodding. ‘We come not to destroy, but to reclaim. Our quarrel is only with Ravana and those rakshasas who make the error of supporting his vile ways. Once we have secured what we have come here for, we shall leave Lanka better than we found it. That is how we shall show the Lankans that we Ayodhyans are builders, not destroyers. And that their true enemy was Ravana himself, for leading them so far down the path of unrighteousness.’

Lakshman frowned doubtfully but spoke no objection.

Vibhisena’s eyes filled with tears. ‘My lord, if you could truly achieve such a thing you would be blessed for a thousand lifetimes.’

‘It shall be so, my rakshasa friend. We did not choose to start this war. But we shall be the ones to end it.’

Lakshman inclined his head at the sun, low on the western horizon. ‘We should try to make land before nightfall. It will be harder for the vanars and bears to cross in the dark.’

Rama nodded. ‘Yes. Let us make speed. Give the word to the lines behind that we shall not stop now until every last soldier is safely on land. To Lanka!’

‘TO LANKA!’ came the thundering, excited response.

Supanakha prowled the walls and ceiling of the cavern where Ravana had commanded the generals to assemble. The chamber had been carved out of rock by Ravana's asura sorcery, along with the labyrinthine network of caverns that riddled Mount Nikumbhila. Ravana's fiendish imagination, never at a loss for creativity, had shaped some of the natural rock protuberances in the ceiling and walls to make them resemble anthropomorphic shapes and outlines. The one she was clinging to with feline grace was shaped to resemble an apsara and a deva in the throes of copulation. She wondered if the deva depicted in the act of kama was Indra himself. The thousand-eyed one was renowned for his carnal appetite. He was also renowned for a certain peculiarity of his anatomy. She probed the recesses of the carving, seeking to ascertain the accuracy of the anatomical depiction, but was distracted by a flurry of activity on the floor of the chamber, some ten or fifteen yards below the ceiling from which she was suspended upside down.

The score or so of assembled rakshasas gathered below looked unhappy and angry. The garish light of the sorcerously illuminated stones set upon the walls at regular intervals did nothing to enhance the fierce monstrosity of their natural unattractiveness. Their furred limbs and tusked faces were richly clad, as befitted the highest clan lords and generals of Lanka, but even from the high shadows in which she was concealed, she could spy a burnt patch in a tunic, a jagged rent in a waistband stitched from priceless tanned human leather, a crack in a polished breastplate carved from the bone of some extinct asura species—almost every one of these proud rakshasas was marked in some fashion or other, testimony to how narrowly they had survived the burning of Lanka and the damage wrought by the rampaging vanar emissary. Supanakha licked her chops in recollection of the night of wanton destruction. Ah, had she known the vanar was possessed of such great powers, she would have focussed her energies more on seducing him at the outset rather than merely deceiving him. What a rampage! Never before had she heard of any creature wreaking such havoc in a rakshasa lair. For that night of unbridled destruction, she could almost forgive him for killing the handsome Akshay Kumar. Watching him expanded to a thousand times his natural size, pounding the great golden-white tower of the Pushpak to smithereens, his lightly furred limbs working with powerful ease, she had been overcome by lust. Even now, she purred silently just to recall the scene. Would that he had wreaked his havoc upon her person. She would have burned more willingly for him than Lanka had!

She was distracted from her self-indulgent fantasies by another outbreak of growls and grunts from the cavern floor below. The generals were growing restless. They had been waiting here a long while, on Ravana's instructions. And there was neither sign of the lord of Lanka, nor word from him. Come to think of it, she hadn't seen Ravana since early this morning either—and that had been barely a glimpse of him riding in the Pushpak with that wretched woman. Her lips curled at the thought of Sita. She didn't understand why Ravana didn't just have his way with the woman or else do away with her. At the very least, he could hand her over to Supanakha. There were a few delicious torments she could think of to visit upon that wench ...

'Where is he?' asked a kumbha-rakshasa loudly. 'How much longer are we to wait around here? There are important decisions to be taken, pressing matters to be seen to. We cannot spend all day waiting here for Lankanaresh to show himself when he pleases.'

The other clan chiefs echoed his complaints with noises of their own. Some had to see to arming their forces, others to transporting soldiers and supplies to various sites where they were to be stationed, one general had to see to fortifications that had been destroyed by the vanar's rampaging spree ... In moments, the chamber echoed noisily with the complaints of impatient rakshasas. Supanakha watched with amusement as the complaints soon turned to a venting of opinions on the previous day's disaster and how it could have been prevented—or stopped.

'Enough,' said a familiar voice.

The cacophony ended abruptly. The generals and clan chiefs looked around, startled. The voice had been unmistakably Ravana's, yet the lord of Lanka was nowhere to be seen. One of the chiefs pointed with a taloned claw at a wall of the chamber. A greenish light had begun to glow there. Supanakha moved across the carving to give herself a better view of that part of the cavern.

The greenish glow resolved slowly into an image of the northern shore of Lanka. It was similar to the water-illusion Ravana had conjured up earlier, she realised, projecting the image of a scene occurring in some distant location upon the wall of the cavern. As everyone watched silently, the image sharpened by degrees, until the ocean and the Palisade cliffs encircling the northern end of the island were recognisable. Everything was greatly reduced in scale, in order to fit upon the ten yard wide by five yard high section of the cave wall on which the image was sorcerously projected, but it was clear enough overall to make out the familiar geographical features. It was also clear enough to depict the unfamiliar objects floating in the ocean off the northern shore: enormous sea beasts visible slightly above the surface of the water, arrayed in a continuous line that extended well beyond the periphery of the image projected—to the end of the horizon itself, it seemed. This extraordinary living ‘bridge’ across the ocean, joining Lanka to the northern mainland, was covered with countless tiny creatures, scurrying across it like ants upon a rotted tree trunk. The creatures were coming from the north, across the ocean, and as Supanakha watched with fascinated interest, creeping lower to gain a better view, they reached the end of the bridge and began leaping onto the thin sandy beach that bordered the northern shore. In mere moments, scores of the creatures began pouring upon the beach, spreading out in all directions with astonishing speed.

‘This is Rama’s army,’ said the disembodied voice of Ravana, seeming to issue from nowhere and everywhere at once. ‘They are setting foot upon our shores at this very minute as you can see. Hundreds of thousands of vanars and bears, perhaps even millions—even I do not know how many exactly, and I doubt the mortal himself does!’

Her cousin sounded almost gleeful, Supanakha thought curiously. Instead of being furious at the sight of his enemy arriving and setting foot upon his land with such a vast host, Ravana was amused!

His rakshasa leaders didn’t share his amusement. Several of them were scowling, others grunting and chuffing angrily, a few even snorting nervously and spraying spittle and nasal fluids as they sought to vent their feelings of fear and panic. ‘There are too many, Lord Ravana,’ cried one of these, his boar-like tusks glistening with the fluids he was exuding with nervous haste. ‘How will we combat such large numbers?’

Ravana’s laughter echoed through the chamber. Supanakha started. It sounded as if he was right here beside her, high up on the wall of the cavern—as well as down there, and there ... Where was he really? Why was he not showing himself? Those fools were losing their nerve just at the sight of Rama’s army landing on the ‘unassailable’ shores of Lanka. No army had ever invaded the island before. None had even dared try. The very fact that Rama had brought such a vast host to Ravana’s threshold, in the wake of the unprecedented destruction wreaked by his vanar emissary, was enough to make any rakshasa lose some fluids. She was interested in seeing how Ravana calmed his generals long enough for them to listen to his war plan. At least, she assumed he had a war plan.

‘Kambhakhatar,’ Ravana boomed, the rakshasa word for fool echoing around the chamber. And this time, Supanakha felt as if he were addressing her as well, mocking her for daring to doubt his power. She licked her lips: Ravana was wont to deal with any doubters swiftly and brutally. She tensed herself, anticipating that the boar-clan idiot who had questioned his lord would find himself rendered to fat and gristle in a sorcerous flash.

Instead, to her mounting surprise, Ravana responded with more words. Not even angry words at that, but the same amused tone, as if he were speaking to a roomful of children rather than the most powerful rakshasa leaders in all Lanka.

‘Do you really think any of this could have happened without my consent? Do you think that army of bears and baboons could have landed here had I not wished it? Nothing happens in Lanka that I do not permit to happen. Not a blade of grass dares arise from the ground without my willing it. I am Ravana, lord of Lanka. This land is wedded to me as flesh to bone. My asura maya permeates every fibre of this island-nation. I have permitted the mortal Rama to bring his army of monkeys and coons here only so that I may teach him a lesson. A lesson in warcraft. It is a lesson you should heed as well. For in the hours ahead, you will see Lanka restored to the time of its greatest glory. A Lanka that is the supreme purveyor of war and holocaust. Once again, we shall be feared in the three worlds, by every species, every race of living being. We shall crush the mortal Rama and his minions like the insectile hordes that they are, the way a kumbharakshasa's heel crushes an anthill into the ground without even knowing that the anthill existed, and when we are done, all shall know and fear us once again. For the past several years, you have grown soft and accustomed to luxury and indolence. Peace and prosperity have made fat-bellied dogs of you all. It was good that the vanar came and shook you out of your complacency. Now you are awake and alert. Now you will prepare yourselves and fight like the rakshasas you are, and when this war is over, you will follow me across the ocean to the mortal realm and we shall conquer the nations of Aryavarta.

Once we were halted at Mithila by the use of a celestial weapon that none could resist. Today, after we have killed the mortal who wielded that weapon, we shall have avenged the massacre of our fellow asuras at Mithila, and none will remain to oppose us on our new campaign of conquest. Today, we reclaim Lanka and wipe out Rama and his forces. Tomorrow, we conquer the world!'

After this extraordinary speech, even Supanakha felt like cheering. The clan chiefs gathered in the chamber raised their guttural voices in throaty exuberance, their fear and panic subsumed by the war-lust Ravana's words had awoken in their warrior breasts. They cheered and roared their approval of his rallying speech.

At last they fell silent again. Finally, as she had known they would, they asked the question she had wanted to ask as well.

'My lord, what are your orders? How are we to accomplish this victory? Will you not show yourself and lead us to triumph in person?'

In response, Ravana's voice chuckled softly. 'My orders for the nonce are that you rest and prepare yourselves for battle on the morrow. We shall convene here again at dawn, and I shall tell you what is to be done next. Meanwhile, tonight, I am already at work, laying the seeds of the victory we shall reap tomorrow. For as you sleep, I shall be at work, turning our island-kingdom into the great unassailable fortress she once was. Tomorrow, when you arise, you shall see for yourself the result of my invocations. You shall awaken to a new Lanka.'

They looked at one another in puzzlement. ‘But, my lord,’ said the leader of the kumbha clans, ‘the enemy has landed on our shores. Should we not make efforts to repel them at least? Left to their own devices, they could encroach upon a great part of our kingdom by the morning. We should immediately lead a foray to push them back into the sea whence they came.’

Again, that amused chuckle. But now it sounded a trifle impatient, as if Ravana was done talking and explaining himself. Sooner or later, Supanakha knew, that tone of impatience always crept into his voice—or voices, for Ravana had ten tongues in his heads—but it was a matter of surprise to her that he had been so patient so long. ‘They shall not encroach upon a single yard of Lankan ground tonight. And many of them will not live to see the morning light. While all will rue the moment they stepped upon the shores of our land, and shall long for nothing but to return across the ocean whence they came. This will happen even as you sleep tonight. Now, enough has been said. Go and rest yourselves and your forces, and we shall meet again at dawn to face the armies of the invader and reclaim our lost glory.’

They looked at one another, awe and amazement writ large upon their snouted faces. But all knew better than to press their luck further. The next few moments were spent in bowing and scraping and calling out the praises of the great lord of Lanka. Then, one by one, they all filed out of the chamber until Supanakha was left alone once more, with only the flickering green image upon the wall for company. She crept down the wall, peering at the image of the invaders pouring across the bridge still, flooding the northern shore of the island. What had Ravana meant? Even as you sleep tonight? How?

Suddenly, she knew she had to go to the northern cliffs. She would take the caverns, the way she had entered Lanka months earlier, when she had brought with her the means to resurrect her cousin. She would go and see for herself Ravana’s sorcery assailing Rama and his armies by night. It promised to be a massacre worth a ringside seat!

With a flick of her tail, she bounded out of the cavern.

KAAND 2

ONE

The greybacks were too large to come on to the beach itself. The closest one to land had positioned itself in such a manner that the travellers could leap from the end of its back to the edge of the shoreline. It meant a little wading through knee-deep foamy water. Rama watched as the bears leaped easily into the water and waded strongly up the beach, splashing sand and water carelessly. They roared and flailed their arms happily, pleased to have reached their destination at last. The vanars were apprehensive at first, but under their commander's watchful gaze, they plucked up the courage to jump and waded after the bears, wincing as the water splashed around them and new waves soughed inwards softly. The first bears swept up the first vanars in happy bear hugs, and both species roared and cheekaed their delight at having been the first to reach Lanka. The vanars seemed a little the worse for wear after being hugged so enthusiastically, but soon recovered, coughing and grinning cheerfully enough. Some even splashed around in the shallow water, but that ended once one of them spied crabs scuttling underfoot, causing a mass exodus up to dry sand.

Rama noted that the tide was coming in and that the tidemark was several yards further up the sharply sloping beach. Once it was in fully, there would barely be room left to stand here on this narrow strip of a beach. He issued orders to speed up the crossing, then turned to look at the land upon which they had arrived.

Enormous blackstone cliffs rose in sheer, daunting lines above the narrow strip of beach. They ran in either direction as far as his eyes could see.

He turned to look at Vibhisena, who stood beside him and Lakshman. The vanar and bear generals were seeing to the disembarkment of the troops, but King Sugreeva came up to join them in their conference at Rama's request. Jambavan was still on the bridge making sure that there were no laggards and that the troops did not panic once the sun went down, which would be in a short while.

'These are the cliffs you named Palisades?' Rama asked Vibhisena.

'Indeed they are, Rama. They are so named for they are great natural walls of defence guarding Lanka from intruders upon this coast.' He added slowly, 'Although there have never been intruders upon this or any other coast of Lanka before.'

Rama indicated the narrow beach, running to either side of the cliffs. 'How far inland could we travel along the beach?'

Vibhisena's forehead creased with thought. 'Perhaps less than a mile either way. But that would be at low tide,' he glanced around, 'which is now. After the tide rises, it would engulf most of this sandy strip.'

It was as Rama had feared. He exchanged a glance with Lakshman, who understood the problem without needing it spelled out. 'We need to get as many of our troops as possible off this beach before the tide turns,' Lakshman said. 'As it is, there's barely room to accommodate a few tens of thousands here, and even they would have to be packed together like too many teeth in a small mouth.'

Everybody glanced around. The disembarkment was proceeding at a brisk pace now, vanars and bears leaping off the last greyback into the shallows by the scores, raising a great ruckus in their excitement. Already, this portion of the beach was growing over-crowded. Several of the new arrivals were stopping once they reached the dry sand, looking around in bemusement at the dreaded place they had feared so long in their dreams and tales. Several vanars and bears milled around Rama and his cohorts, looking dazed and disoriented now that the long-desired crossing was finally over. Someone jostled Vibhisena accidentally.

Rama wasted no time. 'Lakshman, tell the chiefs to send the troops up the beach on either side, to make room for new arrivals. Fan out as far as possible. Keep runners ready to carry messages and keep the lines of communication working efficiently.'

Lakshman was already off and issuing the orders even before the words were out of Rama's mouth. He passed on the instructions to Prince Angad, who had disembarked a moment earlier and was standing in knee deep water, shouting orders to the rank and file. Angad listened briefly to Lakshman's orders, nodded once briskly, then began shouting new commands to the chiefs who were arriving. Lakshman rejoined Rama and the others up the beach.

‘There is no other way around the Palisades, then?’ asked Rama.

Vibhisena shook his head slowly. ‘That is why all quays and docks on Lanka are built further south.’ He frowned, looking at the line of greybacks stretching back to the horizon in the fading sunlight. ‘Perhaps if your bridge could be extended around the periphery of the island ... A few miles upland and there are many good landing points where you can have direct access to the inland routes.’ He sucked in a breath. ‘Of course, my brother’s forces would certainly be guarding those points, but nevertheless ...’

Rama looked at Hanuman who was waiting just behind him for his instructions. ‘My friend, you understand the language of the greybacks. Would you inquire of them if they could do as our rakshasa friend suggests?’

Hanuman shook his head regretfully. ‘Rama, they have already told me they have risked much to bring us so close to land. You see, there are sharp reefs below the water here, and they are already injuring themselves holding the line until our forces disembark. To go further upland along the coast would mean certain injury, even death to many of their numbers. Even so, they would not hesitate to sacrifice their lives, but there is another problem. Every available greyback in this part of the world has been conscripted to form the bridge to Lanka. There are none to spare to extend it further upland.’

Lakshman looked at Hanuman thoughtfully. ‘What if we have the greybacks at the mainland end of the line come up here and form the extension? Surely our people have come far enough up the bridge to leave a few score greybacks free at the other end?’

Hanuman cocked his head, listening to the greybacks lowing mournfully in the fading light. ‘They have discussed that option as well, my lord Lakshman. The time required for those greybacks to swim all the way here and then re-form into a new line might not suit our purpose. It would take until morning at least. And even then, they say it would be treacherous going, for the tides are fierce this close to Lanka, and are particularly bad at this time of year. The greybacks forming such an extension to the bridge would have to move constantly to keep themselves from being thrown against the reefs.’ He paused, listening to the greybacks before going on. ‘The risk would be great to us as well. Were even a single greyback to be pushed out of line by a riptide or undercurrent, it would cause scores of our troops to drown.’ He listened awhile more before shaking his head decisively. ‘They have sent a scout to investigate and she answers saying that the tides are too savage to enable such an undertaking. It would be suicidal to risk it. Perhaps a few weeks hence, when the summer tides turn once more ... ’ He dismissed the rest with a shrug of his powerful shoulders. ‘Nay, my lords. It cannot be done that way. The greybacks have done as much as they can to aid us. We must find some other means of getting our troops inland.’

Rama was silent for a long moment, thinking. The cacophony from around them continued as clan chiefs yelled and bellowed at their troops to form lines and march post-haste up the beach. Several platoons went sprinting across the sandy strip, disappearing out of sight around the curve of the cliffs. Rama followed them, keeping his gaze fixed on the cliffs, then raising it to the top of the Palisades.

He sighed and pointed with his chin. ‘Then that is the only way.’

Lakshman nodded. ‘We shall have to send them up the cliffs.’

King Sugreeva sucked in his breath. ‘It will not be an easy ascent. There is no sign of any shrubbery to cling to. Vanars are accustomed to climbing steep hills if they have something to clutch at, but these are sheer stone cliffs, moistened by the spray of the ocean.’ He licked his thick vanar lips. ‘Everything on this coast is already liberally coated with the moisture and salt we taste on our faces. It will make the ascent very treacherous.’

Rama nodded. ‘You are right, my friend, but we have no other choice. If we go around by the beach, then when the tide comes up, we shall be stranded on those sharp wet rocks until the tide goes out again.’ He pointed to the craggy black monstrosities that clung to the bottom of the cliffs like teeth at the base of a gaping black maw. ‘And there are too many of us to be accommodated that way.’ He gestured back at the lines upon lines of vanars and bears now streaming onto the shore. ‘We can hardly expect the bulk of our forces to wait on the greybacks, either. It will be hard enough to keep their footing out there once darkness falls. Nay. We must climb the cliffs, difficult though it may be. And we must start doing so now, before too many of us are ashore. Lakshman, call Angad.'

Lakshman put his fingers to his mouth and issued a sharp, piercing whistle. He called out a single word, 'Angadiya!' A messenger vanar waiting nearby issued a shrill cheeka in response and scampered to call the prince who was only a few dozen yards away.

Prince Angad came up, breathless from shouting commands at the troops and their chiefs. 'We are making good progress, my lord Rama. By the middle watch of the night we should have all our troops ashore.'

'Very good, Prince,' Rama said. 'But now we have another great challenge facing us.'

'Angad, my son,' Sugreeva said with his customary sorrowful expression. 'It appears we shall have to climb these stone walls.'

Angad looked up sharply at the cliffs. 'Those?'

'Yes, those,' said Lakshman laconically. 'Can your vanars do it?'

Angad looked at Lakshman, then at Rama, then at the scores of troops splashing into the shallows and up the beach. 'My vanars? Surely. But can your bears do it?'

Lakshman folded his arms across his chest and looked questioningly at Rama. 'A good point. Can the bears climb those cliffs?'

Rama thought about it briefly. 'There's only one way to find out.'

Supanakha peered cautiously out of the narrow mouth of the cave, high on the face of the cliff overlooking the northern shore of Lanka. She looked out at a sight every bit as amazing as she had expected. At first, it appeared much like the sorcerous image projected on the wall of Ravana's chambers.

A great line of immense grey sea beasts extended from the shore of Lanka out to the farthest horizon ... all the way to the mainland. The living bridge of floating sea beasts was covered with tens of thousands of vanars and bears, all marching—nay, running really—with the efficient brisk pace of a military juggernaut on the move. From her point of view, some three hundred feet above the ground, it was a formidable sight. Line upon line of furry vanars and burly bears scampered, sprinted, jogged, and ran, bellowing, shouting, cheekaing, grunting, chuffing, and otherwise venting their enthusiasm as they made their way across the ocean. And here, at the shore of Lanka, they were leaping off the end of the last sea beast, splashing through the shallow water—vanars splashing!—and making their way up the narrow strip of sandy beach, from where they were dispatched in neat squads up the beach, disappearing out of her narrow range of vision. It took her a moment to understand that they were being directed away to make space for their fellows who were arriving after them. She wondered how they intended to get inland though: there was no ingress to be had further up the beach. The entire north coast of Lanka was lined by these Palisade cliffs. She knew that from bitter personal experience; it was not that long ago that she too had made the same ocean crossing to reach Lanka. And she had had no bridge of sea beasts to keep her dry.

She marvelled at Rama's ability to command such an extraordinary army, as well as his ingenuity in conceiving of such a means to cross the ocean. How had he accomplished such a task? Did he know the lord of the sea beasts, then? She would have to ask Ravana how Rama had done it—or then again, perhaps it would be best not to ask. Despite his apparent good humour when addressing his clan chiefs earlier, she could not fathom how Ravana could find this latest accomplishment of Rama's amusing. She watched as the lines of bears and vanars continued to arrive, a seemingly endless parade of eager soldiers ready to fight for Rama and his cause, filling up the narrow beach until it seemed there would be no more room to stand. The sun was almost down now, and she wondered how they would cope with the darkness. It was astonishing enough to see vanars crossing the vast body of water, let alone organising themselves into such an efficient army. She did not think they posed any threat to Lanka's rakshasa hordes—although those bears looked fairly threatening, especially the large darker-pelted ones that were arriving now, grunting and bellowing loudly—but there were so many of them! How large was Rama's army anyway? A million? Two million? More? It was hard to tell for sure, with the bulk of them still spread across the ocean along that long line of sea beasts, but there were certainly enough to mount a formidable invasion. Perhaps this would be a war worth the fighting after all, then. She flicked her tail in glee.

She was looking for Rama himself, searching for his familiar form amongst the furry crowds below when she happened upon a small cluster of creatures standing right below on the beach, pointing up the cliff, in her very direction. She cringed, thinking they had spotted her, and prepared to retreat hastily into the cavern. But then she realised that they were pointing at the cliffs, not at her. They had not even spotted the cave's mouth. In this slanting evening light, they were unlikely to spot it unless they climbed within a few yards' reach of it. She had been lucky to spot it herself when she had landed on the same shore, months earlier.

She looked closely at the group pointing at the cliffs, and with a frisson of sensual pleasure, she recognised Rama's beautiful visage among them. Ah. Her prince. He had grown leaner, more rugged and craggy than when she had seen him last in person, at the battle of Janasthana. His body, never given to softness, had grown harder, more sharply defined, like a sculpture chiselled minutely to the very limit of the artist's abilities. Surely no further improvement was possible now. He was a beautiful, lithe, savagely muscled fighting machine. Her Rama. The mortal she still longed to possess with every fibre of her being.

She sighed softly, feeling the warmth of her own breath upon her front paws. It was futile to dwell thus on past desires, lost lusts. But she could not help the feelings that the very sight of Rama evoked in her. It was all she could do not to clamber down the cliffside and bound up to him, to embrace him in her limbs, feeling his hard, masculine strength against her furry pelt, entwine herself around his torso and—

Rama was coming towards the cliff.

She snapped herself out of her daydream and watched as the mortal for whom she had lusted so long and so hopelessly came to the foot of the very cliff upon which she was standing, concealed, and, with a last brief word to his companions, began climbing the sheer rock face.

TWO

‘My lord.’

Rama paused at the sound of Hanuman’s voice. Standing at the foot of the cliff, looking up in preparation before starting his climb, he glanced around. The vanar was walking towards him up the sandy slope of the upper beach. ‘Yes, my friend?’

‘My lord, there is an easier and speedier way to breach these cliffs.’

Rama turned to face him fully. ‘How?’

Hanuman bent low, prostrated himself, and touched Rama’s feet. ‘With your ashirwaad, my lord.’

‘You always have my blessings, Hanuman. Rise and show me this solution you propose.’

Hanuman regained his feet, inhaled a deep breath, then began to expand himself. As with the earlier times, it was no less amazing a sight to behold. The vanar’s body appeared to magnify rapidly, growing evenly and proportionately. In seconds, he was the height of a tall tree, then a hundred feet. He stepped aside to avoid inconveniencing Rama and the others on the beach as his feet grew to the size of large boulders. He continued to grow until very shortly he was as tall as the cliff itself—and then even taller.

When he was half as tall again as the top of the cliff, he paused, ceasing to grow, and moved forward very carefully, taking great pains not to touch any of his comrades or masters on the beach far below. Bending over the cliff, he placed his hands firmly on the edge, taking a hold of it, then pressed down hard. The muscles in his shoulders and back and arms began to bulge and stand out in clear relief, each corded group individually distinguishable. Rama saw that this immense strain was not due to any great expenditure of effort on his part; rather, it was due to his desire not to cause any sudden avalanches which would endanger those below. The crowds thronging the beach raised a great roar of excitement as Hanuman began to work the edge of the cliff. They grew silent in awe as they watched the gigantic vanar strain and sweat, using his powerful hands to mould the very rock of which the cliff was composed. The troops still on the bridge began calling out from the ocean, for Hanuman must have been visible from miles away. Then they grew silent too as the sounds of rocks cracking and bursting travelled on the balmy evening breeze that was blowing from the south-west. Rama could see the dust of shattered rocks rise in a small cloud, but Hanuman's immense body obscured most of what he was doing. He saw the vanar's right knee rise as he placed it against the cliff, the way a man might press his knee upon a mattress or a load to keep it in place. The vanar's powerful back muscles tensed and bulged as he worked his will upon the Palisade cliffs. Glancing to one side, Rama saw the rakshasa Vibhisena staring open-mouthed at the sight. Even the others, familiar by now with their vanar compatriot's magical ability, watched in awe.

After several moments, Hanuman issued a great sigh of satisfaction and moved aside, allowing them a clearer view of the cliff face. Or what had been the cliff face only moments ago. Now, where a sheer wall of black rock had risen to obstruct their way, a sloping passage had been formed, rising from the beach at a steep but perfectly negotiable gradient, no less than a rough ramp leading to the top.

As the massed soldiers took in the implications of what their fellow vanar had wrought with his bare hands and brute strength, a great roar of approval rose up from their combined throats. Rama joined in with his own voice, raising his hands and cheering Hanuman's achievement.

Hanuman bowed low before his lord, reaching out to touch Rama's feet. His enormous fingers embedded themselves a full yard deep into the sand at Rama's feet, creating a veritable pit. Rama had to step back to keep his balance. The tips of the fingers that sought out his feet were each the size of an oak trunk. He touched the fingers with his own hands, feeling the way an ant must feel when faced with an elephant. 'Bless you always, my soul-friend. Once again, you earn your own shakti through the greatness of your karma.'

Then he turned with a great smile and addressed his company. 'Start the ascent in an orderly fashion.'

Supanakha thought she was doomed for certain. It took her a moment to understand what the vanar intended when he began to expand himself. She turned and scampered away down the cave tunnel not a moment too soon. A fraction of a moment later, the cave mouth behind her began to close shut with a grinding of rock, and the tunnel went pitch dark as the vanar pressed the rock itself inwards. She felt the thumping vibrations of sections of the tunnel's roof caving in and the pricks of fragments striking her furred back and haunches. She raced down the tunnel until finally, several moments later, she discerned it was safe to stop and look back. There was nothing to see. The tunnel had collapsed, the very cliffside moulded by the vanar into god alone knew what—although it was not hard to guess. The vanar had obviously pressed the cliff rock into a more negotiable slope, so that Rama's soldiers could climb it more speedily.

She padded on all fours down the dark tunnel, pausing to sneeze out some of the dust raised by the vanar's manipulation of the rock, and seethed silently.

She didn't know whether to curse the vanar for almost killing her accidentally or marvel at his brute power. A little of both, probably. Fortunately for her, she had seen his amazing size-altering ability first-hand the previous night, and knew well enough to get out of the way. He was a fool, though. Had he been sharp enough to see this cave, they would have had another ingress into the heart of Ravana's sanctum. For this network of tunnels led all the way to the heart of Mount Nikumbhila, yojanas from the northern shore. By following the tunnels, Rama's troops could easily have penetrated to the innermost bowels of Ravana's power centre. And as far as she could tell, even the normally paranoid lord of Lanka had not seen fit to post guards in them. Come to think of it, how careless could her cousin be, to have neglected to send a horde or two to repel the invaders as they arrived on the beach? It would have been easy enough for the kumbha-rakshasas to roll a few boulders down from the cliff top, or vats of boiling oil. Or better still, use some of his high-falutin rakshasa maya to smash those arriving vanars and bears before they could even land on Lankan soil. She had not thought herself a patriot, and irreverence and rebellion had been her lifelong trademarks, but for better or worse, this land was her home, the last bastion of rakshasa life upon the mortal plane—upon all the planes, for that matter— and it rankled her to see the invaders land on its shores and start their campaign of ingress without so much as a rakshasa claw raised to obstruct them.

Is that what you think, cousin dearest? That I would stand aside and let the mortal and his furry friends land upon our shores like holidaymakers arriving for a friendly visit? Do you take me to be that much of a fool?

She stopped short, sniffing the darkness sharply. There. She could smell the unmistakable odour of the lord of rakshasas: that stench as of vegetation rotting in a deep jungle, a reek like long-decomposed boar or bull lying fly-laden in the hot summer sun, a sharp tang redolent of freshly spilled blood ... and a pungent smell pervading the whole mix, like freshly spilled semen from an elephant in masth-heat. Only Ravana smelled like that.

She relaxed, not wasting her time trying to figure out whether he was present here in flesh or merely in spirit. Here in Lanka, Ravana was the very air you breathed. Reeking and omnipresent.

‘I thought you were spending too much time in the palace of pleasures indulging your carnal lusts, cousin,’ she said mockingly. ‘Why else would you not take steps to repel the invaders? Why else would you allow them to land on our shores in the first place? And why else would you send your generals to their beds for the night while Rama and his vaulting vanar heroes cover your land like a pestilence of locusts? Yes, cousin. I thought you must be surely slaking your lust between the haunches of some new rakshasi plaything—or some two dozen new playthings. Too lost in your own sensual gratification to even take this menace seriously. Either that or ... ’ she paused.

Go on, my sweet cat-sister. Don't hold back now when you're enjoying a rare moment of perfect eloquence. Finish that last thought as well.

She shrugged. She had said enough to rouse his ire already. She might as well say the rest. ‘Either that or I thought you were so shaken by the vanar’s display of strength last night that you were cowering and cringing in some haunted corner, and were intending to stay there while Rama overran our country and came to drag you out by your hair—by your ten heads of hair!— and put an end to your misery.’

There was utter silence after she had finished. She could hear the steady thrumming of blood in her veins. Had she gone too far? Calling Ravana a coward was somewhat beyond the bounds of good taste. But she had been genuinely angry. She shrugged. Someone had to say it. And his generals were hardly man enough to stand up and tell him such things to his face—to his faces. Or even to whisper it behind his back, for that matter.

A soft chuckle came back from the darkness. It was the most unexpected response imaginable. But in a way, she felt a sparking of hope. If he was that confident that he could laugh away such bitchy criticism, then he must be more in control of the situation than she had thought. Only a king who had completely lost his senses would laugh like that at such a time—or a king who possessed secret knowledge that nobody else had.

Bravo, cousin, bravo. It would appear you have become something of a loyalist after all. Who would have thought it? Just a few months here in the homeland and you are a Lankan through and through. Simply amazing! I had no idea you had become this patriotic.

She sniffed out a suitable spot in a corner of the tunnel and relieved herself copiously. After she was done, she shook herself vigorously. ‘I care nothing for Lanka,’ she said brusquely. ‘But this matter concerns my rakshasa honour as well. I want to see the mortal crushed and broken like a smashed beetle, not running free across the countryside with an army. It is not right for mortals and vanars and bears to dare to encroach upon rakshasa land this way. Why do you stand aside and do nothing? I heard you tell your generals to go to bed. Why are you not repelling the invaders? Why did you let them land here at all? That is what I understand least of all! Why could you not stop them before they even reached Lankan shores?’

Ravana’s voice, still rich with the amusement he had found in her last remarks, was tinged with steel this time. ‘Because this is an endgame, cousin. Not a skirmish. Not another battle. Not even a war. It is the end of all wars. The culmination of a long and ancient conflict, the last of many campaigns waged over more than one era. I do not seek merely to win this time, nor to repel, or crush. I seek to triumph.’

She realised that his voice was no longer in her head; it had assumed physical form. He was here in the tunnel, she sensed, not far from where she stood. She sniffed, seeking him out, and her senses told her that he was less than three yards ahead, to the right. Slowly, as if locating him had made it happen, he began to emerge from the darkness, his sorcerous shakti illuminating the very pores of his leathery skin, until he stood revealed before her in all his rakshasa splendour, nine of his ten heads engaged as always in their individual bickering and constant dialogue, while the central head addressed her, its eyes glittering like jewels lit by their own inner light.

‘Cousin. You asked me why I permitted Rama to land his forces here? It was because this is rakshasa territory. This is my land. And by coming here, he has played right into my hands. Now, I have only to reach out,’ his hands did as his words promised, reaching out with the palms facing upwards, then closing into mighty fists, the bones crunching harshly, ‘and crush them. Back on the mainland, they might have been able to run or hide or evade me somehow. On the open seas, they might have found help from their oceanic allies. But here on Lanka, they are within my grasp, naked. They have nowhere to go from here. There is nothing they can do to resist my power. Nothing they can do now ... except die.’

She stared, mesmerised. His vitality was so overwhelming, his power rolling off him in thick, palpable waves, that she was compelled to believe every syllable. If any creature possessed the ability to do as he willed, it was Ravana. All her doubts and resentments melted away, seeming foolish now in the presence of such potent shakti. How could she ever have doubted him? How could she have accused him of neglect, of cowardice even? Look at him! Magnificent, omnipotent, conqueror of the overworld and the underworld both, defeater of the devas themselves, master of all he surveyed. What fool would dare oppose him? Of course he had a plan. Brilliant strategist that he was, he had chosen to allow the armies of Rama to land on the shores of Lanka, to lure them here just as a predator lures prey into its sanctuary, the better to pounce on it and savage it at its leisure.

In a single moment, she went from blustering resentment to reverential ecstasy. She gazed up adoringly at the ten-headed master of her race, quivering with pleasure and sensual delight at merely being within his virile presence. She knew she was allowing herself to be hypnotised by the sorcery he wielded to subjugate those who encountered him, but did not care. He was Lanka. And he was indomitable. This was the Ravana she had admired and feared for so long. Who was so named Ra-va-na because his aspect and his deeds were fearsome enough to make the universe scream.

Only one question occurred to her.

‘How?’ she asked, lowering her eyes to show him subservience. ‘How will you do it, my lord?’

She asked it not as a form of censure or objection, only out of curiosity. How would he choose to dispatch the forces of Rama? What devious intent did he have in store for them? The sadistic part of her relished the revelation of some grotesque new means of taking life, the one act that gave her most pleasure of all, more than even the act of procreation, which after all, was only a means of defying one’s own mortality. She preferred to embrace the dark descent. To lick the loins of the deepest, darkest, most secret craving of all living beings—the ultimate mating of all, the coupling of living flesh with sudden, unforeseen, brutally violent death.

Ravana’s faces shared one of those rare moments of concatenation, those brief instants when all ten heads were united in a common thought, joining their formidable individual powers to form one great chain of mental prowess. All heads smiled, displaying a variety of teeth, glistening with the saliva of predatory anticipation. The lion was hot for the hunt.

‘Come,’ he said, his ten tongues speaking in ten mouths all at once, writhing glossily like serpents in the mouths of suboceanic sea-caves. ‘Let me show you.’

He clapped his hands together.

And in a wink of an eye, she found herself elsewhere. She gasped as she teetered on the edge of an abyss, her claws scrabbling for purchase on a gravelly slope, then ceased her struggles as she realised that she was not present here in physical form. Ravana had brought only her consciousness with him— or rather, had summoned it to him—for he was here in all his corporeal glory, naked body weeping perspiration that roiled and dripped like hot oil through the crevices and contours of his exquisitely defined musculature. But she had no time to lust at the sight of his magnificent anatomy, for the thing he had brought her here to see lay below, far below, in a great abyss that she guessed was within the labyrinthine network of cavernous tunnels that led ultimately to the great volcano that had once birthed Lanka and formed the island-kingdom itself. The volcano had lain silent and still for nigh on fourteen years, as had Ravana himself under the influence of the brahm-astra cage in which he had been imprisoned at Mithila. But she saw now that it was not truly dead, only dormant, and even in this dormant state, the heat it gave off was immense, intolerable. She cringed at the rim of the ledge as waves of searing heat rolled up and over her. Had she been present here in the flesh, it would have been roasting now, and her fur singed and smoking. Even incorporeal as she was, she crouched in reflex, fearful of the power of the sleeping titan.

Ravana was chanting shlokas in that rhythmic incantation that she loathed. Every time she heard a rishi or tapasvi sadhu in a forest muttering those Sanskrit verses, she felt inclined to leap upon them and tear out their throats—and she had done exactly that innumerable times. Every rakshasa hated the very sound of those incantations, that smooth, perfect Sanskrit that seemed to carry the motes of energy of Brahman itself in every syllable. Except that Ravana was chanting them backwards, perfectly inverting every syllable, every word, every shloka, to reverse the energies of Brahman. And the effect was galvanising to a rakshasi ear. It was the sound of roaring blood and cracking bone and brutal agony, the very antithesis of the peace and beauty of their original meaning.

Revelling in the sound, she persuaded herself to peek once more over the rim of the crater. And saw a sight astonishing enough to hold her attention despite the terrible maw of the volcano far below. From a ledge at the tip of another tunnel much like this one but a few dozen yards below and to the right of where she crouched, a line of rakshasas of both sexes were emerging. From their white and red-ochre robes she knew them to be the followers of the same Brahminical cult that Vibhisena had espoused. Indeed, every one of them was anointed on their foreheads with the ash markings of Brahmins. They were lined up in neat rows extending far back into the dimly lit tunnel. From the glazed absence of intelligence in their half-shut eyes, she guessed that Ravana had mesmerised them somehow.

And compelled them to do what they were about to do. For as she watched, the first Brahmin rakshasas stepped off the ledge they were standing on, and fell to certain destruction far below. She followed their plummeting bodies for a long moment until they struck the dark slag-covered surface of the volcano's pool of curdled magma. Their flesh ignited instantly on impact with the searing magma and burst into flame. More bodies followed in an unending procession, until the belly of the volcano was a hotbed of flaming spots.

As the Brahmins continued to fall, and Ravana continued to chant his obscenely inverted mantras, she felt a trembling beneath her insubstantial paws. Or perhaps she felt it beneath her real paws, still back in the cavern where Ravana had found her. For she sensed that this potent vibration was reverberating not just through the maw of the volcano, but throughout the length and breadth of Lanka itself. She had no clue what dark ritual Ravana was performing here, but it was obvious that it was some form of power-enhancement. He was clearly using the fire-sacrifice of these hundreds upon hundreds of pious Brahmin souls to create a well of Brahman power with which he intended to work some monstrous sorcery.

Just what that sorcery might be, she shuddered to imagine. As the rumbling increased, growing deafening and causing her every nerve to shudder painfully, she was transported back to the cavern. Just before she was pushed away by Ravana—for she knew it was he who had magically removed her in the nick of time—she caught a tantalisingly brief glimpse of a pillar of fire rising up from the depths of the volcano far below. She barely had time to glimpse it before she was whisked away by Ravana's sorcery, but she could have sworn on her own black soul that the unnatural fire had a face and features that strongly resembled those of the being responsible for its creation—ten faces and sets of features in fact.

THREE

Rama felt a faint trembling beneath his feet and frowned. Perhaps it was caused by the pounding of the feet of his enormous army.

As suddenly as it had begun, it faded away. He dismissed it and refocussed on the task at hand, overseeing the transfer of the armies from the sea-bridge to land.

After Hanuman's dramatic alteration of the cliffside, the ascent posed no challenge. Rama and Lakshman led the first wave to the top, deafened by the cheering of the troops in celebration of their crossing as well as at entering Lanka so easily. The top of the cliff was a plateau stretching for many miles, rolling grassland dotted with clumps of wooded areas. Vibhisena had said that Lanka was shaped like a teardrop suspended just below the mainland. It was some hundred and twenty yojanas in length from shore to shore, and at its widest point at its waist, some forty-five yojanas across. That was both larger and smaller than Rama had expected. All he had learned of Lanka before today were stray bits of information gleaned from legends and myths. Like all such scraps of information, they had ranged wildly from fantastical descriptions of a hellish asura-infested landscape with a great black castle set in the heart of a seething exploding volcano, to a vapid desert island barely a mile from end to end. Like all realities, the truth was to be found in neither extreme. It was a country much like the southern tip of the mainland they had left behind, the flora and fauna appearing almost identical to that one, for at some point in its geographical past, this island had certainly been attached to that mainland. Its lushness was unexpected, yet welcome. For his first concern had been how to feed such a large army with an ocean separating them from their familiar sources of sustenance. Now, he saw, he would not have to concern himself with such mundane matters: the troops could easily find forage in these fecund grasslands and forests. He and his generals could concentrate on the real issues at hand: the strategies of war.

He called a meeting of the leaders at a suitable spot on the plateau, close enough to the edge that they might oversee the beach, where troops were still arriving in a steady stream, as well as spy the lie of the land and plan their next moves. Twilight had fallen by now, a quiet, luminous pallor falling upon the world, with birdsong and the soft shirring of the ocean providing a placid backdrop. It was hard to believe this was the dreaded lair of rakshasas. He noticed the disbelieving look on the faces of each new wave of troops that ascended to the plateau: surely this could not be Lanka? Land of rakshasas? Lair of asuras? Impossible!

For some reason, the impossibility of it troubled him too. He could not easily express why; but it bothered him that the land seemed so peaceful and verdant. That their landing had been unopposed, their ingress unobstructed. Others had voiced these same concerns, but they had been answered, doubtfully. After all, it was not for nothing that these cliffs had been named Palisades. Had they not had Hanuman's prodigious talents to simplify their ascent, these rock walls would have indeed acted as natural palisades, daunting them for hours, perhaps even an entire night and a day, for it would have been no joke to have such great numbers climb such steep faces. As it was, the only thing they had to contend with now was keeping the lines moving up from the beach in orderly fashion, making sure that the flow remained as continuous and unstymied as a flowing river. Already, a goodly percentage of their numbers were upon the plateau, and at this present rate, a few minutes after the time the last vanars and bears came ashore at around midnight, they would all be up here, assembled and ready for war.

He turned his attention to the gathering of chiefs. They were all here: Jambavan, Kambunara and their generals of varying pelt shades—fawn, light brown, dark brown, jet black, and black with white streaks. King Sugreeva, Prince Angad, Hanuman and the five vanar generals. And Vibhisena, Lakshman and himself. The troops were being managed by the clan chiefs, who had gained immeasurable confidence after the successful crossing and the absence of opposition on the Lankan shore. This unwieldy mass of furry friends was finally starting to resemble an army that could give Lanka's rakshasas cause to fear. If nothing else, their sheer numbers would count for a great advantage: from Hanuman's keen observations of Lanka's forces, he deduced that they outnumbered the rakshasas by a factor of three to one. Now it was upto Rama to ensure that this weight of numbers was utilised in the most effective manner possible.

'The key is speed,' he said. 'We must strike like the cobra, swift and unhesitant. And continue striking, in unending waves.' He indicated Vibhisena. 'As you can see from this solitary example, the average rakshasa is thrice as large as the average vanar. And with a hide that is almost akin to armour. Even if three vanars were to attack a single rakshasa at a time, the enemy would still have the advantage of weight and strength.'

He noticed the frown on Vibhisena's face and paused. 'Do you wish to add something to that, my lord Vibhisena?' he asked politely.

The rakshasa nodded thankfully. 'By your leave, Rama. I am not a typical example of my brother's warrior forces. As I am sure Hanuman can tell you. But even the sturdiest Pulastya—which is my clan—are pygmies compared to the kumbhas.'

'Kumbhas?' Lakshman asked.

'Indeed, Lord Lakshman. The kumbha-rakshasas are related to our other brother, Kumbhakarna. While they do not possess his extraordinary stature, for he is quite unique in that way, they are considerably larger than the average warrior-rakshasa.'

'How large are they, then?' Prince Angad demanded with uncharacteristic churlishness. Both the vanar prince and his father were still openly suspicious of their rakshasa collaborator and his motives. King Sugreeva felt strongly about the wisdom of discussing vital military strategy with a member of the enemy; it was only his respect for Rama that had compelled him to swallow his objections. Angad, of course, had followed his father's example and bitten his own tongue as well.

Vibhisena shrugged. 'At least thrice as large as I am, in height as well as weight.'

Everybody exclaimed. Even the bears glowered. 'And how many of these kambos are there?' asked Kambunara angrily, as if Vibhisena was personally responsible for birthing the whole subspecies.

'A full rakshasa garrison,' he said. 'Roughly equivalent to two of your akshohini.' He addressed the last to Rama and Lakshman. They exchanged tense glances. An akshohini was over sixty thousand soldiers. Two akshohini would mean a lakh and twenty thousand kumbha-rakshasas, each thrice as large as ordinary rakshasas, which meant they were each about four times as large as the bears.

Sugreeva stared coldly at Vibhisena. The vanars did not take disappointment well, and the king's response at hearing about the kumbhas was writ clearly on his sorrowful features. 'How do we know that these beasts even exist?’ he asked. ‘In all my years I have never heard of rakshasas that large.’

Hanuman spoke up. ‘They exist,’ he said simply. ‘I fought them only yesterday.’

Lakshman turned to Vibhisena suddenly. ‘You mentioned your other brother, Kumbhakarna? Who is this person?’

Vibhisena passed a hand across his eyes. ‘He is not someone any of you would wish to face in battle, Lord Lakshman. Fortunately, I do not think you will have to.’

‘Why is that?’ asked the vanar general Sarabha. ‘Does he not fight on the side of Ravana? Is he a dissenter like yourself?’

‘Nay, nay,’ Vibhisena said. ‘Would that he was. He is a partner with Ravana in every vile act he has ever committed. Together they have ravaged the realm of the devas and wreaked havoc in the underworld. Kumbhakarna unleashed in battle is an army unto himself.’ He shuddered and shook his head. ‘If he were in this fray, we would not be standing here debating sizes and weights. All our strategies would be devoted solely to defending ourselves against his onslaught. And I honestly would not know how that could be done. Nothing can face my brother and survive. Nothing that I have ever seen or heard of before.’

Everybody looked at the rakshasa with doubtful expressions.

Prince Angad seemed the least willing to take Vibhisena’s words at face value. ‘What exactly makes this Kumbhakarna so formidable? He is a rakshasa, yes? A large rakshasa? Well, even the largest can be downed in battle.’

Vibhisena looked pityingly at the young vanar. ‘Nay, Prince Angad. He is not merely large. He is the thing against which all other things are measured, and are found wanting. A long time ago, Kumbhakarna was granted a boon by the devas. He had only to speak his wish and it would be fulfilled. But he was clumsy and mis-uttered the Sanskrit shloka. So, instead of asking to be able to wage war all year round, which was what he desired, he asked to be able to wage sleep all year round! Lord Brahma, taking advantage of the verbal slip, immediately granted the boon. And so Kumbhakarna, who loved nothing more than to do violence every waking minute, was cursed to sleep for six months at a stretch. He awakens for a single day, during which he eats prodigious quantities of food and consumes great volumes of liquor, and then only is he ready to fight. But since there are rarely any foes worthy of facing him and surviving more than a few moments, let alone an entire day, he has taken to eating non-stop until he falls asleep once again. That may be a day, or a month or six months later. As long as he is awake, he eats and drinks, and then, soon enough, he sleeps again. And once he sleeps, nothing can awaken him.’ He sighed, and made a rakshasa gesture that suggested relief. ‘He is in the middle of a sleep cycle right now. Which is why I know for certain that he will not take the field of battle in this conflict.’

Everybody looked around at each other, unsure of how to take this extraordinary story. ‘How large exactly is he, then?’ Lakshman asked curiously. ‘I mean, if he is of the same clan as the kumbha-rakshasas, then he must be also—’

He paused as the ground beneath them vibrated briefly, like the floor of a canyon beneath an oncoming landslide. But they were standing at the highest point in sight and the tremor passed as suddenly as it had begun. Vibhisena frowned as if about to comment on it, then shook his head and addressed Lakshman’s comment.

‘No, no, no, Lord Lakshman. The kumbhas are like ants before him. He is of a stature that cannot be measured.’ Vibhisena indicated Hanuman. ‘You have seen our vanar friend when he expands himself to his greatest size? As he did yesterday when he pounded the Tower of Lanka into the ground. Kumbhakarna would be taller than that, and much, much more powerful. For he retains every morsel and every drop that he consumes. That is part of the boon that Brahma inflicted upon him ... a curse really.’

Lakshman turned his head slowly to look at Hanuman, then raised his eyes to the sky, trying to imagine a rakshasa taller than Hanuman’s greatest height and stronger as well.

Rama saw that this line of discussion was making the vanars nervous and irritable. It was time to divert the conversation back to the original line of discussion. ‘In any event,’ he said, ‘if he is not able to take to the field, then we need not concern ourselves with him. Let us discuss our first assault now.’

He squatted on the ground and began pointing with a long stick that Lakshman had cut for him for this purpose, indicating the stones they had placed in rows to suggest the formations of the two forces. He had based his plan on Vibhisena and Hanuman’s description of Lanka’s geography as well as the likely defensive formations that Ravana’s army would mount. Lakshman had lit a small fire to illuminate the space in which they had convened. The vanar and bear leaders had learned to steel themselves in the presence of Agni for the sake of their mortal friends but a few of them still blanched and winced as the hastily assembled sticks crackled and hissed in the flames.

Beyond the circle of light, Rama glimpsed the partially illuminated outlines of the troops bounding past in the darkness, eyes glistening red in the moonless night. They had fallen silent out of deference to the war council that was in progress, as the landing progressed beyond the initial euphoria to a stage of grim consolidation. Nightfall had darkened the mood as well. The entire landscape seemed different by darkness. Rama was glad that there would be a moon tonight and the next few nights: they had spied the new moon eight nights before, which meant it was waxing and would be full in another six or seven nights. They ought to have enough moonlight to see by once the moon rose in another watch or two.

He resumed the description of his plans, using the stick and the lined-up stones to illustrate his strategy.

‘As I was saying earlier, our greatest ally is speed. The vanars shall line themselves up in waves, thus. After three waves of vanars, there will be one wave of bears. Which means that three vanars shall attack each rakshasa, and inflict as much damage as they can, and before the rakshasas have time to tear them apart or cut them down, the bears will follow, slamming into them with all their strength and weight. When the bear wave strikes, the first line of rakshasas should fall back. Then we repeat the formation. And so on, until we break through the rakshasa lines and crack their defences. At that point ... ’

He paused. Was it just his hand that was trembling? Or was the very ground on which the stick was resting starting to shudder? He looked around at the troops still pouring onto the plateau from the beach. Could their footfalls be causing the ground to shake? But why should it start of a sudden? Perhaps—

‘My lords!’

The shout rose from the edge of the plateau. It was Nala, entrusted with the function of channelling the various vanar troops into the formation decided by Rama earlier, telling this tribe to go there, and that one here, and so on. He was a dimly glimpsed furry smear in the near-darkness. Only the faint spill of light from the fire made it possible to see him at all. He was waving frantically, leaping up and down in true vanar fashion.

‘My lords!’ he cried again. ‘The land! The land, it—’

He got no further. Chaos erupted all around, as the earth itself heaved up and began to attack them.

In the deep cavern in which Ravana had caged her, Sita felt the earth shuddering and opened her eyes. She had been seated cross-legged, meditating to calm her senses and reduce her bodily metabolism to a minimum. After the morning’s display of shakti, Ravana had flown her into this cavern lit by the ghostly illumination of his sorcerous stones, and protected the entrance with a guard of rakshasas. The interior of the cavern was curiously similar to the place where she had been imprisoned when first brought to Lanka: she even thought she could recognise some of the same trees, with the markings of the rakshasis who had tormented her then. They had used their talons to scratch out obscene drawings and markings on the trunks of the trees, and the trees in this place had similar scratches and markings—similar but not the same. She knew this because these markings made no sense whatsoever. It was as if an artist had attempted to hurriedly copy them and had only roughly replicated them, without understanding what they actually stood for. She wondered if this was a consequence of the damage that Hanuman had inflicted upon the Pushpak. This thought made her rejoice ever so slightly; it proved that even the great and shakti-shaali, omnipotent Ravana had his flaws. Even his maha-shakti had its limits. An imperfectly rendered obscenity upon the trunk of a sala tree, an Ashoka sapling which was bent to the right instead of to the left as it had been in that earlier grove ... these were tiny suggestions that Ravana's sorcery was not infallible. Hopefully, neither was Ravana himself.

The cavern was vast, the Ashoka grove was the most peaceful part of it. She had enough space to wander around, even a little brook and a garden with trees and a shrubbery. Yet she knew that she was no less a prisoner here than she had been in the tower.

She had immersed herself in meditation all morning, knowing that the only thing she could do now was wait—wait until Rama arrived and saved her, or until Ravana finally lost patience and she was forced to end her life. His limits had been tested to the extreme, she knew, and this morning's outburst and display had been to intimidate her into succumbing to his will. She had resisted not by pitting her strength of will against his, but by simply negating his use of force. If one did not accept an abuse flung at oneself by another person, that abuse continued to belong to the person who had uttered it; by simply rejecting it, one brushed off the insult or abuse without any effect. Ravana's lust and his growing desperation were his problems to deal with, not her's.

And yet, she knew that even the most disciplined application of yogic endurance would not help her survive much longer. Ravana's use of force could easily become physical at any moment, and while she might use her yogic strength to combat him mentally, she had no defences against his great physical powers, let alone his sorcerously enhanced strength.

If that happened, she would not live long.

For she would sooner kill herself and her unborn child than succumb to the rakshasa's will. There were no circumstances under which she would yield to his demands or even provide him with the smallest modicum of the legitimacy he desired. Perhaps the greatest advantage she still possessed was the knowledge that he wished her to yield willingly. To attack her would be an admission of his own failure—and her triumph. Either way, all she could do was wait him out.

And so she sat here on the grassy floor of the artificial garden, lost in meditation. Seeking that yoganidra state the devas were so famous for: if she could lose herself the way Shiva had, perhaps all this would pass in the wink of a third eye, and when she regained her consciousness, Rama—

That was when the earth began shuddering.

She unwound her limbs and rose slowly to her feet as the ground vibrated with increasing urgency. The walls and ceiling of the cavern, far and high though they were, shook as well, and fine powdery rock dust trickled down around her. In moments, she was compelled to stand with her legs spread to maintain her balance, clutching to the trunk of the nearest Ashoka tree for support. The shudders increased, as if the island was in the throes of an earthquake. The light in the cavern flickered, dimmed to pinpoints, and then grew suddenly brighter, dazzlingly bright, too bright to look at. She shielded her face from the blinding light, and clung to the trunk of an Ashoka tree, alert to any falling debris—for now the tremors were great enough that she feared the cave ceiling itself might crash down upon her.

Instead, the floor rose up.

She gasped as the grassy ground on which she stood rose without warning, carrying her with it. The tree she was clinging to remained steady, her only support, but everything else was rising and falling, moving, morphing, reshaping ... She could actually see the walls bulge inwards, and then change texture, as if some magical force were altering their very substance. She saw the chiselled rock of the cave wall darken, then smoothen out, then develop a network of indented lines ... The pattern that was developing seemed almost familiar. As if she had seen it often before. She sent up a silent prayer as a great and terrible grinding and gnashing echoed up the length of the cavern and then it was plunged into pitch darkness.

FOUR

The ground beneath Rama's feet rose up with a roar like a Gir lion charging, flinging him upwards and backwards so suddenly, he had no chance to react in any way. It was as if the earth had reached out with an angry palm, shoving him viciously. He felt himself falling through blackness—no, not falling, rising! Rising up, up, up into the air, upon the fist of earth that had erupted beneath his feet. He was transported upwards against his will, too rapidly to do anything more than lie still and try to catch his stolen breath. As he rose up swiftly through the darkness, he heard an angry spitting and hissing, like a nest of Uragas woken by an enemy, and saw a shower of sparks explode in the air somewhere far to the left, dispelling the darkness momentarily and filling the night with a cascade of blazing sticks and fragments from the remnants of the fire Lakshman had lit, illuminating the plateau for a goodly distance for a few shocking moments.

It was a scene like nothing he had ever seen before. The ground heaved and rose and fell all around, twisting and writhing into a variety of tortured, contorted forms and planes. Like a living beast, it moved and turned and rose and fell, crushing vanars and bears here, tossing others remorselessly, sucking some down. The air was rent with the shrill screeches of vanars and the lowing rage of impotent bears. Once again, as with the wall of water, nature itself had turned against them.

He was flung so high that for an instant, he could even look over the edge of the cliff, down to the very beach itself. He glimpsed the line of greybacks, ragged and heaving in the choppy ocean. It was too brief a glimpse to tell for sure, but he thought that the ocean itself was not churning—it was only the effect of the land mass moving that was affecting the water somewhat. He glimpsed also the lines of troops still pouring onto the beach, slowed to a shocked crawl, stunned by the sudden eruption of the land. He heard the frightened cheekas of vanars on the beach, just landed and finding the solid sand suddenly exploding and imploding around them as if fired upon by invisible astras, except that even celestial weapons would not operate in such a manic, frenzied fashion. It was as if an unseen army of crabs were scurrying up out of and down into the sand of the beach, tossing some vanars and bears off their shells as they rose, sucking others down as they descended again, in an insane dance of sand and beast—and blood.

Then he reached the peak of his ascent, or as high as the fist of rock holding him aloft wished to go, and gasped in shocked wonder, experiencing a moment of perfect weightlessness. Like a bird pausing in its flapping to allow a current of air to bear it along. But this was no air wave holding him a hundred yards aloft; it was the ground itself, risen up. And he knew that what rose up must surely fall. He braced his body, curling himself up into a ball and awaiting the impact of the fall. He would survive it, no matter what, he would survive it and then he would ...

The earth shifted beneath him, scraping his bare back, moving under his limbs, tearing itself apart and putting itself together anew, reshaping itself. Great groaning and grinding sounds came from beneath him. He dared to open his eyes once more and tried to orient himself. There was almost no light to see by up here, but he could sense the transformation taking place by the sound and vibration itself. The finger that had raised him up was not falling back—apparently, tonight on Lanka, the natural laws of the world would not be entertained. Instead, it was growing, expanding. He uncurled himself slowly, cautiously, rising to his feet. And instantly wished he had not done so.

The burning debris from the fire, flung across the plateau for tens of yards in every direction, served to illuminate isolated patches of land. Seen from this vantage point, a hundred or more yards above the ground, it was like seeing a map of this part of the island laid out before him, drawn upon parchment by some obscene, twisted artist.

The ground was re-forming itself into a new shape. He could already guess what that shape might possibly be, because the progress was so swift. It was as if the island of Lanka itself had been commanded by the lord of rakshasas to alter its appearance according to his desires. And in doing so, it was moving of its own volition, rising, falling, squaring off, elongating, accomplishing what ten thousand artisans could not do in a dozen years—within a single night. For at the pace at which the reshaping was proceeding, it was evident that this devil's work would be done before dawn. The fact that they, Rama and his fellows, his troops, had been present here at the time of the earth's reshaping, was no doubt part of the lord of Lanka's plan. For while accomplishing his epic feat of sorcerous engineering, he was also launching the first major assault upon Rama's armies. Rama could see dead beasts everywhere: some torn apart by the earth separating, others crushed beyond recognition when two sections hammered themselves together, yet others tossed high, over the edge of the cliff perhaps, to fall on the jagged rocks far below, or even here on the plateau.

He saw a cluster of vanars, bunched together as was their tendency under crisis, thrown mercifully upon the upper branches of a tree, clinging desperately with limbs and tails. Another group, not as fortunate, were tossed high and then left to fall back upon naked rock, their bodies shattering, skulls smashing open to spill splatters of gore, the survivors dying slow, agonising deaths as they lay there helplessly, spines and limbs broken to fragments. Bears were worse off, by and large, for even when thrown down onto trees they could hardly be expected to cling on to passing branches. They hit the ground with heavy thuds, many never to rise again. Those who did rise, were thrown down once more, for the earth continued to shake and shudder, and split open, hiving off in unexpected directions. There was no way to predict which way it would go next, up, down or sideways. In places, he saw the earth split open, swallowing entire companies of his troops, the poor creatures falling silently into the dark maw of a crevice so deep, he could not hear their bodies strike the bottom.

As he watched, stunned and helpless for the moment, he began to discern the rough outline of the new shape the land was taking, and to guess at the ultimate form this sorcerous redesigning was aimed at producing. His fists tightened with cold, impotent fury, and he began reaching for the celestial weapons with which he had compelled the lord of the ocean himself to show himself and cease his attacks not long ago. But he stopped, fingers curling in upon themselves, knowing that there was nothing he could do to stop this particular assault. Here, even the weapons of Brahma and Vishnu and Shiva would have no effect upon the sorcery of Ravana. For this was the rakshasa's domain. He had prepared for this very moment ingeniously, infusing the earth with his sorcery in some fashion, waiting until enough of Rama's troops were on the island—yet before they were ready to launch their own assault—and then he had struck. Now all Rama and his armies could do was wait out the attack. Attempt to survive it somehow. And when it was over ...

He sat down cross-legged upon the spur of ground that had borne him up. It continued to shudder and writhe beneath him, as the sorcerous reshaping continued. Had it been possible, he would have climbed down and attempted to do something, anything. But there was nothing to be done. They were an army at war, and the enemy had launched the first assault. A treacherous cowardly assault, for not one soldier of the enemy's ranks was here to spill blood or even offer a target. An unbalanced, unfair, uneven assault by an invisible, greatly superior force, upon a relatively helpless one. But an assault nevertheless. And faced by such an assault, he could do only what any commander did at such a time: wait out the assault and pray that his soldiers survived it.

He tried to calm himself, regain control of his senses, and prepare himself for the war ahead. To form in his mind a strategy by which he could strike Ravana a blow as intense and unexpected as the one he had struck Rama. He sought the calm of meditation that had always come to him easily, like a flower yielding its fragrance to a kiss of the breeze.

This time, calm was hard to come by.

The screams and cries of dying and suffering vanars and bears kept battering his senses all night long.

Hanuman was filled with chagrin. He had come to the same conclusion that Rama had: There was nothing he could do. He tried to leap here to save some troops from a falling mound of earth, there to catch others who were flung up by another heaving section, to do what he could here and there. But the entire island was writhing and churning, and there was only so much he could do at one time, only so many he could reach. He worked all night long, refusing to give up, using every ounce of his strength and ability to try to save whomever he could. But as the long terrible night wound on, and more and more vanars and bears died in his arms, he began to realise that it was a hopeless task. It was akin to trying to rush around a battlefield, saving one's fellow soldiers from the attacks of the enemy. A battle could not be fought in such a way; not even by a soldier possessed of the powers that he possessed. It was futile. Ultimately, if he saved someone here, someone else died there. If he flew and picked up a cluster of vanars and carried them out of harm's way in one place, moments after he had left them there the earth would rise up and fold itself upon them where they stood, crushing them all without a second's warning. Soon, he was so covered with gore and gristle that he could barely get a grip on anything, his entire body slick with bodily fluids and dust and dirt.

He flew up as high as he could, trying to see as far as possible, and spy out the land. It was towards midnight now and the last of the troops had arrived as expected, for the greybacks had held their line for as long as it was physically possible; no sooner had the last of the vanars and bears leaped onto the killing sands of Lanka, the greybacks moved away with a great lowing and mooing, offering their heartfelt commiseration for the terror that was befalling his compatriots. He sent back thoughts of great sadness and grief, as well as sentiments of great gratitude and love, for the greybacks had done their task admirably; what transpired after his people arrived on Lanka was not within their control. Even so, he heard their voices all night long, lowing and calling in the dark ocean, offering support and encouragement to their new landlocked friends while offering the occasional sirens of rage against those inflicting such suffering upon them. It tore at his heart then, that despite his great shakti he could do so little to help others. He opened his mouth and bellowed his anguish, beating his fists upon his chest.

Lakshman survived a flailing of earth, a mad frenzy of dust and dirt and shrubbery that blinded him for several moments and caused him to lose all sense of direction—or even orientation. For how could you tell which way was up or down when the very earth itself was surging to and fro in impossible patterns? One moment he was being pushed from behind by a wall of earth that rose out of the ground and continued to rise until it had gone too high in the darkness for him to see the top of it; another moment, he was dodging a row of protrusions that shot forward from the wall with alarming speed. Despite being made of just mud, they were hard enough and pointed enough to pierce flesh, as he saw happen to one unfortunate bear who did not dodge them quickly enough. Three separate spears of mud penetrated the bear's shoulder, chest, and ribs, and even as Lakshman lunged forward to try to aid the poor creature, the points of the mud-spears emerged from his back, bursting out of the fur with bloody precision, and continued their forward motion. They were no more aware of their ability to kill than any force of nature, but they were no less deadly for that. Lakshman roared with fury as he struggled to wrest the bear's gasping body off the spears, and in the dust and confusion he almost failed to see the second row of mud-spears emerging from a lower point on the same wall. These were thicker, blunter, but they looked ugly and hard enough to break leg bones. He spun around and began shouting warnings to everyone within hearing range. But despite hearing his cries, several of the troops continued to mill around in dazed bewilderment. Their terror and confusion was compounded by the holes appearing in the ground around them, in a pattern that made no sense at first, but gradually assumed a meaningful purpose to Lakshman. One of the soldiers found his foot caught in a hole that suddenly dropped out from beneath him, and screamed. His vanar and bear friends nearby tried to pull him out, while he kept screaming that the ground was trying to swallow him whole. Lakshman saw to his horror what none of the rest of them was aware of: the lower row of blunt spikes were approaching them at a remorseless pace. He shouted to warn them and they turned, looking at the wall. But they were too late. The spikes struck them, punching through the bones of their feet and thighs with sickening force, and knocked them over en masse. Even as they struggled to break free, the earth shuddered nearby, and a pile of earth flew up in an arching swoop, landing right on top of the hapless band of trapped soldiers. The thud of the earthfall striking ground again cut off their dying screams.

Lakshman saw many more such scenes of sickening, meaningless violence all around him. At one point he began searching for Rama, and when he could not find him anywhere, nor find anyone who had seen him, he began to feel his gorge rise up in his throat. The thought of Rama being brought down by mud-spears or spikes or holes in the ground sickened him. Surely they had not come through so much, survived so many battles and fights, just so the future King of Ayodhya could die here on this plateau in Lanka, killed by nothing more vicious than mindless mud manipulated by an absent rakshasa's sorcery? He searched desperately for hours, passing grotesque tableaux of carnage, until, with an immense bone-shivering, grinding sensation, the first phase of the reshaping ended and a pause more terrible than all the dusty chaos descended briefly upon the battlefield—for it was nothing less than a battlefield. As he waited, not knowing what new horror might erupt next, he looked around and took stock. Immense vaulting walls of earth had sprung up all around the plateau, running along its rim in a pattern that his mind dimly recognised but did not wish to stop to name right now.

As the dust settled at last, he raised his eyes, wiping grime and blood from his forehead, with equally gore-and-dust-smearred hands. Holding his head up to keep a trickle from his head from rolling into his eyes, he saw that a solitary figure was perched on top of one great wall, perhaps a hundred, or a hundred and fifty yards high, it was hard to tell exactly how high in this dust-bedevelled darkness. He tried to find a better angle to see by, and when he looked up again, he saw the figure move, rising to stand in a manner that suggested a man looking down. There was a moon out by now, a quarter, not quite a half moon, and it emerged from behind a bank of cloud just then, silhouetting the lone figure on top of the wall. Then he was sure. There was no mistaking a mortal man's outline and that was certainly no vanar or bear.

'Rama,' he said with a sense of relief so great that tears welled up in his eyes. He dabbed at them fiercely, unmindful of his blood-and-dust-smearred hands. 'Rama is alive.'

Then the next phase of reconstruction began, and he leaped aside just as the ground on which he had been standing began to ripple and slide. It moved slowly from side to side, not quickly or forcefully enough to smash or batter and he saw that the troops across the field were easily able to sidestep these new developments, although they remained fearful and mistrustful of Ravana's sorcery. He called out to those captains and other tribe and clan chiefs within hailing range to remain alert and not to band too closely together, the better to dodge whatever hellish new thing came bursting out next. But now that they were forewarned and alert, nothing happened, of course. The shifting plates and sections of the great scheme that had been put into place earlier merely adjusted and slid a few inches this way and that, the sounds of groaning rock and protesting piles of packed earth more eerie than any actual threat.

And so began a new stage in the battle, one in which the enemy continued to shape its mysterious design, working with the elements of soil and rock and tree, crafting them with invisible forces into a design that was clear even to the most dull-headed vanar or bear on the plateau now, while Rama's army continued to do the only thing it possibly could when faced with such a foe: survive until morning.

It was a long night.

FIVE

It was dawn when the sorcery finally ceased. First light was creeping across the sky, patches of indigo, violet, purple, crimson, and lime green seeping into one another, streaking across the world like coloured water flung across a parquet floor or like some bizarre after-effect of Ravana's maya. Everyone glanced suspiciously around, doubting that things were as they seemed, doubting their companions, their fellows, their leaders, even doubting themselves. For where, only last evening, they had stood upon a lush, green plateau, undulating into rolling meadows, quiet brooks, placid flower fields, dense thickets rife with life and growth, rolling farther to the foothills of distant mountains, where only last evening all this pictureseque natural beauty had greeted their vision, now in its place stood a terrible, heart-chilling vision. A dark nightmare made real through asura maya.

Rama rose slowly to his feet, staring in first one direction then another, seeing with disbelieving eyes what the early slanting light unveiled. He had formed some notion of what was being wrought this long, dark and awful night. But it was still a shock to see it rendered complete even before morning was full-blown. And to know that all this had been achieved through the manipulating of mere earth, rock, trees and water, the natural materials of the land. Manipulated, reshaped, coagulated, hardened, baked and chiselled until the startlingly effective result lay before his very eyes, only a night's watch later.

The raised ledge of packed earth which had carried him aloft was now a solid wall of piled stone. The wall rose much higher than he had thought last evening. He had felt it shudder and move all night long, no doubt increasing by steadier, slower degrees. It had risen to a height of some three hundred yards and was at least thrice as high now. The surface on which he stood was not dry earth packed together, but solid blocks of cut stone, as if carved in great chunks from living rock and then shaped into identical regular blocks, which then appeared to have been placed upon one another to form a piled wall. There were fortresses like this across the Arya nations, although none this high or thick, and surely none that had been erected in a single night. He bent and pressed his palm upon the stone on which he stood, feeling a familiar roughly chiselled texture. The grooves where the individual stones met were lined with a thin glue of mortar, as if living hands had applied the mortar before each new stone was lowered into place by teams of horses or men using ropes and pulleys. Yet no ropes had lowered these stones, no hands, mortal or rakshasa had applied any mortar, no engineer had supervised the placement of the stones and the chiselling of their planes. Despite the absence of these normal essentials, the wall felt perfectly solid and real. After all, he realised, the wall was real, made from the same materials that would otherwise have been used in a normal construction. Only the means by which it had been constructed was unreal.

The wall's top was several yards wide, with crenellations running along the edge of each side for the entire length of the wall. And, he saw as the light illuminated more and more of the island, the wall itself ran across what seemed to be the entire length of Lanka itself. Or as much of Lanka as he could glimpse from where he was: from this height, he could see for a full yojana at least, any further view blocked only by the range of mountains that rose gradually, topped by a single great peak, the one that Vibhisena had named Mount Nikumbhila. Up to that point, and possibly beyond it as well, this wall ran like a great fortification, looking as if it had stood here a thousand years and would stand a thousand more. It rose and fell with the land's natural slope, dipping down to the valley where he could see brooks and thickets and glades that remained as they were the day before, then rising again towards the foothills of the mountain range, dwarfed only by Nikumbhila. Beyond the mountain, he glimpsed a reddish glow that seemed not to belong to the scarlet flares of the coming dawn. For one thing, it was in the south-west. It appeared like a great fire dimly glimpsed far beyond the mountain itself, perhaps several yojanas farther south. But surely no fire, however great, could send up a glow that would be visible beyond the height of such a mountain? It was something else, he could almost name it, but the name eluded him. He dismissed it for the moment. Right now, he wished only to return to the ground below, to join his armies once more. If these were ramparts, there must be steps cut through the heart of the wall, for defending soldiers to come up and go down. He began walking the length of the wall, searching for such a stairway.

Hanuman floated in mid-air, a thousand yards above the island of Lanka. He was standing in the position of an ascetic, with the sole of his left foot placed against the inside of his right thigh. Were he on the ground, he would be standing on one foot, a posture conducive to concentrating and channelling one's energies. His arms were folded across his chest. He was his normal size, for expansion used up energy and the strain of the long night had taken its toll, sapping him of strength as well as purpose. He stared mutely at what Ravana's sorcery had wrought, in a single night no less, and forced himself to remain calm as he examined and studied it in the same way that a hawk might study a nest of serpents a mile below, anticipating when and how he would swoop down to attack and kill the brood.

Ravana had turned Lanka into a fortress. The entire island had been overrun by the rakshasa lord's devilish sorcery. From this vantage point, he could see a pattern of thousand-foot high walls running along the coastline for as far as could be seen. The walls ran for a few yojanas south before criss-crossing the breadth of the island. Up to there, some of the natural landscape was still present, contained within the vaulting walls. Beyond that point, the very landscape had been altered. He could not tell exactly what purpose some of the newly designed features would serve, but they seemed warlike and aggressive. The entire island's aspect, so green and lush and beautiful, a veritable paradise as Rama himself had called it at his first glimpse, had now taken on the aspect of a dark country dedicated solely to war. Ravana had turned it into a giant fortress overnight.

And far to the south, he had done more than that. Hanuman could see an immense reddish glow, as if from a great fire blazing fiercely. But he knew that was no fire, for even an entire forest could not feed such an enormous flame. It was a volcano. Lanka had once been a volcanic isle, raised up from the bottom of the ocean in a series of gargantuan eruptions many millions of years ago. Now Ravana had tapped the volcano once again, reviving it, and had structured the heart of his fortress around the very fires of that hellmouth. The searing heat and intensity of the glow exuded by the volcano was too great for even Hanuman's sharp vision to pierce its surrounding area. All he could tell was that a vast black pile of stone had arisen on that section of the island, occupying a substantial area of perhaps ten square yojanas at the south-western tip of Lanka. The devas alone knew what Ravana had built there during this long, dark night of blood and terror. But it boded no good, of that he was certain.

His fists had tightened, despite his best efforts at self-control, and he desired nothing more than to expand himself to his limits and then swoop down in a rampage of destruction, wiping out all that Ravana had raised through his sorcery, smashing those fortress walls and ramparts, shattering those long spindly spikes that had taken so many of his comrades' lives, destroying, shattering, pounding ... the way he had pounded and smashed and burned Lanka not two days ago.

But this was not that Lanka any more. This was a new Lanka. Or a very old and ancient one, resurrected by asura sorcery to serve Ravana's purpose. Perhaps everything that had happened had served Ravana's purpose—even Hanuman's own rampage of destruction. For what good had it really done? Look at his people now. Look at how many lay dead on the ground below. Look at the beach ... he could not bear to look at those golden sands in the first flush of dawn for thousands upon thousands had perished there, crushed by the alterations of the rocky cliffs, the Palisades, that had formed the bulk of the material manipulated by Ravana's sorcery to raise those great rampart walls. So many bodies lay adrift there, tugged and released by the outgoing tide, that the ocean skirting the island was stained red with their blood. Senseless, futile, awful deaths. And none of them had been able to do anything to prevent it. Not even he, with his great powers and abilities.

Even now, if he expanded himself and flew down and began pounding and smashing, he would endanger his own fellow vanars and bears. These were not rakshasas that he would be harming, but his own comrades in arms. And who was to say that even if he flew yojanas further south and began smashing through the sorcerously erected defences that he could glimpse there, that Ravana would not erect new defences in a matter of hours, and that the process of reconstruction would not endanger the lives of Hanuman's comrades yet again?

What could he do, then? Nothing. Nothing! He was helpless. All this strength and power—futile. Pathetic. He was nothing but a foolish vanar with an ego too large for his own skull. He belonged not here in the land of rakshasas, but back in the redmist mountains, foraging for fruit, then stealing a little honey wine and falling asleep content under the starry sky, as he had done so many nights of his life while a young monkey. That was all he was good for. He could not shoulder this great responsibility. He was no champion. He was only a vanar ... no, not even a vanar. A monkey! A langur! He ought to fly back home right now, for he was of no use on this great quest, no use to anybody at all ... Stupid, foolish, idiot of a monkey!

Ravana laughed. A rich, deep-throated laugh that was echoed by most of his heads with varying degrees of humour. Only two heads remained unamused, one looking bored and distracted, another appearing to be quite fast asleep, its nostrils flaring as it snored gently. Supanakha laughed with him. They were in Ravana's palace. His new palace really. For while it was similar to the old one, the one he had occupied until the reconstruction of Lanka fourteen years ago, it was different as well. Grander. Enormous. Built on an epic scale that dwarfed anything and everything Supanakha had ever seen in her five-hundred-something years of existence.

This particular chamber, for instance, was a vast cavernous space whose walls and ceiling were constructed of the same black rock of which the new fortress Lanka had been built, using the same sorcerous maya. She had watched the night before as Ravana's sorcery had begun its menacing work, had seen a projected image of the chaos and bloodshed on the northern tip of the island as Rama and his forces were routed by invisible forces, decimated without even a chance to defend themselves. She had enjoyed that show hugely. Had wished she were there to see it with her own eyes, hear the screams and howls of anguish and agony, perhaps sip a little fresh blood as it gushed from shattered limbs and severed arteries, munch on some vanar flesh, even taste bear—it had been a long time since she had feasted on bearflesh. But she had also seen that to go out there while Ravana's sorcery was working its wicked way might be less than sensible, and besides, she wanted to be with the one wielding this power, see what devilish new scheme he had cooked up, and how he implemented it. That was the thing she admired about her cousin. He always had another plan, and another, and another ... It was the reason why he would win in the end, she had no doubt. Why he would triumph over Rama and all his determined might. Because in the end, Ravana was a juggernaut, as remorseless, relentless as the forces of nature he commanded and manipulated. He was shakti itself, incarnate.

He laughed for several moments, his muscled torso quivering with each expulsion of breath and sound. Even though he was dwarfed by the sheer scale and majesty of the immense chamber in which he stood, he looked as if he owned it, as if none other than he could stand here and laugh with this much abandon and energy, as if he were celebrating the greatest triumph of his entire life. His laughter slowed in stages, his heads switching to other occupations briefly, new thoughts, dialogues, concerns skitting across the rack, and when he turned his eyes to her again, only two heads were actually smiling, only two mouths still chuckling with glee. But his overall mood was one of great joy and triumph. For this was his moment to savour.

'Do you see now, cousin?' he asked, chuckling. 'How I decimated the enemy's troops without committing a single rakshasa's life to the fray? And in the process, rebuilt Lanka as I desired it, all in the space of a single night.'

'Not to mention eliminating virtually all the Brahmin population of Lanka as well,' she added sweetly, batting her eyelids provocatively at him.

A head on his right-hand rack winked back at her. 'That too, my devilish one. It would not do to have Vibhisena's moral sena running about spreading their messages of peace and brotherhood when there's a war to be fought.'

'Most certainly not,' she agreed. 'And the sorcery you wrought with the Brahman power unlocked by their sacrifice to the volcano ...' She shook her head with amazement that was only slightly exaggerated. 'It was a miraculous feat,' she acknowledged with almost no irony. For once she did not have to summon up false sentiments to pander to his massive tenfold ego. She was genuinely awed by his show of power and his wily use of it. ‘You have won the war in a few hours, without risking the lives of any of Lanka’s rakshasas.’

Ravana’s smiles faded abruptly. ‘The war? You must be jesting. The war has not yet begun! This was but a demonstration. To let Rama and his ragtag bunch of animals know what they are up against. Now, if he is wise, he will turn around and go back home with his tail between his legs.’

Supanakha leaped up on the lower part of an obsidian statue, shaped to resemble a naga feasting on a mortal warrior. She perched on the head of the mortal, whose eyes bulged in anguish as the giant serpentine asura tore open his belly to lay her black chitinous eggs within its warmth, then closed up the rift with her gooey saliva, sealing it until it was time for her young to hatch in a few hours. Supanakha wondered at how exquisitely Ravana’s sorcery had constructed this entire palace, complete with vaulting facades, carved pillars, polished floors, beautifully wrought statues and all, in the space of a few hours. What had he said to her by way of explanation the night before? Ah, yes. ‘In sorcery, as in life, it is the design that takes time and effort and talent—once conceived, it is child’s play to execute that conception into reality.’ She had not understood him completely at that time; now she knew just what he had meant. The level of artistry in this statue alone was awe-inspiring. With his many talents and gifts, he was a great artist as well, not to mention a gifted poet and musician as well, a connoisseur of all arts. This overnight reconstruction had required a phenomenal exertion of sorcery. But the detail and perfection in execution had taken great creative brilliance. Ravana had supplied both in abundant measure.

Now, she said aloud in response to his statement: ‘Do you really think he will?’

He smiled at her with a head or two, while the others debated intently about some new matter in a tongue she did not recognise. ‘No. Rama is not one to quit. Besides, he still has not recovered Sita. He will not leave until he has done that, even if it costs the lives of every last one of his followers. That is what the fools will now learn to their everlasting dismay.’

She flicked her tail at the gaping maw and dripping fangs of the naga above her. The realism of the detail was unnervingly accurate. ‘So you will use sorcery to defeat him and his forces? As you did last night?’

Ravana stepped with slow, undulating strides to the foot of the dais that housed his new throne, a great blackstone seat carved with the entwined figures of countless lunging asura shapes, some engaged in battle, others in copulation, to the point where it was impossible to tell which was doing what to whom. He stood with one foot resting on the first step of the dais. The onyx floor gleamed underfoot, reflecting as perfectly as a silver-backed mirror, and she gazed at the inverted black Ravana depicted there, the black dome of the ceiling a hundred yards overhead glistening faintly above him in the reflection, a thin tracery of veins in the texture of the dome pulsing with a reddish glow that indicated the maya shakti used to build and then keep this whole edifice erect.

‘What would be the sport in that?’ he said. ‘No, my bloodlusting beauty, I will take the field against Rama before he has had time to recover fully from last night’s losses, before his armies have a chance to recuperate and prepare themselves, before his captains are ready to lead. It will be a battle to behold, because despite their long night of suffering, or because of it, his forces will fight fiercely and boldly, even bravely, eager to vent their frustration and anger upon our rakshasas, to face living foes and feel the bite of their weapons and claws and fangs in our living flesh. And we shall give them that satisfaction ... at first.’

‘And then?’ she asked eagerly.

‘And then we shall slaughter them like meat for our fires, and food for our tables, for that is all they are. Flesh to feed on, nothing more.’ He climbed the steps to the throne, ten yards above the floor of the chamber. Even seated, he now looked down upon everything and everyone. Supanakha noted slyly that he had designed even the tallest statues—like the one she was perched on—to be below the level of his line of sight when seated on the throne. Truly a master of detail! He looked down at her, eyes glistening chitinously—or perhaps that was only the reflection of all those gleaming black surfaces. ‘Before night falls again upon Lanka, my victory over Rama will be complete.’

He clapped two of his hands together, calling out in a booming voice that echoed through the vast palace. ‘Bring in my generals. I am ready to begin the war council.’

Supanakha licked the screaming goggle-eyed face of the mortal in the statue with a bit of sympathy and a great deal of relish. The day of her reckoning had come at last. Finally, she would have her revenge on Rama and his brother for which she had waited fourteen long years. Before nightfall. She could practically taste their rich, tangy blood already.

SIX

Anjaneya.

The voice was a distant echo in the background of his crowded mind. He marked it only as a futile intrusion into his private grief, and dismissed it outright. In his anger and remorse, he had drifted far to the south. Miles farther, even yojanas perhaps. He no longer cared; he had lost his bearings, both physical and spiritual. He no longer understood who he was, or what purpose he served in this life. What good was all the power in the world if you could not save your comrades when they needed you most? The cries of his fellow vanars still rang in his ears. Usually on battlefields, when soldiers died, the severely wounded and dying called out a single word: maa. Or a variation thereof; whichever word meant ‘mother’ in their language. So it had been since the beginning of time and the first violent conflicts, and so it would probably be until the end of days. But last night, apart from the many cries of ‘mother’ and ‘mother, save me’ and similar variations, there were two words that were constantly called out on the plateau of Lanka’s northern coast. Those were the names ‘Rama’ and ‘Maruti’. Vanars had died calling out his name, over and over again, and he had been able to do nothing to save them. Yes, he had saved a few dozen, perhaps even a few hundred. But it was not enough. Thousands had died. Tens of thousands, even. The carnage was unspeakable. And he, the great Hanuman—the omnipotent Bajrangbali, leveller of Lanka, destroyer of the city of the asuras, champion of Lord Rama who was the mightiest yodha of all—had been able to do nothing to stop it.

Anjaneya, control yourself.

He paused in his self-pitying misery to glance around. He was still flying, and somehow in his grief he had drifted even higher above the island-kingdom. Lanka lay far below now, a map perfectly drawn by a malicious artist to mock him. Only two days ago, he had demolished this very city. And in a single night it had risen up once more to mock him, taunt him, show him that his power was worthless; Ravana's sorcerous shakti was supreme.

Stop it, Maruti. You will cease this line of thought and return to your lords at once.

A spark of unreasonable anger flashed within him. Who was it who berated him thus? Who dared to command him? None but his lord Rama had the right to ...

I speak on behalf of Lord Rama. He has need of your services. Gain control of your wits and go to him at once.

His flash of anger was abruptly replaced by suspicion. 'Who are you?' he asked aloud. He had been duped before in Lanka, by that demoness—

Enough! This has gone too far. You need not obey my commands, or trust me. But trust your inner soul. You know that your lord has greater need of you in this hour than ever before. Desist in your rambling and go to him at once.

He wanted to argue, to lash out at the speaker of those words. But his anger shrank within him, humbled by the knowledge that whatever the source, the words themselves were true enough. Rama must be seeking him out at this moment, if only to berate him for not doing enough to stem the loss of life the night before. He felt ashamed and humiliated. How could he face his lord? How could he go before him and admit that—

There is nothing to be ashamed of. The voice was gentler, yet retained a tone of steel. You know your lord better than that. He is not Ravana. He is Rama. You do him a disservice by thinking on his behalf. Your duty is only to go to him and place yourself in his command. Go to him now. Fly.

He dabbed at his face, wiping away the tears that had trickled down his cheeks. His puffed mouth was damp and sticky with the residue of his weeping, and he turned abruptly, flying faster and then faster still, until he was speeding like a crow, then a hawk, then like an arrow shot from a longbow, then faster than any object in existence, living or otherwise. He swooped in a wide undulating arc, down, down, down, and cut the surface of the ocean at an angle so sharp, he barely raised a splash. He travelled underwater at the same swift speed, the cool, salty water shocking his body, then calming him, then reviving him. When he emerged a mile further north, he was refreshed. Water cascaded from his body as he leaped from the ocean, shooting up to the sky again, rising high now, higher and higher, until he could glimpse the curve of the world beyond the horizon, and the risen sun already beaming down brightly upon lands far to the east where the day had begun hours earlier. The redmist mountains were to the east. The home of his people. He reached the apogee of his rising arc and hung suspended momentarily, the rays of the sun warming him, enlivening him, then he folded his palms and feet together in a surya namaskaram, holding the yogic asana until gravity began pulling insistently at his body once more, Mother Prithvi calling to him to return home to her.

Up here, everything was so calm, so serene, the earth herself undulating like the curved belly of a mother-to-be, seeded with untold generations of future lives, that he had a brief moment when he wished he could simply fly away, perhaps fly back home, or simply fly. As a young vanar, he had always dreamed of flying like the magnificent swans he saw crossing the skies above Kiskindha twice a year, going south in winter, north in summer. He had always wondered what it might be like to fly like that, beautiful and graceful and supremely elevated above all the petty grime and dirt and dust, the scabble and squabble, the shrieking and the shrilling of land-bound existence. To soar amongst the clouds, eye to eye with the sun, lord of all you surveyed, free to travel anywhere you wished.

If he wished, he could go anywhere now. Fly anywhere. Away from here. Away from more bloodshed, more pain, more agony—all the strife and struggle that he knew with sickening certainty lay ahead. The deaths of friends and comrades and beloved ones. For what else was war but loss, loss, and more loss? Until finally, one side cried ‘enough, I can bear no more’, and surrendered. He had had enough of losing. There was no end to it. As long as you possessed something, it could be taken from you. Better then to possess nothing, to simply soar through the air like a bird, to fly through empty airways for ever, to reduce the troubles of earthbound living to a distantly viewed panorama, like a game where thousands scurried like ants to live and die, and fight and kill, like his compatriots and their enemies now scattered far below upon the hills and valleys and plains of Lanka now. Fly far away, away from it all. And never come back. Fly away and forget.

He hung suspended, weightless, windborne, neither gravity's child nor the ether's possession. And dreamed. For a moment that seemed like an aeon, he dreamed and lost himself, and forgot all. A condor floating far below him wondered at the being that could soar higher than she, and how that being could stay thus so long. Where was the wind that bore that creature aloft? Or was it the hand of a deva that held him there?

The condor called out, mournfully, longingly. Cried for the losses she had suffered through a long and strife-fraught life: a fledgling lost to a storm, a yearling torn to bits by a rival, a mate caught by a wildcat when feeding upon a snake, all her life was contained in that cry.

High above, the cry penetrated through the dream-fog that obscured Hanuman's mind.

The cry seemed to be echoing, or mocking, a mortal word. A single name.

Rama.

Rama needs me. I must go to Rama at once.

He repeated the words to himself like a rote recitation.

He spared a moment of brief, fleeting regret for the freedom and mystery of the high spaces, the glory and joy of flight. Then he wiped all dreams clear and eliminated all thought, desire and emotion from his senses.

He straightened his body and plunged downwards again. So great was the rush of air against his speeding body that every last drop of water was cast away from his skin and his clothing. Lanka grew steadily beneath him, expanding until he was able to see the tiny ant-like figures of his lord's forces, covering the entire northern tip of the island. A final twinge of sadness stroked his heart, then he was close enough to see individual vanars and bears, and then close enough to tell the various tribes and clans apart.

He slowed as he descended to the height of the rampart wall, flying along its length until he reached the lone figure atop the fortification, standing and looking southwards. Rama turned to him as he descended to land.

‘My friend,’ Rama said as he came to rest softly upon the rampart. ‘There you are. I was beginning to worry.’

He prostrated himself before his lord, laying himself flat upon the rampart. The blackstone blocks were unnaturally warm to the touch, suffused with the energy of the asura sorcery that had created them, but he ignored that. He kissed Rama’s feet, not caring that they were dusty and crusted with dried blood. ‘My lord,’ he cried aloud. ‘My lord, forgive me ... I could do no more ... I tried ... ’

His voice broke off despairingly. Despite his attempt to bathe and revive himself, to appear presentable before he faced his lord once more, he was stricken by a great and searing emotion when faced with Rama in person. He broke down and began crying helplessly, great sobs racking his body.

‘Maruti!’ Rama said in distress. ‘My friend. Do not lose hope thus. Come, rise up, rise up ... ’ Gently, but firmly, Rama raised him off the ground and helped him onto his feet again. He put his arm around him, comforting him. ‘I understand your pain. But this is not the time to give in to guilt and regret. There is a great deal of work yet to be done. The only remedy is to do one’s duty, to execute one’s dharma. In the end, that is all a warrior can do.’

Hanuman shook his head, unable to stop the sobs that shook his being. ‘But, my lord, I let you down ... I let my people down ... I could do nothing to stop the sorcery ... ’

Rama looked at him, his voice steady and strong as the arms that held him. ‘I could do nothing either last night. But there is much that we can do now, together. Remember, my friend. Not every battle can be won, not every day brings a victory. Loss is a part of life itself. Respect it, and respect its power over us, but then move on. Loss suffered is natural and inevitable; loss dwelt on and obsessed over destroys us. Yes, we failed yesterday, and lost greatly. But today has dawned anew. Now, the question is not what we could not do yesterday, but what we can do today. Will you squander the opportunities of the present to moan and weep about the lost chances of the past? You are a better man than that, Bajrangbali. You are the son of Marut, the child of Anjana. Your ancestors look down upon you and mark your deeds. The devas in the upper realms admire your prowess. Your friends will fight today whether you join them or not. You cannot bring back those who fell, no Kshatriya can. They died fulfilling their dharma. All you can do is fight on, and fulfil your own dharma. I have need of you now. Will you help me?’

And Rama raised his hand to him.

Hanuman ceased his weeping. He looked at the figures on the ground far below, collecting now in neat lines and regiments as they had been taught to do by their mortal leaders and their own generals and captains and clan chiefs. It broke his heart to see them rallying so valiantly even after the carnage of the night before. He looked back at Rama, at the strong handsome face of his mortal lord. And was moved beyond words to see the unshakeable resolve on those handsome features. The voice that he had heard earlier—he knew now that it was Jambavan, speaking to his mind as he had done before—had spoken truly. This was not Ravana. This was Rama. And Rama was not angered with him. Rama believed in him still. Rama had need of him.

He took the hand that was proffered, but instead of clasping it in the fashion that he had seen mortals do, he kissed it lovingly, then touched it to his own head, palm downwards. He could feel the heat from Rama’s flesh seep into his brain. ‘My lord,’ he said in a voice that was as deep and strong as the voice of thunder in the heart of a storm cloud. ‘I am yours to command.’

Lakshman watched as Hanuman descended from the wall, bearing Rama upon his shoulder. He touched down gently, bending low so that Rama might alight easily. Rama turned, looking this way and that, then caught sight of Lakshman amidst the crowd of vanar and bear generals that had assembled, and came quickly towards him. The ranks parted to let him pass but he stepped around them rather than disturb their formations.

‘Sumitra-putra,’ he said softly as he came within hailing distance, almost too softly to be heard. ‘My brother, you are well?’

‘Yes, Rama, I ... ’

Lakshman barely had a chance to respond. Rama embraced him so fiercely, Lakshman almost cried out at the pain in his ribs where he had been bruised by a fall in the early hours of the morning, while attempting to save a stricken bear. Then he embraced his brother back just as fiercely, surprised at the tears that sprang up in his own eyes. ‘I am here, Rama,’ he heard himself say. ‘Still alive. Still ready to go to war.’

Rama released him, keeping one arm around his back. His eyes glistened in the early light, filled with a look Lakshman knew well from previous battles. He had had that look the day they had entered the Bhayanak-van to face Tataka and her demon-hybrid hordes, the evening they had made their stand in the Sage’s Brow at Mithila immediately before unleashing the brahm-astra, the morning before the final battle at Janasthana.

He pitied anyone who stood in Rama’s way now, mortal, rakshasa, or deva. Once that look came into his brother’s eyes, no force could stop him.

Maryada Purshottam ...

The words sprang up unbidden in his mind.

Maryada Purshottam Rama.

He Who Fulfils His Vow ... Against All Odds. The last bit he added himself. Because the odds were truly against them now. Impossibly stacked. And yet. And yet. They had been stacked as high before, higher even. It had never daunted Rama then, it did not daunt him now.

‘And war it shall be, my brother,’ Rama said in a voice of iron.

SEVEN

Lying upon the grassy ground of the Ashoka grove, Sita felt the ground vibrating beneath her, and thought to her dismay that it was yet another wave of sorcery unleashed by Ravana. All night she had lain awake in anxious trepidation as the very island itself seemed to rumble and boom and grind its way through a series of inexplicable changes. Only in the morning—for Ravana's sorcery ensured that she enjoyed a simulation of day and night even within the bowels of this subterranean cavern—had the clamour ceased. She could not tell exactly what had been wrought by Ravana during the night, but she suspected that it was something epic.

And now it had begun again. She could feel the vibration through the kusavaya grass on which she lay, through the earth below the grass. Like giants pounding their enormous hammers deep within the bowels of the earth.

Then she realised that this trembling of the earth was caused not by sorcery, but by the pounding of feet. Thousands upon thousands of feet. Pounding heavily as they raced through the belly of the island, speeding through the cavernous tunnels that riddled Lanka.

She rose slowly to her feet, ignoring the throbbing in her skull, and walked to the far side of the grove. The pounding continued as she walked, now seeming to come from all sides at once. But it was loudest on this side, and she had found before, that if she went to the very edge of the rivulet that wound its way through the grove, and stood upon this rock here, and looked through the gap between two sala trees in the far distance, she could just about glimpse the end of this cave tunnel and the place where it intersected with one or more other tunnels. Somewhere in that direction were the great underground chambers where Ravana had taken her yesterday morning—or was it this morning? Where he had taken her in the flying vahan and shown her his prized secret: those hideous rakshasas hatching from stone-like eggs, or egg-like stones ... It was hard to concentrate or remember now. She was very tired.

She stood upon the rock and peered groggily through the gap in the trees, trying to position herself so that she could see the place where the tunnels met. She had glimpsed a rakshasa guard earlier from here, or at least she had glimpsed the top of his gleaming spear as he strolled this way, then that, conversing with his fellow guards. She had heard their guttural voices and harsh barking laughter, distantly and obscurely, amplified and echoing through the caverns. Now she could hear only the pounding, and as she approached this listening spot, it grew louder and became more audible, until there was no mistaking it. That sound was the pounding of thousands of pairs of cloven-hoofed feet. The feet of those beings that Ravana had bred in secret in the subterranean chambers.

She craned her neck and crooked her head and arched her back until she found a suitable angle and was able to glimpse an inverted triangular space which was lit more brightly than this cavern. And in that illuminated space, she glimpsed a blurring rush, as of hordes of armoured heads and backs moving at a frenetic pace. Line upon line running in perfect formation.

And now that she was focussed at last, her waning, depleted energies drawn to the maximum alertness she was able to summon up, she could hear clearly—too clearly almost—the thunderous roar of those cloven hoofs pounding the solid rock floor of the caverns. And the grunting and chuffing of tens of thousands—or perhaps it was lakhs—of those devilishly bred rakshasas. They were on the move. And that could mean only one thing. That Ravana was moving them up to the surface in preparation for a battle. And that in turn meant that Rama and his forces were here at last, upon the island, and that they would soon join weapons with the army of Lanka.

The pounding rhythm of the rakshasas moving through the rock caverns vibrated through the ground, through the rock upon which she stood, through her weary bones, up to her skull, where it joined the throbbing of her head and the drained emptiness that her consciousness had become. She felt herself mesmerised by the rhythm for several moments, the constant pounding acting like the beat of a dhol-drum, lulling her already battered and beleaguered senses ...

Then it came to her with a shock like cold water splashed upon her face: all those vicious beasts racing through the cavern were going to do battle against Rama, her Rama. Very shortly, her beloved would face these beasts, and perhaps be wounded by them, possibly even killed. The father of her unborn child. She pressed her palm against her belly, and thought she felt the embryo within her stir and then thrash with great force, anguished by the sound of the bestial hordes going to war against its father. She experienced a moment of dizziness and nausea as the thrashing continued, and stumbled over to the nearest support, a large black boulder shot through with ugly red veins, where she sat a moment to regain her equilibrium.

She caressed her belly soothingly, trying to calm the unborn life—or was it lives? Lately, she had begun to sense more movement within her womb than could be caused by a single embryo—while empathising with their anguish. Their anguish? Yes, now that she thought on it, she grew certain that she bore more than one life within her womb. Two, came the answer from her inner being, the voice of her blood, her life force, her intuition, given substance by the sparking flame of Brahman within herself. Yes, two. She was certain of it now. And at this moment, as events in her life, and therefore their lives as well, reached an epic pinnacle, she could guess how they must feel, blind and helpless and imprisoned though they were—even as she herself was blind and helpless and imprisoned in this subterranean sorcerous cage. In their captivity and inability to act, she and her unborn children were as one at this moment.

She pressed her hand to her swollen belly, longing for the power to act, to join her karma to that of Rama, to do more than simply await the outcome of a war that would surely change her life, and the future history of the world itself. Had she but a sword, or a bow and a quiver, or even just her freedom and her bare hands, she would not hesitate to add her strength to Rama's forces and wage battle against the armies of Lanka. Women warriors before her had fought in her condition; some of the greatest warriors had been birthed—nay, simply dropped—upon blood-spattered battlefields. Born into blood, sworn into blood, the old Arya legend went, referring to such battle-birthed Kshatriyas. Neither her condition nor her present state of extreme weakness would have stayed her from joining the war against Lanka.

But since she could not do so, all she could do was wait. And her unborn offspring must wait with her. She felt a stirring within, as if they sensed her thoughts and knew exactly what she felt, and had they but the power to voice their own thoughts would have argued hotly and fiercely with her.

She smiled indulgently. Not yet born, and already ready to fight? What else could she expect of the children of two Kshatriyas who had spent the better part of their lives fighting for dharma?

‘Fear not,’ she said softly, stroking her belly gently, ‘some day, when you are a wee bit older and able to at least hold swords in your hands, you will get your chance. Until then, both you and I must wait patiently, no matter how difficult it may be.’ She listened to the sounds of Ravana’s sorcerously created warriors pounding through the labyrinthine caverns around, below, and above her, racing even now to attempt to end the life of her beloved, the father of her unborn children. She added grimly, ‘And until you are ready to fight for yourselves, your father will fight fiercely enough for all three of us.’

So may it be, Devi, she prayed. Make his strength threefold. For he now fights for three lives, not one.

It was a grim assembly that gathered once again in the clearing at the heart of the valley. Gone were the eager comments and sharp observations. Not one of Rama’s generals and advisers was spared of cuts, scratches, or lacerations. All were coated with a fine layer of dust and grime, and tear streaks marked many snouted visages. The sound of wounded vanars and bears was all around, made the more heart-tugging because those wounded or dying struggled pitifully to restrain themselves from crying out openly, and only exhibited their agony in helpless coughing or fits of delirious moaning. In the dim, dusty air of the plateau, the bear lords looked no less menacing, to Hanuman’s eyes, than kumbha-rakshasas. Jambavan’s ruby-red pupils smouldered with a fury that sent a trickle of unease down the vanar’s curved spine; the king of bears looked as if he would eat the first rakshasa he met alive, horns and hoofs and all. Not one of those gathered here had been spared the loss of one or more blood-kin or friend. The dead still lay in great heaps, awaiting cremation later that evening, after the day’s fighting was done, for even vanars and bears were aware of the edicts of Manu Lawmaker and the ancient sages regarding the rules of combat, and Rama’s army would follow them scrupulously, whether or not the enemy chose to do so. It was testimony to Rama’s leadership and the respect all had for him that they were not shrieking and raging with fury at the treachery of the king of rakshasas. Nor were they incapacitated by grief and fear at what new terrors the lord of Lanka might have in store for them.

If anything, despite the tragic gloom that hung about them, despite the atmosphere of uncertainty and unease at the bitterly unfair slaughter and massacre, there was still an air of dignity in the face and bearing of each and every one. Even King Sugreeva, the oldest and weakest, bore himself with stubborn pride, although he had lost a son, Angad's younger brother, no older than little Sakra, to the terrible 'killing stones' as the vanars now called the sorcerously created rocks and pillars. After all, they were still Rama's soldiers, and there was still a war to be fought. A war for dharma.

Rama spoke in a quiet yet clear voice appropriate to the occasion, briefing them on all that he had observed and studied during the long night of the killing stones. Sugreeva nodded from time to time, Angad interjected a comment or two, and others added their own contributions to the gathering of intelligence on what the enemy's plan might entail next. Hanuman described to them all how, when seen from high above, Ravana's scheme seemed quite clear. By raising the sorcerously constructed fortress, he had enclosed all of Rama's forces in a central walled-in area, some several yojanas wide and long. Unable to retreat back to the sea, vulnerable if they attempted to scale the towering smooth-faced stone ramparts, the vanar and bear senas were left with only one choice: to proceed southwards towards the capital city.

'Then that is what we shall not do,' Angad said angrily, almost spitting with vehemence. 'We shall not fall into his trap.'

'Aye,' said General Susena, whose left paw had been nearly severed by a descending block. He held the disabled paw against his chest, face pale from blood-loss but no less fierce with war-lust. 'My Mandaras will take the front line and mine their rakshasa bellies the way we mine silver!'

Several grunts and noises of agreement echoed this sentiment. Rama waited for them to finish, then shook his head decisively, once. 'No. We shall do exactly as they wish. We shall march south and besiege the capital.'

General Vinata of the Mandeha vanars frowned. ‘But my lord Rama, we may be marching into a trap.’

General Satabali, who had lost two brothers and a wife to the killing stones, grunted in agreement. ‘Most certainly. They wish to shepherd us into an ambush like sheep. It is evident from the lie of the land as Hanuman described it. I could even point out the likely spot where the ambush will take place.’ He indicated a spot on the dirt map that Nala had sketched quickly but expertly as Hanuman had described his sky-view of Lanka. ‘Here, here, and here. They will strike us from the flanks and behind, using the natural cover of the terrain and these thickets to conceal their approach until the very last minute. Then, they will no doubt throw open the city gates and sally forth to catch us in a pincer and crush us.’

‘My vanars know whereof they speak, Rama,’ King Sugreeva said. ‘Heed their advice well, my friend.’

‘I respect their knowledge of warcraft and do indeed heed their advice, King Sugreeva. But when the enemy makes his plan known, he also makes his weaknesses known.’

Several furred faces frowned. ‘What do you mean, Lord Rama?’ General Nila asked, his dark fur still matted in places by the blood of comrades and loved ones he had tried to save.

Rama looked at each of them in turn. ‘In my father’s court at Ayodhya, as a boy, I saw many emissaries from far-flung lands arrive and speak at length about their peoples, cultures, social customs, and other matters. Among these nations was a land far beyond the redmist ranges, a great nation spread across an archipelago of islands. It is said to be a beautiful land, a veritable heaven on earth, and its people are as beautiful as the land they live upon. We Aryas have many things in common with them, including our adherence to morality and the strict tenets of law and custom. Yet there is a great deal of difference between us, and it is in these differences that we can learn so much. For instance, among their warriors, there is a principle of war termed shima.’

‘Shima?’ Angad repeated with not a little trace of puzzlement. ‘I have never heard of such a thing before. Is it a siege machine? For that is one thing we do not have. We will need siege machines to breach the walls of Lanka.’

‘The walls of Lanka,’ Lakshman said curtly, without preamble or any attempt at diplomacy, ‘are made of the same stone blocks as those walls that skirt the plateau.’ He inclined his head in the direction of the walls that, while not visible here, miles from the rim of the cliffs, still loomed large in everyone’s mind’s eye. ‘A siege machine that can breach three-yard thick stone walls has not yet been invented, to the best of my knowledge.’

Angad looked as if he was about to retort sharply to that but restrained himself. He nodded, understanding both Lakshman’s response and his directness. In a sense, Hanuman thought, the young prince of Kiskindha and the second prince of Ayodhya had many qualities in common.

The bear king’s baritone rumbled like thunder.

‘Go on, Rama,’ Jambavan growled. ‘Tell them about shima. Tell them about how, at times, letting the enemy know your plans is an effective strategy. For he then believes that he knows your plan of attack and defence and arranges his forces accordingly. So he is already reacting to you instead of acting. While you, knowing that he knows your every move, are free to change your plans at any moment, thereby surprising him and forcing him to continue reacting, except that now, he knows not what you will do next, and because his forces are deployed to deflect your alleged plans, he is unable to reposition them quickly enough to respond to your new movements.’

Jambavan’s eyes bored into each one in turn as he looked around at the war council. ‘Rama means to use the precept of shima to feed Ravana information regarding our war plans, giving out all our military secrets to the lord of rakshasas and setting us up for an even greater massacre than the one we suffered last night.’

EIGHT

There was dead silence for a long moment as everyone absorbed the bear king’s words.

Finally, Sugreeva spoke. ‘A remarkable strategic manoeuvre. I have never heard of such a tactic in all my years. Is that what you intend, Rama?’

‘It is, my lord Sugreeva.’

Angad frowned and scratched his head unabashedly. ‘It sounds ... complicated. Will it work?’

Lakshman gave him a withering look but refrained from answering that rhetorical query directly. Angad shrugged as if to say, Well, I didn't want to admit that I don't really understand a word of it.

General Satabali spoke, his age-ripened features cast in deep contemplation. ‘That is not the question to ask, Prince Angad. The questions to ask are, “How may this be accomplished?”, by which I mean how may we pass on our plans to Ravana, and more pertinently, “What are those plans to be?” ’

Rama said quietly. ‘The plans are the same we discussed yesterday evening at our war conference. They were designed for a direct siege-assault on Lanka's forces at the gates of the city. The triple formation, the order of attack, the flank troop movements, the counter-circling ... we shall let Ravana believe that all that information is the sum total of all we have planned for the forthcoming battle today.’

General Satabali stared in dismay. ‘Our entire battle plan? But Rama—’

Rama held up a hand, palm outwards. ‘Before you say anything further, my good general, you should know that the plan we are speaking of—yes, our entire battle plan—is already in the enemy's possession. It has already been delivered to Ravana, and even now, the spies who transported that information are back amongst us, sniffing out more intelligence.’

He gestured at the open clearing in which they stood, bordered on all sides by a dense thicket of a mixture of trees and foliage. Their gathering stood in the very centre of the open area, several dozen yards from the nearest tree or rock. Hanuman knew why, as Rama had asked him to scout out and find a place meeting these requirements before summoning the war council to this spot.

‘Why do you think I chose this location for our conference? Even now, eager eyes watch us.’

Angad started, twisting around, his eyes popping. ‘Spasas! Among us? Impossible! My angadiyas would sniff out a rakshasa a mile away, even before it approached our ranks. So would any vanar for that matter.’ At a growl from Kambunara, he added hastily, ‘And any bear too, I have no doubt!’

Rama met Hanuman’s eyes. ‘But what if they do not smell or look or act like rakshasas? What if they appear to be, to all intents and purposes, vanars, no different from your own people?’

‘Vanars?’ Sugreeva asked, then sighed plaintively. ‘Yes, I have heard of this from the olduns. There is a line of rakshasas capable of altering their shape and outward appearance. But what of the smell, Rama? How can they make themselves smell like us?’

‘Why don’t we ask them how, my lord Sugreeva?’ Rama said simply. He nodded at Hanuman. ‘Flush out our rakshasa spies.’

Hanuman rose into the air, hovering a couple of yards above the others. Suspended in the air, visible to anyone watching from the thicket around them, he issued a sharp, piercing whistle. It was the pre-arranged signal.

At once, a flurry of movement exploded in the trees to the south-west of the clearing. Leaves and twigs flew and fell to the ground, as a brief, violent struggle broke out in the upper branches of the trees bordering the clearing. The shrieking of outraged vanars carried all the way to the council. The struggle did not last long, because, Hanuman knew, the trap had been laid carefully and shrewdly. The one thing the spies had not been expecting was to be spied on themselves! Yet again, he admired Rama’s ingenuity as a warrior as well as a master strategist of warcraft. When he had carried his lord down from the ramparts, Rama had done more than restore strength and courage to his tortured soul; he had given him simple, explicit instructions about a dozen chores to be carried out at once. The work had cleared his addled brain more effectively than any hours-long pravachan.

He marvelled at Rama's sharpness. Even his own preternatural powers of perception had not sensed the presence of the spasas the previous evening. Yet Rama had, and had devised a plan even while dealing with a hundred other details as well as the terrible tragedy of the night before. That itself infused Hanuman with new strength: to be guided by such a leader was sufficient to instil shakti in the weakest warrior.

A few moments later, a group of figures dropped from the trees to the ground below. One of them rolled and leaped up and attempted to flee, but was quickly caught once again, subdued, and bound tightly. From this distance, all the parties involved looked exactly like vanars. And even as the captors forced their struggling, cheekaing prisoners to march towards the war council in the clearing, there was no way to tell them apart. Hanuman sniffed the air carefully, but all he scented was indication that the prisoners had been consuming a diet that would be considered unorthodox, even repulsive, to a Kiskindha vanar. Which could be said of almost any of the variegated tribes of vanars that were part of the great collective of Rama's patchwork army.

As the group of vanar captors and prisoners came closer, he heard the other generals exclaim. He knew what they were wondering at: the three vanars who were herding the two captives were none other than the same Kiskindha spies whose lives King Sugreeva had spared after their assassination attempt on his life, at Rama's request. They had cowered, fearful for their lives that day on Mount Rishimukha. Today, they strutted boldly, their faces bright with pride at having accomplished their given task. They stopped within a few yards of Rama and the war council, forcing the two captive vanars to their feet. The prisoners bared their teeth and issued low growls but complied. One of them, a mangy-looking vanar with buck teeth and a chewed-up tail, glanced fearfully at Hanuman. Evidently, they feared him the most of this assemblage. That was to be expected, for if they were rakshasas they certainly knew of his rampage in Lanka just two days ago. And after the night of the killing stones, not just they, but any rakshasa in Lanka had good reason to fear Hanuman's wrath. He could feel his body expanding involuntarily as his pulse raced. It would bring him great satisfaction to grow to giant size, take these two wretched infiltrators in his fists and pound them on the stone ramparts that had slaughtered so many of his compatriots, staining that sorcerous stone with their cursed blood. But Rama's orders had been quiet yet clear: the spies were not to be harmed in any way.

Their captives pinned to the ground, and placed under the baleful eye of Hanuman himself, the three vanars who had not long ago sought to take King Sugreeva's life now came forward and prostrated themselves before him. 'My lord,' said the spokesman for the trio, a heavy-shouldered vanar with a dark blackish-brown pelt. 'As instructed, we watched them through the night.'

Angad stepped forward incredulously, sniffing curiously at the captives. 'You watched these spasas through the night of the killing stones?'

The leader nodded. 'Such were Lord Rama's instructions. No matter what happens, keep the spasas in our sight always.'

Lakshman nodded. 'Rama told me to pass on those instructions last evening before we assembled for the war council.'

Hanuman spoke up. 'And I was the one who flew and found our own Kiskindha spasas and passed on the instructions.'

King Sugreeva stroked his white beard bemusedly. 'These three are familiar. Are they not ... ?'

Rama nodded. 'The same three men that Vali sent to assassinate you on Rishimukha, claw-tips stained with blackjuice poison.'

'The vanars you pardoned,' said the old vanar Plaksa, who was leaning on a hickory staff, his ancient face lined with age and pain, for he suffered greatly from the ailments of age—his companion, Sugreeva's other adviser Prabhava, had perished in the night, crushed between two piles of fusing rock. '“If an enemy respects you more than he respects his own cause or leader, make of him an ally, not an enemy.” Those were the words of the ancient vanar Manasi from the Satya Yuga. Today, Rama has proved them true.' Despite his shaky voice and weak lungs, the old vanar's words still carried a great reverence, as did his rheumy eyes which fixed adoringly upon Rama. Hanuman felt a surge of pride through his heart and veins. To hear Rama praised by Kiskindha's greatest ancient tutor of artha and dharma was a great thing indeed!

Rama inclined his head, acknowledging the tribute. ‘Gurudev,’ he said, using the highest tribute a mortal Arya could address to a learned one, ‘you honour me by comparing my expedient battlefield decision to the wisdom of your ancient forebear.’ He performed a perfect namaskaram to the ancient vanar. ‘With your blessings, may the rest of my hastily devised plan prove as fruitful.’

Plaksa’s wizened features contorted. It took Hanuman a moment to understand that the ancient tutor and adviser was attempting a rare smile! ‘My lord Rama, even Skanda and Ganesa commanding the armies of the devas, with Indra riding Airavata in the first rank, would be hard-pressed to oppose you on this battlefield or any other. It is your karma to wage this battle of dharma.’

Rama did not question or spend more time on this cryptic response. Instead, he asked the leader of the Kiskindha spasas to continue his debriefing. He asked him to be quick and to the point for already the first rays of daylight were showing over the peaks of the rolling hill ranges of Lanka.

The heavy-shouldered vanar explained. ‘Our great brother Hanuman told us that Lord Rama had scented spasas in our midst, disguised as vanars. We were to scent them out and keep a close watch on them night and day, no matter what happened, until Rama called for us to apprehend them and bring them to him. We found them easily, for their scent was unusual, as if,’ he paused briefly to sniff loudly, as if seeking words to describe the scent in question, ‘they had been feeding on spoilt berries and grapes that even Dadimukha, master of the gardens of Vrindavan, would not have used to make his honey-wine.’

Vibhisena spoke up. ‘They are the result of an old breeding experiment by Ravana in the Bhayanak-van. A cross-breed between rakshasa and vanar that turned out to be more vanar than rakshasa. Even their brood-mother Tataka scorned them and they would have become food for their other hybrid siblings, as happened with so many other unsuccessful cross-breeds. But Ravana found them “interesting” he said, and ordered them brought to Lanka. Even then he knew that some day he would find a use for them as spies, no doubt.’ Vibhisena shook his head in wonderment at his brother’s great strategic mind. ‘They are vanars in every outward sense, but their inner organs resemble those of rakshasas more, and so do their feeding and mating habits.’ He paused, sniffing disdainfully. ‘That is the reason for their off-putting scent.’ He added uncomfortably, ‘Ravana determined these things by dissecting several of them and studying them closely. These two must be among the last who remain of the original litter.’ He gestured to the vanar who had been speaking. ‘Pray, continue.’

The Kiskindha vanar went on with his tale. Rama’s three spies had watched the two Lankan spies closely. The Lankans had spied on the war council, noting every detail of strategy with avid hunger. Later, when the killing stones began their terrible slaughter, the Lankans had scampered in the direction of the capital city, and the Kiskindha vanars had followed. A pause and an inflection in the spy’s voice revealed his emotional reaction to the massacre of the night before, and Hanuman could imagine how hard it must have been for the trio to stick to their appointed task in the face of such unexpected horrors. The spy continued, explaining how the two Lankans had led them back to the city of Lanka and had been permitted to pass through. Determined to fulfil their orders to the letter, the three Kiskindhan vanars had managed to breach the Lankan defences and enter the city as well, though the vanar did not explain in detail how they accomplished this task. ‘The guards were overconfident, the walls were high,’ he said scornfully, ‘but the ground was soft and it was easy to dig beneath the walls.’

Once inside Lanka, it was not hard to pick up the scent of the two Lankan spies although it was terrifying to be within the city of their most feared enemies, alone and unarmed. But by hiding in plain sight—pretending to be Lankan spies themselves—they had simply strutted through the other barricades and guards and followed their targets right into the heart of the capital. There they had managed to conceal themselves in the high branches of a great banyan tree and watched as the two Lankans passed on their vital information to a rakshasa general with the most magnificent teeth they had ever seen on a living creature.

‘General Vajradanta,’ Vibhisena said, on hearing this description. ‘He can bite through the blades of three swords at once, leaving perfect indentations of his teeth on all. He is blessed with a boon that enables him to bite through anything he chooses.’

After being debriefed by their general, the two spies had wined and supped and been allowed to indulge in Lankan hedonism most of the night, until they fell into a drunken, satiated stupor. Early this morning, they had staggered awake and made their way blearily back to Rama's army before dawn. On Hanuman's instructions a little while earlier, the three Kiskindha vanars had stayed close by the two Lankans in the trees, falling upon them when Hanuman gave the pre-arranged signal. And here they were.

Satabali nodded at Rama, Lakshman and Hanuman, including them all in his gruffly spoken congratulations. 'Smartly scented, shrewdly devised, brilliantly executed. But what would you do now, Lord Rama? Your Lankan spies must be killed, or they will go back and tell their masters all your real plans.' He added with a chortle, 'Unless you think that these spasas can be made allies as well!'

Rama studied the two rakshasas crouched on the ground. They looked amazingly like vanars. Hanuman sniffed. Their baleful eyes glared angrily up at the mortal yodha, as if they desired nothing more than to tear out his throat. He resisted the urge to cuff them for their insolence, knowing that if he did, he might wish to hit them harder than living bone could endure.

'No,' he said quietly. 'They can never be our allies. But we shall not kill them either.'

Angad asked, with his customary impatience tinged with genuine curiosity, 'Then what do you wish done with them?'

Rama's lips curled in a semblance of a smile. 'They shall be escorted to the gates of Lanka and handed over to the sentries there. Hanuman, you shall do this, fly them there and return as swiftly as possible. Dawn is upon us, sunrise is nigh, and we have many preparations yet to make. Go, my friend. Do as I have instructed.'

Hanuman needed no second bidding. He moved forward, bending down and scooping up the two rakshasa-vanars in both arms, then took to the skies with a swiftness that brought startled, choked gasps and a cheeka of outrage from the two Lankan spies. In moments, he was cutting through the sky like a falcon following its prey.

‘I don’t understand, Rama,’ Lakshman said. ‘Doesn’t this defeat the plan of shima you described earlier? Won’t the Lankan spies now go back and tell Ravana everything you outlined this morning as well? If what our Kiskindhan spies told us is true, the Lankans were able to read our lips and so deduce everything we discussed here at this war council as well. Now both our original plan and our counter-plan are in Lankan hands!’

Rama smiled. ‘What makes you think that either of those are our real plans?’

Lakshman looked at him, dumbfounded for once. So did everyone else.

Rama said quietly, ‘Now, if you will listen closely, I will tell you what we must do today to turn the tide in our favour and show the lord of Lanka that we are not an enemy to be dismissed lightly. It is time that we showed him that rakshasas can be slaughtered and massacred too.’

NINE

Hanuman flew up several hundred yards, high enough to view the lie of the land, yet not so high that he could not be seen easily by Angad and the other generals and captains and chiefs of the armies. He floated in mid-air, examining the scene below with great curiosity.

He had deposited the Lankan spies at the gates of Lanka, dropping them from a height of several yards right at the feet of the startled gate-watch kumbha guards—high enough to injure and cause pain, but not kill—and before the kumbhas could so much as raise their spears and howl a warning, he was speeding back to Rama. He had rejoined the council barely a moment after Rama had begun outlining his real plan. And now, only a short while after the council had ended, here he was, in the sky again, preparing for the first battle against Lanka.

He hovered in the air and examined the lie of the land below. To the north-east, the sun had risen above the rim of the ocean horizon and cast its golden light upon the world. Seen from this height, the ocean glinted and glistened, encapsulating Lanka as the waters of a pond encircled a lotus.

Only now, in the clear light of day, could he truly see the results of Ravana's sorcery of the night before and compare the land that lay below him now to the Lanka he had seen only a day or two earlier on his previous visit.

What had been a lush, fecund plateau sloping down on the south side into a valley which then rose again to the foothills of mountains, had been transformed into a vast enclosure bounded on all sides by the towering fortress wall. In a sense, Rama's forces were now contained within the walls of Lanka. But this was illusory, for these walls were intended to imprison, not to include. Lanka's true walls of defence were much farther south, where the inner fortress city now lay, resurrected in all its former blackstone rakshasa glory, the volcano beyond it spewing red-hot hellish rage. This was the Lanka that they had heard fables and legends of, the land of rakshasas and asuras and unspeakable things.

What Ravana's sorcery had achieved the night before, apart from killing almost a tenth of Rama's forces—decimating them in the most literal sense—was to imprison them in this part of the island, the northern end. Hanuman could see for a good yojana in every direction from his current vantage point: the armies of vanars and bears spread thickly across the landscape, fenced in by those menacing blackstone walls with their cruel spiked spears that protruded several yards.

After the council ended, the first thing Rama had done was offer a prayer for those who had fallen during the night of the killing stones, followed by a second prayer for those who had been spared. Speaking briefly to the assembled commanders, captains and tribe chiefs of both the vanar and bear forces, his words passed on to the gathering through word-of-mouth as usual, Rama had told his warriors that it was a sign of their good fortune that although they had suffered great losses during their first night in Lanka, almost all their commanders and leaders had lived to see daylight. That surely indicated that they were meant to live and to extract reprisal for their fallen soldiers.

The next thing he did was quickly sketch out his analysis of Ravana's strategy, based on his observations of the manner in which the fortress had been raised, and the design of its fortifications. He pointed out what they had all observed by then in the slanting light of sunrise: 'These fortifications are designed to contain us within, not keep us out. That itself tells us everything we need to know about their next plan of attack.'

Hanuman watched now as the lakhs of vanars and bears carpeting the landscape below milled about in apparent confusion, seemingly still fearful and disoriented after the night's traumatic events. Slowly, with apparent difficulty, the troops to the south began to organise themselves into battle formations, lining up in typical fashion. Farther south, he could see the clouds of dust raised by the approaching armies of Lanka. To all appearances, Lanka's armies had come from the city and were attacking from the south, as was logical, and Rama's forces were responding by forming up to face the defenders.

But appearances could be deceptive.

The troops were doing as Rama had ordered, playing their part exceedingly well. Slowly, in apparent confusion and with visible reluctance, the vanar and bear lines began to form, facing southwards. This left a great patch at the northern tip of the plateau completely deserted. Not a single vanar or bear was visible for several miles at that end.

A movement by the wall at the northern tip of the plateau caught his eye and he shifted his attention to that spot. That was the farthest point north, literally the place where he had pressed the cliff face to provide a more negotiable slope for Rama's armies to climb from the beach. Now it was bounded by the rampart wall. It was at that very point that he had found Rama an hour or so earlier, and carried him down to the ground below. Rama had spoken to the council about his search for a stairway down from the top of the rampart to the ground, and how he had found no such thing. Which defied all logic. What good was a rampart wall without a stairway for soldiers to climb to the top to defend the wall? There was only one answer to that, said Rama: The wall was never meant to be climbed, either by the defenders or the attackers. It was merely intended to fence them in.

Which raised the next, most vital question: Now that Ravana had Rama's army fenced in upon this part of his kingdom, imprisoned by those unclimbable walls on every side, how would he launch his first attack? The logical choice would be from the south, from the direction of the city of Lanka itself. But that would be too simple, too obvious. And Ravana was not given to simple strategies, as the sorcerous display of the night had itself proven.

No, Rama had said, had Ravana desired to attack them in the usual fashion, sending his armies across the mountain ranges to engage Rama's forces in face-to-face confrontation, he would not have designed the walls as he had. It was no mere coincidence that Rama had been raised up by the rising wall, for by that happenstance, he had been able to discover the lack of an ingress for Ravana's soldiers in the rampart walls, and from that lack, he had been able to deduce Ravana's entire battle strategy— and prepare a counter-strategy of his own.

And that was what was being put into action right now. From the moment Nala's messengers had brought word of the event that Rama had told them to look out for, the die had been cast. Just as Rama had predicted, the scouts posted as close to the walls as they could possibly get had felt tremors from deep within the ground. Anybody else would have thought that this was evidence of some new phase in Ravana's sorcerous redesign, but Rama was confident that it meant that his analysis was right, and had immediately given the word to move to the next phase of their counter-strategy.

Hanuman watched with bated breath as the troops below moved farther south as if they only had a mind to engage Ravana's troops arriving from that direction, with no awareness of any other threat. As they moved they left the entire plateau apparently empty.

The key word was 'apparently'.

Back on the ground, he had watched along with everyone else as Rama had pointed out the crevices and crenellations carved into the foot of the wall at regular intervals. Rama had explained for the benefit of the two species, who had no previous knowledge of such things, that in normal fortifications those apertures would lead to stairwells and tunnels providing passageways for troops defending the wall to travel along its length and to the top of the ramparts to reinforce the defences. But as he had already discovered, there were no such stairwells leading to the top of the walls, which left only the other possibility—passages. It had taken only a few moments of quick scouting by a handful of bold vanars to report that, indeed, the crevices and crenellations led to passageways within the walls, and that these passageways led, not upwards as would have been usual for a fortification of this type, but down. Once Rama heard this, he had smiled a smile such as Hanuman had never seen before. And then he had outlined the strategy they were now putting into effect.

Hanuman focussed his gaze on the dark shadows gathering at the foot of the walls. At first, it would seem that they were what they appeared to be—shadows. But in many places, they fell the wrong way, aslant to the angle of the sunlight streaming down from the eastern sky. And they moved as no shadows could possibly move. As he watched, they grew bolder, emerging into the light as they saw that Rama's troops had abandoned this region to march south, just as their master had intended.

Now he saw the flash of a rakshasa's tusked snout, now the gleam of a horned head, now the silvery flash of a steel weapon being unsheathed. Ravana's troops were coming up through the secret passageways inside the wall, just as Rama had predicted, and were now waiting until sufficient of their number had accumulated to launch the first attack. He smiled grimly. So this was Ravana's plan, just as Rama had expected: The lord of Lanka intended to catch them between a rock and a hard place—or to be more accurate, between a rock wall and a charging army. He was launching his forces from the south, duping Rama into forming his troops to fight there, and when the battle was fully underway, with all of Rama's troops committed, he would order these rakshasas, creeping up through the secret passageways, to strike at Rama's armies from the flanks. Rama's forces would be bound on all sides, hemmed in, and it would be easy for the rakshasa hordes to press them inwards until they had nowhere to turn or retreat. It was a brutal, cruel plan, and a brilliant one.

He watched as the rakshasas emerged more boldly now from the walls, like cockroaches swarming out in the absence of the occupants of a house, and lined up in preparation for their devious assault. There was nothing between them and Rama's unsuspecting troops to the south except a few empty miles of dense thickets. They would wait for the battle to begin before launching their assault.

He flew a yojana or so in a southwards direction, until he was floating over the approaching armies of Lanka. They looked formidable in the early sunlight, endless lines of rakshasas racing in the familiar thumping marching style that he had seen before during Rama's battles in Janasthana. There were legions of kumbha-rakshasas among them too, dwarfing their fellow rakshasas and wielding great wooden hammers with iron heads. Even though they were far fewer in number than the other rakshasas, the cloud of dust spiralling up from their battalion was denser and greater than that rising in the wake of the rest of the army.

He watched as the rakshasa army came within a mile of his own forces, and slowed to a halt, the two armies arrayed across the width of this end of the island, spread thickly across some two and a half yojanas. Even now, Rama's forces were much more numerous than those of Ravana, but in this too, Hanuman knew, appearances were deceptive. Ravana had many tricks up his sleeve, and even Rama could not second-guess every one of them; while all the troops that Rama commanded were there to be seen and counted.

He grinned slyly. Well, perhaps not all.

He flexed his body and prepared to carry out the next stage of Rama's plan.

General Vajradanta watched from a promontory atop Mount Nikumbhila as the Lankan forces reached their appointed places in the valley below. A hint of movement in the sky above caught his attention and he peered up to see a tiny speck flying high overhead. He scowled. That was the vanar champion, Hanuman. He could not tell whether the flying vanar seemed so tiny because he was so very high, or because he was merely his normal vanar size, but in either case, he knew that the simian was doing exactly the same thing as he was: spying out the lie of the land before the battle commenced. He watched as the speck sped northwards, back to the enemy ranks, and briefly contemplated calling for a regiment of archers to loose. He dismissed the idea almost at once: the vanar was flying too high and too swiftly for even the most accurately aimed missiles to catch.

He returned his attention to examining the troops below. From this projecting ledge of stone, jutting out several yards from the promontory of the fortress ramparts and enhanced by the considerable height of Nikumbhila itself, he had an excellent view of the valley below as well as a clear sight of the landscape for several miles in every direction.

Even from this height, the reverberating sound of the bone-horns of the heralds was faintly but distinctly audible, as the rakshasa leaders far below ordered their hordes to halt. The densely packed rakshasa lines slowed from a canter to a trot, and finally came to a trundling stop, the dust cloud created by their movements slowly carried away by the strong early-morning winds. At once, the inevitable fights and arguments broke out between the more belligerent tribes over stopping too soon or too slowly, and were suppressed as quickly by the barbed metal-rope lashes of the kumbha herding officers.

Vajradanta examined the formations carefully, turned to issue a few crisp orders regarding troop adjustments for his lieutenants to courier down through the trained vultures used for this purpose, then decided that the ragged formations were about as close to a semblance of orderliness as any rakshasa army was ever likely to achieve. With a grunt of satisfaction, he turned and strode back along the jetty, walking across the promontory to the spot where the rest of the Lankan command stood. As he approached, he could see the blackrock fortress walls undulate in both directions, running along Lanka's coastline for as far as the eye could see, an impenetrable defence that no army could possibly breach. It made him want to roar with exultation at the sheer power and might of his leader and his race.

Generals Mahaparsva, Mahodara, and Virupaksa stood watching the battlefield with glowering eyes. They were naturally resentful at Vajradanta being chosen over them to command the army, after that wretched vanar's rampage in the tower three days earlier. The looks of malevolence they shot his way didn't bother him one whit. He could bite through any of their limbs without even straining his jaw muscles. The only one who did inspire some slight unease was the veteran Prahasta, who had wisely suggested that he maintain his position of city commander and manage the defences against any possible intrusion or siege. Siege!

Intrusion! Ludicrous, given the formidable new defences that Ravana's sorcery had wrought. But he was still glad that Prahasta was not among the rivals who stood glaring at him from the rampart circle.

A little apart from them stood the sorcerers Vidyujjivha and Malyavan, looking even more smug than usual after the display of their asura maya the night before—even though they were barely apprentices to Ravana's mastery of the dark arts. Several other lesser officers of the Lankan hordes stood about, debating battle strategy, the weather, omens and portents, and even, in at least one case, whether bears were worth ravishing sexually. He allowed himself a smirk at that last query. Rakshasas would be rakshasas, after all. A flash of movement told him that Ravana's cousin Supanakha was watching covertly, which was her usual style. Vajradanta bared his teeth, tilting his face to catch the slanting sunlight and send shards of reflections dancing across the faces of his fellow rakshasas.

It was more effective than bellowing for their attention. At once, they all grimaced and cringed as one, shielding their light-sensitive rakshasa eyes from the splinters of reflected light with paws, helmets, weapons. All conversations died out, and he saw a flash of tawny fur not far behind the sorcerers as the shape-shifting yaksi came closer to eavesdrop more effectively.

He grunted and began without preamble.

'While we await our lord, let's apprise you of developments. As you must know already, if you aren't deaf or senile yet, the night's sorcery was smartly done. Our spies tell us casualties on the enemy's side were large, as many as two out of every five of their warriors were killed by the shifting stones. And the rest of the vanars are demoralised and terrified of more sorcery, which makes them weak and nervous to fight. So the vanars are as good as minced, take it from me.' He flashed his teeth again. 'I'm looking forward to seeing if their marrow's as tasty as they say it is. I wager they'll gibber and flee at the sight of our kumbhas alone, which I propose to send in the front line of the first wave.'

'Maybe they will, and maybe they won't. But you can wager yourself back that the bears won't be that much of a pushover.' The speaker was Mahaparsva, the general who had been next in line for promotion until Vajradanta got bumped up the line by Ravana. His triple-hinged mouth flapped and unflapped, revealing the sucking maw within. His tall, slender frame belied his ramrod strength and speed in combat. He sneered disparagingly at Vajradanta. ‘And you don’t have enough kumbhas to throw at the bears as well, do you, Jaws?’

Vajradanta bristled at the use of his most disliked nickname, but knew better than to draw attention to that deliberate provocation. Returning Mahaparsva’s sneer with a scornful gesture of his own, he retorted: ‘We have something extra tasty planned for the bears, Purse. Why, would you like to go and give them all bear hugs before we slaughter them?’

It was Mahaparsva’s turn to bristle now at the use of his nickname, a reference to the folding flaps of his oral orifice. He scowled sullenly.

Virupaksa snarled and pounded his chest, issuing a subvocal roar that Vajradanta could actually feel vibrating in his teeth and inner ears. The champion almost never spoke, but he hardly needed words to express his impatience to delve into the fray and perform his usual gristly routine of separating enemy torsos from limbs with the efficiency and speed of a butcher on a feast day. His muscles—indeed, his muscles upon muscles—bulged and flexed and he gripped the edge of the rampart wall nearest to him. The yard-thick block of stone actually began to crumble at the edges under his crushing grip. The sorcerers Vidyujjivha and Malyavan sidled away from this unseemly display of brute strength, their frail, pot-bellied bodies wasted away by years of poring over forbidden texts lettered with mortal blood on endless scrolls of parchment made of mortal skin in the deep, fetid dungeons of Lanka. Their eyes shone with a rheumy, cataract-obscured feverishness that unnerved Vajradanta far more than Virupaksa’s impressive show of strength.

‘We shall leave the breaking of our walls to our enemies to attempt, shall we, Viru?’ said a clear, calm voice from above them all. Vajradanta looked up with a start to see Ravana himself, standing at the golden railing of his Pushpak chariot, his ten heads seeming to stare in ten directions at once. At once, Virupaksa released the rampart wall. Everyone else stiffened in mute attention. Ravana smiled down at Vajradanta. ‘And my dear general, before you proceed with today’s scheduled programme of slaughter, there are two useful pieces of information I think you might like to gain possession of.’

Reaching down with two hands, Ravana brought up two vanars, their terrified furry faces dwarfed by the rakshasa lord’s immense handspans as he gripped them by the backs of their heads and raised them squirming for all to see. He tossed them contemptuously down to the rampart platform where they fell in two ragged heaps, moaning and crying out shrilly. Then he descended and alighted onto the rampart himself, like a lion among his pride.

TEN

The two hybrid spies writhed on the stone slabs of the rampart, prostrating themselves before Ravana. ‘Mercy, Oh Lord of Lanka, we are your humble servants.’

Ravana kicked them hard enough to draw the sharp crack of bone splintering, and one of the two turned pale with shock and pain. He ignored them both as he addressed the assembled commanders. ‘To put it briefly, it would appear that Rama’s army is falling into the very trap I had devised. At least that’s what these two buffoons learned this morning before they were exposed and sent back to us like simpering whores.’

Nobody sought to correct the king of Lanka by pointing out that the trap in question had been thought up by General Prahasta in collusion with Ravana’s own elder son, Indrajit. If Ravana chose to call it his trap, it was his trap. He strode to the edge of the rampart, gazing out across the assembled army in the valley below. ‘I see that you have aligned our hordes according to the plan, Vajradanta.’

‘Just as you ordered at our earlier conference at dawn, my lord,’ Vajradanta said obsequiously, trying with some difficulty to bow his thick, overdeveloped torso. ‘Everything is precisely as you instructed.’

Ravana was silent for a moment, seeming distracted now. Several of his heads were murmuring, one snarling, and at least three seemed to be meditating—at least, their eyes were rolled up in their sockets. Vajradanta tried unsuccessfully to avoid staring at them out of sheer curiosity. Finally Ravana nodded curtly. ‘Well done. And speedily too.’

Vajradanta blinked, surprised at the unexpected praise. He glanced around, licking his lips excitedly, to see if the others had noted this uncharacteristic compliment paid to his generalship. Judging from their dark, scowling expressions, they had. He almost grinned, but checked himself. It would not do to bare his teeth to his master and commander; among rakshasas, it was a sign of challenge. To Ravana, it would be a sign of defiance and insubordination, punishable with instant death. Nobody grinned at Ravana and lived to grin a second time. He kept his lips sealed.

Ravana strode out on to the ledge where Vajradanta himself had stood not long before, gazing this way and that, examining the troop positions and land layout with closer attention. Finally, satisfied, he nodded again, and turned back to Vajradanta. ‘Yes, well done indeed. I could not have aligned them better myself. Now we shall rearrange them all anew.’

Vajradanta blinked rapidly. Had he misheard his commander? ‘My lord?’

Ravana gestured casually with a hand whose wrist alone was as thick as Vajradanta’s shoulder, ‘I shall give you the codes for a new formation. It must be done within the hour-watch.’ He paused, reflecting, squinting at the rising sun. ‘Nay, within the half-hour. Time is of the essence. This battle should be over and done with long before noon.’

Vajradanta stared in numb confusion. ‘Within the half-hour? New formation? My lord ...’

Suddenly Ravana was all too close to him, his powerful arms within easy striking distance, his breath hot and scented with a dozen different odours—actually, ten, to be exact. He placed one palm upon Vajradanta’s shoulder; it felt as heavy as a bag full of iron ingots. One squeeze, and the general’s shoulder would be no longer a shoulder, merely fragmented chips of bone and gristle and cartilage. He swallowed nervously, carefully keeping his lips pressed together, to avoid showing his famous teeth.

‘Vajra,’ Ravana said quietly, with breath that was redolent of scented paan, supari nut, and something else that the general could not identify—it could not possibly be roasted mortalflesh, could it? ‘You are named for your lightning sharp teeth. Surely your intellect is not as slow as molasses?’

Vajradanta swallowed a gob of his own blood, only then realising that he had bitten the inside of his own cheek when Ravana’s hand had descended on his shoulder. ‘Nay, sire. I understand perfectly. The new formation shall be aligned as you desire within the half-hour. You have but to provide me with the codes.’

Ravana’s heads peered at him. It was unsettling to be gazed on from this close by that entire formidable rack of heads, their grinning, leering, scowling, chewing, abusing, suckling faces within spitting distance from his own. When one chuckled softly at last, he hardly knew which one.

‘Excellent.’ The hand on his shoulder patted him heavily, then, mercifully, was removed. ‘I knew I could count on you to be a good trooper, my toothsome friend. Here are the codes. See that they are carried out at once.’

He gestured, and a scroll held by one of the waiting vulture-handlers nearby was plucked clean out of the rakshasa’s hands and wafted in the air. In a trice, lines of instructions coded in the Lankan secret communication shorthand appeared on it magically. Vajradanta caught the scroll as it fell out of the air, and rolled it up neatly, gesturing to the same handler to come forward and take it. The rakshasa approached fearfully, all but crawling across the rampart to avoid raising his head in Ravana’s presence, and in another moment the precious instructions were being tied to the foot of a reluctant vulture. The bird bit hard at his handler’s gloved arm, squawked an ugly, resentful cry, then took off with a fluttering of its ragged wings, soaring on an air current down to the valley below.

Vajradanta gestured to another pair of handlers and quickly dictated a series of follow-up codes to his hand-picked lieutenants below which would ensure that the new instructions were carried out with the lightning speed for which he had been named.

That done, he turned smartly to his master. ‘My lord, I myself ought to descend to the valley in order to see that the instructions are carried out with the efficiency you desire.’

Ravana nodded obscurely. ‘In a moment, my lightning-toothed one. I understand. You will need to crack a barbed whip, bust a few skulls, and generally use a combination of bullying and brute force to ensure that the re-formation is carried out in time. I was once a lowly lieutenant in the rakshasa ranks too, you know. I recall how hard it can be to keep a horde in order—sometimes even to keep them heading in the right direction in a battle! But wait a moment longer. I have one last jewel of information to impart.’

Vajradanta bowed his head, straining his thick neck to do so. He waited patiently as the sun inched higher in the eastern sky, already casting its gaudy light across this entire part of the world.

‘Yes,’ Ravana said, his central head gazing dreamily into the distance, visualising something none of them could see. ‘You see, sometimes the prey that has eluded the predator long enough begins to believe that it is the predator.’

He grinned with four heads simultaneously at the commanders of his armies gathered on the rampart top. ‘It is then necessary to remind him that just because the predator chooses to prolong the hunt, that is not proof of the predator’s weakness, but of his superior skill and self-confidence. For, what fun is a hunt that is ended in a flash? The true test of skill comes only in contests of endurance.’

He effected a gesture that Vajradanta thought was directed at him. It took the general a moment to realise that Ravana was gesturing at the rakshasas standing directly behind him, the two sorcerers Vidyujjivha and Malyavan.

‘Fellow misappropriators of Brahman shakti,’ Ravana said, one head chuckling at his own wit, ‘it is about time you earned the right to the considerable fee I pay to keep you in my employ. I have a task for you to perform. Do you see these two wretches here?’ He gestured at the still prostrated vanar-rakshasa hybrids. ‘What are your names, wretches?’

The two broken-spirited creatures stared up in abject terror. ‘S ... s ... Suka and Sarama,’ said one, answering for both. The other merely gibbered wordlessly, spittle oozing from his mouth.

‘Suka and Sarama,’ Ravana said thoughtfully.

Suddenly he bent, gripped the two vanar-rakshasas by the skin of their necks, and with one casual flick of his powerful arms, flung them over the ledge and into the valley below. Simultaneously astonished and delighted, the two sorcerers rushed to the edge of the rampart and followed the fall of the two vanars as they hurtled to certain death, too shocked even to emit screams. ‘You see,’ Ravana said, sounding disappointed. ‘They cannot fly. I must have pigs with wings for the crucial phase of today’s plan. That is the task I entrust you with, sorcerers: Grow me enough wings to make an entire battalion fly.’

He chuckled at their stunned expressions. ‘Fear not. I will provide you with the means to accomplish it. And the mantras. It’s just that I need you to do it yourselves, as I have other business to attend to meanwhile.’ He gestured below. ‘A little matter of a battle to be won.’

Then he clapped a hand on Vajradanta’s shoulder again, almost crushing it to shards. ‘Now, my sharp-toothed friend, take my Pushpak and race down to the valley, and carry out my instructions to the letter. It’s time to show Rama and his furry companions that vanars can fly too. They just have a little trouble landing in one piece!’

Rama and Lakshman reached the top of the rise. Mount Suvela, as Vibhisena had called this peak, was barely worthy of the title of mountain, but it afforded the best view for yojanas around. From here, the two brothers could see the towering eminence of Mount Nikumbhila, perhaps a yojana and a half farther south, with its massive fortifications. Lakshman said he thought he could spy figures atop the fortifications, and as he watched, Rama distinctly saw an object rise and fly up into the air before dropping slowly into the valley below. From the manner in which the sunlight caught the object and reflected gaudily off it, like a lamp’s light off the jewellery of a queen, he had no doubt it was Ravana’s Pushpak chariot. And where Pushpak was, Ravana was too, most certainly.

From this vantage point, they could just glimpse the endless lines of the rakshasa forces, still tramping this way and that in complex formations, raising new clouds of dust that were quickly carried away by the unusually strong sea wind.

‘What are they doing?’ Lakshman asked, frowning. ‘They seem to be rearranging their lines. Why would they do that now?’

Rama watched the swirling dust-haze of the rakshasa army movements for several moments. ‘We must not make the mistake of underestimating Ravana. He is too shrewd to be easily duped. I wish there was some way we could know if he has swallowed the story the spies carried back to Lanka.’

Lakshman shrugged philosophically. ‘Well, it is too late to do anything now. Our forces are committed. They only await our order to cover the last mile or two before engaging the Lankans.’

He gestured to the left. ‘They look quite professional now, don’t they?’ he said with more than a trace of pride. The days of hard drilling and disciplining had borne fruit, the more so after the bitter losses suffered by the armies, for nothing toughened soldiers more effectively than sudden death.

Rama turned his attention to the armies of vanars massed in the declivity to the left of Mount Suvela. While nowhere near as organised and neatly arrayed as the armies of Ayodhya or other Arya nations, and lacking any uniformity—even of pelt colouring, height, shape or size—the vanar forces were nevertheless impressive when he recalled the ragtag swarms he had first set eyes on, when Hanuman had arrived at the northern shore. They had been akin to wild monkeys then and anyone could have been forgiven for mistaking them for their simian cousins. But now they were vanars, bearing themselves as proudly as was possible with their curved spines, their tails all held upright to avoid bothering those behind and beside them, and attempting manfully to move as units, instead of scampering individually with the abandon they were so accustomed to in their native lands. Yes, Lakshman’s training had borne fruit indeed. It was testimony to the commitment and devotion of those brave little warriors that he could actually count the number of lines in which they were arranged.

He smiled. Despite the apparent enormity of their numbers, he knew that those were barely half the number of vanars under his command. He exchanged a glance with Lakshman and saw the glint in his brother's eye as he acknowledged the same observation. There was neither sign nor sight of the rest of the forces, and that was most impressive of all. Yes, they were ready now for battle, or as ready as they were ever going to be.

A cheeka from behind alerted them to the arrival of Nala. Rama turned to see the spry little vanar racing up the grassy hillside. 'Rama!' He was glad that the bridge-builder had not been one of those who perished in the night of the killing stones: Nala was an ingenious engineer and was invaluable in calculations and plotting, as well as map-making. It was he who had translated several of Rama's and Lakshman's troop movements into practical deployments, and of course, without him the whole backbone of their main plan would be worthless.

If they succeeded in pulling off this bold and desperate plan today, a portion of the credit would belong to Nala.

But more than his ingenuity and skill, it was his passion that Rama loved about Nala. Witness the way he had come bounding across the miles when he could as easily have sent one of Angad's couriers—artfully arranged at intervals across the battle theatre for that very purpose. Like Rama himself, he swore by the maxim that if it was worth doing, it was worth doing yourself.

'Rama,' he said, chopping his sentences up to gasp for breath, 'All goes just as you said. The angadiyas just brought word. Tremors from beneath the northernmost walls! Just as you predicted. And our lookouts have spotted them emerging.' He sucked in a longer breath. 'They are ugly brutes, Rama, larger than normal rakshasas and oddly made, with some kind of armoured hide growing on their backs and chests.' He touched himself on the aforementioned places and grimaced. 'I do not know how we will be able to bring them down, but Angad and Kambunara say they will find a weakness, everyone has a weakness.'

'That they do,' Rama agreed grimly. 'Including us. What of the other lieutenants? Have they been deployed as instructed?'

Nala nodded vigorously, pointing as he described each one's position. 'Under the command of General Nila, Mainda and Dvidida man the eastern flank. Under Prince Angad, Rsabha, Gavaksa, Gaja and Gavya to the north. General Susena commands the western flank with Pramathi, Praghasa and the twins. And King Sugreeva himself, aided by the generals Satabali and Sarabha, mans the southern vanguard with the main Kiskindha fighting force.'

Rama glanced at Lakshman. They had both tried to urge Sugreeva not to enter the fray himself, given his ailing condition and the injuries he had sustained the night before. But the vanar king would not hear of it. 'If not for you, Rama, I would have no army to command. If my life is forfeit in your cause, it is forfeit. Say not another word.' And he had bounded off with a strong proud gait that all knew was costing him a great price to maintain.

Rama nodded. 'It is time, then. Summon Anjaneya.'

'Here, my lord.' Hanuman descended from the sky with the suddenness of a bar of light emerging suddenly from behind a passing cloud.

Rama looked the vanar in the eye. 'My friend, my brother in blood and destiny. Do exactly as we planned and leave the rest to the devas. If we are meant to succeed, then they will fight side by side with us today. Go now. Give the word to begin the march. Make sure every contingent executes their orders exactly as planned unless they hear otherwise from me. And remember, you are to watch everyone and everything and report back to me constantly, but above all you are to watch me for further instructions and any alterations in the plan that I may issue. For only you can reach our far-flung legions in time to convey my words. I know it will seem strange and frustrating, to only watch without entering the fray yourself, but you must do this for me. You will have your chance to kill rakshasas very shortly. Only do as I ask for this first phase of the battle.'

Hanuman bowed and touched Rama's feet, then Lakshman's. When he rose again, his eyes were shining wet. 'By your grace, my lord,' he said, 'I pray I do not let you down today.'

Rama placed a hand upon Hanuman's shoulder, and from the vanar's response it was evident that Hanuman was overjoyed at this rare show of warm affection. ‘You will never let me down, my brother. Go now and add your name to the shining annals of the greatest yodhas of the Treta Yuga. Today you will do us all proud. I know this to be true.’

Hanuman stared mutely at Rama, then blinked away sudden tears. Before anyone could say another word, the vanar raised his chin and flew straight up with astonishing speed, gone in a blink.

Rama turned back to Nala. ‘Go now, my young architect. Send back word to all through the angadiyas to start the movements I outlined earlier.’

Nala nodded vigorously. ‘They will do exactly as you desire, Rama. There is scarcely a vanar or a bear on this field that does not have a fallen friend or blood-kin to avenge today in Lanka.’

‘Even so,’ Rama said, ‘remind them that while the desire for vengeance is a good servant to a soldier, it is a bad master. Let them curb their anger and unleash it only when permitted to do so by my order. And remember that the signal to change the formation will come from above, from Maruti, not from me or you or the angadiyas. Is that clear?’

Nala nodded, sombre now. ‘All shall be well, by your grace,’ he said. He dipped his snout to kiss Rama’s feet, then Lakshman’s, before they could protest—for neither approved of this particular vanar custom—and in a trice was bounding back downhill, already yelling out instructions to the nearest angadiyas. Before Rama could draw his next breath, the words he had spoken were being passed on through the ingenious and wildfire-quick network that was one of the great strengths of the vanar armies.

He turned back to see Lakshman scouring the lands below, to the north, then east, then west, and finally in the southern valley before them whence they had come a little while ago.

‘What are you looking for, Sumitra-putra?’ Rama asked, although he could guess.

‘Bears,’ Lakshman said, then flashed a wolfish grin at his brother. ‘I am looking for any sign of bears, Kausalya-putra.’

Rama inclined his head slyly. ‘And did you find any?’

Lakshman turned up his hands, palm upwards. ‘Not a one. It is as if they have all vanished off the face of Lanka.’

Rama nodded slowly. ‘Good. Then we are truly ready to begin.’ He picked up his bow in one hand and his sword in the other, preparing to give the final signal to the vanar armies. He paused, then glanced at Lakshman again. ‘Son of Dasaratha, you have not spoken a word concerning my battle plan since our first war council this morning. Even now, you speak of everything but the plan. Will you not offer me one argument or correction?’

Lakshman looked back at him with a tight smile, his own bow off his shoulder and in his hands now, an arrow already on the string. ‘Is that not enough to tell you what I think of it, Dasaratha-putra?’

Rama smiled back. ‘I am blessed to have you by my side today.’

Then he raised the bow in his left hand and the sword in his right, kept them aloft long enough for Hanuman to note, then dropped them to his sides in the pre-agreed signal to start the battle.

Then, as one being with two hearts, they surged forward, sprinting down the slope of Mount Suvela, towards the field of battle.

KAAND 3

ONE

A horn carved from the tusk of a mahish-rakshasa, an extinct asura species, sounded across the Lankan side of the battleground, calling the rakshasa armies to order. Its grating, low-pitched trumpeting, resembling a bull elephant's mating call, nevertheless carried far enough to reach Vajradanta's ears.

The general, seated atop a kumbha-sur, one of a small number of hybrid broken-surs cross-bred with kumbha-rakshasas, pointed the leaf-shaped head of his lance at his herald. The nervous albino rakshasa, colourless eyes covered to protect them from the blinding sunlight, raised his own horn to his maw, inserted his oral orifice entirely into the opening of his mahishasura trumpet, unusually large as befitted the army's main herald, and issued a call both higher-pitched and more threatening than any of the earlier ones.

It was echoed by identically high-pitched trumpeting from the far corners of the battleground, some from so far away that even Vajradanta, mounted four whole yards above high ground, could not see the flanks and rear formations. The trumpeting was echoed as well by the enraged lowing of bull elephants in the prime of masth, the mating frenzy that drove them to battle one another and tear up the countryside in search of mates. The masth tuskers had been corralled and harnessed specially for this battle, and it took a score of rakshasas controlled by kumbhas to hold each one down with ropes. At the sound of the high-pitched horns, laced with notes that were designed to enrage them as well as the sensitive hearing organs of the rakshasas, they renewed their frantic efforts to free themselves, crushing their captors.

Elsewhere, kumbha sergeants lashed their troops one last time, bellowing orders that had been repeated so often that some of their command actually moved their lips in time with their sergeant's words, repeating by rote.

There were a variety of rakshasa species on display. The kumbhas were a familiar sight, their numbers woefully depleted, yet the two hordes that stood today on the grounds of Lanka still made for a formidable sight.

Their hulking shapes bristled with horned armour, their fists clenching mostly the blunt-edged mace-like pounders they preferred in battle.

The wagh-rakshasas were distant kin to Supanakha, though she was a yakshi-rakshasi, cross-bred and unique, and resembled various sub-species of felines: some with thick yellow-and-black striped bodies, some sleek, jet black and muscular like bagheera panthers, others spotted like leopards crouched on their hind legs, yet others sporting the pair of large fore-fangs and white fur of the northern cats, and even a platoon's worth of leonine rakshasas, mangy manes and roar and all. The rest were an amalgam of various lesser breeds, an odd admixture of rakshasa and clouded leopard, golden cat, jungle cat, marble cat, fishing cat, lynx, caracal, cheetah, pallas cat, desert cat, civet, toddy tiger, marbled polecat, palm civet and binturong.

The lupine sub-species were collectively known in Lankan commonspeak as the 'dog fighters'. Their hierarchy—for all rakshasa sub-species were decided by strength and viciousness bred over generations to determine the order of their varnas, in a mocking imitation of the castes that mortals followed—was headed by the wolf variants with their sleek, grey fur and great slobbering jaws. These were followed by the jackal-rakshasas, then, in successively descending order of varna, the red foxes, the desi foxes, the dholes, hyenas, coyotes, and the various mangy pariah cross-mutations.

Farther outfield, though he could not see them, Vajradanta visualised the ranks of the mahish-rakshasas, claiming descent directly from the legendary Mahish-asura himself, he who had compelled the ur-Mother Goddess, Devi, to take a rebirth in order to rid the world of his menace. They were less respectfully known as the 'buffalo buffoons', on account of their relatively less developed intellect—no rakshasa sub-species actually took pride in calling itself intelligent—and obvious physical characteristics. Here one found the gaurs, the bantengs, the yaks, the mithuns, oxen, bison and tsaine rakshasas.

Bearing a biological similarity to the mahish-rakshasas, but no obvious physical resemblances apart from similarly cloven or hooved feet, were the antlered families, as they preferred to be called, more commonly known as ghaass-phuss eaters, because their digestive systems were better suited to vegetarianism despite being rakshasas. It often made them the fiercest fighters, perhaps to redress any misconceptions about their eating habits reflecting in their capacity for inflicting violence upon fleshly creatures. These came in an astonishing number of variants: the most recognisable were the shapus, marcos, nayans, bharals, ibex, leapers, markhors, nilgiri tahrs, high tahrs, nilgai, fourhorns, chinkaras, blackbucks, sambhars, kashmiras, thamin, swampers, chitals, chevrotains, hoppers, muskers, muntjacs, wildtusks and barkers. Seen from a distance, their torsos and lower bodies concealed by high grass, one could be forgiven for mistaking them at first sight for a herd of unusually diverse deer-like creatures. Closer up, one would be left in no doubt at all that they were savage rakshasas.

And finally, there were the few exceptions that were not enough to make up a tribe, let alone a horde, but were invaluable as wild cards in a battle. These were the one-horns, strikingly similar to the near-sighted armour-plated animals on the mainland, except that they could stand briefly on their hind legs at times, and were rakshasas through and through; the elephants, differing only from their 'normal' counterparts in that they had been raised by and with rakshasas for generations and taught to fear and hate the scent of mortals and other enemies of the asura races; and the broken-surs, once perhaps related to the desert horses with their water-carrying humps that mortals sometimes harnessed to cross the vast desolate sands of the Gobi aranyas, but with that unique cloven skull, from which their name derived, meaning literally 'broken-headed' and their squatter, speedier, more horse-like skeletal structure.

All in all, it was a formidable line-up, enough to strike terror into the heart of any army in the three worlds. Indeed, it was the rakshasas that had formed the vanguard during Ravana's legendary invasion of swarga-lok, the heavenly realms of the devas, when the other asura races had displayed typical last-minute jitters at warring with the very gods themselves. And it was the rakshasas that had had first spoils of conquest in those divine realms.

Vajradanta licked his chops as he recalled the hedonistic glories he had enjoyed on that campaign. His nether organs stirred at the recollection too. He grinned, baring his famous teeth at last as he urged his kumbha-sur forward, raising his ten-yard-long lance high into the morning air, catching the sunlight, and roared: ‘Ra-van-a!’

For that was the war cry of the united rakshasas of Lanka now, agreed upon after some cajoling—and cudgelling—on the part of their lord and master after his reawakening, replacing the dozens of separate tribe and horde-cries that had been customary before.

Ra-va-na. He Who Makes the Universe Scream. Vajradanta personally thought it was a splendid war cry. And what could strike fear into the hearts of the enemy more effectively than the name of the most dreaded creature in all existence?

As he spurred his mount into a trot, then a canter, taking it slowly only in order to let the other commanders follow apace, he heard the cry resound across the massed ranks of the Lankan army, echoed in a hundred different animalistic accents and variations, until it coordinated roughly into a deafening, bone-shuddering boom of a sound. ‘RA-VAN-A!’

Vibhisena reached the top of Mount Suvela just in time to hear the Lankan war cry resound from the foothills of Mount Nikumbhila. That the engorged exultation carried all the way to this spot, miles from the actual battlefield, reflected the mood of the rakshasa hordes. They did not merely intend to win; they were winning. Their palpable sense of victory rolled across the valleys and low hills that separated him from the place where so many lives would engage in a struggle to the death only moments from now. He bowed his head and mouthed a prayer for Rama’s forces as well as for Lanka itself, not the Lanka of Ravana and his bestial hordes, but the gentle, pure Lanka that had existed long before the lord of asuras had wrested this pristine island away from his brother Kuber and that would, he believed, survive long after Ravana’s evil reign ended. For it would end, he believed. He might not have the unshakeable faith that Hanuman had in his lord and master, but he believed in Rama too in his own way, or he would not be standing here today, on the wrong side of a theatre of war wherein the fate of his own land, his own people, was being decided.

He caught a flicker of movement in the sky and glanced up to see Hanuman flying overhead. The vanar was criss-crossing this section of the island-kingdom incessantly now, checking and rechecking troop formations and movements, for in this first phase of the battle, Vibhisena understood, manoeuvres would be crucial to gaining the upper hand. He prayed that Rama's armies, numerous though they were in sheer head count, would be able to withstand the far greater strength and skill of Ravana's hordes—not to mention the fact that the armoured, armed and battle-hardened rakshasas had enormous natural advantages over the naked, mostly unarmed and completely unblooded vanars. At least the bears possessed bulk and size in this otherwise woefully unequal clash.

As the last of the vanar troops in the declivity to the left disappeared over the top of a rise, going out of sight for a moment—they would appear again once they crossed the ghats and arrived in sight of the main fighting plain—he wished, not for the first time, that he was a warrior too, if only so that he could pit his own strength in Rama's favour. But that was wishing for too much. Though he was a rakshasa, a lifetime of hard penance—bhor tapasya—and the fasting, self-deprivation and sacrifice necessary to pursue his Brahminical goals had depleted him of the savage energy of his race. Yet, he knew he was stronger than an entire regiment of rakshasas in the one thing that mattered most to him—spiritual strength—and it was that which enabled him to stand tall now on the peak of Mount Suvela, where Rama and Lakshman had stood only a little while ago, and gaze out at the impending battle.

As the horns of Lanka sounded the final command to charge at full galloping speed, and the war cries reached a crescendo that echoed from the walls of the stone ramparts that now fenced in the land on every seafront, Vibhisena released a great pent-up sigh and lowered his weary body to the grassy mound. He sat cross-legged and focussed his mind on the perfect incantation of shlokas to help ensure the fruition of Rama's just cause, and the downfall of his own brother Ravana's empire.

So engrossed was he in his meditation that he did not see the vanar Hanuman whoosh by only a hundred yards overhead, on his way to carry out yet another overlook of the enemy forces.

Hanuman slowed his flight until he was hovering directly over the rakshasa army. The hordes were moving at canter speed now, and were building up momentum to reach a full-out charge. Already the dust cloud raised in their wake was half the height of Nikumbhila itself, and growing steadily. It provoked his senses to see the army of rakshasas charging headlong in the direction of his comrades, but his orders were explicit and undeniable: he was to stay aloft until Rama called upon him. His surveys completed now, he was only to wait and watch. The hardest task of all, for a warrior. He hovered above the theatre of war. For a moment, he was overwhelmed by the urge to expand himself and simply drop down like a hammer from the sky, pounding the rakshasas into the dust of their own homeland, but his devotion to Rama overcame this urge, and he subsided, forcing himself to remain a calm and detached observer as his mission required him to be.

A reflection off a bright burnished object distracted him and he glanced in the direction of the mountain that towered above the valley in time to see the celestial vehicle of Ravana rising swiftly to the top of the highest ramparts. He scanned the ramparts suspiciously, alert for any sign of mischief, but that was clearly unlikely: the forces of Rama were yet miles away, too far for any flung missile to reach. Correction: too far for any physically flung missiles to reach. He could not vouch for sorcery's tricks.

He vowed to himself silently that were Ravana or his minions to use sorcery to strike at Rama from that high rampart, he would not stand by and let it happen unchallenged: for anything that came from the sky was in his domain and he could not be expected to stand by and let death rain down around him. The ground war was off limits, but surely not the skies where he roamed. Even Rama could not find fault with that simple logic.

At present, there was no visible sign of threat from the high place. Pushpak, gleaming and resplendent in the morning sunlight, like the divine machine it was, reached the highest point of the ramparts and landed as gently as a feather alighting, vanishing beyond the crenellations that bordered the top of the fortress wall. From his present spot, he could not see beyond that point—not without flying up there and peering down, which his orders did not permit him to do. He sighed in frustration and returned his attention to his given task, watching the battle below.

General Vajradanta's kumbha-sur was flying across the valley floor now at full gallop. Grinning with exultation at the sheer joy of anticipation, the general whipped his head from side to side, checking his flanks. For as far as he could see to east and west, the ground was being churned and pounded by the front lines of the rakshasa hordes. After the last trumpet call announcing the full charge, the war cries had fallen briefly silent. Now the thunder of their hoofs and footfalls alone filled the air for miles around. A rakshasa army charging at full speed was a terrible, awe-inspiring sight to behold, and he was proud to be leading this one. All the brutality, abuse and humiliation he had suffered in his centuries-long rise to this rank felt well worth it now. He commanded the greatest rakshasa army in the three worlds, the last asura fighting force left in existence, and only Ravana himself stood above him in the military hierarchy. He felt the power of his position with every bone-shuddering step, felt the exhilaration of impending combat fill his veins and organs, felt the certainty of victory over the enemy on this glorious Lankan autumn day, and urged his mount to go faster, faster.

Finally, the enemy ranks grew closer. No doubt the monkey army was loath even to attempt to match the Lankan charge, that was why they had hung back so far, compelling the rakshasa hordes to come to them. He could see them now, at the far end of a canyon that rose up to either side. Somewhere, only a few miles to the west, was Mount Suvela, the tallest peak in these parts after Nikumbhila. That was where he would have stationed himself and his most trusted commanders if he were the mortal Rama. He felt certain that Rama was there now, on the peak of Suvela, watching with growing horror as he witnessed this merciless charge of the rakshasas towards his pathetic forces. Vanars? Hah! What was a vanar before a rakshasa? No more than a pile of fur-clad bones to be easily crushed with a single blow, barely a mouthful's worth of feeding. The spies Ravana had sent into the enemy camp—and who were now lying in blood-spattered pieces at the foot of Mount Nikumbhila—had brought back impossible counts of the enemy. A million vanars, perhaps over a million! Faugh! A quarter of a million bears! Juuaagh! There could be no more than a quarter of those numbers. At best, surely no more than five lakh vanars and a lakh of bears. And even those unlikely figures would have been greatly depleted by Ravana's magnificent wielding of asura maya the night before. Even he, Vajradanta, had harboured great anxiety and doubts when Ravana had made vague boastful claims about how the enemy would be dealt with in the night itself, without deploying a single regiment of rakshasas! But the morning had shown Ravana's words to be not just true, but awe-inspiring. If asura maya did not require such immense amounts of sacrifice and penitential preparation beforehand, he had no doubt that Ravana could have eliminated Rama's forces entirely and won this war through the use of his sorcery alone.

The entrance to the canyon loomed before him. He barely had to nudge his mount to steer it into the opening. He frowned as his kumbha-sur pounded its way into the canyon's mouth, barely a kilometre wide. There would not be room enough for the hordes to ride abreast, but that would not be a great hindrance. He had given instructions beforehand for them to fan out and ride around the canyon on either side, meeting up on the far side of these ghats and rises. He would have preferred to halt well before this spot and wait for the enemy to come forward to engage them, but Ravana's orders had been explicit: Engage the enemy wherever you find them, do not wait a moment longer. For some reason, the lord of Lanka wished to take decisive action well before noon, although Vajradanta could not understand what the time of day had to do with anything. In any case, the enemy was not coming forward to meet them, so they had no choice but to go to them.

He led his own vanguard into the canyon, the sounds of their feet and hoofs echoing deafeningly off the canyon walls. He could see the vanar forces huddled at the far end of the canyon, bunched together in a kilometre-wide mass like a herd of sheep unaware of the slaughterer's axe approaching. He flashed a brilliant grin. This would be a massacre of epic proportions. His enthusiasm did not flag even when he rode closer and saw the masses of brown- and black- and red- and silver-furred creatures extending far back, for miles it seemed. Yes, there certainly were a great number of them. Easily as many as the Lankan army's own numbers. But even a vanar or bear for every rakshasa was hardly fair. They would ride those foolish monkey-kin into the dust of this canyon if they simply stood there like that, no doubt stunned into immobility by the sight of the oncoming rakshasa onslaught.

Speaking of bears ... He scanned the great mass up ahead, exerting his excellent vision to see where the bear troops were stationed. But to his surprise, he could see only those yard-tall furry creatures with their long, looped tails—all held up stiffly behind them for some laughable reason—standing in surprisingly neat rows. No sign of any taller beasts. He was not pleased at that observation, and his grin faltered briefly, for it meant that the bears were elsewhere, perhaps on the flanks beyond this canyon, and that meant that the other hordes, rather than his vanguard, would engage them first. But there was nothing to be done about it now. He would smash into the vanar lines at this furious headlong pace, cut through them like a sharpened talon through yielding flesh, and then emerge at the far end to rejoin the rest of the regiments and engage the bear troops, perhaps even outflank them and catch them in a palm-meeting-palm slap, like a fly smashed between two rakshasa paws. Yes, that would work.

He regained his grin and rode down on the vanar ranks. Still standing in immobile rows, the poor, pathetic inexperienced fools. Did they think those neat lines would make any difference to the oncoming hordes? Did they think they could withstand the juggernaut of an all-out rakshasa semi-mounted charge that way? What a novice this Rama Chandra must be, to order his soldiers thus! And what a coward, to stay high upon a mountain watching anxiously, as his forces did the real fighting down below.

Well, Vajradanta would show him a sight he would not forget for the rest of his all-too-brief life.

The general spurred his mount, which was already frothing madly at the mouth and chugging breath frantically as it rode at breakneck speed. The perfect vanar lines, looking like nothing so much as a welcoming carpet of fur laid down for him and his vanguard to ride over in their certain victory, loomed as he crossed the last few hundred yards that separated them.

‘Ra-van-a!’ he roared again, raising his twin weapons, spear in one hand, the great hacking blade in the other. The canyon walls exploded with the echo of his vanguard’s responding cry:

‘RA-VAN-A!’

TWO

Five hundred yards or less. And closing fast.

Sugreeva squinted to see through the rising wall of dust that came thundering down the length of the canyon towards his position. He resisted the urge to grimace or reveal his discomfort in any way as he realised how close the Lankan front line was now, and the fact that they were coming on with no sign of slowing or stopping. Which was all to the good, for that was how Rama had wished it to happen, and it was a happy omen that Rama's prediction had been proved right.

He drew a slow, easy breath, not too deep or fast, for he would need every breath, every ounce of energy for the battle ahead. The Lankans were approaching at a frightening pace; and if bestial rakshasas, armed and armoured to the snouts, were not enough to instil terror into the stoutest heart, a large number of these were mounted as well. He had never seen such mounts before: they vaguely resembled the desert 'ships' that he had heard of from distant travellers, the hump-backed creatures that were said to have awful dispositions and could survive days in the arid sands without a drop of water. But these looked like deformed mutations of those beasts, their heads split into two unnaturally jutting out sections, each section with its own set of enormous squarish yellow teeth, as if someone had split their heads down the centre of the scalp with an axe. What were they called, these broken-headed creatures? He didn't know, but they looked every bit as dangerous as the snarling rakshasas that rode them. Right now, every one of them was slobbering wildly, mouth foaming liberally as they bore down on him and his vanars. And these were only the front lines. Behind them, stretching up the length of the canyon and far beyond it, were thousands upon thousands of roaring rakshasas of every description. He had never heard of most of the sub-species he saw now, let alone seen them in flesh. He wondered which of them would be the one to strike the blow that would send him to his ancestors. The one in front, leading the charging horde, seemed the most eager: a stocky rakshasa with blinding razor teeth that caught the sunlight and shone as brightly as a shard of volcanic glass.

Three hundred yards or less, and coming nearer every moment.

As he prepared himself to die with honour for Rama's cause, he glanced briefly to either side. From his peripheral vision, he could tell that not one of his brave warriors had budged an inch since he had given the order to halt and stand at attention. He had no doubt that their fur was as damp with sweat as his own, their hearts pounding as loudly in their bony vanar chests, their blood roaring in their veins almost as loudly as the oncoming rakshasa hordes. But they were the pride of Kiskindha, warriors tracing their ancestry back to the earliest age. They had followed him out of Kiskindha when Vali the Usurper had wrested control of the kingdom, had lived on berries and bitter gourd in his years of exile, and had marched behind him when he returned to the city to reclaim his throne. More importantly, they had drilled on the coast of the mainland under the tutelage of Lakshman for long hours before and after the arduous bridge-building, had disciplined themselves to acquire skills that no vanar in history had ever been able to master. And master them they had; for even difficult-to-please Lakshman had finally raised his eyebrows in surprised admiration and acknowledged their progress, the very day before the passage to Lanka.

Now they stood by Sugreeva in the face of this horde from Narak, the worst of the hellish realms. Preparing to meet near-certain death. Because it was essential to Rama's plan. That was the reason why Sugreeva had decided that he would stay with his men to the last; if the Kiskindha vanars had been chosen to shed first blood in this war—he did not count the treacherous murders caused by Ravana's sorcery on the night of the killing stones as blood honestly shed— then he would stand with them to the end. His resoluteness had overpowered even Angad's incredulous arguments; if anything, when he commanded his son to cease arguing and declared himself committed beyond debate, he had seen a surprised glow of pride and tearful joy in the young prince's eyes. It had been a long time since Sugreeva had done anything to earn that look and now, as he faced the thundering whirlwind that approached at the speed of death, he cherished the memory of both that look and the tight hug Angad had given him before parting wordlessly.

Two hundred yards or less, and now picking out their targets and aligning themselves accordingly.

And as if proving the very rightness of his choice, he had felt the years of self-pity, misery and frustration melt away like the frost on the firs in the northern ranges when the first thaw came. He had experienced a straightening of his age-bent spine, a quickening of his snail-slow pulse, a tightening of his sagging muscles, and most of all, a resoluteness that was as solid as iron forged and smelted and beaten in the furnace, as the mortal blacksmiths did to shape their sword weapons. As a king, he had done many things that could be termed morally ambiguous. His rivalry with his late brother Vali was the most questionable of all, morally speaking; he had, in a sense, been the first to usurp Vali's throne, and the guilt of that had weighed heavily on him, even though he had known he was doing the right thing in law and the people themselves needed him to be their king. He had never thrown off that guilt entirely, and it had aged him greatly, as had the long, bitter struggle that had followed, ending only in the death of his brother at Rama's hands. A part of him had been lost as a result of that bitter conflict, for no fight was as debilitating as a fight against your own kith or kin. Emotionally and morally speaking, there was no winning that struggle, not for him personally.

But this, what he was doing now, was righteous and right in every sense. He was standing on the floor of a great canyon in the feared land of rakshasas, heading the entire contingent of Kiskindha vanar warriors against the vanguard of Ravana's army. It was an act to be proud of, that his grandchildren would speak about reverentially to their own grandchildren some day. It was the stuff of which legends were born, and about which histories were penned. And it was right in every way, unassailable morally. In the end, he realised, as an errant tear escaped his left eye unexpectedly and rolled down his age-lined snout, a king's job was so fraught with compromise and moral ambiguity that there was only this one thing he could do without compromise or self-doubt or debate: he could stand with his people and die with them.

Less than a hundred yards, and now looming as large as nightmares viewed under the influence of an excess of honey-wine.

'Time,' he said softly, then repeated it louder. 'TIME!' he said as forcefully as possible, and was surprised to hear that it was far louder and far more commanding than he had thought he could sound any more, as inspiring an order as he had ever given, audible and rigid as smelted iron even above the drumming madness of the oncoming rakshasa hordes.

At once, his loyal, disciplined vanars did as they had been instructed. Every second warrior in each line leaped upon the shoulders of the warrior in front. The warrior in front crouched slightly, to balance himself, and then braced his body by reaching out with both paws to grasp the shoulders of the vanars to either side. The vanars on the outermost lines, near the canyon walls, braced themselves by reaching forward and gripping the shoulders of those before them. Forming a simple but effective two-layered grid. The vanars poised on top of their fellows crouched low, baring their teeth and tensing their lithe muscles in preparation for their next move. The entire process was accomplished in a fraction of a moment; leaping up was to a vanar what taking a step was to a mortal. Once aligned, they let go of one another's shoulders and prepared to leap literally into the jaws of death ...

Forty yards ... thirty-five ... thirty ...

And now there was no time left to reflect any further, no time for regrets, sorrows, memories, guilt, or forgiveness, no time for tears even. He dabbed fiercely with the back of one hirsute paw and braced himself. The vanar beside him, his general Sarabha, said urgently, 'My lord ... if you will.' Meaning that he should leap upon Sarabha's back. For in the plan they had developed, the vanars in the top layer would almost certainly have a substantial advantage over those on the bottom. They would at least have an opportunity of dying fighting, while those on the ground were unlikely to even survive the first impact—especially those in the front rows. But he shook his head fiercely, disdaining the offer, and stood his ground resolutely, paws held ready by his sides, claws arched to strike, teeth bared. A snarl rose from his throat and he felt that old friend of all warriors, regardless of race, species, skill or age, arrive to take over command of his faculties: battle rage was coursing through his veins now. He felt the same rage ripple through the massed ranks behind him, felt their readiness to die—but to die killing rakshasas—and suddenly he was a young vanar once more, barely a few summers of age, facing his first battle, a clash with vetaals in a dark forest clearing just before dawn.

Fifteen ... ten ... nine ... eight ...

He raised his voice one last time in a battle cry that was the only departure he had ever made from the Kiskindha screech.

'For Rama!' he shrieked.

The cry was all but lost in the terrible, unspeakable impact as the two armies collided.

Hanuman cried out in outrage.

Suspended directly above the canyon, barely three hundred yards overhead, he was low enough to smell the sweat and rancour of the rakshasa hordes and their vile mounts, as well as the familiar musky blood odours of his Kiskindha comrades. He saw the pre-planned manoeuvre executed with astonishing perfection mere moments before the Lankan front lines struck, the vanars leaping upon one another's shoulders too late for the rakshasa general to slow or halt his army's onslaught—not that the shiny-toothed fool would deem vanars leaping on one another's shoulders to be any kind of threat—and heard the last cry of King Sugreeva, shrieked a fraction of a second before the first mounted rakshasas struck the vanar lines. With his preternaturally enhanced senses, Hanuman could see clearly every detail of his king's snout, even the track of the single tear that had escaped his rheumy eye and travelled through the dust that had settled there. His heart swelled with pride. He had never in his own lifetime seen King Sugreeva stand so tall, look so strong, so resolute, so invincible ...

Then the Lankan vanguard struck the vanar front line.

The sound that resulted from the impact of the two armies colliding—or actually, of the rakshasa army colliding with the vanar army, for only the former had been moving—was a sound like nothing Hanuman had ever heard before. As soon as it entered his ears, he wished he could dispel it for ever, and wished he had never heard it before, nor would hear again.

It was the sound of metal crunching bone, of steel smashing flesh to pulp, of blood exploding out of living bodies, as a bladder-balloon filled with wine explodes when stomped by an angry elephant's foot.

It was the sound of vanar skulls striking solid rock after a fall from a height of several hundred yards—a sound he had heard once too often during the bridge-building. Of fragile vanar bodies crushed by hurtling rakshasas with a velocity great enough to shatter bone to the texture of squeezed marrow, skulls to the consistency of squashed brain, organs to paste. It was the sound of a thousand mounted rakshasas, each mount and rider's combined weight easily close to half a ton, striking the bodies of ten thousand vanars each weighing no more than a few dozen kilos. It was the sound of hammerheads as big as vanars themselves, falling like the wrath of cruel devas upon his comrades. It was a thousand sounds like these, each one as terrible and gut-wrenching, all issued at the exact same moment, until the total din of their emission was like a thunderclap on a sunny day.

The cloud of dust that had followed close on the heels of the charging rakshasas rolled over the canyon, boiling and seething as the front lines struck their target and inevitably slowed, and the hordes following behind spread out, milling about, roaring and striking and chopping and gashing and hammering, each rakshasa seeking its own victim—or dozen victims, if they could be had—with great gusto.

The cloud enveloped the ensuing battle, wrapping both armies in its thick embrace, mercifully concealing unspeakable death, unwatchable slaughter, unbearable butchery. Only the sounds of battle escaped its clutches, the roaring exultation of rakshasas engaged in mindless slaughter, of kumbhasurs, broken-surs and masth elephants trumpeting and calling out in dazed madness, of vanars shrieking their death-cries as they sacrificed their brave little souls.

Out of the fog of the dust cloud, a hearty roar was recognisable above the others. Hanuman distinguished it from the rest, knowing it came from the throat of the general of the Lankan vanguard, the one with the fearsome teeth. The strong wind that had blown at unpredictable intervals all morning, near tempest-like at times, then falling to complete stillness for long moments, suddenly swept down into the valley, bringing the unlikely odour of the deep oceans, brine, the scent of fish, cloying and sweet and salty at once.

The wind parted the dense cloud of dust in patches and strips, affording the flying observer overhead scant tantalising glimpses of the battle raging below.

He saw the rakshasa general, still astride his ungainly mount, laying his bladed weapon left and right, slaying vanars before they could come within striking distance of him. He had lost his spear somewhere, but the great blade was enough to cut a swathe of bloody slaughter through the vanar ranks. He urged his mount on with his knees, kicking his barbed heel into her bleeding flanks, and with a squealing protest, the beast lurched forward, gnashing and snapping at vanars as it moved through the mass of Kiskindha warriors like a boat through swampy marsh water. Many unfortunate vanars came underfoot and were crushed beneath its lumbering hoofs, their bodies smashed like those of rodents, leaving blood-spattered furry corpses in its wake. The rakshasa general's bladed weapon likewise sent arcs of vanar blood flying each time it swung through the air, leaving an assortment of chopped and severed limbs and shrieking, dying vanars.

The wind puffed again, and the dust rolled over once more. The general laughed a great rakshasa laugh, his gleaming teeth stained with the blood of his enemy, and then was lost to sight again, concealed by the rolling dust.

Hanuman gnashed his teeth in frustration. He longed to plunge down, like an arrow aimed at the heart of that rakshasa general and slice him in two like a ripe fruit. It took every bit of his self-control to remain floating here, watching this most heartrending scene. What did Rama expect of him? To simply watch his fellows being cut down like lambs before a butcher's blade? To hover like a dragonfly when his tribe-kith and clan-kin were being slaughtered mercilessly? When his own king, so brave and proud despite his years and ailing health, was undoubtedly breathing his last only a few dozen yards below?

But Rama's orders had been undeniable. 'Watch. Nothing more. Until I give the word.'

And so, gnashing his teeth, and beating his chest with impotent fury, he watched. And waited for Rama's word. As the unequal battle raged on below.

THREE

Around the time that General Vajradanta was leading the first charge into the canyon, and King Sugreeva and his Kiskindha vanars were preparing to meet the vanguard of the Lankan army in that first terrible clash, the site of another battle, only a few miles south of that canyon, was deceptively tranquil and calm.

In the shade of the densely wooded valley, bounded on all sides by rolling hills, the slanting rays of morning sunlight could barely touch the bottom of the vale. In the few places where they succeeded, the pure golden light of morning leaked through the closely interwoven branches of the trees, seeping through sluggishly to fall upon the leaf-strewn forest floor in ripples, slats and dappled patterns. Occasional beams of sunlight broke the greenish dimness, dust motes and insects swirling in them lazily. Birdsong still filled the air sporadically, and chirring and whirring of insects and the clicking and hissing of smaller creatures in the undergrowth only added to the sense of tranquillity.

Seated atop a latsyoa tree's upper branches, the vanar leader Mandara-devi was reminded of her home in the Vidarbha ranges where she had spent much of her childhood. She had sat in trees much like this in valleys almost identical to this one during her childhood years, except perhaps for the eastern wind that blew softly through the woods now, carrying the faint salty odour of the sea, and the fact that an army of rakshasas hellbent on killing her and her companions lay over that hill.

She glanced back, parting a branch to see northwards, and peered at the southern face of Mount Suvela. That was where Rama and Lakshman were to station themselves to watch the progress of the first part of the battle today. She could glimpse no sign of them, though it should have been easy enough for vanar eyes to spot a mortal's form against the lush grass of the mountainside, even at this distance. Instead, she found, on the rim of the eastern edge of the peak, a solitary figure that looked like . . . a rakshasa!

For one heart-stopping instant she almost panicked and issued an alarm, thinking that the worst had happened, Ravana's devious plan had succeeded and Rama's armies had been outflanked.

Then she saw the wind billow the solitary figure's garment, and recognised belatedly the white garb of Rama's ally Vibhisena. She breathed more easily, slowing her heartbeat. A rakshasa, true, but the one rakshasa in Lanka that could be trusted by vanars. There had been some muttered grumbling when Rama had taken the ocean-sodden rakshasa into his protection, trusting him on first sight and word, but Mandara-devi preferred to leave such decisions to those best suited to make them. The idea that Vibhisena could be a spy who would dupe them was too sickening to contemplate: better to be just a soldier and fight than to let one's mind rest on such befuddling thoughts. And while she had been a tribe-goddess to the Mandaras for a third of her natural span, she had been a soldier for almost all her life. It was her varna.

She let the branch fall back into place and returned her attention to the way she had been facing. That was where the rakshasa hordes would come from, and the last word from the angadiyas had been that they were no more than a half-watch away, and approaching with great speed. She wondered how King Sugreeva's Kiskindha contingent was faring, in the canyon a few miles farther north. It was too far for her to see or hear anything, but in a more silent moment, when the birds and insects fell still, as they would sometimes do in such tranquil forests, she thought she could hear, faintly, a distant roaring and gnashing, as of armies clashing somewhere. She could not tell if she was imagining it because she knew to expect it, or if she was truly hearing it. But there was a faint sound coming to her ears from somewhere, something that didn't seem to fit into the natural pattern of things. It was a terrible ghost of a sound, like the sound of ten thousand vanars dying unspeakably horrible deaths all at once, and she shivered despite the warmth of the day.

She sent up a silent prayer for King Sugreeva and her fellow vanars, may they fare well. She had two sons-in-law and one daughter in the Kiskindha contingent, and seven of their children, her grandchildren, as well. For that matter, she had kith or kin in all the various vanar armies fighting here today, but for some reason the little anxiety she felt was focussed only on those in the Kiskindha army. For as the vanguard, they would be bearing the full-frontal assault of the rakshasa charge, and she had heard enough of Rama's plan to first lure and then entrap the rakshasas in that narrow canyon to not want to know anything more. The thought that her grandchildren or her sons-in-law or even her daughter might already be lying dead only a few miles away was a thought she did not wish to dwell on. She wiped such thoughts clean from her mind, but with a small effort.

‘Mandara-devi.’

The voice was urgent and excited. She recognised the gruff tone as belonging to Dvidida, one of General Nila's two chief lieutenants. While Nila had nominally been given charge of the Mandara contingent, after her kinsman Vinata was injured in the night of the killing stones, Dvidida was one of her own. In fact, if she didn't know better, she would have thought him of her own line, so similar was his glossy jet-black pelt and burly, muscled physique to her own stocky shape. Perhaps, she had begat this handsome young creature through one of the many, many lovers she had taken in her younger years ... Sometimes, among vanars, it was difficult to tell for sure.

Dvidida squatted on a branch nearby, his beautiful burnished pelt almost denuded of fur, testifying to the numerous wrestling bouts he had participated in—and won mostly—over the years, making him one of the most lauded wrestling champions in vanar history. His jewellery—for all her Mandara vanars wore silver jewellery from their own mines—was sparse and close-hanging, but his earlobe piercings were profuse, marking the many victories he had achieved in single combat. She saw a flash of white teeth in the gloamy shaded darkness. ‘They come.’

Those two simple words caused a thrill to race down her spine. Veteran of so many wars as she was, she nevertheless felt a thrill that was wholly new and unfamiliar. ‘Are we all ready? Tell them to make sure that nobody makes a move until I give the signal. Understood?’

Dvidida's teeth flashed again. ‘Not a tick will twitch on anyone's pelt until you give the signal, my lady. They know that anyone who dares panic and move too early will have to answer to me, even if he or she survives the rakshasas.’

Mandara-devi resisted the impulse to smile back in response to Dvividā's smug grin. Her vanars might not have been as well trained and drilled in the mortal ways of battle as the Kiskindhā army, but they were good, honest vanars, mischievous at play and obedient to a fault in a crisis. She doubted that Dvividā would need to wrestle any soldier after this battle to discipline him, but if he did ... well, then she pitied the poor bugger. She herself had wrestled Dvividā only twice ... and although she had won the second bout by the hair on the tip of her tail, she would not wish to repeat that experience any time soon. 'Are General Nila and his vanars in position?'

'Ready and waiting as well, devi. They will not enter the fray until you give the word, or ... '

Or until they receive word of your demise . . . That was the pre-agreed arrangement. She clicked her tongue softly, approvingly. 'How many, how far, and how fast?' she asked.

Dvividā's grin faltered ever so slightly, then was back again as bright and insolent as before, but she had caught that brief hesitation and it spoke more eloquently to her than any dry narration of figures and estimates. 'Never mind,' she corrected herself quickly. 'Go on, back to your position. We leaders must be spread as far as possible, as we agreed.'

Dvividā nodded and was about to turn away when Mandaradevi hissed again, 'Dvividā.'

The burly vanar turned back, curious. 'My lady?'

'May you fight with the strength of our brother Hanuman and the will of our lord Rama.'

Dvividā looked at her a long moment, his small, bright eyes gleaming in the darkness. Then, without a word, for among Mandaras deeds spoke louder than words, he vanished back whence he had come.

She stilled the pounding of her heart and sought to remain calm. She slowly became aware of the silence that had fallen upon the forest in the valley. No birdsong or insect call broke the stillness now, even the sea wind that had blown this past watch, sometimes as fiercely as a gale in the making, had died out. She sensed the same disturbance that the wild creatures and birds and insects of the forest had sensed, and focussed her attention on its source, just over the rise of the ghats up ahead to the north. It was a mild vibration in the ground, transmitted through the trunk of the latsyoa tree, all the way up to the high branch where she squatted. She arched her tail, touching the tip to the branch, a vanar's equivalent of placing fingertips to feel. She felt the unmistakable trembling of the oncoming horde. She sighed. It seemed such a beautiful, idyllic day ... too beautiful for the carnage and slaughter of battle. Yet, such was the tragic irony of war, instead of enjoying nature's beauty and fruits, we foolish creatures squander our lives and seed the earth with our wasted blood. She prayed once more for all her vanars, for Rama's cause—and yes, even for the rakshasas of Lanka, that they might learn the meaning and value of peace some day. Perhaps, even today. Even if she was the one who had to teach them.

Then she focussed her attention fully on the direction from which she knew the enemy would come, the slight depression in the lowest hillock of the ghat to the north, barely a quarter of a mile from the tree on which she sat. The morning sun was just high enough to touch the tips of the grass on the peak of the rise, turning them into an army of gleaming blades, waving gently like a benevolent gathering. As she watched, the trembling turned into a shuddering. And then the shuddering grew into a palpable, audible sound. A thundering reverberation that sent squirrels and other small denizens of the forest scurrying for cover, a few smaller birds fluttering away in panic. The stillness around her grew grim, as if the forest itself knew what that sound portended. And perhaps it did. For nature's creatures were the first to know of oncoming disaster.

She could feel the hackles on her own body rising, a part of her mind, that primitive simian part that linked her and all vanars to their monkey and ape forebears, as it linked mortals too, screaming Run, flee, fly, and she used that impulse, turned it into fuel to feed the fire of outrage that had been sparked when she saw her son and his entire family crushed to death on the night of the killing stones, her brother fall in the bridge-building, her cousin drowned by the tsunami, and the almost certain deaths that lay ahead for so many of her beloved kith and kin.

Who were these rakshasas then, to travel to foreign lands and wreak havoc and destruction? Did they think they could continue unchallenged for ever? Well, they had erred in kidnapping Rama's beloved. For at last here was one who would not brook their transgressions. And her love for Rama and her anguish at his suffering fuelled her anger as well, and the fire within her grew and grew, until the thundering of her own mighty matriarchal heart was no less than the pounding of the ground just over that rise ...

The first figures appeared, lining up along the top of the rise from end to end. Ragged, horned, sharp-cornered silhouettes, limned by the light of the risen sun, half cast in golden burnished light, half shadowed. She caught her breath as their numbers grew, and grew ... hundreds, then thousands, then, as they began to roll down the sloping incline, tens of thousands. How many were there? At least they were all on foot, she saw. Her vanars feared the rakshasa mounts more than the rakshasa themselves. She was also relieved to see none of the kumbharakshasas that General Nila had warned them about; these were only the standard breed that she and her vanars had fought before—not often, not always victoriously, but at least they had had some brushes with this kind.

But never in such vast numbers.

She shuddered briefly as the rakshasa army began rolling down the slope of the ghat like a juggernaut, its thundering tearing up the grass and churning up the fertile soil to sods and clumps. And still they came on, lines upon lines of the blade-armed, horned and tusked, taloned, armoured and shaggy-furred beasts.

The birds of the forest, keenly aware of the destruction that would soon follow, called to one another and rose as one enormous mass, filling the sky above with their cries and the flapping of their wings.

For a moment the sky was shrouded by the cloud of fleeing avians, and the already dim forest in which Mandara-devi waited turned even darker as if portending the dark deeds that would be accomplished in its idyllic shade.

FOUR

Inside the cloud of dust and blood and madness, King Sugreeva grew slowly, gradually aware of the impossible: he lived yet. Somehow he had survived the first collision of the rakshasa hordes with his vanars. Because the oncoming mounts were riding too swiftly and were too large to swerve or correct their course, and because the vanars were so small, many of those in the front lines were literally bypassed without a hoof or a spear or a blade so much as touching them. Not all, of course: for every vanar like Sugreeva who came between those thundering beasts, at least two other unfortunate vanars fell beneath their crushing hoofs. The front line that had stood so bravely with their king, facing the oncoming rakshasa vanguard with the perfect courage of soldiers confronting certain death, was wiped out in a flash, like a line drawn with powdered ash erased instantly by a splash of water. The ferocious charge of the rakshasa vanguard, led by the cavalry, crashed into the vanar ranks like an elephant into a bamboo thicket. Some seven thousand vanars, brave Kiskindha warriors all, the majority with some prior battle experience, but far too many facing combat for the first time in their very young lives, were killed on impact, their mashed bodies driven together into piles of mangled flesh and splintered bone. So much blood was spilt in that terrible clash of Rama's armies and Lanka's hordes that the dust of the floor of the canyon was stained red ochre, a deep, dull, almost brownish shade that fittingly approximated the colour of the roughcloth worn by Arya sages since the beginning of time, for it was the colour of transcendence. The front lines of the rakshasa charge were splattered with vanar blood, gristle, pieces of flesh and splinters of bone so that in an instant they resembled butchers after a long day's work.

And yet, those front line vanars were the lucky ones.

A few thousand more of their equally brave comrades, in the lines behind them, provided the soft obstruction that slowed the charge, their shrieking, mangled bodies forcing the mounts as well as the foot soldiers to reluctantly come to a halt. Vanars were squashed under the thundering hoofs, pushed along brutally, and piled upon and over and under—and through—the bodies of their comrades behind them, until the mass of piled bodies that resulted was yards high in places, with several hundred wounded or incapacitated vanars caught in the morass, most doomed to slow, tortuous deaths but several simply stuck and unable to break free of the twisted, writhing knot of piled bodies. A few dozen rakshasas and their mounts broke their legs or slipped and fell and were hard pressed to regain their footing, so gory was the canyon floor, with so much flesh and gristle and blood underfoot. The masth elephants that had been thought to be of such obvious value in this charge proved to be a mistake, perhaps the only one that the rakshasas made in that first clash, for they could not be stopped, and simply barrelled onwards, ramming through the growing pile of bodies and shoving them forward, crushing the press like piled grapes, until they collapsed as well, and were struck by the tuskers following them in turn, which infuriated them further and led to spontaneous fights among the beasts, all piled up together and squealing and screaming horribly, for the assortment of jagged and broken weapons in the press was sufficient to inflict mortal wounds in the maddened elephants. And thus they added their own tormented corpses to the great wall of carnage that rose in the centre of the canyon.

And that was all in the first impact.

The vanars who had crouched on the shoulders of their comrades just before the rakshasa vanguard struck their lines, leaped high into the air, just as they had been instructed. Their timing was perfectly planned and executed, so that at the exact instant when the rakshasa charge smashed into their ranks, they were in the air, suspended several feet, or even yards in some agile cases, above the fray. In the moments it took them to succumb once more to Prithvi ki dor—the invisible thread of gravity that tied every creature on earth to its mother-planet— the rakshasa charge struck the Kiskindha lines, ploughed through them like a threshing blade drawn by rampaging oxen, and passed twenty yards or more beyond them. So when they descended, they descended upon rakshasa helmets, heads, shoulders, chests, backs, or mounts. In a few unfortunate but inevitable cases, some of the leapers came down only to be impaled upon rakshasa spears or horns. But most were shrewd and agile enough to avoid such pitfalls and fell upon the foe, going to work at once as they had been trained.

The rakshasas were thick-skinned, often scaly or armoured, with spiked cladding. Apart from their natural horns and tusks, similar to the various bestial species with which they shared a resemblance and a family tree, they also had sharp-bladed weapons clutched in their fists. But they were designed more for effect, and for attack, not defence. Rakshasas had no natural predators, or enemies, except maybe mortals; their armour as well as their natural defences had evolved to injure, maim and kill their prey or enemy, not to ward off enemies who attacked them, certainly not lithe, limber little vanars who leaped twenty feet into the air, and then landed upon their backs or necks, while the rakshasas were still engaged in a headlong forward charge and in crushing or hacking down other vanars.

So perfectly had the leaping been timed, that it spelled certain death for the vanars who had borne their fellows on their shoulders. But they had known the inevitability of their fate: had they not undertaken this manoeuvre, all of them would have died. This way, the leaping vanars got a fighting chance, and the element of complete surprise. For in all the millennia that the rakshasa races had been battling—and they had been warring ever since the beginning of creation, it was what they did—no enemy had ever sprung such a tactic, with such brilliant timing and execution. This was the very thing that Lakshman, for this tactic was his brainchild, had counted on.

The leaping vanars, or the flying vanars, as they would henceforth always be called, landed on their adversaries, and even as the mounts and hoofs and flying blades and spearpoints of the rakshasas crushed and maimed and slaughtered the vanars on the ground, the flying vanars fell on the enemy with a ferocity that could not be compared to anything else. They bit at the ring of neck that was exposed between helms and breastplates, ripped out unprotected bellies, tore into the soft fleshy portions on either side of the rakshasa spines, where the rakshasa liver and organs of liquid purification were housed, their sharpened talons and teeth working damage in small areas in a fashion calculated to cause irreparable damage. Livers were torn out, throats ripped open, bellies slashed and entrails removed in a blood-spraying flash, eyes gouged and turned to useless lumps of fleshy pulp. Some vanars were given the gift of landing on the mounts themselves, and it was short work to do their deadly damage to the startled kumbha-surs and broken-surs. That was even more effective than killing their riders, for the already crazed, driven-beyond-the-limit beasts barely realised that they had been dealt fatal blows, and rode on mindlessly for several dozen yards, until they shuddered and tumbled head over heels, tossing their rakshasa riders like clay dolls to smash into other rakshasas ahead of them, or into the rocky canyon walls, joining the growing pile of corpses in the enclosed mortuary that the place was fast becoming.

Almost none of the rakshasas or mounts was able to resist even a single flying vanar. Apart from those few unfortunates who landed on open blades or points, the rest of the contingent did their bloody work, then leaped again, landing on new victims farther back in the rakshasa lines—for the sheer momentum of the charge kept the whole vanguard moving, even after it had ploughed into the rising heap of vanar dead—and repeating their killing. By the third or fourth leap, the rakshasa onslaught had slowed sufficiently for the Lankans coming up, mostly on foot by this point, to see the danger and take action. But almost at once, as if aided by the very Prithvi herself, the dust cloud thrown up by the charge as well as the impact obscured the air for yards ahead, blinding the rakshasa hordes. And since they were still expecting to see the enemy ahead of them, and a much shorter enemy at that, barely one-third their size, the last thing they were expecting was for bloody murder to come dropping down out of the skies.

By the time the rakshasas had cottoned on to the stratagem of the flying vanars and begun to roar warnings to their fellows in the lines behind, the Kiskindhans had taken an impressive toll. Nowhere near as many rakshasas as vanars died in that first wave of assaults as vanars, nay. If anything, the vanar casualties in that very first rakshasa charge numbered well over ten thousand, whereas barely a couple of thousand rakshasas were slain. But by this time, the vanars lined up beyond the end of the trough created by the ploughing slowdown of the rakshasa charge had begun leaping over the pile of corpses of their fallen comrades, and these brave Kiskindha warriors entered the fray too. They leaped onto those enraged rakshasas who had escaped their flying fellows, landing upon them two or three at a time. In some cases, a half dozen vanars landed upon a single rakshasa, and the sheer viciousness of their attack almost equalled the brutality of the rakshasas themselves. Some rakshasas, blinded by the swirling dust and blood splattered into their eyes by the collision, saw only nightmarish glimpses of ‘flying’ vanars leaping onto their fellow rakshasas and tearing them open—to their startled minds, deluded into expecting to face only a puny, monkey-like enemy by their overconfident generals, it was as if the vanars had been empowered by some sorcerous means. Not particularly gifted with intelligence, their rakshasa brains were too slow-witted to think of looking up—which was where their attackers appeared from, to rip into their own throats and bodies the next instant. What the vanars lacked compared to their rakshasa foes in size and strength and weaponry and armour, they valiantly made up for by sheer courage, speed and ferocity.

Sugreeva knew and sensed and saw and heard and scented all this without actually needing to pause and look. He himself awakened as if from a long, dreamless stupor to find that he was crouched atop a dead rakshasa and his maimed, howling mount—the foolish creatures the enemy rode seemed to make more noise than a hundred vanars—and wielding a length of hardwood almost as thick as the trunk of a young tree. He could not recall how he had come by the tree trunk—probably it was the pole of a spear and the bladed metal point had broken off somewhere somehow—but to his vanar touch, its rough, unpolished length felt exactly like a young sala trunk that he had once wielded in a battle. He flailed the weapon around, hefting it overhead and swinging it wildly. The bodies of two rakshasas lay with their heads and shoulders smashed and naked white bone exposed through their torn muscles nearby, and it took him a moment to accept that he had slain those two as well as the one on whose body he now stood, as well as at least three more lying farther behind him in the ugly press of bodies dead or dying. The rakshasa charge had finally been shattered and now warriors of both forces milled about in the dense dust fog that covered everyone, turning rakshasa and vanar alike into dust-covered demons roaring and shrieking and swinging and leaping and fighting to the death. A rakshasa with a lupine gait came loping straight at him, its red eyes glowing in the dust like a timberwolf he had once faced in the Nilgiri ranges, then leaped, snarling, in a high arc that would bring its weight down upon him with crushing finality, and he swung the tree trunk with a deftness that surprised even him, catching the oncoming rakshasa at the highest point of its leap, in the soft vulnerable flesh of its throat, cutting off its lupine howl and nearly severing its spine at the neck. The corpse of the beast, head hanging backwards now, open throat-wound gushing arterial blood, collapsed in a heap before him, ploughing through the blood-covered dirt of the canyon floor and raising the dry dust that lay beneath, adding to the opacity of the air. Sugreeva issued a cheeeking shriek of triumph, then turned his attention to a trio of feral catlike rakshasas that crept out of the dust-fog. He kept them at bay for a moment by some deft swinging of the pole, some distant corner of his mind thinking, you will pay dearly for this vigour, Sugreeva, you are too old and weak to fight like this for long, your muscles will not support your defiant will much longer. Then, just as two of them were about to outflank him and the third was crouching to leap from behind him, a blur of vanar fur streaked out of the dust haze and leaped at the cat-rakshasas. Two vanars and the leaping cat-rakshasa met in mid-air, all three tearing and scratching and ripping viciously on impact. Two, a vanar and one of the cat-rakshasas fell like stones to the ground, badly mauled and bleeding to death; the third, a vanar, limped a step or two, then leaped back into the attack against another rakshasa and was lost again in the haze. From the other side, with feral roars of fury, the other two catrakshasas leaped at him. Sugreeva turned his pole, gripped it with both hands and slammed it into the rib-cages of the chests of the enemies, stopping them in mid-leap but also driving himself backwards beneath their considerably greater weight. He was driven back down to his knees, and for a heart-stopping moment, he thought he would be pinned down beneath them, but then he shoved forward with a snarl and was shocked to feel them yielding and falling back. Without thinking about it, he turned the pole and impaled one of the rakshasas on its jagged point, then continued to slam the side of the polehead into the skull of the other one, feeling more than hearing the cranial bone crack with a nauseating impact. What invisible god had granted him the strength to push back two rakshasas, each weighing several times his own weight? 'For Rama!' he shrieked, and fought on.

It went on like this for a while. Killing, attacking, being attacked, fending off, vanars joining him in the fray, him coming to the aid of vanars, making stands against oncoming rakshasas, taking advantage of the few blessed instants of dust-shrouded obscurity to finish off the crippled rakshasas lest they rise again and attack them from behind, all the grisly grind and clatter and grimy glamour of the battlefield.

Somewhere in the midst of all the carnage and the gore and the slaughter, two realisations came to Sugreeva simultaneously. One, that he was stronger and faster than he had ever been before, and had more stamina than he ever knew he possessed; even after what seemed like an hour-watch of brutal, punishing combat, he was still on his feet, still wielding the yards-long spear pole, still slaying rakshasas before they could come within touching or killing distance of him; never before, not even in his younger, more virile years had he ever experienced such a sensation of power and strength and resoluteness. The second realisation was that it was time to move to the next phase of Rama's plan.

He drove the end of the pole into the face of a charging bear-like rakshasa, shattering the beast's jaw, sending slimy yellow tooth fragments flying in all directions, watched the beast fall in a thrashing heap upon the bodies of other rakshasas he had slain. Then, with great reluctance, almost regret, he turned and began issuing the ululating call for retreat. It took several moments before his message penetrated through the fog of warlust that had gripped his Kiskindha warriors. And several moments more before they were able to disengage themselves from the enemy and fall back. Once in effect, the retreat was also difficult, for it was painful to clamber over the veritable hillock of dead or dying creatures, including so many of their own fallen comrades, particularly those that were caught in the piled press of bodies created by the ploughing slowdown of the first charge. But there was nothing to be done for them, and his orders were clear: Stand and hold the first charge, take as many rakshasa lives as possible, then retreat so swiftly the enemy should be bewildered by your disappearance. He barked orders to his vanars, painful orders compelling them to leave the wounded and near-dead and fall back at once, using the vanar tactic known as mist-wraiths, referring to the stealthy attack-and-flee method of Kiskindha vanars, using the cover of the famed redmist of their mountain homelands to best advantage. It pained him to turn his back on the enemy as well, when he could have taken more rakshasa lives and helped alleviate the unequal balance, for he knew in his heart that their losses were nowhere near his, but Rama's orders were Rama's orders, and he fell back, retreated and withdrew, leaving the rakshasas in the canyon milling about in utter confusion, unable to understand where the little monkey beasts had disappeared to all of a sudden. Their valiant work done, the vanars of Kiskindha retreated under cover of the dust cloud to permit the next phase of Rama's plan to be put into effect.

FIVE

They came cautiously, knowing the enemy was here somewhere, smelling the unmistakable scent of vanars in the forest. Mandaradevi had watched as their leaders had ordered them to proceed with care. But the troops had grunted derisively and shrugged off the cautions. What had they to fear from little, naked, unarmed monkeymen? This would be like a pack of tigers on a rabbit hunt, they snarled.

They were right. Except that, this time, they were the rabbits.

The plan called for her to wait until the entire rakshasa horde was inside the confines of the forest before ordering the attack. But the rakshasa general leading this contingent was wiser than most. He ordered a third of the troops to fan out through the woods, sweeping it from the south end up to the north, while the remaining rakshasas waited outside. Those ordered to hold back squatted on their haunches grumpily, peeved at being denied the chance to snack on hot squealing vanar flesh. Mandara-devi eyed them uneasily, trying to decide what to do next. Finally, she came to the conclusion that there was nothing else for it. She would simply have to go ahead as planned, and hope for the best. Too much depended on them coordinating this battle with the others for her to wait much longer. As it was, she was certain that the other vanar contingents would have engaged the enemy by now. Any moment now, Hanuman would appear overhead, expecting to see the battle in the valley over, or in its final phases.

She watched as a pair of lumbering rakshasa brutes passed directly beneath the tree in which she was ensconced. She decided that they would do as well as any, and raised her head, arching her throat to cry out an ululating call that was instantly taken up and answered by hundreds, then thousands, then tens of thousands of vanar throats across the valley—and beyond it as well. The rakshasas below jerked their heads upwards with a start, then howled their fury as well as communicating to their fellows that the enemy had been sighted. One of them began hacking at the tree with his enormous bladed weapon, as if he would chop it down to get to her. She was glad these rakshasas could not climb trees, then she wondered mischevously if that was such a bad thing—perhaps a tree battle would be better than this uneven fight.

She cheekaed, leaping to a lower branch, then still lower, to afford the blundering beasts below a better sight of her. She hung from a branch, using her tail to suspend herself upside down, bringing her within a few yards of the ground. They howled and waved their stubby rakshasa arms—these were some kind of bull breed, with short, thick, menacing horns, stocky upper bodies and massive, overdeveloped lower bodies and haunches that looked powerful enough to kick an elephant to death. As if reading her mind, the stupid beast who had been hacking at the latsyoa's trunk, turned around, dropped his weapon, braced himself with his stubby arms flat on the ground, and released a powerful kick. He misjudged the distance and only landed one rear hoof on the trunk, but the impact was enough to jar her bones. The trunk cracked, protesting loudly. The other rakshasa roared to his companion, who glanced behind, corrected his angle and prepared to deliver another mighty kick, this one aimed to—

She leaped off the tree and onto the next. Just as the rakshasa's kick shattered the latsyoa's trunk, sending splinters flying. Even as the tree began to fall, creaking loudly in protest, she leaped to a third and then a fourth tree. The rakshasa who had been watching her howled to his companion, who grabbed his weapon and shot to his feet. Both trundled after her, bellowing loudly. Other rakshasas were running towards them now, thrashing noisily through the dense undergrowth, roaring to one another. So far so good, but how were the other vanars—

She heard a commotion explode to her right, then another farther away to her left, then the whole forest erupted with the sound of teasing vanars cheekaing and angry rakshasas bellowing as they gave chase. She swung from tree to tree, going as fast as she could without actually leaving her pursuers behind. She was in no danger of being caught, and she didn't want to lose them. The whole point of this tactic was to make them follow. She wished more of the enemy had entered the forest. The plan depended on them all being within the woods, not outside it. But there was nothing to be done about that, so she raced along, and hoped that the commotion she and the other teasers were causing would bring more pursuers. She caught occasional glimpses of the others as their silver jewellery reflected a beam of sunlight, or a flash of white vanar teeth against glossy jet-black fur, and knew that all were doing their job as planned.

But theirs was the easy part.

She heard a sudden surprised grunt from one of the rakshasas chasing her, followed by a disgusting squelching sound; she paused, clinging to the branch of one tree with her tail and a branch of the next with one paw. She hung suspended momentarily, listening and scenting. The undeniable odour of freshly spilled blood filled the air, and was followed by a rakshasa howl of outrage. She grinned and turned to watch as the battle began in earnest.

Kambunara stepped out from behind his tree with a paw outstretched, claws extruded fully. The trundling rakshasa in the fore of the group chasing Mandara-devi was too intent on the pursuit, and on keeping sight of the fleeing vanar, to even notice him until the very last instant. The rakshasa sensed something and lowered his sights just in time to see the brown-furred Himalayan bear, as tall as himself and as wide in girth, appear from behind the trunk of the tree that had concealed him. Kambunara saw the Lankan's foaming mouth open as he tried to bellow a warning to his fellow rakshasas, and twisted his torso with the powerful side-swiping movement that his kind were masters of. His outstretched claws caught the oncoming rakshasa right in his throat, slashing it to raw, ragged ruin, and the warning died before it had begun.

Kambunara followed through with a swipe in the opposite direction, using his left claws this time to finish off the rakshasa. The bull-headed beast collapsed to the leafy ground, heaving and thrashing in his last throes.

He heard a roar of outrage explode and looked up in time to see several more rakshasas approaching at a run. Even as he stepped forward to greet them with the appropriate bear welcome, he saw several other dark-furred shapes step out from behind their trees to deal sudden death blows to racing rakshasas as well. Across the length and breadth of the forest, the sounds and scents of bears felling rakshasas rang out like a brutal symphony. Two of the rakshasas in his path made it past the other bears and one swung an enormous bladed weapon similar to the battle axe he had seen mortals use in their wars. Bears were not limber enough to dodge like vanars, or to simply leap out of the way, so he shot out a paw and grasped the wooden shaft of the weapon in mid-air. The rakshasa grunted, startled, then died with the same startled expression on its mottled mongrel-breed snout as Kambunara twisted its own weapon to drive it home into the rakshasa's midriff. Even before that enemy fell to its knees, its steaming guts pouring out onto the leaf-strewn forest floor, Kambunara swiped backhanded at the second oncoming foe with a snarl of effort. The rakshasa, in the process of raising his own sling-blade weapon, was too slow to dodge the unexpected move and took the full brunt of the blow on his—or her?—face, screaming in outrage as the deadly claws ripped open skin and flesh and destroyed its eyes. It turned, dropping its weapon to clutch at its blinded organs, and, still running, crashed headlong into the trunk of the tree Kambunara had been lurking behind. A sickening crunch suggested that it had cracked its skull on the hardwood trunk, and Kambunara had only to slash again at its lower back, severing the spine in at least three separate places, and it was done.

The forest was ringing with the sounds of bears killing rakshasas, but in only moments, as the pursuing Lankans became aware that they had been lured into a trap by the vanars, the oncoming rakshasas slowed, waited for their companions, and then roared to one another across the forest, organising a more efficient advance and attack. Kambunara had expected that, although he had hoped for more to fall prey to bear claws before they wised up to the ambush. He waited for the rakshasas to regroup and then advance—even as his bears closed their ranks and prepared to meet the next onslaught.

Kambunara had a brief moment to clean his claws on the bark of a tree. A sound alerted him and, glancing up, he saw Mandaradevi herself seated on a lower branch. She looked as matriarchal as ever, her white-streaked fur and her jewellery belying her willingness to risk her own life like any of her soldier vanars.

‘Is that all you could bring us today?’ he asked.

She grinned at his impudence. ‘Only about twenty thousand odd followed me and my teasers into the woods ... ’

He shrugged, showing no sign that the number was either greater or smaller than what he had been expecting. ‘We’ll try to make do. Is that all of them?’

She sighed, losing her grin. ‘They have a smart general. He stationed two-thirds of the horde outside the forest.’

He nodded. They had hoped for the whole horde to come crashing in but had not truly expected that; it would have been too easy. ‘Then we shall have to go to them.’

The sound of bellowing rakshasas caused him to look down again. The rakshasas were advancing now, approaching at a slow, sensible pace as befitted the dim, close confines of forest fighting. He could see at least half a dozen advancing on his position alone.

‘After we deal with this bunch, that is,’ he said.

‘Actually,’ Mandara-devi said from the tree, clambering up to a higher branch as she spoke, ‘I thought I might do something about that. Perhaps see if they’re able to ignore an outright challenge from a vanar. That would make your job much easier, would it not, my rksa friend?’

Kambunara grunted approvingly. ‘You do that, my lady, and I shall personally kiss your furry behind in gratitude.’

She chattered in amusement at his comment. ‘Well, just for your information, that particular part of me is not furry.’ And with a flash of that same anatomical part, she leaped up and away, racing back the way she had come, to the north end of the valley.

Kambunara grinned and turned his attention to his approaching rakshasa visitors. ‘Come on then, you slow-witted, illegitimate spawn of Ravana. Let me show you how we bears gut our fish before we eat them.’

That got him a satisfying roar of outrage in response, and a more reckless charge from the oncoming rakshasas. He growled in reply, his claws slashing and flashing in the bars of morning sunlight that seeped through the close-growing foliage overhead.

Mandara-devi raced back through the trees. At first she passed steadily increasing numbers of rakshasas going the other way, then, as she approached the northern end of the forest where she had begun her tease-run, the numbers dwindled until, reaching the place where she had waited before, she found virtually none of the enemy. Her fears were confirmed when she peered out through the branches of a diarsaqa tree.

Some forty or fifty thousand rakshasas squatted in roughly regular lines on the northern side of the valley. Kumbha lieutenants patrolled the lines, their long, barbed whips keeping the troops in check. The general of the horde stood with his back to her, peering up at the sky to the north, as if seeking out something. She caught a glimpse of sunlight reflecting off some golden or gilded object in the distance, and assumed that was the fabled flying chariot that Ravana was rumoured to travel in. She would have been happier to see Hanuman instead, but he was probably watching over the battle of the Kiskindha vanars, as that had been his first order.

She scented Dvidida an instant before he appeared by her side. Another vanar was with him, almost as burly and well-built as he, but far less attractive. This was Mainda, the other champion lieutenant, older and past his prime, but a formidable figure among the Mandaras nevertheless. He was also notorious for his predilection for honey wine. He gave her the tribe greeting, paw touching skull, even though she had specifically ordered all her vanars to abjure formal greetings during battle. She ignored the gesture, but he did not seem to mind.

Dvidida grinned at her curiously. ‘Does my lady intend something?’

‘If those ugly beasts don’t enter the forest, the whole plan will be for naught,’ she said. ‘We must lure them in somehow before I give the order for the second wave.’

Mainda looked at her, his face twisted from an old paralysing injury that had left the right side of his face unable to respond or move. It gave him a sad, perpetually snarling expression. ‘The bears in the woods are greatly outnumbered. Can they even hold the rakshasas already in there, my lady? Perhaps you should give the second order and see how things turn out.’

She looked at the ageing champion. ‘If I give the second order, then the rest of the bears and all of our Mandaras will come pouring down the valley from all sides.’ She gestured ahead at the rakshasa horde in the valley. ‘With the bulk of the enemy still out in the open and easily able to see the attack coming, what good will that do? The point of getting them into the woods is so they believe we are all hiding in here, while in fact, we mount our main attack from outside, encircling them inside the forest. Then, the bears battle them on the ground while we Mandaras pounce on them from the trees. It is a simple yet brilliant plan devised by Rama and his advisers and it is our job to follow it through.'

Mainda glanced at her craftily—or perhaps it was only his damaged nerves that made him seem crafty. 'True, my lady. But the plan is no longer valid, since the rakshasas failed to react as our lord Rama expected. It may be best for us to go ahead with the attack and leave the decision making to the leaders. General Nila will surely adapt to the changed circumstances.'

She looked at him. A part of her understood what he meant—and felt. Only a little while ago she had thought and felt the same thing: Leave the thinking to the leaders, a soldier's only task was to follow orders. But by that same logic ...

'By that same logic,' she said aloud, 'we are only following the orders we were given. Rama's instructions were clear. All the rakshasas must be lured into the woods, and only then will the second order be given. I intend to fulfil that order now, at any cost. Will you aid me or hang around here arguing?'

Dvidida shot Mainda a quick, stern glance. 'Where you go, we follow, my lady,' said the young champion.

Mainda lowered his brow, in the vanar equivalent of a nod. 'Always.'

She breathed more easily. She had no stomach for wrestling her oldest and most experienced lieutenant into submitting to her orders, not when tens of thousands of lives hung in the balance. 'Good. Then follow my example and do as I do.'

She leaped off the tree, rolled through the kusa grass and began loping across the open grassland, towards the rakshasa horde.

SIX

Hanuman roared with fury as the dust cloud finally began to dissipate in a new gust of oceanic wind that blew from the east. The canyon floor below was heaped with thousands upon thousands of his fallen vanar comrades, crushed beyond recognition into piles of bleeding furry flesh. Where so many brave Kiskindha warriors had stood and faced the first of the Lankan attacks, now only corpses and body parts littered the place. His anger was somewhat alleviated by the sight of some few thousand rakshasa corpses lying intermingled as well, more than he would have expected. It filled him with pride to see how many of the enemy the Kiskindhans had felled, but did not negate his great sorrow. He clenched his fists, his body expanding with anger without his even being aware of it, and vowed that every one of those vanar lives would be paid for in full, even if he had to kill that many rakshasas himself, bare-handed.

He saw King Sugreeva leading the vanars that survived back in the retreat as planned. As the last of them reached the end of the canyon, they turned and cheekaed insolently at the rakshasas behind. King Sugreeva himself, carrying what looked like a spear pole, also turned and added his own taunting cheekas to the shrieks of his warriors.

The rakshasas, milling about in confusion after the abrupt disappearance of their foe, responded to the sound of the taunting vanars with outrage. Pointing their weapons, they roared and chuffed and spewed their fury, then lurched forward clumsily, for their bulk and weight, while a great advantage in a headlong charge, was cumbersome to them when starting from a standstill. As the ones milling about behind came far enough forward into the canyon to see their fallen comrades, they howled and roared, unable to believe that so many of their own could have been felled by these puny, impudent creatures. That incensed them all the more and they began to run in their clumsy, lumbering fashion—although, to be fair, there were some sleeker, more elegantly muscled ones that moved with considerable grace as well, for like vanars or mortals or any other creatures, not all rakshasas were alike. He watched as their run grew effectively into another charge, albeit a much less thundering and swift one than their first, for by now a great many of the mounted rakshasas in the front lines lay dead or maimed.

Hanuman watched with narrowed eyes as the general he had seen before, the one with the diamantine teeth, climbed to the top of the mound of bodies piled in the middle of the canyon, avoiding the squealing maw and tusks of a horribly wounded and trapped masth elephant. The general found his footing with difficulty, and with the advantage of the high ground now, shouted something to his hordes, gesticulating with his bladed weapon in the direction of the retreating vanars, egging them on to give chase and finish the slaughter they had begun so well.

Again Hanuman longed to plunge down and smash those bestial beings into so much bloody pulp, but restrained himself. He settled for snarling viciously, loud enough that the sound carried down and echoed off the canyon walls, resounding. The diamantine-toothed general looked up at once, and peered narrowly at the vanar flying above. He raised his blade in an unmistakably threatening gesture, baring his teeth in a menacing snarl. When Hanuman refused to respond or react, he shook his head in disgust, turned away and resumed ordering his troops in the chase.

Vajradanta was furious at the number of the fallen. The whole point of that thundering charge had been to crush the little monkeys into the dust. How dare they presume to stand before the might of a rakshasa cavalry attack! The piled corpses of vanars gave him cause for satisfaction, although he had expected many more to be lying there lifeless. That last-minute ruse they had sprung on him unexpectedly, leaping on one another's shoulders to fly up into the air and land on their attackers—the military mind in his head admired the sheer audacity and expertly timed execution of that tactic—had cost him the majority of his mounted troops. The few hundred broken-surs and kumbhasurs that had not broken a leg, been caught in the crush of piled corpses or been slain by the leaping vanars, were being caught and mounted again by the survivors of his cavalry unit. But he was shocked to see how few remained. Especially the elephants, who all lay dead, except for a handful that had turned and fled at the mouth of the canyon itself, perhaps sensing the carnage that lay ahead and tearing loose of their ropes, ripping out their own flesh in the process, to run wild across the valley behind. On open ground, these same masth elephants would have caused havoc among any army's massed troops, the casualties they caused cancelling out the threat they posed to one's own troops— for mad elephants could hardly be bothered to distinguish between friends and foes. But here, in this enclosed space, with nowhere to go but straight ahead, they had been befuddled and maddened further by the stench of sudden, violent death and corpses, and their own lumbering weight had been their downfall, crushing them as well as those unfortunate enough to come in their path. Still, at least they had wreaked great damage in their dying. What he could not brook were the losses suffered by his rakshasa ranks—for those were not accidental but wholly caused by the vanars themselves. The little bundles of fur, unarmed and untrained in battle—for who had ever heard of vanars mounting an army?—had proved surprisingly resilient and resourceful antagonists.

Filled with chagrin and astonished that little monkey-like creatures could inflict such damage on heavily armoured, armed, and mounted rakshasas, he determined that in this next charge he would not only break their resolve and spirits, but shatter the backbone of their forces as well. They were already on the run, no doubt horrified by the superior power and strength, not to mention fighting skill, of the Lankans, and all his troops needed to do was run them down and finish them off. There could be no more than another ten thousand or so, and he had twice as many troops still on their feet and fighting mad. He himself had already slain several dozen vanars, the foolish beasts leaping at him from all directions at once, but none quick enough to dodge his flashing blade, and those who came too close, falling prey to his lightning-sharp teeth. His mouth was filled with the taste of vanar blood, and flesh, and fur, and he spat several times to remove it. Now, if he could only get a bite or two of mortalflesh, fresh and bloody, while the heart was still pumping, that would remove this taste. He grinned. Perhaps he would get his wish before the day was through.

'Ra-van-a!' he roared, pointing his blade at the end of the canyon. The foolish vanars still milled about there, making insulting noises and lewd gestures with their mouths—and other parts of their fur-covered anatomy as well—as if such childish behaviour would dissuade his stout rakshasas. He frowned as he saw that even their leader, an ageing vanar who had appropriated a broken spear rod from some fallen rakshasa and wielded it like a monkey waving a tree branch, was joining in the taunting. As he watched with narrowed eyes from his vantage point on top of the body of his fallen kumbha-sur, gazing above the heads of his lumbering rakshasas, he saw one vanar, either the leader or someone close by, turn around and flash his brightly coloured rear end at the oncoming enemy. In quick succession, several dozen other vanars did the exact same thing, and for a moment, gaily coloured vanar bottoms flashed insultingly at the charging rakshasas, drawing new roars of outrage and fury from the racing Lankans.

Vajradanta frowned. That was no mere fright-response. He could see now that despite the approaching rakshasas being no more than a few dozen yards from their position, the vanars were still holding fast, neither continuing their retreat, nor gibbering nor leaping away in terror. If anything, they were snarling and leering with a savage humour that he knew well from his years on the battlefield. These were warriors in full spate, taunting their enemy to come on fast and furious ... encouraging them to race into ...

‘A trap!’ he shouted. ‘It’s a trap! Desist! Fall back!’ He repeated the words in several rakshasa dialects, and his lieutenants passed the order on as well.

But the words were barely heeded by the infuriated rakshasas now a good two hundred yards ahead of him at the narrowest point of the canyon, too far away and out of earshot due to the peculiar acoustics of the place. The rakshasas charged ahead towards the leering, mocking, taunting vanars who awaited them below an overhang that arched over the narrow exit of the canyon. As Vajradanta raised his head and waved his weapon to draw the attention of his troops, bellowing at the top of his voice, he saw movement atop that overhang. Glancing up, he saw the reason for the vanar retreat, for the taunting, and for the apparently foolish, suicidal, doomed stand in this particular spot of all places. His shouts died away, cut off in mid-command, as his military mind instantly grasped the enemy’s scheme. A trap it was indeed, neatly sprung, and seeded with the lives of more enemy vanars than he would have thought possible for any commander to sacrifice. Yet the very scale of that bloody sacrifice had been the reason why he had failed to see the trap until it was too late.

He raised his head, scouring the top of the canyon walls to left and right, and suddenly, with a sinking heart, Vajradanta knew that he had sadly, tragically, dangerously underestimated the enemy numbers, by a factor of five or ten, perhaps more.

Sugreeva felt a surge of joy akin to nothing he had felt before as he raised his eyes and saw the top of the canyon bristling with countless scampering shapes. The canyon walls on the eastern side were lined with scores of silhouetted vanars climbing up from the far sides where they had lain hidden on Rama's orders in the dense shrubbery. As each wave climbed into view, it was caught by the garish light of the morning sun's rays, and then clambered down lithely into the canyon, he was filled with pride and a sense of honour. It was worth it now to have seen so many of his fine Kiskindha vanars sacrificed in that terrible first charge of the Lankans. Worth it to see the trap in which the rest of the Lankan vanguard was now caught, encaged on two sides by the canyon, and on this front by his Kiskindha vanars, and left with only one route open—back to Lanka. His knowledge of war strategy told him that if the rakshasas were wise, they would elect to retreat at once, while they still could; and his knowledge of rakshasas, gained in large part from Rama himself, told him that they would rather die than retreat.

He could see the general with the flashing teeth, standing in the centre of the canyon atop a veritable hillock of corpses, staring up at the waves upon waves of vanars coming down the steep slopes of the canyon sides, raising new clouds of dust as they slid, leaped, rolled down the three hundred yards towards their quarry. Already, some fifty or sixty thousand vanars were in view, with more arriving every instant in endless profusion, streaming over the tops of the canyon sides and carpeting the dusty sand-coloured dust of the terrain until the canyon itself seemed to grow dark on account of the sheer quantity of dark fur coating its walls. Rama and Lakshman had debated how many of the vanars to deploy in this particular action and the decision had been unanimous: enough to not only crush the Lankans, but to wipe them out.

'To the last beast,' Lakshman had said fiercely.

‘Or till they retreat,’ Rama had added.

Sugreeva bared his own teeth now at the rakshasa general, in mock imitation of his toothy grin. But the rakshasa commander’s attention was still turned upwards, staring in mute horror at the enemy pouring down towards his position. Already, the charging rakshasas had almost reached the spot where Sugreeva and his warriors had halted to lure them on with jeers and taunts and that classic vanar gesture, bottom-flashing. Now, as the sound and smell and sight of the new threat penetrated their thick rakshasa skulls, they slowed their charge, coming to a lumbering, puzzled halt. They began raising their snouts and muzzles and horns and tusks and gazing in all directions, scenting the change in the atmosphere before they saw or heard anything amiss. Even Sugreeva could scent the massive increase in vanar odour, for the wind was blowing down from the east. At first, the stunned rakshasas seemed unable to comprehend what was happening—or more likely, were unable to believe the sheer numbers of the enemy pouring down towards them. Then, one by one, they began grunting, squealing, howling, roaring and raising their rakshasa voices in outrage and protest. There was nothing a rakshasa hated more than to be foxed, for their advantage lay in brute strength, not wits.

The ones closest to Sugreeva, barely a few dozen yards away, stared up directly at the overhang beneath which he stood, the exact position prescribed for him by Lakshman. He glanced up as well. The overhang, barely three yards in thickness and curved across this narrow part of the canyon from side to side like an arch designed by a builder in a hurry. It was thick with vanars, crowding it, hanging from it, tails coiled around the narrow fingers of protruding rock that stuck out at all angles, a massed group of several hundred of his kind staring down with glinting, hungry eyes, claws and teeth flashing angrily at the sight of so many of their fellows lying dead on the canyon floor. They issued a sound not unlike a clutch of snakes hissing angrily, the sound that vanars made when gathered in great numbers and confronted with a natural predatory enemy.

As more and more waves continued to roll down the sides of the canyon, the walls grew thick with gathered vanars, all issuing the same deathly sound. Sugreeva heard his own vanars echo them as well, until the canyon was filled with the unearthly sound. He saw rakshasas gaze up in bewilderment, and guessed that the Lankans had never seen such a sight nor heard such a sound before, and knew that this too would become part of rakshasa lore and vanar legend for ever more. The hissing built up to a crescendo, then faded away slowly. In the utter silence that followed, he heard a wounded vanar somewhere in the awful pile in the middle of the canyon cry out Hanuman's name, then Rama's, then fall silent.

Sugreeva drew himself up as tall as possible, preparing to fall upon the prey. For this time, it was the vanar who was the predator, making up in sheer weight of numbers and an ingeniously chosen geographical position what he lacked in strength and size and weaponry.

He raised his wooden pole, which he preferred to think of as his tree now. The eyes of nearly a lakh of vanar warriors turned to look at him, waiting for his command. And still the numbers continued to swell as more waves continued to roll down the canyon sides.

With a sharp ferociousness, he stabbed the pole in the direction of the surrounded Lankan army. 'For Rama!' he shrieked.

This time, the response was loud enough to fill the entire canyon, echoing like booming thunder.

'FOR RAMA!'

Like dark honey wine freshly brewed from the choicest grapes of the Madhuvan gardens, the vanar forces poured down the walls of the canyon. As they reached the end of the slope, they paused to brace themselves briefly against the knobbly edge of rock, then using it to give themselves greater momentum, they leaped, hurling themselves with frenzied ferocious energy at their foes. The air was so thick with flying, leaping vanars that for a moment, Sugreeva's view of the sky and the sun, just emerging over the eastern wall of the canyon, was almost completely obscured. Denser than the dust cloud which had obscured them all during the first battle, the vanar cloud filled the air for long moments. Then, as the first vanars landed on their enemies, and on the canyon floor, the sound of slaughter began anew.

For the first time since the onset of the battle, Hanuman opened his mouth and roared with delight. He watched as the torrent of vanars poured down relentlessly upon the surrounded and outnumbered rakshasas trapped in the canyon. He saw a female, bearing two young ones—for many rakshasis carried their young into battle just as a lioness would take her young on a hunt, to train them in the art of killing—screech with outrage and fling her young up in the air. No helpless babes, the two young Lankans met their vanar foe in mid-air and gnashed and bit and tore with great fury. Their mother grappled a half-dozen vanars at once, ripping one apart into two bloody pieces, crushing another's head, and almost decapitating yet another, while jabbing and clawing and kicking wildly to keep the others at bay. But more and more vanars kept leaping upon her, and upon her young, and in moments, the three of them were so overwhelmed that only swatches of their bloodied bodies were visible. When they finally succumbed, over two dozen vanars swarmed over the three of them, ululating in triumph. He did not permit himself to feel any remorse for even the young rakshasas: if they were old enough to take lives, they were old enough to die. Such was the harsh reality of war. Still, he could not help wishing the mother rakshasi had left her younguns at home.

Other fights were much less ambiguous. Great, hulking rakshasas with tusked mouths and horned heads or grotesquely malformed orifices went down fighting like mad elephants in a mash, taking half a dozen or more vanar lives apiece before they succumbed. Others fought on bitterly, remaining on their feet, or hind legs, or nether limbs and tail, blood streaming from dozens of terrible wounds—for vanars did not just bite or claw, they tore out flesh and ripped out pieces of organs—battling on in the face of impossible odds, refusing to surrender. These courageous rakshasas—and he admired their courage without hesitation, for a true warrior always respected a brave enemy—were treated with different tactics by the vanars.

In one instance, he saw at least two dozen vanars surround one adamant bull-headed rakshasa in a ragged circle, taunting and mocking it, while the ones at its rear bit and slashed, leaping back before the slow, wounded Lankan could turn around and hack at it with its enormous battle blade. The rakshasa turned and swung, turned and swung, until it was dizzy-headed and in agonising pain from countless wounds and nips and bites, and the instant it showed the slightest weakness, vanars leaped upon its back, slashing and tearing it open like a sack of grain, clinging to its belly and lower limbs with claws and teeth working viciously, spilling its innards and organs until, by the time the bull-rakshasa fell, bellowing in agony and disbelief, it was little more than a butcher's pile of body parts. It was this same tactic that vanars used to fight and kill natural predators like lions or tigers or leopards in their natural habitats and it worked just as well on solitary rakshasas, isolated from their comrades.

The wiser of the Lankans, perhaps aware of this fact, banded together, and fought-back-to-back and shoulder-to-shoulder. But the vanars were wiser and had more warriors to spare and speed to offer. They penned these teams of rakshasas until they were too close to swing out wildly without injuring one another, which a couple did do from time to time, drawing furious protests and retaliatory blows from their own stricken comrades, for in the heat of battle, rakshasas were as wont to strike out at one another as at an enemy. And then, when they were virtually huddled together, jostling each other and on the verge of desperation, the vanars darted in underfoot, slipping easily beneath and between the rakshasa's lower limbs to strike telling blows. The vanars who did this were mostly killed in the press or chopped down, or simply crushed between massive thighs, or beneath pounding hoofs and reptilian tails, but the instant a rakshasa turned its attention downward to kill the intruding vanar, the other vanars waiting and watching took that opportunity to leap upon it and tear into it savagely.

The battle raged on for another half-watch, and Hanuman's anger slowly began to ebb as he watched the pride and glory of Ravana's vanguard systematically decimated, then quartered, then halved, whittled down in a thousand smaller fights and sub-fights, until the few thousand rakshasas left standing, or lurching really, could barely keep their wits about them, let alone offer real resistance. The vanars were gibbering and chattering by now, as vanars do when gathered in huge numbers and confident of superiority over a larger, greater predator. The sound of their victorious cheering and taunting rose into the air to reach Hanuman, and he laughed, filling the sky with his booming glee. As more rakshasas continued to fall, he saw a few sorry Lankans nearest to their own side of the canyon, lose heart and attempt to race for their lines. With that, the stubborn pride that had cost the rakshasas so dearly finally broke and the battle turned, as all battles do eventually.

In moments, a handful of rakshasas—no more than one-fourth of the horde that had ridden and raced into the canyon not long before, so proud and arrogant and confident of victory—were stumbling and running back towards their capital city, crying tears of rage and frustration as they went. Hanuman watched as Sugreeva noted the Lankan retreat and called a halt to the vanars seeking to pursue and kill the fleeing enemy. The vanars shrieked and screeched and showed their colourful bottoms to the retreating rakshasas, then danced cartwheels and somersaults and held hands and jigged.

Sugreeva climbed to the top of the piled dead, reaching the very spot where the rakshasa general with the flashing teeth had stood not long before. Standing atop that heap of his own beloved dead as well as enemy corpses that now outnumbered their own by a factor of two or more, he paused and stood proudly, scanning the great army of vanars that thronged the canyon, dancing and calling out with unbridled delight.

He raised the pole that had served him so well in the battle. And the vanars ceased their dancing and antics and looked up at him reverentially. No longer Sugreeva the Exiled One, or Sugreeva the Lost, but Sugreeva the Victor of Lanka, commander of the soon-to-be legendary flying vanars who had confronted a horde of the greatest fighting rakshasa warriors in all existence and beaten them into bloody pulp.

‘Jai Shri Rama,’ he called. Praised be Rama.

The response was deafening, audible even to Hanuman floating three hundred yards above, amplified by the canyon walls to resound for miles around, heard even by the fleeing rakshasa survivors, if not by Rama himself. ‘JAI SHRI RAMA!’

Hanuman smiled. ‘Jai Shri Rama,’ he said softly, then flew north to carry word of the victory to Rama himself. He would check on the progress of other battles en route.

SEVEN

Hanuman arrived at the valley where the Mandaras and the bears were to confront the enemy just as Mandara-devi emerged from the darkling shade of the forest. He slowed to a halt, staying well above the line of sight of those on the ground below, and watched as the tribe-goddess of the silver-miners loped towards what seemed to be a sizeable army of rakshasas. Following her closely were two black-pelted Mandaras that he recognised instantly as the lieutenants and champions Mainda and Dvividā.

He frowned as he watched the three vanars run towards the rakshasas. The battle plan called for Mandara-devi and her vanars to tease and lure the enemy into the forest where Kambunara's bears would keep them busy, while General Nila and his troops, along with the rest of the bear contingent, rode down into the valley from all sides, encircling and trapping the rakshasas in the woods in much the same way that the Kiskindha vanars had fallen upon the rakshasas in the canyon. Glancing northwards, he could see and scent fighting in that part of the wooded valley. Using his preternaturally enhanced senses, he could make out bears fighting rakshasas, the bears badly outnumbered but fighting with their customary laconic brutality. At once he grasped the situation. The rakshasas had proved cleverer than expected, leaving the bulk of their force outside the woods, and now Mandara-devi was attempting to finish her given task of bringing them into the forest so that the rest of the battle could be played out as planned.

But the plan had not required that she personally endanger her own pelt by going out alone to face forty thousand rakshasas! Again he felt chagrin and frustration at being able to do nothing but watch. He did not know how much longer he would be able to keep this up. He seethed silently, waiting to see how Mandaradevi and her two champions fared.

Mandara-devi knew that what she was doing was foolish, even suicidal. But there was no alternative. There was not time enough to think up another plan, and she was no thinker or planner anyway. This was all she could come up with given the circumstances and limited time and resources. Perhaps she could have sent Mainda and Dvividā out instead of going herself, but she would sooner throw off her jewellery and disdain her calling as tribe-goddess than do such a thing.

The sunlight was warm and pleasing on the back of her pelt. She wished she could spend a little time, rolling in this high grass, sunning herself. How could a land as beautiful as Lanka harbour such demonic species? But then, that was what this war was about, in a sense. After Rama won, Lanka would no longer be a lair of rakshasas. It would be a land of peace and freedom, where even those rakshasas who survived would live in harmony with other neighbouring nations. Or so it was to be hoped.

She emerged from the shelter of the high grass all too quickly, and into the scrubby area just before the rise of the ghats. At some point, a rivulet or stream had run through this part of the valley and had dried up, leaving behind a dirt bed, like one of the raj-margs that mortals built to carry their carts and horse-mounted armies across their kingdoms back home. Nothing much grew here, except some weeds and wild flowers. She stopped upon this dry patch, within sight of the horde.

A chorus of howls and growls and roars rose from the rakshasa troops. Several hundreds stood up and hefted their weapons, their ugly orifices and snouts and jaws slobbering disgustingly as they called out resoundingly. Their general was less impulsive and much shrewder. He turned and eyed her with interest, noting Mainda and Dvidida at each of her shoulders, flanking her. He issued a terse command to a kumbha lieutenant who immediately began barking hoarse commands to the other kumbhas. Whips lashed out, containing the agitated troops even as they sought to surge forward and attack the insolent vanars who dared approach them so boldly.

She sighed inwardly. It had been too much to hope that they would all simply roar with outrage and come running at her, so she could lead them on another merry chase through the woods as she had the first bunch. This general would take some amount of finessing.

She called out to him now. ‘Rakshasa! Will you not fight us? Are you too cowardly to come and face the vanar sena of Lord Rama Chandra of Ayodhya? It would seem that his very name strikes fear into your craven rakshasa hearts, does it not?’

Howls of protest rose from across the massed ranks. For a moment, even she was awed by the sheer brute muscle power collected on the slopes.

Even though her Mandaras and the bear contingent outnumbered this horde, she wondered if they could truly match them in strength and fighting power. She pushed away that errant thought, keeping her energy concentrated on the task at hand.

The general smiled at her, his bullish face beaming with jagged yellow teeth. ‘Fear? Your leader’s name brings nothing but contempt to my warriors. See even now how he sends a female vanar to do his parleying for him! He is the coward! Too craven to come himself to beg for peace and mercy.’

This time the horde roared with delight, while she sensed Dvidida step forward beside her, his muscles rippling with anger. ‘Back,’ she commanded in a low tone. ‘Let me handle this.’

He did as she ordered but she could sense his fury at having to listen to Rama being insulted thus. She shared his anger and let her own show in her reply. ‘My lord Rama asks for no mercy or parley. He is wise enough to trust his generals and lieutenants to make his battlefield decisions for themselves. I am Mandaradevi, guardian goddess of the Mandara vanars. I speak for myself and myself alone. Does your vile leader Ravana permit you such latitude and independent volition?’

The rakshasa general scowled. ‘Lanka-naresh Ravana is the supreme commander of all the worlds. None can rival his acumen in war. If he wills it, a war is already won. Such as this one. You call yourself a guardian? Then go, take your vanars home while you still can. Or my warriors will use your army’s bones to pick their teeth.’

She feigned a snicker. ‘You wish. But we shall not let you off that easily. First, I challenge your greatest champion to single, mortal combat.’

The general of the horde stared at her for a moment, silent, nonplussed.

Beside her, she heard a shocked intake of breath from both her lieutenants. Even the laconic Mainda seemed taken aback. ‘My lady,’ his voice murmured in her left ear. ‘Are you sure you know what you are doing?’

‘We shall find out soon enough, Mainda,’ she said quietly.

Aloud she challenged again: ‘Why are you silent, rakshasa? Are you afraid that I will defeat even your greatest champion and humiliate you before your own horde?’

The volume of the roar of protest that met this remark made even the general of the horde scowl. He looked around, issued a terse instruction to the two kumbha lieutenants nearest to him, and then came forward. A gruff cheer rose from the rakshasa ranks. Several slammed their bladed weapons against their helmets or armour to show their approval for their leader’s move.

Mandara-devi slowly released the pent-up breath she had been holding back. For a moment, she had feared that the rakshasa general might send someone else to fight her. But she knew from Rama’s briefings that rakshasas accepted only the strongest and fiercest fighter as their overlord. This general would have proved himself beyond dispute several times before, making him the horde’s acknowledged champion. She had counted on that fact, and on his ego preventing him from applying his leaderly wisdom in this one instance. To have denied her satisfaction—a solitary, ageing, female vanar—would have been humiliating before his horde. He had no choice but to accept her challenge, no matter how much he resented it or distrusted her motives for demanding this fight. She saw it in his eyes, coldly intelligent and calculating, unlike the animalistic eyes of most rakshasas. Yes, this Lankan knew something of what she intended, and that knowledge only served to make him more dangerous, not less. For it meant that apart from being the horde’s fiercest fighter, he was also the most intelligent.

Starting to remove his helmet, he said coldly, ‘Vanar, you should know that I would normally not fight a female or an aged one. But this being war, and your kind being the aggressor who invade our noble land, I see no loss of honour in accepting your challenge. It shall cause me no regret to tear your feeble body apart limb by limb and throw the remains to my horde to feed on afterwards.’ He affected a thin smile, difficult for his features which were like that of a buffalo and it only made him look leering. ‘Or perhaps I shall throw you to them before, to feed on you while you yet live. Perhaps if you are yet of breeding age, you shall survive to bear rakshasa offspring in a Lankan dungeon.’

She snarled softly to either side, admonishing Mainda and Dvivida, who were undoubtedly livid at this insult, and curled her lip in a sneer of her own. A single glance to each of them made it clear that she would not brook their interfering in the bout to follow, no matter what transpired. Only when they looked down, acknowledging her command, did she turn her eyes back to the enemy.

She looked at the rakshasa, who was now standing only a few yards away upon the dry river bed, flexing his powerful muscles. ‘After I finish with you, rakshasa, there will not be enough of you to breed with even a scuttling insect. And the same goes for your horde, which my lord Rama will squash like a cluster of bugs underfoot.’ A cacophony of roars broke out across the slope: there were few things rakshasas hated more than bugs, or being compared to them. They had hated the dreaded pisacas, a now-extinct race of asuras who had been wiped out during the Lankan civil war fourteen years ago, largely by the rakshasas themselves.

She drew herself up and let loose with a vanar roar. ‘Now stop your idle chatter and come die at the hands of a vanar old enough to be your mother’s mother!’

And without further ado she charged at the rakshasa general.

EIGHT

Hanuman watched in amazement as Mandara-devi charged at the rakshasa general. She wasted no time with the circling and feinting that usually preceded bouts of single combat, nor did she posture and prance around as was the custom. A glance at the northern end of the valley showed him the reason for her haste: the bear company was slowly crumbling under the sheer weight of numbers of the rakshasas in the forest. And on the high slopes bordering the valley on all sides he glimpsed tiny clues—invisible to anyone on the ground below, vanar or rakshasa—that told him that the concealed vanar and bear regiments were growing restless, wondering why their order to attack had not yet come. If she did not act quickly, it would be too late, for like a thunderbolt unleashed, an army once it began to charge could not be called back.

Again he wished he could simply dive down, like a falcon falling on a snake, and pluck the rakshasa up, crushing him like an egg. Or better yet, expand himself and land with all his might upon the entire rakshasa horde itself, crushing them all like a nest of vile cobras. But as before, Rama's orders compelled him to wait and watch.

Mandara-devi sprang at the rakshasa's face, all four paws extended and teeth bared in as vicious a snarl as she could summon. It was not hard. She had resented the rakshasa accusing her of invading his land, and calling Rama a coward and a craven. As she flew at him, completely confounding any expectation he might have had that she would circle and feint for several moments before locking blows, the element of surprise worked brilliantly in her favour. The rakshasa instinctively covered his face and ducked his head, leaving his broad, hunched back momentarily exposed. She landed precisely as planned, upon that slab of solid muscle that filled the area between his shoulders and bulged in hard lumps and knobs. At once she tore into the back of his neck with her teeth, ripping so hard into the leathery flesh of his buffalo-like hide that she could feel a tooth crack and break off as it snagged on his collarbone. He bucked exactly as a bull would, and she half leaped and was half thrown off, landing on her hind feet but at an angle that twisted a muscle painfully. She ignored the pain and sprinted forward before he could take her measure, spitting out the mouthful of his fetid flesh and blood, spitting out her split tooth as well.

He roared, furious at the pain as well as the humiliation of losing first blood to her. But even in his anger, he was shrewd enough to glean her intention and dropped at once to his front paws, kicking back with his powerful haunches and hind legs in a startling display of reflexes. His hind feet were sheathed in ingeniously designed armoured shoes that expanded their size and added jagged metallic edges and barbs to the kick.

She had intended to sprint around him and then launch herself once again, but his reaction was so quick, his judgement so true, that one of the flailing warboots struck her a glancing blow. It was only a nick really, but the barbed edge was deadly sharp and rusty as iron left on a seashore, and it tore a chunk of flesh from her sensitive behind. She faltered, fell, rolled, and then regained her feet.

To find him turned around, anticipating her, and ready to lash out. He released a second kick, this one with all his strength behind it, a mighty bull-kick even greater than the one the other bull-rakshasa had launched back in the woods. If that had been sufficient to fell a latsyoa tree, then this kick was certainly enough to fell a vanar.

She flipped herself backwards, somersaulting over and over, and over again. The lethal edge of his warboot passed over her head, close enough for her to feel the wind of its passing. She continued to somersault, the momentum too great to halt at once. The disadvantage of such a move was that it took her away from her combatant, whereas a vanar's advantage lay in leaping on one's opponent and getting close enough to bite and scratch and tear. When she landed on her feet, he was already up on his hind legs again and charging at her. She barely had time to collect her wits and did the only thing she could do: she leaped as high as she could manage.

He was anticipating that as well.

Instead of charging head down at her and blundering past, leaving his flank open for her to slash and tear again, he leaped too. His bulk and weight made it impossible for him to spring up as high as she, but his powerful hind legs and forward momentum gave him enough push to reach her lower limbs. He slashed out viciously with a gloved arm bristling with shiny, metal blade extensions to his own claws, and with a sensation like an umbilical cord being severed, she felt her tail, the pride of any vanar, cut in two, close to her rear. Another blade slashed her upper thigh, opening a wound that spurted blood. A third caught the edge of her fur on her back and tugged it hard enough to rip a patch of her pelt right off, taking skin and flesh with it as well.

Both vanar and rakshasa fell to the ground—the vanar bleeding and wounded in three separate places and having lost a part of her anatomy as essential to maintaining a balance as a foot was to any biped. The rakshasa, on the other hand, had only been wounded the once, though his wound was still bleeding profusely and, from the angle at which he held his head, hurting badly as well.

She stumbled, trying to stay upright, and fought back the impulse to simply roll over and clutch at her lost organ, for to a vanar, even losing an arm was preferable to losing its tail. She thought absurdly that her grandchildren would no longer be able to play with that slender velvety tail now, or tug on it mischievously or entwine their own little furry tails with it while sleeping blissfully in her lap.

The thought made her grin savagely, blinking back tears of pain and determination.

Out of the corner of her field of vision, she saw Mainda and Dvivida, seething and barely able to restrain themselves. She snarled briefly in their direction, reminding them of her order not to interfere. Then she looked again at her opponent and showed him her wide-open, blood-smeared mouth, for the hole left by the lost tooth was oozing blood and pain as well. She feigned a careless laugh, ignoring the agony and shame of her severed tail.

‘Are you ready to yield yet, rakshasa?’ she demanded.

He stared at her with cold curiosity. ‘Yield? You are brave and foolish, vanar leader. You should have stayed in the forest and died along with the rest of your monkey companions.’

She laughed. The sound seemed to startle him. ‘Actually,’ she said, pausing to spit out a mouthful of blood and a tooth fragment, ‘that’s what I had in mind for you.’

With a yell like a monsoon cyclone wind, she launched herself at him again.

Hanuman stared in disbelief and awe as Mandara-devi threw herself yet again at the rakshasa general. This time, she barrelled into him at ground level, the complete opposite of what he had been expecting. Prepared to meet a vanar’s leap, he was met instead by a creature one-third his height scurrying between his legs. He corrected himself and bent down astonishingly fast for a creature of his size and bulk, but she was faster, and his blade-tipped paws grasped only a snatch of her fur which ripped away in his clutch. Mandara-devi, racing between the rakshasa’s legs, slashed upwards with both paws, talons drawn and held at an angle designed to cause maximum harm. She cut into the general's most tender organs with ferocious strength, using the one advantage of a vanar to its utmost, then, as he bent over, partly to attempt to grab her, and partly to reach for his ruined organs, she caught hold of the back of his armour and pulled herself onto his back, spreading her limbs and clinging on with all her might.

The rakshasa howled with an anguish that was echoed by his entire horde. It was a cry of such typically masculine disbelief and agony that even Hanuman shuddered. For all his earlier bluster—for their words had been heard clearly by the flying vanar—it seemed the general would not be begetting any more offspring, whether on vanars or any other species. Hanuman admired Mandara-devi's audacity and ruthlessness.

Clinging to the enraged, agonised rakshasa's back, Mandaradevi felt a pulse of triumph. She had injured him deeply, if not mortally. He would not recover from that injury, for she had not only ruined his organs of procreation, she had effectively emasculated him. That was one rakshasa who would never boast of raping vanars. As the pain-maddened rakshasa swung round and about, attempting to dislodge her, she used one claw to slash into the tough hide of his back, seeking out his spine. He howled again, fathoming her intent, and threw himself upon his back.

The impact of a hefty rakshasa weighing some three hundred kilos land upon her with all his force shattered every major bone in Mandara-devi's body and crushed several of her organs as well. Blacking out for a moment she barely knew when she released her hold on her opponent. She lay on her back on the gravelly ground, as the rakshasa general rose again and took a brief moment to bend over and peer down at his own severed and damaged organs, whimpering once in shock.

Lying there, the sun felt warm and comforting upon her face and body. She had no sensation from the waist down, which was a good thing, for she was certain that her legs were horribly crushed and she would never walk again, not with all the healing in the world. She enjoyed that brief moment of respite, the sun a luxury to one who had spent almost her entire life in the silver mines of her land, taught from birth to both fear and respect that blazing orb that rode the skies by day and was swallowed by the land and the oceans by night. Rama had said there was no truth in the myth that exposure to the sun would kill her or her Mandaras, and she believed him, but now it hardly mattered. Henceforth, Mandeha legend would forever record that she had exposed herself to the sun and had died that very day. For she knew that this was to be the day of her death.

As the rakshasa general roared again, unable to believe how irrevocably she had damaged him, she sensed Mainda and Dvividā bounding towards her. They knew she was mortally injured and barely able to lift a paw, let alone defend herself, but she croaked out an admonishment to them. ‘No!’ she said as sternly as she could manage, spitting up blood and fluids, for her ribcage was a tangled thicket of splintered bones and mashed lungs. ‘Remember why ... Finish it. For Rama.’

Hanuman watched with unspeakable sorrow as Mandara-devi used her rapidly ebbing strength not to curse her fate or beg for help, but to order her lieutenants to fulfil Rama’s orders. After all, that was why she had sacrificed her life so bravely this morning, to ensure that Rama’s orders were carried out to the letter. He watched as the two burly vanars chattered with dismay at one another, while the rakshasa general regained his senses and stumbled back to where his opponent lay dying, grimacing and grunting at the agony of his ruined manhood. Then the bull-rakshasa turned, and aimed a kick with his hind legs directly at his fallen opponent. From the anger on his bullish features, it could be seen that he intended to finish her off with this kick. Hanuman almost wished he could avert his eyes, but still he watched as the shockingly brief and sudden combat reached its finale: for even they who only watched served Rama.

Mandara-devi waited until the rakshasa had turned his back upon her completely and was engrossed in lining himself up for the death-dealing kick. She had known he would use his hind legs to strike at her, for as a bull-rakshasa cross-breed, that was what came most naturally to him. He had no reason to fear her; she was shattered and broken and lying in her own fetid fluids and solids and with blood oozing out from a dozen different places and every orifice as well.

What he did not know was that both her upper limbs were still intact for the brunt of his weight had landed on her torso and lower limbs.

When the jagged, warbooted hoof flew towards her, she used the last of her strength, pure will really, to grasp it and swing herself up. Her arms, still functional, served to yank her up his leg, dragging the rest of her body behind her, and all the way to his exposed throat. It took an extraordinary amount of skill and strength, but she had nothing to lose now, and she accomplished it despite the screaming agony of her ruined body. And then she was at his neck, clinging on like a leech in water.

With one ferocious movement, she tore out his throat, ripping open the major blood vessels. His life blood splashed out in a torrent, splattering and blinding her. Her last glimpse was of his stunned face, unable to believe the death she had brought him to; she, a mere vanar, and a female at that.

Then she fell back and the ground claimed her. She had a moment of perfect bliss, lying in the sunlight, recalling the faces of her family, her children, their children, all those she loved and had lived for and fought for, and died for now, today, in this nameless valley in a foreign land. The sunlight felt wonderful on her upturned face, and her lips curled in a tranquil smile.

Hanuman shut his eyes briefly as Mandara-devi died, a smile upon her blood-spattered face. Even with his eyes closed, he could hear the death throes of the rakshasa general, could hear the shock and disbelief in the Lankan's voice as he bled out the last of his life.

When he opened his eyes again, the two lieutenants, Mainda and Dvividha, were taunting the rakshasa horde on the hillside. The assembled troops, shocked at the death of their leader, had fallen silent in the last few moments of the fight. The combat itself had lasted barely a twitch of the sun's passing, so sudden, brutal and ferocious had Mandara-devi's attack been. Now, as the reality of their general's loss crept into their dense skulls, the rakshasas finally succumbed to the frustration and battle lust that had been consuming them all this while. With their general no longer there to control them, they rose as one and stormed down the hillside, roaring and waving their weapons, their order to remain at bay forgotten with the death of their leader.

With whoops of exultation, Mainda and Dvividā raced before them, leading them across the grassy outskirts, then into the forest itself. Their kumbha lieutenants snapped their lashes and attempted unsuccessfully to stem their advance as the rakshasa horde streamed after the vanars into the forest.

Moments after the rakshasas vanished into the dim, shaded forest, the ululating call for the next phase carried across the valley. And not long after, Hanuman watched as the bulk of the bear and vanar contingents appeared on the rim of the valley on all sides, then poured down into the forest, to finish the battle whose success Mandara-devi had given her own life to ensure.

NINE

Rama and Lakshman watched from a rocky outcrop on the slope of Mount Trikuta. The highest peak on the northern side of the island-kingdom, it was dwarfed by the taller Mount Suvēla, only a few miles to the north, but Suvēla's view was blocked by the hilly ranges that undulated like ocean waves, whereas the gradual incline of Trikuta's northern face led directly down to the edge of the Palisade cliffs—bordered now by the fortress wall raised by Ravana's sorcery—affording them a clear view of the entire lie of the land on this northern tip.

They had stationed themselves here these past hour-watches, waiting patiently for the enemy to make the first move. In that time, Surya-deva had ridden his gleaming chariot up to a sharply diagonal angle in the eastern sky, and the sunlight now shone down on them, its touch warm and bracing. The cool sea breeze that continued to blow sporadically, tinged with the salty odour of the ocean, did not allow them to break out in perspiration. Rama shifted his quiver a little, then glanced at Lakshman.

‘Should we?’ Lakshman asked.

‘No,’ Rama replied. ‘We wait.’

Lakshman shrugged. They had had this conversation twice already since stationing themselves here. Lakshman had favoured going to the rampart walls and provoking the rakshasas that were visible there, milling about in the shade of the high fortification. If the plan was for the rakshasas to attempt to attack their forces from behind, pressing them back against the armies streaming out of the Lankan capital, then they ought to have attacked long before now. Rama had already received word from the angadiyas that all the other contingents had engaged the enemy on their various fronts, and he expected Hanuman to bring word of the outcome of those battles very shortly. If these enemy forces intended to do as he expected them to, then they should have moved long before now, striking Rama's forces from behind while they were in the thick of battle. But close to two hour-watches had passed, and still they lurked in the shade of the rampart walls.

Rama insisted that they wait. And so they remained here, watching from this vantage point, concealed behind this rock, baking under the sun. Waiting was not one of Lakshman's strong points. After several moments more had passed, he shifted his bow and sword restlessly, checked his quiver for the umpteenth time, then finally could stand it no more and turned to brace his back against the rock, looking directly at Rama.

'The bears as well as the Jatarupas must be in excruciating discomfort, Rama. What good is our plan if our army is in no position to fight when the time comes? I say we go down now and roust out those beasts and lure them out into the open.'

Rama kept his eyes fixed on the distant rampart walls, while replying patiently to Lakshman. 'If we do that, and they suspect something amiss, they may not come out at all. In which case, the bears and vanars who have endured this long wait already under such suffocating circumstances will have to suffer far longer a wait, or they will have to leave their hiding places and the entire plan will be exposed.'

'First of all, Rama, why would they suspect anything? They are rakshasas—some kind of new breed, no doubt, but still great, big, hulking idiots with bulging muscles instead of brains. I think they would simply react to the sight of us and follow us into the open. Secondly, even if the plan is exposed, we shall come up with another one.'

Rama shook his head once, tersely. ‘There will be no time for second plans. Once Ravana realises how we have made him dance this morning, he will no longer offer us the iron fist in a velvet glove. He will unleash all his dogs of war, and when that happens, it will be too late for strategy or battle tactics. Too late for shima, or war shastras.’ He paused. ‘And I think you underestimate not only those creatures, but rakshasas in general. They are not lacking in intelligence, it is only that they have been culturally raised to favour the more physical and violent arts rather than the poetic and philosophical ones. Given time, opportunity, and a leader like Vibhisena, I have no doubt that they will rival even our Arya nations in the proficiency and profuseness of their arts and culture.’

Lakshman snorted in amusement. ‘I can’t believe we’re sitting here debating the rakshasa capacity for art and culture! Rama, this is war pure and simple. We should be fighting, not talking!’

‘Not talking is what leads to fighting, my brother,’ Rama said calmly. ‘But fret not. I think you will have your wish very shortly. I believe the fighting part of the war is about to begin, for us at least.’

And he pointed with his chin.

Lakshman swung around, clapped his palm to the rock—the shaded part, for the sun-exposed part was already burning hot—and his lips moved in a rare smile. ‘Ah, at last. A time to slay rakshasas.’

‘And be slain by them,’ Rama added philosophically.

They watched as the ground below finally began displaying signs of activity.

In the shadowy depths of his hiding place, Prince Angad of Kiskindha watched as the rakshasas finally arrived at some kind of decision and began emerging into the sunlit open ground. He had been sitting here waiting for so long that his backside had turned numb. He could not understand why the rakshasas had hesitated this long before making their move. His angadiyas, the agile younguns he had trained to courier messages to and fro, had brought word of fighting on all the other three main fronts—north, east and west. He had heard of his father's valiant prowess in battle in the face of incredible odds, of Mandaradevi's challenging a rakshasa champion to single combat, of the brutal battle unfolding on the western front where General Susena, Pramathi, Praghasa and the twins had met stiff resistance but were fighting furiously still.

Yet he and his contingent here—mainly Jatarupas, with a small company of his own hand-picked faithfuls and the bears— had had to wait hours as the morning wore on.

He peered over the edge of his hiding place and saw that the ground below was indeed seething with the enemy. After coming up through the secret tunnels that opened in the shadowy nooks and crannies of the rampart walls, the rakshasas had not made a move all morning. Now, they emerged into the sunlight, moving in eerie silence on their hind legs. They seemed to be some breed of lizard-crossed rakshasas, for their hides were yellowish-brown in colour with a mottled dark stain-pattern, their rear ends adorned with long, thick tails that were an extension of their torso and comparable to those of a gharial or the river crocodile that vanars feared and hated so much. They seemed able to walk upon all fours, or only on their hind legs, but their front limbs were much smaller than the rear ones, and if not for the extruding talons would have seemed near useless to an enemy. Their heads were also quite similar to the reptilian species, with bright yellow, browless eyes with nictitating lids that opened and closed sideways and were set on either side of their narrow tapering heads. From time to time, some of them issued clicking sounds that he had first mistaken for exclamatory gestures, but now understood were in fact commands and communications, and that this odd ticking-clicking sound was their form of speech.

As far as he could tell, they had no leaders as such, for all moved at the same pace, exactly as land lizards would, but with a springy step that suggested the ability to move with great speed when required. Lizard-like they might be, but not the slow, waterbound crocodilian type; these were like land-lizard creatures, able to dart and swoop at will to catch their prey. They moved forward en masse now, leaving the shadowy recesses of the rampart walls to cover the vast stretch of ground leading to the foothills of Mount Trikuta. This entire part of the former plateau had been eroded by the killing stones, grass and trees and the land itself uprooted and reformed overnight by Ravana's sorcery. Now it was a large, barren plain, perhaps a yojana wide at this point, the narrowest tapering tip of the northern end of Lanka. It stretched for about half that distance far southwards, till it reached the grassy foothills. Angad's sharp eyes made out the large rocky outcrop on the northern face of Mount Trikuta. He knew that that was where Rama and Lakshman would have stationed themselves. It was too far to see them clearly, but he took comfort simply in knowing they were there, watching the battle that was about to unfold, and would join in themselves shortly. It gave him great pride to fight under Rama's command, perhaps even alongside Rama himself, if the devas willed it.

He hissed at the nearest angadiya, a bright-eyed little female with a mischievous smile on her young snouted face, and used the system of paw gestures he had devised to convey communications during such times, when silence was a necessity. She nodded, understanding, and scampered away. She would carry his order to the lieutenants Rsabha, Gavaksa, Gaja and Gavya. As for the bears, well, with Lord Jambavan himself leading that contingent, he had no reason to worry.

As he watched from his vantage point, the lizard-like rakshasas seeped out from the shadow of the ramparts like an endless flood unleashed upon the large barren field. Thousands upon thousands ... nay, tens of thousands upon tens of thousands ... And still they came. It seemed there was no end to their numbers. For a heart-stopping instant he wondered if perhaps Ravana had been able to summon up infinite numbers of these strange, oddly formed warriors. How would they fight them, then? It was true that Rama's sena was enormous in its multitudes, even after the losses sustained during the bridge-building, the tsunami, and the night of the killing stones, and far outnumbered Lanka's armies as described by Vibhisena. But Ravana's brother, on hearing of these yellow-hide lizard-like rakshasa beings, had admitted that these were something entirely new, no doubt hatched by Ravana in the subterranean volcanic caverns where he worked his vile asura maya in secret. What if Ravana had been able to summon up the multitudes of the hell-realms, as he had done once before, and was bringing up all the asuras in the three underworlds again? Both Rama and Vibhisena had insisted that such a thing was impossible, because the brahmastra unleashed at Mithila had rendered it so, but to a vanar prince visiting this strange mythical land of demons, anything seemed possible.

Then the last of the yellow beings emerged, and he breathed a small sigh of relief. Only a small one, for the sheer size of the army gathered below was awe-inspiring. He estimated there were close to a hundred thousand of the odd beings gathered below. A lakh of rakshasas! Even given the vast numbers of the contingent he led, and the numbers of the bear warriors as well, that was still enough to instil fear and doubt in him. Then he reminded himself once more of Hanuman's words: 'Rama is the source of all strength. He is the key to unlock your own inner power. Believe in him completely, without question, and you believe in yourself. For he is within you, around you, and he is yourself in truth as well. Give your faith to Rama, and you shall not want for anything. Jai Shri Rama!'

And so, hefting his weapon, he rose from his hiding place, drew himself up to his full height, showing himself, and cried with all his strength: 'Jai Siyaram!'

And an army of vanars echoed: 'JAI SIYARAM!'

It had begun.

Rama and Lakshman were too far away to see individual details clearly, but the day was bright and the view excellent, and they did not have to be falcons to see the enormous numbers of the enemy streaming out from beneath the rampart walls like a pot of water spilled across the floor of a hut on washing day. Where there had been only a great expanse of empty barren ground, a dirt field some nine miles long and four miles wide, bordering the foothills that led gradually up in steps to this northern face of Mount Trikuta, there now stood a vast army of the strangest breed of rakshasas they had ever encountered.

Even at this distance, they could tell from the way the enemy moved and held themselves, that they were like no rakshasas they had ever seen. Earlier, angadiyas had brought reports of more typical rakshasas, horned and tusked beasts that were much like the rakshasas he had been expecting to fight today. But then, those initial sightings had been followed by curious dispatches, reporting that the rakshasas had withdrawn. Then, after a gap of a half-an-hour-watch, during which time Rama had waited with ever-growing anxiety, fearing that their plan had somehow misfired and that Ravana had decided to concentrate all his forces upon the main vanguard to the south, while he and the substantial part of the bear contingent as well as an entire army of vanars waited here on his orders. But now that the rakshasas were out in the open, easily discerned, Rama saw that they were certainly not the kind that had been glimpsed earlier by his scouts. These were a wholly different breed altogether.

They looked almost like great ... lizard men, standing on their hind legs and communicating with a peculiar clicking speech that carried as far as the outcrop on this placid morning. It was a relief when they finally ceased emerging and the brothers could glimpse the end of their number leaving the confines of the rampart. Even a quick guess suggested no number less than a lakh, which was formidable enough. But what was more unpredictable was the nature of these beasts. How would they fight? How could they be defeated? What were their vulnerable points? Rama sighed inwardly, thinking that it would have been good to know all these things beforehand. Not knowing them, he had only one choice: to learn about them first-hand, the hard way. Or rather, for his troops to learn, risking their own valiant lives to glean this vital knowledge.

His heart went out to those vanars and bears who would brave the first encounter with these new-breed rakshasas.

He watched as the vanar contingent led by Prince Angad rose from their hiding places and issued the agreed signal for the start of the battle. Rama had not ordered them to speak those words; that had been entirely the army's prerogative. But that clarion call—literally, Praised be Rama, consort of Sita—cut deeply into his heart, reminding him that all that transpired here today, upon this southern field, as well as across Lanka, all these many many deaths, were all on account of him, and Sita. What was a mortal to feel, knowing that millions fought and died today, to reunite him with his beloved? What was a mortal to do, when faced with such epic loyalty and fealty in the face of such incredible odds? What could a mortal do, except add his own weapons and life to the count, and fight alongside the brave warriors who risked all on his account.

He exchanged a glance with Lakshman, whose objections and grumbling had all died away the instant threat showed itself, as they always did, and saw that his brother shared his sentiments entirely. They nodded, agreeing silently, and started down the slope of yet another mountain, this time to enter the fray of a battle on which not only their own lives, but the lives of many others would depend.

TEN

As Rama and Lakshman sprinted down the long sloping northern face of Mount Trikuta, they were afforded a clear view of the battlefield. The small, dense patches of scrub that dotted the low foothills between them and the vast barren plain were not high enough to obstruct their view, nor were the foothills themselves more than gently rolling mounds, the tallest barely a hundred yards in stature. They watched as the lizard- rakshasas gathered on the plain below turned en masse, staring up at the looming rampart walls from whose shadows they had only just emerged.

For it was atop those very rampart walls that Prince Angad and his contingent were stationed. The idea had been hatched by Rama during the long, lonely hours he spent stuck there. The stone-block walls were easy enough for vanars to climb quickly, and even allowed them to carry up a sufficient store of suitable weapons.

Running downhill at the steady, relentless pace that he and Lakshman could maintain for days on end if required, he watched as the vanars, whose little heads broke the regularity of the stone ramparts, hefted the stones of varying sizes that they had carried up to the top during the post-dawn hours after Rama outlined his plan. There had not been time enough to amass a great store of stone missiles, nor to carry up any truly large ones that would be capable of inflicting great damage. But he had counted on the height of the ramparts themselves, as well as the natural lethal aim of the vanars, to be sufficient for this phase of the attack.

Unable to make out individual vanars, he watched as a multitude of little furry paws—reduced by distance and their semi-concealment atop the ramparts—raised their fists, gripping stones, and awaited their leader’s order to start the attack.

‘Jai Siyaram!’ Angad roared, and launched the first missile. He picked out a brute below clicking furiously, his tongue flickering in and out of his elongated mouth, his yellow-hide pattern distinctively marked with a purplish patch on top of his flattened reptilian head. Angad flung his stone with all his strength, and had the satisfaction of seeing it strike the chosen rakshasa on the exact spot he had aimed for—the flat part of the head between the eyes. From long experience with the large lizards that lived in some climes, as well as with the vanar’s eternal enemy, snakes, he had chosen that spot as being the most effective. He was proved right: the lizard-rakshasa staggered, his tail, which he had been carrying raised a foot above the ground, flopped down, and he keeled back, tipping over to fall senseless.

Thousands of other rocks and stones, flung by the other vanars atop the ramparts, flew down. Most, if not all, were aimed just as accurately as Angad’s, and struck their mark. The vanar prince issued a whooping cry of triumph as thousands of lizard-rakshasas reeled and fell and staggered to crash into their comrades. The clicking sounds from the field below increased to a cacophony, as the beasts milled about in confusion, confronted by this unexpected assault. Ravana had sent these beings through the subterranean tunnels to outflank Rama and his armies. The last thing they would be expecting was to be outflanked themselves. And what delicious irony: to be using the very ramparts raised by their master to attack his own forces!

For the next several moments Angad gave himself over to aiming, throwing and cheering his own successes as well as those of his fellow vanars. Thousands of the yellow beasts below were fallen on the field. He grinned, cheekaing with the enthusiasm of a youngun himself. At this rate they would win this battle easily enough. There would not even be any need to call on the rest of the vanar contingent, let alone the bears.

Then he was out of missiles, and had no choice but to fling down verbal insults and rude noises. Soon the flurry of flung stones ceased all along the ramparts. For several moments, the huge horde of lizard-rakshasas continued to mill about on the field below. Angad frowned as he estimated that at least two in ten had been downed by the attack. That was not bad at all, for vanars flinging stones.

Then his heart skipped a beat.

The fallen lizard-rakshasas were rising up again. The one he had struck down was among the first to regain its feet, helped by its thick ungainly tail. It stood upright again, clicking furiously to its comrades, then raised its menacing flat head to stare up directly at the place where the missile had come from: looking right into Angad's eyes. At the sight of him, its nictitating eyelids closed and opened several times, that forked tongue flickering in and out of its large flat mouth in evident anger.

Then it leaped.

Angad had no reason to expect the fluid, springing jump which the lizard-beast executed. Having never seen this species before, nor anything like it, he stared in stunned astonishment as the creature made a jump from a standing start that carried it all the way to the spear-like extensions that grew out of the lower part of the rampart walls, on which so many unfortunate vanars and bears had died the night before. Landing on the shaft of one of these extensions, the creature paused, clicking again, then launched itself a second time. This second leap carried it, incredibly, all the way to the top of the rampart wall itself. Angad was treated to a glimpse of a dark brownish-purplish underbody, with taloned feet outstretched and looking as deadly as any river crocodile's, then the beast had passed over his head, and landed behind him.

He turned to see the rakshasa facing him, its long tongue flickering in and out of its reptilian mouth. Then, without any further warning, it threw itself at him. Along the rampart walls, Angad heard the sound of thousands of its comrades leaping up to attack his vanars.

Rama watched in grim dismay as the lizard-like rakshasas leaped up to the walls, turning the ambush into a counter-attack. Without waiting any further, he shouted a wordless instruction to the nearest angadiya — several of the little couriers were within earshot of him at all times. The order was simple enough: Start the bear attack.

As he reached the bottom of Mount Trikuta and the start of the first foothill, his view of the battlefield was obstructed briefly. For the next few moments, as he sprinted up this rise, he would not be able to see how the battle fared. He did not need to see it, though: brave as Angad's warriors might be, they were no match for those leaping lizard-beasts. He had no illusions about who would emerge the victor in the struggle that had just begun.

He ran grimly on, and hoped that the bears would fare better than the first vanar attack.

Angad dodged the first leap of the lizard-rakshasa by cartwheeling sideways on the crenellations of the rampart wall. He had an impression of a deadly sharp set of talons blurring through the space where his belly had been just a fraction of an instant before, then he was out of harm's way. He landed agilely on his hind legs, tail dangling out over the edge of the drop. Had he been facing any other creature, the chances were that his sudden sideways move would have caused his attacker to leap right over the edge, falling back down where it had come from. But the lizard-rakshasa was still on the rampart wall, eyes glowing bright greenish-yellow now and clicking angrily. Its tail swished to and fro sideways, and he saw that the appendage was not only strong enough to rest its entire body weight upon — unlike vanar tails—but also thick enough to deliver a damaging blow in a fight. The creature advanced towards him, and he feinted left, then right, seeking to dodge it. But it watched his every move so closely, he knew that it would not be fooled that easily. Like a snake with its beaded eyes fixed on its enemy, it was preternaturally able to anticipate anything he did next.

He heard and scented and sensed from the periphery of his vision that his other vanar troopers were not faring half as well as he was against their own lizard-rakshasa foes. He could tell from the screams alone that they were being slaughtered by the dozens. He had been shocked to see how powerfully these large beasts could leap, and how high and fast. Clearly, he was dealing with a foe that should not be underestimated. But he was still alive, at least. And while he lived, he could find a way to turn the tables yet again.

Right now, though, as he fainted and attempted to dodge the beast on the rampart, staying alive was all he could manage. If those long talons so much as touched his fur, he had no doubt that the wounds they inflicted would be lethal. Angad had suffered scratches and bruises galore, but he had not yet had the misfortune of actually being gashed by such talons, and he had no desire to learn what it might feel like to have one's skin parted and flesh destroyed by them. The only way to survive right now was to not let the creature touch him. And that was proving easier thought than done.

He scampered quickly in one direction, swung around in a half-circle, ran that same way again, then cut diagonally across the top of the rampart wall. The creature moved with him with blurring speed, and for a second he thought it would intersect his path and he would learn what it would feel like to have those talons in his body.

At the very last instant, he threw himself sideways in the opposite direction of where his momentum was taking him, feeling his muscles strain at the unnatural movement, feeling his spine contort and bend to snapping point, and he heard the creature click furiously as it felt him moving away from its lethal talons. Something sliced through the fur on his scalp and then he was rolling on the hard stone on top of the rampart, then scampering and then leaping to land atop the crenellations yet again, his back to the ground below. He saw the creature turn and seek him out, finding him almost at once, and open its mouth to issue a horrifying sound that was part clicking and part hissing, like nothing he had ever heard before in nature. At the same time, it raised its tail and released an odour of such pungent strength that he almost gagged. The stench of hate and anger was unmistakable; he had smelled odours like that on tigers when their prey escaped them.

He heard the ululating call of vanars miles away, the clarion call for the second phase of the battle as prearranged by Rama. And suddenly he knew that he could not win this bout of single combat, that as much as his princely ego demanded he stay and fight to the bitter end, his dharma lay in surviving to lead his vanars into the battle, the real battle that still lay ahead. There was a great deal more work to be done and he was needed there. Nothing would be served by his dying violently atop this rampart wall here and now.

With a cheeka and an ululating call of his own, summoning the surviving vanars to follow him, he turned tail and ran as fast as his lithe legs would carry him, down the length of the rampart, racing in a line that would carry him around and beyond the army of lizard-rakshasas gathered in the field below. He did not need to wait to see if his vanars followed, for he could hear their answering cries already. But behind him, outraged at being deprived of its easy prey, he heard too the same clicking-hissing sound of the creature that had almost ended his life, protesting. He did not know if it would pursue him, and if it did, whether it could run fast enough to catch him, and he did not wait to see. He simply ran pell-mell, heading for the far side of the open field, to where the next part of the battle was already unfolding.

They came over the hillock at a steady run, in time to see the vanars on the ramparts—those who had survived—racing southwards along the wall. Rama was relieved, because there was no point in sacrificing those vanars. They had done their job already, by forcing the enemy horde to turn around, breeding the first part of the confusion necessary for the successful completion of his plan.

Even so, he could see that the lizard-beasts were wreaking havoc. The vanars on the ramparts had been almost completely massacred, and a pitifully small number were escaping. He did not allow himself to dwell on that, just as he had not allowed himself to be dismayed by the initial reports from the angadiyas of the carnage in the canyon, the terrible losses in the eastern army and reports of strange developments by the gates of Lanka. The war was long and hard, he had no illusions about that, but the only way to win it was to fight it one blow at a time, one fight, one battle

...

As he and Lakshman started down the hillock, he saw the scrubland ahead suddenly come alive with vanars, as the main force of the northern army—so designated by him to avoid confusion—showed themselves.

ELEVEN

Angad finally judged it safe to glance back, and was relieved to find that the lizard-beast had not given pursuit. He did not know whether the creature could have caught him—those two leaps up the rampart had been astonishing, more than most vanars could ever accomplish, and he still feared the lash of that thick, scaly tail. But the rampart behind him was empty except for other scurrying vanars who raced up to him and gathered around, looking back as well as down. He was angered at how few had survived—it made him want to leap back into the fray and make the enemy pay the price for taking so many vanar lives. But a commotion from the army of lizard-rakshasas on the field below helped distract him from thoughts of revenge.

The lizard-beasts were turning once more to face southwards, in the direction they had been heading until Angad and his distractors had turned them around. Clicking frenetically to one another—he guessed that they communicated and passed on messages and orders in this fashion, as well as expressing their emotions, if they had any—they summoned back those of their number that had leaped up to the battlements. These beasts, a tiny fraction of the larger force, leaped down to the ground again, joining their fellow reptilians as they faced the new threat.

Angad raised his vision to view the threat they had identified. Beyond the dense expanse of the lizard army, the scrubland that skirted the foothills ahead had come alive with furry vanar shapes. The scrubby plants and bushes, while too small to conceal any larger creatures, were sufficient to hide vanars, who could double up and squat easily for hours on end. Now, as they received the order, they revealed themselves. From every tiny bush, bit of scrub, rock and depression, vanars emerged into the open. They were Jatarupas all, smaller in stature than most of the other vanars, and with the distinctive colouring to their head-fur, which they tinted with vegetable dyes to an assortment of colours and shades associated with their tribe, hierarchy, sex, in a complex, arcane system of colour-coding that even Angad could not claim to understand completely. The few trees that dotted the area shook violently as literally dozens of Jatarupas detached themselves from each one and bounced down to the ground. Grinning with their customary devil-may-care attitude, a stark contrast to the Kiskindha vanars' more steadfast attitude, or the Mandaras' burly laconicism, they appeared to be young mischief-makers out for a jaunt rather than a small army of vanar warriors. Yet their numbers left no room for doubt on that front: there were almost twice as many Jatarupas now revealed on the field as lizard-rakshasas, forming the largest vanar army in Rama's entire force.

The lizard beings seemed far from dismayed at the appearance of this new threat. If anything, they seemed agitated but enthusiastic. Angad eyed them doubtfully as they milled about in apparent confusion—he was already able to sense that what seemed like confusion was in fact an esoteric pattern of communication and tactical rearrangement that could only be understood in their own terms. It was useless to attempt to fathom their actions, noises or gestures, by comparing them with those of vanars, mortals—or even other rakshasa species. These were something quite different altogether, and he knew that Rama's warriors would have to understand their fighting methods quickly in order to gain the advantage in this battle. Glancing at the sheer weight-and-height disparity, and already aware of the agility, speed and shrewdness of the lizards, he did not feel very confident that the short, thickly furred Jatarupas would be able to stand up against them, despite their superior numbers.

But Rama had another ace up his sleeve. A very devious and shrewd gamble that, if it played out, might turn the day yet.

The bears had yet to reveal themselves.

Rama came over the last foothill and slowed. He and Lakshman were now overlooking the field of battle itself. Only a few hundred yards before and below the peak of the foothill on which they stood, was the scrubland where the Jatarupas had now revealed themselves in full force. Farther ahead, on the barren land skirted by the curving crescent of the rampart walls that bounded the plateau, were the lizard-like rakshasas. The beasts had turned back to face the vanar army, and if he understood their stances and odd communication even a little, they would attack soon. It was imperative to his plan that they do so, rather than wait for the vanars to come at them.

For only then could the bears emerge from their place of concealment and join the fray. And from the looks of it, the bears would be essential to winning this battle.

But long, precious moments passed and still the lizard creatures remained as they were, milling about in an odd shambling pattern, as if playing out some peculiar fireside ritual dance, moving this way and that endlessly, issuing those vexing clicking sounds all the while. It sounded like a plague of crickets!

He sent word through more angadiyas for the vanars to do as planned in such a circumstance.

As he watched, a few moments later, the Jatarupas complied.

Calling out in their cheerful childlike voices, they began rolling and tumbling to and fro, performing elaborate somersaults, then climbing atop one another's shoulders and throwing each other high in the air, to be caught by other groups, then passed on yet again, until in a moment the air was filled with flying, tumbling, somersaulting, cartwheeling vanars with fur tinged all hues and colours. A fantastic carnival of acrobatic performers, and a sight that would make anyone, adult or child, clap their hands with glee and cheer happily. But there was no one to cheer or clap here. Only a horde of strange rakshasa enemies who stared with their bright yellow, lizard-like eyes, in apparent fascination at this exotic display of acrobatic talent.

Rama noted that the clicking had ceased.

A moment later, he noticed several of the lizard beings moving forward, shambling across the dust of the open field, dragging their tails behind them like tired crocodiles emerging from a river. More and more of their number began moving as well, until soon enough, the entire army was advancing, not in a headlong charge as rakshasas were wont to do in a battle, but in the deceptively slow, sluggish fashion of cold-blooded reptiles. He was not fooled by their apparent sluggishness, for he had seen how they had leaped to the ramparts to deal with Angad and his small force. He hoped the Jatarupas had all been able to see that and would be sensible enough not to underestimate the enemy. From what he knew of them, the jolly, colourful vanars were not foolish at all, but they did have a tendency to overconfidence that was sometimes their undoing.

He watched as the Jatarupas continued their mad antics even as the enemy host approached in their odd, shambling fashion. The distance between the two forces closed steadily—a hundred yards now, then seventy, fifty, thirty ... and now the first lizard-beasts were barely twenty yards from the vanar army. He tried to estimate how much of open field the lizards had left behind them.

‘Not more than a mile,’ Lakshman said grimly, voicing his own concern.

That was not enough. He needed the lizard-beasts to clear at least three miles of open field, or he could not deploy the bear army. Bear with me just a little while longer, he said silently to Jambavan. He wished he could send a spoken message via the angadiyas as he did when communicating with the vanar forces. But as soon as the thought left his mind, he felt a tingling sensation, as if the bear lord heard him and understood, and had sent back a gruff assurance.

Then he waited for the battle to begin.

Angad watched as the lizard-beasts approached within striking distance of the Jatarupa army. Even now the playful vanars still continued their mad antics, leaping and whooping and dancing like a tribe drunk on honey wine at moon-feast time. He shook his head, vexed. Could they not see that these beasts were not like regular rakshasas? Had they not glimpsed how fast they leaped and how high? He wished now that he had elected to lead the Jatarupas instead of manning the much smaller force on the rampart walls. Contrary to expectations, it had transpired that the larger force was facing the greater danger.

But it was too late to change the plan. All he could hope was that Rama's war strategy was astute enough to anticipate and adjust to all possibilities. And that the Jatarupas were able to stand up to this new breed of rakshasa better than his warriors had.

Too far away to participate actively in the battle, too far even to fire arrows that would be better used at closer range, Rama and Lakshman prepared to watch as the battle began.

The lizard-beasts made the first move. One moment they were all still as statues, every single one of them in sight, even their clicking communication fallen completely silent, as they stared ahead with unblinking yellow eyes, glaring with serpentine coldness at their enemy. Then, abruptly, without any warning or sign, they attacked. Not by running forward, or by charging in lines as any normal rakshasa horde would do, but by leaping high into the air, with such suddenness and force that it seemed as if they had all launched themselves at once. Perhaps they had indeed done that, their uncanny clicking communication enabling them to maintain individual independence in movement and action while uniting them all mentally. One moment the field before the Jatarupa army was filled with immobile threeyards-tall lizard-like creatures. The next instant, the air above that same field was filled with the creatures leaping with ferocious energy and momentum, all but flying through the air. That first launch carried them some fifteen or twenty yards up, and with enough force to propel them forward across the intervening distance between the armies.

In the late morning sunlight, their talons and fangs gleamed and glistened brightly.

Like a rainfall of snakes they landed on their vanar foe, rending and tearing, lashing and biting. They moved like acrobats themselves, not with the tumbling grace of the Jatarupas, but with manic intensity. Their movement seemed clumsy when seen individually, but taken as a whole group it was undeniably concerted and coordinated with perfect precision. No doubt about it, these were creatures with a communication system so flawless, they did not need to line up and march or attack in rank and file; transcending those trivial disciplines altogether, they danced a deadly dance together in battle.

Both Angad from the high ramparts and Rama and Lakshman from the overlooking hillock, watched with horror as the lizard-rakshasas fell upon the vanars like no army they had ever seen before.

The Jatarupas were no fools. Their clever antics and acrobatic leaping had served a definite purpose: they had glimpsed the enemy's style of attack and had sought to confuse and diffuse it by leaping and tumbling about. In this manner, they hoped to dodge the leaping beasts while flying at them themselves.

But the lizards' uncanny ability to coordinate with one another rendered this useless. Rama watched as vanars flew through the air, tumbling in trajectories that should have been impossible to predict or intersect. And yet, they were intersected, by lizards that met them in mid-air and slashed them viciously, laying open their flesh, severing limbs, decapitating heads. And even before they landed again, they leaped once more with greater force, for this time they were propelled by forward momentum as well, they were clicking to one another, communicating other vanar movements, and leaping precisely to intercept those leaping vanars, only to cut them down with ruthless efficiency in mid-air. So huge was the army of lizards and so widespread that the vast majority had to leap several times before engaging with the enemy. They kept springing forward, tens of yards at one jump, and in mere moments the entire scrubland was awash with battling vanars and lizards, a bizarre dancing battle fought almost entirely in mid-air. For the Jatarupas could not alter their natural fighting style so quickly, and continued to leap and cavort and frolic in their acrobatic way even as they were being massacred by this strange, new foe.

The vanars did fight back. Angad saw several of them inflict slashing wounds and lay open the soft underbellies of the lizard creatures. But the lizards went on to leap again, undaunted by the greenish-yellow ichor oozing from these cuts and slashes, while the vanars mostly fell dead on the spot or with mortal injuries.

Simply put, the Jatarupas, with their exotic fighting method, had met a foe whose method not only matched theirs but exceeded it. To put it bluntly, and bloodily, they had been outmatched.

And that could only mean one thing, Rama thought with the cold clarity that came to him in such moments of ultimate crisis during a battle: the enemy had anticipated his move and outwitted him. That was the danger of shima: in letting the foe know your plans, you also risked his being able to unleash new alternative counter-plans of his own. Ravana had not succeeded in his attempt to outflank Rama's armies and catch them in a hand-clapping action. Rama had rendered that impossible by splitting his army into separate forces and engaging the enemy on four different fronts, each on a ground of his own choosing and his own terms. But Ravana had outmanoeuvred him by pulling back the ordinary rakshasa regulars Rama had expected to attack from this northern rear position, and deploying these strange new creatures instead.

Rama watched as his army of brave, eccentric Jatarupas was smashed to smithereens by the lizard force.

TWELVE

Angad howled with anguish as thousands upon thousands of Jatarupa vanars were cut to shreds by the leaping rakshasa army. Now the entire lizard force had covered the scrubland, and the air and ground were thick with flying bodies. He watched in anguish as vanars were cut to ribbons by multiple lizards at once, body parts flung to the winds. Blood and gore filled the air like a macabre festival of colours, celebrated at seeding season in one of the mortal ritual holidays he had once witnessed. Instead of the powdered rang and water that the mortals threw to celebrate the colours of the coming spring and the harvest being seeded, vanar blood and gristle flew through the air. The air was so densely reddened with bloodspray that he wondered how the warriors of both sides could even see each other. It was as if a cloud of red mist had fallen upon the battlefield, engulfing both forces.

Still, he could see, the Jatarupas were not yielding quarter. They stood their ground, leaping and calling out and chittering to the last, slashing and causing as much damage as they could inflict upon the enemy. Here and there a few lizards even fell, cut open and killed by the multitude of wounds they had received from several vanars leaping upon them at the same time. In this fashion, the battle, uneven and disproportionate as it was, did continue awhile, with perhaps five or seven vanars dying for every mortally wounded or killed lizard. But the count was increasing so rapidly that were this fray to last even a single day, every last Jatarupa on the field would be dead or mortally wounded.

But in standing their ground so bravely, and facing the enemy despite being outmatched and outmanoeuvred, the Jatarupas had achieved the fruition of the next part of Rama's plan.

They had left room for the bears to be set free.

Jambavan sensed rather than felt or heard or saw that it was time for him to emerge. The bear lord had sustained himself for the past several hours by reducing his breathing to a minimum, using a method that the mortal sages of the Arya world referred to as pranayam yoga. In fact, his method preceded the mortals' form of yoga by several millennia, deriving as it did from the original yogi himself, Lord Shiva the Destroyer. In a past life, Jambavan had served his lord personally, and in exchange for that lifetime of service diligently fulfilled, he had been given knowledge of the Three-Eyed One's most personal accomplishments in the field of self-attainment. This gift he, in turn, had imparted to his bear fellows, and on this day in Lanka, it was what had made the fulfilment of Rama's plan possible. In fact, he himself had suggested this particular concealment, when Rama had mused about how they were to hide such large, obvious creatures as bears. He and his kind could hardly crouch between scrubby bushes or cluster in trees as the Jatarupa vanars could. Nor were the trees around here sufficiently large-trunked for a bear to hide behind effectively. So he had suggested this place and it had served its purpose beautifully, for the enemy had bypassed it without ever being aware that a whole army of bears lay concealed within its confines. Now, they would learn and see, and be fearful. But not for long. That was Jambavan's vow. For in the infinite knowledge of his deva-granted wisdom, he had indeed heard Rama's silently spoken missive, just as he was aware of the progress of the battle between the Jatarupas and the reptilian rakshasas.

With a great flexing of muscles, he raised his powerful paws and began to dig his way out of his place of concealment. It had taken almost an hour-watch to dig his way in, and for the Jatarupas, supervised by Rama himself, to cover him up along with his bears. Now it took only a few moments to dig his way out. They had been lucky in that this entire patch of some twenty or more square miles was all loose dirt with almost no stones or rock for several yards beneath the surface. Being barren, there were no weeds or roots to form sods either. So it had been relatively easy—no, perhaps not easy, but possible—for his army of bears to dig their way a yard or more into the ground, and then for the Jatarupas to shovel the dirt back over them and stamp it in energetically to create the illusion of a flattish if somewhat lumpy field once more. Any unevenness could be attributed to the night of the killing stones, which had disrupted the entire landscape of this northern tip already. No enemy would suspect that an army of bears could be buried under a yard of packed dirt. In fact, it was impossible to do such a thing, for how could any creature breathe and survive several hours in this fashion? Impossible, that is, for any army except Rama's, and any host of bears except that of Jambavan's, with his mastery of the science of yoga. Even so, he knew that a few unfortunate specimens, unable to master the art, or lacking the discipline required to sustain the art of slowing one's metabolism and breathing to the near-death level required to survive such a feat, had choked and suffocated to death already. They were a tiny fraction of his numbers, but if they had had to spend several more hours thus, then perhaps he would have lost many more.

But now it was time. He worked his great paws furiously, digging away the dirt and then the topsoil, and finally broke free, lifting his snout to breathe in the dusty but blessed air of Prithvi once more. He gasped in great lung-filling breaths, willing his pulse to resume normal pace once again. Then, moving as quickly as was possible under the circumstances, he dragged his large, heavy bulk out of the ground and stood, examining the field around him.

Incredibly, he was not the first to emerge. He took pride in seeing several hundred bears already out of the ground, or breaking free even as he looked around. Of course, most had probably been buried a bit less deeply than himself, and so had had to dig less to get out as well, but even so, it was a mark of his achievement as a leader and as a teacher of yoga that so many were able to respond so quickly. If slowing one's bodily functions in the shav-asana state—literally like a corpse—was hard, then returning those functions to normal pace, while not as hard, was arduous and demanding. Under the circumstances, it also had to be done quickly, for it was no use wasting precious moments on regaining one's senses and strength. They had to be ready to fight at once.

Which made it much like rousing oneself from a state of calm to full-blown fury. For nothing could raise bodily reactions faster and more effectively than anger. But anger controlled so that it was useful, not excessive. He willed his glands to produce the secretions that would bring him to a fighting fury quickly, while retaining control over his mental and intellectual faculties.

Around him, the bears who had emerged were doing the same thing, clenching their jaws and tensing their powerful upper limbs tightly, sheathing their claws and fisting their paws to enhance the arousal.

And all the while, more and more bears broke ground and emerged blinking and breathing into the clear, bright light of day. Now there were a few thousand, then twenty thousand, then twice that number ... until the vast tract of barren land was covered with an army of bears the likes of which had never been gathered before on the face of the earth, nor would ever be gathered again. For in his heart, Jambavan knew that this great army was assembled only for Rama's cause, and no cause as great or as righteous could ever summon such loyalty, such sacrifice, such unity between species, for perhaps as long as the world existed and until the last day of Brahma ended to give way to the final tandav of Shiva as He danced to destroy the world and make way for a new one.

Jambavan felt the power of all his strength, all his will, and all the shakti of his yogic knowledge and mastery, as well as the fury of outrage of Rama's suffering, well up inside him, awakening every cell, every pore, every vessel of every organ in his body and mind, until he was in full battle rage, ready to unleash the power of the bear army.

He raised his snout and roared. Then lowered his head and lumbered forward to the attack.

Rama watched with pride and an unnameable emotion as the bear army stood on the plain, tens of thousands upon tens of thousands of great hulking, shaggy, furred beasts, each a formidable force individually. A small contingent of their number had been dispatched earlier to aid the Mandaras in their forest valley battle. But the bulk of his bear army was right here, kept in abeyance until this crucial moment. And seeing them rise up out of the ground, he felt that he had done exactly the right thing. For could any force withstand that great army led by Jambavan?

As Jambavan roared and thundered forward, the massive bear force lumbering with him, the lizard-beasts ceased their fighting and dropped to the ground, falling still and silent once more. The Jatarupas, having the advantage of knowing about the bears, used this brief respite to hack and slash and cut the enemy, slaying several hundreds as they stood motionless, eyes opening and shutting but without moving any other muscle in their long reptilian bodies.

Then, as the bears' lumbering run accelerated into a full-blown charge, the lizards moved as one, a great swivelling and turning that brought them all face-to-face with this new enemy that had appeared so unexpectedly while they were busy battling the vanars, and their clicking began anew. But this time, Rama felt, there was a difference in the pattern and pitch of their communication. He could not be certain of course, but he sensed a faltering in the rhythm of their clicking, a dulling of volume, a hesitant, uncertain start-and-stop pattern that he had not heard before. If their earlier communication was a confident, aggressive, bold outburst of chatter, the equivalent of a mortal roar of 'attack and destroy', then this new sound was more akin to a curious cry of 'What is this now? What should we do next?' He had no doubt that given even a few moments longer, they would regroup and figure out some way to deal with the new threat, and their skills would be almost as devastating as against the vanars.

But they did not have the luxury of those few moments. The ploy of burying the bears and then recalling them so suddenly, and of trapping the rakshasa force between two armies—of outflanking the very force that was intended to outflank his forces—paid its dividends now. As the lizard-beasts stood in stunned confusion, unable to decide how to deal with this unexpected new enemy, the Jatarupas realised what was about to happen and quickly and quietly pulled back, leaving the reptilian creatures standing alone and defenceless before the oncoming bear charge.

With a sound like a great fist driven into living flesh with the force of a hammer, the bear army slammed into the lizard-beast army.

The lizard-beasts, formidable though they were when attacked, were not built for defence. Like the natural reptilian species they resembled so vividly, they possessed the same soft underbellies and vulnerable under-jaw. When attacking, their powerful leaps and slashing talons negated these disadvantages. But when standing still in stunned confusion, as they were now, they made soft, easy targets.

Jambavan rammed into a lizard headlong, ripping into its belly with his right fist, tearing open the soft flesh with such impact that a great gush of ichor spewed out like vomit. He saw the beast's enormous mouth, as flat as a crocodile's but with high fangs placed like a snake's, open as if to issue a sound of anguish, but without a word or even a click, it collapsed in a gelid heap at his feet. He was already moving on to the next, swinging his great fist to slash it viciously across its thick reptilian throat. The joining of its head to its body was too solid and fleshy for him to actually decapitate it, but he ripped it sufficiently so that the head sagged limply to one side as the creature fell with a soft thud upon the ground. In the time it took to fall, he had moved on and killed another of its fellows. Around him, bears were finding their own chosen targets just as easy to kill.

The situation changed slowly as the beasts, sluggish though they were, and clearly stunned by the sudden appearance of this unexpected foe, regained their wits and began corresponding yet again with those unnerving clicks. But their confidence was so badly eroded, and the ferocious onslaught of the bears so great that even their rallying response was too feeble, too late. They tried leaping high and fast and in all directions, as they had done before, but whereas the vanars had been leaping as well, and had been much smaller creatures with far inferior strength, the bears were a different story altogether.

Jambavan tracked a lizard leaping elliptically, and when it came flying down at him, its talons blurring, he was already half turned away, out of the range of those slashing blade-like tips, then twisting his body around in that famous side-to-side swinging action that only bears could effect with such power and grace, cutting back at the enemy with his own formidable claws. The lizard's torso seemed to explode in a burst of green-yellow ichor as it hissed out a cry that reminded him of a giant swallowing snake he had once fought deep in a tropical jungle, ten times his length and as thick as himself. This creature was a far less competent foe than that great anaconda, and died far more easily, the light winking out of its bright eyes like a firefly slapped by an irate bear.

Jambavan slaughtered and sang his song of battle, slaying dozens of the creatures himself, until he lost count of how many he slew, or of the progress of the battle as a whole. Such battle madness was unavoidable, even to a creature as enlightened and in control of its senses as he; it was a relaxation of the normal sensory awareness of time and tide and logic and sense; in its own way, this state of battle-lust and killing fever was no less than a meditation itself, albeit a brutal and life-negating meditation that did not bear the fruits of a true transcendental trance. But it helped make the butcher's task that much easier—made it possible even, for killing, however necessary, however justified, if you could ever call killing justified, was no glorious deed to be sung about and praised in paeans. Jambavan, like any true warrior, fulfilled this part of his dharma, but in doing so allowed himself to neither be clouded by the illusory, vainglorious pleasure of victory, nor disabled by the horror of his acts of violence.

When the fugue of bloodletting passed, he found himself standing in a place of blood and ichor, corpses and severed parts, of body organs exposed and stinking fetidly, of blindly staring yellow eyes in lifeless reptilian heads, and a scene of such incredible carnage as he had never witnessed in his years before, nor ever desired to set eyes on again.

Rama looked upon the battlefield with a sense of awe that he had not thought himself capable of feeling since he was a boy and still uninured to the excesses and cruelties of life. Even as a young man of fifteen, the year that Brahmarishi Vishwamitra had come to Ayodhya to take him into the Bhayanak-van on that fateful mission, he had not experienced such a sense of utter disbelief.

The bears had wiped out the force of lizard- rakshasas. The few thousand that remained, gutted or wounded, struggling feebly to fight back, were being slaughtered even now. The bears, aided by the Jatarupas, who were more than eager to avenge their own losses, went about the field dispatching the survivors easily, with a sense of dutifulness that was almost frightening to watch. This was no longer battle lust that drove them, but a simple sense of survival. There was no point in leaving alive any of the foe, when they knew full well that those survivors would only return to hunt them once again. Even so, his time-toughened warrior's mind found it difficult to stomach this necessary act. He consoled himself with the knowledge that these creatures were a sorcerously bred hybrid creation of Ravana, not a natural breed of rakshasas that lived and raised families like the other rakshasas—Vibhisena had confirmed as much when he had joined them a little while earlier. And in that case, they were only undoing the work of unnatural sorcery, not truly killing life created by the honest purity of Brahmanic shakti itself, as were mortals, vanars, bears, or other animals, birds and sea-denizens that existed on earth.

Yet, he still could not help feeling a sense of sickening unease at being the sole cause of an entire species being wiped out so completely and finally. Thus were genocides committed. Did it matter any less if the race thus extinguished was a sorcerously created one? He was grateful that he had not had the luxury of time to dwell on the moral and ethical ramifications of such issues. His dharma only called for him to go to war, and this war required that this reptilian force be destroyed to the last member. So be it.

THIRTEEN

They met at the lowermost foothill: bear lord, vanar prince, mortal princes and a solitary rakshasa Brahmin, for Vibhisena had come down from Mount Suvela and joined them a short while ago. They embraced and exchanged looks full of the undefinable emotion that passes through the hearts and minds of warriors at such a time. There was sadness there, at the losses of their fallen comrades—for despite their superiority, the bears had sustained losses too, and the Jatarupas had paid a heavy price. There was relief and even joyousness, for they had won the battle. There was guarded wonder, for it was only just approaching noon, and this was only the first day of the first real battle of the war to rival all wars to date. But above all, there was love, and friendship, and camaraderie, and great, indescribable happiness at seeing one another again, and taking comfort in each other's living, breathing presence once more.

Before they could speak a single word, a great shape dropped out of the sky, landing as softly as a feather beside Rama.

'My lord,' Hanuman said, kneeling down to touch the feet of his chosen master. 'I come to bring you news of the war thus far.'

Rama blessed him without protesting overmuch. He still did not enjoy shows of obsequiousness, for he knew how easy it would be for such fealty to turn into a god-like worship, and he was still far too much a mortal creature of flesh and blood to desire to be venerated like a deva. 'Give us your report, my friend. We have had some word from the prince of Kiskindha's fleet-footed couriers, but it is your overview that I long to hear most. Leave out no detail of significance, rather tell us all that is worth telling, but do so as briefly and efficiently as possible, with no formal embellishments or ornate phrasing, for we are still soldiers and the war is only just begun.'

Nearby, a familiar saucy cheeka rang out, as the small, furry shape of Hanuman's half-brother Sakra bounded up the hillock. The little vanar had found employment in the company of the angadiyas and his naturally exuberant energies diverted productively in ferrying messages to and fro. But on sight of his illustrious brother, he still seemed to turn back into the childish monkey-fool vanar he was at heart.

Hanuman shot Sakra a stern look to admonish him for interrupting such an important convention. Undaunted, Sakra remained where he was, seated on his haunches and scratching his left ear with his left hind leg, exactly as a monkey might do, while eavesdropping blatantly upon their conversation. He was ignored by all, by unspoken mutual consent, and with Rama's indulgent blessings.

Hanuman then did as Rama had asked, and narrated the tales of the battle of the canyon and the battle of the valley. He described how, after Mandara-devi's gallant sacrifice, the rakshasa horde was encircled and entrapped within the dense woods by the waiting vanar and bear contingents and made to suffer great losses, in numbers as well as morale. 'They were like proud wolves eager for a feast when they arrived over the rise of that valley, led by one of the greatest champions of Lanka, and they fled southwards back towards their capital with the aspect of whipped curs, leaderless, and whimpering at their losses.'

'And what of the battle in the west?' Rama asked. 'For I have received fewest reports from that front, it being the farthest from us. How fared General Susena, lieutenants Pramathi and Praghasa, their champions the twins, and the rest of the Mandeha vanars?'

Hanuman lowered his snout in a vanar gesture of sadness. 'I regret to say that the general was killed, as was Praghasa, but the twins and Lieutenant Pramathi survived; and while the Mandehas sustained losses amounting to about two in ten of their original count, they held the field. The enemy was sent into retreat and was last seen by me raising a great dust cloud as it returned to the gates of Lanka.'

He paused, and Rama, who had been about to speak a few words of commiseration over the loss of the general and the others fallen on the western front, held back, sensing that the vanar was about to reveal something of great import. 'What is it, Anjaneya? Speak it aloud to me, however trivial a detail it may seem. If it troubles you thus, it is surely not too minor to recount.'

Hanuman looked at him with a puzzled expression in his reddish-brown vanar pupils. 'I do not scent the meaning of it, Rama. But perhaps you, in your infinite wisdom and your great store of knowledge of battle lore, will better comprehend its significance.'

'What is it? What did you see or hear?' Lakshman asked, with less patience than Rama but more gently than usual. He was as pleased by the morning's victories as any of them, his normal impatience tempered by the successes.

Hanuman looked at Rama's brother, then at Rama himself. The bear lord Jambavan and Prince Angad watched him curiously, as did the Kiskindha lieutenant Gavaksa, and the Jatarupa vanar lieutenants Rsabha and Gavya. The Jatarupa lieutenant Gaja had perished on the talons of a lizard-beast on the rampart walls, while other lieutenants had died fighting the creatures on the field below. All present waited with mounting curiosity to hear what Hanuman had to say.

'It was a strange sight, my lord,' he said. 'There were survivors coming from all fronts, beaten and bedraggled and bearing wounded and hurt rakshasas all, gathering before the gates of Lanka. But the gates were kept shut against them. Not a single one of them was permitted to return into the walled city. Rather, when some failed to badger and intimidate the gate guards into opening the gates, and attempted to enter via a sally port while others attempted to climb the walls in sheer desperation, they were thrown off and shoved out with as much violence as might be used against a besieging enemy.' He paused, looking at each of their faces in turn to see if any of them understood this peculiar event any better than he did. 'It was as if Lanka's lord and master would rather leave his armies to die rather than permit them to return unvictorious.'

Lakshman swore softly, using phrases Hanuman did not understand. 'Then they will attack us once again. They are left with no other alternative. They will charge our armies with greater ferocity than before, for now they know they have nothing to lose, and everything to gain. A wounded lion is more dangerous than a sleeping one.'

'A wounded lion is a wounded lion,' Rama replied softly. 'And I do not believe Ravana is so mindlessly cruel that he believes such tactics will enrage his forces into seeking victory where they failed so miserably before.'

'But they did not fail miserably, Rama,' Lakshman argued persistently. 'They failed, yes, but only because we outmanoeuvred them and outwitted them at every turn. Now they are aware of our tactics. Indeed, we have used up all our surprises, and revealed all our forces. Our armies have sustained great losses, perhaps greater than the armies of Lanka in some cases. And while we held the ground we fought on, it was not ground that was valuable in itself. We have yet to march on Lanka and take the city proper, for only then is our goal fully accomplished. When Lanka will not admit its own soldiers back into her fold, and the armies of Ravana remain outside its gates, how can we march on the capital and storm it?’

Jambavan spoke in his quiet rumbling tone. The bear king had wiped off some of the ichor from his snout and features but the stench of the substance still hung about him thickly; yet nobody dared say so to him directly. ‘We are not meant to storm the capital, Rama. That is why the king of rakshasas refuses entry to his own warriors. He is not yet prepared to let us bring the war to him. He wishes to bring the next phase of the war to us.’

The bear king paused, sniffing the air suspiciously. ‘And I would warrant that he is preparing to do so at this very moment.’

Hanuman looked around, suddenly alert. ‘My lord Jambavan speaks truly, Rama! I scent the odour of asura maya in the air. The same fetid stench that issued when Ravana deployed the killing stones last night. He is about to wreak some new sorcery upon us!’

Even as he was finishing, a great cheeka rang out from Sakra. They turned to see the little angadiya leaping up and down in frantic excitement, his paws covering his eyes in terror. Despite covering his face, he still peered out between his furry fingers, and as the attention of the war council was directed at him, he pointed upwards with a single claw, shrieking anew.

They looked up to see what was bothering him. And stared, transfixed, as nightfall descended on them out of a clear noon sky.

King Sugreeva was seated with his lieutenants on the high rim of the canyon, enjoying a moment of idle indulgence, eating a little fruit to replenish his resources, while reviewing the battle’s high points to glean new insights for future reference. He was in the midst of explaining the most effective method for bringing down the large broken-headed mounts that had been used by the rakshasa horde in its first headlong charge, when the day turned dark. He rose to his feet at once, scenting the stench of rakshasa sorcery at large. But his first impulse was to look down at the canyon, where his forces were resting, for fear that the rakshasa horde had somehow regrouped and gained reinforcements and was launching a fresh onslaught.

He did, in fact, see something to make his heart leap into his mouth. But instead of a rakshasa charge, what he saw was a dark cloud, with the texture and appearance of fog, creeping across the ground. As he watched, it entered the canyon, covering the ground with frenetic haste, like smoke billowing before a great wind. But he knew this was no natural fog or smoke, for the wind was still blowing from the east, whereas this unnatural bank of fog-like substance was coming from the south, from the direction of Ravana's capital city.

Then the shouts of his lieutenants caused him to look up at the sky and what he saw there made him almost swallow his heart again out of fear and shock.

In the dense jungle of the valley, Mainda and Dvividā rested on trees, too weary to eat even though their fellows feasted and danced all around them. As inveterate fighters, both had acquired the art of resting at every given chance, and preferred a little respite for their aching bodies to filling their bellies with nourishment. Even with his eyes shut, Dvividā's mind still replayed that brutally brief combat between Mandara-devi and the rakshasa general. A whole battle had passed since, during which he had fought and killed perhaps a dozen of the enemy himself, had survived some very close scrapes and seen too many of his friends and blood-kin killed, but it was that one fight that haunted him still. He knew it would haunt him for as long as he lived, and he would tell and retell it countless times to his fellow vanars, his children, and even his grandchildren and great-grandchildren, for it was the greatest fight he had ever witnessed in his life. That itself was the highest praise a fighter could pay another fighter—to tell that fighter's story instead of his own. He would honour Mandara-devi always, by retelling the great fight she had fought on that dried river bed in Lanka, for by fighting that fight, she had made this battle and this victory possible.

He took the sudden commotion to be some new round of celebration. Some of the more enterprising vanars had found some fermented fruit and were pretending to get intoxicated on it. Such silliness was acceptable after a battle, more so after a victorious battle. But when the shrieking and commotion grew loud enough to compel him to rouse himself from his reverie, he opened one eye, then the other, to see what was occasioning such madness. He saw Mainda stirring drowsily on the branch of the tree beside him.

‘What are they up to now?’ grumbled the older vanar. He had sustained a gash beneath his ribcage that was still oozing blood, but was otherwise unharmed. He raised his snout and peered around. Being on a higher branch than Dvidida, he had a slightly better view. He looked around, but could see nothing that aroused his interest. Then he raised his snout to glance idly at the sky, and saw something that made him freeze.

‘What is it, Mainda?’ Dvidida asked, alerted more by Mainda’s reaction than by the flurry in the camp. The old champion was not given to easy excitability.

‘Mother of vanars,’ Mainda swore, then pointed up at the sky. ‘Our doom is come upon us, Dvidida. Prepare to meet the deva of all the vanar races in the afterworld.’

Dvidida looked up, parting the leaves above his head to peer at the bright blue sky. The first thing he saw was that it was turning slowly black, as if a gigantic cloudbank was creeping across it. The next thing he realised was that it was not a cloudbank at all.

‘General! The sky!’

General Pramathi—for he had been promoted instantly on General Susena’s death—followed his lieutenant’s pointing finger. He was in the midst of taking stock of his losses and standing in the centre of the large grassy declivity where the western army had fought their battle. Tens of thousands of corpses, rakshasa as well as vanar, lay around him, reeking in the noonday sun.

He paused, and looked up.

And froze in horror.

Rama stared in grim consternation as the sky above Lanka grew dark as night. The cause was sorcery, of that he had no doubt. He could see the fog-like darkness creeping across the ground at the same time—except that creeping was too slow a word to describe the speed with which the sorcerous substance was spreading. In moments, the entire hill range, the ghats, and even the mountains that had been so clearly visible only moments ago, were shrouded in a night-like darkness. And soon, he could see the sky would be benighted too. Already the sun was covered by the advancing cloud of blackness that raced across the sky, matching the speed and denseness of the thick, oily smoke-like substance that covered the ground below. In another few moments, the whole land would be plunged into a darkness as dense as the darkest moonless night.

But that was not the thing that gave him pause for anxiety.

What startled him was the other skyborne menace that was approaching from the south. This was much lower than the high cloud that was enveloping the earth, about three or four hundred yards high, the height at which Hanuman usually flew in order to maintain a clear view of the ground below as well as spy out enough of the land ahead. The height at which a flying warrior would choose to fly.

And this dense mass moving at that height was indeed a swarm of flying warriors.

Rakshasas, to be precise. Rakshasas with leathery wings on their backs, flapping with the slow, precise beats of enormous foxbats which they resembled when seen from this distance. Nowhere near as large as the vulture-beast Jatayu had been, but close enough to remind him painfully of his lost friend and ally who had died fighting Ravana in his valiant attempt to hinder Sita's kidnapping.

An army of flying rakshasas, tens of thousands of them, filled the dark sky, coming directly at him.

At the same time, from behind him came a chorus of vanar shrieks and bear howls.

He turned to look at the battlements whence the lizard-beasts had emerged not long before. New enemies were emerging from those crevices now, brought up through the tunnels beneath the ground like their predecessors. They were huge, lumbering beasts, much like rakshasas in body, but with a distinctive feature that he could spy even at this distance. They bore faces almost recognisably familiar, even seen from afar. As he frowned, trying to make out their faces more clearly, the darkness overhead and on the ground engulfed that entire part of the island, and all was blackness.

A deathly silence fell across the world broken only by the sound of countless leathery wings beating the still air. And then, with a sound like thunder clapping in the distance, Ravana unleashed his war upon the forces of Rama.

KAAND 4

ONE

‘Anjaneya. To the skies!’

Hanuman did not need a second order from Rama. He rose like an arrow shot from Lakshman’s bow, expanding his body to a size he judged optimum for fighting the winged rakshasas. Moving up through absolute blackness did not worry him unduly; his vanar senses enabled him to scent his way just as effectively in pitch darkness. The air was thick with the rank odour of the flying beasts, and from the sound of their leathery wings beating the air, he knew they were only moments away from Rama’s position. He set his jaw and flew to meet them, guided through the utter darkness by his vanar senses, determined to ensure that far more of Ravana’s flying warriors would die in the air than reach the ground below alive.

King Sugreeva cursed aloud as the darkness enveloped him and his warriors. He knew he was fortunate to have been standing atop the rise, overlooking the canyon, well placed to see for miles around. In those last brief moments before the world went dark, he glimpsed the rumbling dust cloud raised by the horde approaching from the south, as well as the winged creatures in the sky. Then all vision was blocked out by a darkness blacker than night itself, leaving him staring in frustration.

‘My lord,’ someone called to him in the darkness. ‘Shall we retreat?’

‘Where to?’ he asked rhetorically. For he knew that the other armies would be under attack as well. It would not matter whether he ran this way or that, all around was enemy territory. A stab of sadness, as piercing and cold as a dagger of ice, went through his heart as he realised that all the sacrifice of the Kiskindha vanars in the first battle was in vain. Then he corrected himself: Nothing was ever in vain. Every soldier’s life well spent made possible a future victory.

He did the only thing he could as a good king and a general of Rama: he gave the order to prepare to repel the enemy on both fronts, ground and sky. And then he raised his battered pole, whose point he had taken a moment to taper into a spear-sharp tip, and waited for the charge of the armies of the damned.

From the dimness of the valley forest, the champions Mainda and Dvividā peered up at the sky, benighted as abruptly as if someone had thrown a rug over the world. Despite the blackness, they could still see faintly: the great volcano in the south of the island was emitting a soft glow, invisible in the bright sunlight earlier, but now sufficient to throw a candlelight's worth of illumination upwards, casting faint highlights on anything that caught the light in the sky.

They stared up in wonderment and awe at what their enemy had wrought: would that Mandara-devi had lived to see this—or then again, better that she had not.

A constellation of darkly luminescent eyes and gleaming talons glowed dully like an alien sky filled with bizarre stars and celestial orbs. It reminded Dvividā of the time he had wandered too far into the dreaded Southwoods as a youngun and glimpsed a cluster of eyes reflected back at him by starlight. He had realised at once to his undying dismay that the rumours of a horde of grotesquely malformed asuras dwelling in those deepwoods were not rumours but truth. He shivered and wished he could flee scampering as he had on that long-ago occasion, back to the safety of his tribe. But on this occasion, there was nowhere to flee.

As they waited for the skyborne menace to fall upon them, they grew aware of another sound and scent. A great rumbling vibration filled the valley. They exchanged a look of bared teeth, knowing what that sound and vibration meant. Peering through the murky darkness, they made out the faint blur of movement, enough to deduce the rest.

An army of rakshasas was pouring down the ghats into the valley from all sides, encircling the contingent of Mandara vanars and Kambunara's bears within the forest valley. This time they were the ones trapped and surrounded—not just on all sides, but from above as well.

Angad stared in frustration at the dark field ahead. He could see the shadowy shapes of the creatures emerging from the battlements, could see just enough by the faint glow of the volcano's emission to make out that they were nothing like the lizard-beasts; these were some wholly new breed of rakshasas. How would they fight? What were their points of vulnerability? Did they have any? And what of the creatures above? Even if Hanuman was powerful enough to fight them, there were far too many for him to deal with all at once.

He heard the code-sounds of his angadiyas ringing out across the battlefield as they communicated Rama's terse new orders. He admired Rama's ability to respond so swiftly to such a drastically altered situation, and passed on his own instructions as best as he could, ensuring that Rama's wishes were carried out efficiently, but secretly he wondered if it was possible to outmanoeuvre this move of Ravana's. For it seemed like no battle strategy that the lord of Lanka had unleashed; this seemed like an endgame.

Jambavan's thoughts, despite the yawning disparity between him and the young vanar prince of Kiskindha, were not very different. He swore gruffly as his ember-red eyes, accustomed to seeing in the lightless depths of subterranean caverns, glimpsed the first wave of flying beasts detach themselves from their hovering mates overhead and begin a sharp, plunging dive towards his position. At the same time, the newly emerged rakshasas creeping out from beneath the battlements also began striding forward, seeping across the field like viscous fluid upon a polished surface. Far in the distance, to all points of the compass, he sensed the other forces of dharma also preparing to join weapons with their nemesis in the arcane darkness. Masterfully and magnificently, Ravana had struck back at them with a war game to beat all war games. In his ancient heart, the bear lord knew that this battle just beginning would be the last battle of Lanka. Whoever stood at the end of this clash would be master of the kingdom of rakshasas henceforth.

He snarled and unsheathed his claws. At such a time there was only one thing a warrior of dharma could do. He intended to do it until the last fish-stinking breath left his burly body.

He lifted his snout and roared the challenge of the ancient ones. Around him on the benighted battlefield, the bear army raised their snouts and roared as well, defying any and all who dared to fight against them.

Across the land of rakshasas, the forces of Ravana had come into position, each poised and ready to strike at their prey, like a group of felines marking the chital they would each pounce on in a grazing herd.

There came a pause in the tableau then, as the forces of Rama and Ravana regarded each other, able to see only briefly in the flashes of lightning-like purplish illumination that flickered in the dense black sky-fog, and by the deep-scarlet hellish glow of the volcano at the far southern end of the island.

The creatures flying above Hanuman had slowed their progress to hover in mid-air, flapping their enormous wings slowly enough to maintain their height, without moving in any direction. Their hungry eyes were directed downwards at their enemy, and their beak-like mouths issued shrill cries from time to time, as they waited impatiently to attack. Now, as if receiving some inner command that he could neither scent nor hear nor sense, they issued a unanimous cry of triumph. This painfully ear-piercing shriek was followed by the thunderous flapping of tens of thousands of wings, as they began their murderous descent, breaking off in waves, like the one that Angad had already glimpsed, each group flying in a different tactical trajectory. Hanuman knew he would not be able to stop them all, but he intended to deflect as many as he possibly could before taking the offensive. He had placed his body in such a way that large numbers would have no choice but to attempt to bite and slash and claw their way through him in order to get at their designated targets.

From below, the roar of the bear lord was echoed by the thundering response of the bear army.

The sound gave him new courage and determination. Even as he braced himself for the pain he knew was inevitable, he heard the roars of the rakshasa hordes on the ground rend the air as they began their attack as well.

TWO

Hanuman roared in rage as thousands of razor-sharp beaks and claws tore into his flesh from head to toe. Sharp talons dug into the tender skin around his eyes, seeking to rip open his lids and penetrate the soft orbs of his organs of vision. Clenching his eyes shut, he felt their probing points peck even at his closed lids, felt the pain of that delicate skin being torn and slashed, penetrating through to his eyes themselves, drawing blood. He swiped backhanded, sweeping away scores from his face, some clinging on so fiercely that he tore away his own skin and flesh before they were cast away. He clapped his hands together, smashing a dozen-odd to crumpled gristle. The leathery wings continued to flap even after death, as if governed by a force not of the flesh. Sharp, needle-like talons pierced his chest, his arms, his taut muscled belly, his waist, his legs, even hacked at the makeshift langot, the strip of loin-cloth he had taken to wearing after the mortal fashion. They ripped away his fur in clumps, leaving pinpricks of oozing pain, tore his skin in swatches, needled into his flesh, gnawed on his bones, slashed at his tendons, attempted to tear open his blood vessels ...

Soon, his entire body was one enormous bleeding wound. This was no fight, it was a torture session. Yet he bore the agony of it without a sound of protest—not a sound after that first enraged roar of challenge—and slapped and crushed and battered the beasts, killing them upon his own body like an ordinary vanar might do to bloodsucking insects.

Angad leaped into the fray, slashing at the throat of an oncoming rakshasa. He felt his claws tear at living flesh, felt also the telling spurt of life-fluid, and heard the beast grunt angrily. As he sprang out of the way of its responding blow, dodging it with a hair's breadth of space to spare, he took comfort in the fact that these creatures bled and fought not unlike regular rakshasas. It did not make them easier to fight or kill; it merely made it possible to do so. And right now, possible was all he prayed for. The rest was ultimately up to the devas—and Rama himself.

Then all thoughts, all prayers, were set aside as he gave himself over to the task of fighting for his life, as the battle disintegrated into tens of thousands of individual combats.

King Sugreeva swung his tree in a circling arc, feeling the bones of rakshasas crack and crunch and shatter as he struck them with just enough force to inflict telling damage but not so much that it would halt the swing of the weapon. He relished the feel of the supple, smooth hardwood in the palms of his unfurred fists, thanking the vanar ancestors who had brought him this weapon. He took satisfaction also, as had his son, in knowing that rakshasas were flesh and blood, just like vanars, and could be broken and beaten and killed. These new rakshasas had not the benefit of the mounts that the first attack had; they came on foot, and the same darkness that nearly blinded Sugreeva and his forces also impaired their vision, forcing them to come at the vanar army in the canyon with the customary slow, lumbering gait of rakshasas who had not built up sufficient running momentum. His vanars fought around him, a contingent of veterans from the first battle clustered around their king to offer him support and protection, and the darkness was rent with the screams of comrades and enemies alike.

There were no war cries issued in this dark and fierce battle, no howls of exultation. Only a desperate fighting that stole lives and shattered organs and bones, crippling and maiming and severing limbs from bodies. It was the brutal business of war, with the dark deva of death kept constantly busy slipping his invisible thread-noose around the souls of dying creatures and slipping them into his burgeoning sack to be carried back to the netherworld on his black buffalo mount. Yet Yamaraj himself might have paused a moment to marvel at this strange, silent clash beneath a sorcerously benighted sky, where great armies fought one another in a strange, doomed, desperate struggle to the finish.

A trio of vanars before Sugreeva succumbed to a new onslaught of arriving rakshasas, grunting softly with effort as they dispatched one of his most beloved lieutenants—who also happened to be his sister's son—with a heart-rending liquid gush of bodily fluids. His nephew Kaharimal died silently, his body torn nearly in two, only yards from Sugreeva. And the vanar king of Kiskindha grieved for his lost blood-kin the only way a warrior could, by raising his tree and dealing a great deadly blow to the offending rakshasa. The beast collapsed beside his vanar victim, his misshapen skull shattered by the tree, brains oozing out to mingle with the rent flesh of Sugreeva's favourite nephew.

The champions Mainda and Dvividā fought on with bitter rage, both for the honour of their fallen tribe-goddess and for Rama's cause, for the two were inextricable in their minds now. The valiant vanars in the forest had a great advantage over their enemies in that they were in their natural environment, whereas rakshasas, having lived in more civilised communities and cities, were no longer as accustomed to forest-fighting as their kind had once been, millennia ago.

The bears had this advantage as well, and the darkness actually served to conceal them. Oftentimes, a rakshasa would strike out at what he perceived to be a bear, only to have his blade strike the hard bark of a tree; before he could free the stuck blade, a dark, towering shape he had mistaken for a tree would lumber forward, claws slashing from side to side, ending his confusion once and for all.

Kambunara enjoyed the business of slaughter for a while, as his dark fur disguised him well in the pitch black forest. Rakshasas ran into trees as they attempted to charge him, and he ran into them, wreaking havoc. A butcher in a sheep pen.

But as time went by, and the battle wore on relentlessly, ever-increasing numbers of the enemy kept pouring in from over the valley's ridges, to replace those who had been slaughtered. The bears and vanars began to grow weary, for how long could one fight without rest or nourishment, but they knew that retreat was not an option, and so they fought on grimly. The forest floor, dried and leaf-strewn in this autumnal season, became a morass of wet gelid corpses and body parts and fluids. Soon, the bears were standing on corpses and fighting, while the vanars, swinging from tree to tree to tree, began to find even the limbs of the trees growing slick and sticky as vanars before them clutched them with blood-spattered palms and blood-dipped tails. The forest turned into a grisly abattoir as the long night that was in fact a day, wore on relentlessly.

Even Jambavan's great heart-stopping roar fell silent as the battle wore on. The bear king's position was inundated with the flying rakshasas. There was no longer any separation between the vanar and bear armies, as both kinds intermingled, fighting shoulder to shoulder—or bear hip to vanar shoulder, to be more exact— and combining their separate skills to maximise their killing efficiency. But the enemy had a greater advantage, dropping soldiers from the air as well as sending them sweeping across the ground. The flying rakshasas, almost as dark as the sorcerous night itself, appeared out of nowhere, snatching vanars and carrying them high, tossing them from one to another, tearing them open in mid-air. Many vanars, once tossed, twisted and turned to slash the wings of their skyborne abductors, causing the creatures to falter or fall out of the sky to crash on the ground below, often landing on warriors of both sides. The vanars in the air died one way or another, either by falling, or by being torn apart by the flying beasts. And a steady spatter of blood fell from the darkness, like the ghoulish monsoon that fell year round in the hellish realms of naraka-lok.

Jambavan fought both the ground rakshasas and the air ones, sometimes slashing upwards to tear the throats of swooping attackers, or grabbing a wingtip, ignoring the talons that dug into his already bleeding palms, then tearing the beast in two by ripping it down the middle like he might tear a palm frond. He kicked at oncoming ground attackers, using his lower claws to stab their groins and emasculate them. Those that came close enough to fall upon him, he bit at savagely, chomping through horned hide, muscle and bone in a single clean clenching of his mighty jaws. Around him the biggest and fiercest of the bears fought with similar frenzy, each one killing dozens, even scores, before ultimately succumbing to wounds too terrible to recover from and too numerous to count. He sensed rather than saw many old friends, lovers, blood-kin and tribe-kith fall one by one, until he began to realise that this was a battle that would end only with the deaths of them all, vanars and bears and rakshasas, all together. So be it. He would make sure to tote up a butcher's bill so great that even Ravana would marvel at how a single bear's life could cost so many rakshasa ones. He bit through the throat of a rakshasa bird-beast that had landed on his back, tearing into his shoulders viciously, while slashing a ground rakshasa with his lower right paw and decapitating a third with his upper left paw, all in a one-two-three sequence of actions. He had long since lost count of how many of the enemy he had downed, but it would number well over a hundred. And the battle was still young.

The engine of war ground its minders into bone and gristle. Nothing could stay its course, no force could give it pause. The leaders of both sides fell silent, needing every ounce of their waning energies merely to survive. Many died, or were horribly wounded and struggled on pitifully till they were overcome with particularly savage ferocity, for rakshasas considered the consumption of an enemy leader's organs to be a vitaliser. And to consume them while the leader was still living was even more precious.

Thus, the terrible, near-silent slaughter raged on all day and well into the evening. Above the sorcerous fog-cloud that enveloped the island, the sun traversed the sky and dipped into the west, the denizens of the ocean lived and loved, mated and nursed, and wondered at the carnage that was evident even to them, for all knew of Rama's war and Ravana's reign of terror. The greybacks, who had worked so hard to bring the armies of dharma across the ocean, now immersed in the deep, cold waters of the northern sea which they required in order to sustain their enormous weight and bulk, knew of the carnage that raged in Lanka, if not the specific details of each battle and fight, and wept tears that were lost in the vast teardrop of brine itself.

The birds of the land deserted the country, terrified by the slaughter that raged below, the unnatural beasts that swarmed the skies, and the dark nothingness that obscured both land and sky. They flew to other climes, cawing and honking and squawking plaintively at having lost their homes. They landed on the mainland, on the tsunami-ravaged shores, and settled in the forests bordering the ocean in great multitudes, a million squabbles breaking out with their mainland cousins, but most quickly resolved as all understood that this was a temporary migration. Or so they hoped. For who truly knew what would transpire in Lanka next? Who could say that the two great hosts warring on that darkling land would not simply massacre one another and leave the island-kingdom bloodwashed and unpopulated, a ghost country haunted by the spirits of countless departed of both sides? Being birds, they did not understand the ways of mortals or asuras, and could only wrap their wings around their trembling bodies and wait for this season of death to pass.

For the first hour-watch of the battle, Rama and Lakshman stood side by side on the hillock immediately overlooking the northern battlefield, their bows working furiously. The faint glow of the volcano from below and the occasional flickers of sorcerous purple light in the heart of the fog-cloud above limned the silhouettes of the flying rakshasas sufficiently for them to shoot by. They loosed arrow upon arrow in unending succession, dropping scores of beasts from the sky. Those that came close enough to dare to lunge at Rama were dispatched with double fury by Lakshman, who shot unerringly at nictitating eyes, snarling mouths, or bared throats, driving these impudent ones back. Even so, as time passed and the beasts' frenzy to kill these two warriors who were responsible for downing so many of their kind intensified, the onslaught grew to impossible proportions. At one point, the air above them was so thick with flapping wings, flashing talons and darkly gleaming eyes, they seemed shrouded in a cloud of their own. The vanars and bears on the field below glanced up at their mortal leaders and were awestruck at the number of the enemy surrounding the two Ayodhyans. But no matter how furiously the enemy tried to get at them, their fleeting arrows kept them at bay. They faced greater danger from the gore and offal splashed on their faces and bodies from the wounded and dying winged beasts. The hillock around them was littered with corpses of the creatures, their wings continuing to stir and jerk spasmodically even after the beasts themselves were dead.

All this was possible because of the great store of arrows that they possessed. Cut and shaped and polished with loving care by a special contingent of vanars under Lakshman's supervision, back on the mainland. Yet no number, however great, could last for ever. And so, as the hour-watch passed into another hour-watch, and then yet another, and the number of their victims grew from tens to scores to hundreds and thousands, that great supply finally began to dwindle.

When Lakshman knew that they were on the last bushel, he called out to Rama above the noise of flapping wings and strangely silent attacks, only the involuntary grunts and sharp squeals of the arrow-struck breaking the deathly pall that lay over them. 'Rama, you must use your powers now.'

Still Rama continued to loose arrows and down enemies.

Lakshman called out again. 'Rama, the gifts,' he said this time, referring to the gifts of Anasuya.

Still Rama did not heed him and went on firing arrows with the same methodical precision.

Finally, Lakshman dropped his bow, unsheathed his sword with one hand, and gripped Rama's shoulder with the other. The corded muscle was covered by the slimy blood of the winged beasts. 'Rama, it is time. Use your weapons,' he pleaded insistently.

As he spoke, he used his sword to continue fighting the beasts, for their onslaught had not slowed a whit even hours after the first wave. Only for brief moments did their attacks diminish as new reinforcements arrived in the sky above, lined up to form a substantial new wave, and then attacked. Or at times when the giant Hanuman succeeded in flaying a greater number of the enemy, shattering their attempts at forming a wave and dissipating their numbers before they could fall on those below.

Rama reached the last of his arrows and resorted to his own sword. Blades flashing, they continued to kill as many birdrakshasas as before. Now the creatures were able to come closer to their targets, but as in any attack, where a great number attack a single or two closely clustered warriors, the space of access was limited and so only a certain number could come at the two brothers at once, and even these often got their wings tangled with one another's, or clashed in their eagerness to be the one to attack the mortal yodhas. In fact, this resulted in a different challenge and possibly a somewhat reduced one, for Rama and Lakshman had now only to wait till the creatures approached within sword-range and then lash out with well-aimed sweeps, lopping off crucial parts of the beasts. The still-flapping wings, hovering in mid-air for precious moments after the death of the creatures they bore, obstructed those behind and above, and reduced access to the two brothers still further.

Rama still did not respond to Lakshman's pleas.

'Bhai,' he shouted, more urgently this time. 'You must use your weapons, or our cause will be lost.'

A sudden change in the atmosphere around them distracted Lakshman. He slashed at an oncoming rakshasa, its snarling face disappearing in a small explosion of blood and shattered bone as his sword flashed in the near darkness. Then he glanced around, trying to make out the source of the odd disturbance.

THREE

Sugreeva thought his eyes were playing tricks on him. The rakshasas that had been attacking them so relentlessly for so many hour-watches began to recede, then faded away altogether. In moments, he was standing alone in the centre of the canyon, with no foes left to fight. He lowered his tree suspiciously, looking around, then above. Surely this was some devious new stratagem of the enemy. But all around him he saw vanars fall still, peering around in confusion as they found no rakshasas left alive to fight.

He sensed movement nearby and at once raised his pole, ready to strike. What he saw instead gave him pause.

He saw the mangled body of his nephew, barely recognisable now, rise up from the ground where it had fallen. The two halves of the body were barely able to cohere together, and the unfortunate young vanar's internal organs were all clearly exposed, most brutally severed. Yet this unlikely amalgam of body parts and limbs was rising to its feet and lurching forward with slow, drunken steps. As Sugreeva watched with mounting horror, all around him, vanars who had fallen in battle began to rise slowly, their lifeless eyes black with a soulless light that he glimpsed by the faint glow of illumination that had expanded across the world this past hour-watch. Across the canyon, his stunned warriors stared around them in shock at this bewildering development.

The corpses of his dead vanar soldiers were coming back to life.

Except that 'coming to life' was an insufficient phrase to describe what was happening. 'Regaining the illusion of life' would be more accurate. For that was all that these risen corpses were, hollow shells mimicking the actions and movements of living creatures. Yet this only served to make them the more ghoulish, for to see one's comrades, fellows-in-arms, blood-kin, kith, rise up from the dead, mangled and horribly disfigured, was worse than seeing the most grotesque rakshasa charging on a kumbhasur. Sugreeva swung around, staring with disbelief as the entire canyon was filled with the shakily rising and lurching figures of dead vanars revived to life. This was Ravana's sorcery at work, of course, that went without saying. But to what end? What did he hope to achieve by reanimating these mangled corpses?

In a moment he had his answer. The lurching, lumbering form of Kaharimal stumbled towards him, its nearly severed head tilted at a bizarre angle, its midriff cut open to reveal every vital organ. And its arms, Kaharimal's arms, reached out towards his uncle Sugreeva, as if seeking his blessing. But there was no mistaking the curled menace of those claws, nor the snarl that opened the dead vanar's mouth to reveal its fangs in a dead black maw. Still unwilling to accept this evidence of his senses, Sugreeva allowed the moving corpse to come within reach of him.

Suddenly, belying the clumsy slowness with which it had moved till now, the corpse lunged at him, the twisted head and hacked torso moving at ludicrous angles as the creature attempted to attack the king of Kiskindha.

Sugreeva recoiled in disgust as the creature's claws raked his arms, peeling off a thin strip of fur, and those snapping jaws attempted to close upon any part of his anatomy they could reach.

Moving with mechanical dexterity, his heart sinking with dismay, he brought his tree-spear up with a swift efficient action, cracking the reaching corpse's arms like sticks, then shoving it back with enough force to send it tumbling over and over, until it landed in a heap of confused limbs and spilling vitals. Yet, after a moment, these mangled parts began stirring relentlessly and once again the whole mass struggled to move forward, to repeat its mindless attack upon its own kith and kin.

Across the canyon, thousands of dead vanar corpses were attempting the same thing.

The onslaught of flying rakshasas died away as suddenly as it had begun.

Rama peered up at the dark sky suspiciously. He could see Hanuman's outline, writhing and twisting as it battled the beasts in the air—then he saw the giant vanar's movements slow, as even his antagonists dissipated. The few remaining winged ones flew back southwards whence they had come. In moments, the sky was as empty as if they had never been there at all. Only Hanuman's hovering figure, and the mounds of corpses all around on the hillock, and the gore and gristle coating his own body were indisputable proof that the battle had occurred.

‘Rama, look.’

He turned to see Lakshman peering down at the battlefield below. It was still relatively dark, but there was now sufficient faint illumination to see by, both from the volcano in the south, which appeared to be growing more agitated by the moment, and from the flashes of sorcerous purple-tinged lightning which flickered in the fog-cloud above.

He stared at what seemed to be an impossible tableau.

Unable to accept the evidence of his senses, he asked Lakshman, ‘What is it?’

‘The dead,’ Lakshman replied grimly. ‘Our dead are returning to life.’

And Rama looked again, and saw that it was so.

Mainda and Dvidida wondered at the disappearance of the rakshasas. Below them on the corpse-scattered floor of the forest, Kambunara wondered as well, sniffing a strange new scent that made no sense at all. It smelled like living dead bear, which was impossible.

Then, two tree trunks away from him, a bear he had known well and loved dearly, and whom he had seen downed after killing at least a score of rakshasas, began to regain her feet slowly. She used the tree before her to raise herself, like a sick bear would. He could hear her talons rasping on the bark of the tree, and the sound of her heavy nether paws cracking the paw bones of a dead rakshasa underfoot, but he could not hear her breathing, even though the forest had fallen deathly silent. He could not smell her breath either, nor the odour of her effusions. What he could smell was the stench of death, but mingled with another riper, fetid odour that was like a mockery of a living bear's smell. Like flesh that was partly roasted and deliciously fragrant and partly rotted and worm-riddled.

She turned, twisting her snout from side to side, as if seeking something out. But she neither sniffed nor looked with her eyes, for he could sense that they were both stuck shut by a great quantity of blood that had washed on her from the rakshasa who had dealt her the killing blow and whom she had pulled down with her own claws, embracing in death. Then, as if sensing him out, she began lurching in his direction. With a sickened heart, he understood what was happening. Moments later, when he was forced to defend himself against her clumsy yet heartbreakingly determined attack, he saw her rise yet again—and again, and again—and he knew that nothing that Ravana had done before or would do after this could be worse than this one act of sorcery. For what could possibly be worse than being pitted against your own beloved comrades and forced to fight them for your survival?

Across Lanka, vanars and bears found themselves faced with the same situation. As their rakshasa foes vanished, retreated, withdrew, they were replaced by their own fallen dead. It was not that this new enemy was particularly proficient or dangerous—their mangled condition and lurching, mindless movements made them easy enough to repel—rather that they could not be stopped and kept on coming and coming. For how could you kill something that was already dead? And there was also the fact that the armies of Rama had no stomach to fight their own kind, that too their own kith and kin and warrior comrades. They fought, to survive, but there was no heart in their fighting.

The battlefield was filled with lurching, mindless shadows battling improbably with Jambavan's bears and Angad's vanars. Lakshman turned away from this heart-sickening sight and faced Rama.

'My brother,' he said in a voice of steel. 'This time you will not let our followers be massacred. You will use the dev-astras and turn the tide of this war. I ask you this not to save myself or even you. I ask you this in the name of dharma.'

'But what good will it do to use them now?' Rama asked. 'Against our own dead?'

Lakshman made a sound of exasperation. 'This is a ploy of Ravana. After this round, he will send another wave of new foes against us. And he will keep sending more and more surprises and shocks to us, until our great armies are whittled down to nothing, and our spirit is broken.'

'We can withstand everything he throws at us,' Rama said. 'We can win this war honestly, without the use of maha-shakti.'

Lakshman shook his head. 'This war can never be won honestly, Rama. Can you not see that? How can it, when Ravana himself uses asura maya against us?'

A rush of wind indicated the arrival of Hanuman. The vanar was still in the process of reducing himself as he landed—he was twice his usual size when he bowed to Rama with a look of some agitation. 'Rama, I fear Ravana has some new terror he plans to unleash upon us. Our forward armies are in no condition to withstand yet another sustained assault.'

Rama was shocked at Hanuman's condition. The vanar's body seemed to be one continuous open wound, the skin flayed as if it had been peeled off meticulously by some cruel interrogator. But the very agitation and energy of his friend reassured him; if Hanuman could be concerned about others, then he himself must surely be capable of continuing. 'Yes, my friend, we are aware of Ravana's latest sorcerous trick. He uses our own dead against us.'

'Nay, my lord, I speak not of that. I speak of the new attack that he is preparing to launch at us from the gates of Lanka.'

‘New attack?’ Lakshman stared at Hanuman. ‘What have you seen?’

‘When the winged creatures retreated, I flew after them, thinking to bring down as many as I could. I pursued them to the gates of the city, where I saw a great new host assembled, led by the rakshasa who bested me on my earlier trip to Lanka, Ravana’s own son, the one named Indrajit. He was so named because of his once legendary defeat of the king of devas, Lord Indra himself. Do not take this new challenge lightly, Rama. He wields the weapons of the gods themselves, the legendary dev-astras. No living being can survive his assaults. On that day when I permitted him to ensnare me, if I had chosen to resist I cannot say for certain that I would have survived the encounter. And I can say with absolute certainty now that if he unleashes dev-astras at our forces, they will be slaughtered to the last vanar and bear.’

Both of them looked at Rama. He felt the intensity of their gaze like the heat of the noonday sun upon himself. He noted that Hanuman’s wounds had already begun to heal and close: the vanar was possessed of the power to heal himself, of course, although that did not diminish the agony he would have suffered when those wounds were inflicted. Vibhisena had spoken of Ravana’s elder son with as much fearful awe as he had of their brother Kumbhakarna. Hanuman was the only one who had actually faced and fought Indrajit. If he said the rakshasa was formidable, then he must be so.

‘Very well,’ Rama said quietly. ‘I agree with you, Lakshman. It is time to use the powers vested in me through the grace of the devas.’

Reaching within himself, he shut his eyes and called upon the latent mahashakti that resided in him, waiting for this moment.

In a flash of blinding blue light he was possessed of the Bow of Vishnu and the Arrow of Shiva.

He spoke a single mantra, taught to him and Lakshman by Brahmarishi Vishwamitra at Siddh-ashrama on a day some fourteen years ago. It felt like a past lifetime now. The instant he spoke the shloka, the Arrow blazed with a fierce electric light that crackled like dry leaves snapping in a flash fire. He aimed the Arrow directly overhead, bowing his head as he continued to focus his energies inwardly, drawing on the vast store of Brahman shakti that infused his being, calling it and pouring it into the Arrow. With a final shloka uttered, he loosed the Arrow, setting the night ablaze with light as it rose, flaming, and illuminated the sky and land for miles, then leagues, and then yojanas as it rose higher and higher. Finally, the Arrow reached the apogee of its flight and hung still, crackling and sparkling in the air with a light more intense than the sun. Then it vanished in a great flash, compelling anyone and everyone, including Rama himself, to blink once. When Rama opened his eyes again he saw that the fogs of sorcerous darkness laid down by Ravana had been dispelled completely, and Lanka was returned to its normal state once more. Across the island-kingdom, the resurrected dead, vanars and bears, collapsed lifelessly and were returned to their state of corpsehood, this time never to rise again. It was now late evening, for the day had passed in the course of the long fighting, and the sun was low in the western horizon, casting long shadows. But it was natural and the air of sorcery had been dispelled, and everyone breathed freely again, sighing with relief. For all knew at once that this was Rama's shakti at work.

Upon the hillock, Rama looked at Hanuman, whose body had almost completed its process of self-healing. As he raised his eyes to the vanar's face, he saw a deep gash upon Hanuman's cheek and forehead close and then smooth out until the skin appeared as if it had never been cut at all.

'Anjaneya,' he said. 'Expand yourself and carry us to the gates of Lanka, my friend. Let our forces be informed of our intentions and begin moving northwards as well. It is time to take this war to our enemy's gate and see if Ravana has the courage to end what he began back in the aranya of Panchvati.'

FOUR

'They come,' Ravana said, his heads grinning and nodding with almost unanimous pleasure—only one exception on the extreme left-hand side of his rack appeared to be smacking his lips and drooling as if famished, staring down at the vast array of savouries that lined the enormous plinth before which its owner sat. The king of rakshasas was feeding himself, and perhaps that head had not received sufficient victuals as yet. Almost as if aware of this, he picked up a leg of some Lankan fowl, dripping with juices, and fed it to the hungry head, which wolfed down chunks of roasted flesh ravenously. Each of Ravan's six hands continued to eat and gesture and do various other things.

With one hand, he gestured with a taloned finger and the image projected upon the far wall of the enormous chamber sharpened and grew in definition, becoming so clear that Mandodhari thought she could almost see the wounds on the giant vanar as he flew carrying the two mortal warriors on his shoulders. But then a diagonal slash on the vanar's neck seemed to fade, and she wondered if that was the result of the image's imperfection or Rama's sorcery. For she knew now that the Prince of Ayodhya was truly a master of sorcery on a par with her own husband, or how else would his army of monkey-men and bear-beasts have been able to withstand the great military might of the rakshasa nation for this long?

The great hall of Ravana's new palace gleamed with polished black surfaces, intricate sculptures, great hangings and works of art, vaulting facades, elaborate pillars, winding stairways, the whole a veritable cornucopia of architectural marvels. And to think this had all been raised in the course of a single night.

Mandodhari had still not recovered from the destruction of fourteen years of hard work by that wretched vanar spy, and would always miss the pristine, alabaster Lanka that she herself had designed and raised while Ravana lay in the thrall of Rama's sorcerous Brahman stone like a fly in amber.

But she could not deny that this newly renovated Lanka was beautiful too, albeit in a more hedonistic, more classical rakshasa style. That, after all, was Ravana's taste as opposed to her own. He preferred the ancient asura ways in all things—including boudoir acts. That was why she had not permitted him into her bed for perhaps half a millennium and no longer cared what he did and with whom in his palace of pleasures—which place, she had no doubt, he had resurrected as well, and decorated with even more sinful luxury and diabolic splendour.

She had finally reconciled her differences with Ravana, understanding late in their long marital accord that he was what he was, a destroyer of worlds and a rapist of civilisations. As long as she retained the dignity that befitted the queen of the realm and the stature of the mistress of Lanka, and he did not interfere in her governance of the people and their culture, she couldn't care less if he invaded the cities of the devas again and raped every devi in swarga-loka. It was simply what he did, unpleasant and distasteful as it was, and she could not change it, so why should she waste her energy trying?

Besides, those he targeted usually merited their fate in some fashion. Take this upstart Rama Chandra for instance, and his hypocritical, rakshasi-murdering wife Sita. He had undoubtedly ravished their cousin Supanakha, encouraged his brother to partake of her womanly fruits as well, and then spurned her. When the whoring creature—for Mandodhari did not delude herself that Supanakha was an angel of virtue—had foolishly demanded that Rama, having bedded her, should now wed her, she had been mutilated and nearly murdered by the brothers. That was the rape and humiliation that had sparked off this whole war, after all, for even after the massacre of his forces at Mithila and numerous other provocations, Ravana had still retained enough self-will not to respond to Rama's devilish challenges. She had seen for herself how, after his resurrection with the aid of Supanakha, he had resolved to live a new, quieter life of consolidation and repair, culture and development, rather than conquest and ravage. But Rama, curse his mortal avarice, had not accepted that. Exiled after causing his own father's untimely demise, humiliating his clan-mother Kaikeyi, driving his own wet-nurse Manthara first to madness then to death, and having murdered rakshasas by the thousands in the aranya wildernesses in order to allow his mortal rishis and sages to practise their vile cult, performing forced conversions of the local tribal folk, he had hit upon this scheme to invade Lanka. She believed now that Ravana had been brilliantly manipulated by Rama himself, who had used his own wife as bait to lure Ravana to the forests of Panchvati, and once seduced by the mortal temptress, Ravana had been cajoled into bringing her back to Lanka with him, thinking he would be freeing her from Rama's yoke by doing so. And having engineered this whole thing himself, Rama then cried 'Rape' and 'Kidnapping' and used these wanton lies to muster the support of the vanars of Kiskindha and the bears of the Himalayan cavelands.

And now his manipulations, schemes and sorcery had brought him to the gates of Lanka.

Her blood boiled as she watched the image projected on the far wall of the chamber, a vaulting fifty feet high and seventy feet wide. The vanar spy landed on the open field before the walls of Lanka, placing his mortal passengers gently on the ground. She squinted in disbelief and saw that the vanar's wounds were fully vanished now, as if they had been healed fully in his brief passage through the air. Surely that was sorcery of the highest order. She could not help but marvel at the mortal's command of asura maya. How ingenious and devious, to parade about like a soldier of dharma and pristine virtue, while in fact using the blackest arts to accomplish his every desire. Finally, it seemed, Ravana had found a worthy opponent in this Rama Chandra.

Now she could hardly wait to see his bestial armies routed and Rama himself torn to shreds by Ravana. Or, the Devi willing, by her own son Indrajit. For it was she this time who had suggested that their eldest scion be sent out to destroy the invaders.

Ravana smiled around a mouthful of roast flesh at the back of Mandodhari's head. For once, his prissy wife was wholly supportive of his actions and decisions. He could read her innermost thoughts and was pleased at the reluctant but unrepentant espousal of his decisions, as well as her wholehearted antagonism towards Rama. Finally, he mused, he had everything he desired in the palm of his hand. A Lanka occupied solely by rakshasas, with no other asura races to share the kingdom's past spoils or future victory; the mortal woman Sita in his possession; his arch-nemesis Rama at his gates, literally inviting his own death; and more maha-shakti than he had ever been able to summon up, a veritable volcano of power waiting to be utilised as he deemed fit.

Why was it, he wondered idly, quaffing off three separate wine goblets at once, that things always seemed to achieve a perfect state of bliss just before the end?

Supanakha milled around the crowded square before the city gates, weaving expertly between the hoofed nether limbs of the hordes of Lankan citizens and soldiers alike—there was little difference really, since every rakshasa was considered a soldier from birth, the only division being between those who were enlisted and provided armour and arms and sent out to fight, or kept back to farm or harvest or store or serve or perform any one of the relatively lower grade tasks in the country’s social hierarchy, for the supreme varna of any rakshasa was the varna of warrior.

She had spent the past hours on the ramparts of the city, and then on the rooftops, watching as much of the progress of the war as she could glimpse or glean without actually venturing out upon the battlefields, stealing back into the palace from time to time to watch Ravana’s constantly unspooling sorcerously projected images of various battles and clashes.

But she had tired of those sorcerous projections wherein everything seemed so immediate and real and yet was so false and ephemeral. Someone, a court wag and self-appointed prophet had remarked idly in her ear that some day in the distant future people would watch such magical projections as entertainment. She had replied that they would all have to be possessed of brains like potatoes and a complete lack of life force in order to sit idle and simply be content to watch life unfolding upon a giant screen instead of participating fullbloodedly in the business of life themselves. That had silenced the wag.

She watched as Indrajit issued a few last instructions to his generals and commanders, then stepped up to the cupola of his war chariot. Not a handsome man, like his younger brother, curse his untimely demise, Indrajit nevertheless possessed a magnificent personality at such times. He looked like the great warrior he was, formidable and indestructible, cruel and relentless. She licked her chops and promised herself that after this battle, she would be the first of Indrajit’s legendary celebratory ‘conquests’—except of course, that she would be the one conquering, not being conquered! She had learned a great deal of sexual art in Ravana’s erstwhile palace of pleasures and it would be delicious to pass it on to the warrior prince of Lanka.

Well, cousin, are you prepared to go to war now?

She almost leaped out of her skin. Scanning the crowd around her without finding any trace of that familiar ten-headed form, she realised that Ravana was up to his old tricks again. Mindspeaking. She hated it when he did that, intruding into the private recesses of her thoughts.

But you do love intrusions, don't you, cousin dearest? Or let me rephrase that: You enjoy being penetrated, whether it's your mind or your—

‘What is it?’ she snarled, startling a group of diggaja-rakshasas before her.

I come to invite you to join me in viewing the battle from a more comfortable place.

‘I’m tired of watching your projections,’ she grumbled. ‘I want to see and hear and smell things first-hand.’

And so you shall. You can even join in the fray if you like. As I promised you would be able to.

She frowned, peering through the cluster of diggajas who had moved away nervously after recognising the famous lust-mad cousin of their king. A commotion broke out suddenly, which she ignored. ‘Indrajit is already in his chariot, ready to ride out. Perhaps I should hop on with him and hitch a ride.’

He would run his sword through you—penetrate you—the instant you leaped up on that platform. He rides with no one, as you well know.

She sniffed. That was true. Indrajit fought alone, with no charioteer or archer, or even the usual protective circle of chariots that most commanders used to shield themselves in battle. ‘Then how?’

Look up.

She looked up and saw the Pushpak hovering overhead. Ravana’s ten-headed visage leaned over the gleaming golden balustrade of the celestial vehicle and flashed multiple moustached and clean-faced grins down at her.

As they hovered high above the southern plains of Lanka, the setting sun filling the sky with streaks of crimson and scarlet and the ominous deep orange shade of fresh heart's blood, Rama and Lakshman looked down and saw hordes of rakshasas milling about outside the looming stone ramparts and battlements of the capital city. The gates were closed to them, Hanuman had said before, and it appeared that they had remained closed.

What manner of king would bar his war-weary soldiers from returning to the safety of their own city? Was this how Ravana ruled his kingdom and ran his army? Surely it could not continue for long thus. No wonder he required such great mastery of asura maya; only unnatural power could enable such a king to rule.

Rama looked down from his perch on Hanuman's shoulder and saw the last of his own forces arriving at a brisk pace, taking up position beside the other armies that had already arrived. The contingent of bears that had been with Kambunara in the valley were assembled here; Jambavan's far larger contingent would follow shortly, but by another route. All those who had been summoned had arrived and were lined up in formation, maintaining the disciplined presentation that they knew Lakshman and he preferred, despite the terrible, heartbreaking losses they had sustained and the grinding battles they had fought this seemingly endless day. Rama's heart ached as he estimated that perhaps three or four in ten had been lost already in the bitter fighting of the day, and virtually all those who remained fit enough to fight nevertheless sported some mark of injury or wound. That was further testimony to the indomitable morale of his warriors.

In case he needed further confirmation, as Hanuman descended with him and Lakshman, a great volley of cheers rose from the weary dust-and-blood lined throats of his brave soldiers. The sentiments were familiar, the words oft repeated, but the enthusiasm displayed in their chanting was what roused him and moved him almost to tears. As Hanuman touched ground and bent down low enough for his two passengers to alight, the lusty chant reached a crescendo before dying down out of respect to their leader.

Rama exchanged a glance with Lakshman and saw that even his stout-hearted brother had a shine in his eyes. This time it was Rama who reached out and squeezed Lakshman's tautly muscled shoulder.

'You were right, Lakhan,' he said, resorting to the diminutive used by some of the vanar tribes, who found the 'ksh' sound in Lakshman's name impossible to pronounce. 'I owe it to these brave warriors to employ the dev-astras now. In fact, it is for their sake that I released that astra earlier. That missile did not merely dispel the sorceries of Ravana and undo the reanimation of our dead that his maya had achieved, it also infused each and every one of our soldiers with a share of our own Brahman mahashakti, creating for them an invisible kavach, a shield as it were, that will protect them the next time Ravana unleashes some new sorcery.'

Lakshman nodded thoughtfully. 'It will make them invulnerable?'

'Nay,' Rama corrected. 'It cannot guard them against honest weapons and natural violence. That they must defend themselves against by using their own skills and strength. The astra only protects them from the use of other astras, shakti, or any kind of sorcery. Such as I am certain Ravana will deploy, for he seems desperate now and at his wits' end.'

Lakshman glanced in the direction of the capital city. The gates were still closed. 'I am not as certain of that as you are, Rama. I do not think him to be at wits' end, but desperate, quite possibly. We have given him stiffer resistance than he expected.' He sighed. 'But he has also dealt us some telling blows.' He gestured at the forces assembled behind them on the flat southern plain of Lanka. 'Look at how many we have lost. And this is only the second day of the war. I wonder if any of us will leave Lanka alive.'

'Perhaps not,' Rama said. 'But if we leave, we shall certainly not leave unvictorious.'

Both fell silent then as a great commotion broke out among the hordes milling about before the gates of the rakshasa capital. As they watched, the looming thirty-yard high wooden gates, each three yards thick and worked by a hundred rakshasas apiece, groaned open by degrees. They waited to see what would emerge.

FIVE

Sita was barely in control of her senses, doubting everything she saw or heard or felt. Her wits reeled and her consciousness flickered like a guttering candle in a dancing breeze. Had Ravana truly come to fetch her from the Ashoka grove, inviting her to come aboard his golden flying chariot and brought her here? Why? Did he wish her to witness yet another of his demonstrations of sorcery and power? She had had quite enough of those ... effects, for want of a better word. She wished only to be left alone, meditating quietly until Rama came and fetched her, releasing her from this unending tyranny. She wanted only that her ordeal should end, and end soon.

She sensed the familiar churning of her insides as the Pushpak rose, carrying its occupants aloft, and clutched the sickeningly warm golden rod beside her seat for support. She hated herself for showing even that much weakness, but she had no wish either to fall or to lose the meagre contents of her stomach, that nutrition which she had reluctantly consumed only for the sake of the unborn lives she bore. She held on tightly until the vertiginous sensation passed, and only when she was certain that the vahan had ceased its upward flight did she allow her eyes to slowly flutter open.

She saw Ravana standing at the prow of the vehicle, facing outwards like any general examining his troops. She saw that vile shape-shifting yaksirakshasi hybrid, Supanakha, crouched upon the balustrade beside her cousin, staring down as well. And she was aware that there was another gallery on the celestial vehicle, where she dimly recalled having glimpsed Mandodhari and various ministers of the Lankan court earlier; but that was a lower section of the Pushpak. On this uppermost gallery there were only the three of them. She realised that she was in the open air and a weak, warm evening sun was lighting her face and upper body on the right side. In the distance, she could see the horizon and the ocean, turned blood-red by the setting sun. The air was fragrant with the ripe, rich odours of the open countryside, and she wanted so badly to relish it, to savour the simple pleasure of being out in the clear air of Prithvi-maa once more, to have done with this endless nightmare, but she knew Ravana too well by now to believe that he had brought her out here for a soiree in the park. He had some devilish ulterior motive for taking her along on this trip, and she sensed with a sickening certainty that whatever it was he intended her to see, it lay below them at this very instant. She prepared herself as best as she could in her current state, and gripping the balustrade now with both hands, trembling slightly from weakness as well as trepidation, she peered over the edge of sanity.

She was not prepared for the sight that met her eyes.

Rama.

Rama stood there below, far below, perhaps a few hundred yards distant, almost as diminutive as her index finger, but it was still he, in the flesh, standing on a grassy barrow, with Lakshman beside him. Tears welled up at once, unbidden and undesired, and for once she did not banish them, as she had done with all her emotions in Ravana's presence. She let them flow, dripping one and then another upon the flawless golden surface of the Pushpak, where they did not linger or roll about, but were instantly absorbed by the metal skin of the celestial vehicle, disappearing into the fabric of the device itself. And she fought to blink away the tears that followed so that she could see more clearly.

Rama and Lakshman stood before a great army of vanars and bears, so great that even from this height she could not see the end of that great host. Before them, on the great southern plains of Lanka, barely a mile separating them, were the hordes of Lanka, assembled before the city walls and gate in some measure of confusion, circling and re-circling, raising dust clouds in agitation, as if unsure of whether they were to retreat into the city or attack the sighted enemy. Within the walls of Lanka, just inside the great gates, were assembled what appeared to be all the rest of Lanka's populace, armed as well as unarmed, armoured as well as unattired. A great, gleaming chariot was preparing to ride out through the gates even as she looked, and she thought she recognised the helmed head of Indrajit, Ravana's elder son. Behind him were several rakshasas in much smaller, less ostentatious chariots that she somehow knew were champions.

Her eyes found Rama once more, even though the Pushpak had drifted slightly during this brief period, and they filled with tears again as she gazed adoringly upon the visage and form of her beloved after so long a separation. He seemed well enough, but so much leaner and thinner. His dark skin, once almost bluish in hue, seemed to have faded and he looked paler. She thought it must surely be the weakness of her vision and the dust of the field and the fading light of evening that deceived her. As she gazed at him, she saw several vanars and a bear or two approach him, and stand with him and Lakshman upon the mound as generals and lieutenants might stand with their king upon a battlefield. Of course, she did not know any of them apart from the gallant Hanuman whom she had recognised at once. She felt great sorrow at the fact that the forces and generals of Lanka were so much more familiar to her than those of Rama. And once again, she dearly wished that she had but her freedom and a sword, and that she could stand by Rama's side, like any of his war ministers, to do battle for his honour. For it was as much his honour he defended here as hers, for were they not one and the same? What was it he always said? Where Sita begins, and Rama ends, I do not know, it is not possible to know. But where Sita ends, there Rama ends, this I know for certain.

I am here, my love. She wanted to scream the words. But the shame and humiliation of being in his enemy's chariot and a captive caused her to hold her tongue. And she only watched, as the great drama of war unfolded before her weeping eyes.

The gates of Lanka were barely open all the way when the great war-chariot flew out, its team heaving with all their might to get the great armoured vehicle moving upon its high wheels. Some rakshasas—either simply careless or perhaps foolish enough to think they might aid their lord as he rode out—came in its path, and without so much as a warning shout, Indrajit whipped his team and rode them down. Their bodies were churned and crushed beneath the spinning high wheels, reinforced with metal and cruelly studded and spiked. The rest of the horde nearest to the gate reared back, issuing a disgruntled growl. Even the heavy lashes of the kumbhas upon their hides did not deter them from watching with baleful resentment as the prince of Lanka rode out through their lines and onto the field of battle.

Indrajit rode his chariot to a suitable strategic position and then reined in the team. They chomped at the bit now, pulses racing, scenting the odours of the enemy and eager to continue, for they were blood-fed cross-breeds, weaned on the flesh of mortals and as vicious in battle as any rakshasa.

Indrajit stood proudly arrogant in his chariot's well, gazing out at the army of invaders with an aspect that seemed openly contemptuous even at this distance.

Rama watched as a line of smaller, far less ornate chariots followed in Indrajit's wake, taking up suitably subordinate positions behind their leader. Following them in turn came a new host from Lanka, their armour still gleaming and unsullied by the dust of the field, their blades sharp and maces undented. They came—and kept coming, the new arrivals fanning out to form a wall from west to east that promised to match the length of the battlement wall of the city itself. He resisted the urge to catch his breath as the numbers continued to swell, until the army before them seemed almost an even match for their own host. And he would wager there were still more rakshasas not yet assembled here: those odd-faced beasts that had emerged from the battlements after the sorcerous darkness fell were nowhere to be seen on this field.

His generals had assembled around him even as they awaited Lanka's next move. Now they were all silent, watching this great army arrayed before them. Suddenly their great advantage of numbers seemed substantially diminished. After taking into account their huge losses, they were now left with an army no more than twice as big as Lanka's own. And given the superior size, armour, strength and fighting knowledge of the Lankans, that was hardly an advantage at all.

A flicker of gold in the air caught his attention again. He did not pay it much heed. He had already glimpsed Ravana's celestial vehicle hovering about overhead as it had done all day. He could see several faces gazing down from its galleries at the armies assembled on these plains, but he did not care. Let Ravana's spies examine him and his forces as much as they desired. There was no longer any call for subterfuge. This was open war and this the last battlefield in Lanka.

'The craven lurks in his chariot and will not even descend to the field of battle,' snarled Sugreeva with surprising vehemence. The king of vanars had been barely recognisable when he had approached Rama moments ago; the marks of battle were on his face and form, and yet he seemed renewed and invigorated rather than weakened. His age-bent crouch and pained expression had given way to a monarchical pride. Just like the first time that Rama had laid eyes upon him at Mount Rishimukha, he was reminded again of his father. This fierce Sugreeva put him in mind of what he thought Maharaja Dasaratha must have looked like on the field of one of his famous battles: proud, indomitable, unrelenting. He had already heard a brief account of Sugreeva's exploits in the battle of the canyon and marvelled at it. He felt a surge of pride that he was the cause, however unfortunately, of the vanar king's return to glory.

'If he will but descend to the ground and join swords with us, I will show him how kings should fight upon the field, instead of sending his minions out in hordes to do his killing for him.'

The king of Kiskindha added a few choice epithets to his outburst then snarled and spat furiously in the direction of the Pushpak. For an instant, all eyes in Rama's camp turned upwards towards the gleaming golden object in the dusky sky. Rama looked up as well, noting that there were two galleries on the vehicle; a large one which accommodated at least a couple of dozen rakshasas of varying breeds and kinds, and an upper gallery which was only slightly smaller but held just two or three persons, one of whom was unmistakably Ravana, the other the treacherous Supanakha, and the third ... the third ...

Hanuman's paw gripped his arm. 'My lord!'

Rama started at the same moment, seeing what Hanuman and Lakshman and all the rest of them saw, but only the three of them recognized.

The third passenger in the Pushpak was none other than Sita herself.

Indrajit raised his mail-encased fist and his herald at once lifted his long, elaborately carved bone trumpet. The call that issued forth was lowing and mournful, like a dirge. It silenced the chattering and growling in Rama's camp as well as the grumbling and resentful noises among the Lankan hordes. The kumbhas ceased their whipping and beating momentarily, for even the most recalcitrant rakshasa obeyed implicitly the call to battle. Ravana watched as the trumpeting was taken up and echoed by each of the hordes. In fact, he had not yet given the signal to issue the call of battle. The herald had been entrusted with the task of watching Ravana in the Pushpak, waiting for the lord of rakshasas's signal. Instead, Indrajit had given the command himself. Ravana knew that he could not rescind that order now without causing Indrajit to lose face: his son would be more likely to turn his chariot around and ride back into Lanka than brook being corrected by his father. Several of his heads sighed. If there was one rakshasa in Lanka he could not command by hook or by crook, it was his own eldest son. On the other hand, he had been about to issue the order himself. And he had indeed entrusted Indrajit with leading the army in this battle after all. So to all intents and purposes, Indrajit was the supreme commander today. Let the dog have his day.

He glanced back with two of his heads at Sita. She was clutching at the balustrade with both her hands, trembling and tearful at the sight of Rama. He had glimpsed Rama and his cohorts staring up just now, when the ageing vanar had issued his futile challenge and spat rudely, and knew that both the paramours had seen one another and were profoundly moved.

That had been Ravana's intention in bringing her here today. It gave him pleasure to see her anguish, knowing that her beloved Rama was so close and yet so far. It would give him even greater pleasure to watch her watching Rama die on that battlefield.

SIX

Rama had no time to dwell on Sita's presence above the battlefield. The Pushpak remained aloft, several hundred yards high, its passengers watching like spectators at a feastday celebration. The Lankan forces, rallying behind their several banners, began to march inexorably forward. Rama's generals looked to him for orders to march as well, but he indicated to them that they were to wait. He sensed the impatience of the vanars and the bears, eager now to strike openly at their foe after so much subterfuge and counter-subterfuge. All the scheming and battle strategy was well and good, but there came a time when warriors needed to face their enemy and match their army's strength against the other to secure a decisive victory. This was that time now.

But the Lankan army halted when they were three hundred yards from Rama's lines. Orders were shouted by their generals, enforced by the kumbha sergeants and their vicious whips. After much grunting and grumbling and effusion of nasal fluids, the hordes reluctantly relaxed their weapon arms and assumed a waiting stance.

‘Do they desire a parley?’ Angad asked scornfully beside Rama. ‘Do not give them the satisfaction, Rama. We will fight them with our last breath!’

‘It is not a parley they seek, son,’ King Sugreeva replied, his voice sounding both stronger and wearier after his battles. ‘They seek to call out our champions against their own, I warrant.’

And indeed that was what the rakshasas desired.

A moment after calling a halt, a rakshasa from Indrajit’s horde alighted from a chariot and strode forward to the centre of the battlefield, stopping midway between the two standing armies. He was a kumbha-rakshasa with the heightened stature and superior bulk of his kind, and bore a jet-black iron mace studded with vicious barbs and points. He flexed his muscles, and roared a challenge. His demand was obvious: Send someone out to fight. If you have someone worthy of fighting.

Almost every vanar and bear stepped forward, as well as every one of Rama’s generals. Angad and Sugreeva were the most vociferous, as were the vanars Mainda and Dvividā. Rama quietened them all down with a raised hand, showing them his open palm. When they were silent, he spoke, feeling the need to explain his choice even though his army would accept his decision without question.

‘The Lankans are arrogant and overconfident. They challenge us in order to prove that they are superior and to demoralise us. It is necessary to show them decisively and quickly that we are more than their match in every way. The champion I pick must not only defeat the challenger but must crush him so convincingly that they should be left open-mouthed with awe. To this end, I request all you able and valiant warriors to stand aside and allow me to select the most powerfully endowed amongst you all.’

There was a moment’s pause as his words were repeated in relay, reaching the farthest vanar and bear, miles away. Then, with one voice, the entire assembled might of Rama's army replied without hesitation or second thoughts: 'Jai Shri Hanuman!'

Rama nodded approvingly. 'Hanuman it is.'

Hanuman stepped forward with palms joined. Bowing first, he then prostrated himself on the dusty ground before Rama, touching his lord's feet, then Lakshman's as well. Both of them gave him the traditional ashirwaad. He rose to his feet again and strode out from their lines. As he walked, he chanted in his clear vanar voice: 'Siyavar Rama Chandra ki jai! Shrimati Sita Mayya ki jai!' Praised be Rama Chandra, husband of Sita. Praised be Mother Sita, wife of Rama.

Rama's forces echoed the words, keeping rhythm with Hanuman's steps as he walked to the no-man's-land between the armies where the Lankan champion waited. The rakshasas took up their own arcane chant as well, a kind of guttural howling, with a ragged rhythm reinforced by the pounding of armoured fists, and bladed as well as blunt-headed weapons, against their helmets and chest armour. Somewhere in that cacophonous noise was the word 'Dumraksa' which Rama took to be the name of the rakshasa challenger. It was only to be expected that rakshasas would cheer the champion rather than their overlord.

The din raised by both armies was intense and fierce and was audible for yojanas around.

Hanuman stopped when he was within ten yards of his opponent. Rama noted that the vanar had chosen neither to expand his body nor to display his enormous powers in any fashion, and was pleased by his friend's wisdom. Hanuman had understood what he desired even without being told in so many words.

Sita watched from the Pushpak as the Lankan champion roared and beat his mace upon the ground, gouging out great cavities in the ground with the weapon. Raising the formidable weapon, the rakshasa bellowed one last time and charged the waiting vanar. She saw that Hanuman was unarmed and standing calmly, making no remonstrations nor calling out.

The chanting of the armies had ceased and both sides watched with tense anticipation as their champions clashed.

Vertiginous and drained as she was, she did not understand why the vanar had not used his incredible powers. She had seen what he was capable of when he virtually destroyed Lanka single-handed. But yet today he stood there like any ordinary vanar.

The rakshasa challenger charged at Hanuman with his mace raised. Swinging it with all his might, he brought it down at a diagonal angle aimed at the junction of Hanuman's head and left shoulder. It was a classic mace attack, designed to shatter armour and bone and crush the heart instantly. Any victim struck by such a blow would drop dead at once. She caught her breath, not because she doubted Hanuman's abilities, but because of the impassive manner with which the vanar stood there, neither moving back nor forward, or responding in any way to the brutal attack. And because Hanuman was neither armoured nor protected in any way, bare chested and naked except for the langot around his groin, seemingly vulnerable.

But at the last instant, Hanuman's left arm shot up, unerringly gripping the shaft of the downward swinging mace. It was as if the rakshasa had struck an invisible force that did not resist or yield a fraction. The mace hung there in the air, gripped by both the champions. There was no struggle as such, for Hanuman simply stood there, left arm upraised, almost as if he was reaching up to pluck a fruit from a tree limb. The rakshasa, on the other hand, sweated and grunted and strained with effort until his eyes bulged enormously and his muscles popped and the tendons stood out in relief like a network of wires.

Both fighters stood like statues in a tableau. Like one of the enormous stone statues Sita recalled seeing in the Suryavansha palace at Ayodhya, depicting scenes featuring Rama's ancestors.

Then, slowly, the rakshasa's feet began to move.

Just a fraction at first, but the motion was unmistakable.

Then a little more, perhaps an inch. Then another inch.

He was sliding backwards, losing his grip.

Realising this, the rakshasa roared once, loudly, then pushed upwards with both his hands, his great back muscles now standing out in relief as he exerted all his considerable strength to attempt to push the vanar back, or tilt him off-balance at the very least.

Instead Hanuman raised his head, opened his mouth, and spoke a single phrase, loudly and clearly enough to be heard by both armies.

‘Jai Siyaram,’ he said.

And brought the mace down on the head of its owner with a force so swift, so sudden, so powerful, that the head of the weapon was driven through the crown of the rakshasa’s skull, through his brain, through his spine, shattering each in succession, all the way down to his hip, which shattered like fragile chalkstone, and down until it struck the ground itself and disappeared several feet inside, to lie buried in a veritable grave with the pulped remains of all that was left of the Lankan challenger.

The stony silence that met the death of the Lankan champion was broken by a great roar of rage from the rakshasa hordes. Several rakshasas broke free of their lines and ran forward, unable to curb their anger. Some were lashed by kumbhas but others were methodically shot down by arrows from Indrajit’s chariot. The acting commander of the Lankan army showed no hesitation in cutting down his own warriors; abjuring from wounding them in the legs, he aimed to kill, dropping a dozen-odd rakshasas dead in their tracks before the first of them could reach even halfway across the no-man’s-land. Shouted orders by the kumbhas sent grumbling rakshasas out in pairs and trios to drag back the bodies of the insubordinates. After that, the rakshasa hordes settled for howling and roaring and spewing noxious fluids into the air, but none dared break their ranks.

Rama watched as Indrajit lowered his bow and gestured with a fist. A flurry broke out behind him, and then a chariot rode forward. Rakshasas scattered to make way for it, the charioteer giving no heed to whether or not he ran down his own countrymen, and the vehicle drove through to the buffer space. Then, without pausing, it swung around in a dusty arc and wheeled straight towards Hanuman.

Cheekas of protest broke out in the vanar ranks, for Hanuman, despite his powers, was still unarmed. But the Lankan chariot charged at the vanar without pause, its wheels trundling more silently than any chariot Rama had seen until now. In its cupola was a rakshasa with so much armour and cladding that he could scarcely discern the creature's face. Only two ruby-red eyes glowed from within the slit in the helm, and a maw that might have been its mouth issued an unsettling banshee scream. From the manner in which even the front-line kumbhas stepped back hurriedly as the chariot rode past them, he understood that this new champion was greatly feared by Lankans as well. Someone in Indrajit's formation started a cheer that was reluctantly repeated by the rest of the Lankan army—or most of them at any rate, for the new challenger was clearly not loved by all of his own people. The cry that rang out this time was 'Akampana!'

Hanuman stood impassively as the chariot hurtled towards him. The charioteer, a sneering fellow with a thin, reedy trunk like a poor imitation of an elephant's, whipped the broken-sur team with vicious glee, adding his own tinny voice to the Lankan cheer: 'Akampana! Akampana!'

The Lankan began firing arrows when he was a mere two hundred yards from the lone vanar. His aim was unerring despite the speed of the chariot. Rama saw an arrow strike Hanuman's right shoulder, the next his left shoulder, the third his chest, the fourth his abdomen ... By the time the chariot came within striking distance, fourteen arrow shafts were stuck in the vanar's bare body, one in every major part of him, with three in his chest alone. Hanuman seemed not to take notice of these missiles and remained standing with the same impassive calm as the chariot bore down on him at the greatest speed its driver could muster from the frothing team.

Rama saw the leading kumbha-sur lower its cloven head to strike Hanuman, even as the vanar did the same with his own head, bending down and forward at the last instant. The beast and vanar skulls impacted together with a sound like dried parchment crumpled in an angry fist. The entire broken-sur team ploughed into Hanuman with the force of a wooden box striking a granite boulder, and flesh, bone and blood, crumpled like sticks and waterbags, destroyed on impact and exploding into a shower of grisly blood-rain that poured down on the dusty plain as far away as the first lines of the nearest Lankan horde. The chariot followed, ploughing into the steadfast vanar even as it upended and flipped over. Hanuman raised his arms, catching the overturning chariot, and crumpled it with his bare hands until it folded and refolded into a splintered mess of metal debris. He threw the remains at the Lankan lines, to land just before the front ranks. The rakshasas scuttled backwards, tripping over their fellows behind, several collapsing like a heap of startled toddlers. The crumpled remains of the chariot crashed down and slid across the dusty ground, stopping inches from the popping eyes of a kumbha-rakshasa lieutenant too proud to step back out of its way. It resembled a child's plaything stepped on by an elephant's foot.

The charioteer had been mashed to pulp within his vehicle, Rama noted, but the Lankan within had leaped free even as the vehicle overturned, landing several yards to one side. As Hanuman straightened up after tossing the chariot aside, the rakshasa charged the vanar, swinging a metal mace with chains attached to its head, and studded iron balls on the ends of the chains. He whipped it around with expert ease, till the balls were whirling blurs in the fading sunset light, and with the same banshee sound he had made earlier, attacked Hanuman.

Making no attempt to bend or dodge the swinging weapon, the vanar put his hand directly in the path of the whirling chains and balls. As if by magic, the entire thing wrapped itself around his bare fist, an arrow still sticking out of the forearm which still bled lightly. Yanking once, he pulled the mace towards him— along with the rakshasa holding it. The Lankan, thrown off his feet, flew straight into the vanar's other fist, which connected with his chest with a squelching impact. His banshee wail ceased at once, and he stared down at the vanar's arm, embedded so deeply in his chest that the fist attached to it had emerged from the rakshasa's back, clutching a dripping, still-pounding heart. Rama watched as Hanuman's fist squeezed the beating heart till it was the consistency of oatmeal porridge, then shoved the rakshasa away. The second challenger's corpse landed with a thud in the dust beside the crumpled remains of the chariot in which he had ridden so proudly only moments ago.

Rama had expected that Indrajit might lose patience after seeing the fate of the two challengers, and simply roar and order the rest of the army to charge his lines. But the rakshasa was evidently a person well versed in battle etiquette and tradition. He displayed an admirable restraint in the face of the enraged roars of his army, and opted to send in another challenger against Hanuman—and then another, and yet another. Staring across the distance that divided them, Rama saw the son of Ravana gazing coldly at him, in a manner unlike any other rakshasa he had seen before, and he knew that he was facing an enemy who was a master of the art of warcraft, a rakshasa whose prowess was comparable only to that of his father. Small wonder that Ravana had chosen to let his scion command the army of Lanka while he himself watched from the high vantage of the Pushpak.

Angad and some of the other generals, unfamiliar with the ancient war customs of the Aryas and rakshasas and other warfaring races, grew impatient. After Hanuman had killed the fourth challenger and was waiting for the fifth to ride out on a trumpeting kumbha-sur, Angad asked impatiently, ‘Is he such a craven, this son of Ravana, that he dares not order his army to charge us? He must know by now that Hanuman can crush any opponent he sends against him. So why does he waste time sending more fools to their death?’

Lakshman answered on Rama’s behalf. ‘He seeks to show the world—both our armies, as well as the observers who watch from a distance,’ indicating the Pushpak above and the high ramparts of Lanka in the distance, ‘that he is a fair and just commander, cleaving to the rules of war. So that when the history of this war is written, it will record that Lanka fought fairly and according to the code of warriors.’

‘But that is a lie!’ said the young vanar prince. ‘What of the devilish sorceries employed earlier? What of the spies, the subterfuge, the use of killing stones and fog and other devices that are not lawful by the rules of warrior conduct?’

Lakshman and Rama exchanged an understanding glance with the vanar prince. ‘Those he will probably blame on us, I suspect,’ Lakshman said matter-of-factly. ‘He might well spread the story that Rama the sorcerer was the one responsible for all the unnatural things that have happened up to now.’

‘Rama the sorcerer?’ Angad asked disbelievingly.

Lakshman nodded laconically. ‘And being innocent of the true workings of the dark arts, most will believe his lies. We have already heard from Hanuman who heard from my sister-in-law about the elaborate web of deceit Ravana has already spun to justify his war against terror, even though he himself is the creator of that very terror.’

Angad swore in vanar phrases that Rama was almost glad he did not comprehend. As Angad subsided, he added quietly, ‘But I suspect there is another reason for all this charade of honourable warfare.’

‘Aye,’ King Sugreeva said, nodding with the wisdom of his age. ‘I see it as well.’

Angad frowned. ‘What is that, Rama?’

‘He seeks also to show Hanuman’s indestructibility, so that when he himself attacks our friend and defeats him in single combat, his own power will appear god-like, immeasurable. And then, when he kills Hanuman and leads his army against ours, their morale will be unassailable.’

Angad stared at Rama. ‘But that ... you mean he actually believes he will be able to kill Bajrangbali?’

Rama nodded grimly. ‘Not just believes, he may well be capable of doing so in reality.’

Angad had no response to that statement.

SEVEN

The roll-call of challengers continued all through the night. After the first three or four encounters, the light faded completely, leaving both armies blanketed in darkness, with only the lights of Lanka itself visible. Indrajit ordered braziers to be set up in the no-man's-land, illuminating the front lines with garish highlights. Some more time-wasting formalities followed, and finally, when the single combat challenges continued, it went on much as before, except that Hanuman now began to take a little more time before dispatching each new champion. The hordes, so belligerent and arrogant to start with, grew furious when they saw their first several champions dispatched with such nonchalant ease, but as the night wore on, and the number of dead Lankan fighters mounted, they grew quieter and quieter, until by the time first light began to break on the horizon, they seemed stupefied. Rama saw several of them staring with glazed eyes at Hanuman as he swung a hefty four-footed rakshasa with tusks as long and curved as an elephant's, round and round, before releasing him. Such was the force of Hanuman's swinging that the rakshasa was thrown miles away, arching high in the air over the plains of southern Lanka, before falling back to earth out of sight—probably in the ocean yojanas away.

At that, the rakshasas, who had been staring with glazed eyes, came alive, salivating and making curious low noises, their wet muzzles rising and falling in an action Rama had not seen any rakshasa make till now. Seeing their response, the kumbha sergeants came with whips flashing and lashed them bitterly, but even after lowering their snouts submissively, they still continued gazing at the vanar standing alone and unconquered in the centre of the field.

‘They have turned admirers,’ Rama said. ‘For when confronted by an opponent so powerful that one cannot hope to defeat by any means, the mind of a warrior resorts to only one of two choices: either to refuse to accept his superiority and risk one's life in a final suicidal assault, or to acknowledge his superiority and offer oneself in surrender to his greater power. The rakshasas of Lanka have begun to admire and respect our Anjaneya, it seems.’

‘I wonder if Indrajit and his father knew this would happen when they decided to play this charade,’ Lakshman said, smiling.

Rama glanced up at the Pushpak. The celestial vehicle had hovered in the same place for the entire night. Now, as the first rays of the sun caught the burnished surface of the vahan, sending golden shards of splintered sunlight in all directions, creating a rainbow-like seven-hued refraction, he found his heart crying out at Sita's plight. How was she enduring this test of tests? To be so close to him, within sight, and yet unable to come to him. If she felt anything akin to what he himself felt, then her heart must be weeping blood. It took every ounce of his self-control not to raise his celestial weapons and use them to end this elaborate charade that Ravana had laid out, end this wretched war, and take his wife home. But thinking along these lines bred anger within his breast, the epic anger that he had restrained for so long through so many travails and struggles and disappointments. He shut his eyes tightly, breathing deeply to dispel the ghosts and demons that threatened to turn him once again into a killing machine. Once that Rama Chandra was unleashed, there could be no muzzling him.

Lakshman's eyes were on him when he reopened his eyes. 'Patience, bhai. It will not be long now. Let Ravana have his day. We will have ours.'

'Yes,' Rama said. 'Dharma will triumph in the end, as it always does.' He paused. 'It is the long and painful waiting until that day arrives that tests the mettle of us mortals.'

The bouts of single combat ended suddenly.

First, shouts broke out on the ramparts of Lanka, followed by a great hullabaloo from the direction of the city. Shortly after, a rider emerged with great haste from the gates of Lanka. He rode up to Indrajit's chariot and delivered a message. After listening to him Indrajit nodded and dismissed him, then called upon his herald. The herald was given instructions and sent out towards Rama's army. Taking great care to steer clear of the vanar champion standing alone in mid-field, the herald announced that he had a message for Rama's ears alone. With Rama's permission, he was brought to where the leaders of the invading army had assembled. Looking notably nervous, yet haughty, as heralds are wont to be, he spoke in a clear tenor, using classical Sanskrit highspeech that revealed him to be highly cultured and educated.

'It has come to my lord Indrajit's notice that some faction of your army has infiltrated the city of Lanka using devious means and undoubted sorcery. These demons in disguise are being repelled by our forces. My lord wishes you to know that while they shall not succeed in their devilish endeavour, he finds such treachery repugnant. It is an affront to the rules of warfare, and to any warrior with a sense of honour.'

To emphasise his meaning, the herald arched his thin stalk-like neck sideways and spat. At this, Angad and several of the other generals swore and surged forward. Rama raised his hand, halting them.

The herald eyed them carefully, then seeing that they were not likely to attack, resumed his ornately decorative style of address: 'Under the circumstances, the single combat duel is called off and we withdraw our champions at once. It would be dishonourable for us to continue fighting a foe who indulges in such unlawful practices and insults the rules of warfare, shaming the very varna of Kshatriyahood itself. My lord wishes you to be warned that he proposes to assault your lines, drive you back into the sea whence you came using your sorcerous aids. If you desire to leave this field alive, do so at once, desist in your campaign and retreat post-haste. If you are not gone within the hour-watch, you shall face the might of Lanka's hordes, and my lord has no doubt that when confronted with an honest battle, your devilish monsters so cleverly disguised will be routed and massacred to the last man. I bid you on his lordship's behalf farewell and call you to arms, to arms, to arms.'

With those final words, delivered in a proud, sneering, nasal tone, the herald turned his back on Rama and rode towards his lines once more.

This time, when Angad swore he was echoed by several other vanars. 'What did that pompous ass mean? Why did he keep referring to disguises all the time? Who is disguised here?'

'You are, according to him,' Rama replied thoughtfully. 'The Lankans now believe, or pretend to believe, that you are in fact mortals that I have somehow disguised as vanars and bears through sorcery.'

This time, even King Sugreeva swore. 'He will know the truth soon enough when he feels my talons ripping his vitals and my jaws upon his throat!'

‘That he will, I have no doubt,’ Rama said. ‘But those are merely words and words can be woven cleverly into ingenious lies. That is why Indrajit uses a mediator, and Ravana in turn uses Indrajit. They are merely a means to spread disinformation and conceal the truth. We must not be moved by them one whit. What is of import is the news that Jambavan and his bear army have successfully traversed the underground caverns and reached the city itself. We have forced Ravana’s hand at last, and now we can put this charade behind us and finish the war we came here to wage.’

At his words, everyone subsided. King Sugreeva nodded sagely, showing that his newly acquired battle aggression had not entirely replaced his kingly wisdom and sense of justice. ‘Aye, Rama, you speak truly. This is yet another clever subterfuge of the dark lord of Lanka to confuse and provoke us. See how he toys with us: first using sorcerous stones and the earth of Lanka itself, then sending hybrid creatures out of some hellish realm to attack us under cover of sorcerous darkness, and when he sees that his forces are losing the day, he pulls them back and changes tactics at once. But this time he will not cheat us of our goal. We are at the walls of Lanka, and our forces are already breaching their capital city. We must push through and secure the city now, and after that, there will be nothing left for Ravana to fight us for.’

‘Except one thing,’ Lakshman said tersely.

And indicated the Pushpak overhead, with Sita’s tiny, forlorn face visible even at this distance.

Sita had spent a wan and nerve-racking night, alleviated only by the sight of her beloved Rama and her brother-in-law Lakshman. Each time her champion—for she knew he fought for her as much as for Rama, his people and the cause—defeated another Lankan challenger, her heart leaped. Perhaps, she prayed, Ravana would see that Rama could not be vanquished, just as his champion could not be, and would yield now. She knew this would not come to pass, but she still prayed. The sight of so much blood being spilled, even Lankan blood, even that of warriors, dismayed her. Perhaps it was the life growing within her—the lives, she corrected herself at once—or merely her weariness with so much war and violence. Either way, she wished now only to have done with all this, to have an end to this fighting. To go home.

When the ruckus broke out in the city, she understood at once what it meant.

From her vantage point, she could see the crowds running helter-skelter. They were heading for the tunnels, the subterranean network of corridors riddling the island that had either been created on the night of the sorcerous changes or merely altered and expanded, she did not know which. From the commotion at the mouth of one of the tunnels visible from her position, it seemed that there was fighting going on there. Since Lanka had only one enemy, she knew that it could only be Rama's forces that had somehow infiltrated the tunnels and breached the city! Then victory was in sight at last!

She laughed, the first open-throated, guileless laugh she had enjoyed since ... since that afternoon at Panchvati when she had chased after the golden deer and slipped and coloured herself with turmeric and Rama had found her that way, rolling in the grass, yellow-faced like a bride-to-be.

The slap took her by surprise. A backhanded blow upon her left cheek so resounding that it nearly caused her to lose her balance. She clutched at the railing, her head spinning, eyes unable to focus for a moment. She blinked away tears and stared into the snarling, fur-covered features and glowering yellow eyes of Supanakha.

‘What do you have to laugh about now, Rama's—?’

Whatever the rakshasi had been about to say next was cut off by a kick from Ravana's mighty foot. The shape-shifter was thrown clear across the width of the Pushpak, a good ten yards or more, to land with a loud thump on the far railing and wall. She squealed with indignation and leaped towards her cousin, coming at him with the ferocious instinct of a cat rather than the lumbering power of a rakshasa. Perhaps that was what saved her life, for Ravana struck out at her with a careless blow, as if swatting aside a gnat rather than dealing with an enemy of any import, and her natural feline response brought her down on all four paws. She snarled and crouched in preparation for yet another leap.

‘Enough!’ thundered the rakshasa king. ‘You’ve already given me reason to kill you, cousin. If you wish me to perform the execution right here and now, then it shall be so.’

Supanakha subsided, but not without a final glowering snarl. She licked at her haunches where they had struck the railing of the Pushpak. Sita saw a red bruise rising there already as well as another dark welt where Ravana’s careless blow had landed. She felt sadness rather than satisfaction at seeing her abuser hurt thus; would this cycle of violence never end?

‘How are you, my lady?’ asked Ravana in a tone so gentle, it almost made her forget who he was. But she had seen enough of his guile not to be fooled.

She ignored him studiously, staring out at the lightening sky. From below, she heard the sounds of the Lankan army moving once more, and knew that battle was about to be joined. She had expected that the instant she had seen the commotion in the city and recognised it for what it was. Bravo, Rama. You forced their hand and compelled them to confront you at last in a fair fight. Now we shall see how the lord of Lanka fares in a true battle.

Ravana paused, gazing down at her with all his heads in a manner that almost made her glance up. She resisted but was struck by the feeling, so overwhelming it must have some measure of truth, that he somehow knew her thoughts and was displeased by them in the extreme. Still she refused to look up at him and give him the satisfaction of a single word of conversation. As far as she was concerned he did not exist. It was the only way she could resist him now, for every gesture, every look, every word she granted would be twisted and misinterpreted to suit his own purpose. Only by acting as if he did not exist could she reject his advances totally.

After a moment of waiting, looming above her like an elephant with a raised foot, he turned and strode away, back to the front railing of the Pushpak, where he stood once more, gazing out at the battlefield below while his heads continued their own bizarre battle of words and wits.

She stole a glance at Supanakha. The rakshasi sensed her gaze and glared back at her, but continued licking her wounds with no sign of aggression or threat. However much she might hate Sita, she hated Ravana more, and feared him too, and that was the only protection Sita could cling to for now.

She raised herself to her feet once more and took her place at the railing, determined to watch the battle to the finish, or for as long as her captor would permit her. She would pray for Rama's victory with her every breath now, until the war ended.

EIGHT

In the clear light of day they met this time, vanars and rakshasas, and bears, and two mortals, on the open field of battle, with no subterfuge, or sorcery, shima or tactics, strategy or device. A straightforward charge, army versus army, riding and racing headlong towards one another, meeting midway, clashing together with a noise so terrible that all the world seemed to stop still for a moment. Prithvi herself paused in her rotation around her own axis, as well as her revolution around the sun god's blinding orb, to wonder at the clash of two hosts so hellbent on one another's destruction.

Many wars have been fought since, and many were fought before.

But none akin to the war of Lanka.

Never before or since have such strange hosts, through a chain of such extraordinary circumstances, gathered on so seemingly idyllic a plain, marred only by the smoke-oozing cone of the newly reawakened volcano a few yojanas farther south. Never before had vanars gone to war in such numbers—and that too against rakshasas! Never before had rakshasas been confronted by an army on their own homeland. Never before had a war been fought for dharma by such misunderstood, maligned and mistreated ones as Rama, Lakshman and Sita— for in her own proud way, she fought as valiantly as any other. Not every soldier wields a blade; not every battle is fought with violence; not all blood that is shed is visible.

In the clear light of day, they clashed.

Like moths to the flame, rakshasas rushed towards Hanuman. Many of them were the same glazed-eyed observers that Rama had seen watching the vanar through the long night of combat, their aggression giving way to disbelief, then to fury, then to denial, then, finally, reluctantly, to awe and admiration. Many charged him without even swinging their blades or maces, merely rushing at him and allowing themselves to be mowed down, as if being killed by Hanuman was a consummation devoutly to be desired.

Those who attacked him did so with the silent, watchful stance of a deer lashing at a tiger, purely out of reflex and instinct, yet knowing full well that the tiger would win and they fall. And so they fell. And falling spoke his name or mouthed it silently or simply held his image in their glazed eyes as they died. They had been killed by Hanuman.

Rama and Lakshman were out of arrows, and had to fight with their swords. Of course, Rama possessed one last arrow, and that one alone was equivalent to all the arrows ever created since the beginning of time and until the end of days, but in staging this battle with apparent honesty and transparency, Ravana had brilliantly denied him the use of that celestial weapon. If Rama employed the Bow of Vishnu and the Arrow of Shiva now, he would be seen as resorting to unfair means, and confirmed as the treacherous invading sorcerer the Lankans believed him to be. He would not use it until and unless it was imperative to do so.

So he chose to fight like a mortal, like a Kshatriya, like an Ayodhyan, like an Arya warrior, like a yodha. Like a man. And he did not stand apart from his army as Ravana did either; he waded into the thick of the combat, his sword flashing beside Lakshman's, both of them dispatching rakshasas by tens and dozens with the methodical ferocity they had acquired over years—nay, decades—of fighting rakshasas. And as the battle progressed and the sun traversed the Lankan sky and the day grew long, the rakshasas of Lanka saw Rama and Lakshman fight and came to know them for the warriors they truly were. Came to know and fear them. Not because of the sorcery they thought they wielded, or the treachery which they believed was a part and parcel of mortal nature, but for their fighting skill and battlefield courage and sheer endurance, for these were all things that rakshasas understood well and admired greatly. Their awe and admiration for the two mortal yodhas grew steadily as the day wore on, and by the evening of that third day of the war in Lanka, word had spread across the blood-soaked field that Rama and his brother were truly great warriors, worthy of confronting and killing—or being killed by. For to a rakshasa, nothing was more honourable than being killed by a warrior of such stature and courage. In war, one could die of anything—a cut from a rusty weapon, an accidental nick by one’s own comrade in the heat of battle, a pratfall, a clumsy move inefficiently parried, a convergence of serendipity and bad luck. But to be bested by a foe who was the greatest mortal warrior that ever lived—and this was the legend that grew around Rama on that third day of the war—was a death any rakshasa would willingly embrace.

But of course, they would fight bitterly for the privilege, not simply throw themselves down on his sword. These were not the glassy-eyed admirers of Hanuman who were so awe, struck by the vanar’s incredible power that they flocked like lemmings to his ocean. The rakshasas who thronged to Rama and Lakshman were the finest warriors on the Lankan field, the best of the best of their nation, seeking to pit their own skills against the best of the best of the mortal nations. A rakshasa was born, raised, lived and loved and trained with the omnipresent dream that some day he or she would face the hated mortals of Arya and do battle with them, helping rid the world of those terror-mongers who had plagued their kind for aeons. Once, their ancestors had battled mortals frequently. But most of the rakshasas in Lanka now had never seen a mortal before, let alone waged war against one. And so, Rama and Lakshman were prized on that field, and every rakshasa worth their salt—and their nasal effusions—sought to fight them. And by the end of that day, judging by the piles upon piles of corpses around the two brothers, it almost seemed as if every rakshasa did fight them. The death count numbered in the scores.

And still they kept coming. And fighting. And dying.

The others fought bravely as well. King Sugreeva waved his tree and the horde parted to provide a bloody pathway down which he leaped and fought and slew the enemy. His son fought beside him and was amazed at first at his father’s prowess, for this was the first truly great war he had ever seen his father fight. Angad matured and grew wiser in the course of that day, for every son listens to the tales of his father's great deeds with only one ear open and a sceptical mind, thinking always, 'Really? I'm sure I could do ten times better!' But it was only now, when he was pitted against the same odds on the same field, that he understood for the first time how great a warrior his father truly was. More importantly, he understood how great a king Sugreeva was. For the vanar lord could easily have stayed at a distance, and watched and supervised the fighting from afar. But by pitting his own life on the field, and staying from dawn to dusk and dawn to dusk yet again, and a third time, he proved himself to be more than just a king, he proved himself a comrade. The most valiant comrade at all. For though he was not the oldest on that field, he was certainly the only oldun with such authority and lineage, and his very presence, not to mention his prowess, was hugely inspiring to his army. He knew this, and fought the more valiantly for it, and his warriors fought the more valiantly for his sake, and died the more bitterly.

As Sugreeva earned his son's respect and admiration, so did each one of the heroes of Rama's army find their own place in the sun that fateful third day of the war. Not all survived it. Sometimes, as happens with war, the most unlikely ones fell, never to rise again, while the least expected ones survived, if not to fight another day, at least to look back on that day and speak of it to others for years afterwards. So it was that Mainda, the older, cynical champion of the Mandaras, outlived the battle, and Dvividha, the younger and more energetic, died, taking a spike from one rakshasa in his left armpit, and, in quick succession, six separate vital wounds from six other rakshasas, impaling him like a bug on a bramble bush. It made Mainda angrier than usual, and he killed all seven rakshasas in quick succession before going on to kill several sevens more. Mandaradevi would have been proud of them both.

Nala, the bridge-builder, fought like a bridge-destroyer. His natural ingenuity and keen visual acuity served him well, and he battled with a fervour that was as much intellectual as physical, using his talent for perspective and judgement of angles to leap and slash and cut and dodge, often killing his victims by tricking attackers to turn and thrust and kill their own comrades accidentally, while he leaped cheekaing out of the way.

If there was a trophy for the fighter who killed the most enemies without actually resorting to violence himself, he would surely have won it.

Speaking of cheekas, Sakra died on the field as valiantly as any warrior, although he killed not a single rakshasa. The young vanar was taking a message from one general to another— Satabali to Susena—asking for reinforcements on the extreme left flank and was killed by an axe-like bladed weapon flung by a frightened rakshasa at a cluster of bears who were taking a heavy toll on their enemy. Even as he died, he managed to pass on his message to a fellow angadiya, who scampered away to deliver it as Sakra breathed his last rattling breath. His brother would learn of his passing only a day later.

They all fought bravely and fiercely, vanars and rakshasas and bears and mortals. In the clear light of day, and as the day waned and night came again, by the honest darkness of night.

But some were more gifted than others.

From the very outset of the battle, Indrajit was a menace of sizeable proportions. Although a gifted sorcerer, he had clearly been ordered by his father not to employ magicks and asura maya on the battlefield. In any case, he did not need to. For Indrajit, like his father, was possessed of abilities granted to him by the devas themselves, whom he had helped conquer once, and who served him even now, however reluctantly, as the ransom price they paid for their freedom and for he and Ravana keeping their hordes away from the heavenly realms.

Every arrow he put to his bow and loosed was accompanied by a great onrush of wind and stormy rain and even thunder and lightning at times. The missile then loosed killed not one but a score of enemies. It was fortunate that he fought languidly, almost carelessly, as if aware that if he desired, he alone could decimate Rama's army, or the losses he piled up would have been tenfold or even hundredfold. As it was, his only goal seemed to be to face Rama, and so he only killed those who came in his way—be they rakshasas or vanars or bears, for Indrajit was of that breed of kings' sons who looked down on all those of lower status than himself as being much alike. He ran over rakshasas fighting bravely for his own cause with the same careless impunity he displayed when killing a score of vanars or bears.

The hordes seeking out Rama and literally dying to face and fight the legendary mortal yodha hampered and impeded Indrajit for all of that day. There was also the small matter of his not wishing to slaughter several tens of thousands of his own forces in order to reach the enemy leader. Not that he cared a whit about killing that many of his own warriors; simply that it was not expedient to do so, and though he might be a psychopathic monster, he was not a foolish psychopathic monster and knew that a supreme commander, even a supreme acting commander did not massacre his own army.

So after several unsuccessful attempts to make his way across the field to Rama's position, he finally saw that it would take the slaughter of a quarter of his own army to reach that position. At which point he settled for killing Rama's armies instead—which he did with dispassionate brutality, snuffing out the lives of scores of vanars and bears—and the occasional handful of rakshasas who were entangled in combat with them—with his potent arrows, driven with the force of the gods of wind, storm, lightning, water, fire, air, and a score of others.

But as the day gave way to night, and the night wore on relentlessly, with no signs of the fighting abating, he grew impatient. And finally, as the armies fell back and rallied and charged again and then shifted again in one of those periodic adjustments that armies must make during battle, his opportunity arrived. A gap opened up between himself and Rama's position. And due to the falling back of the rakshasa hordes as well as a simultaneous movement of Rama's forces to the flanks and outwards, there was a clear pathway all the way.

Indrajit whipped up his team and rode his chariot with demonic fury straight at Rama.

Rama saw him coming and knew that he could not stall this fight or delay it any longer. But before he faced Indrajit, he wished to give a few vital orders to the generals, especially the ones on the flanks who were hard pressed by an outflanking movement of Lankan troops and needed reinforcements badly.

‘Rama,’ Lakshman said as he saw the great black chariot coming across the battlefield. It was still a mile away but approaching at a steady, relentless pace, slowed only by the piles of corpses and mangled metal and flesh and bone that obstructed its way. It would take several minutes more, but it would reach them.

‘I see it,’ Rama replied, then continued with the message he had been giving to the angadiya.

‘Rama,’ Lakshman said again, as Indrajit covered another hundred-odd yards.

Rama did not reply, but finished the message he had been giving, and only when the messenger scampered away with a cheeka to warn his own warriors that he was coming through, did he turn and join Lakshman, who was standing and staring at the oncoming chariot, his sword dripping blood steadily.

‘Use your weapons,’ Lakshman said. ‘Use them now.’

Rama did not answer.

Lakshman looked at him sideways, flicking the blood and gristle off his sword with a practised twitch of his wrist, an action he had repeated several hundred times that day alone. ‘Rama, this is no time for arguments.’

‘You are right, this is no time,’ Rama replied. ‘Let’s concentrate on fighting this rakshasa.’

‘Rama, this is no ordinary rakshasa,’ Lakshman almost shouted. ‘This is Indrajit, son of Ravana. He has the shakti of the devas themselves on his side. Remember what Hanuman told us? How he was able to capture him so easily? And what Vibhisena said? Indrajit cannot be defeated by mortal weapons alone! The devas gave him his powers and only the greater devas can destroy him. You must use the Bow of Vishnu and the Arrow of Shiva to counter the shakti of the other lesser devas that he uses. Do it now, Rama!’

Rama looked at his brother, unmindful of the chariot now bearing down upon them, only a few hundred yards distant and closing fast, or as fast as could be managed over that body-strewn field. ‘I have already used them, remember?’

Lakshman stared at him, uncomprehending. ‘But they are inexhaustible! You can surely use them again!’

‘I can, Lakshman. But when I used them yesterday, I used them not as a weapon to kill, only as a means of uncloaking the sorcery that Ravana had cast over the whole of Lanka to conceal his own use of asura maya. And for one other thing.’

Lakshman eyed the chariot, bouncing over bodies and living soldiers alike in its haste to get to them. ‘It would be nice if you told me what that one other thing is, Rama. I am in no state of mind to guess right now.’

‘I used them to create a shield against asura maya, my brother,’ Rama said. ‘That is why Ravana was forced to resort to honest warfare and called his son out to lead his armies against us here. Due to the maha-shakti of the Bow and the Arrow, I negated Ravana’s asura maya and shielded our own forces against its use. That is why we are in the process of winning this war today, and will win it decisively very shortly.’

Lakshman glanced around briefly. He did not seem convinced that they were winning anything that day, let alone the war, but he took in Rama’s words with a frown. ‘Even so, Rama, how does that prevent you from using the astras again? Employ them against Indrajit, destroy him, and we can go on and win the war.’

‘That is the one thing I cannot do,’ said his brother. ‘For the moment I use them again, Ravana will be free to work his sorcery once more, and he will crush our soldiers with it before we can recover. I cannot sacrifice so many lives in order to save our own.’

‘But you will sacrifice our lives in order to save theirs?’ cried Lakshman in disbelief.

‘If need be,’ Rama replied.

And then the time for talk was past. For Indrajit’s chariot was now within easy firing distance of their position.

NINE

Sita watched with bated breath as the black chariot reeled to a halt before Rama's position. Her heart hammered in her chest like a dhol-drum as she watched Indrajit take up his bow and put an arrow to the cord. Why was Rama simply standing there? Why did Lakshman not do something? She saw the two brothers exchanging words and would have given anything in the world to hear what they said but all she could do was look on, and at such a time it was more frustrating than not seeing and not knowing. For at least then, she knew, she could not do anything. Watching from here, so close and yet so impossibly far, she felt like doing something, anything. But what?

What was it she heard a great sage say once—or had it been her own father? Yes, it was Maharaja Janak of Vaideha who had said it. The opposite of action is not inaction, it is waiting. They also serve the purpose of Ka who only watch and wait.

She watched and she waited now, as Indrajit raised his bow, took aim, and loosed a single shot at the two men standing a hundred yards away.

The arrow seemed to take for ever to reach its destination. She blamed her own debilitated condition for the seeming lapse of time, then she realised with a shock that it was not her alone: the arrow was indeed taking unnaturally long. For she could turn her head and see vanars and rakshasas fighting over there in real time, and look back and see the arrow still travelling slowly, sluggishly, like a pebble dropped into a jar of honey. And it was elongating and expanding as it went, growing in length as well as thickness and curving sinuously. She peered at it in disbelief, unable to comprehend the evidence of her eyes. What manner of arrow was that, to bend and wave and curve thus, and to move so slowly, like ... like ...

Like a snake across grass.

Then she saw it clearly.

It was a snake. Not just one now, but an entire mass of them, writhing and spitting and hissing as they flew through the air. And with each yard they travelled, at an impossibly slow pace, they multiplied in number, until by the time they had covered the hundred yards' distance between their source and their destination, there must have been several hundreds of them, slithering sinuously through the air like water snakes through a swamp.

She saw the morass of snakes strike Rama first, then, a moment later, Lakshman. Saw the snakes go through Rama, just like any arrow would, but wind and curve and slither as a snake does, and penetrate his body. She saw the fangs of scores of snakes pierce Rama's flesh, saw blood spurt, saw venom spray, saw flesh rend and the heads of the serpents pass into that flesh, that precious flesh, and delve deep within, saw the tails of serpents wriggling, saw their bodies buried deep inside the body of her beloved, the is their body of the father of her unborn children. She saw the same process repeated with Lakshman, saw both the men on whom her very life depended drop to their knees, then pitch face forward on the blood-and-gore-splattered grass of the mound, and lie still. The snakes that had entered their bodies writhed and wriggled and wrapped themselves around tightly, until every inch of their flesh was covered with the wriggling black and green and red and yellow creatures, and they appeared to be human no longer. And no longer alive.

The word spread like wildfire, like lightning, for not only the vanars and bears, but even the rakshasas of Lanka were aghast to hear of the news of Rama and Lakshman's deaths. Those rakshasas who admired them were aghast because they had longed for the honour of pitting themselves against those mortal champions in order to seek either the destruction of their lawful enemy or their own release from fleshly ties at the hands of such a venerated foe; those who genuinely hated them—and most rakshasas still hated them bitterly, blaming them for everything wrong in their nation and history, including their own fistulae and diseases—were aghast because now they would not have the pleasure of killing the two brothers themselves. The vanars were dumbstruck, the bears stricken. Not one soul on that field at that midnight hour between the third and fourth day of the war in Lanka were left unmoved by the news that Rama and Lakshman were no more. Not one heart was left untouched.

The fighting ceased at once. A truce was called at once, neither ordered by the commanders, nor voiced aloud, but simply enforced through the exchange of glances, the lowering of weapons and claws and talons, the lowering of eyes, the slumping of shoulders, and the walking away back in the direction of one's own lines. Slowly, with shuffling feet, like a crowd at a funeral procession, the rakshasas retreated to the Lankan side of the battlefield, the vanars and bears returned to the northern side. Even in the city, where the bear army of Jambavan had emerged from the cave tunnels to take charge of the centre of the capital, and was fighting in the streets for control of key sections of Lanka, the fighting ceased by mutual consent and both sides subsided.

On the mound where the two heroes had fallen, a ring was formed. By the time Angad and Sugreeva and Nala and Hanuman and all the other generals made their way to the spot, the entire strength of Rama's armies was standing around, staring inwards with numb disbelief.

Hanuman bent low and sought to touch Rama's body, but the serpents writhed and hissed violently and wrapped themselves even tighter around their victim. So completely were the two bodies covered by the sinuous creatures that not a hair on their heads or a tip of a fingernail was visible: it was as if a thousand snakes had knotted themselves around one another.

The vanar's lips parted in a snarl and he moved as if to tear the snakes off Rama's body, but Vibhisena, who had hurried to the spot as fast he could from his vantage point on a nearby overlooking hill, caught his arm and stopped him.

'No, my friend, this is the work of Takshak, the lord of snakes. Indrajit has called upon his potent power and used it against your master and his brother. You may tear out every last tail, but the heads will remain buried in their bodies, and if that happens then you will never be able to remove them.'

'Then what are we to do?' Hanuman bellowed in anguish, his body expanding and contracting without his conscious knowledge, for he was sorely agitated and unable to comprehend what must be done. This was not a situation that he had ever thought would come to pass. He had no contingency ready to deal with Rama's death. The possibility had never even crossed his mind.

'There is nothing we can do,' said Vibhisena, after examining the bodies as closely as he could. 'I do not know of any mantra or astra that can counter the weapon of Takshak. The only one who might possess the power to counter it is Rama himself, who lies there bound inextricably and as one dead.'

'But are they truly dead?' asked Sugreeva gravely, tears running down his cheeks. For the question begged asking. 'Or are they only rendered unconscious by the venom of the serpents and bound by them?'

Vibhisena looked at the vanar king sadly. 'What difference does it make? We cannot remove the serpents, so they are as good as dead.'

'As good as is not the same as,' said an ancient voice. Vibhisena and Sugreeva turned to see the aged vanar, Plaksa, being brought forward, supported by two muscular Jatarupas, his great-grandsons. 'If they are alive within that nest of snakes, then there may yet be a way to revive them.'

'How so, Gurudev?' asked Sugreeva.

'During the great war between the devas and the asuras after the churning of the ocean of milk, the asuras thwarted the devas by disappearing and returning again and again, for they were immortal and although they could be killed, they possessed the ability to return to life from the netherworld. The devas, while immortal themselves, could not die at all, so they remained on the battlefield, suffering grievous wounds and unable to leave for even a moment, while the asuras continued to die and disappear and then return again, while other asuras continued to wage war against the devas. Finally the devas were as ones dead, from countless wounds sustained over the course of the millennia-long war, and could barely continue fighting. At this time, Brihaspati, guru of the devas, brought vital medicinal herbs and tended to the devas, while chanting mantras all the while. In this fashion he revived them, healed every last one of their wounds no matter how grievous, and restored them to their full fighting strength.'

Hanuman looked at the aged vanar, joining his hands together. Tears streamed down his snout. ‘Mahadev, where might these miraculous herbs be found? Tell me, that I may go seek them out at once.’

The oldun sighed. ‘Alas, if I but knew that, I would be the greatest healer in all the three worlds. All I know is that they grow only on the mountains Candra and Drona, which are to be found in the ocean of milk where the legendary amrit nectar was churned.’

‘But that is a place of myth and lore,’ Angad said, looking even more distressed. ‘How may we find such a place?’

‘Aye, Mahadev,’ Hanuman said passionately. ‘But guide me to its location and I will bring back all the herbs you ask for. If I cannot recognise them, I shall uproot and bring back both the mountains you speak of, one upon each shoulder, that you may pick whichever and as many of the herbs as you deem necessary. But we cannot leave any stone unturned so long as there is any hope of reviving my lords. I do not believe they can be slain when we are so close to victory.’

‘Do not fear, my brave champion,’ Sugreeva said with a look like fire in his vanar eyes. ‘No matter what happens, I will see to it that the war is completed successfully, Lanka destroyed, and Sita rescued. This war is no longer Rama’s alone, it is a war of dharma and we will see it through to the end.’

‘I fear you may have to do so, my king,’ said the wise oldun, his hands trembling regretfully as he contemplated the twin bundles of writhing serpents. ‘For nobody has known the location of the ocean of milk or the mountains of herbs since the Satya Yuga, and I do not know of anyone who can guide our brave Hanuman there. All the strength and power in the world is useless if one does not have knowledge, and I regret to admit that in the age that we live in, knowledge of such true things is already fading. The devas alone know what will happen when the Kali Yuga comes and the desire for knowledge itself departs from the world. But for now I can only say that I am not possessed of that knowledge, and I do not know of anyone who is.’

Hanuman stared at the face of the guru, then at his king, then at the rakshasa Brahmin, in despair and disbelief. ‘But without knowing the location, how can I—’ He broke off, then tightened his jaw. ‘No matter. I will go seek it out even if it takes me to the end of the Kali Yuga itself. I will not return until I have found the mountains of herbs and brought them back here. As long as there remains a means of saving my lord, I will not rest.’

And with a fierce shout as intense as a battle cry, he flew up into the air and was gone.

‘Hanuman,’ cried Sugreeva. ‘Wait—’ But it was too late, the vanar had already gone. The king of Kiskindha shook his head in anger and frustration. ‘Where will he go? How will he find them? At least while he remains here he can aid us in the war against Lanka. For now more than ever it is imperative we press on and show the enemy that he may kill one or more of us, but in the end we will triumph against all odds, for ours is the just fight and the true cause.’

But nobody around him said a word, for all were silent and still shocked to the core by the sight of Rama and Lakshman lying bound head to toe by the snake arrows of Indrajit, their flesh permeated and poisoned by the heads and bodies of those wriggling creatures.

Sita cried out again.

‘It is another of your tricks. Sorcery! Rama cannot be killed. He is a champion of dharma. You have used your asura maya to create an illusion to deceive me, because you know that I will never accede to your demands. I am not fooled. Rama is still alive, and he will rise up again and resume his war and grind your faces into the ground.’

Ravana looked at her with several varying expressions of morose sympathy. None of his heads was grinning or even smiling, and that unnerved her more than if he had simply laughed aloud and mocked her. Instead, he seemed to be genuinely sorrowful, and that disturbed her intensely. ‘Your husband was a great warrior, Princess,’ he said quietly. ‘But he is no more. Grieve for him as you will, I will not trouble you until you are done with your period of shok. After it is over, and you are ready to speak with me once more, I will come to you and we will discuss how best to continue.’

And he turned away and gestured. The Pushpak, which had been hovering in mid-air for nigh on two nights and a day, began moving again, speeding towards the high vaulting ramparts of Mount Nikumbhila, from which point, she knew, it could enter the vast subterranean palace of Ravana. She did not understand how the palace could be in Lanka as well as in the mountain several yojanas away, but it was, and in any case, at a time like this, it hardly mattered how Ravana deployed his sorcery.

But it does matter, she heard a part of her mind say vehemently. For this too is his sorcery at work. Just as he can create an illusion so immense—placing a palace in two locations at once—so it would be child’s play for him to create the illusion of Rama and Lakshman struck down by snake-arrows.

But the larger part of her mind hesitated. Over the course of the past two nights and a day, she had watched with her own eyes and seen Hanuman dispatch so many rakshasa challengers. Then she had seen the battle joined and many more vanars and bears and rakshasas killed. Had all those deaths been illusions as well? If so, then why would Ravana have wasted so much time? He could simply have created this particular illusion the previous day, and pretended then and there that Indrajit had killed Rama. And what of Hanuman and the other vanars and bears gathered around the fallen two? What of the whole army collected there weeping visibly in distress? What of the hordes of rakshasas who had retreated like kicked dogs? If it were truly an illusion, then surely Ravana’s forces would have continued their attack, pressing home the advantage of their enemy’s shocked state to turn the tide and win the war. Why would they retreat and give Rama’s forces time to grieve and recoup?

Most of all, she knew that Indrajit was indeed endowed by the devas, as was Ravana himself. And she knew that while much of Ravana’s sorcery consisted of illusions, many were as real as anything born of mortal flesh and blood.

Still, she could not let herself believe that Rama was dead. She simply could not. Not until—

‘Prove it to me,’ she said, struggling to keep her voice from revealing the turmoil of her heart. ‘Prove to me that Rama is ... that he is no longer alive. Let me go to him and place my hands upon his body and see for myself.’

Ravana turned back at the sound of her voice and contemplated her with the same morose range of expressions. The Pushpak continued to fly in the direction he had guided it, the wind of their progress gently ruffling the hair on several of his heads, except, of course, the two hairless ones.

Finally he said softly, his words sounding so sincere that she had to remind herself of his deviousness. ‘I understand your need for closure. It is only right that a widow should have the opportunity to grieve over her husband’s body one last time. Rama was a great warrior and deserves that much at least. However, I cannot permit you to go to him under these circumstances.’

There, she thought triumphantly, I have caught him out. He cannot let me examine Rama’s body closely because he knows that I would then be able to see for myself that his ‘death’ is no more than an illusion! I was right to distrust him.

But even as this argument raced through her mind, Ravana added in the same subdued tone: ‘What I can do instead is bring his corpse to you. I will arrange to have it brought within the day in order that you may grieve properly and accept the truth of his demise.’

And he turned away, leaving her dumbstruck, for even the strenuously objecting part of her mind could find no suitable retort to this simple statement of intent.

TEN

It was nearing noonday when Angad heard the sparrow. The only reason he noticed it at all was because the sound of its chirping was so unusual under the circumstances. Being a vanar, he was attuned to the natural rhythm of nature, and had observed the exodus of the birds when Ravana's sorcerous fog enveloped the island-kingdom. Since then he had not heard a single bird sound. Even that might not have been unusual in itself, except that the sound was coming not from a tree or a grove—there were none within miles of this plain—but from the ground.

He looked up from the place where he was sitting, squatting really, along with lakhs of other vanars and bears, near Rama and Lakshman's grotesquely snake-covered bodies. They had sat thus since the midnight hour when Indrajit's arrows had struck. After Hanuman's abrupt departure, the war council had conferred for long hours without finding any satisfactory solution. Finally, when they were approaching their wits' end and starting to surrender to despair, a missive had come from Jambavan who still held the inner city. The bear king said that he had elected to stay in position as it would be foolish to lose such a hard-won strategic advantage; besides which, it had been Rama himself who had ordered him to use the cave route to enter the city and hold it at all costs until the rest of the army breached the gates and entered as well and it would be fish-foolish to disobey that order now simply because Rama was not there to enforce it. Nobody argued with this expectedly eccentric mixture of bear logic and phrasing. But it was the latter part of Jambavan's message that puzzled them. Wait till sundown, said the bear king through the angadiya courier. If Rama is not revived by then, let us go ahead and complete the invasion of Lanka and honour his last wishes by fulfilling his dharma and rescuing Sita.

King Sugreeva had been arguing until then for an immediate resumption of hostilities. On hearing the bear king's message, he grew contemplative and conceded that waiting a day would not harm their cause much. Or if it would harm it, then so could acting at once. As the acting leader of their forces alongwith Jambavan, he concluded that they would indeed wait until the next sundown and if Rama and Lakshman were not revived by that hour, they would proceed with the war.

After that, it had been waiting, waiting, and nothing but waiting.

The mood on the battlefield was one of grieving and heartbreak. Crowds of vanars and bears lined up and formed a procession to come forward in turn, view the snake-infested bodies, and then move on to allow others to take their turn. There was no formal grieving, as it had still not been confirmed that the Ayodhyans were truly dead, and Sugreeva would not have a single one speaking of them or acting as if they were so. So there was no outright weeping and beating of breasts and pulling out of hair, or cutting one's own bodies with claws and sharp blades as some of the tribes were wont to do at the funeral of a great vanar. Only a solemn queue, as each and every warrior, fit and wounded alike, came to see their fallen leader and offer a brief prayer.

As the sun rose and traversed the Lankan sky, the silence on the battlefield had grown thicker and denser, filling Angad's ears and brain until he thought he would scream with frustration. He could not bear to sit around here a moment longer, and yet he must. Hour after hour passed thus, and he began to admire the resolve and discipline of the Arya rishis who could spend years in meditation and spiritual contemplation. He occupied himself with great difficulty by thinking of Kiskindha and of his wife and the new life she was about to bear—or had borne already in his absence, for she had been close to her time, which was the only reason why she had not accompanied him on this campaign. He decided that if it were a boy, they would name him Rama, and if a girl, Sita. Thus, with thoughts of home and family uppermost, he passed the several hours of waiting.

When the sun was approaching its zenith, he was slowly distracted from his reverie by the sound of a sparrow chirping. The very unexpectedness of the sound brought him out of his contemplation. He looked around, seeking its source. To his surprise, it was distinctly coming from the ground. He rose and walked around, seeking it out. Only yards away from where the brothers lay in their terrible living shroud, the ground was churned and ploughed up where a Lankan chariot had crashed and overturned. At the place where the corner of the chariot's cupola had dug a furrow in the ground, he found the broken shell of a tiny egg and the faint tracks of a little fledgling. A few feet away, beside the chariot's shattered wheel, he spied the tiny bird.

He knelt down gently, and moving with exaggerated caution, scooped up the little newborn. It twittered and chirruped indignantly at first, its minuscule claws pricking his palms lightly, then subsided into a tiny ball of feathery warmth and lay there quietly.

‘Hello, little one,’ he whispered softly, still wistful from the hours spent thinking of his own impending fatherhood, and the new life he would be caring for on his return to Kiskindha. ‘This is no place for you.’

He looked around. The endless lines were still moving past the mound for all those who had seen Rama and Lakshman once would queue up immediately to see them again in the wan hope that their situation might somehow have been resolved. The only change that anyone could see was that the snakes seemed to grow more agitated when the sunlight began falling directly upon them, writhing and moving in frenetic patterns that were sickening to watch, and once the sun had risen higher and grown stronger, they had subsided by degrees, until now, a half hour-watch ago when Angad had last checked, they were almost as still as if dead themselves. He had actually reached close enough to touch the body of one particularly thick green snake—the exact shade of a neem leaf—and only when it tightened its coiled grip was he satisfied that the wretched things were still alive.

Everyone assumed that the snakes were susceptible to the heat of the harsh sunlight and as snakes were wont to do, had grown sluggish and overheated by the constant exposure. Since snakes, being cold-blooded creatures, were also wont to die from prolonged exposure to direct sunlight, it was decided that everyone would ensure that no shade fell on the two bodies in the faint, unconvincing hope that the snakes would wither in the heat and leave the body to go in search of cooling shade. Thus far that had not happened, and Angad secretly did not think that these sorcerous snakes shot like arrows from a bow would be affected by the sun as normal snakes were.

‘But you would like the sun, wouldn’t you, my little beauty?’ he said softly to the fledgling in his palm, stroking its back with a finger. He carried it out of the shadow of the fallen chariot and into the sunlight.

The result was electrifying.

He stared in surprise as the little baby bird opened its wings and chirruped loudly. Loudly enough to attract the attention of all around. They looked up, staring in dazed puzzlement, their faces reflecting the stunned awareness of their loss, still unable to accept its reality. Angad stared down at the palm of his hand as the little sparrow grew visibly, expanding in size much the way that he had seen Hanuman do, but only to the extent that it became a full-grown sparrow. Even so, it was an astonishing transformation, accomplished almost in moments instead of the days it ought to have taken. And it had been precipitated simply by exposure to the sun. He could almost feel the warmth of Surya-deva enter the little body and fill it with energy. He recalled something Hanuman had told them on the journey, the tale of Rama's exploits in the dreaded Southwoods forest called Bhayanak-van, which Hanuman in turn had heard repeated by Rama's band of outlaw rebels in the wilderness of Janasthana during his years warring against the rakshasas there.

What was it Hanuman had said? In the Bhayanak-van war against Tataka and her hybrids, the brahmarishi Vishwamitra had timed the confrontation to take place at noon when the sun was at its highest and strongest. And the reason for this was because Rama was descended from the line of Suryavansha, the dynasty of Surya-deva himself, and derived much of his energy from that celestial orb.

It was almost noon now. And Angad was witnessing a just-born sparrow grow to full maturity with the aid of the sun god's light alone.

The sparrow twittered again, this time in the full-throated voice of an adult bird and flew up into the air a few yards above the mound. All eyes turned to watch it instinctively. It hovered there, flapping its wings frantically, and Angad stared at it because he knew that sparrows, like most other birds, could not hover long in the same place. Certainly not as long as this sparrow.

As he watched, the sparrow's wings beat faster, until they were a blur, seeming almost to stand still.

The sparrow split into two.

Now, there were two sparrows, both full-grown, both hovering.

Both chirruped together, and instantly split into two each.

Now, there were four.

They split into eight.

Then sixteen

Then ... at this point, Angad lost the ability to count how many sparrows there were, for the splitting increased in speed, taking place so fast that it was as if sparrows were emerging from thin air—or from a beam of sunlight. In moments, there were hundreds, then thousands, then tens of thousands, and finally, a cloud—the size of a small hill—hung over the heads of the staring vanars and bears, and over the snake-infested bodies of Rama and Lakshman.

The sound made by those lakhs of sparrows was enormous, filling the air for miles around. Angad felt his father at his side, staring up in amazement. ‘What are they doing? Where did they come from?’ asked Sugreeva.

Finding himself momentarily unable to answer, Angad simply pointed upwards.

The cloud of sparrows had resolved itself into a distinct shape, unmistakable even when seen from this angle. It was the shape of a gigantic eagle.

Plaksa came up slowly to Angad’s left, aided by his great-grandsons. ‘Garuda,’ he said in a reverential voice. ‘There can be no doubt about it. The lord of birds has himself descended from swarga-lok.’

The enormous eagle-shaped mass of sparrows hovered a moment longer above the mound. Sensing what it intended to do, Angad broke out of his stupor and called out urgently to his lieutenants. They obeyed instantly, and the troops gathered around the mound responded with matching swiftness. In moments, everyone had moved back, clearing the mound.

The gigantic eagle, for that was what it was, Angad knew now for certain, dipped low, the point of its beak aimed at the prone form of Rama. Darting down, it plucked at a snake’s tail and tugged at it sharply, yanking the snake free of Rama's body. It came loose with a sucking sound that was disturbing to hear, and with its head and body covered in bloody slime. Jerking its neck, the eagle gobbled down the snake as if it were no more than a worm. It pecked sharply at another snake, pulled it out and swallowed it down as well. It continued pulling out snakes and eating them with a seemingly bottomless appetite. Angad knew that this 'eagle' was nothing more than a cloud of sparrows clustered closely together. Then how could little sparrows pluck out snakes almost as thick as his own wrist and swallow them down one after another? This convinced him that this was indeed Garuda himself, descended to earth.

'He is not permitted to come to our realm during this age, the Treta Yuga,' said Plaksa. 'Hence he chooses this form.'

'And he has come to save us,' Sugreeva exulted.

They watched as the great being consumed the last of the snakes binding Rama. The mortal yodha remained prone on the ground, his body covered with numerous lacerations resembling snake bites. For a brief moment of doubt, Angad feared that even the great bird lord's efforts had failed, that Rama was already dead and would remain so. But then he recalled what Plaksa had said earlier: If they are already dead, then why would Indrajit's arrow-snakes not leave the corpses? The only purpose the snakes serve is to keep them bound and helpless in a deathlike state. For only by continually infusing their bodies with their toxic venom can they keep the sons of Dasaratha unconscious. The moment they stop biting them, the Brahman shakti in their blood will rid their bodies of the toxins and they will revive.

Even as he watched, Garuda finished removing the last of the snakes from Lakshman's body as well.

Then the bird lord moved forward and extended his arms. They had bird claws, but they were also anthropomorphic hands, somewhat like the half-bird, half-man form of Rama's late lamented associate Jatayu whom he had seen on one or two occasions. Except that Garuda, the eagle lord of the heavenly realms, was much more beautiful, proud and fierce than Jatayu, the vulture lord of the hellish realms. Garuda touched his hands to Rama's forehead and leaned forward as if to kiss him. Angad distinctly watched the lord of birds draw something out of Rama's head, and saw a greenish effusion, like a wisp of jadecoloured liquid, pass out of Rama and into the sparrow cloud. Garuda repeated this with Lakshman, ridding both brothers of the toxins accumulated in their bodies.

Then Garuda moved back, the wind of his great wings compelling Angad and the others to move back as well.

After a long, anxious moment, Rama's eyes opened. A moment or two later he began to stir, first leaning on his elbow, then sitting up unsupported.

The cheer that rose from the assembled vanar and bear armies was enough to make the earth shake.

Soon after, Lakshman revived as well.

Both brothers sat up and stared at the remarkable being that hovered before them.

Rama joined his palms and said in a voice as calm and peaceful as if he had woken from a deep sleep, not a near-death state. 'You have brought our spirits back from the realm of Yama-deva who was transporting us to the afterlife. You have given us back our strength and rid our bodies of the last drop of venom. Who are you, great and shining one, and how may we repay you for this great boon of life you have given us?'

Out of the cloud of sparrows, came a sound like a bird calling in the distance. It was the sweetest, most beautiful birdsong Angad had ever heard. In its tone he could hear something akin to language, yet far beyond the clumsy mechanism of words and their inefficient sounds. It was a pure, clear song that went directly to his soul and was understood perfectly in all its subtle nuances and numerous shades of meanings. Putting that lyrical song into crude speech would have made it sound something like this:

~I am Garuda,~ it said. ~I came here because you were entrapped by Ravana's son using the powers of the devas who were compelled to aid him in his war. Nothing on this realm could have saved you. And your great and valiant follower, despite his enormous strength and loyalty, could never have found the mountains of herbs in the ocean of milk. Hence Lord Indra sent me here to aid you.~

‘Indra-deva?’ Lakshman asked. ‘Why does he take an interest in our lives?’

~Recall who it was who felled you thus, and why he bears his given name.~

Indrajit. Literally, Defeater of Indra. So named for his victory over the king of the realm of the devas. Of course Indra had a vested stake in seeing Indrajit foiled. Angad smiled at the irony and appropriateness of the deva’s act.

~And since he cannot come himself, for all the devas are forbidden to directly use their powers to attack or defeat Ravana and his forces in any fashion, he sent me here to revive you. It was the only way.~

Rama and Lakshman stood and joined their palms together in perfect unison, bowing in tandem before the lord of all birdkind. ‘We thank you, great one. Please assure Lord Indra on our behalf that we shall do everything in our power to defeat the rakshasa who once humiliated him and took his name as a reminder of that incident.’

Garuda issued a sound that, had he been a mortal, would have sounded like delighted laughter. ~You will indeed, Lord Rama. We already know this. Farewell.~

And with a flurry of wings, the cloud of birds started blurring faster and faster, until in the gap between one blink of an eye and the next, it simply disappeared out of existence.

A single feather floated to the ground on the cool refreshing sea breeze that had suddenly begun to blow from the east. Angad went and picked it up. It was a sparrow feather, tiny and soft. He looked up at the clear, cloudless azure-blue sky. The sun was directly overhead. The time was precisely noon.

ELEVEN

Ravana received the news with equanimity.

‘I see,’ was all he said.

He sat upon his great throne and looked out impassively upon the crowd of ministers of war, generals, and other officers of Lanka’s governance, several of his heads apparently sleeping or engaged in deep contemplation. No, not contemplation, Supanakha thought, meditation. But why is Ravana meditating at a time like this? And why is he taking the news so calmly?

‘My lord,’ said one of the generals. ‘I say to you, the leaders of the invading army, the mortals Rama Chandra and his brother Lakshman, have freed themselves of Indrajit’s arrow-snakes and risen up once again. They appear to be unharmed and in perfect health. Even as we speak they are marshalling their troops and preparing to attack the capital.’

There was a pause during which everyone waited for Ravana to respond. The king of Lanka gazed out into the distance with three of his heads, one appearing to be softly chanting some kind of shloka—or could it possibly be a song? Surely not! Supanakha resisted the urge to giggle. If she didn’t know better, she would think that Ravana was growing senile at last!

Finally, one of his heads seemed to notice that everyone was staring at him. The head frowned and looked around. ‘Yes, I heard you before. Rama and Lakshman are revived once again. They are about to attack us. And you,’ he indicated another general, ‘said that the bear king and his forces are already in possession of the northern quarter and are preparing to fight their way out.’ He nodded at yet another rakshasa, a war minister more renowned for his amassed wealth than his victories. ‘And you said that the troops are on the verge of revolt, that there seems to be some rumour abroad that Rama’s wife was unjustly abducted by me, and that I provoked this whole war and endangered the entire rakshasa race in doing so.’

The war minister paled and quickly made several obsequious gestures. ‘Not in so many words, your highness,’ he said nervously.

‘It is what you meant, if not what you said,’ Ravana said imperiously. ‘Let’s stop beating about the bush now, shall we? We’re in a sticky situation. The enemy is at the gates, their numbers are still greater than our own, and they have infiltrated our city. With the morale of our troops already faltering, we do not have much hope of turning this war around in our favour. And to make an already bad situation worse, it now appears that the whole thing might have been one great misunderstanding.'

'A misunderstanding?' asked one of the generals, a younger rakshasa sworn in quickly to replace his father, a veteran of the wars against the devas and a legendary warrior. The son was clearly not a patch on his illustrious forebear. He looked as if he had eaten something rotten for his morning meal. For that matter, almost every one in the chamber looked wan and sickly, and the way they had blanched at Ravana's words made it clear that he had struck too close to the truth for their comfort.

'Yes, a misunderstanding,' Ravana replied. 'You know what I mean. These things happen. It's no use crying over it now, anyway. We will go on, of course. With the war, I mean. Send Indrajit out again, and don't fret, I've made arrangements for my brother to be awoken.'

'But, sire,' said the minister for procreation. 'Your brother Vibhisena has betrayed us and joined Rama's forces! In fact, we suspect it is his excellent knowledge of the city that gives these bear warriors the advantage.'

Ravana regarded the minister with two heads, one of which looked as if it was eyeing a crushed insect on the underside of a boot. 'I meant my other brother, minister. Now, if you will all leave me, I wish to undertake my afternoon meditation ritual. Do go ahead and make all the usual necessary arrangements to repel the invaders.'

Stunned silence greeted this extraordinary response.

After a pause, during which the heavy, anxious breathing of several generals could be clearly heard, Queen Mandodhari stepped forward. 'Is that all you have to say, my lord? We are facing the possibility of defeat against the greatest threat that has ever confronted rakshasakind, and you wish to undertake your afternoon meditation ritual?'

'Yes,' Ravana rumbled in a sonorous tone. 'One must keep up one's rituals regardless of all distractions.'

Mandodhari looked genuinely puzzled. 'Is that what you consider this situation to be? A distraction?'

‘Yes, my dear,’ Ravana said, yawning with two heads and making no attempt to even conceal his boredom. ‘A tedious, inane, irrelevant distraction.’

A chorus of anxious whispers spread like butterflies around the chamber. Mandodhari stepped closer to the vaulting dais, the silver anklets on her shapely ankles tinkling as she walked across the black marble floor. ‘And why is that?’

Ravana looked down at her as if peeved that she actually expected an answer. ‘Isn’t it obvious?’

‘If it was I wouldn’t be asking, would I?’ She gestured at the roomful of anxious warlords. ‘Pardon me, but I am not as well versed in the craft of war as these gentlemen. Pray, do explain to me why this situation, which seems pressing and near disastrous to my guileless eyes, is such an irrelevance to you, my lord?’

Ravana sighed and shook two heads sleepily, then nodded wearily. ‘Very well, then. It is unfortunate that Indrajit’s arrows were unsuccessful. But no doubt this is the result of more sorcery on Rama’s part. As are the rumours among our troops and the confusion in their minds—all evidence of his continued sorcery. I have our royal wizards at work on this problem already and it will be redressed very shortly. As for the enemy advancing, well, I think you will all agree that my brother Kumbhakarna is more than sufficient to repel any and all comers—in fact, he’s capable of destroying their entire army on his own, wouldn’t you agree, my queen? And then there is still Indrajit and all you other great warriors to contend with. Not to mention the fact that I have yet to enter the fray and have not even fired a single arrow as of yet. That is why I require to undertake my afternoon meditation ritual, to prepare myself.’

‘And will you?’ Mandodhari asked.

Ravana regarded her for a moment. ‘Will I what?’

‘Fire a single arrow? Or more?’

He smiled then, with several of his heads at once. ‘I began this war. I shall end it.’

He rose to his feet and said, in that manner which Supanakha found simultaneously arrogant and attractive: ‘And I know only one way to end a war—by winning it. Does anybody here doubt that I shall emerge the victor in this conflict? If you do, then say so now. Otherwise, get the devil out of here and go do your jobs, as I shall do mine. We have an enemy to destroy, and a war to win. Let’s not waste time standing around here bickering like old women.’

At his words, the entire room erupted into activity. In moments, everyone had exited hurriedly. Supanakha noted that several looked relieved and more confident than when they had entered, but the majority still appeared ill at ease and confused.

Mandodhari remained standing where she was, at the foot of the dais.

‘I shall go and pray for you to be triumphant on the field today,’ she said.

‘Then you do believe I will triumph?’ he asked quietly.

‘Should I have reason to doubt it?’ she asked in an even quieter tone.

‘Have you ever known me to fail before?’

‘I have never known you to act this way over a mortal woman.’

‘This war is over a mortal man, not a woman. The woman is only a tool.’

‘I see,’ she said. ‘Then why not return her now and resolve that issue?’

‘All issues will be resolved soon. With the end of this war.’

‘People are saying things.’

‘It is what people do.’

‘But this is different. They are saying you are acting oddly. Confused. Erratic. They say you are hardly seen in person. They say you are indulging in arcane sorceries that even the court wizards fear to speak about. They say omens are everywhere, indicating the destruction of our country, our kingdom, our race. They say that Rama is not the evil villain he is made out to be, but a misunderstood hero who is the righteous one in this conflict. They say we are the villains to oppose him.’

Ravana shrugged. 'I said that this is a misunderstanding. But now it is a misunderstanding that can only be resolved by finishing this war. And I intend to finish it, one way or another. Let people say what they will. I can only do what I must. That is my dharma.'

'Your dharma?' She shook her head. 'They also say that Rama is a warrior of dharma, and that we are the ones fighting against dharma. They say that is why Indrajit's arrows did not kill him, because Lord Indra himself sent Garuda down to earth in the guise of a cloud of sparrows to resurrect Rama and Lakshman. And this is evidence that the devas, although bound by their ancient vows to you and compelled to serve you in your war, are in fact favourable to Rama and his forces and will subvert your every move to ensure your loss and his victory.'

He stepped down from the dais, taking his time, his impressive bulk dominating the chamber, a fitting figure for a room filled with magnificent statuary and art. He looked like the king he was. When he was on the same level as Mandodhari, he reached out slowly, gently even, and took her hands in his own. Even she looked surprised at this action. It was not a very Ravanalike gesture.

'You have told me all that the people say and the people think and the people believe. Now tell me what you believe.'

And he looked deep into her eyes, waiting for her answer.

The devil, Supanakha thought, curling her tail in the alcove in which she sat, he has truly changed, he has. Either that, or he is giving the most excellent performance of his life, and that is saying something, given that I am one of the finest actors of our time!

Mandodhari tried to shift her eyes away, caught off guard by the simple directness and gentleness of his query. But to ignore or avoid it would be as good as a reply in itself and she was too intelligent to make that mistake. She forced herself to return Ravana's look levelly. Sighed deeply. And admitted the truth. 'I believe that you are my husband, and the master of Lanka. And that in all you do, you keep the welfare of this nation and race uppermost. Even if it serves your own purpose, it also serves the purpose of the rakshasa people. And that is why, however distasteful some of your acts may be to me personally, however much I disagree with your decisions and choices individually, as a whole I endorse you completely and support you with all my might and my strength. And I shall continue to do so until death parts us.'

He looked at her a moment longer, then bent down and kissed her. Supanakha craned her neck, trying to see which face he had used, but it was impossible to tell for sure from this angle. The first one on the right rack? Or was it the second one on the left rack? Damn. If she had known he was going to do that, she would have taken up a better spot.

Then it was over, and he was holding his wife in his arms, so tenderly that Supanakha could scarcely believe that this was the same Ravana who enjoyed servicing several dozen rakshasis on a given night, and treated them all like they were whores of the lowliest class. And what was that bit about dharma? Ravana and dharma? She scratched behind her ear with a half-extended talon. Something odd was going on here, that much was certain.

'Continue believing and supporting me a little while longer then, my queen,' he said softly. 'It is all I ask.'

After Mandodhari had left the chamber, Ravana glanced up at the alcove where Supanakha reclined. 'You can come down now, my cousin.'

She scowled, but descended quickly and lithely.

He looked at her contemplatively. 'I trust I did not hurt you overmuch when I struck you in the chariot. But it was necessary to gain the mortal woman's trust and to make a point to her.'

Was he really apologising to her? Impossible! Aloud she said archly, 'Mandodhari was right, you are obsessed with that woman.'

He gestured dismissively. 'It hardly matters now. Things are coming to an end.'

'So I see.' She looked around as she stalked the floor slowly. 'I am trying to imagine Rama occupying this chamber as King of Lanka.'

He chuckled. ‘You will not succeed in provoking me today, my dear. I am not that Ravana you could once rely on to tease and arouse.’

She glanced up at him sharply. What did he mean? Had he read her mind just now? She knew he could, but never knew when he actually did so. But more importantly, what did he mean by that?

‘Who are you, then? Rama Chandra of Ayodhya?’

He laughed appreciatively. ‘Nicely put. Now, enough banter. I have a small chore for you. A little charade I wish you to enact.’

She swished her tail from side to side. ‘Who do you wish me to play this time? You? I could do a better job than you’re doing right now!’

He only managed a tiny humourless grin at that. ‘Actually, I had in mind a role you’re much better suited to play. I believe you’ve even played it successfully once before, and fooled none other than Rama himself, if only for a while.’

She pricked her ears up. Could he possibly mean ... ?

‘Yes, my dearest cousin. I wish you to take the guise of Sita for a little demonstration I have planned. This time, however, you needn’t worry that you’ll be found out. Because you’ll only be seen from afar. And only for a brief while.’

TWELVE

They were ready to attack Lanka when Lakshman pointed upwards at the sky. Rama glanced up, hoping to see Hanuman returning, but it turned out to be Ravana’s golden flying chariot again. This time, the lord of Lanka had altered the vehicle—or commanded it to alter itself, more likely—to display only a single level. And from what Rama could make out at this distance, there were only a handful of people riding in it. He watched as it came closer, much closer than it had before, and descended low enough so that he could see the people riding within as clearly as he could see Angad and Sugreeva on the field ahead, supervising the formation of ranks for the advance.

There were only two persons in the Pushpak. Ravana himself. And Sita.

Rama and Lakshman exchanged a glance. Rama knew what Lakshman meant by that look: What is that devil up to now? He wondered the same thing, but didn't waste time speculating. He had a feeling he would find out soon enough.

When Ravana's voice rang out, Rama had been expecting it for several moments. It was the only reason for the rakshasa to halt the flying chariot at such a place, directly before him, and hovering over the middle of the field, perfectly placed to be visible to all of Rama's forces as well as to Lanka's troops by the walls of the capital city. The voice was a booming baritone, amplified somehow through Ravana's sorcery, for once again the tide had turned and a new chapter had begun in the annals of the war: anything was possible next, from sorcery to treachery.

'Rama Chandra of Ayodhya,' said the voice that so many had feared for so long. 'You have committed genocide against the asura races at Mithila, you have slaughtered innocent rakshasas and other asuras on countless occasions, you have ravished and tortured and mutilated my sister Supanakha, and killed her brothers, you have conspired with Sugreeva the Usurper and on his behalf murdered his brother Vali, the rightful vanar king of Kiskindha. Your crimes are countless, your offences beyond measure, and now, by invading Lanka and attacking my people without rightful provocation or cause, you have proved yet again that you are a tyrant with an infinite capacity for cruelty. You are an enemy of dharma, and so it is only fitting that you be judged by the laws of dharma itself.'

Nala, who was the nearest to the brothers, looked up angrily and shouted. 'How dare he! Rama, you must stop him from speaking more lies and deceit. Cut him down with your celestial astras.'

Several hundred other voices echoed Nala's sentiments, shouting angry threats and retorts at the vahan hovering above them.

Rama replied steadily. 'If I attack him now, it will be perceived that I did not wish him to relate my alleged crimes and sought to shut him up. I must let him continue to the very end. After that, I shall take action if necessary.' He called out to his people, his voice carried across the field by instant word of mouth. 'Let him speak!'

Lakshman nodded. 'The more lies he speaks, the more he strengthens our cause.'

'Wisely spoken, my brother,' Rama said.

But Ravana did more than speak next.

Instead, he turned and grasped Sita by the shoulders. At that, both Rama and Lakshman lost their composure. To see Ravana so much as touch Rama's wife, to see her wriggling in his grip, and his muscular arms grasping her forcefully with power enough to crush her to death in an instant, was more than either one could bear. This was beyond lies and insults; this was an affront to the dignity of Sita and a mortal threat to her.

At once, Rama spoke the shloka of incantation and the Bow of Vishnu appeared in his grasp, glowing blue even in the bright afternoon light.

'This is the reason you came to Lanka, is it not?' Ravana's voice boomed. 'To recover this mortal harlot of yours to whom you would not even give the status of wife? This woman who seduced me and persuaded me to help her flee your tyranny by bringing her to Lanka where she would be safe from your wicked treatment? And now I find that in fact she is in league with you, and has been all along. That both of you devised this ingenious plan to dupe me, exploiting my sense of dharma and fair play. In fact, she is your mate in the commission of wrongdoing. Your partner in evil. It has taken me far too long to understand this and to recognise her for what she truly is. But now I know. And knowing her true evil nature, I will not let her survive to dupe other unsuspecting males and provoke other needless wars. Too many have died already. You have rejected my previous efforts to make peace and consistently thwarted every attempt to parley. Now I ask you one final time, before all your forces as well as mine, do you agree to yield here and now, and return home across the ocean with your army?'

Lakshman clenched his sword so tightly that his fist turned white. Had it been any other metal but steel, it would probably have bent. As it was, the imprint of his fingers would certainly be embedded permanently in the grip of the weapon. 'It is a trick, Rama. Do not listen to him or answer. Fire your arrow now. Destroy him!'

‘I cannot,’ Rama said softly but fiercely, even as his heart agreed with Lakshman. Shouting as loudly as he could, he replied: ‘If you wish this war to end here and now, rakshasa, then you have but to release Sita. Hand her over to me this instant, and I promise you I will return with my forces, never to return to this land again. But first take your hands off my wife and face me like a man, you craven!’

Ravana’s grin was visible even at this distance, as was his hand on Sita’s neck. His wrist alone was thrice as thick as her slender throat. Lakshman shook the sword in a wordless threat, and at that, the rakshasa grinned even more broadly, all his faces showing their teeth together. ‘So you refuse yet again. As I expected. Then you leave me no choice. I trust that by doing what I do next, I will show you that your threats and abuses and terror tactics will not move me one whit. For I am the descendant of Pulastya himself, and we are honourable soldiers of dharma. It is in the name of dharma that I commit this execution of a known enemy of the Lankan state.’

And without further ado, he raised a dagger in another fist and, holding Sita’s head backwards in a grip so firm that Rama could see the imprint of the rakshasa’s fingers on her pale neck, Ravana slit her throat from side to side, allowing her lifeblood to gush out in a torrent, staining the railing of Pushpak, and splashing below onto the field of battle, onto the shocked ranks of the vanars of Kiskindha.

Lakshman howled his anguish and leaped forward as if he would attempt to spring up onto the flying vehicle. And indeed, as he bounded across the fifty-odd yards to the spot where Sita’s blood had been spilt, he seemed capable of leaping twenty yards high. For both of their maha-shaktis had been activated once more, and Rama could feel the power coursing through his veins. He could not stem it this time any more than he could stop himself from loosing the Arrow of Shiva.

‘Sita!’ he cried. And released the cord of the Bow.

The Arrow shot forward in a blaze of blue light, racing towards the Pushpak where Ravana stood, holding Sita’s lifeless body like a rag doll. It sped over Lakshman’s head even as he roared and leaped high in the air.

But in a blur of movement faster than anything Rama had seen before, the celestial vehicle vanished from sight. The last thing he saw was Ravana's ten heads grinning malevolently at him. But even in that moment of ultimate tragedy, he would recall that one of those ten heads, just one, was neither grinning nor smiling, merely gazing at him with a sincere, almost sorrowful expression. Perhaps it was the preternatural clarity of vision resulting from the maha-shakti awakened within his blood, or the intense stress of the moment, but he knew he would carry that final image with him to the end of his life; and the conviction that that single face, bearing an expression so starkly different from the nine others, was the true face of Ravana.

The Arrow passed through empty air, and not finding a target, halted. It hung there a moment, then vanished, reappearing in Rama's hand instantly.

Lakshman's leap carried him through the same space a fraction of an instant later. His sword sliced through empty air as well, finding no opponent. He fell back to the ground, landing easily on his feet, and looked around, seeking out his enemy. Finding none, he howled his anger and frustration.

'To Lanka,' he roared at the top of his voice, his words amplified by the power of his shakti, resounding across the battlefield.

As one, the ranks of vanars and bears responded with anger and outrage no less than Lakshman's. 'TO LANKA!'

The armies of Rama charged forward.

Sita heard the roars of Rama's armies and heard the reverberation of their charge. She felt a secret thrill ripple through her body: Rama's forces were attacking! That could mean only one thing. That Rama and Lakshman were alive and leading their armies in a final assault on Lanka.

Her joy was short-lived. A towering shadow loomed across the grassy ground of her exotic prison.

She turned to see Ravana standing beside her. He was uncharacteristically silent and subdued, his faces for once revealing almost nothing of their inner processes. It was the first time she had seen him so subdued. It frightened her more than any display of machismo or power. Still, she would not show him any emotion.

‘My husband’s armies are attacking,’ she said to him proudly. ‘It will not be long now before he comes and frees me, and deals with you.’

He sighed. ‘It grieves me to disagree with you at a time like this, my lady Sita. But I am afraid your husband will not be going anywhere now, or ever again. I intrude upon your privacy only to carry out my promise. As I said I would, I have brought you proof of Rama’s demise. I urge you yet again to accept his death now and make a mutually beneficial pact with me. I will leave you with this evidence and return shortly to have your final answer. This is the last time I will parley with you. The next time I come here, if you are still unwilling to cooperate, I will do as I must. Perhaps even as my son did to your husband.’

And with those words, he laid down an object he had been carrying, turned, and left the Ashoka grove.

She scarcely dared to walk the five or six steps to the spot where he had placed the object. And when she had covered that distance, seemingly miles to her heightened consciousness, she could barely work up the courage to uncover the cloth that concealed the item.

When she did, her entire being froze with shock.

Rama’s severed head lay there, staring up at her blindly, his skin turned blackish-blue and his face covered with numerous snake bites.

Rama was lost in the fog of Brahman. It had been fourteen years since the last time he had surrendered himself to the power of the maha-shakti. Then, Brahmarishi Vishwamitra had been there to leash him and help him control himself. Now there was nobody with the power to control or restrict him, only the blinding blue fury that burned his every cell, set his brain ablaze and turned him into a remorseless fighting machine. He was barely aware of his actions, sensing only that he was killing a great number of the enemy, slaying them by the dozen, the score and the hundred, and still the numbers mounted steadily ... None could face him, none could survive. He loosed the Arrow of Shiva repeatedly, using it to kill entire companies of rakshasas at once, to blast holes in the walls of Lanka, to smash through the gates of the city, to swat hundreds of rakshasas from the ramparts like ants off a platform.

Then he grew aware that he was within Lanka, and killing more rakshasas, destroying houses, bringing down entire structures with a single loosing of the Arrow. He employed his sword now, for it was not seemly to use the Arrow for such trivial destructions as killing rakshasas. He could slay countless numbers with his blade alone, flashing, swirling, circling, swinging, flying, leaping, severing, hacking, cutting, slicing ...

He came to his senses once, briefly, in a scene of such carnage and destruction that he was shocked to the core. It took him a painful moment to realise that he had been responsible for this devastation. All around him his followers were battling rakshasas. He saw Nala and his company fighting a rakshasa in a chariot surrounded by a force of albino rakshasas with long curved spears for weapons. He saw Sugreeva fighting a rakshasa wielding a mace, using the same spear shaft as his weapon. He saw Angad pitted against a trio of female rakshasis who screamed like banshees and sent their young scurrying to nip and claw at Angad from behind, but Angad's angadiyas, now no longer needed to pass on messages because the time for talking was long past, fought the little rakshasas, meeting them at their own height and matching their ferocity.

He saw houses burning and citizens screaming, children being flung from rooftops by desperate parents, falling to the ground to land injured but still alive, while their parents died consumed by flames. He saw sights so terrible he wondered why men fought wars and whether any cause was worthy of such carnage and horror, whether dharma itself was sufficient justification for such violence. He felt the war lust swell up inside himself again, and fought to control it. But then he remembered his last glimpse of Sita's face, that look of utter surprise as Ravana cut her throat, as if she had expected him to treat her roughly, rudely, even violently, but nothing as drastic as this, nothing as final as death.

And he submitted to the call of his fury again, hating himself for doing so, but hating even more the one who had driven him to this pass.

Ravana.

He would slaughter every last rakshasa in Lanka until he found and fought the king of rakshasas. Where was Ravana?

THIRTEEN

Sugreeva saw Rama resume fighting and almost turned away. It was excruciating to watch the mortal fight in this state: not only because of the sheer brutal efficiency with which he slew the enemy, giving them virtually no chance of reprisal or defence, but because of the anguish that drove him. He felt some of that anguish too, for he knew what it felt like to have one's wife taken by force and forced to submit to an enemy, but in his case, that wife had been married first to the same enemy, his brother Vali, and so she was only returning to her first husband in a sense. Whereas Rama had lost Sita first to the most dreaded foe of all living races, Ravana; and now, he had lost her to that final enemy of all creatures, the lord of death. From whose cold embrace, she could never be returned.

Sugreeva fought on with anguish as well, but in his case it was tempered with experience, age and wisdom. He grew slowly aware that while their forces had entered Lanka and were in occupancy of the capital city, the rakshasas were still fighting back with great vehemence. This war was approaching an end very fast, but it was far from won yet.

He had just dispatched a particularly troublesome opponent, a burly mace-wielding rakshasa, and had cracked his tree in doing so, when he heard the noise and felt the thunder.

At first he thought it was the killing stones once again, Ravana's sorcery at work. But what would be the good of using it here? Did the lord of Lanka intend to kill his own people as well as the enemy? For how could mindless sorcery distinguish friend from foe?

Then the afternoon sky darkened.

And he looked up to see a shape looming high above the city spires. So high above in fact, that he thought at first that the rakshasa was floating in the air. For the creature's head was so far above the ground that he could not even see it clearly. All he could see was a body so enormous it towered upwards endlessly, tapering as it went higher, until its upper body and arms and head were lost against the brilliant blue afternoon sky.

Then the rakshasas all around began crying out triumphantly, 'Kumbhakarna! Kumbhakarna!' And he knew that this was the other brother that Vibhisena had warned them about.

Angad gazed up in horror as the looming form towered above them all, rakshasa and vanar and bear alike. From the exultant shouts of the rakshasas all around, he knew who this mighty being must be, but even so he could not comprehend the evidence of his senses. Could anything be so enormous, so powerful? And a rakshasa at that? He had thought Hanuman's expanded size to be unbelievable, but to see a mortal enemy this huge was almost enough to cause him to freeze into permanent immobility. For how could he fight such a mountain of a being? How could anyone fight this creature?

He watched with naked horror as the giant rakshasa stopped and looked down, examining the scene before him. Very faintly he could make out a gargantuan head peering down, tilting one way, then the other. Then the rakshasa seemed to reach a decision, and with a roar that vibrated through Angad's very bones, he raised one impossibly large foot and brought it down upon a mass of vanars swarming through the city gates.

The giant foot came down upon the closely crowding vanars like Angad's own foot might come down upon a bunch of grapes. A thousand vanar lives were squashed instantly, along with a few dozen rakshasas. Twisting his foot this way and that, the giant raised it again and grunted with approval at the result. Then he put the foot down and used the other one to step on a party of bears battling a rakshasa in a chariot. This time Kumbhakarna attempted to avoid injuring his own kind, and almost succeeded. But the edge of his heel touched the back of the chariot a brief, glancing blow. That was enough to send the chariot flying end over end, throwing its occupant, apparently a rakshasa general of some importance, so far up in the air that he must surely have been flung all the way to the ocean, like that opponent Hanuman had swung and thrown on the battlefield that ...

Hanuman!

He alone could tackle this impossible mountain of a rakshasa. Where was he? Still searching for the mountains of herbs? If only there was some way to let him know they had need of him, that Rama and Lakshman had already been revived and it was he they required now, for without him, this monster would surely destroy them all, even if he killed half of his own forces in the process.

But several hour-watches later, as the sun was setting again, there was still no sign of Hanuman. The situation was growing desperate now. Most of their troops had concealed themselves within the ruins and remains of Lankan structures, often only yards away from their rakshasa enemies. For the moment, this seemed to be working. Kumbhakarna was roaring and calling out in anger, his bellows filling the sky and his breath so great that the stench of it wafted down to where Angad stood in the foyer of what was once a grand mansion of some rich rakshasa. The giant's breath stank of rotting meat and wine on an epic scale.

Angad looked at his father and at Rama. Rama, who had been a whirling dervish of violence until King Sugreeva had called to him to desist as they needed to speak. At first Angad had thought Rama would strike down the vanar king without a second thought, but then he saw recognition cloud Rama's bright blue eyes—those eerie eyes that would haunt Angad's dreams for ever—and he lowered his dripping sword. Once Rama had subsided, Lakshman followed suit at once.

'Use your weapon, Rama,' Lakshman advised. 'But be careful not to draw his attention, or he will attack all our friends as well. And they will not all be able to move out of his way quickly enough to avoid being crushed.'

Sugreeva agreed. 'For all his bulk, the giant is fast.'

Rama nodded slowly. 'I must draw him out somewhere in the open, away from you all. Perhaps if I race out into the field and attract his attention, taunting him and forcing him to follow ... '

Angad frowned. 'But if you do that, you will be exposed and unable to conceal yourself.'

Rama shrugged. 'It is the only way.'

Sugreeva shook his head. 'No, Rama. I have seen something of your powers. The maha-shakti you possess, as well as the astras, they give you great power to kill and destroy, but they do not protect you personally against blows or weaponry. If the giant crushes you beneath his foot, you will be killed. It may be more difficult to destroy you or Lakshman than any of us, but you are not completely invulnerable.'

Lakshman glanced at Rama. 'Then let me go. I will draw him out and you shoot him with the Arrow of Shiva from the safety of a hiding place here in the ruins.'

Rama shook his head. 'We will both go. Two can dance better than one, and he will not know which of us to chase.'

'He will know soon enough the instant you fire the Arrow at him.'

'Once I fire the Arrow, nothing else will matter.'

Vibhisena cleared his throat. Mostly a silent observer, and looking anguished at the sight of his countrymen slaughtered and his city devastated, the rakshasa nevertheless continued to offer his advice whenever needed or asked for. He offered it now. 'It may not be that simple, Rama. My brother Kumbhakarna was granted the gift of indestructibility by Lord Brahma himself. It is another matter that he fumbled the boon and was cleverly given the gift of narcolepsy as well, compelling him to sleep for half a year at a stretch. I do not believe either the Bow of Vishnu or the Arrow of Shiva, or indeed any other celestial weapon will harm him.'

Rama and Lakshman both stared at Vibhisena. 'Are you certain of this?' Rama asked, looking vexed.

‘Absolutely,’ Vibhisena answered. ‘Your astras and your mahashakti will be no match for him. To the best of my knowledge, Kumbhakarna cannot be destroyed.’

Before anyone else could speak, a great crashing sound came from somewhere nearby, perhaps only a mile away. A vanar came leaping in, eyes goggling with fear. ‘The giant is attacking again.’

They came out of the ruined mansion to see Kumbhakarna, his patience lost by now, stamping on houses at random, uncaring whether they were occupied by friends or foe. Each time he brought his foot down, a house was razed to the ground, with all its occupants crushed to fragments like the rubble of the structure itself, sending up a puff of dust several hundred yards high. Puffs of dust were visible all across the city as Kumbhakarna continued his rampage with a vengeance.

‘He is slightly irritated now,’ Vibhisena said. ‘He has poor eyesight and the failing light is making it harder for him to see.’

Angad stared at the giant pounding lives and buildings into rubble like a child squashing sand mounds on a beach.

Rama called on the Bow of Vishnu and set the Arrow of Shiva to it.

Lakshman turned to him. ‘What are you doing, bhai? You heard Vibhisena. Even dev-astras will not destroy the giant.’

‘We must do something,’ Rama said grimly. ‘Those are our people dying there. I cannot stand by and let him continue killing our troops unhindered.’

Lakshman gripped Rama’s arm firmly, preventing him from drawing back the bowstring. ‘Rama, listen to reason.’

Rama stared at his brother with an intensity Angad had never seen on his face before. ‘The time for reason is long past, Lakshman. It is only time for the madness of war now. Leave my hand and let me shoot.’

Lakshman’s hand remained on Rama’s arm, his eyes returning Rama’s intensity with a fire of his own. Angad felt sick to the stomach at the prospect of the brothers fighting one another, after all they had been through together and endured.

‘My lords!’

The voice of Kambunara turned all heads. The bear was waving at them from the end of the street, from behind a partly destroyed wall that hid him from the gaze of the giant on the far side of the city. ‘I have found Jambavan. Come quickly, he wishes to speak with you at once.’

With a sense of great relief, Angad saw Lakshman release Rama’s arm. Rama lowered the Bow and it vanished at once, along with the Arrow. They hurried over to where the bear stood, taking care not to be seen by the rampaging giant. The air was filled with dust from the many places Kumbhakarna had trampled already.

‘Come, my lords,’ Kambunara said, ‘I will take you to Jambavan. He is in a part of the city directly in the giant’s path, so we must be careful. I know a way that will keep us from his sights, but it is infested with the enemy.’

‘Wait,’ Angad said, as the bear turned to lead them down the street. ‘Why did Jambavan not come here with you? Wouldn’t that be easier than taking us all to him?’

Kambunara regarded him sadly, swiping with the back of his paw at the light coating of dust on his snout, and sniffing. ‘He is dying, young vanar. That is why he cannot come himself. He is dying and wishes to share his last thoughts with Rama before he goes to meet his ancestors in the last cave.’

The sound of the giant’s work was deafeningly loud in the quarter of the city where Jambavan lay. The bear lord was leaning back on a slab of stone that appeared to have once been part of a roof, or the floor of a higher level in some structure that was now destroyed. It was difficult to tell which one, for virtually every building in this street had been crushed either partly or wholly by the rampaging giant. Dust was everywhere, as well as the stench of the giant’s effusions, and Angad winced as he passed a house where several bears had evidently taken refuge. The structure was completely demolished, the debris stained pink with the blood of the unfortunate bears. He glanced up at the shadow of Kumbhakarna, cast in sharp relief against the setting sun, and prayed that he was not given such a death. When and if he went, he wished to do so fighting hand-to-hand to the bitter end.

Jambavan had fought to the bitter end as well, judging from the numerous wounds and arrows on the bear's body. Angad counted over two dozen arrows before he gave up, and the sword and blade wounds were at least double that number. He thought it incredible that the bear lord was still alive and breathing.

'Rama,' Jambavan said with genuine warmth and pleasure. 'My son, my eyes have thirsted for the sight of your handsome face. And yours, my son Lakshman.'

'My friend,' Rama said sombrely. 'What can I do to make you more comfortable?'

Jambavan managed a grin, revealing bloody teeth with more than one gap between them. 'You can get me a basket full of river fish, so fresh they're still jumping out of the basket to escape!'

Everyone grinned at that. 'Apart from that,' Rama asked, taking the bear's paw in his hand.

'Apart from that, he says,' Jambavan chuckled, then turned his head, coughed, and spat out a gob of blood. 'I'd settle for honey then, but you won't find that either, not in this hellhole of a city. Rakshasas hate sweet foods almost as much as they love mortalflesh. Roasted, mind you, with a seasoning of their traditional spices.'

Angad saw Kambunara shoot Jambavan a stern glance.

Jambavan sighed. 'But I'm rambling as usual. It's hard for an old bear to change his fur at this age, my friends. But I shall try to come to the point more directly. I see that you have a situation here.'

'That we do,' Rama acknowledged. 'Vibhisena has just told us that even my celestial Bow and Arrow cannot bring down the giant, yet I wish to try. What other choice do we have?'

‘Choice?’ The bear king coughed and spat again. ‘There is always a choice. But you will not need to resort to desperate measures. Hanuman will deal with that jumping jackass out there. No, don’t fret about him—not unless he chooses to stomp on this very house right now! Now that would be a nice turn-up, wouldn’t it?’ He laughed his rumbling bear laugh, grimaced sharply in acute pain, then subsided at once. ‘But that isn’t what I wished to say to you either. The reason I called you here was to say that you must forgive Sita.’

Rama stared at him silently.

Jambavan leaned closer, putting his blood-smirched snout almost on top of Rama’s own nose and repeated his words more loudly. ‘I said, you must forgive—’

‘There is nothing to forgive,’ Rama said, frowning.

Jambavan sighed. ‘There is always something to forgive, between lovers. But in this case, you are right. There is nothing to forgive—except what you imagine! Either way, forgive her. Love her unconditionally, and be glad you have her back. It is a treasure devoutly to be desired and few ever possess it, or, having lost it, regain it again.’

Angad had no idea what that meant, but even he could not fail to miss the obvious. ‘My lord Jambavan,’ he said, ‘pardon my interrupting, but perhaps you have not heard yet ... Our lady Sita ... She was ... ’

‘She is alive and well,’ Jambavan said quietly, his small dark eyes twinkling at Angad. ‘She is kept in a cave that is not a cave deep within the mountain below the temple of Shiva. What is the mountain called, brother Vibhisena?’

‘Nikumbhila,’ said the stunned rakshasa. ‘But when you say she is alive, how—’ Then he stopped short. ‘More sorcery?’

Jambavan shook his head. ‘No. The execution was real. Except the victim was not Sita. It was a shape-shifting yaksirakshasi cross-breed named ... ’ He waved a paw with three arrows sticking out of it. ‘I can never recall names.’

‘Supanakha,’ Lakshman said at once. ‘Of course!’

From outside came a great crashing and splintering, but this one sounded farther away. In confirmation, one of Angad's vanars called out, 'The giant has moved away! It is safe to go out now.' Angad made a be-quiet gesture at the vanar, but the rest of the group paid the cry no heed. He looked at Rama's face. There was such an utter absence of emotion visible on it, it put him in mind of the demonic fighting machine he had seen earlier. He swallowed nervously. Rama's anger was a rakshasa to be dreaded in its own right.

'You know this for a certainty, how?' Rama asked in a voice so completely without inflection or tone that the absence itself suggested an emotional level too great to express.

Jambavan shrugged. 'We are the ancient ones, we know more than we are supposed to. Just as I know that Hanuman will return and take care of your giant pain in the foot out there. But you must remember what I said to you, Rama. Trust her! No matter what turmoil rages in your mind, believe her. She loves only you, and you alone. Never doubt that for even an instant.'

Rama was silent for a moment, then abruptly he hugged the bear king fiercely. Jambavan hugged him back, but his eyes had glazed over, and Angad could see that the great being's strength was failing fast, now that he had finished speaking what he had desired to say.

'Enough, enough,' coughed the bear. 'If you wish to push my arrows inside my wounds, at least add some new ones!'

Rama let go of him at once. Jambavan laughed. 'I was only jesting,' he said. Then fell into a coughing fit. 'Only ... jest ...' He could not finish.

From outside, a great din resounded. A cloud of dust puffed into the ruins in which they were clustered, obscuring their vision for several moments. When the fog cleared, Jambavan's eyes were shut and he was no longer breathing.

Rama cried out and hugged the bear again, tears spilling from his eyes. But barely had he begun weeping than a noise like boulders crashing on each other came from outside the ruined house.

'Rama,' came a great voice from everywhere at once.

Rama rose up to his feet. ‘I know that voice.’

He looked at the bear king once again and then bent and kissed Jambavan on his furred brow affectionately. ‘I will return, my friend.’ And he went outside, followed by the rest of them.

FOURTEEN

Rama came outside the house to find a giant face staring down at him. His followers reared back at once, exclaiming. But he stood his ground. For he had recognised the voice of Hanuman the instant the vanar had spoken. He glanced around briefly, making sure that Kumbhakarna was not in the vicinity—but the lookout had spoken truly, and the giant was visible in the distance, several miles away, wreaking havoc in another section of the city. Until he noticed Hanuman’s presence here, they would be safe for a brief while.

Then he gazed up at the mile-high figure of his beloved friend and champion. He was not surprised to see the vanar in this expanded form, but what did surprise him were the two objects Hanuman bore upon his shoulders: two enormous mounds of earth, each several hundred yards high. Rama had no doubt that where they had stood originally, before Hanuman uprooted them, they would have been far higher, veritable mountains each. He could see the roots of trees and bushes and dark soil on the underside of each one, testifying to the strength which was required to uproot them from their original resting place. Hanuman bore them on his shoulders as easily as skins of water.

‘Rama,’ said the vanar, smiling at the sight of his favourite mortal. ‘Forgive my inability to greet you and Lakshmanji appropriately. As you can see, I am somewhat burdened.’

Sugreeva swore a vanar phrase. ‘How on earth ... ? Are those truly what I think they are?’

‘The mountains Candra and Drona,’ said Hanuman. ‘With the herbs of revival that Plaksa spoke of. I could not make out the herbs themselves and had already wasted enough time in the search, so I simply brought both the mountains here. You may take what we require and I shall return the mountains to their original resting place later.’

‘But how did you accomplish this, my friend? And why are you not surprised to see Lakshman and myself already revived? I suspect that you have learned much even while away.’

‘That I have,’ rumbled the vanar. ‘For Jambavan has been my guide as before, speaking to me in my mind and showing me the secret way between worlds. That is how I flew from this mortal realm to the heavenly worlds, and found the ocean of milk where these mountains rested. That is also how I learned of your happy revival at the behest of Garuda, lord of birds.’ He paused. ‘But I will have to relate my adventures later, Rama.

For right now I believe there is yet another rakshasa who wishes to challenge me.’

And he bent his knees and leaped upwards, flying like an arrow straight up. A fraction of an instant later, rushing through the space Hanuman had just vacated, came the giant Kumbhakarna. The rakshasa raged with fury at having missed his opponent, then looked down and saw Rama and his companions. At once, he roared and stamped down angrily. Rama leaped back, but he already knew he would not be fast enough. The giant’s foot rose and fell with the speed of a hammer striking an anvil. The ruined street suddenly went dark as all light was blocked out, and Rama cried out at the thought of all his followers crushed together.

But when the sole of the giant’s stinking foot was merely a foot or two from crushing Rama’s head, it stopped suddenly, then rose back upwards once again—and kept on rising!

As the foot grew smaller, Rama saw that Hanuman had leaped down again just in time, grasped the giant rakshasa and was lifting him back into the sky. Because Hanuman was still carrying both mountains, he had no choice but to use his feet to pick up Kumbhakarna. The rakshasa’s face reflected his shock at encountering someone as large as himself—for Hanuman had expanded himself further in those few moments when he had flown upwards and returned, making himself the size of the rakshasa. And he was still continuing to grow.

‘Rama,’ Hanuman shouted in a booming voice as he rose up into the sky. ‘I will place the mountains outside the gates of Lanka, to avoid crushing any of our warriors. You must send Plaksa there at once to find the herbs of revival. I will deal with this beggar in the meanwhile.’

And he flew up and then at an angle, and was lost behind the slanting debris of a demolished house. Rama turned at once to his companions. ‘Angad, you are entrusted with this task. Find Plaksa and take him at once to the mountains. Once he finds the herbs, bring them here right away. I will stand guard in this spot to ensure that no Lankan forces attack this house.’

Angad stared at him, puzzled. ‘But Rama, you and Lakshman are already revived. Why do you still require the herbs?’

Lakshman clapped the vanar on the back, hard, admonishing him playfully. ‘For our good friend Jambavan, young prince. Now, less talk and more walk! Go! Do as you are told!’

Angad went.

The giant struggled to break free of Hanuman’s grip, but the vanar kept his feet tightly clenched together. Flying with two mountains upon his shoulders while carrying aloft a giant rakshasa of epic proportions was not exactly the easiest thing he had ever done, but he knew that if he dropped any one of the three, he would certainly kill a goodly number of his own comrades; even the fact that he would demolish half of Lanka at the same time was not enough to balance out that cost. So he focussed his energies on flying straight and true and keeping himself as well as his three burdens aloft. He passed ruined areas crushed by the giant’s rampage, and noted that the corpses of rakshasas as well as vanars and bears lay in the wreckage. What arrogance! To slay one’s own warriors along with the enemy! What use was a weapon so large that one could not control it or direct it accurately?

Then he was past the city and over open country. Still he continued. For he knew that once he set this giant fool down, he would need all the room he could spare. He wondered if he ought to take Kumbhakarna back to the mainland, where there was little chance of running out of space, but he did not think he could maintain his threefold burden that far. He looked down at the part of the island they were flying over now: it was the central section of rolling hills and ghats and valleys. Would this do? But only a short run would take the rakshasa back to Lanka and that was something he could not chance.

Finally, he hit upon the only practical option.

He flew out over the ocean. Kumbhakarna roared his indignation as the rolling hills of Lanka fell behind them and pristine blue water appeared below. He intensified his struggles until Hanuman knew that he could not hold on much longer. The realisation had finally penetrated the rakshasa's dense skull that he stood to lose less by falling than by allowing himself to be carried farther away. He seemed to hate the water, judging by the way he struggled frantically.

'Or, judging by the way you stink,' Hanuman said aloud, 'maybe you fear bathing more than death!'

He was perhaps a hundred yojanas out at sea when he felt his grip on the giant's shoulders giving way at last. He looked around. Nothing but open ocean was visible for as far as he could see in every direction. 'This is as good a place as any,' he mused aloud. And then rose up as high as he could before releasing his grip abruptly and letting the giant fall, howling, to land in the sea with a splash great enough to raise a small tidal wave for yojanas around. 'Go ahead and start your bath, I'll join you in a minute,' he said cheerfully as he turned back towards Lanka, 'Oh, and don't forget to wash behind your ears!'

He flew back to Lanka at a much faster speed. By the time he reached the battlefield outside the gates of the city, he was pleased to see Angad and Plaksa already there, waiting. He set both mountains down on the centre of the field, joined his palms in a respectful namaskaram to the vanar guru, and said, 'Forgive me for my haste, mahadev, but I have a rakshasa who needs my attention urgently. I pray you find the herbs you need quickly and that they are as efficacious as they're believed to be.'

'Bless you, Maruti Anjaneya,' said the ancient vanar. 'You have done what no being in the mortal plane has ever done before. Later, you must tell me how you accomplished this extraordinary task, that I may record it for posterity.’

‘I shall do so most happily, gurudev,’ Hanuman said. ‘Now, I take your leave.’ And without further formality, he shot upwards, feeling his body surge with the freedom of being released from the three enormous weights he had carried before, and zoomed back to the spot where he had left Kumbhakarna.

The giant was waiting. The ocean here was deep, but not deep enough to submerge the rakshasa completely. As Hanuman approached, he saw Kumbhakarna’s head, shoulders and the upper part of his torso, up to the lowest of his ribs, visible above the surface. The gargantuan rakshasa roared as he saw Hanuman approaching in the sky. He shook his fists and opened his jaws, bellowing a challenge.

Hanuman responded by flying straight at him, and crashing into the giant’s chest at a speed so great that the air around them both boomed with a resounding thunder loud enough to set off a ripple in the ocean waters and be heard all the way back in Lanka.

Angad heard the booming crack of sound and knew that it was caused by Hanuman. The vanar had joined battle with Kumbhakarna then. He clenched his fist, silently wishing his comrade strength and honour in the fight. Then he returned his attention to helping find the herbs that Plaksa was seeking. The ancient vanar had said that while the herbs were miraculous in their efficacy, if the subject had been dead more than a certain time they were of no use. For beyond a certain period of time the brain, lacking the air carried to it by the pumping of blood through the body, began to perish and rot. And once the brain rotted, reviving the body was pointless. So they had only a limited amount of time to find the herbs. According to the ageing guru, that meant doing so before the sun set completely.

Angad glanced over his shoulder at the horizon. From the top of the mountain he could see the sun already at the end of its journey, its rim touching the horizon. In only moments it would descend below that line and the time to save Jambavan would be past. How cruel it would be for Hanuman to have travelled all the way to swarga-lok and bring back these two legendary mountains, and then to lose Jambavan because they could not find the right herbs in time. No. He would not let that happen.

He searched desperately in the fading light.

Rama climbed the last few yards to the top of the ruined structure. After making sure that the delicately poised slab of roof was not likely to collapse under his weight, he straightened up and looked around. From here, he could see across most of Lanka, as well as the entire clearing below. The streets here were packed with vanars and bears. King Sugreeva and the other leaders had assembled as many of their forces as possible within this section of the city. The rest would be apprised of his words through the usual system.

‘My friends,’ he called out. ‘I have the best news of all. Sita is alive and well, but she is still Ravana’s captive. What we saw earlier was yet another deception of the lord of Lanka.’

Cheers rose raggedly from the weary army. He held up his hand. ‘But hear me out. For time is short and we are in enemy territory. Jambavan the bear lord lies stricken. Yet Hanuman has brought back the two mountains of magical herbs from the land of the devas, and the vanar Plaksa, aided by Angad and Nala, is searching for the herbs of revival. We have every confidence that they will find them and resurrect the lord of bears successfully within the hour. But we cannot stand by and wait. Hanuman has removed the giant Kumbhakarna from Lanka, leaving us free to battle the rakshasas on our own terms. Now is not the time to grieve for lost comrades or generals, nor is it the time to lick our wounds and rest, nor is it even the time to cease our struggles. Now is the time that will test our mettle to the utmost. It is time to crush the rakshasa menace once and for all, to free the lady Sita, and rid this land of the evil of Ravana and his sorcerous tricks for ever. And so I ask you, one and all, to join me in one last effort to claim Lanka and drive our enemies to the sea. Push them back until they have nowhere to go but water and fire.’ He pointed to the southernmost tip of the island, where the volcano rose smouldering beside the ocean. ‘All the way to the last yard of lava-scorched land. For only then can our war be over and dharma triumph. Give me this one last time your courage, your strength, and your warrior's skills. In return, I will give you the victory of dharma over adharma!'

The roar that greeted the end of this speech filled the city of Lanka for miles around, echoing the booming thunder of Hanuman's flight moments earlier.

Rama spoke the shloka of summoning and the Bow of Vishnu and the Arrow of Shiva appeared in his hand.

Raising the Bow, he aimed the Arrow directly at the most distant quarter of the city, the innermost sanctum of Ravana and the only area that his forces had not yet breached. He loosed the Arrow, and watched it fly blazing through the evening sky.

It landed in the inner city with a resounding clap of sound. A blinding white light exploded outwards in concentric circles, travelling back towards Rama. He shielded his eyes from the flash, and still felt the light searing the very core of his vision. When he opened his eyes again, one large section of the triple walls surrounding the inner circle lay in ruins. He pointed in that direction, and gave the order to charge. With a roar of fury, his army obeyed and surged forward.

FIFTEEN

Lanka was burning. Yet again.

Ravana looked out from the veranda and saw the flames engulfing the mansions of his ministers, generals, nobles and the richest merchants of the land. If Hanuman's rampage had destroyed the poorer sections of the city-state, then Rama's arrows were ravaging the richer sections, completing the work of demolition.

He saw Lankan citizens crowding the gates of his palace, begging for sanctuary against the invading troops of Rama. They were all fat merchants and the spoilt, soft, rich rakshasas he had cultivated for their shrewd trading and wealth-creation. They were of no use now. He needed warriors.

‘Open the gates and let them in,’ he told the captain of his palace guard, Narantaka, a kumbha who was the bastard son of Kumbhakarna himself, which made him Ravana’s nephew. Or was he Ravana’s own bastard? Hmm. Sometimes it was hard to be sure, after so many dalliances and impregnations. In one sense, of course, all of Lanka was his extended family.

‘And after they’re in, close the gates, and then kill them all.’

‘Sire?’ said Narantaka, staring at Ravana.

‘That group there,’ Ravana gestured casually, ‘knows where most of Lanka’s wealth is concealed, here as well as in foreign lands. In the event that they’re captured alive, they won’t hesitate to share that knowledge, or even some of their wealth, to save their perfumed lives. Dead, their knowledge goes to the netherworld with them. I want them all killed, down to the last rakshasa, rakshasi and child.’

Narantaka looked at him briefly with a look that reminded Ravana so strongly of the face on the extreme end of his left rack that he felt certain that this was his bastard, not Kumbhakarna’s. The captain saluted silently and marched away to carry out his orders.

By the time Ravana emerged from the palace a little while after sunset, the courtyard was littered with corpses. He gestured to Narantaka, who stood smartly before a company of palace guards, awaiting his next orders. ‘Leave a couple of kumbhas to burn the bodies,’ he said. ‘The rest of you follow me.’

‘My lord,’ Narantaka replied. ‘What of your family and the palace staff? Should we not remain here to guard them in the event of an intrusion by the enemy?’

Ravana glanced at him. ‘They can look out for themselves. Besides, your company has the last fresh troops in Lanka. If you stay here, the enemy will attack. That’s why I need you to ride out with me, to stop them before they do.’

The captain looked as if he wished to say something further, but then he saluted and gave the necessary orders. Ravana climbed aboard his chariot, took up the reins and rode out without waiting to see if Narantaka and his troops followed. The streets of Lanka's richest quarters were a shambles, destroyed by the Arrow—and not a house remained untouched. And these were the structures freshly raised by the sorcery of a few nights ago, during Ravana's reconstruction of the city. It was hard to believe, looking at it now. It looked like a city that had been under siege for years, not days. That was what devastras did, accomplishing in hours what would take days to achieve through ordinary muscle-power and siege machines.

And to think that two mortals leading an army of vanars and bears had done it all.

He allowed himself the luxury of laughter, his amusement growing as he passed ever-increasing sights of destruction and distress. The greater the devastation, the more intense his amusement, the louder his laughter, and the faster he sped his chariot.

Laughing loudly enough to be heard over the din of battle and destruction, Ravana, Lord of Lanka, drove his chariot at manic speed through the devastated streets of his ruined city.

Hanuman was grappling with Kumbhakarna underwater. The vanar was gripping the rakshasa around the waist, with his head pressed against the giant's belly, and was attempting to wrap his hands around him in order to pick him up, invert him, and bring him down head-first onto his thigh. But Kumbhakarna was no stranger to wrestling tactics, and had immediately grasped Hanuman's neck and pinned it in a vice-like grip. Now he was using his other elbow to pound on Hanuman's upper back. Each blow was powerful enough to raze mountains, and every time the giant's elbow splashed down it threw up an explosion of water hundreds of yards high. Hanuman could actually feel the blows, which was an indication of how strong Kumbhakarna was. And the giant's grip on his neck was tightening inexorably, choking off the last breath he had in his lungs.

He opened his eyes and saw dark water everywhere. The sun had set during the first moments of their clash, and here, almost a mile under the surface, the ocean was a deep midnight blue. He saw sea creatures swimming in the depths, no doubt wondering at these two enormous newcomers who had descended into their world and were causing such a maelstrom. Among the creatures of the deep he recognised the pale, whitish ones with the jagged sharp teeth and the large fins. There were several of them quite close by, and he could see their dead black eyes glinting even in this dim light as they watched the struggle of the titans with dispassionate interest, no doubt waiting in the hope that one or both of them would be left to provide fodder for their evening meal. For several hundred evening meals, in fact, considering their size. Hanuman knew these creatures well—they were the tigers and lions of the oceanic depths, the prime predators of this world.

The sight of their gliding bodies gave him an idea. He had to do something quickly, for he could not breathe now, and the giant's relentless grip was forcing the last air out of his lungs, bubbling slowly out of his pursed lips to rise lazily towards the distant surface. The elbow hammering down on his back was starting to hurt as well; the giant seemed to be testing the strength of the individual links in his spinal cord. If this continued much longer, he would soon have a choice between dying by drowning, or from a broken back. He had to do something quickly.

His right cheek was pressed against the right side of the giant's bulging belly. A great deal of Kumbhakarna's bulk was fat, although like many an extremely obese person, the rakshasa bore powerful muscles beneath those rolls and rolls of adipose.

He turned his head very slightly, feeling the pressure on his neck increase exponentially and opened his mouth, ignoring the disgusting fetid odour coming from the rakshasa's unwashed skin—when had he last bathed anyway? In the Satya Yuga? Then bracing himself for the undoubtedly wretched taste, he bit deep and hard into the roll of fat on the giant's midriff. At once the skin and flesh parted, and the horrible stench and flavour of raw meat filled his mouth. He almost gagged, choking, and at once swallowed a great gout of ocean water. Which, of course, went down the wrong way, into his lungs, and that in turn made him start to cough.

At the same time, a small burst of blood spewed out of the gaping wound, billowing out and unravelling in ribbons on the ocean tides, carried in two separate directions at once. One ribbon of blood passed directly through the throng of dead eyes flicking their tails desultorily. As the blood reached them, they convulsed suddenly, as if stricken by fits, and started to wag their tails furiously, swimming this way, then that. Meanwhile, Kumbhakarna, belatedly realising that he had been injured somehow, ceased his elbow-pounding and reached down to feel the spot at his waist where Hanuman had bitten him. Hanuman, choking on ocean water as well as the disgusting chunk of fatty flesh and blood he still had in his mouth, wriggled fiercely, and with an effort, broke free of the giant's grip.

Just as the first of the finned predators reached him. Hanuman saw the first one, an enormous white beast with a mouth full of more teeth than he had thought it possible for any mortal creature to possess, approaching with ferocious speed, just as a cheetah covers ground incredibly swiftly when in pursuit of her prey, and lunge directly at his face. No doubt to get at the mouthful of bloody flesh he still had between his teeth. He spat the mouthful straight at the sea predator, hitting it on the tip of its snout. It swerved upwards instantly, snatching the flesh and chomping down on it so hard, the morsel was divided neatly into three pieces. At once the other predators, following close behind lunged for the two remaining pieces, and began to fight over them in a frenzy. Several more swam past the frenzied group and came for the source of the bleeding—the wound in Kumbhakarna's waist. Hanuman moved back out of the way, a lashing fin slapping him hard on his shoulder and a mouthful of jagged teeth missing his fingers by a whisker, and kicked hard, launching himself upwards and away from both the rakshasa as well as his frenzied pack of sea predators.

He broke the surface coughing and gasping, spitting out flecks of bloody flesh and emptying his lungs of the salty water he had swallowed. Several fish were regurgitated as well, swimming away in panic the instant they were splashed back into their natural habitat. 'Sorry, little ones,' he muttered, then coughed one last time and looked around.

Kumbhakarna was only a few yards away, but too preoccupied to notice him. The giant was thrashing around madly, no doubt feeling the deadly bites of the undersea predators in his already wounded belly, and not liking the idea of becoming an evening repast for the denizens of this watery world. He reached down into the water with both hands, and Hanuman saw his fists re-emerge clutching two of the white predators in one hand and a third big one in the other. The creatures thrashed furiously and one managed to squirm and bite Kumbhakarna deeply in the tender space between his taloned thumb and foreclaw. The rakshasa howled in pain and smacked the creature down hard on the surface of the ocean, not realising in his fury that slamming water creatures into water might not be the best way to injure them. He flung both fists as far as he could, and Hanuman saw the predators go flying miles away, thrashing in the air as they went, their fangs flashing even in the darkness. He didn't wait to see where they landed, but instead took in a great deep breath and then quickly dived underwater and launched himself at the giant again before Kumbhakarna could spot him coming.

This time he went low, much lower than the rakshasa's waist. He saw several dozen more predators, fins twisting wildly, rushing for the source of the blood they scented, and dived below them. The ocean was darker here, difficult to see through, although he could glimpse as well as feel any number of shoals of fish and those odd gelid creatures with the numerous tentacles floating about him. He had estimated the distance well, and was prepared when his shoulder slammed into the giant's ankles. He grasped the two hairy rakshasa feet at once, and yanked hard with all his strength.

Kumbhakarna roared—Hanuman could feel the reverberation of the sound all the way down here, rippling through the water, as well as through the giant's body itself—and lost his balance completely.

That was the chance Hanuman had been waiting for. As the rakshasa toppled over, he pulled Kumbhakarna's feet upwards. They rose easily, without much resistance except for the water itself, for Kumbhakarna had nothing to hold on to. When he had the rakshasa's feet at his own waist level, Hanuman shoved them upwards with all his might; then, when Kumbhakarna was fully inverted and thrashing about desperately, he pushed downwards, literally shoving the rakshasa's head down towards the bottom of the ocean.

But while the rakshasa was no genius, he was no pushover either. He used the momentum of Hanuman's downward shove to propel himself faster, braced his hands on the ocean floor, and somersaulted. Hanuman sensed this rather than saw it, for their struggle had raised such clouds of mud and dirt from the ocean floor that the water was a swirling fog through which he could barely see. Also, he had to surface again to breathe, and when he did so, he saw Kumbhakarna's feet emerge from the ocean several hundreds of yards away and then topple back, and then, moments later, the giant's head and torso came out of the water. Kumbhakarna vomited out a great mouthful of ocean water, plant life, and even one of the squishy tentacled things. He gasped in several deep breaths, rubbing the salt water from his eyes, which had turned red. He had accumulated a great deal of undersea weed upon his bald pate, but seemed not to notice this. The pile of mulchy weed on his head almost resembled a wig of sorts, the kind that Hanuman had seen some of the richer classes of Lankans wearing during his first visit to Lanka. 'Shall we dance?' Hanuman asked him with a cocky grin.

Kumbhakarna bellowed again and charged at him.

This time, when Indrajit appeared, Rama did not waste time on parleys and heralds and warnings. All the formalities of war were done with. This was a fight to the last now. He had granted Indrajit the luxury of firing upon Lakshman and himself once, and had experienced first-hand what his lethal arrows could achieve. He had no intention of allowing the rakshasa a second opportunity.

The instant the black chariot turned the corner and rode down the avenue, Rama took aim. The Arrow of Shiva could assume any form suitable to a missile, depending on the user's desire. Rama had only to think of the Arrow as barbed, and it would be barbed; hollowed with a rounded point, in order to pass through flesh and bone more smoothly, and it would be so.

This time, he called upon the celestial Arrow to alter itself into the shape of a snake.

Not any ordinary snake either. He called upon Takshak himself, the lord of snakes. The serpent that coiled eternally around the neck of Lord Shiva the Destroyer.

For this was Shiva's arrow after all. And Takshak was Shiva's servant to command.

As he drew back the cord of the Bow to its maximum, Lakshman, standing beside him whispered into his ear, ‘In the name of our father Dasaratha. If his sons Rama and Lakshmana are righteous soldiers of truth, unbeaten in valour, then may these weapons of Shiva and Vishnu bring about the destruction of this unrighteous rakshasa.’

Rama loosed the Arrow directly at Indrajit, aiming for the slender crack between the top of the rakshasa’s armoured breastplate and the bottom rim of his helm.

The chariot thundered down the avenue directly at him. The Arrow sped towards its target.

SIXTEEN

Hanuman lost track of the passage of time. All he knew was that he and the rakshasa giant had been fighting for hours and that both had succeeded in injuring the other several times in different ways. The rakshasa had proved unusually adaptable, learning to use their situation to his advantage. Hanuman had swallowed enough ocean water to fill a small inland sea, and every bone in his body felt as if it had been pounded by Indra’s hammer on the anvil of the gods like a sword’s blade.

They faced each other in the dark waters, eyeing one another silently. Bellowing and shouting took too much effort, and they had spent the last hour-watch or two wrestling and hammering and lashing out in relative silence, only the splashing of water and the thud of fists on flesh and the slapping of palms against bodies providing accompaniment. Now, the rakshasa glared at him balefully, that part of his pale skin visible above the surface blotched with bruises and rents and cuts. Hanuman knew those cuts must hurt dreadfully when washed by the salt water, because his own certainly did. But the giant looked as if he could take far worse and still continue fighting. He looked, in fact, as if he could keep this up all night for a thousand more nights—or even a century. If the legends about him were true, as Vibhisena had claimed, then once awakened and challenged to a fight he could go on indefinitely, or until he won. Hanuman assumed he had never been defeated yet—for who on this mortal realm could fight and defeat a giant of this stature?

The question was, could he?

We are evenly matched, Hanuman told himself. That is the worrying thing. He can fight on like this forever. And I cannot take forever. The war must be won soon, and Sita regained. Even now, Rama may require me back in Lanka, to press home the last phase of the war. I must finish this combat and put this foe down once and for all. Kumbhakarna cannot be allowed to return to Lanka alive, for then he can single-handedly destroy our entire force in mere moments.

And yet, the more he thought about it, the more he felt that the only way to kill Kumbhakarna was to bring him back to Lanka. But the trick was to do so without allowing him to go on another rampage of destruction which would endanger Hanuman's comrades. It was an enormous gamble, and one he hesitated to take, but no other solution offered itself.

He wished Jambavan were here now, so he could ask him for advice. The bear lord's guidance had proved invaluable in his quest for the mountains of herbs, and he knew their bond was far greater and older than any other he had experienced, with the sole exception of his bond with Rama. If Jambavan were here ...

I am here. Ask me what you will, my friend.

Hanuman's heart leaped. 'My lord,' he said aloud without realising he was doing so, 'you are revived then! Plaksa was able to find the herbs and administer them in time?'

The rakshasa stared at him in befuddlement. 'Hrrggh?' he grunted, confused and suspicious at this odd question which he thought was posed to him.

'Oh shut up,' Hanuman said to him. 'Can't a vanar even speak to his friend for a moment?'

Angad found the herbs, Plaksa administered them in the nick of time, just as the sun fell below the horizon line. I am well now and wholly healed. Ask me your question.

Hanuman told him his plan, speaking in his mind-voice this time. Kumbhakarna continued to eye him suspiciously, taking cautious steps to one side, foolishly thinking that because Hanuman was distracted, he would not notice the rakshasa trying to approach him from an angle.

It is a bold plan, but a good one. Do it. Do it quickly, but make sure you do not falter. Remember who you are and what you fight for, and let nothing stand in your way.

With your blessings, I shall, Hanuman said silently.

Then he turned and began striding back towards Lanka, deliberately walking slowly enough for Kumbhakarna to follow. He could have risen out of the cold ocean water and flown back easily to the island-kingdom, but the giant could not fly, and the whole point was to draw him back to Lanka.

For several moments he thought that the giant had seen through his plan and would not follow. But then again, what else could the rakshasa do? Stay out here in the ocean? He had already spent more time in water than he had probably spent bathing in his entire millennia-long existence! And with that wound in his side and the sharp fangs of the ocean predators still pricking him from time to time, the giant could hardly be finding this a very pleasant place.

At last Hanuman heard the enormous sloshing sound of Kumbhakarna starting to stride through the water as well, following in his wake.

He led his quarry back to Lanka.

Ravana howled in rage and anguish. He felt the pain of Indrajit's wound in his own throat, as if the Arrow of Shiva had passed through his flesh and severed his neck, decapitating him. He felt the blood gush out of the open wound, the heart still pumping in disbelief, the arms, those arms that had once wounded devas and held a sword to the throat of mighty Indra himself, jerking spasmodically and dropping their weapons, the head rolling in the dirt and mud of the city avenue, its open eyes staring blindly, filling with debris and grit even as the pupils dilated one final time, expanding until they were staring into oblivion.

He whipped his team so hard, the lashes not only drew blood, but gouged out strips of flesh as well. The horses, for he used only the finest prime Kambhoja stallions, shrieked in pain and galloped even faster, risking breaking their legs and toppling the whole chariot. He did not care. He wished only to reach the spot where Indrajit had fallen and to avenge his death. For the pain he felt was a father's pain, and it was genuine. This was one of those rare occasions when the lord of Lanka was not acting or performing for effect: he was being himself.

It was an angry, anguished father that turned the corner on two wheels and started down the avenue at a pace that should have been too swift for even Rama to retaliate. But Rama was ready and waiting. And though Ravana's bow was drawn and ready to fire, Rama's bow was quicker, his arrow swifter, his aim deadlier and his quiet rage more potent than Ravana's howling fury.

Both arrows met in mid-air, and Rama's missile shattered Ravana's in half, splitting it perfectly through the middle of the shaft before speeding on to its target, seeking to bury itself deep in Ravana's neck and do unto the father as it had done unto the son.

But this was not to be the moment of Ravana's death. For even as the Arrow of Shiva sped towards him with unerring accuracy, the lead horse of Ravana's team stumbled over a helmet lying in its path. By chance, or perhaps by serendipity, it happened to be the helm of Indrajit himself, separated from his skull when his decapitated head struck the ground and rolled aside. The horse's foot stepped on the curve of the helm, and its shin shattered. The horse fell, whinnying with agony, and with it fell the team, and with the team, the chariot. And as the chariot tilted, preparatory to overturning as chariots are wont to do when their horses fall at such high speeds, Ravana's body shifted in the air, and where his neck had been a fraction of a moment earlier, his shoulder now presented itself. The Arrow struck the fleshy muscle of his right shoulder and passed through it. This was not a snake-arrow, simply a pointed one, and as the Arrow of Shiva always did once it had struck its target, it vanished at once, returning instantly to Rama's hand only a moment after he had fired it, ready to be used again.

The chariot overturned in a spectacular somersault, flinging both cupola and rider yards across the broad avenue. Ravana came crashing down with the debris of the chariot, landing in an ignominious prostrate position—right at Rama’s feet. The rest of the team, screaming with pain as their bodies were broken and mangled with the force of the fall, thudded sickeningly on the hard ground, their lives crushed into silence on impact. The chariot and its wheels and rigging shattered into pieces and fell on all sides.

Ravana stared up at Rama with all his eyes.

The Arrow of Shiva was pointed directly at his throat. The lord of Lanka reached for his sword, but he had lost it in the headlong crash, along with his bow. He curled his fingers to issue a sorcerous gesture, but the look in Rama’s eyes told him that his foe would unleash the Arrow before he could even start to conjure anything. He lay there for a long, breathless moment, as warriors of both sides ceased fighting and turned to gaze in wonder and disbelief at this extraordinary sight. What twist of fate had brought Ravana thus to Rama’s feet, weaponless and disadvantaged? Nobody knew, but it had happened somehow, and with a single action, Rama could end Ravana’s life.

‘Rama!’ Lakshman cried out by his side, his own eyes glowing with the blue light of Brahman shakti. ‘Now!’ Rama loosed the Arrow.

Hanuman paused when he was in sight of Lanka. He had taken a circuitous route, taking care not to come within sight of the island-nation too soon, for Kumbhakarna might well have charged straight at his homeland then, eager to continue his earlier rampage. Now he was where he desired to be, and could still hear the rakshasa sloshing behind him. He had deliberately let the giant fall behind, hoping thus to anger and provoke him further.

Already he knew that the long, cold walk through chest-deep water had irritated the gargantuan rakshasa no end. Several times, Kumbhakarna had bellowed a wordless challenge to him, its meaning crystal clear despite its lack of coherent language:

Stop and fight me, you craven. Stop running away from me!

Hanuman had simply grinned and continued.

Now he moved more quickly, heading straight towards the part of Lanka to which he had wished to bring the rakshasa. Reaching the edge of the land, he climbed ashore, pausing briefly to shake the water from his fur as best he could. He twitched his tail several times, then caught it in his hands and wrung it out gently. Looking back over his shoulder, he saw Kumbhakarna approaching, his pale face mottled with bruises as well as apoplectic anger.

He took advantage of his posture to stick out his tongue as well as point his rear at the approaching rakshasa. Kumbhakarna roared with rage and began to run as fast as he could, causing the ocean to surge violently for miles around. Waves splashed over the foothills on this side of Lanka, submerging the land for several hundred yards. Fortunately, Hanuman knew, they were miles if not yojanas away from the city of Lanka itself, where his comrades were.

He waited until Kumbhakarna was close enough to reach out and grab him, then, at the last possible moment, he rose up into the air, floating just out of reach. The rakshasa roared and clambered onto the land, trying to leap up to grab the vanar.

Hanuman moved back a few hundred yards, leading the rakshasa on. He did this for several miles, until they were at the place where he wished to bring the giant. Then he turned and flew a little way further, before descending to the ground.

At the sight of his opponent earthbound again and within reach, Kumbhakarna lurched forward, grunting with frustration. Hanuman turned and raced up the steep slope, continuing to taunt and mock the giant all the way. The rakshasa grew more incensed with each new gesture and action, and tried to run faster. Finally, by the time they reached the top, he was out of breath, but as eager to fight as ever.

That was when Hanuman turned and faced him.

On the rim of the smouldering volcano.

The Arrow struck the elaborately carved headpiece that covered all ten of the demonlord's heads, splitting it apart. The gold-plated metal carving clattered to the ground, smoking where the Arrow of Shiva had passed through it.

The Arrow reappeared in Rama's hand again.

Lakshman, about to cry out in exultation, stared at the prone Ravana.

The rakshasa king was unharmed.

Ravana himself touched the top of his central head, then another head, then yet another, deducing that he had been unharmed. He seemed as stunned as Lakshman.

'Rama?' asked his brother. 'Why did you not ...?'

'One does not kill a foe who is unarmed and prostrated before oneself on the field of battle, Lakshman,' Rama said. 'It would be dishonourable to kill Ravana thus.'

Lakshman stared at him, eyes goggling. 'But—' he began to say, then stopped. His features were conflicted, his expression agonised. But finally he said in a choked voice, 'Why should we show him any honour when he fights without honour?'

'Because we are Dasaratha's sons. Shishyas of Brahmarishi Vashishta and Vishwamitra. Children of Kausalya and Sumitra. Kings in waiting of Ayodhya, mightiest of Arya nations. Because we are Kshatriyas, bound by the code of the warrior. Because we are followers of dharma.'

Lakshman had no answer. He turned back to glare at the prone Ravana, still lying on the ground. 'What do you intend to do, then?'

Rama lowered the Bow slowly. 'Ravana, you have committed grievous crimes against too many to count. Your sins are legendary, your transgressions too great to be adjudged easily. Your violence against me and my loved ones, whether directly or through your minions, such as Manthara and my stepmother Kaikeyi, the yaksi Tataka and her hybrids, the demoness Supanakha and her brothers and their thousands of followers, the hordes of Lanka and the hordes you sent to Mithila ... too much for my weary heart to recall or recount. You have robbed me of years of my life, of my wife and of my peace of mind and you have slain my friends and their loved ones. Yet here on this field of battle, I fight as my father's son, my mother's pride, the student of my gurus, an Arya Kshatriya, and a warrior of dharma. By my own code of honour, I cannot kill you under these circumstances. Therefore, I entreat you, rise now and go back to your dwelling, and return again at sunrise on the morrow to the fields outside the city, and at that time I shall finish what you began, and end this war as well as your life. Go now, before I change my mind and dishonour myself and all who respect me.'

Deathly silence lay across the avenue. Elsewhere in the city, crumbling slabs and bricks fell from ruined structures, wounded and dying rakshasas and vanars and bears groaned and begged for oblivion, fires crackled, and the shouts and screams of warriors still fighting continued unabated.

But every one of the few hundred soldiers of both sides who were within sight of Rama and Ravana stared with numb minds and silent, open mouths.

They watched incredulously as the king of rakshasas rose to his feet, looked up at Rama with his ten heads, performed a perfect namaskaram and without a word turned and walked back up the avenue the way he had come.

SEVENTEEN

In the hour before dawn on the fourth night immediately before the fifth and final day of the war of Lanka, Mandodhari came in search of her husband.

The halls of the great palace were empty, the chambers of pleasure and of dining and other fleshly indulgences all desolate and devoid of any pleasure-seekers. The vaulting walls and ceilings, richly festooned with the finest examples of Lankan art and sculpture and crafts, threw back the hollow sounds of her footfalls with the ghostly echoes of a museum at night. Even the palace guards were not at their posts. The usual hordes of sycophants and harem-whores who usually stayed close by their master had fled, either to hide in the labyrinths below Mount Nikumbhila, or to surrender themselves to the mercy of Lord Rama, who was already a legend among the Lankans. The tale of his sparing Ravana was the only thing that everyone could speak of; it was said also that the invader's soldiers would not harm a hair on any rakshasa who voluntarily laid down arms and submitted meekly to Rama's lordship.

Lanka was a lost cause, she knew that beyond doubt. What she wished to know was whether Ravana was lost as well.

The great doors of the throne chamber were ajar. She stepped through without difficulty, as could any stray dog or wandering mendicant. Never before had she known Ravana to be so bereft of self-worth that he would leave his doors ajar, his guard-posts unmanned, his palace devoid of sycophants. Never had she imagined she would see such a day. And yet the day had come, and here was Ravana, seated on his enormous throne, in the chamber that dwarfed even him, that seemed as large as kingship itself, as ornate and intricately decorated as the politics of governance, as vulgarly ostentatious as the price of luxury, as black and polished and obsidian as the onyx eyes of the worm Ouroboros that twined around itself, swallowing its own tail, repeating the circle of life, karma and rebirth eternally.

She stopped before the throne and waited for some sign of greeting or acknowledgement from him. But he remained seated in that same stance, legs sprawled akimbo, heads leaning back against the specially carved and cushioned backrest, multiple pairs of eyes staring up into space, several hands clutching several goblets of wine.

Had she not known better, she could have mistaken him for any drunken rakshasa noblemen, one of those rich sods who drained away their inheritance and their life in endless nights of wine-steeped self-indulgence and self-pity, mingled sometimes with the companion vices of debauchery and gambling.

But this was Ravana, her husband, victor of a thousand wars, champion of countless combats, destroyer of worlds, conqueror of realms, lord of the armies of the hell-realms, master of the wealth of Kuber, the treasurer to the devas, and father of her sons. He did not give in to despair, depression or alcoholic stupor.

And yet here he sat, alone and abandoned by all, desolate in his own gaudy grandeur.

‘My lord,’ she said to him. ‘Is Lanka lost?’

He barely stirred. But two of his heads lost their glazed obliviousness and lowered their eyes to look upon her. ‘Need you ask?’

‘Then why do you still not fight? Why do you not rally our armies? Why do you not unleash your powerful sorcery and repel the invaders? Why do you sit here all night drinking wine and brooding alone?’

He took a sip of wine. ‘The fight is lost. Our armies are routed. My sorcery is impotent. But the wine is still good. Would you care for some?’

She stared at him until he looked away. ‘Is that your only response? To give up?’

He sighed and put down several of the wine goblets. Two of them teetered on the edge of the surface he set them down upon and fell, clattering, to the floor. The sound of metal on marble was loud and the echoes reverberated through the empty halls and corridors. ‘What would you wish me to do? Shall I read out the roll-call of dead champions, generals, sorcerers and illustrious warriors?’ Without waiting for a response from her, he held up two of his hands in a manner that suggested he was unrolling a scroll, and pretended to read sonorously: ‘Mahaparsva, Mahodara, Virupaksa, Dumraksa, Akampana, Prahasta, Yupaksa, Mahodara, Viradha, Kabandha, Narantaka, Devantaka, Trisiras, Kumbhakarna, Indrajit, Malavya, Vidyujjivha, Malyavan, Atikaya, Kumbha, Nikumbha, Prajangha, Sonitaksa, Makaraksa, Vajradanta, Matali ...’ He smiled a malevolent smile with one face. ‘Some of those are your sons by me, others are mine by other wives. Shall I go on? The list is long and we could spend the rest of the night poring over the names.’

‘Enough!’

Ravana tossed aside the imaginary scroll. ‘All our champions are dead, our generals as well, even our sorcerers have been cut down, and we are bereft of all our sons, legitimate as well as bastards. The city is overrun and in chaos and ruin, my last supporters have fled or surrendered, and only hours ago, Rama himself had an arrow to my head.’ His moustached lips twitched in a wry smile. ‘My heads. My sorcery was rendered almost powerless the instant I killed Supanakha, for she bore in her second belly the secret that revived me and was responsible for all the shakti I possessed. I could perhaps conjure up more by sacrificing some of Vibhisena’s Brahmins, but I seem to have exhausted my supply and the few that might have eluded me have gone over to the enemy, along with the rest of the deserters.’

‘Why did you kill Supanakha?’ she asked. ‘If killing her cost you such a heavy price?’

He shrugged. ‘Shall I spend days explaining everything that led up to that moment from thousands of years ago? Or shall I just cry off with the standard response of monarchs when asked uncomfortable questions regarding unsavoury methods employed in a past administration, namely that it had to be done and someone had to do it?’ He spread his hands. ‘Nothing I say now will convince you, my queen. Why waste time even discussing it?’

‘Because I cannot desert you and Lanka, nor do I wish to die in a war over your lust for an ugly and morally decrepit mortal woman,’ she replied coldly.

He looked at her with five heads, a sixth joining the others a moment later. ‘Is that what you think this war was all about? My lust?’

‘What else could it be? I do not see anything else being fought over. No continents conquered or invaded, no power struggles, no wealth amassed or lost, no kingships acquired ... What else is this war about if not Sita, the wife of Rama?’

He shook his head, rising slowly to his feet. Coming down the stairs of the dais a step at a time, he stopped at the lowest one and looked at her steadfastly. ‘This war is not about any woman, and never was. This war has been waged forever. It is the eternal war, the mother of all wars. It is not merely about me, or Rama, or our differences. In another time, he and I were friends and much beloved of each other; in another time, we may be so again. We shall be so. Yet in this age, and this place, we are at war. And neither of us, if pressed hard, can answer honestly and truly why. For the reason goes to the very soul of itihāsa itself. And as you know, the word for history means simply: That is what happened. There is no logic, no rationale, no justification, no moral side to choose, no right or wrong, no good or evil, or even shades of grey ... There is merely an event, a relationship, a war or the end of war. Some day, perhaps, you will be shown why this particular war happened, and why it ended as it did, why it had to end as it did. But now, today, I cannot explain it to you in any terms you can understand. Or I can do so, but to do so I would require a scribe of prodigious talents and proficiency, and some six or seven volumes, consuming several thousands of scroll-pages.’ He pretended to glance around. ‘And I do not see any scribes at hand at this moment, nor do I think I can keep Rama waiting that long. For it is approaching the hour when I am bound to meet him on the field for our final encounter and it would not be seemly for me to be late for my appointment with my own death.’

She caught one of his arms. ‘Then you knew all this would transpire? That you would be defeated, that Lanka would fall, and that you would go to face Rama thus, helpless and bereft of your army, your sorcerous powers, your ... ’ she gestured, ‘everything?’

He looked down at her with a variety of expressions displaying affection, gentleness, tenderness, even something approaching love, if it could be called that. ‘If I tell you I did, will it make your heart easier?’

‘Tell me the truth!’ she cried. ‘For once!’

He smiled sadly with all his heads at once. ‘The truth is too great a burden. I must bear it alone to my grave.’ He kissed her gently on the forehead and walked past her.

She turned, tears streaming down her face. ‘You owe it to me,’ she shouted. ‘I am your wife!’

He looked back at her. ‘No,’ he said. ‘You are now my widow.’

And he left her standing alone in that desolate palace of unspeakable luxury and finery, and went to meet his end.

Rama surveyed the field. All the survivors of his armies had assembled here again, and it was a telling sight, for now at a glance he could see how many had been lost. Perhaps four out of ten of the original number who had assembled on the shores of the mainland weeks ago remained now. At least another three of the remaining six of those ten were wounded to varying degrees, several grievously. And not one of that number was without some injury or wound. All were exhausted and near collapse, including himself. For even with the shakti of Brahman in his veins, he was still mortal. And mortal flesh had its limits.

But it was still an army, and it was still his to command, and it was a victorious army.

A cry went up, and he saw the thread of dust in the distance, raised by the approach of a single chariot. A few thousand of Lanka's troops stood on the field as well, their heads hanging in shame, their bodies mutilated, battered, and in several cases mortally injured. They had not formally surrendered to him, but they might as well have, for they had ceased fighting hours ago, after the last of their leaders had been slain. All night the war had raged on, and he himself had killed more than he could easily count, and each one of his generals and lieutenants had been injured in their combat with Ravana's greatest warriors. But they had triumphed in the end. And the four precious herbs from the mountains that Hanuman had brought back, the mrtyasanjivani, visalyakarni, sauvarnakarni and samdhani, had been wonderfully efficacious in reviving those seriously injured. Already, Sugreeva, Angad, Nila, Sarabha, Gandhamadana, Jambavan, Vegadarsi, Mainda, Nala, Jyotimukha, and Panasa, and many others, all injured in various combats, had been revived, healed, or wholly resurrected. Only those who had been torn to pieces physically were beyond the power of the herbs to heal, which number included a great many loved ones, including little Sakra, the tribe-goddess Mandara-devi, and even the aged guru Plaksa, who had been killed by a falling roof while attempting to heal the bear Kambunara. In the ultimate irony, Plaksa had left instructions with his great-grandsons that in the event of his demise, he was not to be revived at any cost. He had already passed on the knowledge of how to select and use the herbs, and wished to be allowed to go to his well-deserved next life in peace. Rama had ordered that his wishes should be adhered to.

Now, Rama watched as the chariot approached up the length of the field, and stopped several hundred yards away. He was prepared for subterfuge, for sorcery, for deception and deviousness. After all, this was still Ravana, and he expected the lord of Lanka, like any ferocious aggressor, to be more dangerous in defeat than he had ever been before.

EIGHTEEN

When Ravana's voice spoke within Rama's mind, he was not surprised. He had been expecting some kind of mindgame. The only surprising thing was the softness of Ravana's tone. It sounded almost ... gentle.

Are you pleased, Rama?

He answered by speaking quietly, preferring to use natural speech rather than respond to Ravana's magicks. 'I am ready.'

But you must be filled with joy and relief. You finally have me at your disposal, the war is won, and you will soon regain Sita. You have achieved a great victory, one that will be remembered and celebrated for millennia. In some future age, you will be worshipped as a deva descended to earth in mortal avatar for your accomplishments and deeds in this life.

'I am a warrior performing his duties. It was ever my task to work diligently to achieve my goal, regardless of the fruits of success. I neither desire to be worshipped as a deva nor think that I am one.'

Are you quite sure of that?

Rama frowned. 'What do you mean? If you seek to dupe me somehow, you will not succeed, rakshasa.'

Succeed? I have already failed! Do you wish to hear me say it? I have failed, Rama. I have lost to you. Lost everything. My kingdom, my army, my wealth, my power ... and now, I am about to lose my life. I have nothing to gain now by lying to you. This is perhaps the only time that Ravana has nothing to say but the truth.

Rama was nonplussed by this admission. Of all the things he had been expecting, this was not one. Still, he could not be wholly convinced that the rakshasa was not employing some device so clever it seemed entirely naive. He could not believe that it was in Ravana's nature to admit defeat, and to admit it so openly, honestly and graciously.

But what do you really know about my nature, Rama? Like everyone else, all you know of me is based on my behaviour, my words and my deeds.

‘That is how all men are judged by their fellows, on the basis of their words and their deeds.’

But which words and which deeds, and at what time?

Rama shook his head. ‘I do not follow your meaning.’

If a son sees his father steeped in wine all hours of the day, indulging himself in fleshly pleasures with three hundred and fifty wives, while he neglects his mother painfully, grows too corpulent even to lift a sword, let alone wield it, how would that son judge that father? Why, he would think him to be a mere debauch! Whereas that same debauch, only a decade or so earlier, might have been one of the greatest warrior-kings that ever lived, leading a vast host against great odds, and winning unwinnable wars against the most terrible warring demon races that ever existed. If we are to judge people by their deeds and their words, then we must also weigh which deeds and which words, and at what time.

‘Do not refer to my father. He has nothing to do with this.’

But of course he does. Why do you think he was named Dasaratha: He Who Fights in Ten Directions? He spent his life fighting me and my minions, and now his son is about to become legendary for his defeat of a certain villain named Ravana, who happens to have ten heads?

‘Names and numbers, they mean nothing to me.’

Much more than names and numbers, my young god-in-themaking. There is the matter of Vishnu, who is destined to have ten avatars, the Dasavataras as they are called. Of whom seven have already been born and passed by.

Rama frowned again. He knew of only six avatars of Lord Vishnu. Who was the seventh that Ravana was referring to?

Every hero must have a villain to destroy, in order to prove himself a hero. But not every villain needs a hero in order to prove himself a villain.

‘What does that mean, rakshasa?’ Rama asked bluntly. He could not understand what Ravana intended with this debate—or lecture, really. But he did not wish to deny his enemy the right to parley, if that was what this unusual exchange was to be called.

That I existed long before you, Rama Chandra, came into this world in this form, and I will exist again, and again and again, long after you take your samadhi and depart this mortal coil.

‘If I have to be born again a thousand times to rid the world of your menace, I shall.’

A thousand times is too many. Thrice more would be sufficient.

‘Enough talking now. Come down from your chariot and face me on the field of battle.’

So you prefer violence to civilised conversation, then? And they call me a villain.

‘You were given several opportunities to talk civilly, rakshasa, and you chose to eschew them for violence. You have left me no choice but to speak in the only language you seem to understand.’

I am sure that kings and leaders of great nations will justify their wars and invasions of foreign lands in much the same terms in future ages. That does not make those wars and invasions any less evil. But perhaps you are right. The time has come at last to end this particular conflict. Already it drags on past my endurance. You do not know how long I have awaited this day, this hour.

‘Then come and reap the harvest of your actions,’ said Rama and raised the Bow of Vishnu and drew the Arrow of Shiva.

Ravana stepped down from his chariot. The lord of Lanka was clad in the traditional garments of civilised Arya everywhere— for Arya meant literally ‘noble’, and was not a race or creed, but a way of life—a pristine white dhoti around his lower limbs and a white anga-vastra draped loosely around his upper body, the end of the strip of cloth wrapped around his lowermost right forearm. He wore no crown on any of his heads, and every one of his foreheads had been anointed with the red-ochre marks that signified that he had performed his acamana ritual that morning and offered suitable prayers. Rama had received reports that the king of rakshasas had been spotted entering the Shiva mandir earlier, although he still could not fathom how he had travelled there from the palace in the inner quarter of the city without being seen by Rama’s troops, who were everywhere now. It did not matter any more; they were now at the end of all deceptions and subterfuge. Whatever sorcery Ravana had planned, Rama would counter it with his dev-astras and his will. He would not let the rakshasa leave the field alive this time.

When Ravana was perhaps fifty yards away, he stopped and faced Rama. The rakshasa carried a throwing javelin covered with gold-plate and carved in exquisite detail: the filigree working was visible even at this distance, catching the light of the rising sun. It was an unusually ostentatious weapon to bring to such a vital encounter. Rama had expected something more deadly or exotic. But then, perhaps Ravana thought to confuse and deflect his attention with such an object, while his real attack would come from a wholly different direction. He remained alert for any and every possibility. Hanuman was already overhead, hovering in midair, arms across his chest as he watched the contest sternly, ready to intervene on Rama’s behalf at any time that he saw deception on Ravana’s part. Lakshman, Angad, Sugreeva, Nala, Jambavan ... all were stationed at strategic points, ready to face an attack from the most unexpected quarter, be it from below the ground, from the sky, the ocean, or even the very air itself. They had become veterans now of the wiles and ways of rakshasa warfare. They were masters of this field.

One last thing, Ravana’s voice said in his mind.

‘I am done with speaking, rakshasa. Raise your weapon and strike if you will. Or I will strike at you first, it does not matter to me either way. But cease your speaking and act.’

You may strike at me any time you wish. But I shall say this one thing anyway. After I am gone, care well for the twins. For they are my legacy to the world, and my parting gift to you.

Twins? Legacy? Gift? Rama found himself growing angry and impatient with the rakshasa’s riddles. ‘I do not know what you speak of, Lanka-naresh. But I will hear no more. Now, raise your weapon and fight.’

And with those words, Rama pulled back the Arrow and prepared to loose it upon Ravana.

Ravana nodded. All his ten heads dipped and rose in unison. Then he hefted the ornately worked gold spear in one hand, raised it, pulled back his arm, and flung the weapon hard towards Rama.

Rama stood his ground, allowing the spear to fly straight at him. He had promised himself that he would let Ravana have first strike—and even first blood, if it so transpired—so that when he fired upon the rakshasa, no one could question his right to do so.

He knew he could move and dodge the spear should it threaten to impale him in some vital organ. But because of the miracle herbs, even that would not be needed. And he would rather endure even a mortal wound manfully than step aside and dance for Ravana. So he braced himself, fully expecting the spear to pierce him fatally, prepared for the impact and the pain.

Every pair of eyes in both the assembled armies watched the spear as it flew through the air towards Rama.

The spear sped towards him, and then, when it was merely yards away, fell like a dead weight, piercing the ground almost half a yard short of his left foot, which he had placed forward in his usual archer’s stance.

He was shocked as well as suspicious. Surely Ravana could not have missed? The master of war himself? No, there was something deliberate in this near miss. Of that he was certain. But he would not waste time trying to fathom it. He would act before the rakshasa’s plan, whatever it might be, took effect.

With a shloka on his lips, he loosed the Arrow of Shiva.

The missile flew across the field, blazing with blue flames clearly visible in the morning light.

And struck one of Ravana's heads, the one on the extreme left side. The head was decapitated and fell with a dull thud to the ground, rolling several yards away. The Arrow returned to the Bow in his hand. Without hesitating, he fired it again, decapitating another head, this time the one on the extreme right hand side of Ravana's rack of heads. He saw the blood spurt and the head lopped off, falling beyond the rakshasa. He fired again. And yet again. Nine times in all.

Until only one head remained.

Rama paused, staring at the lord of rakshasas. Why was Ravana simply standing there, doing nothing? Why did he not retaliate against Rama's attacks? Surely he had other weapons, other devices? Why was he not acting, using them, deploying sorcery?

Because you shot so swiftly, he told himself, stilling the uneasy voice in his head. You shot so swiftly that he had no time to retaliate.

But now Ravana did have time, as Rama paused and wondered at his inaction.

And as he watched, the rakshasa raised his six hands, flexing his powerful muscles, and gestured, as if unleashing a sorcerous spell.

At once, Rama loosed the Arrow a tenth time.

And decapitated Ravana's last head.

For a long moment, the king of Lanka stood there on the field, headless, blood pouring from ten separate wounds, the white bone that fixed each head to his unusual spine visible in some of the cavities.

Then, slowly, almost majestically, with an illusion of dignity and grace, the demonlord's body pitched forward and fell on the mud of the field. It lay there, still and lifeless, to all appearances dead.

Rama lowered his Bow and stared at the fallen body of his enemy. It could not possibly be that easy. Surely Ravana had engineered some deception here, some sleight of hand or asura maya.

It occurred to him that perhaps the rakshasa had used a shape-shifter in his place, instead of appearing himself. That seemed unlikely, since this combat was now a matter of honour, but who knew how low Ravana would sink?

Unconvinced, he called out to Lakshman and Nala to check the body and confirm that Ravana was dead.

They did so. Lakshman bent down, examined the body closely, then rose and nodded. 'He is dead, Rama.'

Even then Rama was not satisfied. 'Call someone who can identify him.'

'I will identify him,' said a rakshasi stepping forward. Rama had noticed her earlier, standing to one side along with several other rakshasis, but had assumed they were widows seeking the corpses of their fallen husbands among the dead, or perhaps even one of the many delegations that had been approaching him to beg for mercy for themselves and their surviving relatives. Now, as she removed her veil, he saw that she was clearly a woman of some distinction. Vibhisena started forward from his place among Rama's supporters. 'Mandodhari,' he called. The rakshasi paid no heed to his call but as he approached, she permitted him to walk alongside her. Together they went to where Ravana's body lay and bent down over it.

As the rakshasi began to sob and weep uncontrollably, embracing the mutilated body of the dead rakshasa, Rama grew certain at last that the impossible had indeed been achieved. He had killed Ravana. The nemesis of the three worlds was dead at last.

SAMPTAM

After Ravana's death, Lanka's survivors in the kingdom hailed Rama as he entered the city in a triumphant victory procession, and a delegation of all the surviving nobles and ministers approached him to beg that he assume kingship of their nation.

He refused flatly, and at first was inclined to leave it to the Lankans to select and install their own king. But when they insisted that he choose for them, he said simply, 'At a time like this, you require an honest, righteous ruler. I know only one such rakshasa. Ravana's brother Vibhisena.'

Mandodhari was inconsolable. But after her initial breakdown on the field, she regained her wits and her composure and met Rama with an aspect of unrelenting accusation. 'My husband did not fight you,' she said in a tone the more galling for being so quiet and controlled. 'He permitted you to slay him. It was an act no less than murder.'

'My lady,' Rama replied patiently, 'if he allowed me to slay him, then surely it ought to be called suicide.'

But she would not listen to further argument. And turned her face away with the final, chilling words, 'May your wife come to know how it feels to be separated from her husband thus. Ravana was a being of many faults but he was also a great king, a great leader of men, and his name will live longer than yours. There may be many Ramas, there will always be only one Ravana.'

He did not respond. She had the right to speak her heart. Besides, widows were entitled to say whatever they wished. He focussed instead on the tiring task of settling in the new council of governance, under Vibhisena, and undergoing a brief formal ceremony during which he wished aloud that the conflict between rakshasas and mortals would end this day for all time.

'When the rakshasa race itself is on the brink of extinction,' one sardonic minister replied, 'where is the question of further conflict. You have weeded out the worst of us, Rama, but in doing so, you have also ensured our extinction. Perhaps not today, or even a year, or a hundred years, but the Lanka of the rakshasa race is doomed. Some day in the distant future there shall be a new Lanka which recalls nothing of its rakshasa past, and is occupied entirely by mortals. This much you have achieved at least: you have rid this mortal plane of the last vestiges of the asura races. Surely you will be remembered and celebrated throughout history for your acts.’

Rama sensed and heard the cynicism in the rakshasa’s words but did not argue the point. When one has won the war, one should not stoop to petty squabbles. Besides, there was no untruth in what the fellow said. Some day, he thought, looking down from the balustrade of the Pushpak, which he had commandeered, there would truly be a new Lanka, a Lanka of peace and prosperity, and this jewel of an island-kingdom would be populated with people as beautiful as the land itself, dark and comely and pure of heart and soul. If only they did not allow the poison of the violence that had been committed here in the past to resurface.

He had Hanuman extinguish the volcano, which was already dying after the vanar had wrestled the giant Kumbhakarna into its maw. The enormous bulk of the rakshasa had consumed most of the volcano’s fire, and it took very little effort—only a few giant fistfuls of water and dry sand—to snuff it out completely. Reshaping it with his bare hands, Hanuman turned it into yet another mountain, the highest now on the Lankan landscape.

With Ravana’s sorcery gone, the Lankans would have to rebuild their city the hard, old-fashioned way. Perhaps that was for the best. They would be occupied with productive work and would have no energy or time to spare for unfruitful thoughts of revenge or retaliation. As he observed the people straggling through the ruins of their once great city-state, Rama did not sense any great animosity or hostility, only the sullen relief of a defeated populace.

Sita was seated beside him now, on the cushioned seat of the Pushpak, resting her weary body. He had been shocked to find her so depleted and pale and thin. But she was alive, and still in her senses, and had sustained no major injuries. They had much to speak of, but there would be time for that later, once they were safely back in their rightful place.

Right now, all he desired was to return home. For the exile was finally over, his demons slain—literally—and Sita regained. He had nothing else to hold him here, or anywhere else. And there was an entire nation waiting to receive him, and welcome him back. He had already sent Hanuman ahead as his emissary to inform his family that he was returning, and as he watched Sita resting languidly, neither wholly awake nor asleep, he waited for the vanar's return.

Lakshman came up beside him, glancing at his sister-in-law. 'How is she? Angad and Nala have laid out a repast for us on the lower level. Will she join us there to feast?'

Rama put his arm around his brother, hugging him warmly. 'Nay, my brother. She needs rest now more than food. Perhaps later, when she has been able to recover a little, she will feel her appetite return. Right now, she is still absorbing the shock that her ordeal is finally over.'

Lakshman gestured to Rama to come over to the far side of the Pushpak. Rama went with him.

Lakshman turned and said softly, too softly to be heard by Sita, 'Rama, there is a rumour among the vanars and the bears ... '

Rama had heard several hundred rumours in the past day, most concerning Ravana and how the demonlord was not truly dead but concealed somewhere, biding his time to return, even if it took ten thousand years. He put his arm over his brother's shoulder. 'Lakshman, if we believe every rumour, we will be imagining Ravana's leaping out of our own shadow every minute.'

Lakshman shook his head. 'This one is not about Ravana. It is about Sita.'

Rama looked at him curiously. 'What about Sita?'

Lakshman looked around uncomfortably, then glanced back at Rama. 'The question that is being asked is this: How do we know that the Sita we saw killed earlier was not the real Sita, and that this one is not the shape-shifter Supanakha?'

Rama removed his arm from Lakshman's shoulder. 'How can you even tolerate such an ugly lie?'

Lakshman sighed. 'Rama, do not take offense. Consider for a moment. After all the deceptions of Ravana, is it not possible?'

'No.' Rama's voice was without anger, but it was firm.

‘But Rama, how can you know for sure? After all, it was only because Jambavan told us that the first Sita was actually Supanakha with her appearance altered that we knew that bhabhi was still alive. Had Jambavan not told us, we would be thinking today that this woman was Supanakha, would we not?’

‘No,’ Rama said again. ‘You might, others might, but not I. I know that this is Sita, my wife, and your sister-in-law, Lakshman.’

Lakshman inhaled deeply, then released another breath. He looked around in frustration. ‘There is a simple way to prove it.’

‘I will not hear of it.’

‘Rama, if not for yourself ... ’

‘I am her husband, I am satisfied, I do not need to satisfy anyone else.’

Lakshman looked at him thoughtfully. ‘You are also King of Ayodhya now, or will be in a short while. You owe a duty to the people. You remember the vow of kingship: to put dharma before self, to put the law of the land before one’s own welfare or gain.’

‘You do not need to remind me of my vows. I know them well. And this matter has no bearing on them.’

‘But it does, Rama. The law says that a woman who has been away from her husband and has lived in another man’s house for more than one night must prove her chastity or be assumed to have committed the crime of adultery. That is the law, as I need not remind you.’

‘Yes, of course,’ Rama began, ‘but ...’ Then he stopped. And thought through the implications of Lakshman’s words. He saw that Lakshman was indeed correct: while the law was not meant to cover wives abducted by rakshasa kings and spirited away by force to distant lands, Sita’s case did indeed fall under its purview. ‘Even so,’ he conceded reluctantly, ‘it is the husband’s prerogative in such a case to choose to accept his wife back or reject her, regardless of whether or not she has ... ’ He could not bring himself to utter the offensive phrases, and to his relief, Lakshman nodded hurriedly, as embarrassed as he was. ‘And as her husband, I believe completely that she was neither touched by Ravana nor did she once yield to his embraces ... ' There. He had said as much as he was willing to say. 'I accept her back unconditionally as my lawful wife.'

'Yes, yes, yes, Rama, and I support you wholeheartedly, and would do the same if I were in your position, Devi forbid,' Lakshman said softly. 'But you are no ordinary citizen, nor is she an ordinary woman. You are the king and queen of Ayodhya, and the minute we reach home, you will assume your crowns and your kingship and queenship. And kingship demands a far higher standard of morality and law, and dharma.'

'Then what would you have me do, Lakshman?' Rama said, now starting to lose his patience at last. 'Would you have me test her to be certain of her identity? And even if I ascertain that she is who I believe her to be, there would still be aspersions cast on her purity, according to you. So what would you have me do? Ask her to take the agni test to prove herself?'

Lakshman stared at him wide-eyed. 'Bhai ...'

Rama realised the implications of what he had said and looked as if he would retract his words.

'But it is perfect,' Lakshman continued before Rama could say anything. 'By taking the agni test, she will prove both things simultaneously—that she is indeed Sita, and not a shape-shifter in human form; and that she is pure and unsullied by any other man's touch.'

Rama shook his head. 'No, no, no. I will not subject my wife to such a test. It is inhuman and irrational, and offensive to her as well as to me.'

'But your wife is the queen of the civilised world now, Rama.'

'No,' he said again. 'I will hear no further argument on this matter. Sita will not undergo the agni test.'

'Sita will indeed undertake the agni test.'

They both turned to find Sita standing a mere yard away. She still looked wan and pale, but in her eyes was a glimmer of something they both recognised: her steely will.

'Sita,' Rama said anxiously. 'You ought to be—'

‘I am exhausted and bruised and starved,’ she said, ‘not dead. I will do this, Rama. I will undertake the agni test.’

‘You do not need to, my love,’ he said gently. ‘People will always find some new rumour to gossip about. We have been through so much together and apart, we will endure this as well.’

‘And we will survive it as well,’ she said. ‘I do not doubt that, nor do I doubt your resoluteness, my love. But I am not doing this for you, nor am I doing it for myself, nor am I doing it to silence those who start such rumours, nor even those who repeat them and thereby give them credence.’

Although she did not look at Lakshman as she said this, her brother-in-law flushed hotly and glanced away.

She continued calmly, ‘I do this for Ayodhya.’

‘For Ayodhya?’ Rama echoed.

‘Yes. The kingdom has waited fourteen years for the rightful king and queen to return. There must be no shadow of doubt, no whisper of rumour, not even the tiniest spot of a stain to mar the perfection of that moment. Your road to the Sunwood throne must be unquestioned and unchallenged by anyone, for I know that by Ayodhyan law, even the king and queen are subject to the same laws of dharma as their citizens, and none are above it. If we do not undertake this test, Rama, anyone at any time can raise this question again. Let me undertake this agni pariksha now and stamp out the rumour for ever.’

Rama was silent when she finished. He looked at Lakshman, who was flushed with embarrassment, but nodded silently, agreeing.

‘Very well, then,’ Rama said. ‘Let us overcome this final hurdle and return home.’

They performed the test on the mainland, travelling there by the Pushpak, which Vibhisena showed them how to manipulate until it was enlarged into a great vessel of many score levels, enough to bear the entire vanar and bear armies. The celestial vehicle flew as easily and smoothly with this enormous load as it did when only two or three passengers rode it. And despite the swiftness of its movement, none aboard felt any discomfort or unease. Although the vanars and bears cheekaed and howled at the sight of mountains and valleys and plains, and then wide-open ocean water, rolling beneath them at the speed of the wind.

They reached the mainland two hour-watches before sunset. With so many hands to work, it took little time to assemble the dried branches and sticks and lay them out upon the sandy beach for a length of some ten yards as required by law. Then Lakshman set about the task of lighting the fire and uttering the appropriate shlokas over it, taking care not to make a single slip, for then he would be required to start all over again.

When all was in readiness, he turned and nodded to Rama.

Rama looked at Sita. ‘Are you sure?’

She smiled at him with the same wan smile he had seen on her since he had found her in the cave beneath the city. At least she did not weep in his arms and shake uncontrollably as she had done at that first reunion. He was proud of how dignified and self-possessed she looked.

He walked with her to the start of the long walkway, already blazing with foot-high flames. He kissed her once, then left her.

Sita did not resent the pariksha. She understood how doubt could creep into the mind of any person and take root. She could also understand the external perception that most would have of her situation: a defenceless woman, captured and kept prisoner for weeks by the most powerful demonlord, arch-enemy of her husband. It would be hard for some people to believe that she had not been raped, ravished, violated in some fashion or other. They would wonder how she could have resisted so long. And she could hardly expect them to believe the truth: that Ravana had in fact never approached her with force or a lustful gaze. The closest he had come to any form of violence was in badgering her, hectoring, taunting, seeking to break down her mental defences. But to the end, all he had done was threaten her verbally, not abuse her physically. It had perplexed her all this while; now she was left wondering if perhaps he had never intended to do anything to her at all. Perhaps that had been his intention all along—merely to use her as bait to bring Rama and his armies to Lanka. But why would he wilfully cause his own destruction?

She set aside these and all other questions and prepared herself for the pariksha.

The test was simple enough. The fire was real, the threat to mortal flesh and life and limb agonizingly real as well. Only the mantras that Lakshman had spoken over the fire, and which she was now required to repeat the companion verses to, could keep her from being consumed alive. No asura or rakshasa could hope to speak the same mantras and survive, Agni, the deva of fire, would know, and destroy them at once. And of course, if there was any trace of impurity in her—if, for instance, she had indeed committed any transgression against Agni, for the marital vows were always sanctified by the holy fire, whether she had done so willingly or unwillingly—she would be burned alive. It was an ancient, cruel test for women who had been violated against their will, but it was also a test devised by women themselves, to prove their purity under circumstances where doubt arose.

She stepped onto the flaming logs, the verses already on her lips, and measured her footsteps by the rhythm of the Sanskrit shlokas.

Before she knew it, she was stepping onto warm sand once again, and a great cheer rose from the watching assemblage of vanars and bears.

Rama came and hugged her. ‘My love, my love,’ was all he said.

She smiled and looked back at the long firewalk. Had she truly stepped through that without feeling a thing? Apparently she had. And she had not a burn nor so much as a stain to show for it. Even her garments were untouched.

Lakshman came and bowed before her, touching her feet. ‘Bhabhiji, forgive me if I offended you in any way. I desired only to set all doubts at rest.’

‘Lakshman,’ she said, and felt tears springing to her eyes, ‘you have no need to apologize. I know that in all you do, you wish only the best for Rama and me.’

She looked at her husband and her brother-in-law, then at the masses of shouting and leaping and dancing vanars and bears. ‘I think a celebration is in order now. I can see that everyone needs it.’

Rama nodded. ‘But ours will have to wait until we return home.’

He gestured at Hanuman, who had arrived shortly before they left Lanka with the news that Ayodhya was awaiting them with great eagerness.

The Pushpak flew swiftly across the land, reduced now to merely one level as only the three Ayodhyans and Hanuman were aboard it. Rama had taken leave of King Sugreeva and Jambavan and all the others back on the shore of the mainland itself, with promises to visit soon and stay in touch; when he parted from them he felt almost as he had felt when parting from his family in Ayodhya that fateful day fourteen years ago.

The Pushpak moved at a tremendous pace. At this rate, Hanuman had told them, they would be in Ayodhya before sunset. And indeed, the celestial vehicle’s speed was so great Rama had nothing to compare it to any longer, except perhaps Hanuman himself!

He almost wished he could make it go slower, to savour the moment, the luxury of being with Sita again, of looking upon her heart-shaped face, that slender throat, those eyes he could lose himself in for hours. He looked down at the endless forests blurring past underneath and wished that they could return to that simple cottage in Panchvati, could play in the high grass and rub turmeric on one another’s faces and laugh and kiss and spend all day in the dappled sunlight falling through the leaves, and perhaps later, when they were done with affection, they could go down to the river and slake their thirst and then dive into the cool, perfect water, and enter that beautiful, silent world. And afterwards, as the forest dimmed and the sunlight faded, and the birds filled the sky with their deafening cacophony, they could sit by a fireplace and eat a simple meal before retiring for the night to straw pallets on a mud floor swept by Sita herself with a thrash-broom and sterilised by Lakshman with cow urine, and then made fragrant by rose blossoms strewn in the corners.

But he knew wistfully that such a thing could never come to pass. Tonight he would sleep on velvet cushions and silken sheets would cover his body. So be it. As long as he had Sita by his side, nothing else would matter. And Lakshman would have Urmila again. For Rama had not forgotten that these past fourteen years, his brother had been separated from his bride. Fourteen years. And now it seemed to have flowed past like the river rushing by below the Pushpak. Had it really been that long?

Then he realised that the river was the Sarayu, and that the wooden arch speeding by below was Mithila Bridge. And that they were on Kosala land now. There was the raj-marg winding its way steadily alongside the river, bordered on the south by the pressing darkness of the forest. Except that there was no Bhayanakvan any longer, no dreaded Southwoods, no asuras lurking in those dark wildernesses. And that was his doing, he had rid the world of all demons, including his own.

And then he saw the lights, and heard the faint chanting.

Ayodhya was glowing. She had put on her best face for him once more, as she had done on the night he had returned from Mithila with his new bride, he and his three brothers, and his father and mother, and the other queens. But this time there were people on the raj-marg as well, holding up oil lanterns blazing in endless perfect rows. On the riverbanks. On the walls. On the city streets, which he could glimpse now. On the rooftops. And at the balconies of a thousand homes.

Ayodhya was burning with happiness. For him. For her long-lost liege, returning home at last.

He could see the palace now, so familiar it brought an ache to his heart, and a tear to his eye. He could see the troops lined up on the avenue, their weapons gleaming in the light of the mashaals, their uniforms immaculate, and he could hear their voices now, raised in perfect harmony, singing the raag Deepavali. It filled his heart and his ears and enveloped him with warmth and love and affection. He looked down at Sita and saw her face lit up with the glow of the lights below as well as from an inner flame that he knew was the first sign of thawing of the icy terror that had imprisoned her all this while. She would be well now. She would return to life. And he would care for her better than he cared for himself. For she was Ayodhya, and he loved her. And he was with her now, he was home, and he would stay for ever. Nothing would ever separate them again.

He looked down with her, their hands clasped, their throats choked with emotion, Lakshman and Hanuman behind them, all four of them silenced by the grandeur of the scene, the rich tableau laid out before them, an entire city—nay, an entire nation—turned out to greet and welcome them back. And the Pushpak dipped, slowing at last, coming to a perfect halt, then descending smoothly, silently, to bring them to the level of the ground before the palace entrance. And Rama saw his mother, ageing and white-haired, and Brahmarishi Vashishta, looking much the same as ever but with perhaps a few more lines on his ancient face, and Bharat, and Shatrugana ... and was that Nakhudi? And that stately old man in a general's uniform, could it be Bejoo? So many faces, so many memories, so many loved ones and sights and sounds and things, all swirling together in a miasma of light and song and beauty.

He gave Sita his hand to hold for support and helped her out of the Pushpak. Together they stepped out onto the soil of his native land. At last, finally, they were home.

AUTHOR'S AFTERWORD TO INDIAN PAPERBACK EDITION 2006

My Ramayana ends here. The page you just turned is the last page of my retelling.

I know. I know. Valmiki's Ramayana goes on beyond this point, in the section titled Uttara-kaand, to narrate what happens to Rama and Sita and the rest of this epic cast of characters.

But I've chosen to end the story here.

As promised, the tale that began in Prince of Ayodhya ends here with King of Ayodhya. An epic journey completed, an exile fulfilled, a prince returned home to claim his crown at last, a kingdom restored to its rightful master, a world set right once more.

Lovers united at journey's end.

Of course, there's more to come in their lives. There always is. Life goes on past the endings of storybooks. But books, alas, must end someplace.

This one ends here, by my choice. Why?

Well, for one thing, as you know by now, I've chosen to retell this story from the outset as an imaginative retelling, closer to the kind of beautiful monster attempted by Kamban or K. M. Munshi, rather than a strict translation—after all, there were any number of excellent translations available long before I began. And in attempting a retelling, one is guided first and last by one's own vision or interpretation of the tale rather than by any rote recitation.

And so, in the Uttara-kaand I finally came upon an episode that I was unable to integrate into my perspective of this great epic. The banishment of Sita by Rama, after they are back in Ayodhya.

My sense of interpretation has difficulty accepting this decision of Rama to banish the woman he loves so deeply and for whom he fought such a long and terrible war. For whom he, in fact, crossed an ocean and invaded a foreign dominion—a unique event in the history of our nation. Whether viewed on a personal or political level, this decision was hard to accept, for me, Rama's self-styled biographer.

To put it bluntly, the Rama I felt I came so close to understanding through this long journey of three thousand pages and several years, could not, would not, cannot ever have agreed to banish his beloved wife.

Yes, I know the arguments about dharma and allegiance to the people. Setting a royal example, etc.

They're all good and valid. And to those who adhere strictly by that interpretation, I say, well and good. You have every right to insist that that is the only truth.

I have no argument with you.

This is precisely why I am not attempting to put forth my version of what might have, ought to have, or should have happened. After all, who am I to argue with the great minds of past masters?

Despite all my flights of imagination, despite all the small liberties and creative poetic license I have taken within the framework of the story or in individual episodes and characterisation, I have always tried to adhere strictly to the bare bones of this tale—far more closely than you might imagine. The brilliant translation by Arshia Sattar of Valmiki's Ramayana — abridged, but nonetheless masterful and complete in itself— remains to my mind, the single best version of this epic poem. It has been my lodestone and guiding star through every working day of my long journey with Rama and his companions. I cannot credit it highly enough except to say that if I have achieved even a tenth of its greatness, then I shall feel hugely rewarded.

And because I respect that source material so much, I could not twist and alter the facts of the story to such an extent to suit my own purpose.

And so, I chose to simply end the story here. In doing so, I'm supported by a legion of scholars who believe, to this day, that the first and last kaands of Valmiki's retelling of the Ramayana (for it was also a retelling of actual events, whether wholly real or partly, let's not forget—not his own fictional creation!) were added later by other hands. This may also account for my disagreement with the events described in the seventh, and last, kaand, perhaps. It's quite likely that my disagreement is not with Valmiki at all, but with those who might have added these later portions for their own unfathomable reasons.

I also know that I've left several questions unanswered, or only partly answered, at the end of this, the sixth and final book of my Ramayana. That, too, is deliberate.

The purpose of my retelling was never to answer all questions, or offer an explanation of all the mysteries of the universe! It was to show you, dear reader, that this is truly a great tale, perhaps one of the greatest tales of all time, and that even today, the Ramayana can be read and enjoyed by one and all.

I believe that to some small extent, I've succeeded in doing that. Today, by any estimate, there are several lakh readers of my Ramayana books worldwide, the majority of them Indians or of Indian origin. And a surprising percentage of these readers claim that this is the first and only Ramayana they have ever read in their lives!

I hope to encourage you to correct that lacuna now. To drive you to find answers to the unanswered questions of my retelling by reading other, better versions of this epic. You may like to start with the excellent Arshia Sattar abridged edition, in print and easily available. After that, go ahead and try out any of the numerous other versions in various languages. There is a rich tradition of Ramayana retellings—as well as commentaries on the Ramayana, such as the famous Ramcharitramanas by Sant Tulsidas—in various Indian languages. In particular, I have high regard for the versions available in several south Indian languages, including Thamizh. They reveal a rich heritage of questioning and debate that has helped keep this tale alive and made the tradition of the Ramayana a living one to this day.

Armed with the knowledge of the story gained through my humble, flawed attempt, you will perhaps be able to discover new insights and answers with each new version you read. Who knows...you may learn things that I failed to discover. After all, they say that the Ramayana is read differently by different readers.

I wish you happy reading.

And I shall take my leave now.

For I have another epic to work on, and another great historical age to visit and view through my own imaginative point of view.

If you wish, you may like to accompany me on that long journey as well.

It promises to be a far longer one, though. Already looming as eighteen large volumes, about six times the length of my Ramayana series!

Come with me, if you will, to another place and time ... to a great city, ruled by an ancient family ... where a blood feud threatens to rip asunder the very fabric of family and history ...

In Hastinapura where the blind king ruled ...

KING of DHARMA

ASHOK K. BANKER

RAMAYANA SERIES®

PART FOUR

This omnibus ebook contains the complete text of VENGEANCE OF RAVANA and SONS OF SITA

Contents

KING OF DHARMA

Preface

AKB eBOOKS

VENGEANCE OF RAVANA

Invocation

Epigraph

Dedication

Introduction

Introduction

Introduction

2nd Introduction

2nd Introduction

Samaptam

Samaptam

Samaptam

Prarambh

Prarambh

Prarambh

Kaand 1

Kaand 1

Kaand 1

Kaand 2

Kaand 2

Kaand 2

Kaand 3

Kaand 3

Kaand 3

White

Text

Blankness & Void

She floated in the void for an infinity.

“Exile.”

Promo

SONS OF SITA

Invocation

Epigraph

Dedication

Introduction

Introduction

Introduction

2nd Introduction

2nd Introduction

Prarambh

Prarambh

Prarambh Text

Kaand 1

Kaand 1

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 1 Text

Kaand 2

Kaand 2

Kaand 2 Text

Kaand 2 Text

Kaand 2 Text

Kaand 2 Text

Kaand 2 Text

Kaand 2 Text

Kaand 2 Text

Kaand 2 Text

Kaand 2 Text

Kaand 2 Text

Kaand 2 Text

Kaand 2 Text

Kaand 2 Text

Kaand 3

Kaand 3

Kaand 3 Text

Kaand 3 Text

Samaptam

Samaptam

Samaptam Text

AKB eBOOKS

KING OF DHARMA

Ashok K. Banker's Ramayana series is presented here the way the author originally intended for his retelling. Four magnificent omnibus ebook editions bring together all the eight paperback books in the series. KING OF DHARMA, Part Four of the Ramayana Series, includes the complete text of the seventh paperback book published earlier as Vengeance of Ravana and the as-yet unpublished eighth book Sons of Sita. Each of these omnibus ebook editions includes the original Author Introduction and Preface to the Indian print editions, in all major ebook formats hand-crafted by the author himself and made available exclusively under his own AKB eBOOKS imprint. To know more, visit the official website at www.ashokbanker.com

AKB eBOOKS

www.ashokbanker.com

AUTHOR'S PREFACE TO THE AKB eBOOKS DIGITAL EDITION 2011

Unlike people, a broken spine on a book is a good thing. So are battered covers, peeling lamination, torn corners, tea stains, and dog-eared pages.

They're signs that the book is loved and has been enjoyed often.

In the four years since the first book of my Ramayana series was published, I've had the pleasure of seeing and signing many such copies of my books.

It's the best sight in the world to an author. It means you've written a book, or in this case, a series of books, that readers genuinely love. Some of those copies even had favourite passages underlined or highlighted. You can't buy that kind of appreciation with a fat marketing budget or media hype; it has to be earned, word by word, page by page.

As of this writing, each of the six books in the series have gone through multiple reprints. Rather than tapering off after the publication of the sixth and final book, sales have continued to increase steadily—despite my not having publicized the books nor given any media interviews, attended any book launches, signings or readings, for close to two years. If anything, the reader response has swelled overwhelmingly, with the online community showing extraordinary support for the series and for my humble attempt to retell this seminal epic.

And so, four years after the first paperback edition of Prince of Ayodhya was released, the Indian publishers of my Ramayana series have decided that it's time that this appreciative readership had an edition that was more durable and better designed to withstand such enthusiasm and affection.

With the publication of this hardcover omnibus set, you finally get to see my Ramayana retelling exactly as I originally intended: as one long book split into three continuous parts, rather than six separate paperback novels. The text remains almost exactly the same, I've reinstated the original volume titles that I had wanted for the series and the story is now split at exactly the points at which I wanted it split.

Prince of Dharma, the first volume, contains the complete, unabridged text of Prince of Ayodhya and Siege of Mithila. Prince in Exile, the second volume, contains Demons of Chitrakut and Armies of Hanuman. Prince at War, the third and final volume, contains Bridge of Rama and King of Ayodhya.

If you're new to the series, then turn the page and read the introduction reprinted from the paperback editions, which will answer many questions and hopefully help prepare you for perhaps the most unorthodox and unusual retelling of this classic tale ever attempted.

And when you're done with that, then I wish you happy reading.

Scuff these shiny new covers, cause the laminate to peel off, spill tea or coffee or cola on the book, bend and crack the spine. Even published in this fancy hardcover edition, this isn't a book that's designed to be put on a shelf and admired over the years, it's a book meant to be read, and reread, and reread yet again...and loved.

Because that's how it was written, with love. And passion. And devotion. And that always shines through, no matter how thick that hardcover, or how stiff that spine.

May you find many happy hours of pleasure and contemplation in travelling this long, winding road of dharma with its greatest proponent.

Jai Bajrang Bali. Jai Siyaram. Jai Hind.

*Ashok Kumar Banker
Mumbai,
April 2007*

AKB eBOOKS
Home of the epics!

RAMAYANA SERIES®
PRINCE OF DHARMA

PRINCE OF AYODHYA & SIEGE OF MITHILA
PRINCE IN EXILE
DEMONS OF CHITRAKUT & ARMIES OF HANUMAN
PRINCE AT WAR
BRIDGE OF RAMA & KING OF AYODHYA
KING OF DHARMA
VENGEANCE OF RAVANA & SONS OF SITA

KRISHNA CORIOLIS SERIES

SLAYER OF KAMSA
DANCE OF GOVINDA
FLUTE OF VRINDAVAN
LORD OF MATHURA
FORTRESS OF DWARKA
CHARIOT OF ARJUNA
RIDER OF GARUDA
LORD OF VAIKUNTA

MAHABHARATA SERIES®

THE FOREST OF STORIES
THE SEEDS OF WAR
THE CHILDREN OF MIDNIGHT
(& 15 more volumes)

MUMBAI NOIR
THE IRON BRA
TEN DEAD ADMEN
MURDER & CHAMPAGNE
A BLOOD RED SAREE
THE ARBITRATOR

GODS OF WAR
VORTAL:SHOCWAVE
VERTIGO
TEN KINGS
SAFFRON WHITE GREEN

NON-FICTION
RAMA: THE MAN BEHIND THE MYTH
THE VALMIKI SYNDROME

& MUCH, MUCH MORE!

only from

AKB eBOOKS

www.ashokbanker.com

VENGEANCE OF RAVANA

Ashok K. Banker

RAMAYANA SERIES®

Book 7

AKB eBOOKS

Invocation

Ganesa, lead well this army of words

Epigraph

|Raghupati Raghava raja Ram|

||Patita pavan Sita Ram||

|Sita Ram Sita Ram|

||bhaj pyare tu Sita Ram||

Traditional bhajan

(Favourite of Mahatma Gandhi)

Dedication

again and always *for bithika jain and biki banker, age 46: who says love grows older as we grow older?

count on.*

*for ayush yoda banker, age 20:
the arrow must travel; does it always know where?
fly on.*

*for yashka banker, age 16:
is not the mountain always higher than the climber?
climb on.*

45+46+20+16=2gether4ever

RETELLING THE RAMAYANA

AUTHOR'S INTRODUCTION TO THE 2ND INDIAN EDITION 2005

Adi-kavya: The first retelling

Some three thousand years ago, a sage named Valmiki lived in a remote forest ashram, practising austerities with his disciples. One day, the wandering sage Narada visited the ashram and was asked by Valmiki if he knew of a perfect man. Narada said, indeed, he did know of such a person, and then told Valmiki and his disciples a story of an ideal man.

Some days later, Valmiki happened to witness a hunter killing a kraunchya bird. The crane's partner was left desolate, and cried inconsolably. Valmiki was overwhelmed by anger at the hunter's action, and sorrow at the bird's loss. He felt driven to do something rash, but controlled himself with difficulty.

After his anger and sorrow subsided, he questioned his outburst. After so many years of practising meditation and austerities, he had still not been able to master his own emotions. Was it even possible to do so? Could any person truly become a master of his passions? For a while he despaired, but then he recalled the story Narada had told him. He thought about the implications of the story, about the choices made by the protagonist and how he had indeed shown great mastery of his own thoughts, words, deeds and feelings. Valmiki felt inspired by the recollection and was filled with a calm serenity such as he had never felt before.

As he recollected the tale of that perfect man of whom Narada had spoken, he found himself reciting it in a particular cadence and rhythm. He realized that this rhythm or metre corresponded to the warbling cries of the kraunchya bird, as if in tribute to the loss that had inspired his recollection. At once, he resolved to compose his own version of the story, using the new form of metre, that others might hear it and be as inspired as he was.

But Narada's story was only a bare narration of the events, a mere plot outline as we would call it today. In order to make the story attractive and memorable to ordinary listeners, Valmiki would have to add and embellish considerably, filling in details and inventing incidents from his own imagination. He would have to dramatize the whole story in order to bring out the powerful dilemmas faced by the protagonist.

But what right did he have to do so? After all, this was not his story. It was a tale told to him. A tale of a real man and real events. How could he make up his own version of the story?

At this point, Valmiki was visited by Lord Brahma Himself.

The Creator told him to set his worries aside and begin composing the work he had in mind. Here is how Valmiki quoted Brahma's exhortation to him, in an introductory passage not unlike this one that you are reading right now:

Recite the tale of Rama ... as you heard it told by Narada. Recite the deeds of Rama that are already known as well as those that are not, his adventures ... his battles ... the acts of Sita, known and unknown. Whatever you do not know will become known to you. Never will your words be inappropriate. Tell Rama's story ... that it may prevail on earth for as long as the mountains and the rivers exist.

Valmiki needed no further urging. He began composing his poem.

He titled it, Rama-yana, meaning literally, The Movements (or Travels) of Rama.

Foretelling the future

The first thing Valmiki realized on completing his composition was that it was incomplete. What good was a story without anyone to tell it to? In the tradition of his age, a bard would normally recite his compositions himself, perhaps earning some favour or payment in coin or kind, more often rewarded only with the appreciation of his listeners. But Valmiki knew that while the form of the story was his creation, the story itself belonged to all his countrymen. He recalled Brahma's exhortation that Rama's story must prevail on earth for as long as the mountains and the rivers exist.

So he taught it to his disciples, among whose number were two young boys whose mother had sought sanctuary with him years ago. Those two boys, Luv and Kusa, then travelled from place to place, reciting the Ramayana as composed by their guru.

In time, fate brought them before the very Rama described in the poem. Rama knew at once that the poem referred to him and understood that these boys could be none other than his sons by the banished Sita. Called upon by the curious king, Valmiki himself then appeared before Rama and entreated him to take back Sita.

Later, Rama asked Valmiki to compose an additional part to the poem, so that he himself, Rama Chandra, might know what would happen to him in future. Valmiki obeyed this extraordinary command, and this supplementary section became the Uttara Kaand of his poem.

Valmiki's Sanskrit rendition of the tale was a brilliant work by any standards, ancient or modern. Its charm, beauty and originality can never be matched. It is a true masterpiece of world literature, the 'adi-kavya' which stands as the fountainhead of our great cultural record. Even today, thousands of years after its composition, it remains unsurpassed.

And yet, when we narrate the story of the Ramayana today, it is not Valmiki's Sanskrit shlokas that we recite. Few of us today have even read Valmiki's immortal composition in its original. Most have not even read an abridgement. Indeed, an unabridged Ramayana itself, reproducing Valmiki's verse without alteration or revisions, is almost impossible to find. Even the most learned of scholars, steeped in a lifetime of study of ancient Sanskrit literature, maintain that the versions of Valmiki's poem that exist today have been revised and added to by later hands.

Some believe that the first and seventh kaands, as well as a number of passages within the other kaands, were all inserted by later writers who preferred to remain anonymous.

Perhaps the earliest retelling of Valmiki's poem is to be found in the pages of that vast ocean of stories we call the Mahabharata. When Krishna Dwaipayana-Vyasa, more popularly known today as Ved Vyasa, composed his equally legendary epic, he retold the story of the Ramayana in one passage. His retelling differs in small but significant ways.

Sometime later, the burgeoning Buddhist literature, usually composed in the Pali dialect, also included stories from the Ramayana, recast in a somewhat different light. Indeed, Buddhist literature redefined the term dharma itself, restating it as dhamma and changing the definition of this and several other core concepts.

In the eleventh century, a Tamil poet named Kamban undertook his own retelling of the Ramayana legend. Starting out with what seems to have been an attempt to translate Valmiki's Ramayana, Kamban nevertheless deviated dramatically from his source material. In Kamban's Ramayana, entire episodes are deleted, new ones appear, people and places are renamed or changed altogether, and even the order of some major events is revised. Most of all, Kamban's Ramayana relocates the entire story in a milieu that is recognizably eleventh-century Tamil Nadu in its geography, history, clothes, customs, etc., rather than the north Indian milieu of Valmiki's Sanskrit original. It is essentially a whole new Ramayana, retold in a far more passionate, rich and colourful idiom.

A few centuries later, Sant Tulsidas undertook his interpretation of the epic. Tulsidas went so far as to title his work Ramcharitramanas, rather than calling it the Ramayana.

By doing so, he signalled that he was not undertaking a faithful translation, but a wholly new variation of his own creation. The differences are substantial.

In art, sculpture, musical renditions, even in dance, mime and street theatrical performances, the story of Valmiki's great poem has been retold over and over, in countless different variations, some with minor alterations, others with major deviations. The tradition of retellings continues even in modern times, through television serials, films, puppet theatre, children's versions, cartoons, poetry, pop music and, of course, in the tradition of Ramlila enactments across the country every year.

Yet how many of these are faithful to Valmiki? How many, if any at all, actually refer to the original Sanskrit text, or even attempt to seek out that text?

Should they even do so?

So many Ramayanas

Does a grandmother consult Valmiki's Ramayana before she retells the tale to her grandchildren at night? When she imitates a rakshasa's roar or Ravana's laugh, or Sita's tears, or Rama's stoic manner, whom does she base her performance on? When an actor portrays Rama in a television serial, or a Ramlila performer enacts a scene, or a sculptor chisels a likeness, a painter a sketch, whom do they all refer to? There were no illustrations in Valmiki's Ramayana. No existing portraits of Rama survive from that age, no recordings of his voice or video records of his deeds.

Indeed, many of the episodes or 'moments' we believe are from Valmiki's Ramayana are not even present in the original Sanskrit work. They are the result of later retellers, often derived from their own imagination.

One instance is the ‘seema rekha’ believed to have been drawn by Lakshman before leaving Sita in the hut. No mention of this incident exists in Valmiki’s Ramayana.

Then there is the constant process of revision that has altered even those scenes that remain constant through various retellings. For example, take the scene where Sita entreats Rama to allow her to accompany him into exile. In Valmiki’s Ramayana, when Rama tells Sita he has to go into exile, and she asks him to allow her to go with him, he refuses outright. At first, Sita pleads with him and cries earnest tears, but when Rama remains adamant, she grows angry and rebukes him in shockingly harsh terms. She refers to him as a ‘woman disguised as a man’, says that ‘the world is wrong when they say that there is no one greater than Rama’, calls him ‘depressed and frightened’, ‘an actor playing a role’, and other choice epithets. It is one of the longer scenes in Valmiki’s Ramayana, almost equalling in length the entire narration of Rama’s early childhood years!

Tamil poet Kamban retells this incident in his more compressed, volatile, rich style, reducing Sita's objections to a couple of brief rebukes: 'Could it be that the real reason [for Rama not taking her into exile] is that with me left behind, you'll be free to enjoy yourself in the forest?'

By the time we reach Sant Tulsidas's recension, Sita's rebukes are reduced to a few tearful admonitions and appeals. Were these changes the result of the change in the socially accepted standards of behaviour between men and women in our country? Quite possibly. Tulsidas's Ramcharitramanas depicts a world quite different from that which Valmiki or even Kamban depict. In fact, each of these three versions differs so drastically in terms of the language used, the clothes worn, the various social and cultural references, that they seem almost independent of one another.

Perhaps the most popularly known version in more recent times is a simplified English translation of a series of Tamil retellings of selected episodes of the Kamban version, serialized in a children's magazine about fifty years ago. This version by C. Rajagopalachari, aka Rajaji, was my favourite version as a child too. It was only much later that I found, through my own extensive research that my beloved Rajaji version left out whole chunks of the original story and simplified other parts considerably. Still later, I was sorely disappointed by yet another version by an otherwise great writer, R. K. Narayan. In his severely abridged retelling, the story is dealt with in a manner so rushed and abbreviated, it is reduced to a moral fable rather than the rich, powerful, mythic epic that Valmiki created.

English scholar William S. Buck's nineteenth-century version, dubiously regarded as a classic by English scholars, reads like it might have been composed under the influence of certain intoxicants: in one significant departure from Indian versions, Guha, the tribal chief of the Nisada fisherfolk, without discernible reason, spews a diatribe against Brahmins, and ends by kicking a statue of Lord Shiva. To add further confusion, in the illustration accompanying this chapter, Guha is shown kicking what appears to be a statue of Buddha!

If you travel outside India, farther east, you will find more versions of the Ramayana that are so far removed from Valmiki, that some are barely recognizable as the same story. In one recent study of these various versions of the epic across the different cultures of Asia, an ageing Muslim woman in Indonesia is surprised to learn from the author that we have our own Ramayana in India also! The kings of Thailand are always named Rama along with other dynastic titles, and consider themselves to be direct descendants of Rama Chandra. The largest Rama temple, an inspiring ruin even today, is situated not in India, or even in Nepal, the only nation that takes Hinduism as its official religion, but in Cambodia. It is called Angkor Vat.

In fact, it is now possible to say that there are as many Ramayanas as there are people who know the tale, or claim to know it. And no two versions are exactly alike.

My Ramayana: a personal odyssey

And yet, would we rather have this democratic melange of versions and variations, or would we rather have a half-remembered, extinct tale recollected only dimly, like a mostly forgotten myth that we can recall only fragments of?

Valmiki's 'original' Ramayana was written in Sanskrit, the language of his time and in an idiom that was highly modern for its age. In fact, it was so avant garde in its style—the kraunchya inspired shloka metre—that it was considered 'adi' or the first of its kind. Today, few people except dedicated scholars can understand or read it in its original form—and even they often disagree vehemently about their interpretations of the dense archaic Sanskrit text!

Kamban's overblown rhetoric and colourful descriptions, while magnificently inspired and appropriate for its age, are equally anachronistic in today's times.

Tulsidas's interpretation, while rightfully regarded as a sacred text, can seem somewhat heavy-handed in its depiction of man–woman relationships. It is more of a religious tribute to Lord Rama's divinity than a realistic retelling of the story itself.

In Ved Vyasa's version, the devices of ill-intentioned Manthara, misguided Kaikeyi and reprehensible Ravana are not the ultimate cause of Rama's misfortunes. In fact, it is not due to the asuras either. It is Brahma himself, using the mortal avatar of Vishnu to cleanse the world of evil, as perpetuated by Ravana and his asuras, in order to maintain the eternal balance of good and evil.

My reasons for attempting this retelling were simple and intensely personal. As a child of an intensely unhappy broken marriage, a violently bitter failure of parents of two different cultures (Anglo-Indian Christian and Gujarati Hindu) to accept their differences and find common ground, I turned to literature for solace. My first readings were, by accident, in the realm of mythology. So inspired was I by the simple power and heroic victories of those ancient ur-tales, I decided to become a writer and tell stories of my own that would be as great, as inspiring to others. To attempt, if possible, to bridge cultures, and knit together disparate lives by showing the common struggle and strife and, ultimately, triumph of all human souls.

I was barely a boy then. Thirty-odd years of living and battling life later, albeit not as colourful as Valmiki's thieving and dacoit years, I was moved by a powerful inexplicable urge to read the Ramayana once more. Every version I read seemed to lack something, that vital something that I can only describe as the ‘connection’ to the work. In a troubled phase, battling with moral conundrums of my own, I set to writing my own version of the events. My mind exploded with images, scenes, entire conversations between characters. I saw, I heard, I felt ... I wrote. Was I exhorted by Brahma Himself? Probably not! I had no reader in mind, except myself—and everyone. I changed as a person over the course of that writing. I found peace, or a kind of peace. I saw how people could devote their lives to worshipping Rama, or Krishna, or Devi for that matter, my own special ‘Maa’. But I also felt that this story was beyond religion, beyond nationality, beyond race, colour, or creed.

Undertaking to retell a story as great and as precious as our classic adi-kavya is not an enterprise lightly attempted. The first thing I did was study every available edition of previous retellings to know what had been done before, the differences between various retellings, and attempt to understand why. I also spoke extensively to people known and unknown about their knowledge of the poem, in an attempt to trace how millennia of verbal retellings have altered the perception of the tale. One of the most striking things was that most people had never actually read the ‘original’ Valmiki Ramayana. Indeed, most people considered Ramcharitramanas by Tulsidas to be ‘the Ramayana’, and assumed it was an accurate reprise of the Sanskrit work. Nothing could be farther from the truth.

For instance, Valmiki’s Ramayana depicts Dasaratha as having three hundred and fifty concubines in addition to his three titled wives. In keeping with the kingly practices of that age, the ageing raja’s predilection for the fairer sex is depicted honestly and without any sense of misogyny. Valmiki neither comments on nor criticizes Dasaratha’s fondness for fleshly pleasures, he simply states it.

When Rama takes leave of his father before going into exile, he does so in the palace of concubines, and all of them weep copiously for the exiled son of their master. When Valmiki describes women, he does so by enumerating the virtues of each part of their anatomy. There is no sense of embarrassment or male chauvinism evident here: he is simply extolling the beauty of the women characters, just as he does for the male characters like Rama and Hanuman and, yes, even Ravana. Even in Kamban’s version, the women are depicted in such ripe, full-blown language, that a modern reader like myself blushes in embarrassment. Yet the writer exhibits no awkwardness or prurience in these passages—he is simply describing them as he perceived them in the garb and fashion of his time.

By the time we reach Tulsidas and later versions, Rama is no less than a god in human avatar. And in keeping with this foreknowledge, all related characters are depicted accordingly.

So Dasaratha's fleshly indulgences take a backseat, the women are portrayed fully clad and demure in appearance, and their beauty is ethereal rather than earthly.

How was I to approach my retelling? On one hand, the Ramayana was now regarded not as a Sanskrit epic of real events that occurred in ancient India, but as a moral fable of the actions of a human avatar of Vishnu. On the other hand, I felt the need to bring to life the ancient world of epic India in all its glory and magnificence, to explore the human drama as well as the divinity that drove it, to show the nuances of word and action and choice rather than a black-and-white depiction of good versus evil. More importantly, what could I offer that was fresh and new, yet faithful to the spirit of the original story? How could I ensure that all events and characters were depicted respectfully yet realistically?

There was little point in simply repeating any version that had gone before—those already existed, and those who desired to read the Ramayana in any one of its various forms could simply pick up one of those previous versions.

But what had never been done before was a complete, or ‘sampoorn’, Ramayana, incorporating the various, often contradictory aspects of the various Indian retellers (I wasn’t interested in foreign perspectives, frankly), while attempting to put us into the minds and hearts of the various characters. To go beyond a simple plot reprise and bring the whole story, the whole world of ancient India, alive. To do what every verbal reteller attempts, or any classical dancer does: make the story live again.

In order to do this, I chose a modern idiom. I simply used the way I speak, an amalgam of English–Hindi–Urdu–Sanskrit, and various other terms from Indian languages. I deliberately used anachronisms like the terms ‘abs’ or ‘morph’. I based every section, every scene, every character’s dialogues and actions on the previous Ramayanas, be it Valmiki, Kamban, Tulsidas, or Vyasa, and even the various Puranas. Everything you read here is based on actual research, or my interpretation of some detail noted in a previous work. The presentation, of course, is wholly original and my own.

Take the example of the scene of Sita entreating Rama to let her accompany him into exile. In my retelling, I sought to explore the relationship between Rama and Sita at a level that is beyond the physical or social plane. I believed that their's was a love that was eternally destined, and that their bond surpassed all human ties. At one level, yes, I believed that they were Vishnu and Lakshmi. Yet, in the avatars they were currently in, they were Rama and Sita, two young people caught up in a time of great turmoil and strife, subjected to hard, difficult choices. Whatever their divine backgrounds and karma, here and now, they had to play out their parts one moment at a time, as real, flesh-and-blood people.

I adopted an approach that was realistic, putting myself (and thereby the reader) into the feelings and thoughts of both Rama and Sita at that moment of choice. I felt the intensity of their pain, the great sorrow and confusion, the frustration at events beyond their control, and also their ultimate acceptance of what was right, what must be done, of dharma. In my version, they argue as young couples will at such a time, they express their anger and mixed emotions, but in the end, it is not only through duty and dharma that she appeals to him. In the end, she appeals to him as a wife who is secure in the knowledge that her husband loves her sincerely, and that the bond that ties them is not merely one of duty or a formal social knot of matrimony, but of true love. After the tears, after all other avenues have been mutually discussed and discarded, she simply says his name and appeals to him, as a wife, a lover, and as his dearest friend:

‘Rama,’ she said. She raised her arms to him, asking, not pleading. ‘Then let me go with you.’

And he agrees. Not as a god, an avatar, or even a prince. But as a man who loves her and respects her. And needs her.

In the footsteps of giants

Let me be clear.

This is not Valmiki’s story. Nor Kamban’s. Nor Tulsidas’s.

Nor Vyasa's. Nor R.K. Narayan's. Nor Rajaji's charming, abridged children's version.

It is Rama's story. And Rama's story belongs to every one of us. Black, brown, white, or albino. Old or young. Male or female. Hindu, Christian, Muslim, or whatever faith you espouse. I was once asked at a press conference to comment on the Babri Masjid demolition and its relation to my Ramayana. My answer was that the Ramayana had stood for three thousand years, and would stand for all infinity. Ayodhya, in my opinion, is not just a place in north-central Uttar Pradesh. It is a place in our hearts. And in that most sacred of places, it will live forever, burnished and beautiful as no temple of consecrated bricks can ever be. When Rama himself heard Luv and Kusa recite Valmiki's Ramayana for the first time, even he, the protagonist of the story, was flabbergasted by the sage's version of the events—after all, even he had not known what happened to Sita after her exile, nor the childhood of Luv and Kusa, nor had he heard their mother's version of events narrated so eloquently until then. And in commanding Valmiki to compose the section about future events, Rama himself added his seal of authority to Valmiki, adding weight to Brahma's exhortation to recite the deeds of Rama that were already known ‘as well as those that are not’.

And so the tradition of telling and retelling the Ramayana began. It is that tradition that Kamban, Tulsidas, Vyasa, and so many others were following. It is through the works of these bards through the ages that this great tale continues to exist among us. If it changes shape and structure, form and even content, it is because that is the nature of the story itself: it inspires the teller to bring fresh insights to each new version, bringing us ever closer to understanding Rama himself.

This is why it must be told, and retold, an infinite number of times.

By me.

By you.

By grandmothers to their grandchildren.

By people everywhere, regardless of their identity.

The first time I was told the Ramayana, it was on my grandfather’s knee. He was excessively fond of chewing tambaku paan and his breath was redolent of its aroma. Because I loved lions, he infused any number of lions in his Ramayana retellings—Rama fought lions, Sita fought them, I think even Manthara was cowed down by one at one point! My grandfather's name, incidentally, was Ramchandra Banker. He died of throat cancer caused by his tobacco-chewing habit. But before his throat ceased working, he had passed on the tale to me.

And now, I pass it on to you. If you desire, and only if, then read this book. I believe if you are ready to read it, the tale will call out to you, as it did to me. If that happens, you are in for a great treat. Know that the version of the Ramayana retold within these pages is a living, breathing, new-born avatar of the tale itself. Told by a living author in a living idiom. It is my humble attempt to do for this great story what writers down the ages have done with it in their times.

Maazi naroti

In closing, I'd like to quote briefly from two venerable authors who have walked similar paths.

The first is K.M. Munshi whose Krishnavatara series remains a benchmark of the genre of modern retellings of ancient tales. These lines are from Munshi's own

Introduction to the Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan edition of 1972:

In the course of this adventure, I had often to depart from legend and myth, for such a reconstruction by a modern author must necessarily involve the exercise of whatever little imagination he has. I trust He will forgive me for the liberty I am taking, but I must write of Him as I see Him in my imagination.

I could not have said it better.

Yuganta, Iravati Karve's landmark Sahitya Akademi Award-winning study of the Mahabharata, packs more valuable insights into its slender 220-page pocket-sized edition (Disha) than any ten encyclopaedias. In arguably the finest essay of the book, 'Draupadi', she includes this footnote:

'The discussion up to this point is based on the critical edition of the Mahabharata. What follows is my naroti [naroti = a dry coconut shell, i.e. a worthless thing. The word 'naroti' was first used in this sense by the poet Eknath].'

In the free musings of Karve's mind, we learn more about Vyasa's formidable epic than from most encyclopaedic theses. For only from free thought can come truly progressive ideas.

In that spirit, I urge readers to consider my dried coconut shell reworking of the Ramayana in the same spirit.

If anything in the following pages pleases you, thank those great forebears in whose giant footsteps I placed my own small feet.

If any parts displease you, then please blame them on my inadequate talents, not on the tale.

Handwritten signature of Ashok K. Banker in black ink, written in a cursive style and underlined.

ASHOK K. BANKER

Mumbai

April 2005

EVERY END IS A BEGINNING IS AN END IS A BEGINNING
AUTHOR'S FOREWORD TO THE LIMITED SIGNED AKB BOOKS
EDITION 2009

So here we are again in Ayodhya. The question is why.

In late 2004, when I wrote the last pages of King of Ayodhya, I was sure I was done with the Ramayana Series. Two years later, when the book went to press, I wrote an Afterword that confidentially stated the series was over and even gave my reasons for not writing the part of the story that is known as Uttar Kaand in the Valmiki Ramayana. Next stop, Hastinapura, I said. And then went back to work on my Mba. No, not a business degree; that's just my personalized term for my retelling of The Mahabharata, a mammoth project by any standards, and equivalent to several degree courses! At a projected ten volumes of over 1000 pages in hardcover each, aiming to cover ALL the material in the original 18 Sanskrit parvas, it was enough to occupy me (or several dozen other writers) for years if not decades. It should have been reason enough for me to wave goodbye to the Ramayana forever, hop on the slow train to Epic India and never look back.

But life has a way of deciding where and when to stop the train. And sometimes, looking back, most of the stops that really matter in the end, turn out to be unscheduled ones.

That's how it was with me and the tale of maryada purshottam.

As some of you may already be aware, I had always been fascinated by myths and itihasa since childhood and around the turn of the millennium, I had begun seriously re-reading, researching and studying the puranas with a view to writing my own series of interlinked retellings as well as original works, comprising an enormous range of books that would, in theory at least, encompass all the major myths, legends, itihasa of the Indian sub-continent. I call it my Epic India Library, and it comprises Four Wheels (to use the Sanskrit analogy) that look something like this:

ASHOK K. BANKER'S EPIC INDIA LIBRARY A Lifetime Writing Plan In Four Wheels

WHEEL ONE: PURANAS

Imaginative retellings of Ramayana,
Shrimad Bhagvatam and Mahabharata.

RAMAYANA SERIES®

Prince of Ayodhya
Siege of Mithila
Demons of Chitrakut
Armies of Hanuman
Bridge of Rama
King of Ayodhya
Vengeance of Ravana
Sons of Sita

OMNIBUS VOLUMES

Prince of Dharma
Prince in Exile
Prince at War
King of Dharma

KRISHNA CORIOLIS

Slayer of Kansa
Dance of Govinda
Flute of Vrindavan

Throne of Dwarka
Field of Kurukshetra
Chariot of Arjuna
Coils of Ananta
Lord of Vaikunta

OMNIBUS VOLUMES

Krishna Leela
Radhey Shyam
Gita Govinda
Vishnu Ananta

MAHABHARATA SERIES

The Forest of Stories
The Seeds of War
The Children of Midnight
As The Blind King Watched
Brothers in Exile
While War Lords Speak of Peace
Upon This Crimson Field
When the Blue God Awakens
Beyond Black, White and Grey
Age of Kali

WHEEL TWO: ITIHASA

Richly detailed historical fiction based entirely on factual research, Starting with Dasarajna (Battle of Ten Kings), the seminal war described in the Vedas that established the Bharata nation in the subcontinent, the rise of the Aryas, the story of the Harappa and Mohenjo-Daro civilizations, the time of Mahavira, the Buddha, Chandragupta Maurya, Asoka, etc, through the Golden Age, Moghul Era, British Era, upto the present day covering the entire national history (with no special North, South or other emphasis) including other related cultures and nations in Asia. An honest and sincere attempt to reconstruct our history for our point of view, rationally, incisively, without the religious, racial or cultural bias that unfortunately mars so many revisionist histories, using fictional devices in the tradition of the finest literary history fiction in order to understand our history better.

WHEEL THREE: OURSTORY

Contemporary novels that explore diverse facets of the Indian condition, with an emphasis on how history, both personal as well as collective, influences, affects and informs every decision, act, motive, outcome. An attempt to create a literary document that records snapshots of contemporary Indian life from a variety of points of view, illuminated by fictional devices, genre tropes, and literary devices. Vertigo, Byculla Boy, The Pasha of Pedder Road, This Song Like A Stone In My Fist, Indian English, Beautiful Ugly, Under A Mumbai Sky, The First Vampire, Devi Darshan: Dark Tales, Man With Celluloid Eyes, In This Cup The Ocean, and various novels and short fiction in the genres of crime, science fiction, fantasy, horror, romance or simply general fiction.

WHEEL FOUR: FUTURE HISTORY

To boldly go where no historian has gone before: Using literary devices to extrapolate possible futures, outcomes of present-day policies and sociopolitical structures, imaginatively and intellectually explore possible future events and histories. Gods of War and its sequels, Judgement Day, The Greater Jihad, Rage of Angels and End of Days. The Vortal Codex, comprising Shockwave, Python, Flash, Dreamweaver and Final Cut. The Indus Rising trilogy comprising Gandhi's War and its two (untitled) sequels.

As you can see, there's a certain chronological flow to the whole plan. Not only through all four Wheels, but within each one as well. Now, it's true that I've already begun submitting books from all four Wheels to publishers – Gods of War is already published, Vortal: Shockwave is available to readers as well, some of the contemporary novels have been out for years, and so on. That's because, for better or worse, I am following tracks and trails of the imagination and intellect that lead me where they will. I feel it's important to write down those parts of the overall plan that most intrigue and excite me at a given time, rather than methodically and mechanically following the plan chronologically. So for example, I wrote Gods of War and Vortal: Shockwave while working on my Mba and Krishna Coriolis and other books, and felt the first two were polished enough to be published right away. This is why you'll find various volumes in the overall Epic India Library appearing out of sequence. The hope is that someday, you will be able to own every single volume in the entire Library, all repackaged in conformance formats and specially related covers, with numbers indicating the correct reading sequence, and then you can sit down and start reading the whole shebang from start to finish – now, that would be something to look forward to, wouldn't it?

However, within each Wheel, it really would be best to read the books in chronological sequence. Just as, for instance, you can't read Bridge of Rama before Siege of Mithila, and so on without destroying the author's attempt to create a cumulative buildup of story through accretion of detail, incident and character development. In short: while you're certainly free to do as you wish, faithful reader, to get the full effect of what I wrote you need to read the whole Ramayana Series in order, complete it, and then go on to read the Krishna Coriolis, which after all, continues the epic adventures of the Vishnu-avatar (the Sword of Dharma as I call Him) through his next incarnation. And then read my Mba when it starts appearing midway through the Krishna Coriolis, thereafter alternating between volumes of Mba and Krishna Coriolis in order to get the full 'stereoscopic' effect of the entire tale. (Or, since there are Four Wheels in the Epic India Library we could even call it a 'quadrosopic' effect!)

Which brings us to Uttar Kaand.

The ending of King of Ayodhya left Rama and Sita and the others back home in Ayodhya. The war of Lanka was won. Sita recovered. The exile ended. Rama presumably crowned and esconced on the sunwood throne. Sita pregnant with their children. And a world of possibilities ahead – all happy ones, we would assume.

Yet anyone who knows the basic story of Valmiki Ramayana – or even Tulsidas's commentary, which differs somewhat from the adi-kavya and adds a strong religious and revisionistic colouring to the original Vedic tale – would know that Rama's story certainly does not end there. In fact, one of the most dramatic events of the entire tale occurs after the return home to Ayodhya. Also one of the most controversial, and the reason most often cited by angry young Indians who still fume about what they feel was Rama's chauvinistic ill-treatment of Sita. Kamban chose to ignore that part of the tale – and so did I, at first, placing my small feet in the footsteps of the giants who went before. Because, as I said in my Afterword to King of Ayodhya, I couldn't reconcile my idea of Rama with the king who cruelly cast out his beloved life-companion. So it was with a clear mind that I put aside the Ramayana Series and went on to write about those amazing five brothers in that great ancient city.

But as I worked on my Mba over the next few years, I realized two major things: one, my Mba was growing far too large and compendious to fit into the original nine volumes as planned. The reason being, I'm not satisfied with offering yet another abridged version of the great purana, but wish to make my retelling the first complete, comprehensive Mahabharata ever attempted by any single writer. (Or, for that matter, by any of the several teams of dozens of academic scholars aided by hundreds of researchers and hundreds of millions of dollars in aid over decades – none of whom, curiously enough seem to have managed to translate the Sanskrit epic in its entirety, either leaving the project abandoned midway, or completing it while leaving out valuable details for inscrutable reasons and using language and ideology that seem designed to make the work accessible to western minds rather than honestly attempting to capture the full detail, glory, and greatness of the work itself irrespective of who reads it.)

This problem of length, I eventually resolved by splitting the story into two separate series: Krishna Coriolis in eight volumes and Mba in ten volumes, making a total of 18, exactly like the original epic.

The second fact that struck me was the realization that the Krishna Coriolis, in the manner in which I was treating the retelling, continued almost directly from the Ramayana Series®,. This is because of my concept of the ‘Sword of Dharma’ about which you will read more in my Afterword to Sons of Sita: Book 8 of the Ramayana Series®, which will explain many other things as well. For an avatar or amsa, the moment of death is no death at all. It is simply a transmogrification. The aatma, that eternal and undiminishable part of brahman of which each living or inanimate being is composed, simply moves on to its next host. Thus, Rama dies and is instantly reawakened as Krishna, the next Sword of Dharma. Mortal years – and our mortal sense of chronological temporality – are irrelevant to the flow of brahman. To His consciousness, the transition is virtually instantaneous.

There was also the issue of my considerable alteration to the original tale, done because I was seeking to find answers to questions that had constantly plagued me (as it had plagued, and continues to plague countless Indians even today): Why did Rama act as he did? If dharma was his justification, then why did he have to be so cruel and heartless about it? Why not gently and regretfully banish Sita?

Because as anyone who puzzles over this age-old problem knows, the real issue is not just that Rama exiled Sita. We might swallow the difficult (near-impossible, in my honest opinion) argument about him abiding by dharma – I don’t, but still. But how do we explain the extreme cruelty with which he treated her? Not in front of all Ayodhya, but in a private faceoff where only the two of them were present, and where he says things and addresses her in a fashion that is unlike the Rama of the preceding story. It’s as if this is a completely different Rama now, one that is impossible to reconcile with the loving, gentle, equalitarian Rama whom Sita is able to speak harshly to, even slap, and otherwise act and behave on completely equal terms with throughout their earlier life. (This is one of the crucial differences between Valmiki Ramayana and Tulsidas and other recensions, including Kamban to some extent: the egalitarianism of the sexes, and the clear evidence of womanly power in exchanges between men and women in those Vedic times, unlike the considerably diminished stature of women in 16th century India during Tulsidas's lifetime.)

The problem I faced was a simple two-fold one: One, how to reconcile Rama's behaviour (not his actions, mind you, which can be justified, however absurdly, by the 'dharma' argument, but his behaviour towards his beloved wife) with the Rama we had known and shared mindspace and heartspace with for over 3000 pages in the preceding six books. Two, how to bridge the time between Rama's return home to Ayodhya at the end of King of Ayodhya, and the start of Slayer of Kansa, the first book of the Krishna Coriolis (which, by the way, will be appearing in bookstores only a few months from now)?

And so my mind returned to Ayodhya, and as an idle mental exercise, began to follow the mindtrails and scent-trails of the imagination.

As I finished Gods of War and began work on Judgement Day, the trail widened and the scent deepened.

When I finished Vortal: Shockwave and began work on Vortal: Python, it became even clearer.

And finally, by the time I finished Dance of Govinda, the sequel to Slayer of Kansa, I knew exactly how and why it had all happened. Or at least, my version of events. (Just as the previous six books were my version of the Valmiki and Kamban Ramayana.)

And so you now have this book in your hands.

Vengeance of Ravana.

And you're about to return with me back to Ayodhya. And to begin a journey that will seem both familiar and strange, I suppose, since that's how it seemed to me. And start down the wide, scented path that will lead you to a whole barrage of new questions that will answer some of the old ones, while raising completely new ones.

All questions will be answered not here, but in the succeeding, final book, Sons of Sita. In fact, I should probably warn you that Vengeance of Ravana ends on a cliffhanger, most definitely incomplete, unfinished, unresolved, and altogether unsatisfying ending – because that’s the way the story unfolds. What I can reassure you off, old friend and companion, is that all these new questions as well as old ones, will be resolved in Sons of Sita. You have my word on that. Of course, the story itself will not end there, even in Sons of Sita. Because, as I mentioned earlier, while Rama’s story ends there in SoS, Krishna’s story begins – and continues in SoK and its seven sequels, and in the Mba thereafter.

But the story starts at this point, and so here we have to start again.

Once again in Ayodhya. Once again in Rama’s bed-chamber late at night. Once again with the sound of a disembodied voice in his ear, and warm breath on his neck. Because endings usually bring us back to the beginning in some fashion. In fact, in Indian (and Asian, to some extent) storytelling, all tales are cyclical, as are all lives.

So in a way, every end is a beginning. Which itself is an end. And which in turn is a new beginning. And so on.

After all, as they say, all stories are ultimately linked together. Just as all people are. All beings. All things. All matter. All universes.

And that’s the last thing I have to tell you before we return to that bed-chamber in Ayodhya.

While VoR and SoS do conclusively end the Ramayana Series®, they also begin a whole new tale. One that doesn’t simply continue through the Krishna Coriolis, Mba, and beyond into the other three Wheels of my Epic India Library. But also slips sideways and leaps forward in time to other linked stories.

Gods of War and its sequels are one storyline that is directly linked to the events that conclude the Ramayana Series®. Without reading that series, it is impossible to fully understand and, more importantly, fully appreciate and enjoy the larger tale that begins in VoR.

Vortal Codex is another series that must be read in order to understand and, again more vitally, relish the thrill of the underlying story that starts here in this book.

In short, once you read this book, loyal reader, you run the risk of entering a maze of chambers. One leads to another to another and so on. Not endlessly. Because there is a definite end. But a long journey nevertheless. A journey that will take you through the entire mythology, itihasa, history and contemporary sociopolitical world of the Indian subcontinent (and to a lesser extent, the world at large). As of this writing, it looks like being about 70 volumes in all. Hence the term Epic India Library.

In a sense, you began reading the Epic India Library the moment you read any of my earlier books.

But once you read VoR you will be committed.

Of course, you could still choose not to continue reading. In fact, it's quite possible that you may be so fed up of me and my work by the time you put this book down, that you may never read anything by me again. (Those who take extremist views for or against Rama may feel that way, since they most often have their own fixed notions of what they believe really happened, and are simply not interested in anyone else's point of view.) But since you're still here, still reading this long and possibly irrelevant foreword, I have a feeling you will go on.

And if you choose to do so, then I just want to remind you that I warned you. Right here. Right now. I warned you that reading this book will commit you to a very wide, very scented path that will lead on those dozens of other books, tens of thousands of pages, and a vast labyrinthine story that will take several years more to complete, publish, purchase and read, and will occupy a considerable portion of your waking hours and your book-buying budget.

Will it be worth it? You'll have to answer that one yourself. I think so. But then again, the engineer always enjoys riding the train. Just as the charioteer always loves leading the team of horses.

Why else would the charioteer be a charioteer otherwise? Or the train engineer a train engineer?

Ultimately, it will be upto you, constant reader, to decide whether this epic undertaking was worth the effort and time and investment.

And in case all the above seems like the insane dream of a bibliomaniac, well, one can dream, can't one? In any case, I'm only talking about writing the books. As was the case when I started writing my Ramayana Series®, it's quite likely that no publisher will want to even look at the manuscripts, let alone publish them. It's equally possible that I won't live long enough to finish telling all the stories, or even most of them. But what the hey, I'm a 45-year old, balding, greying, paunchy father to a teenage daughter and an adult son, husband to a schoolteacher wife, care-giver to an adorable but stubborn basset hound, I live and work surrounded by books, family, some filmed entertainment and a few good friends, and that's pretty much it for me. A simple life, almost boring by Mumbai/Bombay standards or any standard for that matter. So at the least, at the very very least, I can afford to dream big, and I'm damn well going to do so.

I have no idea whether or not I'll succeed, and whether you will feel at the end it was all worth it. But I'm damn well going to give it an epic try.

I couldn't think of a better way to spend this lifetime.

And you're warmly invited to join me for the ride.

Chariots don't have seatbelts (neither do trains, curiously). So you're just going to have to hold on to my shoulder if you need some support. I'll try to coax the team to riding gentle, but at times we will have to ride fast and furious. And there may be bumps. And dips. And obstacles.

But at least we'll ride them together. And the journey is an amazing one.

That much, I can promise you.

Ashok K. Banker
25 November 2009
Andheri, Mumbai

SAMAPTAM

Raghupati.

Through the haze of smoke from the burning towers of Lanka, dimly glimpsed. Upon that battlefield, carelessly littered with the corpses of friends and foes alike, he stood, grieving. For even in victory had he lost so much; such were the bitter fruits of war. The shouts of his jubilant soldiers rang out all round him, yet to his ears they were overwhelmed by the remembered cries of anguish and torment of those that had fallen upon this field. Vanars, bears, rakshasas...it mattered not if they were his enemy or his ally. All who had died had died for him, one way or another. That was all that mattered. All this, this brutal hacking of limbs and sundering of bones, this mad dance of soldiers, this epic bloodshed, this immense decimation of life, was on his command, and therefore, on his conscience.

Raghava.

He walked the battlefield, taking stock of the fallen. All these lives cut short, some in their prime, all before their time. All these...so many, too many... brothers, sisters, sons, daughters, blood-kith and blood-kin. His siblings-at-arms. For no less were these fallen united to him than were his own brothers back home, Bharat and Shatrugan. No less were they related to him by blood than Lakshman himself, partner in all his travails and exile, the shoulder that stood beside his shoulder through thick and thin. So what if these vanars and bears and rakshasas had not been born of the same mother as he, or of the same father, or even of the same species? Born apart, they had come together to die today for him, and in dying, bonded with him in the eternal brotherhood of blood. These mangled and broken bodies had been living, hoping, longing, loving creatures, with homes and families of their own, which they had left, to dedicate themselves to his cause, to travel long yojanas to this foreign land across a hostile sea, and now this alien soil was soaked through with their honest blood. And this blood was upon his conscience.

Raja.

Now, he would return to his homeland, proud and triumphant, lauded in victory, to be crowned king of Ayodhya. No more a prince in exile, or at war. A king in name and deed and title. His name added to the long list of Suryavansha Ikshwakus, his portrait hung beside those others in the hall of ancestors, his statue carved and polished and raised in the public avenues and places of honour, his name given to a thousand thousand newborns whose mothers would pray for them to be as Rama was, do as Rama did, to become...

Ram.

Yet, was he deserving of this victory, this pride, this praise? This kingship, even? The tales that would be woven around his exploits, the poems composed and sung of his adventures in exile, his feats as a warrior, his triumphs against the evil rakshasas, his incomparable accomplishments and wondrous feats of chivalry? Like so many other warriors before him, reluctant and unwilling to embrace celebrityhood, his story would grow larger than his life itself, in time would come to seem more real than the sordid, gritty reality and eventually would march firmly into the annals of legend, then myth, and finally, into race-memory.

“Raghupati Raghava Raja Rama...patita pavana Sita Ram!”

The sound rose to a roar, counterpointing the numbing silence in his veins. He came out of his reverie like a traveller emerging from mist and saw the entire host of his army's survivors assembled before him, before the walls of Lanka, still a formidable mass, their ragged voices joined in this new chant, something he had never heard before, yet seemed so oddly familiar. Vanars and bears, and rakshasas even...not all of the rakshasas, for he could see several kneeling sullenly or glumly by, driven to their knees by their vanar or bear captors, unrepentant and hostile in their failure...but those brothers of Vibhisena in spirit who were jubilant in their relief at being rid of Ravana's yoke at long last. A great multitude of voices raised in ragged, heartrendingly cheerful harmony, filling the smoky skies above Lanka with this hypnotic chant, this near fanatical hymn of praise...

“Raghupati Raghava Raja Ram, patita pavana Sita Ram,

Sita Ram, Sita Ram, bhaj pyare tu Sitaram.”

The same two lines over and over again, as if the poet had been so overwhelmed by adoration that he had no motive left to seek lyrics to follow, or inclination to compose those lyrics.

Hail to thee, Rama, Lord of the House of Raghu, Saviour of the fallen, Hail to the divine union of Sita and Rama, Beloved are you both, Sita and Rama.

The lilt of the lyrics and the monotony of the melody gave it the quality of a bhajan, a couplet chanted in praise of a god. Was that how they perceived him? As a god? He scanned the sea of upturned faces, bloody snouts and furry heads, and saw wet adoration in those animal eyes, mirrored and repeated in every single visage, vanar and bear alike. To the periphery of his host, huddled before the crumbled walls of Lanka, the survivors of Ravana's army stood herded together. He saw even their bestial aspects raised towards him. The expression on most rakshasa snouts was grim, morose, even hostile. Yet there was a certain grudging admiration visible in that mottled and beaten crowd, an awe that went beyond a mere fear of captivity. And sweeping the vast assemblage again with battle-weary eyes, he saw that what he euphemistically referred to as adoration or admiration was no less than an acknowledgement of godliness. It was the same look one saw on the faces of devotees at a great teerthsthan, one of the sacred pilgrimage spots. Yes, many of those assembled saw him as something akin to a god. It would be ingenuous of him not to see that; not to recognize the glistening admiration in those grape-dark eyes for what it truly was: the awe of a crowd of believers given sight of their deity. Even as this realization seeped into his tired senses, the vast host, their numbers so great as to make the vast field resemble nothing so much as a field of kusalavya grass, swaying gently in an autumn breeze, reached a peak in their chanting.

He scanned the landscape from left to right, attempting to take in the sheer vastness of the multitudes assembled, despite their terrible losses in battle, carpeting the hills and valleys and fields of Lanka for miles in every direction, a veritable ocean of waves dipping their crests to show respect for the approaching shore, and as they sensed him responding at last – looking upon them – their haunting chant yielded to a moment of such utter silence that he thought his heart itself had ceased beating.

As one, in drill-perfect unison, they straightened their battered bodies to stand on their hind legs – a measure of supreme respect among both vanars and bears – and raised their snouted, furred and dusty faces to him, their dark wet eyes gleaming in the slanting evening light. On straightened knees with lowered brows, hoarse voices stilled at last after days of yelling war cries and crying havoc, they observed him, and waited.

In the silence that fell, he heard a bird twittering somewhere, calling the end of day. He felt the benediction of a soft, cool ocean breeze wafting in from the west, redolent of salt and the exotic odours of a thousand yojanas of open sea. He felt a strange absence of feeling spread through his being, like the sensation one experienced just before falling fast asleep, when the body and mind hovered momentarily between wakefulness and deep unconsciousness. He stood on that precipice, and teeming multitudes waited to hear his words.

A great hand fell upon his shoulder; gently, despite its great strength. The voice that spoke in his ear was as quiet as that hand was gentle.

“Command them. They are yours. As are the earth, the sky and the sea and everything in them. You are the master of the world now. Rule it as you see fit.”

The voice of the bear king Jambavan was sonorous and gruff as ever. But the tone of sad wisdom was new. Perhaps, he thought, the war had taken its toll on the ancient one too, dimming his penchant for eccentric proclamations and whimsical asides. Or perhaps it was the gravity of the moment that the bear lord tempered his speech to suit.

He turned to look up into the eyes of the lord of rksaas. During the time of battle, he had seen those same eyes blazing like coals in obsidian, promising fire and delivering death. Earlier in their numerous counsels he had seen grace, wisdom, empathy and knowledge so deep and infinite that he had felt he could ask any question and the answer would be there in those eyes. Now, he saw in them a mirror image of the same adoration he saw in all those lakhs of vanar and bear and rakshasa eyes staring up at him from the field of battle. A look of fierce admiration and pride, an almost deifying adoration. It was the look a soldier gave his king after a successful end to war; the look a worshipper gave his deity after a lifetime's wish was fulfilled.

He wondered if he deserved such a look, such adoration, such deification.

“Lord bear,” he said softly. “I barely know how to console myself. How do I console these who have sacrificed so much for my cause? What do I say to explain the terrible cost of this great conflict?”

Jambavan's face fur rippled in a diagonal pattern that began somewhere east of his left ear and traversed across the top of his mountainous head ending somewhere in the vicinity of his nape. The effect resembled a strong wind ruffling thick elephant grass on plainsland. The berry dark eyes shone with sympathy, but the parted jaws promised no mercy. “Heed well my words, youngun. I will say this only once, so treasure it and scroll it and do not make me repeat it. The price of war is the prize of war.”

And the bear stepped back, silent, turning his snout away to gaze at a flight of geese overhead as if they had suddenly grown more interesting than anything transpiring on earth. Rama blinked, taking in the words so eccentrically given, tersely spoken, yet so dense and rich with meaning.

The price of war is the prize of war.

He blinked again, this time to dispel the sudden wetness that plagued his vision. And suddenly found the courage to speak. He found a little strength to straighten his stiff back, to raise his head and thrust his chin forward, to return their show of respect with a gesture of his own, for among vanars and bears, actions counted more than words. Yet words he gave them as well. Words that carried to the furry ears of the farthest vanar or bear through the whispering relay system that had been perfected under Nala’s supervision. The only effect, to his ears, was a faint susurrations following each of his words like a wind blowing through a leafy grove.

“Comrades,” he said. “All we have accomplished, all we have achieved, all we have endeavoured towards, all we have struggled, fought, strategized, manoeuvred, battled, bled and sacrificed for, is upon this field. It is our dignity, our honour, our pride and our dharma. At this hour of battle – with the tide turned, the enemy vanquished, the master of the land fallen, the siege broken, the fortress overrun – any army could be expected to wreak havoc, to ravage and forage, to rape and pillage, to partake of the spoils of war. But we did not fight this war for spoils. At a time like this, any army in history would be forgiven a few transgressions, a few excesses, a few just rewards for the bitter struggle we have all endured these past days and weeks. The rules of war condone such excesses, overlook such transgressions, forgive such acts. Yet that is not why you fought this war. At this point in a war, any invading conqueror would be expected to slice up and divide the territories he has conquered, to parcel them out to his generals, his comrades, to any he pleases who may have pleased him before. Yet that is not why I fought this war. You and I, we made a pact. To come to these shores and plead for peace. To sue for a quick and bloodless resolution to this needless conflict. To beg for the safe return of my beloved Sita. It was Ravana’s choice to deny us that peace, to abjure a resolution, to mock our pleas. We could all be forgiven, you and I, if we razed his kingdom to the ground, if we put every last one of his citizens to the sword, if we ravaged his queens and his concubines, if we speared every rakshasa cub in Lanka, if we cleansed the world of the rakshasa race forever. We could do all these things, and indeed I am sure that after the grievous losses we all suffered this day there are many of you who desire this end, who crave it. I will not deny that a part of me craves it as well...The basest, most vengeful part of me..."

He paused, looking at the snouted faces of the Lankans by the broken walls. Their faces were filled with dismay and terror now. Gone was all hostility, all glumness, all reluctant admiration. In their place was naked fear, panic at the thought that what he had just said might actually come to pass. He sensed the vanar and bear armies swivel their heads and eyes, looking towards Lanka, towards those walls, those bestial warriors, those towers that had caused them so much pain and death and suffering these past days. And he knew from the very stench of their rage that he had spoken their hearts' deepest emotions aloud.

"Yet we shall do none of these things," he said quietly. The relay took his words like the wind and passed them down the lines, rippling miles North to the far reaches of the vast assemblage.

“For these are not the reasons why we came here to fight this war.”

He paused again, straightened his head, and took a step forward. He raised his arms to either side, palms upwards. The interlacing of myriad cuts and nicks and wounds across his weary muscles screamed in response, for the blood had long since dried over them, and some of the caked wounds and hundreds of tiny scabs tore open as he flexed those overused muscles again. He ignored the pain, which was as much his brother too. And held the stance. The setting sun caught his body in its embrace, and its soft saffron warmth was like a careless blessing from a gruff god.

“We came here for a reason, and that reason is accomplished. Our work here is done. Now, it is time to show Lanka, the world indeed, to show generations to come, that while war itself is undesirable, warriors can still adhere to dharma. Let us pledge here and now, with our Lankan enemies present beside us, that we shall work together to rebuild every loosed brick, every shattered beam, every broken palace, hovel or hut, and to raise a new Lanka from the ashes of this tragedy, a Lanka that will put war behind it forever and turn her face towards the new sun of peace. Let us pledge this now. Let our pledge and the execution of it be a testament to our pride and honour and dharma. And a monument to all those of our beloved ones who fell here on this soil. I do not command this, for with this war done, I have no authority to command you anymore. I merely ask this, request it, beg it if you will...Join me in showing Lanka and all the ages to come, that yes, we came, we fought, we conquered... And then we rebuilt. We restored. We rehabilitated. We took nothing, but we gave everything. And by so doing, we gained the greatest riches possible, the most precious spoils of war, that which every soldier secretly craves but rarely hopes to ever acquire: the love and forgiveness and admiration of our enemies. I ask you this in honour of my fallen foe, Ravana. I ask you this in the memory of everyone fallen in this conflict. I ask you this in the name of dharma.”

“What say you?”

The silence that followed the last whispering passage of his words through the seemingly endless ranks was deafening. He could hear his heart pounding steadily, like a drum beaten by a drummer tolling a dirge. He could hear the distant, high-pitched lowing of greybacks far out at sea. He could hear birds in the skies wailing for the lost day. And the sun slipped one final time to touch the rim of the horizon, hanging there as if reluctant to take its sight off him, as if waiting to hear the response of his armies, as eager to know the effect of his words upon them as he himself was.

The answer came with a roar so resounding it shook his body to his very bones. It was accompanied by a stamping of feet that made the earth beneath tremble as well, the grassy knoll shuddering as if stricken by another bout of the earth-moving wrought by Ravana's asura maya on the first night of their landing. The wind of their shouting made the hairs of his arms and his nape stand on end. It was greater than the war chants they had yelled in battle, greater than the screams of the dying, more determined than the shout of fealty they had pledged to him back at Mount Mahendra when the armies of Hanuman had first assembled before his sight. Hail Rama Husband of Sita.

“JAI SIYARAM.”

The sun slipped beneath the rim. He thought he felt it smile one final time before it passed from that part of the world. He smiled as well.

PRARAMBH

ONE

Rama.

Blackness. As impenetrable as a caul over a newborn's eyes. As dark as his name – which meant black and was given to male infants darker complected than the average dusky-skinned Arya male. In his case, so dark that the royal artists often used a deep shade of midnight blue to distinguish his skin, back in the days when things such as portraits had been an insignificant yet inevitable part of his life. Back when he was still a prince, a yuvraj, carefree and happy in the first flush of youth. Before life had turned upon him like a hunting hawk upon its handler and ripped that casual innocence to shreds.

Awaken, Black Prince.

Crow feather. Night shade. Shyam rang. Or his favourite, Kisna. Although Kisna, or Krishna, as it was pronounced in commonspeak by those unschooled in Sanskrit highspeech, was as likely to be used for a girl as a boy. Unlike Rama, which was always unquestionably a masculine name, he didn't know why. Nor was he the first of his name: there were at least three previous Ramas in the Suryavansha Ikshwaku dynasty. And any number across the Arya nations, for dark complexions were common across the length and breadth of this land of the relentless sun.

Enough. I bid you rise...NOW.

A hand not made of flesh and bone grasped him in a vice and hauled him back to consciousness.

He woke, choking, gasping for breath, and leaped to the floor. He reached for his sword – missing. His bow, arrow, rig – likewise. His clothing – also gone. Weaponless, naked but for a langot, he spun on the balls of his feet, his keenly honed warrior senses alert to attack from any front by any foe.

He was in his bed chamber, the king's bed chamber, no less. For he was king now in all but name, and after the coronation on the morrow, the title would be his as well. Although it was and perhaps would always be, his father's bed chamber. It was larger than he had recalled it, certainly far greater in span and length than his own princely chambers back when he had resided here. Although, after fourteen years of forest exile, constant battle and rough living off the land, even a woodsman's hut would seem comfortable. This...this was beyond luxurious; never much of a poet, he had no words to describe it now.

Marbled floors gleamed by the light of moonshafts falling through latticed windows. Alabaster columns marched down the length of the chamber like resolute sentries perpetually on guard. Statuary cast in ebony, ivory, jade and softwood depicted a variety of devas, auspicious animals and Ikshwaku ancestors in a variety of postures, every detail precise and perfect. The fingers, arms, necks and ankles of the kings and queens among them glittered with real ornaments of precious metal and stone, kept polished and pristine over centuries. Immense portraits and epic landscapes adorned the vaulting walls, some aspiring to the ceiling a dozen yards above. Richly brocaded tapestries hung in cul-de-sacs. The lush carpeting yielded to his bare feet like a velvet invitation. Everywhere he turned – seeking, scanning – darkly majestic furnishings gleamed with exquisite artistry and lavish care. The entire vast chamber was redolent of the woody perfume of sandalwood, his favourite aroma.

Yet it was empty, every yard of it. He completed a full circuit of the chamber and stood, puzzled. He had not imagined it. That grasp that tore him away from his dreamy meanderings had been as real as any rough hand laid on his flesh. So had the voice. He stood there in the moonlight, breathing silently. A gust of night wind parted and lifted the gossamer curtains, and dried the cooling sweat upon his muscled chest. And slowly, like a debt returned too slowly over too long, it came back to him.

There had been a dream much like this, on a night very similar, a long time ago. Before Lanka. Before the abduction of Sita. Before the rakshasa wars, the exile, the marriage, the battle of Bhayanak-van... before that day, the Holi day, when his life had changed forever, wrenched from its course like a river denied its pathway to the ocean.

A dream of Ravana. Warning him. Threatening. Mocking.

Abruptly, a terror rose in his blood. He spun on quicksilver feet and in less than a breath's span, was at the side of the bed he had left only moments ago.

Sita.

The bed raiment was strewn on the side where he had been sleeping. Unaccustomed as he had been to the caress of such fine cloth for so long, he had pushed them away impatiently before falling asleep. But on the side where she had laid herself down, they were gathered and overlapped, and now all he could see was the raiment itself.

A dark dread lay on his heart like a stone. He reached out, willing himself to be steady, and plucked a loose end of the gathered cloth in his hand. Gently, he lifted it and pulled it away from the bed, bracing himself to find nothing more than a rumpled space where she had lain, still faintly warm with her heat. Gone. Again. Taken.

Instead, he found her. Lying curled beneath the bedclothes like a bird nursing a broken wing. He caught his breath at the sight of her, unable to believe his eyes alone. Still holding the blanket in one hand, he reached down with the other and gently touched the crook of her arm. He could smell the musky odour of her body, feel the heat gathered beneath the blankets. She stirred in the throes of deep slumber, moaned softly, but did not turn over or rouse. Too exhausted, at the end of her tether. His heart went out to her. If only he could have reached Lanka sooner, if only the war had been less complicated, if only he had used his brahman shakti from the very outset...But he had done what had seemed right, and what had been had been.

He started to lower the cloth, then stopped. He watched her a moment. His heart stuck in his throat to see how thin she had grown over the weeks of her captivity, how pale and bony. Bird-like. Yet, watching her thus, her face stripped of all self-control in the languor of sleep, there was something about her face and aspect, an inner glow that belied all the recent hardship, defied the preceding years of torturous existence, the blood-smirched struggle for survival that had been their way of life for fourteen long years. A proud dignity that still shone on her features, which could not be hidden. It made him want to take her into his arms, to embrace and love forever. She was still the strong, indomitable woman he had fallen in love with and married, those many years past. Neither exile, nor hardship, nor war, nor Ravana had broken her. Nothing could. A bird with a broken wing... indeed. But a Garuda among birds.

He lowered the raiment, replacing the blanket as nearly as he had found it. She had always liked to cover her head while she slept, a habit he could not brook. He would feel suffocated to sleep thus, yet she could not sleep otherwise. And now, he thought with a faint smile as he stepped back from the bed, she could certainly afford to cover herself and sleep thusly; in the finest silks and velvet coverings in the whole wide world.

But not for long.

He spun around, scouring the chamber. After the life he had lived, the things he had seen, there was little that could unnerve him, and yet, some part of him could not accept that this was happening. Ravana is dead. I killed him on the battlefield of Lanka, in full view of both our armies. He sliced the air with his open hand, in the manner he had learned from a dark-skinned fighter from the Kerall waterlands who had fought with him in the wilderness of Janasthana. He could leap twice his own height in the air, and strike with a sword in a full circle before touching ground again. But there was nothing to strike here, no foe to defend against.

“Show yourself,” he snarled, almost beneath his breath.

Where I am now, your weapons and fists can no longer harm me. Yet I can do to you and yours as I desire. Perhaps I shall start with your wife...

“Craven!” He started to cry out but choked back the shout. He did not want to wake Sita if he could help it. He must draw the bodiless intruder away from her. He drew upon the steel-edged self-discipline that had earned him his formidable reputation, using a pranayam breathing pattern to calm his ragged nerves and soothe his battle-weary muscles. Old guru Vashishta had taught him the yogic breathing pattern; in another lifetime, it now seemed. A happier, youthful time.

Coward, he hissed silently, knowing that he did not need audible speech to be heard by his tormentor. Why do you hide from my sight and seek to taunt me with words? Face me like a warrior if you dare.

A sound in his head, like a chuckle with a hundred echoes.

No.

Not a hundred.

Ten.

Only ten.

If he listened closely with his now-fully attentive mind, he could even catch the nuances of those ten different voices, voices he knew so well now from hearing them up close on the field in the crystalline hyper-awareness of battle.

At that moment, the saliva in his mouth began to taste of the coppery tang of blood and he knew then that this was no nightmare; it was indeed Ravana speaking. But how? And more importantly, why?

Why do you think, King of Ayodhya? We have unfinished business.

He spun around on the balls of his feet. This time the voice had seemed to come from just behind his left shoulder. He had even felt the faint heat of voice-breath upon his bare skin. But there was still no one there. No one that could be seen by mortal eyes.

But even the invisible one could be cut by steel if struck at a certain moment, when a particular one of those ten voices was speaking. He did not know how he knew this; he just did. If only he had his sword. He missed it, his constant companion through all his struggles. How could he have let himself be parted from it? Then he recalled. Sumantra had insisted on taking it away, and when he had protested, the aging minister had simply held up the sword in both palms, showing it to Rama. And he had seen, really seen, what a state it was in: blood and gore and bodily fluids and materials had dried and encrusted themselves along its length so many times over that they formed a scabby coating. The hilt was cracked and bent, its jewels long lost in the heat of one of a thousand encounters. The blade was chipped and marred in a hundred places, barely retaining any vestige of its former honed perfection. The once-lethal blade was now little more than a macabre souvenir. That sword, he had realized in an onrush of commingled pride and sadness as he met Sumantra's heartrending gaze again, told the history of his struggles more eloquently than any court poet. But now its work was done; it needed to be repaired and rested, perhaps retired. Not unlike himself.

Except that unlike the sword, he was still on call, still required to serve. He breathed, drawing energy from the air, in the way that tapasvi sadhus in the deep aranya drew sustenance from air alone. Breathed and waited.

Finally, as if realizing that he would not be baited into leaping and flailing about, the voice spoke again, and this time, because he was listening intently, he heard the unmistakable inflection: that doubling of tones, like ten men speaking at once yet not quite precisely in unison.

Outside.

He needed no further explanation or command. He moved toward the verandah and exited the royal chamber to find himself upon a patio lined with flowering plants and stone statuary intertwined with vines and creepers. Here beneath the open sky, the nightwind caressed his naked skin, a vetaal's lifeless breath. From the vantage point of a royal view, he scanned the sleeping capitol city with a glance. Countless house lights still flickered, even though it was long past the midnight watch, and faint sounds echoed and carried even from the farthest reaches of the great city-state: his people, Ayodhyans, all working to prepare for the grand coronation tomorrow, a few perhaps still celebrating the return of their king.

There was nobody in sight.

Jump.

“What?” he asked, startled. His voice would not carry inside to Sita from here.

Do you still wish to face me like a man? Like a warrior? Then do as I command. Leap from the balustrade.

He let his teeth show, flashing white in his wine-dark face. Do you mistake me for a fool now, Lankanaresh? Have you forgotten that I brought you down upon the field of battle? Do you really think I will leap to my death at your bidding?

A sound of impatience clicked in his mind.

Mortal unbeliever. If I wanted to kill you by stealth I would have done so at any time I chose. The fact that you yet live is proof enough that I have bigger plans for you than a quick blade in the dark—or a short fall to a brain-crushing end.

Now it was his turn to chuckle scornfully. “Why should I—?” he began, then stopped. Why should I trust you? he was about to say. But the question was an absurd one. He could not trust the lord of rakshasas at all, of course. And yet. And yet. He sensed the asura spoke truly; what he said was beyond dispute. Simply luring Rama to a suicidal fall might serve a lesser being’s thirst for revenge. It was not Ravana’s way.

And yet, there was some game here that he could not fathom. Starting with the most startling question of all: How could Ravana be speaking to him if Ravana was dead?

There was only one way to find out.

He leaped up to the balustrade, the action as lithe and easy as it had been in his youth, despite his wounds and aches, despite his hardships, despite everything. What he had lost in age and agility, he had made up for in experience, skill and the constant, relentless use of his body and mind, like a well-used bow grew easier to string and draw over time.

He looked down. The king's chambers were at the top of the main palace complex, and the drop that lay below him was easily a hundred feet down. At the bottom lay the closely set flagstones of the innermost courtyard, each a quarter ton of solid rock hauled by elephants all the way from the Karakoram principality. The lights of mashaals gleamed dully on the buffed stone, and he glimpsed sentries patrolling diligently, in larger numbers than was usual owing to the presence of so many high personages tonight, most of all, their long-awaited king and queen. The nightwind carried the scents of the city, sometimes pungent, sometimes intriguing. The perfumes of Ayodhya, dressing to celebrate her king's return.

“Jump?” he asked. But it was a rhetorical question. He knew the voice that gave the command would not explain or provide reasons; it was a voice accustomed to being obeyed by armies, that spoke to devas and asuras in the same level tone. Jump, it had said. And he grinned wolfishly and decided he would obey.

Whatever mystery lay here, it was clear he would not resolve it without taking bold action. As the moments passed and the voice did not speak again, he knew that he had no other choice, no other means of learning what Ravana meant, except to do as he bade and follow this nightmare through to its very end. He resisted the urge to glance back into the chamber where Sita lay asleep. He would not weaken his resolve. Better to draw the asura away from her. Reaching a decision, he nodded once to his invisible foe, inhaled sharply, spread his arms like a bird about to take wing and sprang out from the balustrade, his strong legs carrying him yards out into the empty darkness, high above the solid ground, his body arching like a diver leaping into oceanic depths.

He hung suspended in the air a moment, then slowly, inevitably, began the long quick fall to the courtyard.

TWO

He fell up instead of down. It felt so natural that it took him a moment to realize what was happening. But his senses already knew what his mind had yet to comprehend.

The weight of the earth, the incessant loving tug of Prithvi Maa, keeping her children close to herself, was gone. In its place was another pull, drawing him up to the sky. He looked down and saw the courtyard far below, receding fast. He saw the balcony on which he had stood a moment ago, diminishing at astonishing speed, then the top of the palace, gleaming quietly resplendent in the moonlight, the Seer's Tower beside it, then the palace complex whole, and then the entire royal enclave...soon the city itself was falling away far below, reduced to a sprinkling of fireflies upon a green patch surrounded by darkness. The speed at which he was falling— if falling was the right word— was astonishing. He felt the wind rushing past, drumming in his ears, felt the night grow colder around him, enveloping him in its dark embrace, his unclothed skin giving up its hard-won warmth reluctantly.

He looked up. And saw the sky. But it was not the sky he had seen above the palace only moments earlier. That had been dark in the usual natural way, a deep midnight blue, almost the exact shade used to portray his black skin, a smattering of cottony clouds drifting majestically, backlit by a resplendent moon. That had been placid, peaceful, almost languorously lazy.

This was something else altogether: a carpet of boiling, raging black smoke—an ocean, really, for it stretched as far as the eye could see in every direction. He turned his head and saw that the moon, his other namesake, had been banished beneath the ocean of roiling cloudwaves.

As Rama meant black and Chandra meant moon, so Rama Chandra could be interpreted to mean black moon or dark moon. And so his mother had teased him as an infant in arms, singing lullabies to him of her own casual composition, weaving the words ‘dark moon’ into the homespun lyrics. He had carried those lullabies and the memory of her love and warmth and maternal perfume with him through some of the darkest nights of his life. Yet it was only now, for the first time, that he saw a true dark moon, submerged beneath the ocean of clouds, yet still blazing luminously, like a gleaming silver coin caught by a ray of sunlight at the bottom of a murky pool. It seemed to pulse sporadically, like a heart filling and emptying with pale white light instead of blood, and even through the raging cloudstorm-ocean, its light illuminated everything, searing through the dense frenzy of the smoke waves. As he looked directly at it, it blazed now, like a maddened jewelled eye set deep in the flesh of the forehead of some vengeful deva. The air, Himalaya-cold now, made his skin prickle apprehensively. He shivered and brought his arms closer to his body, clasping them to his bare chest. It made no difference to the pace of his falling—rising—which was so rapid now that he could barely look up without blinking, so great was the force of wind buffeting him. It roared in his ears like the ocean on the shores of Lanka.

He glanced down again and saw that the lights of Ayodhya had vanished entirely, and the very bowl of the earth itself lay revealed beneath him now, like a dark ball veined with emerald and sapphire threads thickly intertwined. His breath, smoking now as it left his shivering lips, caught in his chest to see it so far removed. Surely even garudas never flew so high. Far in the north, he could glimpse the peaks of mountains as well, and he was much higher than the loftiest peak now...and still flying upwards at tremendous speed. Except, he was not actually flying. There was no conscious volition in the act, nor was he doing anything to make this miracle of flight possible. Unlike Hanuman, who could pound the ground, take a mighty leap skywards and shatter the protective shackles of Prithvi Maa, he had no power to soar bird-like. He was simply falling, it was just that he was falling upwards instead of down.

He sensed a change in the pace of his falling, a slowing down. It felt like the opposite of falling now, for at the very end of a fall, the earth seemed to rush up to meet you, flying at you like a rushing mass. But as best as he could make out, the cloud-ocean, boiling and raging with purple and gold veins showing through the morass of smoky chaos, seemed to be approaching slower than before rather than faster. A moment later, he was certain of it—his pace had definitely slowed. Shutting his eyes momentarily from the wind, now cold enough that he could feel the prick of icy particles needling his naked skin, he heard it change from a roaring whirlwind to a growling giant, then fade out gradually to a numbing silence. He opened his eyes again to see the cloud approaching closer as he reached the end of his descent—ascend? He felt himself slow until he was almost floating. He opened his arms, bracing himself for impact even though a part of him knew no impact was forthcoming. With an eerie absence of sound or sensation, he saw his body execute a perfect somersault, feeling no pressure of the earth's pull—or cloud's pull, either—and as gently as a feather touching ground, he saw his bare feet come to rest upon the dark purple-black cottony surface of the cloud ocean.

He released a long deep breath and continued looking down for a moment. The substance beneath his feet had no substance to speak of. It was like standing on ground wreathed in dense ankle-depth fog, except that he could feel no ground beneath his bare soles, only a vague sensation of cold wetness. Like standing on dew-wetted grass? No. It was more like the sensation of placing one's bare foot on the surface of a pond of cool water, feeling the water slap against the sole of the foot, yet holding the foot in mid-air so it did not immerse itself into the water. Yes, that came closer to describing how this felt, except that he was standing with all his weight on both feet, and even so, he was not being pushed down through the skin of the water. He was in fact, impossibly, able to stay suspended, standing on water—or a cloudbank filled with it.

He took a step or two, mentally bracing himself again, and confirmed it. He could even sense the upsurges and downsurges in the mass of smoke-wreathed fluid through the soles of his feet—for these were monsoon clouds, he felt certain, even though monsoon clouds this pregnant with rain should not have been able to rise this high above the land. Yet the whole thing was incredible. How was he able to walk upon the belly of a cloud? To traipse upside down on the underside of a monsoon cloud, looking up—down?—at the earth itself, far, far below, faintly illuminated by the light of the dark-shrouded moon, a silver-limned orb now hanging suspended in a vast pit of darkness. He had arrived here by falling up, like a wingless bird. Even the unbearable cold, for he could hardly imagine how frigid it must be at this height, had grown bearable somehow; he felt a chill wind wafting across his bare chest and limbs but he was neither freezing nor severely inconvenienced. It was as if he had simply acclimatised. Even more curious was the fact that he was able to breathe and move as normal, as if he was on any earthly surface. It was impossible, a dream surely...or a nightmare.

Then he looked around and saw the shapes coalescing around him across the seascape of cloud for as far as the eye could see, an army of writhing, threshing, frenetic forms locked in the ugliest dance of all. After a lifetime spent locked in the frenzy of that same mad dance, he knew at once what it was. He was looking at a theatre of war.

Not just any war.

The war of Lanka.

His war. Against the rakshasa hordes of the lord of asuras. The war he had fought to regain his abducted wife Sita.

He was standing on what seemed to be a hillock of cloudy mass, elevated over the rest of the cloud-field. Several yards below him, ranged on every side for as far as he could see, ghostly shapes thrashed and writhed and engaged in mortal combat. His heart clenched as he recognized familiar companions and fallen foes, and identified enough familiar details to know that this was indeed the battle of Lanka taking place once more, this time fought by ghostly replicas of the original combatants but otherwise perfect in every detail. Rakshasas and vanars, bears and rakshasas, and in the distance, even a silhouetted Rama and Lakshman, arrows flying from their two bows as if from a single arrow-machine, raged in blood-lust. It was unnerving, unsettling, to see the carnage that had cost him so dearly repeated once more. The blood and gore and ichor might be vaporous, the figures mere simulacra, but the action and the memories it evoked were all too real, and awoke terrible dread in his heart. He heard himself moan softly, agonized.

A soft chuckle reverberated in his left ear. He swung around, startled and ready to lash out, bare-handed if need be, prepared for anything except the apparition that appeared.

A man stood beside him. Not a rakshasa with ten heads and legendary sorcerous powers. Not the king of asuras, conqueror of devas and yaksas, terror of the three worlds. Not He Who Makes The Universe Scream.

Not Ravana.

The man who stood before him was no rakshasa or asura. He had two arms, two legs, two eyes, one head ... he appeared normal and mortal in every way. He was well-built in a way that clearly indicated he was a kshatriya by profession, with well-developed musculature and sharply indented angles that suggested an active and vigorous lifestyle. His bristling, oiled moustache was matched by unruly, long hair, tamed by a wooden clasp behind his head. He was clad in a simple yet well-woven dhoti and anga-vastra. Even at first glance, there was something about him that instantly caused Rama to associate him with the specific sub-varna of kshatriyas called rakshaks. A sense of coiled power in those heavily muscled limbs and torso, coupled with a relatively less developed lower body suggested that he was more suited to house guarding and site protection than the leaner, wirier physique suited to the rigours of long travel required of any serving soldier. At best, he could be a mace-wielder, but he lacked the exaggerated shoulders and back muscles that macers were known for. No, Rama thought, all in the space of the time it took him to take in the stranger's appearance, this was almost certainly a rakshak.

“Who are you?” he asked, on his guard, but not adopting a fighting or defensive stance. There was no sense of threat from the man, no suggestion of impending violence. Still, he was prepared for any sudden move, any sign of treachery. “Where is Ravana?”

The man smiled. There was something not unpleasant about his features, something vaguely familiar, like a family resemblance. He arched his thick eyebrows, his broad, high forehead creasing with a trio of horizontal lines. “After all we have been through together, do you still not know me?”

Rama frowned. He glanced down briefly at the war raging below—or above, depending on your perspective. It was still in furious progress. “I don’t understand. What is this place? How are we able to witness events that have gone before. Why have I been brought here? I heard a voice...Ravana’s voice...it summoned me ...” He indicated the ghostly conflict raging around them. “What is this? Sorcery or illusion?” And, with a sudden ferocity that surprised even himself, “Who are you?”

The man’s face recomposed itself into a conciliatory expression. “Patience, Ayodhya-naresh. All will be revealed.”

The man turned and walked away, up the sloping side of the cloud-hillock on which Rama stood. Rama saw now that the hillock rose sharply behind him to ascend upwards into a mist-wreathed darkness. He looked upwards, where the convex bowl of the earth had been only moments earlier, and saw only darkness wreathed in mist. He looked back and saw that the ghostly images of warriors had vanished, leaving only an undulating ocean of dark monsoon cloud, pregnant and heavy with the promise of rain. Apparently, the stranger intended to take him someplace higher up, up some kind of cloud-mountain, the top of which was obscured in the strange mist that had sprung up unexpectedly and was curling around Rama's ankles and feet now. Rama remained where he was, surprised, and more than a little chagrined. He did not like what he felt; did not want any of this. It felt strange, like a dream that was surreal, exotic, enticing, yet with a constant sense of dread, of mortal threat, lurking behind the strange exoticism. The man stopped when he realized Rama was not following him, and looked back. He was already several yards up the mountain.

“Come,” he said simply. “You do wish to know, don't you?”

Rama hesitated. Then shrugged. He had awoken to a voice, the voice of his dead arch-enemy. It had summoned him. On the dead rakshasa's command, he had leaped off the balustrade of his palace verandah. Instead of falling to his death on the tiled courtyard, he had fallen up, to a realm made entirely of clouds. He was looking over a re-enactment of the battle of Lanka, perfect in every detail to his eye. And now a strange man, a rakshak perhaps, was asking him to walk up the side of a cloud-mountain. He may as well follow this madness through to the end, go where this stranger took him and get to the bottom of this mysterious waking dream. He began walking.

The man waited for him to catch up, deferred to him when he approached, making it clear that he was not seeking superiority over Rama, and if anything, was being suitably humble before the king of Ayodhya. They walked together across the impossibly solid cloud-field, the slope rising steadily above. They reached the place where the mist coiled and clung, obscuring view of what lay beyond and above. He paused. The man paused beside him. He looked back, down, wondering at the battle scene he had seen. He hesitated, not afraid, for fear was a warrior's most loyal companion, but considering. What sorcery was this? It was like nothing he had heard of or experienced before, there was something totally alien about its nature and deployment. What purpose had the ghostly vision of the Lanka war served?

He looked at the face of the rakshak. The man looked back impassively, yet not unkindly.

“We must go on.” His voice was deep and resonant, and pleasant to the ear. It was the voice of a man whose life had been spent in service to persons such as Rama, a raj-rakshak, a royal guard. Again that sense of maddening familiarity danced at the periphery of Rama's memory, but he could not place the man, or why he seemed so familiar.

“What lies beyond?” Rama asked, the mist swirling around his feet. It felt neither cold nor wet, simply like a gentle breeze nipping at his ankles.

“The answers to all your questions,” said the man.

Rama stepped forward, into the mist. The man walked beside him. Together, they passed through.

Three

The traveller reached the top of the rise and paused.

The view was breathtaking. Ayodhya the unconquerable lay spread before him like a bagful of precious gems carelessly strewn across the lush green carpet of the Sarayu valley. The river herself wound her way sinuously around the natural hillocks and rocky banks upon which the city’s architects had built their structures, integrating their city planning with the natural lay of the land. At a glance, the city itself seemed as much a part of the vast valley, as if it had always existed and always would. It was the Arya way to build and live in harmony with nature, for all things were the fruit of Prithvi Maa, and only by her gentle grace and forbearance could mortalkind survive on this realm. Yet even judged by that standard, Ayodhya’s city planning and architecture were a sight to behold; a melding of man-made aesthetic and natural beauty that made one want to gaze at it for hours.

The traveller did not have hours to spare.

Already he feared he might be too late. It had been several days since Rama and his entourage had returned to Ayodhya. He had set out within moments of the end of the war of Lanka, knowing full well that speed was of the essence, but the Ayodhyans had travelled by Pushpak, and even his swiftest walking stride could hardly match the blurring speed of the celestial vehicle. Now, he fretted that he might have arrived too late, that the fateful decision that he sought to prevent might already have been taken and events set into motion that could not be undone. He prayed it was not so, that his long arduous trek had not been in vain. For the event he sought to prevent would alter not only the course of his own life, that of Rama and those near and dear to him, but the lives of all presently alive, mortal and otherwise. Its impact would be felt at the end of the farthest corridors of history, in unimaginable ways at inconceivable future times. He used the brief moment of respite that he had allowed himself now to send up one final prayer that he might yet be in time to prevent that terrible turn of events.

He took up his stout staff, worn and battered from the long walk, and numbed his mind to the ache and pain from his bruised feet. They were unaccustomed to such travel, for the past year had seen him engaged more in meditation and contemplation rather than physical activity, and his body, so long abused by harsh living and the numerous injuries, scars, old wounds and fresh marks of a violent existence, had only just begun to soften and grow accustomed to the peaceful ascetic life when he had risen to undertake this mission. He had pushed it hard these past several days, walking constantly with only the barest minimum of rest, sleep and frugal nourishment. Roots, herbs, a fruit or two...he had eaten little, grown even leaner than whip-thin, and he longed for a good, hot meal and a pallet to rest his weary head.

But there was no time for eating or rest.

He had work to do. Vital work. A Queen to warn. A King to appeal to. And, if his foreboding was right, a kingdom to save—perhaps even an entire civilization.

And to achieve any of those, he had to reach on time, before that fateful decision was made. Before the die was cast whose rattling echo would haunt the halls of itihasa for millennia to come.

If he reached even an instant too late, then this breathtaking view of great, noble Ayodhya would be worth no more than a mouthful of ash. Ayodhya herself, the unconquerable, would finally fall. Not to an army of asuras, or even mortal enemies. But to the greatest enemy of all. The enemy within.

He gripped the staff tightly, marked the progress of the narrow winding pathway down the side of the steep slope that led downwards to the rajmarg on the north bank of the river, and began to descend.

As he descended, the sun appeared over the eastern rim of the valley, sending blades of golden light across the perfectly blended amalgam of mortal and natural aesthetic achievement that the world knew as the capitol of the Kosala nation, home of the Ikshwaku Suryavansha dynasty, seat of the sunwood throne. Sunlight glittered on the tips of the Sarayu's wash, caught the wings of butterflies traipsing through the North bank woods where a certain crown prince had once whiled away youthful hours in daydreaming and kairee-munching, blissfully unaware of the years of toil and violence that lay ahead. It caught the tips of blades of new grass shoots emerging from the rich, alluvial soil of the valley where a nest of baby kachhuaas swarmed blindly, tiny mottled shells clattering over one another as they sluggishly fought their way toward food, light, water, survival. With the new day, the struggle for life and survival had begun anew.

The traveller strode toward Ayodhya.

As the traveller completed his descent and reached the raj-marg, turning his aspect and his feet in the direction of the city's looming first gate, a figure crouched upon a high branch on the far bank of the river watched him curiously. It had observed the stranger from the moment he had appeared over the rise and stood, contemplating the view, for if there was one thing that the being that crouched upon the tree did exceedingly well, it was to watch, to observe, to spot what most others might fail to notice, or notice too late. He knew that the sentries posted by the city did an exceedingly good job of patrolling and defending the outskirts of the city and its environs, and that they were especially alert in these warlike times, but even their garuda-sharp eyes could not cover every inch of terrain at once, and their disciplined quad-sweeps could be bypassed by a shrewd intruder or two—not for long, but it was possible. The watcher did not brook martial discipline much, particularly the variety favoured by humans; he had found that most conflicts were won by a combination of shrewdness, stealth and ferocious explosive force applied at the least expected time and place. He had enough firsthand experience to know whereof he spoke. He also had enough firsthand knowledge of the wily ways and methods of foe that fought not by the Arya rules of war nor cared for the kshatriya code of conduct. He did not know of any such foe still extant but that was beside the point. He had made a vocation of watching and observing, and old habits died hard, especially among his species.

That was what found him here this morning, and every morning, routinely patrolling the outskirts of the city in a route so random and individualistic that it was perhaps more effective than the regularly timed quad-sweeps of the Ayodhyan defence system. It was this idiosyncratic loping through the trees—for that was his preferred method of ambulation—in a zigzag pattern completely unpredictable and unique to each new day, that had brought him this glimpse of the traveller on the rise. The traveller who was presently vanishing into the dusty haze that overhung the raj-marg in the wake of his swift progress. The watcher made no attempt to follow the traveller or to seek out the nearest quad of PFs making their methodical sweeps of the area—he scented there was one not three hundred yards away, working its way through a thicket on the same rise the traveller had descended from only moments ago. He knew the traveller would be accosted in moments by either the PF regiment permanently stationed on the raj-marg or the bristling gate-watch who were ever-vigilant under the command of newly elevated General Drishti Kumar. It was not the traveller himself that concerned him now; it was the reason for the traveller's visit.

As it so happened, he knew the traveller. Not personally, for he had never had occasion to meet the man face to face. But he had watched him fight alongside his lord and lady for years in the forests of Janasthana, during those harsh years of his lord's exile, watched him risk life and limb countless times in the service of Rama's war against the rakshasas of the region. Watched him fight fiercely, despatch any number of the brutal creatures that had plagued Rama and his companions since the feral cousin of Ravana, Supanakha, had maddened her cousins and their clans into declaring war against Rama after he had spurned her. Yes, the watcher had watched as this man, this traveller now come to Ayodhya, had fought as fiercely, brutally, bestially, as any rakshasa himself, driving fear into the hearts of even his own exiled fellows. For while they fought to live, to survive, this one had fought as if driven by some inner demon, a rakshasa of his own making, and inflicted more violence and harm upon his foe than was necessary to simply survive: he fought to decimate, to destroy, to eliminate completely.

Of course, that was in the past. For the watcher knew that this man had parted ways with Rama after the battle of Janasthana. He had heard that he had dropped the sword and taken up the cloth, so to speak, turning from the physical rigours of warriorhood to the spiritual rigours of priesthood. He had heard of the immensely disciplined tapasya undertaken by this former bandit and bearkiller, of the enlightenment he had received while meditating within a nest of fire ants—a story that was fast becoming a minor legend in some parts—and of the life of peace and philosophy he had taken up with enthusiasm thereafter. But all this had been received in bits and pieces and he had not paid much attention to it, being somewhat preoccupied with a war to wage and a considerable army to manage, several armies as a matter of fact.

And he had never liked and trusted the man himself back when he was a warrior in Rama's camp of outlaws and exiles in Janasthana, had felt the intrinsic distrust and burning hatred of any human who had made a habit of slaying creatures of the land. Bearkiller, the traveller had been at one time, long before he joined Rama's ragged band of exiles, and his face had borne permanent testimony of ravages wrought by a much earlier attack by one of the same species that had lent him his name and earlier reputation. The ugly face-altering scars that disfigured his visage were now mostly concealed under a dense growth of beard and an unruly head of hair. The muscular body that had displayed the scars of countless conflicts as well as earlier encounters with the furry nemesis that lent him his nickname was now covered with a red ochre garb that flowed from head to foot; along with the wildwood staff he gripped in one hand, it lent him the appearance of a tapasvi sadhu quite convincingly.

But the watcher was not convinced.

To him, the man that he had first heard called Bearface, later , and now Valmiki, was not one to be trusted entirely. He did not trust his motives, the extreme alteration in his appearance and vocation, or his reasons for coming here to Ayodhya now, at this particular juncture in time and history.

So, while he had chosen to let him pass, to be dealt with by the PFs and gate-watch, he intended to race back to the palace ahead of him. To alert his lord, Rama.

Yes, that was what he would do, must do.

His mind made up, the vanar named Hanuman uncurled his long, muscular tail from the branch on which he had sat perched contemplating until now, and with one supple surge of his powerful muscles, propelled himself from that sala tree to the next. In moments, he was a blur loping and swinging through the trees, moving not unlike the smaller, less-muscled simians that his kind were often mistaken for by foreigners, yet with a sinuous grace and sheer power that no monkey could ever emulate, moving faster through the trees than most land animals across the ground.

As he raced through the trees, startling squirrels and confusing birds by flitting past them even before they were able to burst into flight, the sun crested the top of the craggy northeastern ranges and shone its golden beam into the valley of the Sarayu, sending its message of warmth and brightness into crannies and crevices, stirring sleeping reptiles and compelling creatures of the earth to emerge blinking sleepily in the light of a new day.

FOUR

Bharat saw the sword turn at the very last instant.

His mace was already deployed, held in an overhand grip and swinging downwards and to the right, aiming for his opponent's right shoulder. It was impossible for him to stop the momentum and swing it again in time to thwart the oncoming sword thrust. Nor would the bulbous head of the mace make contact with its target in time to prevent him, Bharat, from being pierced. His opponent had gambled his own right shoulder, possibly more, on delivering this thrust; Bharat's mace would meet its mark and certainly wound, maim, disable, perhaps even permanently cripple the man. But not quickly enough to prevent him from sticking Bharat in a vital organ. For by turning that blade at the last instant, he was aiming precisely at the fleshy area between Bharat's ribs and hipbone. And from the angle at which the blade was aimed, the point would enter Bharat's flesh just below his lowest rib, penetrating sharply upwards, deeply inwards, slicing through his liver. A fatal wound. All the vaidis in Ayodhya would not be able to save him from succumbing to that one. Bharat had seen enough men struck in the liver to know their fate from just the shade of blood that seeped out: rich, liver-dark blood, fecund with the body's densest nutrients and life-energy.

All this he realized in the flash of an instant when he glimpsed the sword turn: it unreeled before his mind like a long scroll abruptly unfurled, the permutations, combinations, possibilities. It all added up to one simple conclusion, reached almost instantly: Bharat was a dead man.

Even as his veteran warrior's instincts flashed this conclusion on the unrolling reel of his thoughts, the prince of Ayodhya still found himself admiring the audacity of the move.

It was a bold, impudent action: the man was willing to have his own shoulder, possibly even his collarbone and part of his rib cage, shattered by a direct, brutal blow from a twenty kilo mace. All in order that he might despatch Bharat with a fatal wound. Even in that split second it took him to size up the threat, to weigh the possibilities and outcome, Bharat found himself admiring the man's gumption. A mace blow to the shoulder was nothing to shake off; it would be far more painful than Bharat's own wound, if considerably less life-threatening. In short, the man had won the fight. He had put himself out of action, but he had finished off Bharat. No question about it at all.

Or at least, he would have done so. If he had been able to follow through on his bold action.

To the men watching the fight—several dozen of them, all burly, powerfully muscled macers and swordsmen, all sweaty and mud-caked from their own sessions in the fighting field, for they had been at it since before dawn—there was no conceivable way that Bharat could avoid the lethal sword strike now. Several of them winced, grimaced or otherwise failed to conceal their distaste at the sight of a fellow kshatriya suffering such an awful blow, that too their own prince as well as their guru in warcraft—even as they admired the swordsman's brilliant last-second twist and turn. None of them, certainly not Bharat himself, had seen that sudden twist of the sword coming, or deemed it possible. But that was because no hale and hearty soldier willingly risked certain bodily harm to his own person, possibly even permanent disability, merely to despatch a single opponent. It was one thing to be brought down by a superior opponent; it was a completely different thing to bring down an opponent by a manoeuvre that caused grave bodily harm to oneself. If this had been a battlefield bout, after wounding Bharat fatally the man would have been down on the field, gravely injured, unable to move or fight thereafter. For him, the battle would be over, possibly even the war. There was no point to such a desperate manoeuvre. It was not the way of a kshatriya.

It was the way of an assassin.

A fanatical attacker with one mission and one only: to slay his opponent. Whatever the cost.

That was the reason why the attacker didn't care about being injured, crippled even. He was here to die anyway: to sacrifice his life in order to achieve his mission, to kill Bharat.

All this happened in the blink of an eye: the turn of the blade, Bharat's grasping of the inevitable consequence of this tactic, the watching crowd's realization of the same deadly fact, and Bharat's realization of what this implied.

And then the blade struck. Flesh.

Bharat's flesh.

Pierced. Blood. Spurting. Skin. Tearing. Pain.
Blazing. Muscle. Crying Out.

Time fragmented into shards, like shattered glass frozen at the instant of explosion. A stream of water being poured from a skinbag into a horse trough seemed to stay suspended in mid-air. A bird in flight, overhead, glimpsed from the corner of Bharat's eye, seemed locked into immobility. A horse neighing and starting to buck, froze motionless. The wrangler pouring water into the trough, staring wide-eyed, mouth parted to reveal gawky, misshapen teeth. A bar of sunlight, reflecting off the armoured shoulderpiece of one of the mace-men watching from the sidelines, seemed to halt before touching the ground. Motes of dust dancing in the bar of sunlight, a horsefly, particles of bloodspray—my bloodspray, he realized with a distant, dim detachment—hung in the stunned silence of the moment, and Bharat felt the cocoon of pure, perfect warlust grip the universe itself in a tight godlike fist, slowing down time to a crawl, freezing nature herself, until he felt as if he alone could move through this silent tableau at will, slicing sunlight into strips if he desired, piercing a drop of water with the tip of a blade, sending an arrow whirling into the eye of a bird...felt in this sacred moment of moments as if he ruled time, gravity, and all forces of nature, and was master of atoms and elephants alike, lord of creation—and destruction.

It was sorcery, pure and simple.

Yet it had not been achieved by the recitation of any ‘magic’ mantra. Or by the infusion of any potion, the recitation of any spell, the casting of any runes.

It was a feat he had acquired mastery of through fourteen long years of hardwon practice, combat, warfare...fourteen long, hard, bitter years.

Even more, if you counted the years of training under Maha-guru Brahamarishi Vashishta in the gurukul as a young boy, the adolescent years of constant practice in the palace courtyard and fighting fields. The years he had spent struggling to keep pace with, match, and then outmatch the undisputed champion of Ayodhya, winner of every individual event in every sporting contest he participated in, his own brother. Rama. And struggle he did, not because he resented his brother’s inherent superiority in all warriorlike activities and sport, but because he desired to be Rama. To see the same light in his father's eyes when he looked at the eldest of the four sons of Dasaratha. To hear the crowd roar as deafeningly as it roared for Rama. It was not that Maharaja Dasaratha, or anyone else, loved Bharat, Shatrugan or Lakshman any less than they did Rama, it was simply that they adored Rama more than they could possibly adore any other being. The irony was, so did Bharat himself. How could he not? Rama was perfection incarnate, or as close to it as it was humanly possible to be and yet call oneself human.

And so he had striven to become more than human. In all things, but most especially, in the realm of the warrior. Not just on the playing field, but on the battlefield.

And in these past years, since Rama's exit into exile, as Bharat had resided at Nandigram, preferring to manage the day-to-day affairs of the kingdom of Kosala from that humble village rather than from the great seat of political power that was Ayodhya, he had had occasions innumerable to hone those skills, to polish the edge of that blade into perfection. For the time for playing fields had passed with the passing of Rama into exile. And Ayodhya had entered into a new age, a darker, more daunting age of constant threat, fears, doubts, internal strife, external assaults and more physical threat and challenge than was usual for an apparent time of peace. It had been the hardest fourteen years of Ayodhya's existence, even harder than the time of the Last Asura War, because the threat was not as obvious and externalized as it had been then. It was an insidious, internalized, constant and unceasing stress that had at times threatened to tear apart the very fabric of this great city-state and the kingdom at large. The enemy within.

And it was that same enemy that had now struck at Bharat again.

In that instant when the blade penetrated Bharat's flesh, he slipped instantly into this private space, this shell of invisible armour he had designed and crafted himself over the past near-decade and a half that he had acted as regent of the kingdom in Rama's stead, withstanding everything a king could be expected to endure, and then some, all without even the privilege of wearing the crown whose thorns pierced his head. He had learned how to do this and had done it over and over again, to great effect. In a way, he was known for it. And feared. They called it "Bharat's Wall", and kshatriyas who had watched him fight, even Shatrugan who had watched him at such times, spoke of it afterwards in reverential, glaze-eyed terms, as if wishing they could attain such a lofty level of skill themselves.

And now, as Bharat moved as easily as a bird through smoke in the extreme superstate of awareness that he attained at such instants, he saw that same glazed look on his opponent's face. For the man had come so far, achieved so much more than what the other assassins before him had achieved—the closest before had merely been able to fire an arrow from a rooftop ten yards away the last time—and had executed a move so brilliantly conceived and executed that even Bharat had been admiring it ruefully only a moment ago.

But now, the man knew, and his face reflected this knowledge, he had failed.

Bharat moved through the silence like a knife through silk, cutting time and space as easily as that polished blade sliced fabric, and felt the tip of the sword pass through the outermost layer of the skin over his ribcage, scraping agonizingly against and scoring his lowest two ribs—a tiny spurt of blood, a searing heat as the tight band of muscle was severed at that point—and emerged without having penetrated through the flesh itself, without having attained its intended goal, his vital organ.

And the man's eyes had widened, his mouth opened wide in a dismayed snarl, even as he realized he had been thwarted. Impossible. Undoable. And yet. And yet.

The moment unfroze. Time unlocked. Gravity reclaimed her rightful power.

And Bharat let the hand carrying the mace complete its trajectory, the weight of the heavy weapon, specially customized, engraved and tooled for him according to his precise specifications based on years of mace-fighting experience, carrying his arm into an angle impossible for any human body to sustain, and he felt the agonizing wrench of his right shoulder dislocating from its socket, a sensation like hot knives tearing their way out of his shoulder, screaming to break free. The mace lost its momentum and slumped, thumping the assassin lightly on the muscled bicep of his arm, hard enough to hurt and leave a bruise for days, but not hard enough to smash bone and rend flesh. Then his hand, already falling to hang limply by his side, lost its grip on the handle of the beautiful hand-crafted weapon, made in a tiny hamlet near Nandigram by an old PF veteran with only one arm and one functional eye, and the companion of many combats fell with a dusty thud to the ground. The assassin, who by rights ought to have been sprawled on the same ground with a shattered shoulder at least, remained standing, staring in disbelief at Bharat. For all his shrewd ingenuity and boldness in that manoeuvre, the one thing the man had not come prepared for was the possibility that his target would risk a move as bold, as audacious as his own, and allow himself to suffer injury in order to accomplish his mission: to survive.

The assassin had turned his blade, risking being maimed or crippled, in order to deal Bharat a fatal wound.

Bharat had countered his attempt by turning his mace, a far heavier, unwieldier, and more difficult weapon to manoeuvre in such a fashion, and had knowingly dislocated his own shoulder, in order to avoid the assassin's fatal strike. It had been a breathtaking counter-move, the more so for the speed with which Bharat had seen the unexpected threat—an assassination attempt by a familiar practice partner in the middle of a practice bout—had sized it up precisely, and had then executed a counter-manoeuve that perfectly thwarted the attempt. It was one the kusalavya bards would be reciting verses about in wayside ashrams for decades to come.

The assassin had failed. His blade had merely nicked Bharat's skin and scored his ribs lightly, a mere trifle for a kshatriya of Bharat's veteran status and record. He had suffered worse injuries during practice sessions, which this was supposed to have been before his opponent turned out to have a different agenda.

Bharat had succeeded and though his shoulder screamed agony at this moment, he knew he had no time to waste. The other warriors, alert enough to have seen exactly what had happened, and to have reacted instantly—even now they were leaping the rope ring and swarming to Bharat's aid—were too far away to be of real use in the few instants he knew he had left to act. Shatrugan was at their head, bellowing a cry of rage and vengeance as he sped with frightening swiftness, dust churning in the wake of his bare feet, his javelin held menacingly low by his side, his eyes wide and furious, his teeth bared and flashing in the early morning sunlight, sweat-oiled muscles working powerfully, for he had just finished his own session with another practice partner. But they would all be too late, much too late. For such matters were decided, like all truly important matters usually were, in the space of a blink of an eye. Already, Bharat sensed, the assassin's sword was moving again, turning now to the most inevitable next target: not Bharat himself for that horse had fled already, that opportunity lost, but towards his own naked throat.

Bharat turned and with one smooth motion, grasped at the man's wrist. But both men's bodies, naked except for grimy once-white langots, were slippery with sweat and dust, and his grip slid inches upwards, to the man's forearm. Bharat's intention was to twist the wrist, break it if possible, and cause the sword to fall. Instead, his hand slipped up to the forearm and succeeded only in shifting the angle of the blade by an inch or so.

The man's sword, instead of penetrating his throat dead centre as intended, slashed it diagonally. Close enough to serve its purpose. The result was instantaneous. An explosion of blood from the abruptly severed artery splattered Bharat and then Shatrugan, who reached them only a moment after, and the man fell to the ground, already shuddering in his death throes. Bharat tried to bunch his arm into a fist and failed, feeling only a sense of helpless agony in the disabled limb. He had wanted the assassin for questioning and that was impossible now. The man would be dead in moments with that wound.

Shatrugan and he watched helplessly as the assassin bled to death, his blood spreading to stain the dust of the fighting field. Shatrugan knelt down to examine the man more closely, in case he bore some clue to his identity or affiliation – unlikely, but still worth giving a once-over. The other kshatriyas who practised routinely with them daily, their closest and most trusted war-comrades, stood around, watching. Several of them spat in disgust. The assassin was well known to them all, had caroused and drunk and fought beside them on a dozen occasions over the last year and a half; this had been a long-planned and meticulously executed infiltration and assassination attempt. Only the new buck-toothed novice to the royal syce came running to gawk. Others on the practice field, after a brief pause to take in what had happened, continued as before. This was, after all, not the first time this had happened. Ever since Rama had gone into exile fourteen years ago, Bharat had experienced his share of assassination attempts. There were always people who blamed Bharat for Rama's banishment; not entirely incorrect, since it had been for Bharat's sake that his mother Kaikeyi had demanded that Rama be banished. But once he had settled in at Nandigram, making it clear that he had no intention of seating himself on the throne until Rama's return from exile, the attempts had reduced in frequency and had finally ceased. If anything, over time, he had come to earn the respect of Rama's supporters, who held up his example as the story of the 'perfect brother', whatever that might mean. And in time, even those supporters had begun to attend him at Nandigram, accepting him grudgingly as Rama's regent.

But since Rama's return from exile, the assassination attempts had begun again. This was the third in as many days. And it was certainly not the last.

He bent down, wincing at the sharp knife of pain in his shoulder, picked up the fallen mace, and was about to turn away when Shatrugan called out softly.

He frowned at the expression on his brother's face. "What?"

Shatrugan glanced around briefly then moved his head closer to Bharat, close enough so that only he could hear him. "He's an Ayodhyan."

Bharat stared at him, trying to think through the implications of that simple assertion. He did not ask Shatrugan how he could be so certain of the fact; the how of it was less important than the fact itself. It meant that the people of Ayodhya – or some of them at least – wanted Bharat dead. Which in turn meant... he didn't even like to speculate on what it meant. It was the legacy of fourteen years of infighting, politicking and a messy mix of resentment, accusation, allegation, commercial rivalries, old tribal feuds and internal dissension.

Shatrugan held out something, an amulet of some sort dangling from a black thread. “This was around his neck.”

Bharat didn't touch or take the charm, merely glanced at it. Even so, it sent a chill through his body. Despite the warming morning sun, the throbbing heat in his shoulder, the searing rakes where the blade had scored his flesh, he still felt a chill when he looked at the iconography of the little amulet. He had seen its like before, if not this exact same design. It was based on ancient symbols from an earlier age; an age before civilization, cities and sanatan dharma. This particular combination of symbols was easy enough to read if unusual. It merely inverted the usual honorific of the Suryavansha Ikshwaku dynasty, piercing it with a ragged blade. The meaning was crude but clear: Death to the Dynasty that rules Ayodhya. Death to Bharat and Rama and all their bloodline.

He realized he had been wrong. The assassination attempt was not directed at him alone: it was directed at his entire family, clan and by extension, the entire nation-state that they governed and protected. It was only one part of a far larger mission of total annihilation.

KAAND 1

ONE

Rama.

Sleeping on his back, left arm crooked, fingers curled on his gently rising and falling abdomen, the other arm flung out by his side, fingers splayed, within reach of his ever-present sword. The sword itself was not within the grasp of those splayed fingers, but it was close enough: below the bed, out of sight yet less than half a yard away. In many ways, that sword was as much his wife as she: his constant companion through countless conflicts, battered and careworn, always by his side, never out of reach, except... She caught her breath, lowered her head to release it with a long sigh. Except when she was taken from him, made a captive of Ravana. Then, he had been left with only the sword. In fact, it was that sword that had been his only solace, his final hope, his sole means of retribution, his only way of recovering her, his other constant companion. Even after they had returned from Lanka by Pushpak, and Sumantra had sought to take the battered, bloodied, scarred weapon away, he had resisted. And she had not failed to notice how restlessly he had bided the time until it was returned to him, considerably restored by the royal armourer, but still nowhere near as fine as any of the countless dozens of new swords that were his for the taking. Nay, it had to be that sword and that sword alone.

Which begged the question: He could survive without her but could he survive without the sword? Without all that the sword symbolized? The way of the warrior, the road of dharma?

He stirred in his sleep, breath quickening, eyeballs rolling behind closed lids. She held her breath and lay very still, not wanting to rouse him. He deserved his rest, needed it. The days since their return to Ayodhya had been tumultuous, a whirlwind of excitement and activity that never seemed to cease. And probably never would. A king's duties were endless; a kingdom's, infinite. If Rama and she had regained their home with all the solace and comfort it brought, then Ayodhya too had regained its king and queen after fourteen years. Its claim was undeniable, its demands unceasing. Yet what of her claim, her needs? After fourteen years of exile, after all that had transpired, did not she have a legitimate claim as well? Was he not her Rama too?

She heard the trumpeting of elephants from somewhere in the middle distance. No doubt that was Lakshman, putting the new elephant regiment through its paces. He had slipped so easily, so quickly into his role as prince-in-waiting and commander of the armies, it was unnerving. She had glimpsed him with his wife, her sister, Urmila. They had seemed stiff together, awkward, ill at ease, moving and speaking like strangers at a formal event. Fourteen years ... half a lifetime ... And they had known each other barely days before that cruel separation. They were strangers in all but name. Time had bent and twisted their marriage into a crooked river that lay still and muddy now. Time alone could bring it back onto its natural course—if such a crooked bend could be corrected at all. Perhaps if Urmila's womb had quickened before they had left, things would be different. Worse? No. Better. Definitely better, she thought. Children brought beauty and permanence to a marriage. Always.

She touched her gently risen abdomen. She still was not showing overly much. She feared that might be due to her months of privation. First in those last few horrific days at Janasthana, before that final battle against the ragged remnants of Supanakha's brother rakshasas, then in captivity in Lanka where she had been too mistrustful of her captors to eat freely, too harassed to eat at all sometimes. But in between those years of battle and those weeks of captivity, there had been a brief season of rest, a few pleasurable days of idle pasture, when Rama had shown more tenderness toward her than ever before, as if he somehow sensed her condition. She knew he did not actually know of her pregnancy, for he was guileless in that sense, her Rama, a quiet reserved man who held himself too closely at times but could never deceive her or lie openly; he did not know of her pregnancy, then in its early weeks, almost too early to be sure, although she was sure, but perhaps some part of his acutely perceptive mind sensed her need for gentleness, for caring, for nourishment both emotional and physical. He had fed her like a honeymooning husband—literally as well as emotionally—and she had relished every morsel, for it was his love she was truly tasting, his enduring affection. For all his formidable skills as a warrior, Rama Chandra could be as formidable a husband, when time and circumstances permitted him to be. Perhaps he was compensating for the years in exile, years of hardship and battle, and constant fear and struggle, blood and disease and slaughter. Perhaps he was simply celebrating the imminent closure of that part of their lives: it had been only weeks before the end of their term of exile after all. Whatever the reason, she had loved that brief season of respite. It was what had sustained her through the weeks of torturous captivity that followed, through the taunting of the rakshasis, the mental torture of Supanakha and Ravana, her constant fear of Ravana's asura-maya, his dark, terrible sorcery, and later the horror of knowing that tens upon tens of thousands were dying for her sake, in a pointless battle that she would never have permitted Rama to wage had she been by his side. But that was the point, wasn't it? He waged that war because she was not by his side, because she had been taken from him, and because it was the only way to get her back.

She watched him sleeping, hand outstretched in search of that ever-present sword, and could not bring herself to believe that he would ever have resorted to such tactics: raising an army, crossing an ocean, invading another sovereign realm, slaughtering lakhs, destroying a city, a kingdom, almost an entire race... He would never have done it had she been beside him. Her taking had been the tipping point in a life filled with unrelenting conflict, struggle, bloodshed. He had gone all the way because he was already far down the path of violence.

But had it not happened, had she not been taken, had Ravana not usurped the one thing that could drive Rama to war and invasion, she felt certain he would have remained that peaceable, loving husband. That Rama she had known for those glorious few days in the forest, in the hut by the river, in the last days of their exile. That man with the rough chin and soft touch. Strong hands and gentle voice. Dark skin and light humour.

Rama the river dolphin. Rama the vegetable baster. Rama the minder of rabbits and feeder of fledgling parrots. Rama, friend of the forest, brother of the deer, son of Prithvi Maa.

She touched his chest gently, longing for that Rama. That gentle man in that rough place. That warrior, slayer of thousands, survivor of countless deathly bladed conflicts, who could dance the mad dance of battle like no other warrior she had ever seen or heard of, who could face down berserkers and face up to impossible odds and still lead his ragtag bunch of outlaws and exiles to victory—bloody and painful, but victory nonetheless—and yet choose to abjure slaying innocent beasts of the woods for his supper, opting instead to gnaw on roasted yams and roots and plucked leaves rather than take the warrior's share of nature's bounty that was his fair due. That Rama of the forest who could stay his blade from striking down a pregnant sow that was charging him in mad fury, turn his hip just in time to avoid disembowelment by her wicked horns, twist, turn and smack her on her hairy behind with the flat of his blade, causing her to squeal in outrage and shame and flee into the dark woods. Other, lesser warriors—lesser men—would simply slay the boar and feast on the rich, savoury flesh. But not her Rama. He had perfect control of his senses, his wits, at all times and even when he descended into the maelstrom of battle lust, that heart of darkness that every warrior visited at some time, that dark terrible eye of the storm that even she had inhabited more times than she cared to remember—even then he remained Rama the compassionate, the wise, the infinitely balanced and fair, upholder of dharma.

The way he had acted after the war of Lanka was yet another example of his devotion to dharma. Acknowledging that even a just war was a needless war; that it fell to the victor to hold out the helping hand, to offer those things that daunted great kings, that legendary emperors had been too proud to ever accept: Regret, first and foremost. Reparation.

Rehabilitation. And after all was done, or well begun at least, for the wages of war took eons to be paid out fully, Disarmament. That last alone had eluded almost every conqueror since the beginning of time. Yet Rama had done it, had disarmed, disbanded, dismissed and sent their separate ways the several formidable factions of the greatest army ever assembled in mortal memory. That was Rama. Her Rama.

In a sense, that sword was symbolic of everything that Rama himself stood for. The sword was Rama and Rama was the sword. Battered, scarred, broken and mended and broken again a hundred times over, yet fighting fit and ready to go now, ready to put loyalty before life, duty before self-preservation, dharma before all else. He was dharma's truest disciple, most devout servant, most loyal brother, prodigal son, unswerving husband, fiercest protector...

What else was Rama but dharma by another name?

He opened his eyes and looked up at her. She smiled slowly, brushing away the stray hairs that fell awry—crow-black hairs that were finally washed clean of the dried juice of the bodhi tree-trunk after being matted daily with that milky, gummy fluid for fourteen years —and turned the gesture into a caress.

His face mirrored her smile, his dark eyes not seeming as sunken as they had the day he had taken her out of Lanka, the smile less like a skull's deathly grimace. A quizzical frown appeared and lingered. Her fingers affectionately cupped his hard heart-shaped jaw, the pad of her thumb stroking the stubbly underside of his chin, rasping against the bristling new growth.

His hand reached up and caught her wrist. The sudden ease with which he did this, the smooth grace with which he slid his hand up the length of her arm to the shoulder, his calloused palm rough upon her arm and then her neck, made her draw a quick breath. It felt so good to be with her man again, her Rama. For apart from all else, he was still that. A man. Her man.

They lay like that, gazing into one another's eyes for neither knew how long. A sunbeam slipped through a gap in the gently wind-wafted drapes and fell upon the foot of the bed where it turned satiny saffron covers ablaze, catching the weave and warp of the colour and turning it into naked flame. Sita had been embarrassed by the first sight of the saffron bedcovers—the colour used for newlyweds, because it indicated passion and coital energies. She had been clad for so long in the deep red ochre of the spiritual warrior that the satiny saffron had seemed to blaze like a forest fire, searing her senses. She glanced down now, attracted by the warmth of the sunlight on the naked sole of her upraised foot, and saw the saffron spread glow, then turn to fire again. The fire caught and took hold of her and threatened to consume her.

Rama's grip upon her neck suddenly changed. From a carelessly affectionate caress it became a pressing vice. She saw his eyes narrow, sensed his body tighten. And that familiar look came upon him, like the visor of a war-helm lowered across his features, masking him with the formidable appearance of a warrior, a kshatriya, a yoddha...nay, a mahayoddha.

“Rama.”

The voice was low yet penetrating. It carried as gently as the morning wind wafting slowly from the open verandah. She could not see its owner, but guessed he was perched just above the balcony, on the ledge that served as a rain-ward, perhaps gripping one of the arching apsaras. But even before the voice spoke, the person it addressed had already left her side. Detaching himself from her, Rama had rolled backwards, off the edge of the bed, snatching up the sword deftly as he went, and swept out of the room as lithely as a gust of wind. She lowered her hand, staring briefly at her empty palm—empty too long, much too long—and released a silent shuddering sigh.

There was a brief moment of silence as the caller waited for a response. Then Rama appeared on the verandah, leaned out and tapped his sword on the overhanging ledge. The sound of metal tapping stone reached her. “Come down, my friend. Join us.”

“It’s your favourite vanar,” Rama said as he re-entered the room, the sword lowered.

A furry body lowered itself into view, bare feet thumping onto the floor of the verandah. Hanuman parted the drapes and entered, head bent over and eyes averted sheepishly.

“Apologies for disturbing my lord and lady in their private sanctum,” he said in his gruff vanar voice.

Sita smiled. “You need not apologize, faithful one. Our home is yours to visit anytime you please.”

She rose from the bed and stood, gesturing to a cushioned couch across the chamber. “Please, be seated. I will send for some refreshments.”

She reached for the silken rope that hung beside the bed, intending to tug upon it to ring the brass bell that would summon her serving girls.

“No.” Hanuman’s voice was suddenly sharp. “Please. Do not.”

Rama and she both glanced up at the tone.

The vanar shook his head. “I beg your pardon once again. I would not come here thus unannounced and invade your privacy if it was not urgent. I come only because there is a visitor. Someone comes to Ayodhya. And I thought Rama should know of it before the man arrives within the city. In case...”

He glanced at Rama, whose face was once again shielded, she saw, by that war-mask. His warrior face. He was listening intently as Hanuman completed his message:

“In case my lord prefers that he not be allowed to enter at all.”

TWO

“Who is this visitor?” Rama asked, dressing himself even as he spoke.

Hanuman bowed his head in the direction of his lord’s presence. “It is the bandit-turned-sage. The one they now call by the name of the termite ants who built their home upon and around his meditating body, and so deeply was he lost in meditation that he endured their swarming presence for many moons...”

“Valmiki.”

The vanar dipped his snout. “Valmiki. After the Valmik ants. But once he was known by another name.” Hanuman’s simian eyes grew dark and deadly, as Sita saw his war-face descend upon the otherwise golden and handsome vanar visage. “By the beasts he used to hunt and kill for profit and pleasure, and who savagely mauled him and left their mark upon his features as is the way of the forest.”

“Bearface.” Rama’s voice was clipped as he strapped on his sword. “Ratnakar,” he added. He turned, ready. “How long before he gets here?”

Hanuman cocked his head to one side. Estimating conceptual constructs such as time was not something vanars were known for. It was a testament to Hanuman’s desire to serve Rama that he had somehow mastered this puzzling art of telling time by mortal methods, rather than the perfectly acceptable vanar method that numbered everything up to ten (the number of digits on two paws) and anything beyond that as ‘many paws full’.

“He shall be at your palace gates in a few moments.”

Rama nodded.

“Do you wish me to despatch him?” Hanuman asked quietly. There was no menace or malice in his tone, merely a question.

Rama glanced at Sita. She remained silent, waiting to see what Rama said.

“No,” he said. “I will see him. But not officially, not as a visitor to the court. Go. Divert him. Tell him I sent you. Bring him around to...” Rama frowned. It had been fourteen years. Ayodhya had changed. “The sarathi quarters, behind the royal stables.”

Sita nodded, “A wise choice.” The sarathis, the charioteer sub-caste of kshatriyas, were loyal to the ruling family unto death. More importantly, they were good at keeping secrets. Anything discussed within earshot of any of them would never be repeated for the benefit of other ears.

Rama clapped a hand on Hanuman's furry shoulder. "Go, my friend, Maruti. Swift as the wind your father."

Hanuman went. Loping in great vanar strides, out the verandah and leaping over the balustrade into empty space with an unhesitating fearlessness that made her breath catch.

Rama continued staring at her. She found herself saddened by how completely he had discarded the Rama he was only a moment earlier and how completely his war-face, this maha-yoddha Rama, had replaced her Rama. She had hoped that in the safety and security of Ayodhya, he would be...different. Apparently, she had been wrong.

"What do you think he wants?" she asked, speaking the question she knew was on his lips unspoken. She had begun changing her garb the instant Hanuman was gone.

He shrugged. "We shall learn that soon enough."

That was Rama the warrior-king. Not a wasted word or thought. Why speculate on something that would be revealed shortly? But she knew it was not that simple: in the brief moments between Hanuman's missive and her query, Rama's mind had undoubtedly raced through a dozen, even a hundred possibilities, and had discarded most. He would not fret or worry – that was never his way – but he was not completely inured to curiosity. He was as eager to find out as she was now.

Well. He was right. They would learn that soon enough. She pulled the sash of her garb into the semblance of a knot. Not as tight as she would have worn it four months earlier. She did it almost without conscious realization, but Rama noticed, and shot a glance in that direction. His eyes looked up and met her own. She felt a shock as something passed through her. Like the jagged, snaking, white-light vajra that crackled out of stormy skies and struck great trees, reducing them to smoking splinters with its power and fury.

No words passed between them. But she knew then that he knew. How? When? How long had he known? Her mind raced with questions, possibilities.

She brushed them all aside and focussed on the moment at hand, slipping on her own war-face, little though it pleased her to wear it.

There was no time to speak about it now. It would have to wait until later. Like most other things that did not concern immediate threat and survival.

They left the chamber together, armed.

The newly risen sun warmed Hanuman's face as he sped over the rooftop of the palace. Leaping across man-made architectural edifices was not as convenient as loping through the deep forest and often he leaped across yards of empty space with no certainty that he would find a reliable paw-hold, but it did not deter him one whit and his utter confidence itself carried him forth without incident. The very first time he had leaped across the fortifications of Lanka, on Rama's mission, he had instinctively learned what most vanars could not comprehend their entire lives: that travelling across man-made structures required an almost exclusive use of one's paws and almost no use of the tail. Vanars generally depended on their tail, accustomed from countless generations of gripping tree trunks and branches with that vital appendage, and most failed to make the transition successfully, or quickly enough. Hanuman had adapted like a fish to water; it had even earned him a new nickname back home to add to the long list: roof-climber.

He made impressive use of his newly adapted skills, racing across the structural rises and dips of the palace rooftops to reach the forecourt mere moments after leaving the presence of his lord and lady. He flashed past a stunned serving girl leaning out of an upper storey window in the princess's palace to gesture to her paramour below, causing her to gasp and drop the marigold she was clutching. He flicked his tail deftly, knocking the falling gendha flower back to her—she clasped it to her breast, thanking him with a quick smile—and continued on his way with barely a pause. A moment later, he hung briefly onto the last highpoint, a flat, open terrace atop which flew the gaily coloured standard of the Kosala nation and Suryavansha Ikshwaku clan, right below the golden sculpture of Surya the sungod, the patron deity and legendary forebear of the Raghuvansha dynasty that looked out upon all Ayodhya. A pair of sentries stationed upon the terrace, clad in the familiar uniformed garb of the Purana Wafadars or PFs as they were colloquially known, raised their arms and faces from their strung bows to wave in his direction; the vanar had become a familiar sight in the days since Rama's triumphant return from Lanka, bounding across rooftops on some urgent errand or another for his lord. He nodded back, flicked his tail and leaped over the low wall of the terrace.

A few more leaps and bounds brought him to ground on the clean-swept street before the vaulting gates of the palace complex. A formidable-looking warrior in an officious-looking PF uniform glared fiercely at Hanuman, his prodigious white beard bristling. He reminded Hanuman of his king Sugreeva, except that where King Sugreeva's features seemed cast in a perpetual expression of sorrow, the Ayodhyan's face was unmistakably martial, fierce and commanding. He looked every bit the legendary martial commander he was.

“I have mentioned to you that you ought not to drop in so suddenly, have I not, vanar?” he said in a booming voice undimmed by years of roaring orders at entire akshohinis of men, horses and elephants. “You continue appearing magically from out of the open sky, one of these days you're likely to find a brace of arrows bristling from your furry backside.”

Hanuman inclined his head respectfully, his voice contrite and sincere: “Begging your pardon, Saprem Senapati Dheeraj Kumar. My lord Rama urged speed.”

At the mention of the official mission the general's demeanour relaxed. “Business?”

Hanuman inclined his head in the direction of the figure approaching steadily down the great expanse of Raghuvansha Avenue. “To intercept a visitor.”

Senapati Dheeraj Kumar’s fierce black eyes glowered at the approaching figure. He barked a few choice orders, sending men scurrying in every direction in an impressive display of well-rehearsed efficiency. In moments, an entire company of quads had formed a defensive formation bristling with lances and swords, barring the approach to the palace. Hanuman glanced with idle interest as the top of the wall bristled with the arrowtips of archers aiming down the avenue. Elephants, kept in readiness just around the corner, moved up from the flanking walls to add their trumpeting warnings and formidable bulk to the defensive position. With the shrewdly designed layout of the access road, walls and gate, the assembled forces could hold off an army for half a day if need be – although, of course, an army or even a sizable armed force would never have gotten past the seven ring walls, moats and other security arrangements that had been instituted by the late Maharaja Dasaratha since the Last Asura Wars, thirty-six years ago. Not for nothing was the city known as A-Yodhya, or The UnDefeated (and UnBesieged).

Hanuman watched Senapati Dheeraj Kumar's PFs settle into their positions, and since vanars could not move their facial muscles in the manner that mortals did to produce expressions of humour, he raised his tail high and wagged it slowly to show amusement at this elaborate and efficient show of strength.

It was wholly unnecessary.

When Hanuman was here, not even an army could get through to Rama. Let alone one solitary man.

Valmiki did not slow his pace when he saw the elephants and archers and foot-soldiers move into the classic defensive positions at the palace gate. They caused him no anxiety. He had been expecting a reception; if it turned out to be hostile, so be it. He had not come to enjoy Ayodhya's hospitality, nor to enjoy casual conversation and hot meals; he had not expected a welcome parade.

He strode on as the people on the street going about their business suddenly grew aware of the hustle and bustle at the palace gates and began to melt away down side streets and into their houses and establishments. Ayodhya had grown warier since his last visit, fourteen years ago. Then, the city had been one great festival ground, a never-ending mela, filled with colour, noise, spectacle, excitement and unbridled trust. Now, he sensed a nervous caution barely concealing a closely sheathed wariness. The people were less frolicsome, the mood no more festive. There was a sense of anticipation, of waiting for something inevitable to come to pass. A shifty suspicion in the way the citizens glanced around as they crossed the avenue or glanced out the windows of their places of business. He watched the avenue empty rapidly, as if in anticipation of a riot, and felt a sadness touch him. The old Ratnakar, bear-killer, poacher, thief and dacoit would have roared with laughter but Rishi Valmiki felt only regret for the long years of inner conflict and external threat that had reduced proud, bold-spirited Ayodhya to this distrustful state.

He maintained his pace until he was within shouting distance of the phalanx that barred his way to the palace gates. Then he slowed to a halt and raised an arm in greeting. He did not need to raise his voice overmuch to be heard: the last echoes of footfalls and slamming doors had faded away leaving a deadly hush that grew heavier until the avenue seemed shrouded in silence. Even the elephants had ceased their trumpeting and contented themselves with scratching their forefeet on the ground, waiting for the command to charge, trample, crush. Arrows bristled, speartips gleamed and a hundred shields shattered sunlight as the soldiers waited in terse silence. Ayodhya did not intend to be caught unawares, today or any day.

“I am Rishi Valmiki. I seek an audience with your king, Maharaja Rama Chandra.”

A bushy white beard bristled as a great head tilted proudly, and a man with a martial bearing and a stentorian voice that would probably have carried across raging battlefields boomed out: “I am Saprem Senapati Dheeraj Kumar. Lay down your weapons and permit yourself to be searched.”

Valmiki resisted the temptation to chuckle. He turned the palms of his raised hands sideways. “I bear no weapons. I come as a friend of your liege. You have no reason to fear me.”

“Ayodhya fears no one. If you are a true friend of our lord, you will have no objection to being searched.” And the general barked out two short, coded words that propelled two quads of spearbearing soldiers forward, moving in on Valmiki from either side. He sensed peripheral movement and turned his head just enough to catch sight of two more quads moving in behind him—they had appeared from two of several concealed sally ports embedded in the high wall that ran the length of the avenue. The four quads—sixteen spear-and-sword-armed soldiers in all—boxed him in and moved closer in a menacing, over-cautious manner that didn't seem at all friendly to him.

He felt the first prickle of irritation. Careful now, old bandit, keep the leash tight on that temper.

“I request you once more,” he said, his voice still level and calm. “Permit me to pass unmolested or send for your Lord Rama. I am amenable to either option. Tell him Sage Valmiki tatha Ratnakar seeks to have words with him in private. Tell him my mission is of utmost urgency and every moment of delay costs Ayodhya dearly.”

The quads boxing him in did not slow. Their methodical goosestepping approach continued unabated, and his temper, held carefully in check, began to fray at the seams.

The response from the Senapati with the proud battle-scarred face and the prodigious beard did not appease him in the least.

“Request denied,” Dheeraj Kumar's voice announced summarily. And then followed with a barked command to his soldiers: “Apprehend and disarm!”

Valmiki sighed openly. He had expected this, but had hoped for better. He briefly weighed the option of peaceably surrendering, permitting himself to be stripped, tied, perhaps thrown into a dungeon awaiting further questioning. He rejected it at once; it would consume precious time. And time was one thing Ayodhya was woefully short of right now.

He opened his palm. The stout staff, loyal companion for hundreds of yojanas, fell to the hard-baked rajmarg with a dull thud. It drew a reaction from the approaching quads, a shiver of anticipation followed immediately by puzzled glances. They had been expecting him to use that very staff as a weapon, to wield it and whirl it wildly in a desperate attempt to keep the surrounding armed force at bay. Not to let it drop unused to the ground. That he had done so made them pause because it could mean only one of two things: Either he was possessed of more formidable weaponry than a mere staff, or he was surrendering himself without a fight.

He decided to clarify the situation.

“For the last time,” he said quietly, with the deathly excess of calm that always preceded his famous bursts of temper. “Will you let me pass as a friend or will you oppose me?”

This time, the Senapati did not even waste breath on a verbal response. He simply ignored the challenge and let his soldiers advance.

Valmiki shook his head once, regretfully.

And then he closed his palm into a fist.

Hanuman spoke quietly to Saprem Senapati Dheeraj Kumar after the visitor’s first words identifying himself and his mission. “My Lord has been made aware of this visitor. He bade me bring him into his presence.” Saprem Senapati Dheeraj Kumar responded curtly, “It shall be so.”

And immediately barked out a response to the visitor demanding that he permit himself to be searched, which he ought to have no objection to if he was indeed a friend of their lord. Hanuman knew the old PF took his job of overseeing security within Ayodhya city limits to be more than a given task; it was his dharma. The past fourteen years had seen Ayodhya tremble on the brink of civil strife more than once, not to mention the innumerable rumours of imminent invasions, attacks, incursions and even threats from formerly friendly neighbouring nations. A lot had changed since the demise of Maharaja Dasaratha and the great upheaval of the Suryavansha Ikshwaku Raghuvansha dynasty in the wake of Rama's departure into exile. The Kosala capitol had always been prosperous and one thing that had not dissipated during this decade and almost-a-half had been its growth of commerce and accumulation of wealth through various means. Ayodhya, always a juicy plum of a picking, had grown juicier and riper in the absence of a strong overlord and due to an apparent family rift. During those difficult years, it had been men such as Dheeraj Kumar, loyalists to the bone, who had maintained the status quo and kept the heart of the nation safe and sound. The Saprem Senapati's demand that the Maharishi permit himself to be searched was not intended as an insult, it was merely a necessary precaution. His stentorian tone was merely that of a supreme commander accustomed to being obeyed without question.

But the visitor had taken it in exactly the ill spirit that Hanuman had anticipated. His terse but still polite demand that he be permitted to see Rama at once lest the delay prove costly to Ayodhya sounded hollow to the vanar's ears. Like the very thing a guilty intruder might say to avoid being searched. He watched approvingly as the Saprem Senapati allowed his quads to approach with extreme caution, and when the errant sage dropped his staff, he assumed that the man was finally surrendering to good sense.

He was wrong.

THREE

Bharat and Shatrugan came up Raghuvansha Avenue at a sweaty gallop. Bharat's re-socketed shoulder joint ached with the dull throbbing pain that he remembered well from the previous two occasions on which he had dislocated the same arm. The effort with which he ignored the pain was just as familiar and easily applied. He slowed his horse as he took in the sight ahead. The avenue was curiously deserted, as was the one they had come by, Harshavardhana. The junction of both arterial raj-margs was bereft even of the vaisya merchants, munshis-for-hire and various court recorders who normally plied a brisk business in official releases, deeds of property ownership and other legal items that Bharat had never felt in the least interested to know more about; that was beyond odd, it was alarming. It usually took nothing short of a major riot to clear the avenue of those particular nuisances, slick oily-haired characters with their disarmingly polite manner and talent for counting – particularly for counting the usurer commissions and exploitative profits they all but stole from the poor, illiterate citizenry who could not negotiate the murky byways of official matters independently. Shatrugan and he reined in their horses as they rounded the final corner and came in sight of the palace gates themselves.

They sized up the situation at first glance. It was fairly obvious.

A man – apparently a rishi from some forest hermitage – stood weaponless and bare-handed a short distance from the palace gates. At least four quads of PFs were converging on him with martial stances that left their intentions in no doubt. Several more fully armed and alert PFs stood ready in the human wall formation devised by Saprem Senapati Dheeraj Kumar, who himself stood before the towering gates, beard bristling in that upturned-face expression that his men secretly referred to as the general's 'this-means-war' look. Bharat had just enough time to note the furry outline of Hanuman beside the general, and then time and the universe stuttered and came to a grinding halt and all known natural laws of the world as he knew it ceased to exist.

“Looks like—” Shatrugan began, and suddenly broke off to exclaim, “Sacred Aditi, Mother of gods!”

The sixteen prime examples of Ayodhya’s final line of defence moved as one man, polished speartips glinting in the morning sunshine as the weapons moved together to fence in the intruder like the jagged rows of teeth of some wild beast closing its mandibles upon a choice item of nourishment. The converging circle of speartips left mere inches of room around the bare torso of the half-naked hermit. If he were to move suddenly, he would find his flesh ripped open in a half-dozen places; move with force and speed, he would be impaled to death. The precision of the four quads and the firm line of the inward pointing spears were impeccable. Only a rank idiot would attempt to resist that deadly circle of spearpoints.

Yet the sadhu moved – nay, he didn’t just move. He whirled!

And whirling, he spun like a human top, perfectly in place.

At the same instant, his bare feet struck the dirt floor of the avenue with powerful, precise force, pushing his body upwards. Later, Bharat thought he might have actually heard the thud of the sadhu's feet striking the ground, so intense was the force of that double-kick.

And like a dust-dervish, he rose, still spinning madly – above the circle of lethal spearpoints!

It was a move so audacious, so impossible, Bharat's breath caught in his chest. Shatrugan's involuntary exclamation mirrored his own silent hitch of awe. What immense bodily control, muscular strength, mindand-body coordination it must take to achieve such a move! It was swift yet graceful, as powerful and sudden as a dancer's step, and no less beautiful to watch.

Shatrugan and he tightened their grip on their reins without being aware of their doing so. Both horses turned their heads to snort in protest.

The brothers felt their hearts leap in their chests. For all their battle experience – and there had not been a year in the past fourteen when relentless blood-battles had not dominated their waking lives – they had never seen this particular move executed. That it was executed by a man who appeared to be nothing more than a half-starved sadhu or rishi only added to their shock and awe.

The rishi rose, spinning, as perfectly straight as a pillar – a few scant inches to any side would mean terrible wounds, dismemberment or death – and reached the apogee of his launch some five feet above the ground. He seemed to hover in mid-air for a brief fraction like a hummingbird working at its nest, then his thin yet tautly muscled legs, gleaming with a dusty film of sweat clearly earned from days of hard walking, shot out like the yawning pincers of a stone crab Bharat had once seen at the moment it closed upon its prey.

At that instant, had the sixteen soldiers simply jerked their weapons upwards or even slashed randomly, they would surely have ended the impossible dance of the rishi. But so swiftly had the man moved, so daring had been his gambit and so unpredictable his action, that all sixteen of them were still staring dully at the space the intruder had occupied only moments earlier. A space that was now devoid of his presence, which meant that they were all staring at one another's startled faces like a circle of maidens come together on a festival only to discover that they were all clad in exactly the same festive garbs. The expression on their weathered young faces was a sight to behold!

Shooting out, the two thin long legs spread like a mallakhamb artist's to stretch beyond the deadly speartips above the wooden shafts of the spears. For a moment seeming to hang suspended at that outstretched angle, the rishi resembled a bird of prey at the instant in which it pounced upon its landlocked prey.

Then, in a follow-through move even more audacious than the earlier actions, Valmiki landed upon the shafts of the spears.

The tight-armed firmness with which the PFs had held out the spears to enclose him in the circle of lethal points now served to support the rishi's not-very-considerable weight. As Bharat watched with growing incredulity, the hafts of the spears dipped downwards even as the soldiers holding them reacted with their own shocked expressions, but in another fraction, the rishi had used the brief contact to propel himself upwards again.

Upwards and outwards.

In a somersault that flowed into a vaulting movement, the sage's athletic form flew over the heads of the men who only moments earlier had seemed certain of entrapping him or ending his life, to land in a half-crouch on Raghuvansha Avenue with a dust-raising thud.

Startled though he too must have been by the suddenness and dexterity of the rishi's actions, Saprem Senapati Dheeraj Kumar had already recovered sufficiently to bark fresh orders at his men. The four quads reacted with a swiftness born of endless drilling and training. They swung their spears overhead as their bodies turned to face outwards – swinging sideways at such close quarters would have caused casualties to each other – and the circle of spears rippled outwards in an impressive display of martial coordination. The deadly points that had hemmed in the intruder only moments ago now pointed outwards and were carried forward to create a rapidly expanding ring as the soldiers ran forward and away from the centre of an imaginary circle. It was a brilliantly devised counter-manoeuvre superbly executed. At the same time the other quads standing by moved in with equally ferocious speed. The outward-expanding and inward-enclosing rows of spearpoints moved towards one another. Valmiki ought to have been caught and impaled between the two lines in that moment.

But Valmiki was no longer in the space between the rows.

The instant he had landed in a half-crouch, he had taken one, two, then a third long step, like a stork preparing for flight, and launched himself once more with the same powerful springing leap like a snake uncoiling to strike, this time to fly upwards and forward above the helmeted heads of the inward-approaching quads. Again, being mortal and subject to the call of gravity, he was forced to touch down — this time doing so upon the helmets of the approaching soldiers! Touching down delicately as a cat in flight, he launched himself yet again, landed on the next row of helmets, then fell forward and somersaulted. Clutching his own ankles, head bowed to touch his own knees, he whirled twice — no, thrice, Bharat noted, for the movement was so quick as to blend seamlessly — in mid-air for another moment, before landing once more with a solid thud on the avenue. Two puffs of dust rose from beneath his feet. Bharat saw the rishi's piercing eyes seek him out and pin him and Shatrugan down momentarily. Before the dust could settle around his feet, he had spun around to face the gates once more and only the rippling muscles of his powerful lean back and sinewy thighs were visible.

This is the man I want teaching my children the arts of war, Bharat thought silently, elated.

“Stop now!” the sage cried out, even as the PFs milled about in confusion, most still unable to see where the enemy had vanished – one of the hazards of closely bunched formations. “I do not wish to spill Ayodhyan blood!”

The only answer from the gates was a bellowed curse. Dheeraj Kumar was not a man to relent to warnings and threats. Nor was he a man to underestimate an enemy once outmanoeuvred. This time, he took no chances. He raised one powerful hirsute arm high above his own head, then dropped it in a practised gesture.

Bharat knew what the gesture meant. Shatrughan and he had stopped far enough away from the gates for that very reason, maintaining a safe distance as protocol demanded. Princes were not excepted from the rigorous routine of tri-weekly defensive drills.

The distance was essential for their own safety. The archers of Ayodhya were deadly accurate but once loosed, arrows could not differentiate between friendly and unfriendly flesh.

From the rooftops on which they had taken up positions even as the first verbal exchanges had begun, the royal archers took aim as a single unit and loosed their first volley.

Bharat winced in anticipation. However acrobatic, swift and lithe the rishi may be, even the most athletic body could hardly dodge a carefully placed rain-pattern of metal tipped Ayodhyan arrows loosed from the finest honed Mithila shortbows. The rishi was a dead man.

Hanuman watched with detached interest as the volley of lethal missiles flew towards the semi-clad, bearded ascetic standing on the avenue. The PFs, alerted by their Senapati's bellowed command, had retreated posthaste several yards, far enough to remove them safely from the arc of fire of the rain-pattern. As the arrows rained down on the avenue, Hanuman's view was partially obstructed by the close-ranked PFs standing before the gates; he couldn't be bothered to shift enough to see more clearly. The intruder had proved himself both foolish and intrepid. The leaping and lunging he had indulged in might have impressed the humans watching, but it was nothing to a vanar. In fact, he resented the vanar-like agility of the man. Clearly, the fourteen years since he had last seen Valmiki fight rakshasa berserkers alongside Rama in the jungles of Janasthana had not been spent in meditation and spiritual contemplation alone – the man was clearly a master of the arts of war. But why not simply stick to the more common mortal methods of warfare? Why indulge in these inhuman acrobatics? It bordered on the obscene to see a hairless straightback (two of many names Hanuman’s people used for humans) contort his body, twirl and somersault like a vanar in the redmist mountains of Kiskindha – even if, Hanuman acknowledged grudgingly, the rishi did execute the manoeuvres with a modicum of talent. Well, now the man could cease resisting and dodging like the furry yoddhas he sought to imitate: faced with a volley such as this one, even a vanar could do little more than chitter in fright...and die.

“SHANESHWARA!” cried a soldier standing beside Hanuman, in a ear-bursting volume that made him turn his head away. Why were humans always so loud? Probably because they rarely passed on one another’s distress calls as vanars and other creatures and birds of the forests did, so felt the need to yell cautions themselves. The man who had shouted probably thought to alert all Ayodhya. Hanuman peered over the head of the PFs before him, trying to see past their armoured shapes.

What he saw almost drew a chitter from his own throat!

Rishi Valmiki stood as before, standing upright and straight-backed on the avenue. Around him lay a scattering of blackstick arrows, the kind favoured by Ayodhyan as well as Mithilan archers due to the profusion of lohitwood in the nearby region. In the rishi's left hand, held at an angle above his body, was a whirling blur. Hanuman frowned, momentarily unable to discern what the object was that could cause such an effect.

Then the rishi's wrist twitched once, then again, and his right hand shot out and grasped hold of something in mid-air, and the whirling blur resolved itself into the thick wooden staff he had been carrying when he first came up the avenue. The length of the staff was pincushioned with black arrows, some two dozen of them at least. They sprouted between the fingers of Valmiki's hands like obscene outgrowths. Hanuman blinked, realizing what had happened in the last moment or three when he had looked away, disinterested.

The rishi had snatched up the staff and twirled it like a protective shield, using it to catch each and every arrow aimed at his torso by the archers on the rooftops. At such a short distance, the archers had found it easy to aim at the intruder's chest and vitals, ignoring the groin and long sinewy legs. The smaller target area and precisely simultaneous loosing by the well-drilled archers meant that Valmiki could accurately judge the trajectory of the volley. Even so, the skill required to block every single arrow was impressive. As Hanuman watched, a tiny bead of blood rose from the webbing between the forefinger and middle finger of the rishi's left hand and dripped down to land in the dust of the avenue. The metal head of an arrow was buried in the body of the staff, its lethally sharpened double edges touching both fingers. Apparently, that was the only injury he had sustained.

Saprem Senapati Dheeraj Kumar cursed and turned back to glance at Hanuman.

“Who is this fool?” demanded the general gruffly.

“An old friend and fighting comrade of our Lord Rama,” Hanuman replied calmly. “He led the outlaws in the jungle where our Lord spent his exile and they fought the rakshasas together for fourteen years.” He felt proud of his ability to speak the mortal tongue as fluently as any Arya human; even the most sociable vanars envied him this fluency.

His eloquence was rewarded with an expression that didn’t often appear on the Senapati’s face.

“And you tell me this now? After I have almost butchered the man outside our palace gates?” Dheeraj Kumar sputtered.

Hanuman shrugged. “He was disobedient. You were following your protocol. In any case, he is still alive despite your best efforts.”

Dheeraj Kumar started to make a choice remark, then quite obviously bit it back. He shook his head, his mane and beard ruffling, then turned back to bark an order. At once, the gate was opened and a passage cleared to let him pass. He stepped outside the gate onto the avenue, Hanuman following in his wake.

Rishi Valmiki watched them approach, the arrow-riddled staff still clutched in both fists. He kept the staff raised at its diagonal angle as they came within easy speaking distance. Hanuman wondered what would happen if the general ordered two simultaneous volleys from different directions; would the rishi be able to catch them with his whirling staff as effectively as before? Or would he resort to some other athletic demonstration of his martial skill? He wished the general had not elicited from him the information about Valmiki being Rama's friend just yet – it might have been interesting to see how long the rishi survived the efforts of Ayodhya's best tactician, and how.

Even though Dheeraj Kumar strode ahead and was quite evidently in charge of the situation, Hanuman sensed the visitor's eyes on him, questing, probing, studying. He had a moment when he almost felt the cool touch of the rishi's mind making contact with his own, then the Senapati was speaking in his typically authoritarian tone and he was never sure if he had simply imagined the sensation or if it had been real.

“Maharishi,” said the Saprem Senapati, “Hanuman here has just informed me that you are an old fighting friend of our Maharaja Rama Chandra from his years in exile.”

Valmiki inclined his head very slightly. “This is true.”

The Senapati used his beefy hands to indicate the dhoti-clad body of the visitor. “And after your not unimpressive demonstration of martial ability, it is quite evident that you are unarmed.” Dheeraj Kumar cleared his throat, “Except, of course, for that stout staff which you put to such excellent use just moments ago. And a body that itself is a lethal weapon of war!”

Valmiki’s nod of acknowledgement was more noticeable this time, as was the flicker of amusement on his beard-shrouded face. “I thank you for the compliments and yes, this observation is also true. I am unarmed.” He added with a distinct note, “As I announced at the very outset.”

The Senapati spread his hirsute arms wide in a welcoming gesture then brought them together in a formal namaskara. “Then it is settled. Maharishi, it is my great pleasure to welcome you to Ayodhya in the name of our king Rama!”

Valmiki glanced briefly at Hanuman with another twitch of amusement, then returned his gaze to the Senapati. “Am I to understand that after attempting – unsuccessfully – to have me skewered by over a dozen spears, then run through by more spearpoints, then fired upon by a volley of arrows aimed to kill rather than merely maim or injure, you now declare a cessation of hostilities and are offering me the hospitality of the palace?” He looked around, as if looking for someone else to confirm these observations – there was nobody near enough, “Just like that?”

Dheeraj Kumar was a direct and forthright man. There was no place in his lexicon for apologies or explanations. “Just so,” he replied in his characteristic no-nonsense way and executed a swift, polite namaskara with just the right inclination of his leonine head and whitened mane to convey dutiful respect. “Please, follow me.”

Rishi Valmiki did not respond at once. He looked at Hanuman and their eyes met in another soul-searching glance tempered by that faintly mocking expression that Hanuman felt sure was more than just the result of the rishi’s old bear-claw scar. Not too far away, an elephant trumpeted impatiently and emptied its bowels – the rank odour drifting downwind caused Hanuman’s nostrils to twitch involuntarily; there were certain things a vanar couldn’t help, no matter how well he learned human customs and language.

He waited for the rishi's response.

FOUR

At last, after what seemed like long minutes of waiting but were in fact mere seconds, Rishi Valmiki nodded and said quietly, "Very well. Lead the way."

Hanuman's reluctant respect for the human grew another tiny notch. The man was not one to hold a grudge, it seemed. Despite the intense hostility with which he had been treated thus far, he was still able to accept the hand of conciliation. It was not a quality to be sniffed at. Vanars were not known for their ability to forgive; it was one of the things Hanuman had come to admire in the human race – one of the very few things, no doubt, but still one that had no counterpart in his own race. The ability to prioritize, to start afresh, to put the past aside and begin anew. To forgive if not forget. Vanars, on the other hand, were more apt to forget than forgive! He nodded at the rishi as the bearded sage lowered his staff and stepped after the senapati.

“I shall lead you to my lord Rama,” Hanuman said. “He has instructed me to bring you to him at—”

His last word was drowned out by an eruption of noise and chaos so sudden it took even his prescient senses by surprise.

Without warning or indication, the avenue rose up and attacked them.

Rama stopped pacing and stood still. Sita frowned, trying to make out what had alerted him but she could neither hear nor sense anything. She thought she heard something from the North when Rama shot her a look and moved to the entrance.

“At the gates!” he said and began running.

She followed close on his heels. Out the sarathi shed where the royal chariots were neatly lined up in rows, past the royal stables where familiar snouts snorted and heads were tossed in brief alarm as their mounts scented their still-unfamiliar odours. She had been saddened to know that almost all the Mithila mounts – elephants as well as horses – that had accompanied her to Ayodhya as part of her wedding trousseau had been stricken down in either one of two epidemics over the period of exile. She had seen several of those beautiful beasts foaled and calved and watched them grow to adulthood; she had known them individually as well as she knew people. After her sisters, she had missed them the most. Past the guards shed which lay unusually empty and that itself was evidence that something was wrong. Past the lotus pool and fountain bordering the towering, seventy feet-high statue of Suryadeva standing at his chariot gripping the reins of his magnificent Kambhoja stallions. The early morning light slanted across the rounded silhouette of the Garhwals, flashing through the tall sala trees that lined the periphery of the inner wall.

And then they were moving through a small army of PFs – mounted and on foot – spearmen and archers, elephant quads and chariot-archer teams, all in defensive formation forming a formidable inner wall of last defence in the unlikely event that any intruder was able to pass through seven heavily guarded gates set in seven unclimbable ring-walls, encircling seven deep and wide moats teeming with deadly predators. They were all facing outwards, as they should, and Rama had to bark terse words of command to alert them: to their credit, they responded with perfect reflexes, swinging aside smartly to allow both Rama and Sita room to pass through. They sprinted through the massed rows upon rows, Sita feeling as if she was approaching the frontline of an army on a battlefield rather than simply exiting her place of residence through the front gate, and then they were at the vaulting iron gates and out through a sally port and on the avenue proper.

It took her only an instant to take in the archers on the rooftops, the quads standing at precise intervals in wave-attack formation, the elephants trumpeting and stamping their feet farther down and up the avenue, two men on horseback about a hundred yards up Raghuvansha just about where it was crossed by Harshavardhana, and in the centre of this tableau, three figures: Hanuman's distinctive furry long-tailed form, the bearded, burly shape of Saprem Senapati Dheeraj Kumar and a long-bearded tapasvi sadhu she assumed was Maharishi Valmiki but would never have recognized on her own.

All three lay on their backs, like straw puppets flung to three corners of a box stage in some festival puppet show. The avenue beneath them was cracked and sharded, jagged ends of rock pointing at upward diagonals. The three prone figures had been separated by three large chunks of earthrock that stood out of the ground, leaving a gaping irregular hole, but there was a network of cracks radiating outwards from the hole itself and numerous pieces and chunks of the avenue lay strewn around. A sizable dustcloud was still wafting across the scene, and the neighing, white-eyed horses and trumpeting elephants indicated that whatever had occurred had only just occurred. All three were already leaning on elbows and peering around through the wafting cloud of dust, which told her they were unharmed, merely thrown off balance and stunned by whatever the event had been.

Her first thought was that some kind of earthquake had just struck – a very odd earthquake that had struck only one area of the avenue.

Her next thought was a memory of the last days in Lanka, after Rama's forces had landed upon the island-kingdom, and the entire island itself had seemed to heave and rise and crack and roar in protest. She recalled how she had trembled with fear, not for herself alone – although she was by no means immune to fear – but for the unborn life she carried within her womb. A shudder passed through her as she recalled the violent power of Ravana's maya sorcery. Surely this could not be his work? Ravana was dead!

Even as she thought this, the avenue heaved again. Her arms shot out instinctively as she backed up, coming up short against the raised shield of a PF who was too shocked himself to mutter an apology. Before her, Rama stood his ground, his dark silhouette a portrait of readiness and composure even as the animals and soldiers all around reacted with unmistakable horror. Prepared as Ayodhyans were for violent combat, they were not prepared for supernatural warfare. Why only Ayodhyans? All Aryas. The Last Asura Wars had broken the back of her own nation's army and sent her father into a radical departure from martial ways, seeking succour in spiritual armament to compensate for the immutable memories of the horrors of war against such a vastly superior and alien force of maya-wielding foes.

The ground roared.

There was no other way to describe it. The sound burst from the jagged yawning abyss that had opened in the centre of the avenue, just before the palace gates, like a bestial cry ripped from the throat of some unseen juggernaut. It filled the air, surely audible for yojanas around, and Sita felt it strike her body like a physical blow. She felt the growing life within her stir and respond in distress – or was it anger? – to the solid blow of the sound.

Smoke and light belched out of the crack.

The gates, ten-yard-high intricate structures of corrugated iron and brass, buckled and crumpled like straw in a child's fist.

The ground shuddered and swayed, and a wave of nausea rose in Sita's gullet, forced down by stubborn will.

I must stand! I must not lose my footing.

It took every gram of effort and will to remain standing, firm and seemingly unafraid, beside her consort royale.

It was not sufficient merely to be a queen. One had to act like one.

The three prone figures struggled to stand upright. To her dismay, none succeeded. Even Hanuman, whom she believed capable of virtually anything he put his mind to, seemed to be unable to maintain his balance. After all, the broken ground beneath them was at the epicentre of the disturbance. The vile effulgence belching forth from the jagged hole almost concealed them from view. The intensity of the sound, terrible at several yards' distance where Sita stood, must have been unbearable to their ears. Even so, they fought to rise upright, failed, and somehow managed to half-crawl, half-drag themselves a yard or two back before collapsing once more as a fresh wave of sound and vibration assaulted the avenue.

This time the sound emerging from the belly of the earth was less a roar than a scream. A banshee wail of anguish and anger exploding from the lungs of the unseen force. It throbbed through the skin and nerves to shake the bones of Sita's body, ringing in her ears like the cry of a dying beast.

Unable to help herself, Sita threw her hands to her ears, covering them. She no longer cared if she seemed weak. She was still standing, was she not? It was the sound she could not bear. It reminded her of a being in terrible agony...not just a being...a child being birthed. And once the insane thought occurred to her assaulted mind, she could not shake it off.

“What is it?” she cried to Rama, shouting to be heard above the keening wail. All across the avenue, horses were rearing and screaming in terror. Elephants stamping their feet and tossing their mahouts, some stampeding and crushing their quads. She saw an archer atop a roof drop his precious shortbow and clap his hands to his ears in agony, bending over so far, he lost his balance and tumbled from the roof to fall with a sickening thud on the avenue below where he lay in a motionless heap; even through the cloud of dust that was filling the air, she could see the bright crimson trickle of blood seeping from his ears. Her own eardrums felt as if they had already burst and she half expected to feel the wetness of her own blood on her hands at any moment.

Rama did not answer. He stood his ground grimly. Glancing around, she saw that he was the only one. Every other person and animal on the avenue was reeling from the continued assault of sound and quake. Through gaps in the billowing cloud of stinking fumes, she could see Bharat and Shatrugan, dismounted and attempting to calm their panicked horses while shaking their heads in reaction to the terrible sound themselves.

As suddenly as it had begun, the sound ceased.

The silence that fell in the wake of the sound was almost as shocking as the sound itself had been.

Sita slowly removed her palms from her ears – she glanced briefly at them and was surprised that they were not smeared with blood – and looked around. Shaken, the royal guard was trying to maintain its composure. Yet the horror on their collective faces was nakedly visible. Whatever their considerable training had prepared them to face, this was not included in it.

“What was it?” she asked again, touching Rama’s shoulder with her hand. Dust had settled already on his naked body and she tasted and felt the grittiness on her own face as the smoky effulgence from the crack in the avenue settled.

Rama still did not speak. But in the next few moments, her question was answered anyway.

With the prescient coordination born of long years of fighting side by side, Bharat and Shatrugan dropped the reins of their horses and sprinted forward as one man. Whatever was happening outside the palace gates, it was not over. They sensed that the closer they were to their home ground, the more useful their weapons and skill would be. They had had enough of being bystanders. It was time to get close to the action.

Hanuman rose to his feet, still feeling the echoes of that horrendous wailing in the recesses of his mind. He snorted, clearing his nostrils of the dust and grime that hung in the air like a fog. To his right, he glimpsed the hazy form of the senapati also gaining his feet. To his left, he was not surprised to see the rishi was already afoot and holding his stout staff once more in both hands, like a boatman an oar.

Rishi Valmiki had not expected the first assault. But he was prepared for the second. Unlike all the others gathered on the avenue, he alone knew the cause of the eruption from the ground and the source of the terrible wailing. He sent a silent prayer of thanks to almighty Brahma that he had arrived in time. Ayodhya had no notion of the evil that was about to assault it from within and without, and the proud city-state's legendary defences were about to be tested to their limits – and beyond. Even through the billowing mass of subterranean dust that clouded the avenue, he could still discern the ramrod-straight form of Rama, standing before the crumpled gates, Sita at his side. He needed to speak with Rama urgently, but he knew that the second wave would begin at any moment, and that needed to be dealt with first.

He was ready with his staff when it came.

A blast of heat roared up from the jagged rent in the ground. Like the blow-heat of a furnace stoked with a giant pair of bellows, it seared his skin and instantly caused sweat to pop out of his pores. Yet he stood his ground, knowing that if he did not deal with this threat it would grow in strength and intensity. His only hope – Ayodhya’s only hope – was to strike first and fast and hit as hard as possible.

Accompanying the heat came a tongue of orange-red flame that resembled nothing so much as a war banner blown on a strong wind. Except that this banner streamed up from the ground rather than sideways on the end of a raised lance. Yet it was no less a war banner, and even though the only emblem it bore was naked flame, it trumpeted the enemy’s arrival just as effectively.

He had already begun to chant the mahamantras softly as he had stood up. Now, he raised his voice, projecting it as far outward and above the relentless roar of the subterranean fire-banner blazing upwards, so that every PF, quad leader, elephant, horse and prince upon the avenue could hear it. The purpose of the mahamantras would be served even by silent recitation but by making the recitation heard, they would also rouse the morale of the Ayodhyans. And the battle that lay ahead – indeed, the war itself – would depend as much on will and stubborn determination, as on strength and martial skill.

The smriti shlokas – literally secret verses – expanded into the air, through the space above the jagged crack in the avenue. At the point where the sound of their recitation, performed with a precise diction, enunciation and pace, collided with the sound and heat of the upwards-blazing tongue of flame, a curious effect occurred.

The fire actually shrivelled.

And shrank.

As if the blazing tongue of flame, roaring fiercely several yards high into the air, like a pillar of fire soaring up from the cracked earth, had been doused by a powerful quantity of icy cold water.

Valmiki raised his voice, using the considerable power of his lungs, strengthened from years of recitation and argument before great gatherings of rishis at the annual convocations and debates in the forest ashrams, to a pitch and level that intensified the shakti of the mahamantras even further.

For a moment, the Sanskrit alphabets became visible in mid-air, outlined by the asura fire. They hung in the air like solid things carved out of stone, then turned to smoke and evaporated, dousing the flame – absorbing it, then transforming it into the universal essence of life, brahman shakti. The motes glittered blue before fading into ether.

The fire-banner fluttered once, twice, made a final attempt to blaze through the stream of Sanskrit scripture...then flickered, flagged and died.

Valmiki ended the final shloka and touched the staff to his forehead, inclining his head in gratitude to Brahma-dev for this small but immensely pleasurable success.

At least he had shown the enemy that someone stood ready to do battle on their own terms.

He glanced across the cracked abyss and saw Rama standing on the other side. The king of Ayodhya had moved closer to the edge during Valmiki's recitation and now they both stood on opposite sides of the hole. In his peripheral vision, the rishi saw Hanuman move up closer from one side, and the senapati take up the fourth position. Excellent. Now all four cardinal directions were manned by determined warriors. And as if they instinctively sensed the need to man the opening in the earth, Bharat and Shatrugan moved in to add their own considerable presence to the circle while the foremost quads moved in as well, no doubt on a signal from the intrepid senapati. Rishi Valmiki smiled grimly. Instead of emerging stealthily and rampaging through the citizen-filled streets before the alarm was raised, the enemy would now find a formidable ring of defence already waiting to greet him the instant he showed himself.

Almost as if he knew this, the creature from beneath the ground roared his fury. Valmiki saw the eyes of the PFs closest to him widen to show their whites as the sound echoed through the length and breadth of the deserted avenue.

Then the roar broke off. And something terrible emerged from the crack in the ground. Something that had lain festering beneath the surface of Ayodhya for fourteen long years, biding its time, and which now burst free in a devastating explosion of asura maya.

FIVE

“RAMA!”

Dustclouds boiled high above the rooftops of the avenue, obscuring the sky; foul gases reeked; chaos reigned at the palace gates of Ayodhya. Immaculately behaved horses threw off their riders, impeccably trained elephants trampled their mahouts, Purana Wafadars drilled to face up to any situation including a full-scale invasion milled about in confusion, and even Saprem Senapati Dheeraj Kumar stared in mute fury, his raised fists clenched. Sita controlled the urge to gasp, forcing herself to remain motionless and expressionless. Like Rama. He stood like a pillar in a raging ocean, the only force of still calm among the thousands of armed warriors and armoured beasts standing before the inner sanctum of the greatest capital in the seven-nation Arya world.

The thing that had emerged from the broken ground of the avenue was like nothing she had ever seen before.

It had once been a rakshasa, that was clear. Neither less nor more grotesque, malformed, hideously shaped and barbed at unexpected places, like a machine built for war rather than for mere living. It was huge. The Seer's Eye Tower silhouetted against the morning sun stood mere yards behind it, and its head reached almost as high as the top of the tower. Its strength was evident in the way it flexed its bullish muscles as it freed its wool-ringed feet from its subterranean exit to clump with a bone-shuddering thud upon the avenue. But she had seen rakshasas more hideous and menacing during the long years of exile, while battling them in the forests of Janasthana, and later as an unwilling guest of the Lord of Lanka. This one was no ordinary rakshasa, that was self-evident, but neither was he the fiercest or the most frightening one she had ever seen.

No. What was frightening was the fact that he was here. In Ayodhya! That he had emerged from beneath its roads, like a chick cracking its shell and emerging cheeping into sunlight. Within spitting distance of the most prized goal of any rakshasa: the very seat of the Kosala nation. And if he was here, how many more were there laying in wait beneath the avenue? Was this a full-scale invasion? Were giant rakshasas like this one bursting out of the ground all over the city – or the kingdom? It was a thought too terrifying to contemplate.

Almost as if reading her mind, Rama spoke beside her.

“He is alone,” he said.

At once a quiver of relief flooded her. She felt her parched gullet push down a blob of saliva, her knees unlock and tremble once – just once – before she brought herself under control.

“Yes,” she said calmly, as if she had known that all along.

Rama said nothing. For which she was grateful. Her stoic stance was predicated on thinking and feeling and saying as little as possible: merely remaining in a state of warrior-like preparedness, ready to act.

“RAMA!”

The voice boomed across the avenue, surely audible across the city itself.

She felt its bass vibrations grab hold of and shake the very ribcage encasing her heart, penetrating within that thudding organ itself; like the time when she was a very little girl, no more than a toddler and had climbed into a giant drum one day, not realizing the drum was soon to be struck by a musician wielding an enormous baton. The ensuing boom and the vibrating power of that first strike of that drum – the drummer had instantly sensed something was amiss from the very sound his instrument gave off, and she was immediately extricated – had left her deaf the rest of that day, and its memory imprinted upon her senses forever. The sound of this rakshasa’s voice was no less bone-shaking, and filled with a peculiar teeth-grating, nerve-fraying quality. It was like glass grinding against glass, but elevated to the pitch of a scream.

And yet it was bass enough to make the very ground vibrate beneath her feet.

“RAMA!”

A third time, and this time the elephants and horses all screamed and lowed and rampaged in terror, for the voice was undercut with a sound like bones snapping and blood gurgling from arterial wounds.

“I am here, Kala-Nemi,” Rama said quietly, in a voice that seemed all too human and insignificant after the grinding boom of that terrible roar. He stepped out towards the crumpled gates, the PFs parting at his curt gesture. The senapati remained standing where he had been, raised fists still clenched, brown face red with impotent anger at this ultimate trespass

– A rakshasa! Within Ayodhya! At the royal gates! Impossible!

Rama touched him lightly in passing and the general subsided, turning aside to let Rama pass. Sita saw the expression on his face and the fear that was squirming in her gut increased its writhing. She had no name for that expression, and no way to describe how the senapati must be feeling at this moment.

Rama looked tiny standing before the towering form. His crow-black head barely reached the rakshasa's ankle – although it more exactly resembled a hoof, with woolly fur ringing it at the top. Yet somehow he managed to address the asura without craning his neck or using his hand to mask the sun which was shining directly into his eyes. That was Rama, never yielding the advantage no matter what the circumstances or how uneven the odds.

“Hah!”

The rakshasa's voice boomed with a trace of satisfaction that grated just as much as the earlier plaintive howls. It went on with a tone that grew harsher and more unbearable to withstand even though the emotions it expressed were what would have passed for pleased or smugly contented among humans.

“I have waited a long time for this day. Yet never doubted it would come at last.”

“Did you have a pleasant stay in your subterranean prison?” Rama's voice was as casually indifferent as it was quiet, yet so tense was the silence in the avenue that everyone heard his every word.

Sita saw the rakshasa twist his head to gaze down. It seemed to cause Kala-Nemi more discomfort to look down at the little figure on the street than it took Rama to stare up at him. The rakshasa squinted, finally focussing on Rama before replying.

“PRISON? It was a place of rest, no more.”

“Really?” Rama asked pleasantly. “I thought the lowermost level of Naraka was one place where rest was quite unlikely. In fact, that realm exists purely for the infliction of the most severe dands, what you call punishment, and the beings that are in charge of that realm are very creative and ingenious in the methods by which they inflict that punishment. Or so I’ve been told.”

Kala-Nemi swung from side to side, snorted and threw his head back, hands on hips. His laughter was a jagged effusion of sharp-edged sounds that penetrated Sita’s ears painfully. She realized she was starting to feel more than a little nauseated. She forced herself to stand her ground. She could not display any sign of weakness. Not now. Not ever.

“I know what you wish to do. You wish to enrage me, to make me fight.”

Rama did not speak, his silence eloquent.

“The time for fighting will come shortly. But first I have things to say, a message to communicate to you...from my nephew.”

His nephew? Sita wracked her memory. She recalled Rama and Lakshman’s recounting of Kala-Nemi’s intrusion into Ayodhya fourteen years earlier, disguised as the Brahmarishi Vishwamitra in a futile attempt to attack the royal family and prevent Vishwamitra from achieving his goal. The incident had seemed a minor one at that time, important only for what it portended – Ravana’s evident willingness to bring hostility to his enemy’s doorstep and provoke an all-out war – rather than significant in itself. All Kala-Nemi had achieved at the time was a little subterfuge, sneaking past the outer-wall guards and making it as far as the gates of the palace – the very gates that now hung crooked and twisted near her now – before the two brahmarishis Vishwamitra and Guru Vashishta despatched him by the use of their brahman shakti down to the nethermost level of Naraka, the special hellish realm reserved for the worst offenders against humanity. But who was Kala-Nemi’s nephew? She faltered for a moment, and the strain of trying to remember caused her nausea to return. Then it came to her with a rush of blood that only added to her dizziness...

“You remember my nephew Ravana.”

The mention of that name, especially from the swollen lips of a beast as intimidating as this one, sent a visible reaction through the massed troops and onlookers. Even dead, Ravana still commanded fear and respect among mortals everywhere, a bedtime ogre conjured up by mothers across the Arya nations to put reluctant children to bed. Sleep, child, or Ravana will come and take you away as he took Sita from Rama!

“You mean your dead nephew?” Rama replied insouciantly. “We burned his remains on the funeral pyre of his home, the city that once used to be Lanka.”

Kala-Nemi chuckled. The sound was as unlike laughter or amusement as a lion coughing.

“Death is only a release. The beginning of a new level of existence. My nephew has finally achieved moksha from this eternal cycle of birth and rebirth to resume his rightful place in Swargaloka. And he achieved it by your hands, as he had desired all along.”

Moksha? Swargaloka? What was this beast talking about? How could a rakshasa like Ravana with millennia of the vilest crimes imaginable – and many unimaginable too – have acquired sufficient karma to attain salvation from the cycle of birth and rebirth? It was unthinkable. And Swargaloka? The realm of the devas themselves? What place could he have there? She wondered why Rama did not say these obvious things – why he did not toss them scornfully back at Kala-Nemi. She sensed that all those listening were also wondering the same things. Why was Rama so silent? Why was he not arguing the point? Why was he tacitly acceding to the rakshasa’s line of thought? Or was he merely seeking to say as little as possible, to avoid rising to the rakshasa’s bait? With Rama, it was hard to tell, even for her.

“If that is so,” Rama said, and his tone emphasized the If, “he is gone from Prithvi-loka forever, never to return. And this mortal realm is the better for his absence.”

The dustcloud churned up by Kala-Nemi’s rising had mostly settled, leaving a better view of the environs of the palace. Sita noticed a flurry of movement at the far end of the avenue. She saw Bharat and Shatrugan, who had retreated back once they had regained their feet, turn to take cognizance of the commotion. A pair of riders approached, slowed cautiously while still several dozen yards away, and dismounted. From the flags their horses bore, Sita knew they were alarm-riders. Their horses carried long staffs imbedded in secure pockets on the sides of the saddle-rigs; during an emergency, the riders had only to slip the appropriate flag onto the top of the staff and ride through the city calling out the alarm. Right now, the flags on both their alarm-staffs were red, the highest level of emergency. She saw Bharat and Shatrugan confer with the riders and even at this distance it was obvious that the message being communicated was of an urgent nature. She swallowed dryly, dreading what it might be: more rakshasas? Another supernatural breakout? But Rama had said Kala-Nemi was alone, and he had seemed to know what was talking about; Rama usually did.

She had no time to muse further. Kala-Nemi's dialogue with Rama had acquired an urgency of its own.

“That is where you are mistaken, boy! Ravana's departure from this mortal realm was the crux of his whole plan. Do you not recall the battle of Lanka? How you and your valiant vanar and rksa hordes struggled against our proud rakshasa yoddhas? At what high cost you finally achieved some semblance of victory? And in that last encounter, when you came face to face with my nephew himself, how shockingly easy it was to kill him? Did you not wonder how that final conflict, instead of being a meeting of champions that would make the heavens and earth tremble and be recorded in the annals of war eternally, ended without so much as a whimper? Could Ravana, the challenger and victor of the devas themselves, invader of the highest realms, ruler of the three worlds, conqueror of everything he set his eyes on, the greatest mahayoddha who ever lived, succumb so easily?”

Again, that telling silence from Rama. As if he too had thought the very things Kala-Nemi was speaking of and knew the truth of those words. Even Sita, though she had not witnessed any part of the war of Lanka herself, recalled her wonder at learning how quickly and simply Ravana had been despatched. She knew that while none of the others had ever spoken this doubt aloud, it had been felt and its awareness underscored every description of the events of the war she had heard.

After narrating every detail with great gusto and relish, each narrator seemed to pause in confusion and blurt out abruptly the puzzling manner in which Rama had simply...killed Ravana. It had seemed too good to be true and everyone had thought it, if not said it: and now Kala-Nemi was saying that it was so.

Rama was silent so long this time, she began to think he would not reply at all. Between the giant intruder's woolly feet, she glimpsed Shatrugan and Bharat mount the horses of the alarm-riders and ride back up the avenue – towards the outer gates. The riders themselves remained behind, no doubt left to convey their message to others, and gawked nervously up at the giant rakshasa.

When Rama spoke at last, it was in a voice so quiet, she almost missed his words.

“What does the how or why matter now, rakshasa? He is gone. That is all that matters.”

There followed a long moment of silence, in which Sita thought she could hear a faint rumbling somewhere in the distance. The sky was clear and it was nowhere near the monsoon season. That could only mean.... She did not want to think what it meant. Not now. Not just yet. There was enough to deal with already: all 300 feet high of him, reeking up the air.

Kala-Nemi laughed. Soldiers jerked their heads involuntarily, as the glass-grinding awfulness of the sound grated inside their heads.

The rakshasa drew himself up, raising his head and straightening his slightly bent-over torso to its full height. Sita saw with startled wonder that her earlier estimation had been wrong; he was actually taller than the Seer's Eye – by a good two or three yards. And far wider around. She couldn't bear to wonder what would happen if he simply began rampaging and crushing homes and buildings – and palaces – at will. Surely Rama and Hanuman and the others would find a way to bring him down. But he would destroy a good part of the city and cause considerable casualties – innocent civilian casualties – before that happened. She did not even want to estimate how many he could kill or how much destruction he could cause in that time. This is really real now, she thought, her jaw tightening with the inner steeling that always came just before a battle or life-threatening circumstance. Death is at our threshold once again, and nothing has changed since our years of exile.

Except that it had, of course. And it was worse this time. For this was no wild, uncharted jungle or even a land of rakshasas. It was Ayodhya, beautiful Ayodhya. Home. And it had been invaded.

Then Kala-Nemi spoke again. And she realized that even in her darkest dreams she had had no notion of just how bad it really was, and how much worse it was about to get.

The rakshasa's words boomed out louder and harsher than before. Loud enough to be easily heard across the city. Sita had a sudden image of children burying little faces in their mothers' laps as they cringed at the ear-hurting sound of Kala-Nemi's voice, men standing in the aangans of their houses with weapons in their hands, sweating thinly and wondering what evil day had come to their proud land.

Kala-Nemi's voice boomed out across Ayodhya like a trumpeted proclamation of war:

“Boy! Everything you thought you knew until now is a lie. The war of Lanka, the battles preceding it... every single thing that happened up to this day...was all part of the epic vengeance of Ravana. The real battle has just begun. And this time the final victory will not be yours. It will be Ravana's. Today you shall see the culmination of his great strategy, a battle plan put into place decades ago whose intricate details and ramifications you cannot even begin to understand... Boy! Compared to the ancient wisdom of the lord of rakshasas, you are still a boy. And always will be!”

Kala-Nemi roared with laughter. And with every exhalation of putrid breath, a cloud of greenish black particles were released into the air from his bruise-purple maw to rise high into the air like a swarm of insects; they dispersed across the rooftops with malicious speed, spreading their foul asura pestilence among the people of Ayodhya.

SIX

Hanuman could take it no more.

As the rakshasa finished delivering his bombastic speech, he moved into action. Focussing his attention in the method that had already become a daily ritual, he recited the name of Rama in his mind, unlocking the brahman shakti within his being and willed the cells of his body to expand. The twisted metal of the palace gates, the soldiers around him, the very avenue itself, all grew rapidly smaller in size as he grew larger. He stepped forward to avoid harming any of the Ayodhyans, rising so rapidly that it felt as if he had leaped up into the air and was reaching for the sky. He heard the shouts and exclamations from around him – below him now, and falling rapidly farther below – grow louder as he increased in size faster than ever before. The war of Lanka had pressed him to his limits, challenging him in every way, yet that very challenge had also given him a certain proficiency with the use of his newfound abilities. While he was far from a master of his new shakti, he had felt himself improving in performance and control with every passing day, not neglecting his daily training regimen even though the war was over and no obvious hostility visible on the horizon. It was something he had learned from Rama himself: the work of a warrior is preparing for war; the better prepared you are for it, the less likely you are to wage war.

He was prepared.

“Kala-Nemi!” he roared, his own voice gruff and powerful enough to roll in deafening waves across the city, no less formidable than the rakshasa’s nerve-grating vocal effusions. “I am Hanuman, servant of our Lord Rama. Face me and fight!”

The rakshasa turned his body to face him, and Hanuman was gratified to see that the beast was forced to raise his line of vision slightly. Hanuman had controlled his expansion to make himself only a little larger and taller than Kala-Nemi, just enough to be a formidable opponent but not so much that he bore an unfair advantage. If he had wished, he knew he could fight Kala-Nemi even in his own natural size but he recognized the grave risk at hand and knew that a prolonged battle would take a terrible toll on the innocent lives of Ayodhya's citizens. The only way to end this quickly was to out-match the rakshasa and attempt to take the fight away from the city.

He was more than a little surprised when Kala-Nemi chuckled. The sound gnawed at Hanuman's inner ear like a prickly insect squirming inside.

“Vanar.”

The rakshasa made that simple appellation sound like a humiliating insult. Had he said “monkey” – the offensive name all vanars could tolerate being called – he could not have irked Hanuman more.

“There will be no fight here,” Kala-Nemi said. “Neither single combat nor all-out attack. Would that I could, for it would give me the greatest pleasure imaginable to tear this city apart with my paws and talons. But my nephew's plan was set in stone and he ensured that no deviation was possible.”

Kala-Nemi stepped forward, putting Hanuman on full alert. The rakshasa did not make any move to attack or harm him in any way, merely moved in closer. Now they stood near enough that Hanuman could smell the stench of the rakshasa's rotten breath. It stank like baboon meat ten days-old in the summer sun, so putrid and rancid that even the crows would no longer pick at it. Except that it was not baboon meat, was it? It was...human flesh? Yes. Hanuman stood his ground without blinking or wincing, and tightened his arms and back muscles in readiness for the first blow. The rakshasa's eyes looked up at Hanuman with a malevolent glint – Hanuman was shocked to see things actually squirming and writhing around inside the sockets of those eyes! He had not known that any living being could harbour parasites within its eyes, yet apparently Kala-Nemi could and did. He tried not to look too closely at the things, yet could not help noting that they resembled millipedes with hundreds of tiny, bony thorns rather than hairy cilia. Blood oozed from their tracks as they writhed and moved inside the rakshasa's organs of vision, like bloodshot veins in a drunken man's eyes.

“You dearly wish to fight me, do you not? I wish I could grant you your desire, vanar. But it is not to be.”

Kala-Nemi exuded a grinding sigh of regret and began to turn away.

Hanuman made the first move. He reached out and put a heavy palm on the rakshasa's shoulder, stopping him, “Coward! You will fight me whether you will it or not!”

Kala-Nemi chuckled again and glass shards pierced Hanuman's hearing, as he said laconically without turning around: “I think not.”

The rakshasa burst open like an overripe watermelon.

Lakshman reacted despite himself. Of all the moves he had expected Kala-Nemi to make, this was not one of them; this was not even 100 on the list! He had expected the rakshasa to use his gigantic size to rampage through the city, perhaps knock down the tower, assault the palace, create chaos and wreak havoc. Which was why, when Hanuman had expanded himself and gone to confront the beast, he had secretly breathed a sigh of relief. Almost a decade and a half of battling rakshasas had taught Lakshman one thing: however fierce, huge or powerful, all rakshasas could be killed. But if they could be killed quickly, so much the better. If nothing else, Hanuman could take the fight outside Ayodhya, reducing the collateral damage to the city and its denizens.

But this? This was bizarre!

He watched, transfixed, as the giant burst into a million tiny fragments like an overripe musk melon struck by a heavy metal-head arrow, the kind that was designed to punch through body armour. No. Not fragments. Tiny globular bits, like miniscule black spores. There were patches of mottled colour rippling through the bunched spores, as if reflecting the organic colours of the rakshasa biology of which they were part only instants ago. The entire mass hovered in the air like a swarm of hornets, still more or less occupying the same overall shape as the rakshasa in his flesh-and-blood form – if he was ever in flesh-and-blood form, Lakshman thought with a sudden insight. They swarmed and buzzed and swayed a little to one side then another, as if buffeted by an invisible wind. The top section, still coherent enough to resemble a grotesque facsimile of Kala-Nemi's bestial features, resolved into a semblance of a grin.

“How would you fight this, vanar?” asked the thing.

Lakshman watched Hanuman reach out and try to take hold of the thing’s shoulder. It was like trying to grasp a swarm of hovering insects. The swarm slipped through the vanar’s fingers, ruffling the fur on the back of his paws, and flew around the vanar’s hand, the ‘shoulder’ now detached and hovering apart from the body itself. Then, as Hanuman retracted his paw in puzzled astonishment, that part of the swarm flew back to join the main body once more, mingling with the rest of the mass.

“What are you?” Hanuman asked with a voice filled with outrage. The vanars were not known for their love for rakshasas; least of all the more grotesque and unnatural sub-species of the race. Lakshman could imagine his friend’s horror at touching this perversion of nature.

“I am what Ravana intended me to be. What the brahmarishis Vishwamitra and Vashishta condemned me to become. And what I had to turn into in order to return to this mortal realm. It was the only way – and it suited Ravana’s plans perfectly. For you see, vanar, while your great and mighty mortal master’s city-kingdom is so stupidly proud of its defences –

Ayodhya the Unconquerable! – the fools fail to realize that often the biggest threat comes not from armies or intruders or weapons of metal and steel. There are other ways to wreak havoc and take lives. From the very day I came here to Ayodhya fourteen years ago, my real mission was never merely to infiltrate and assassinate! I would hardly have attempted to walk in through the front gates had that been the case. Nay! My true purpose was to be interred here, not physically beneath the city but in that sector of eternal brahman that corresponds to this city's physical location. For every hour of these past fourteen years I have festered and fulminated, awaiting this day. And now, what you see before you is not Kala-Nemi the rakshasa who once lived. He is long gone. Only his aatma powers this thing you behold. And this thing is the most potent weapon ever to strike at the heart of Ayodhya. A weapon devised from nature itself, corrupted and befouled. A weapon of pure biological evil. For remember this always, Ayodhya: Evil never dies. It only changes form and shape!”

And with that final missive delivered, the thing that resembled Kala-Nemi roared with laughter. The swarm that still resembled him lost its coherence and disintegrated, flying upwards with a roaring rush to travel high up into the air above the city. It hung there momentarily like a giant black monsoon cloud seething and swarming. And then, as Lakshman stared up in mute horror, the cloud dispersed itself, flowing down like individual fingers and streams in a half dozen different directions, each stream splitting further and further into branches and forks, moving with malicious supernatural speed, until a network of spores descended towards every corner of the city, carrying Devi alone knew what foul asura pestilence.

Bharat and Shatrugan heard the last words of Kala-Nemi booming across the city and felt the malevolence in that final message. They glanced back briefly over their shoulders as they rode down the last stretch to their destination, and glimpsed the dark cloud of swarming insectile things bifurcating and snaking out across the city, descending with clearly malicious intent. But the task they were undertaking was as vital, and they exchanged grim glances and turned forward again, slowing to a halt and then dismounting in a single liquid move, barely acknowledging the salutes of the white-faced PF massed facing the barred gates, racing up the carved stone steps to the ramparts of the third gate.... The alarm-riders had been clear in their message – this was a crisis of the highest level possible. Every instant counted.

Even though this was in fact the main gate of the city proper, it was actually the third such gate – a triple protection designed to fox besiegers and thwart even the most determined and persistent enemy assault. Beyond it lay two equally sturdy and solid ‘front gates’ – all three built to look exactly alike – separated by the deepest and most perilous moats filled with deadly predators, and with channels ready in which to pour down barrels of oil that could be set ablaze to further deter those foolhardy enough to attempt to breach the moats. The slender bridges that spanned the outermost two moats were designed in such a manner that a single command could result in their being wrecked completely, leaving no means for any invading force to ride or march to this true front gate, the third. It was a foolproof system, and Bharat knew that no army would ever dare to attempt to breach it, which was the whole point of all this excess and duplication of defences: to make would-be invaders decide it was not worth the effort and potential cost of life. That was why Ayodhya was literally in Sanskrit A-yodha, the city that could not be fought (or defeated or besieged or conquered, etc).

But today was the day that they had all been told would never come.

As Bharat reached the top of the ramparts and Shatrugan and he made their way through the thick throng of clearly shaken yet bravely disciplined gatewatch soldiers, he sought out the familiar clean-cut features of Senapati Drishti Kumar. The son of the Saprem Senapati, Drishti Kumar had some things in common with his father, yet was very much his own man. He turned with a curt snap of his neck to acknowledge and greet Bharat as he approached. The lack of expression on his handsome features could not mask the sickly cast that lay beneath.

“Yuvraj Bharat, Yuvraj Shatrugan,” he said crisply, saluting. “I apologize for not coming in person to fetch you. I felt this warranted my presence here, in the event...” His voice trailed off. Some things were hard enough to acknowledge or accept, let alone say aloud.

Bharat glanced again at his brother’s beefy muscled features, and saw a nerve twitch in Shatrugan’s cheek. He clapped a hand on his shoulder and nodded so discreetly only Shatrugan understood its meaning. Hold fast. We shall get through this together as we have all else. His own shoulder ached still with the memory of the dislocation, but there was no time for personal pain. He ignored his discomfort and stepped into the space cleared by soldiers who moved aside briskly to allow Shatrugan and him to have a clear view.

They looked out across the second moat, over the second gate, then across the first moat and gate, to the place where the raj-marg that cut through Sarayu Valley broadened into a field-wide space large enough to accommodate the regular throng of Kosalans who visited Ayodhya routinely for commerce, trade, politics or personal reasons.

Instead of the usual crowd of goatherds, villagers with carts piled high with produce, merchants in richly-tapestried covered dolis, shyly veiled women or boisterous young men come to seek gainful employment or to make their fortune in the fabled capitol, that daily unending variety of human life that flowed like the Sarayu itself through the greatest Arya city-state, there was a sight he had never imagined he would behold even in his wildest dreams.

Not here. Not at the gates of Ayodhya.

Yet there it was. Plain as life. Real as the smooth sun-warmed stone parapet on which he placed his hand, gazing in disbelief.

An army stood outside Ayodhya, ready to invade.

SEVEN

Of all those on the avenue, Valmiki was the only one prepared for KalaNemi's audacious move. The only one who had expected something along these lines to occur. The only one who had known before the sun rose this morning that Ayodhya would be facing a crisis of great magnitude this very day, and that before the day was ended there might not be an Ayodhya left to speak of; not the Ayodhya of yore at least. He had known these things for some time now and had prepared for them. Had the unnecessary fracas at the gate not delayed him, he would have explained what was happening and why to Rama himself, and perhaps given the city a little time to better prepare itself. But now there was no time to dwell on what might-have-been could-have-been should-have-been. There was only the here and now. And in the here and now, Kala-Nemi had disintegrated his body into crores of tiny insectile pustules or spores that were speeding across the sky to penetrate deep into the recesses of Ayodhya's streets and houses to infect as many Ayodhyans as possible. Under natural circumstances, had an infection this virulent struck even a fraction of the populace, it would spread like wildfire, decimating the citizenry; in this case, so effective was the virus's pollination method that it would strike down easily half the population in the first few hours, and within the day, the majority of Ayodhya's innocent denizens would lie dead, severely ill or dying.

And that, of course, was only the first step in Ravana's vengeance.

He had to move quickly.

“Maruti!” he cried, sprinting forward up the jagged blocks of stone and rubble that had been uprooted when the rakshasa emerged from the ground. The vanar Hanuman – also known as Maruti for his father, the Lord of Wind – was gazing with intense hatred and frustration at the seething, greenish-black mass that boiled and festered in the clear summer sky, so large now that it blocked the sun itself momentarily. “Hanuman! Raise me up!”

Now Hanuman looked down, just as Valmiki reached the top of the highest boulder that lay teetering atop the pile of rubble and launched himself without care for personal safety. The vanar blinked, seeing the little human leaping up towards him and, to the credit of his swift vanar reflexes, allowed his body to respond even as his mind played catch-up. He reached out and caught Valmiki in a furry fist just before he could fall back to ground.

“What—” he began.

Valmiki cut him off brusquely.

“Raise me up! As high as you can!”

Hanuman stared at him for a fraction of a second. Something in Valmiki’s tone, the urgency perhaps, or maybe even the vanar’s reluctant admiration for the manner in which he had confronted the quads of PFs bare-handed earlier – Valmiki had seen the vanar’s impassive features react as he watched from behind the gate – motivated Hanuman. He nodded and swiftly raised the paw in which he held Valmiki.

Valmiki felt the breath rush out of him as he was flung up a hundred yards high. Forcing his senses to reorient swiftly, he opened his eyes. From here, Ayodhya lay like a builder’s model laid out for inspection. Far across, to the South East, he could glimpse the outer gates and before them, the other crisis that faced the city—but there was no time to dwell on that, no time for distractions. Every second was of essence.

He looked up and saw the cloud of black particles dispersing like tentacles of a deep-oceanic monster, wavering across the length and breadth of the city. Already, the tips of those tendrils were descending at great speed, almost at the rooftops now. Soon they would pour in through windows, chimneys, into doorways, and thence into mouths, ears, eyes, nostrils...every human orifice possible. Infecting. Poisoning. Killing.

“Higher!” he shouted, his voice whipped away by the strong wind that blew at these heights. The vanar heard him nevertheless and raised his hand to the limit of his reach. Valmiki looked up and saw the belly of the black cloud of seething, roiling particles still several dozen yards above him. “Still higher! I need to be above the poison cloud!” he yelled.

There was a brief instant when his breath left his body and the sky itself seemed to shove him down brutally hard as if it intended to hammer him down into the earth like a nail hit by a hammer. Then the pressure left his head and shoulders and he blinked to see himself flying – flying!

– straight up into the air. He glanced down and saw that Hanuman had leaped up, still holding him in his paw out ahead, like a mashaal.

They rose up, up, and now they were above the seething black mass. He was looking down upon it now, and from up here it reminded him of a swarm of flesh beetles swarming over the carcass of a dead buffalo he had seen in the Tamasa river near his ashram one day.

“Release me,” he roared as loudly as his lungs permitted, and emphasized his point by digging his staff into Hanuman’s wrist. The vanar’s eyes, big as cartwheels, gazed up at him with puzzled curiosity, but obeyed at once. The furry paw grasping his torso released its hold on him and suddenly he was free-falling back to Earth, into the embrace of Prithvi Maa.

Slowly, maa, he willed, do not be in too great a hurry to hug me, I only have time enough to do this once. Just once.

To his astonishment, he felt his descent slowed to a fraction of what ought to have been its natural velocity. He distinctly felt the wind rushing and raging at his extremities slow to a gentle cushioning sigh, as if Hanuman's own father was joining with Prithvi Maa to aid him in his attempt.

He had no time to ponder the mystical underpinning of this miracle – if indeed it was a miracle and not just an affectation of his own heightened senses. Already, he had begun chanting the Sanskrit mahamantras that he had composed for this precise purpose.

Valmiki fell to Earth, towards the seething mass of black particles, into the mass itself, and was lost inside it.

Bharat gripped the stone ledge hard.

Beside him, Shatrugan swore.

“How dare they!” Shatrugan said, his right fist clenching and unclenching. “This is open betrayal and treason!”

Bharat clapped a hand on his brother's muscled back, hard enough to penetrate Shatrugan's fighting instincts. “Be calm. This may not be what it seems. Let's not jump to conclusions.”

He turned to Drishti Kumar. “Senapati, have you received any word from them yet? Any indication of their intentions?”

Drishti Kumar looked up at Bharat. He was a tall man, his head easily visible above the ranks of his soldiers, but even so, Bharat topped him by two or three inches. He was also the fairest of his brothers; Rama was the shortest, and the darkest-skinned. The senapati's face wore an expression of such haunted misery that it told Bharat everything he needed to know even before the general spoke.

“They have demanded that the gates be opened to them...” he paused. Bharat saw the Adam's apple bob in the man's throat as he swallowed, “...And that we surrender the city to their command.”

“Surrender?” Shatrugan's exclamation was almost a roar of outrage. “Who do they think they are?”

Bharat raised a hand, cautioning Shatrugan. “Senapati, from whom did the demand come – formally, I mean. In whose name was it made? And to whom was it addressed?”

This time Drishti Kumar's eyes flicked sideways, toward the massed ranks of armoured soldiers beyond the outermost wall. He was not a nervous man, nor a hesitant one. Yet he was both nervous and hesitant now. Bharat did not blame him. It was an occasion that warranted such a response.

“Yuvraj Bharat, the demand was delivered only moments ago by three rajdoots representing the kingdoms of Panchala, Kuru and...” he broke off, looking away.

“Panchala? Kuru? Are they insane? They are our closest allies!” Shatrugan’s breath was hot on Bharat’s neck. Bharat held up his hand again, almost in his brother’s face, demanding silence. Shatrugan obeyed; he may be hot-headed and ever-eager for a fight, but he was also obedient to a fault.

“And?” Bharat prompted Drishti Kumar.

The senapati raised his eyes to meet Bharat’s own. “Kekaya.”

Shatrugan released a string of expletives. This time, Bharat didn’t stop him. He stared at the commander of the city’s outer defence network, feeling as if he had been punched in the gut with the blunt end of a spear.

“Kekaya?” he repeated. “Are you sure?”

The senapati nodded; his eyes said what his lips dared not. He was sorry to have to even repeat such a missive.

Bharat turned and looked out again towards the outer wall, trying to see more clearly. It was not very far and the day was clear and unclouded. He thought he could make out the colours of Kekaya on a banner held ramrod straight by a frontrider at the head of a long column. Yes, that was Kekaya's emblem, no question about it. Who was the big-built warrior sitting a massive Kambhoja stallion right next to the emblem-bearer? Was it...no, surely it could not be? But his eyes were sharp and those rough-hewn features and powerful upper body bulk were unmistakable, even at this distance. He groaned and buried his face in his hands as he recognized the man they belonged to. As if echoing his misery, Shatrugan swore yet again and put a hand on his back, speaking with a voice that mirrored Bharat's own sense of dismay and disbelief. "That is your uncle, your mother's brother, Bharat. Your own blood-relatives are out there too, ready to do war against you."

And it was true.

For the army arrayed in neat columns and rows on the raj-marg, filling the length of the road down the Sarayu Valley as far as the eye could see, and no doubt extending back a good mile or two, was no asura conglomeration or rakshasa horde. Worse. Much worse than that. It was an army of their own best allies, their closest and most loyal neighbouring kingdoms, supporters and trade-sharers over centuries. There was not a kshatriya out there in those massed ranks, nor one within these city walls, who did not share either kinship or alliance by marriage or trade with someone from one of the other's kingdoms. They were part of the great seven-nation Arya alliance that had withstood asura invasions, wars with distant lands and a hundred other crises. These were their own compatriots and friends!

And now they were here at the walls of Ayodhya, as enemies in arms.

What did it mean? How had this happened? What bizarre nightmare had overcome the world this otherwise normal, bright and sunny summer day?

Shatrugan's voice was quiet at his side. His brother's anger was as quick to fire as it was to quench. Or perhaps it was the shock of seeing his own kith and kin that had sobered him. "You should go out there and speak with them," he said. "This has to be some kind of misunderstanding."

I doubt it, Bharat thought miserably. Misunderstandings seldom outfit an entire army in siege gear and come marching in such numbers to one's gates demanding entry and your immediate surrender.

He was about to reply to Shatrugan when a chorus of shouts broke out from along the wall to either side. As he was still gazing outwards at the soldiers at the outer gates, he saw even their ranks tilt their helmeted heads to glance upwards. He saw the shadow of a dark and ominous cloud spread its wings across the moat below and the one beyond.

Then he looked up and saw the horror that was unfolding in the sky.

Valmiki felt as if he had leaped from the top of a cliff and landed in a thorn thicket. A thousand tiny pinpricks attacked every available inch of his body. He attempted futilely to use one hand to cover his eyes and nostrils, but even so, the tiny spores began to push their way inside, seeking to invade his body and infect him with their foul venom. So powerful was their toxic effect that he knew he would not survive if sufficient numbers entered his biological system. Already he could feel the poison pinpricks burning in his veins as his blood was infected at a level capable of downing an elephant. His only chance lay in completing the mahamantra he was reciting and in praying that the spiritual weapon he had developed through careful tapasya was potent enough to do its work. He almost screamed in agony as several of the spores slipped past his hand and between his fingers to enter his eyes, penetrating through the outer membrane of the eyes to dissolve and mingle with his optic fluids, like tiny pinpricks of flame igniting inside his eyes.... It was torture, yet he forced himself to maintain the unbroken chain of recitation; it was crucial that the mahamantra be recited without pause or error.

All this while, he continued falling, and even though his descent was definitely slowed by some supernatural benefactor – or benefactors – it was only a matter of time before he would fall to the ground. The cloud of particles was descending as well, and from the keening sound they made as they flowed in their tentacles across the sky, and the brief glimpses he caught through his fingers, he could judge their movement downwards to the city. The tips of the lowermost tentacles were already at roof level and at that very moment began to snake through cracks in eaves, openings in walls, any way they could find to get into people's domiciles. The rest he did not need to see to know: Once at street-level, the individual spores whirled around in search of human hosts, and as they found them, they slipped into their bodies through any convenient orifice or the skin itself, and began to work their deadly poison. In a few more moments, the entire cloudswarm would be amongst the populace, infecting thousands, who would then go on to infect tens of thousands more. And once that happened, no mahamantra, however potent, could possibly undo its demoniac effects. Ayodhyans would die like ants on a bonfire.

He had to stop it here and now. It was the reason he had come, why he had been sent.

He felt a change in the air battering his body and tried to open both eyes for a moment. They teared at once and he was not surprised to see a reddish tinge to the world; the spores had entered in high concentration, infecting his organs of vision already. But now he faced a more immediate danger: even at a slower speed, he was still falling, and the closer he got to ground, the faster the inevitable pull of gravity. He saw with horror that the spores had spread out far across the city, to the farthest corners, and the bulk of the cloud's mass had dissipated already. He was too late!

Even as he saw this and felt rising panic, the spores that had been designated to attack him renewed their assault with added aggression. He felt the poisonous molecules push their way through his very skin, making their way in through his pores, making blood-sweat pop out on his skin as they made their way into his bloodstream. He writhed in agony. He felt the fire of their contact with his blood and the murky pain of their venom as they dissolved instantly, mingling with his precious life-fluid. Already, the effect upon his body was near-fatal. He could not survive more than a few moments longer. And from the way the spores had spread across Ayodhya, it did not seem possible that he could use these last seconds of his life to achieve his mission. He looked down and saw the ground of the avenue only a hundred yards or less below him, flying up to meet him at increasingly greater speed. His mind struggled to finish the mahamantras correctly, for any omission or slip meant starting over from the beginning, and he was running out of time.

This cannot be the end, he said, fighting with all his will. I came here to serve a purpose. I must fulfil it! I must thwart the prophecy!

But his limbs were already numb, his belly blazing with a heat that felt like a red-hot iron rod inserted into his navel. And he could feel darkness clouding his brain as he began to drift into unconsciousness. He finished reciting the mahamantras but already it felt pointless. He would be dead before he hit the ground. And while the mantra was taking effect – he could see the spores falling away from his body, deadened and rendered ineffectual by the shakti of the mantra – he knew it would not disable all the far-flung spores in time to save the city.

There was only one chance left and he took it without thinking of or caring for the consequences to his own person. He uttered another brief two-word mantra, one that was designed to cause conflagrations. One of the two words was a secret name of Rudra, He Who Was Shiva, The Destroyer Of Creation, adding a potency sufficient to reduce an entire forest to smouldering ashes. It was one used only as a last resort, but he was beyond desperate now: he cared not that he would die, only that he must succeed, not for the sake of personal glory or legend, but for the thousands of innocent Ayodhyans who would die for no fault of theirs.

He uttered the last phrase of the shloka just as consciousness left him completely. He slipped into the final darkness without knowing whether he had succeeded or failed in his desperate attempt.

A collective gasp escaped the throats of all those upon the avenue. Looking up at the sage Valmiki falling through the dissipated cloud of greenish black spores exuded by Kala-Nemi – nay, the cloud of spores that was Kala-Nemi – they watched in horror as he burst into blinding white flame. So explosive was the effect that most were forced to cover their faces with their hands, and even through their fingers they felt the searing heat of the conflagration.

The ball of fire that had been a human being an instant ago blazed fiercely as it fell towards the ground – moving at an unnaturally slow speed as if some unseen force cushioned its descent and defied the natural law of gravity. The searing white flame that enveloped the sage's body shot out in all directions like spumes which raced at blinding speed along the tentacles of spores that extended across the city's rooftops, snaking down into houses and streets and mansions now. As it whooshed through the air like a hawk in pursuit of a pigeon, thousands of spores were fried instantly by its searing passage, and fell in wisps of ash to the ground. In a moment, the entire network of dark tentacles was reduced to fingers of white flame, blazing brightly for a fraction, then extinguished for want of anything left to burn.

In distant streets and lanes, miles away from the palace, as citizens went about their work or stood in groups discussing the rumours of strange unnatural events occurring elsewhere in the city, including some staring up in morbid fascination at the strange phenomenon descending from the sky, the white flames caught up with individual spores as they were about to enter one man's ear, a woman's nostril, a child's body through an open cut on his left shoulder.... The people in question barely noticed the spores that would have brought about their death in hours, and completely failed to notice the tiny wisps of ash that now lingered floating in the air, little knowing how narrowly they had escaped a horrible, writhing death.

Gazing down from his vantage point, Hanuman watched in dumb fascination as the rishi's last act found success in the nick of time, destroying the last of the poisonous particles that were all that remained of Kala-Nemi. He had seen and heard and understood all. And now he also saw that the rishi's final sacrifice would result in certain death as his blazing body finally approached the very Prithvi Maa he had prayed to so fervently only moments earlier. Barely a minute had passed since he had let Valmiki fall. Yet in that minute, the rishi had acted more bravely than any defender of this great proud city. Surely he could not be allowed to die now?

Lunging with a determined roar, Hanuman bent down and reached for the burning body. His fingers closed around it and he roared again with agony at the scorching heat of the white flames as he grasped the body of the sage. He remained still for a moment, regaining his balance, and noted that the sage's falling body was barely two yards from the broken rubble on the avenue when he had caught him. He shut his fist tight, then closed his other fist upon it, shutting out all access to air in a bid to douse the flames. He kept his paws shut tightly thus for a moment, praying, ignoring the pain and the singed fur on the backs of his paws. After a few moments, he opened them and stared down mutely at what remained of the great sage Valmiki.

KAAND 2

ONE

As Bharat approached the towering, barred top of the seventh gate, a few flecks of white ash drifted down around him. He ignored them and nodded at the gatekeeper in charge of Ayodhya's first line of defence. Although to visitors it was the first gate they encountered when entering the city, for Ayodhyans it was the last and outermost, hence the seventh. Among the sub-varna of kshatriyas that manned the gates generation after generation, it was a matter of pride that the seventh gate boasted the toughest security. It was here that the biggest fights, feuds and brawls tended to break out, especially amongst those who were afraid of flaunting Ayodhya's well-enforced laws against physical altercations within city limits. Only the toughest and most weathered PFs tended to get duty here, and the man who nodded curtly at him looked like a fair specimen. He was a grizzled veteran with the signs of his tours in the Last Asura Wars prominently displayed on his purple-black uniform, a bear-like man who must have been a formidable sight fully armoured on the battlefield and was impressive if sagging even now, aging roughly, almost entirely white-headed – what little hair he had left – and Bharat had seen his familiar face peering down over the top of the seventh gate ever since he had been a boy. The younger man standing beside him looked half his age but what he lacked in grizzled appearance he made up for with an impressively built physique and a certain calm and deceptively slow look about his face and body that Bharat recognized at once as signs of a skilled and tested fighter. He wondered idly if the younger man was the elder’s son – family traditions ran strong in Arya varnas – then focussed on the matter at hand. There were more important things at stake here. The future of his entire dynasty and kingdom, for one.

“Gatekeeper...” he elicited.

“Somasra, PF,” replied the older man sharply.

“Gatekeeper Somasra, open the sally port on my command, shut it immediately after I pass through and open it again only on my command – and after you eyeball me personally. Am I clear?”

The veteran nodded slowly, leaned sideways over the edge of the bridge, hawked and spat a jet-stream of blood-red tobacco juice into the moat. Something thrashed and rolled far below. “Pardon my speaking out of turn, yuvraj, but think you 'tis wise to venture forth to that mob?"

Bharat sensed Shatrugan about to bark a rebuke and squeezed his brother's arm, stilling him. "You do speak out of turn, oldun. But wise or not, it's necessary."

The man wiped his mouth with the back of his hand – Bharat noted that the man's forearm bore a distinct stain from years of this habit – and cleared his throat roughly. "Pardon my impudence again, young liege. But my advice is to exchange whatever pleasantries are needed from a safe vantage." He jerked his head upwards, indicating the rampart walls high above him.

Bharat resisted the impulse to smile. There was little to smile about this day. "Why? Do you fear for my life? Don't worry. I doubt they would start a siege by cutting down a Suryavansha Ikshwaku without cause. An unarmed one at that." He paused. "I intend to go out bare-handed and with only peace in my heart. Whatever their grievance, I doubt they would violate the kshatriya code."

Still the man remained standing in Bharat's path. Shatrugan made a sound of impatience but Bharat gave him another gentle squeeze and his brother subsided. The young gatekeeper beside Somasra glanced impassively at his senior, and Bharat was intrigued to see a flash of some emotion there as well. Clearly, the two mismatched gatewatchers had been together for a long time, and the younger had his share of frustrations dealing with the older man. But he also respects him tremendously. As if feeling Bharat's attention focussed on him, the younger man glanced at him and again there was something in his expression that suggested that Bharat pay heed to what the senior man was saying, as well as something else; a sense of apology for the older man's brusqueness perhaps?

“Yuvraj Bharat, you will pardon me,” the grizzled old veteran said in a voice hoarsened by years of chewing tobacco and yelling on the job. “I am only performing my duty. Would it be amiss of me to repeat my request that you speak to those outside from the ramparts rather than venturing out to meet them personally?”

Bharat frowned. Now he was genuinely puzzled. This went beyond mere concern for his personal safety. What was the old man trying to say? And why was the younger man looking at him with that peculiar expression, as if he understood the old man's reasons for saying what he did but still felt embarrassed about it.

Shatrugan put it into words in his cut-and-dried manner: “He’s afraid you’ll slip the enemy in through our defences, Bharat.”

It took Bharat a moment to fully comprehend the import of that statement, then it hit him with a flash of heat in the back of his brain. “Are you daring to suggest I would use my position to let my uncle pass through?”

Gatekeeper Somasra spread his broad hands – they looked like they had been broken and incorrectly set a long time ago – in a placating gesture. “I’m following gatewatch protocol, my lord. Under threat of siege or invasion from a large armed and hostile force, nobody is to be allowed out or in. No exceptions. Total lockdown.”

“I know the rules for lockdown—” Bharat began, then stopped.

He looked at Shatrugan. For once, his brother was not upset or angry. He didn’t look like he wanted to smash the gatekeeper in the face. Bharat glanced at the younger gatewatch. The young man still looked somewhat sheepish – and no wonder – but still as resolute and standing shoulder to shoulder with his senior. He looked at the old man Somasra himself then, and as his first flush of anger passed, he saw something there that made him terribly, deeply proud to be an Ayodhyan. The man knew that questioning the actions and orders of a royal prince was grounds for immediate execution, should Bharat but give the word. The circumstances would be considered irrelevant. Kingship and military chain of command superseded everything else. Yet he had pressed his point. Why? Because it was the right thing to do. The man was right. Just because that was Bharat's own maternal uncle out there, that did not justify his violating his kingdom's laws. A lockdown was implemented for good reason. Otherwise, every royal family member could find some reason or other to sally forth and back, and the cherished gate security for which Ayodhya was world-renowned might as well be called a revolving gate-bar for children to swing on round and round.

He swallowed, biting back the retort that had been about to rise to his lips, and raised his hand instead. He offered it to the elder gatekeeper. Somasra gazed at it for a fraction and Bharat had the pleasure of seeing surprise flash in the old man's jaded eyes. Then he took the hand and accepted Bharat's tight, hard clasp of thanks.

“You speak truly, oldun,” Bharat said quietly. “If the sons of Dasaratha cannot uphold their own father’s rules, then why should the sons of Ayodhya? Yatha Raja, tatha praja.” As does the king, so shall the people.

Somasra nodded slowly. Bharat sensed Shatrugan grin beside him and saw the younger gatekeeper relax visibly. The man smiled slowly, almost shyly, the smile of a man ill-used to smiling, revealing cracked and broken teeth yellowed by tobacco.

“The sons of Dasaratha are Ayodhya,” Somasra said, “If you still insist on going through, I cannot stop ye, yuvraj.”

“I shall go. I must,” Bharat replied. “But I thank ye kindly for your advice. Sound advice.”

The old gatekeeper nodded, eyes still glinting. The younger man grimaced – it was his way of smiling without appearing insubordinate – then glanced up at the older man with a look of mingled pride and frustration. If he’s not his son by blood, he’s his son at heart for sure.

“Come then,” said the oldun. “And let us pray those outside have half as much wisdom as ye, yuvraj Bharat.”

He turned and unlocked the hefty double doors of the sally port.

Hanuman walked towards Rama, reducing in size as he approached. From a towering 300 yard-high giant, he shrank in seconds to his normal height. Somehow while doing so, he deftly moved Valmiki from his right paw to his arms, carrying the charred body of the maharishi as tenderly as a child. He looked at Rama anxiously.

“I do not feel his breath rise and fall. Nor his heartbeat. I fear for his life.”

Rama seemed preoccupied. His attention was directed at the far end of the avenue, to the second gate. Sita looked and saw a flurry of movement there, then the unmistakable clanging of the gate being hoveled to and the heavy bolts dropped with a thundering crash that carried all the way to where they stood. The city lay preternaturally silent and still around them as if it were holding its breath in anticipation of whatever came next.

Rama turned and scanned the faces nearest to him. Sita knew he was seeking out Lakshman. He had a certain way of looking when he sought out Lakshman; Lakshman too had a sixth sense that always seemed to tell him that Rama was seeking him out. She glanced around. Lakshman was nowhere in sight. When she turned back, Rama's forehead was creased with a frown.

“Where is he?” he asked quietly in a tone in which the sense of irritation was so subtle only she could have detected it – she, and of course, Lakshman. The three of them were as familiar with each other's tiniest intonations and inflections as it was humanly possible to be.

“I saw him last outside the gate, talking to one of the two alarm-riders.” They too were nowhere to be seen now. “I suppose he must have gone with them somewhere. The same place Bharat and Shatrugan went as well.”

Rama continued to gaze over her shoulder, absorbed in some elaborate thought process. Behind him, Hanuman waited with infinite patience, carrying the smouldering body in his arms. Rama seemed almost unconcerned about the vanar's last words, but she knew that he had not only heard them, he was processing that as well as a dozen other matters simultaneously, and that when he acted and spoke next, it would be in a manner that dealt with that as well as all the other decisions at hand in the most efficient way possible. That was what he did: processed the available information and arrived at a decision. Always the right decision, at least when it came to martial matters.

That moment arrived. Rama turned back to Hanuman and said, “Take him to the sickhouse. Have the royal vaids see if there’s anything that can be done. If not, make him as comfortable as possible until the end.”

Rama gestured to the nearest courtiers, standing some distance away from the main action, looking on nervously, as Hanuman nodded and began walking towards the palace – the men looked relieved at being given some task to handle, and busied themselves clearing a way for Hanuman to pass as one ran ahead calling out aloud for the royal vaid to be summoned at once. Sita had seen the vaid somewhere in the rear ranks not long before, standing by in the event of any combat injuries that might need to be attended to – that was standard practice when any of the royal family were in the way of direct harm. She saw him raise his hand and gesture to Hanuman to follow him, leading the way. She released a small sigh of relief.

Rama was watching her. “You care about what happens to him?”

“He saved the city from something terrible. I care, yes. Don’t you?”

He shrugged, his face that familiar battlefield mask that was impossible to penetrate. “I care about the city. I am not certain yet of his motives, or intentions.” He glanced away before adding, “Or anyone else’s.”

Sita blinked. What did he mean by that? She could understand him doubting Valmiki’s motives and intentions – well, not really, but she could see how there was some grounds for being cautiously suspicious for the time being – but who else was Rama referring to?

But he had already strode away from her, to the mangled gate that was already being pulled down under Saprem Senapati Dheeraj Kumar’s barked instructions by several quads of PFs, with a grinding and wailing of metal that made Sita cringe and want to cover her ears. She felt the churning in her belly again and her nerves screamed in protest. She began to go after Rama but slowed as several familiar robed figures with grim faces accosted her.

“Mahamantris Jabali, Ashok...” her memory failed her and she mumbled a hasty “Noblemen of the Suryavansha court, you should not be out here.”

Jabali spoke first, his birdlike features seeming even longer and sharper than usual under the obvious strain of his grim mood. “Maharani Sita, there are steps to be taken, a protocol to be followed. Under the circumstances...”

She listened to him drone on for a moment about the proper procedure for a siege or invasion of the city-state as laid down by Dasaratha and the First War Council of the Seven Arya Nations following the end of the Last Asura War and how the immediate implementation of such measures were vital to demonstrating Ayodhya’s legal integrity to other neighbouring kingdoms. Finally, when the words began to blur together like white noise she murmured a polite “I shall inform the king, thank you for your counsel,” and hastily made her escape.

The mangled gate was being placed on a flatcart hitched to a sow elephant with a weaning infant that never left her side. She had seen both moving heavy things around the palace grounds before and patted the calf on its rump as she passed. It gave a tiny squeak of greeting and she smiled, thinking of how wonderful it was to see little children and young animals playing together.

She straightened her face as she approached the small group of senior ranked military officials standing around Rama on the avenue. The Saprem Senapati had delegated the removal of the damaged gate to a junior and was among them. She had not had time to know the rest very well, but she recognized them by face at least. They looked as sombre and grim as the court ministers had been, and it was still something of a small shock to her to watch this gathering of half a dozen important martial commanders, each in charge of a sizable military force on his own, deferring to Rama. Her Rama. He is king after all, as well as Supreme Chief of all military forces of the entire kingdom, what did you expect? A ragtag gathering of vanars and rksaas?

“—convene this very hour, in closed session,” Rama said. Apparently he was done, for as he finished speaking, the others all nodded brusquely, and began to move away, talking softly amongst themselves. They looked troubled and she saw one or two of them glance back at Rama as if reassessing him dubiously.

He was looking at her. “We are under siege, it would seem.”

Her heart thudded. “Then what the rakshasa said—”

“No, not rakshasas, or asuras. A human force. A league of armies. At our gates, as we speak. Bharat and Shatrugan are attempting first contact, but they’re clearly not here to parley, not with that number of spears and swords and elephants.” He paused. “And siege machines.”

She inhaled and exhaled slowly. “Shall we go to the seventh gate?”

Rama shook his head. “No. Bharat is already there. He will return any moment. What I want you to do is wait here for him and bring him and Shatrugan up to the Council Room the moment they arrive. He is to speak with nobody else until he sees me – emphasize that.”

She nodded. “Mahamantri Jabali and the others wished to speak with you on some matter of protocol.”

Rama shook his head. “There are more urgent matters at hand. They can wait. Remember, see that Bharat and Shatrugan come straight to the Council Room. I will be in closed session with the War Council, awaiting them.”

“The War Council?” she said, her heart thudding.
“What do you intend to do?”

Rama put a hand on her arm, just above the elbow, his palm shockingly cool on her overheated skin, “Whatever I must.”

She watched him walk away from her, back into the palace.

TWO

Hanuman watched with mounting concern as the vaids conferred among themselves. Finally, they turned and looked at the blackened figure lying upon the pallet in the centre of the chamber. They shook their collective heads and spoke a few more words in whispers. Then they filed out one by one. Hanuman managed to stay the last one long enough to hear his wise pronouncement.

“He is beyond help,” said the vaid. “Only the devas can help him now.”

The vaid left, taking his satchel of condiments and ointments with him.

Hanuman crouched down on his haunches, resting his elbows on his thighs. He gazed at the maharishi's frail, burned form for a long moment.

Finally, he came to a decision.

“You risked your own life to save that of my friends. To save countless innocents,” he said softly. There was nobody else in the chamber apart from himself and the still silent form on the pallet. “You acted in support of my Lord Rama. You cannot be permitted to die. Maruti, son of Vayu and Anjana will not permit that to happen.”

He left the chamber, loping down the corridor. The guards, accustomed by now to his comings and goings, still started slightly at the speed and power of the furry body racing through the palace but he was always gone before they could do so much as lower their lances; as he went, his preternatural hearing picked up their voices thanking Lord Vishnu that he was on their side. He flicked his tail as he raced away.

He saw a particularly large contingent of soldiers guarding the inner palace where the queens and princesses and children resided, as well as the court house where mantris and courtiers milled about in agitated debate

– apparently the War Council called by Rama had not yet begun its session. He knew Rama would send for him when it was time; or not. Either way, it did not matter. He had a task to accomplish and he would see it through. Vaidas were only good up to a point. There were things the vanaras of the redmist mountains knew that even the most learned vaidas of Aryavarta would give their right arm to know.

He leaped off a balustrade, swung down another floor, and then ran down another corridor before reaching his destination: his own chambers. They were bare and unappointed, as he had requested. He did not actually spend much time here – he preferred to sleep in the trees on the Northern bank where the air was clear and natural, the water cool and fresh, and where he could keep an eye on the road to Ayodhya. That was where he had been this morning when he had spotted Valmiki coming. He bent down and rummaged through the straw pallet which he used only when he felt the need to be closer to Rama, although he still could not bear sleeping within the confines of four walls and a ceiling.

He found the herb he had been seeking and took it back to the sickroom, moving as quickly as before – the guards winced but made no move this time. The maharishi lay as before. Hanuman made use of the silbutta grinding pestle and mortar and Gangajal and other implements of the vaidas, grinding the herb with Gangajal into an unguent ointment which gave off a potent but not unpleasant odour. The cooling scents of camphor and eucalyptus tickled his nostrils as he worked – even swinging through a grove of eucalyptus trees made him sneeze – and when he was done the concoction was a dark, blackish-brown paste.

He used a wooden ladle to smear it gently across the maharishi's body, taking care to cover every inch of skin. He paused when he was done, considering whether or not to turn the body over to cover the rear. But doing that would rub off the ointment he had smeared on the front, would it not? Finally, he decided to leave well enough alone. He could always do the rear once this application had done its work.

Just then the wind changed. He raised his snout, sniffing the air curiously, his ears and snout twitching as his powerful senses drew information from the wind – his father's domain – the way a fish could read the meaning of every ripple in a pond.

The message on the wind was clear to read: It was the ripe red stench of man-hatred and imminent violence.

Bharat felt a brief pinch of pain at the sight of his maternal uncle. Yudhajit and his younger sister Kaikeyi, Bharat's late mother, bore a striking resemblance. In the brutal years following Rama's exile and her husband's death, Kaikeyi had been ground down to a pale spectre of her former self. Her demise a few years after the departure of Rama had been as inevitable and sad as the event itself: she had died repenting everything she had done. What good had she achieved by exiling her own stepson and, since Sita and Lakshman had joined Rama in exile, her daughter-in-law and other stepson as well? Bharat had taken an exile of his own, refusing to take the throne from which his brother had been displaced unfairly (in his and virtually everyone else's opinion), moving to the remote village of Nandigram from where he managed the kingdom's affairs for the next fourteen years, refusing even to come and meet with his mother, and offering her perfunctory formality during the times she came to visit with him. Dasaratha had died of a broken heart. Urmila, Lakshman's wife, had been reduced to a wife-in-waiting for fourteen long years. And Ayodhya itself, that prize which Kaikeyi had desired so desperately for her own son, had all but risen up in resentment against Bharat over the exiling of Rama – it was only Rani Kausalya’s iron hand and the unwavering support of the armed forces that had maintained peace in the kingdom this long. The assassination attempt this morning was lingering proof of the long-festering outrage still felt by many over Kaikeyi’s machinations. And Manthara, the daiimaa who had nearly broken an empire and divided a family, had died within hours of Rama’s leaving; in her wake, Kaikeyi had fallen to pieces. Her last days had been sad, miserable ones and Bharat still felt like burying his face in his hands when he recalled them. Which was why he tried as much as possible not to do so.

But now, looking at those same familiar features mirrored on his uncle, that aquiline profile and handsome face, he felt a biting pain in his heart. In her battle armour, astride her own charger, his mother had looked not unlike the figure that greeted him now. As a boy at Brahmarishi Vashishta’s gurukul during the seven years of compulsory education every high-born Arya child underwent, that image had been the one that had always been uppermost in his mind’s eye. It had impressed itself upon his psyche so greatly that he had aspired to cut as striking, as goddess-like, as fierce and imposing a figure as that image of his mother, someday. It was the same image he still carried rather than the wasted, haggard, self-hating Kaikeyi who had died crawling across the floor of her chamber in the deep watches of night – as if she had been fleeing some unspeakable nightmare witnessed in her bed – and had been found moments later, dead, laying on her back cringing in a rictus of either pain or some unnameable terror, a sad death for an Arya queen. He always thought of the younger Kaikeyi, haughty, proud, arrogant, and no less a warrior than any male of the Kekaya clan, the way he had seen her during his early years. Looking at his uncle now was like recalling that childhood memory again. He pushed the memory aside with an effort.

“Mama-shri,” he said, striking a balance between filial familiarity and princely authority. “What brings you here on this fine autumn morning?”

Yudhajit stayed astride his battle-horse, making no attempt to dismount or to offer any gesture of filial familiarity. When he spoke, his tone, made harsh by years of daily chewing betel leaves and areca nut, was no warmer than if he had been addressing any gatewatch guard or sipahi.

“Yuvraj Bharat, as Commander of the akshohini of Kekaya, it is my duty to inform you that I represent the league of Aryavarta nations and am acting under that authority. We order you to open your gates and permit us to search the city of Ayodhya at once. Failure to obey will result in our taking the city by force, however regrettable that action.”

Bharat frowned. He had never been addressed by his uncle in such a tone or manner, not even in the most heated arguments. Whatever his many faults, Yudhajit-mama was not a man given to formal language and gestures. Where was this coming from?

“Mama-shri,” he tried again, attempting to establish some familiar basis of contact. “You are always welcome in Ayodhya, as you well know. What is the reason for this armed force and aggressive demands? Whatever your issues are, surely we can sit down and talk them over? After all,” he added with a shrug and a smile, “we are family.”

Yudhajit stared down at him coldly. That look, those grey eyes staring down at him from beneath the graven visor; the way he sat on his horse without inclining either his torso or his head by even an inch;

the cold, disapproving pause; the silence with which the rest of the force stood by

– even the horses and elephants weren't whickering or whinnying or moving restlessly, how was that possible? – set off silent alarm bells in Bharat's mind. Something was terribly wrong here and he sensed that no amount of talk would resolve it. Suddenly, he wondered if the old veteran Somasra had been right after all. Coming out here was a mistake.

“Your words carry no weight,” Yudhajit said unexpectedly. “We know that the imposter is on the sunwood throne. He controls everything, your minds, your souls, your words and actions even...you are no longer Bharat my sister's son. Merely a puppet in his power.”

Imposter? What is he babbling about?

Bharat was too shocked to find any words to reply at once; before he could manage even a perfunctory, polite response, his uncle spoke again in the same vaguely dismissive monotone.

“Stand aside or join our cause,” Yudhajit said. “Either you are with us or against us.”

This last statement Bharat had heard often before – it was the tired refrain of all tyrants, arrogant asses and bullies everywhere. Those arrogant and selfish enough to want everything their way right now and incapable of tolerating any difference of opinion. It was the kind of thing his uncle might say, but it also confirmed that old Somasra was right. Talk would achieve nothing good here, but it might well make things worse.

But what was he babbling on about before that? What did he mean by ‘the imposter is on the sunwood throne’? Is he talking about Rama? What madness is this?

He had used his peripheral vision to scan the frontline as he walked from the gate. He knew every one of the six men and two women in the fore, all seated astride horses, kitted out in full battle regalia. They were all leaders of substantial armed forces, representing three major kingdoms and three smaller holdings that were pledged to Ayodhya – and more importantly, paid taxes. From the unnatural silence and fierce glassy-eyed stares on all their faces, and the way they had stayed quiet while Yudhajit had spoken, Bharat deduced that they deferred to Kekaya in this matter. Which was odd in itself; at least two of the smaller holdings and one of the large kingdoms were not allies of his mother's homeland by any stretch of definition. For them to take up arms against the might of the Kosala nation thusly, unprovoked and unjustified, and to defer to Kekaya thus – to Yudhajit no less, known for his arrogant and abrasive manner – was a mystery of vast proportions. He could not fathom it, nor understand what power Yudhajit could wield over them to make them act thus.

“Am I to assume that my uncle speaks for you all as well?” he asked aloud, raising his voice so that it could be heard several yards back down the raj-marg. Formal politeness had failed, it was time to try something different; needling might elicit a better response. “And that Kekaya now commands you all like a single hand holding a half-dozen reins?”

The glassy stares remained fixed on a point beyond Bharat – even beyond the outer wall of Ayodhya, he suspected. They were the kind of yojanas-long stares that he had seen on the faces of sentries posted on remote mountain posts and left alone for long years without respite. This was beyond passing strange now, he decided. Something was certainly peculiar here.

Then he caught a flicker of an eye, the movement of pupil within the white, and without turning his head an iota, he fixed his attention on the eighth member of the frontline party.

He had never seen the man before in his life, he decided. Who was he? Which kingdom or holding did he represent?

Without staring directly at the man, all he could tell for sure was that the man was exceedingly fair. He had skin wholly unlike most Aryas, whose complexion may start out as fair in some mountain tribes but was burned to sallow wheat or maize by adulthood if not the dark brown or even jet black of the majority of his people. This man was so fair that Bharat's mind instantly related his complexion to Rama's – he was as white as Rama was black-skinned. So white, the skin almost seemed to glow faintly reddish, as if the skin were barely sufficiently tinted to conceal the blood flowing beneath it. Bharat would have assumed him to be an albino, except that there was colour in his eyes and hair: jet black eyes that seemed almost all-pupil, giving him an unnaturally intense gaze, as if he could see everything and anything and his hair was a contradiction too—grey as ash. It shifted and stirred in the bracing autumn wind that blew through the Sarayu Valley, setting the pines and elms along the ridges shirring in the distance.

Bharat had never seen a combination of these things in any person before: Ash grey hair, black eyes as large as an animal's, and albino white skin. As acting king-regent of the Kosala nation, he had met any number of videshis visiting Aryavarta from distant lands across the great oceans to the west, as well as the many fair-skinned tribes and nations from the vast plainslands beyond the great North-Western frontier ranges (beyond his own mother's homeland Kekaya). But no one like this. No race that he knew of could have such a combination of characteristics. Could intermarrying with videshi envoys and traders produce such traits? Trade had only increased over time and a steady influx and outflow of foreigners was a common sight in port towns and on the trade routes, so internecine relations were commonplace and fruitful. Perhaps, he supposed doubtfully. Either way, those eyes...they were unlike any human pair of eyes he had ever seen. So big, so... strikingly intense!

Bharat realized that the man was the only one not staring fixedly ahead like the other seven in the frontline. Not just that, he was the only one glancing at Bharat occasionally – and smiling secretly from time to time!

Bharat turned to look at the man openly. It was time to try the last arrow in his limited diplomatic quiver.

“And who might you be, sir?” he asked boldly, addressing the fair stranger. “By what authority do you come here and whom do you claim to represent?”

The man smiled again – a fleeting, furtive smile that appeared and vanished almost instantly. He turned his large eyes in this direction and Bharat was startled to see how oddly they bulged out of the smooth glacé surface of his face. Suddenly he felt strange almost feverish and the ache in his recently dislocated shoulder surged to unbearable levels. It was all he could do to resist crying out. He distinctly saw the stranger smile a thin dark smile – displaying teeth that were as grey as the hair on his head!

Then white heat exploded in his forebrain and his vision blew out like a blast of a bellows striking a furnace. Pain, unspeakable pain, screamed in every nerve-ending and his muscles and bones seemed incapable of supporting so much as a feather let alone his living weight. He felt himself sinking to his knees – No! No! I cannot show weakness at such a time! – and one hand gripped his forehead as if seeking to quench the white fire that blazed within the cage of bone, while the other dangled limply by his side, useless and shouting agony. He felt the dull thud of his knees striking the dust of the raj-marg and the world swayed from side to side, appearing and disappearing in a fog of pain and chaos.

Through the fog, the pain, the blinding white light-heat that raged in his brain, he heard the stranger's voice speak out calmly, almost quietly, with seductive tone:

“I am the vengeance of Ravana come to life. Come to wreak justice upon Ayodhya. And to end the reign of Rama the imposter.”

THREE

Lakshman stood at the fringes of the War Council, not liking what he heard. There was too much talk of preparations and preparedness, talk which reminded him too closely of the last several months – the last several years, for that matter. Sometimes it felt as if his life had been one long endless war; only the battles kept changing location. Just that morning before leaving his chambers he had promised Urmila that he would free himself from the usual routine of statecraft and court and attend her for a while. She had not looked very convinced when he made the promise, knowing that his promises were only as good as Rama's willingness to honour them—and if that meant honouring them at the cost of some important chore or assignment, well, they both knew which one would take priority.

It was not even Rama that was responsible, it was Ayodhya. In a sense, the kingdom had always been the real wife he left behind when he left for exile fourteen years earlier; in many ways, it still was the wife he had come home to. The days after his return had been rich with euphoria yet tinged with a sense of great tragedy and sadness; the knowledge of why they had left in the first place and under what circumstances they now returned. This was not the Ayodhya he had bid farewell to almost a decade and a half ago; it was a different woman. He knew her well on sight, despite the relatively minor ravages of time and aging, the inevitable decays of entropy, the normal maturation and greying at the fringes – no matter how cleverly concealed by artful dyeing. Yet her soul was the thing. He had once heard a kusalavya bard sing in his father's court – Dasaratha loved musicians, artists, performers of all ilks, had patronized them to the detriment of his royal treasury at times – that sometimes the souls of men grew older than their faces. It was so with his wife: she had aged beautifully, gracefully, majestically... and yet, that graceful growth deceptively concealed the dying within. Sometime in the long sojourn, in the parting of hearts and minds and souls, she had lost her way; it was there in her eyes to be seen, if you knew how to look. And after all those years abroad in foreign lands, in videshi forests battling brutal beasts, he knew; oh, how he knew. He knew the instant he set eyes upon her again, on their return. She had changed somewhat on the outside, and too much on the inside. Far too much. She was no longer the one he had left, whom he might have loved – whom he had believed he loved during those long lonely years of self-denial, but now knew was merely a stranger waiting to become a lover, perhaps a companion, someday a wife. Whom was he speaking of now? Ayodhya or Urmila? Was there a difference? For Lakshman, perhaps not. For Lakshman, perhaps never. His name said it all: Lakshya-maan. He Who Adheres To His Chosen Goal. He had adhered. Still, he adhered. And would always adhere. And that goal, his goal, was never Ayo... Urmila...never Urmila...it would never be, could never be, should never be Urmila. It was always Ayodhya, and what was best for her. He was hers, she his, in life, in exile, and until death did them apart.

At some point, he sensed Rama's eyes upon him. He had spent so many years, each broken into infinite moments of watchful alertness, the all-day all-night every-waking-and-sleeping-moment level of alertness that drove some men mad and turned others into something other than mere men, that he knew at once when those crow-black pupils were turned in his direction. He turned his head a fraction and gazed into Rama's eyes across the chamber full of agitated war ministers, generals and advisors. Rama, seated upon the sunwood throne that had once borne the weight of Dasaratha and before him, Aja and Raghu and so many other great, legendary kings of the Suryavansha Ikshwaku line all the way to the beginning, to the sungod Surya himself and his mortal offspring Ikshwaku, the bringer of light to Prithvi-loka. Rama sat well upon that throne, perhaps even better than their own father – although Lakshman would never speak that thought aloud, on pain of death – and was already a legend unto himself. The tales of his adventures in exile had done the rounds of so many taverns and ashrams in the past fourteen years, Lakshman sometimes wondered if perhaps the legend had become more real to people than the man himself. Yet if there was ever a man who could live up to and perhaps even exceed the lofty standards of his own mythic legend, that man was Rama.

Rama held the mutual gaze for a moment, his eyes sparking with that quiet fire that Lakshman knew indicated deep process: the burning fire of deep contemplation that always resulted in extraordinary insights and command decisions. Even though he was now the only man not speaking in that babbling chamber apart from Lakshman; the moment he did choose to speak, his words and thoughts would cut through the babble like a sword through rotting vines. He tilted his head a fraction, visible only to Lakshman in that crowded chamber, and Lakshman raised his own chin a mirroring fraction, acknowledging.

It will begin soon, be ready, Rama's gesture had meant.

Ready already, Lakshman had responded.

On cue, the doors of the chamber were thrown open as a white-faced captain came in, bowed and said in a voice urgent enough to end every conversation within:

“Maharaj, there is a crisis at the gates. Yuvraj Bharat has fallen.”

Shatrugan emerged from the sally port with a roar. He carried a fistful of javelins, each as heavy as a sword, as easily as if they were dry tindersticks. One javelin was already clutched in his throwing arm, balanced on his shoulder, ready to be released. He took a step forward, turning this way then that, seeking a target. His powerful muscles bulged – he had refused to take the time to strap on body armour – and his Adam’s apple worked vigorously in his throat. When he had ascertained that nobody in the frontline – or the lines visible behind – was making any gesture of aggression, he turned his attention to the slender figure at the end of the row. The pale white stranger sat his horse as calmly as the others to his left, but unlike them, his smooth face twitched with a sardonic smile.

“You!” Shatrugan roared. “You did something to him! I saw you!”

The stranger turned unearthly eyes upon Shatrugan, eyes that seemed to be all-pupil with only the hint of a white eyeball visible in the socket – like a rakhasa, Shatrugan thought grimly – and flashed a broad grin.

A

white rakshasa with grey teeth—or are they green?

“I spoke to him,” the white stranger said. “Perhaps the truth was more than he could bear?”

Shatrugan felt something as he stared directly at the man on the horse. A piercing pain in his brain, the front of his brain specifically, as if a needle had been inserted through his forehead and its poison-dipped tip was spreading its venom across the entire forebrain like acid eating into flesh. He snarled and threw one arm up, using the handful of javelins to cover his face, as he pulled back the other javelin and lobbed it at the white stranger.

It flew through the air and passed precisely through the space where the stranger’s head ought to have been—but wasn’t anymore. The stranger straightened his head, still grinning, and glanced back casually at the tree trunk behind him from which the back end of the weapon poked out, quivering. “A fine throw. You have some skill with the weapon.”

Shatrugan realized the pain had vanished. It had vanished the instant he lobbed the javelin.

A second shaft had already transferred itself from his right hand to his left where it now hung suspended above his shoulder, ready to throw. He drew that arm back and had the satisfaction of seeing the stranger's neck tense, eyes narrow and smile freeze. He grinned as well, displaying his broad teeth.

“Best of three throws, shall we say?” Shatrugan said. “Or shall we make it best of five?” He jerked his head back towards the gate, yards behind him. “There's plenty more where that one came from.”

This time the albino rakshasa, or whatever in hell the being was, did not respond. He didn't smile either, Shatrugan noted with grim satisfaction.

Judging it to be safe to take his eyes off the white stranger, he bent down beside Bharat's prone form. Setting the fistful of javelins down within easy reach, he felt his brother's neck, searching for a pulse. The skin was awash with sweat, which was unlike Bharat, but rather than fever-hot, it was ice-cold. At least there was a pulse, a strong steady one. That was good news.

He glanced back at the rampart where the old veteran Somasra stood along with his younger associate. “If I should stagger, trip, or so much as spit wrong, loose a full volley at that white bastard,” Shatrugan said.

The oldun nodded once to show he understood and turned and passed instructions to the long triple row of archers standing ready with bows strung and drawn and arrows set to the haft. One gesture now and more arrows would fly at the albino stranger than any ten men could dodge. Or ten rakshasas.

Without a single wasted action, Shatrugan dropped his javelin, picked up Bharat and hauled him up onto his shoulders in one smooth motion. His thighs bulged with the effort, as did his biceps, and he rose from the squatting posture to a full stand, turned, and strode back to the sally port, passing through without a backward glance. The door was shut and bolted behind him instantly, and he set Bharat down on a shaded bench, gently grabbing his brother's head and resting it slowly against the cut-pine logs that made up the pillar against which he rested.

Bharat's eyes fluttered open almost at once. "Where —"

"Shhh. Shantam. You're safe."

Bharat groaned and raised his uninjured hand to his forehead – pressing the palm there as if feeling the aftermath of the same pain Shatrugan had experienced moments earlier. Shatrugan imagined how intense that pain must have been though it had lasted only a moment for him. A few more seconds and he would have fallen too, he had no doubt. It took a lot to bring Bharat down, he knew. He was glad now that Bharat had insisted that they both not go out together.

“Some kind of asura maya,” Bharat said, then gestured for water. It was handed to him at once by a waiting soldier. He sipped carefully and Shatrugan watched the intelligence return to his eyes again.

“Yes, I know. I felt it too. Bastard tried it on me.”

Bharat looked at him quizzically.

Shatrugan shrugged. “I tossed a javelin at his ugly skull. It seemed to work.”

Bharat sputtered water. “You—”

Shatrugan patted his arm, gently because it was the dislocated shoulder. “Don’t worry, he ducked in time. But it did the trick. The pain stopped right away.”

Bharat’s eyes flicked from side to side, mind working furiously. “Still.

That was not appropriate under the circumstances. We were attempting a diplomatic parley.”

Shatrugan chortled. “Yes. Sure. Of course. They knocked you down using sorcery, would have knocked me down too in another second. But I should still have tried to talk to them, right? Well, diplomacy can go suck a lemon!”

Bharat seemed about to respond then stopped. He grinned and nodded. “You’re right. To hell with diplomacy. They made the first move.”

A commotion. The dense rows of armoured soldiers parted to reveal a dark form moving like wind across water. Rama. Followed closely by Lakshman, Sita and an entourage which included, Shatrugan noted, the entire War Council.

“Bharat, my brother,” Rama exclaimed anxiously, crouching down to his eye level. “Are you—?”

“Yes.” Bharat cut his eyes at Shatrugan. “Thanks to Diplomacy-Is-AJavelin-Well-Thrown over here. If not for him, I would still be lying out there...” He shuddered, “...dying, I think. It felt like nothing less.”

Shatrugan saw the look in Rama’s eyes change. It was not a look he would have liked to see on a battlefield opponent.

“What happened?” Rama asked. “Tell me exactly.”

Bharat began, and Shatrugan finished.

Rama nodded, his eyes hooded by the end of it. Shatrugan felt a chill finger on his spine: I'm glad he's my brother not my enemy.

Rama sat on the bench beside Bharat. Shatrugan remained standing, as did the others. He saw Sita shoot him a sympathetic glance and he smiled wanly. Lakshman's mirror image of himself had a look of dark fury that was more kith to Rama's dark brooding look than Shatrugan's own. Whatever they went through in those jungles and in Lanka, he thought, it changed them forever. These two brothers of mine, they are rakshasa slayers now and forever. He respected that greatly; it also made him sad. Sad for what had changed, what had once been, and what might have been.

Rama sighed, "Very well. Let us see for ourselves what new devilment has come to our gates."

There was a flurry of protest, from Saprem Senapati Dheeraj Kumar, Senapati Drishti Kumar, the War Council, Sita, even old Somasra. Rama held up his hand.

"Yes, I hear you. Yet I am king of the Kosala nation. And if there is an army at the gates of our capitol city, it falls to me to protect our citizenry. What danger lurks out there, someone has to go out to face it. I cannot command anyone else to go if I fear to face it myself.”

Lakshman spoke quietly: “Let me go, Rama. I shall put an arrow through his eye before he so much as looks at me.”

Rama nodded. “No doubt you would. And could. But we cannot do that either. The challenge he issued was to me, not you. And as king, it is my dharma to go face him and attempt one last time to resolve this crisis if possible.”

“And if not?” Sita asked the question.

Rama turned to glance at her, nodded again, then looked up at the sky, blue and cloudless now, perfect. Shatrugan saw its blue expanse reflected in the pools of his black eyes, and in the shaded alcove where he sat, it lent his dark face a certain aspect, almost a glow. A bluish glow. But for that, and but for the hundreds of thousands waiting for his response, his decision, his next words, as well as the army waiting outside the gates...but for these things, he might have been a man sitting on a bench anywhere, contemplating the sky philosophically.

When he spoke at last, it was into a still, terrible silence. The calm before the war, Shatrugan thought grimly, seeing Rama's decision in his eyes, his face, his stance, even before the words were spoken aloud.

“If not,” Rama said at last, then paused, looking down at his hands, the muscles of his jaw working tautly before he continued, “If they will not see reason, if it is war they truly want, then we shall give them war.”

FOUR

Kausalya rode silently through the empty streets of Ayodhya. Her horse sensed her anxiety as well as the tension in the air and snickered at shadows and sounds. She saw only soldiers all the way from the palace to the seventh gate and they all looked alert and ready to fight. Mahamantri Ashok had attempted unsuccessfully to dissuade her from venturing out of the royal sanctum but she had spent the earlier part of the morning watching the extraordinary events unfolding from a window and she could no longer stand to be cooped up in her chambers.

It was difficult to believe that so much had already happened, or that something as incredible as the news from the outer gate could be real: An army? At the gates of Ayodhya? Here to invade us? Had she not witnessed all that had occurred already with her own eyes, she might have reacted by smiling it off as a jest. It was simply too incredible. Yet it was happening. Here and now. She had watched the shocking appearance of Kala-Nemi and the subsequent events. If not for Hanuman and Maharishi Valmiki this city might already be reeling under the shadow of fatal disease! With a crisis so dire looming over her kingdom, she had no business staying cloistered in the palace, at the mercy of the trickle of news that the Mahamantri thought relevant for her knowledge. She needed to see and hear what was happening with her own senses, firsthand.

For the past decade and a half, since Dasaratha's demise and Rama's exile, she alone had stood between the throne of Ayodhya and all those who sought to disable, unsettle or openly assault it. Bharat had been king in name only – he had refused to undergo coronation or accept the rajtaru, the kingstaff that was mandatory for the reigning liege to take hold of formally by ritual, and had managed the kingdom's affairs from Nandigram. Nandigram was virtually an outpost of the Kosala nation, and everytime Ayodhya was threatened or disturbed, it had fallen to Kausalya and her able administrative and military supporters to hold the capitol together and maintain peace. As seniormost Maharani of the Ikshwaku-Suryavansha dynasty, wife of Dasaratha, and most of all, mother of Rama Chandra, the “true heir” as he came to be called by his many supporters, it was she who commanded respect and grudging discipline from even the most unruly elements. The court historical record credited her with embarrassing achievements that she always sought to downplay, but over the many years, even her self-effacing modesty could not shy away from the fact that she had held the capitol, and by extension, the kingdom together in these dark, tragic years.

She even had the scars to prove it; Arya women were not exempt from physical attacks nor expected to be mere Sati-Savitris, not even if they were Queen Dowagers of one of the most powerful nations in Aryavarta. She had had to prove herself more than once. Not too often, which was a relief because unlike her sister-queen Rani Kaikeyi, she had never enjoyed physical combat or violence. In fact, she abhorred it. Which only made her task all the harder. Her real strength lay in statecraft, in judging the subtle currents of sociopolitical movement and change, anticipating, negotiating, and above all, artfully managing and maintaining peace. Like all true heads of state, she knew that peace was a dangerous thing to uphold and maintain. Perhaps the most dangerous political freedom of all.

Now, she wanted to be with Rama when he took the decisions that she knew would resonate for years to come. If not to guide or aid him – he had no need of that now, she mused wistfully, her mother’s heart still unable to fully accept the fact – then at least to observe him in action. To be there in case he needed her for any reason. She understood the complex, intertwining, sociopolitical problems of the kingdom far better than he did, but she also knew that Rama was an instinctive leader: he had assumed the kingship with the practised air of one who had been groomed for it all his life, not as an exile returned from years of battling insurmountable odds and enemies.

Fourteen years. For almost a generation she had not seen his face or heard his voice or touched the crow black hair that she had once curled with her fingers as she sang him to sleep with lullabies. She had parted from him once, as a boy of seven, when he went for the mandatory brahmacharya period to Guru Vashishta's ashram and gurukul deep in the Northwoods. She still remembered the day he had returned; that memory had carried her through these past fourteen years, given her the confidence to believe that he would return again, as he had then, stronger and harder than before, less her son and more the warrior that circumstances had moulded him into becoming. When he stepped from the golden flying vahan Pushpak with his companions, her swelling heart had come close to bursting. With pride, yes, of course. For he had taken everything that life had dished out and still kept his head high and his chin up, and triumphed over it all. But also with pain. With inexpressible motherly anguish and grief. At the sight of that dark face now further darkened not in skin tone, but in its hard angular lines and grim set. The itihasa of his exile was written on Rama's face, reflected in the dark pools of his crow-black pupils; the shadow of all he had endured, and done, lay upon his soul like a landslide across the mouth of a cave. Somewhere inside, deep inside, was the boy she had nursed and nurtured and nourished and raised to youthful promise. But he was gone now, lost forever. In his place had returned Rama the man. The kshatriya who had fought and killed ten thousand rakshasas.

Slayer of the king of asuras himself. Yoddha of yoddhas. Mahayoddha Rama Chandra.

That day, through all the pomp and ceremony and roaring crowds and showering petals and rituals and feasts, she had cried inside in secret. For that boy. Her boy. Her son. Who was no more. Who had been replaced by this...man. This legend. This living myth. And she had looked up once to see Rama looking at her intently, as if he knew exactly what she was thinking and feeling – mayhap he did – and she had smiled and pretended that all was well and everything would be as it was before. But time was a river, and like the Sarayu, one could return to it everyday, and it would be the same river, but would the person returning be exactly the same? Not quite. Perhaps never. If Ayodhya had changed so much, how could Rama not have changed too? As a boy came of age in a distant brutal jungle battling daily for his life and for the lives of his beloved companions, so also a city had passed her prime and began greying. The city had existed long before the boy; but now their fates were forever entwined, and so Rama's coming of manhood had been mirrored by the waning of Ayodhya's glory. The city and the man. Apart. Yet always together. For what was Ayodhya if not Rama by another name? So the city had endured its own season of exile, banished from the joy, peace, prosperity and unbridled optimism and enthusiasm it had once been world-famous for. And just as Rama returned with something less than what he had left with fourteen years ago, Ayodhya too had so much less than what it had once possessed.

And now, it was no mere twist of fate that this crisis had arisen only weeks after Rama's return. For Rama's life and fortunes were bound with those of Ayodhya. As one fell, so would the other. Which was why she must be with him when he took whatever decision he took. For even though she was no longer the Dowager Queen awaiting the return of the rightful heir, she was still Ayodhya's bride and Rama's mother.

The tense silence around the seventh gate told her all she needed to know. From the direction of the gazes, she could see that someone, probably Rama, had gone up to take the traditional high spot from which the master of the city spoke to any potential invaders. It was little more than a platform built higher up at a far sharper angle than any spear or javelin could be easily flung, or an arrow loosed without a precious moment taken to raise a bow and adjust for wind force. She glanced up as she dismounted and her heart bobbed as she glimpsed the familiar dark skin and lean upper body through the cleverly slatted protective railing of the high spot. She handed the rein to the head of her personal security unit, a strapping Banglar Queensguard who rarely spoke and always listened and saw every single thing around. As Kausalya walked over to the boxed-in enclosure she deployed her all-female unit in a protective web that seemed redundant given the ridiculously considerable number of armed Ayodhyan forces all around. She could see her stepsons, Sita and what appeared to be the entire War Council. All eyes were on Rama above, and as she approached her daughter-in-law, she heard the strong clear tones of her son's voice call out. She felt a strange mix of pleasure and pride to hear her son – my son the King – call her name:

“Visitors! You have been warned. I, Aja-putra Raghu-putra Dasarathaputra Kausalya-putra Siyavar Rama Chandra Ikshwaku Suryavansha Ayodhya-naresh, command you to turn around and leave our city at once. We have no desire to engage you in physical combat, but if you fail to comply, we shall be compelled to do so at once. Begone!”

She blinked. That was a hard line to take. Did he need to be that harsh? Had he pursued the diplomatic option with sufficient enthusiasm? How had the attempt fared? Was he driving the situation to a confrontation when it might be avoided? But she held her silence. However great her concerns, she would not make the mistake of undermining Rama's authority by questioning his choices and actions or words. He must have good reason for taking such a hard line with the outsiders. He would not have taken this approach unless all others had been exhausted.

She tried to see the visitors outside the gates, but it was impossible from where she stood. The others stood or sat around her, aware of her presence – they had greeted her respectfully one and all through eyes and silent gestures – but were focussing their anxiety on listening too. That was a safety precaution. If they could see outside, those outside would be able to see within. Gate security was one of Ayodhya's legendary military assets, imitated but never equalled the world over. So she simply sat on a wooden bench under the shade of the overhang and listened to Rama's words and the responses of those outside, which she could hear quite clearly.

“If you were whom you claim to be,” said the pale white stranger on horseback, “it would mean a great deal. But the words of an imposter mean nothing.” He looked almost amused, the faint hint of a sardonic smile on his strange but not unattractive features. If this is a rakshasa, he is like no rakshasa I have seen before. “And that is why we are here. To expose you as an imposter and install the rightful ruler of Ayodhya upon the sunwood throne.”

He glanced up at Rama, head cocked at an angle, one eyebrow slanted upwards, as if measuring the distance and force it might take to leap up to the top of the high spot, but only in an academic, theoretical way. “We have been very patient until now. But we are starting to tire of this haranguing and heckling. Let me reiterate my earlier command – open the gates and let us in, and we shall manage the transfer of power in the least inconvenient manner possible.”

Haranguing and heckling? Who is this impudent fool? No wonder Shatrugan threw a spear at him! Right then, he felt like loosing a volley of arrows at the arrogantly smug stranger rather than responding to his absurd insults. But Ayodhya was listening and an accusation had been made that was deadly in its very conception. He could not leave it unchallenged now.

“Stranger,” Rama said, putting steel into his tone and ice in his eyes as he looked down. “You insult not only me but the crown I represent and the people I serve. Such libellous accusations cannot be permitted to go unchallenged. If you have proof to support your wild allegations, show it now. Or face corporeal penalties.”

The slender face, virtually a framework of bone with skin stretched tight as a drum across it, dipped downwards briefly then rose again to display a smile as unsettling as the full-toothed, yawning grin of a skeleton. “I was hoping you would ask. It’s about time.” The stranger plucked a yellow scarf from his saddle and raised it high, waving it slowly in some prearranged signal.

Rama tensed at once, anticipating treachery. It was the kind of signal that would typically be used to call up the first attack of a massed force. Only the colour of the scarf – yellow – suggested preparedness rather than an attack alert.

He relaxed only slightly when a palanquin was brought up the rajmarg at running speed. It was in fact carried by rakshasas, and that in itself was enough to make his hackles rise – and put everyone else behind and below him on edge, he expected. But they were women rakshasas, though no less burly and muscled than any males of their kind, and the ease with which they carried the heavy, ornately carved and filigreed doli the hundred-odd yards was impressive. He recognized the sigil of the House of Pulastya with a growing sense of unease, and then caught a glimpse of the national sigil of the kingdom of Lanka on the other side as the bearers turned the palanquin before setting it down with unrakshasalike gentleness.

There was a moment's pause, as tangible as a held breath. Everyone waited for the occupant of the palanquin – a royal Lankan palanquin of the house of Ravana himself – to emerge. When she did, with a rustling of silk brocades and jangling of heavy jewellery that was clearly audible in the deathlike hush that had fallen, it elicited a release of breath and gasp of shock that he could sense if not actually hear from all along the Ayodhyan walls.

“Rama Chandra of Ayodhya,” said the widow Mandodhari, wife of the late Ravana, as she turned her proud, striking features up to the high spot, her eyes seeking him out balefully: “I told you our paths would cross again and the next time they did, you would face a reckoning for your injustices against me and my countrymen. That time has now come.”

FIVE

Hanuman had done what he could for the maharishi. He smelled the unguent-coated body one last time, sniffed in distaste, then sighed and rocked back on his heels. After a moment, he looked around, found a rag and wiped his hands clean as he had learned to do from watching Rama and Lakshman – slippery hands could mean death to a yoddha. He came out on the verandah, sniffing curiously. There was a strange, unnatural stillness around, a sense of pervasive dread. He reached up and took hold of a beam running the length of the corridor, disguised as a decorative part of the verandah's overhang, and shut his eyes, allowing his snout to see what eyes could not. He smelled the sweaty body odour of armoured men all around, the enticing fragrance of the many females in the palace, the milky smells of children; from farther away, carried on the wind, were the scents of the city...

A map opened before his mind's eye, a map of odours and smells, and he saw the city in a way no human could. Dogs, perhaps. Other animals too. But which other creature could match the powers of Anjaneya Maruti Hanuman, he who had earned the title Bajrangbali after the war of Lanka, and who drew his powers from his deep devotion and worship of Lord Rama Chandra himself? The keenest hound could have scented all that Hanuman scented in that instant, standing there on that verandah. But the hound's brain could never have organized all that olfactory information and mapped it as Hanuman did. Therein lay his genius. The talents of non-humans, combined with the logistical organizational ability of humans. Seconds after he shut his eyes, he viewed the city as an enormous unfolding map of scents. And more than merely being able to place the origin of some particular scent or track it to its source as a keen hound might have done, he could read its significance and relate it to the whole picture.

He opened his eyes. His eyes narrowed, the fur of his face rippling in distress.

Rama is in trouble. Someone means to do him grievous harm.

He needed no commands, orders or instructions. He was a force unto himself. He leaped off the verandah with a careless ease that startled the wits out of sentries on the lower level who were still nervously apprehensive and overly alert – he waved to them to reassure their scalded nerves – touched ground briefly, then launched himself up into the air. He felt it was necessary to move swiftly: running or bounding would not do; he must fly. And so he rose up, above the palace, above the tall ancient trees in whose shelter royal Suryavansha Ikshwakus had played and danced and strolled and reclined for centuries, above the height of the Seer's Eye, the tallest structure in the Arya nations matched only by its counterpart, the Sage's Brow in Mithila, the capitol city of neighbouring Videha. And now he was above the map of scents, gazing down at Ayodhya once more, for the second time that morning – for it was only a brief hour or two since the greatest crisis in Ayodhya's history had begun to unfold. And he soared through the air, the wind buffeting his limbs and flattening his plush fur as he soared the mile or so to his destination.

He slowed in mid-air, using the strength of his mind more than the muscles of his body, for his power to defy Prithvi Maa's hold was more a spiritual one than a physical ability, and required the use of mental commands rather than mere bodily movements. His face grew grim and his warm brown eyes, ever brimming with adoration and affection for Rama, turned cold and steely as he saw what had alerted him.

The army that stood at the gates of Ayodhya did not startle or surprise him one whit. He had sensed its presence out the corner of his eye even as he had done his best to aid and assist Rishi Valmiki in his desperately heroic effort to save Ayodhya from the final villainous ploy of the rakshasa Kala-Nemi. He had not given it a second thought because he was wholly engrossed in one task at the time; that was his way. Rama was able to deal with myriad things at one time and handle them all effectively and with astonishing dexterity. But that was not the vanar way, and Hanuman was, after all, a vanar. At that time he had sensed that the forces amassed outside the gates were not an immediate threat. Just as he sensed that they had become a threat, gravely urgent and demanding critical attention right now.

He hovered in the air above the gates, too high for anybody on the ground to notice him – even if they looked up, he was in the sun – yet low enough to easily see and hear everything that transpired below. He had observed crucial battles during the war of Lanka just so, hovering a hundred yards or so above ground, arms folded, tail twitching lazily in the wind; weeping as he witnessed the brave sacrifices of his fellow vanars as they stood against the bone-crushing onslaughts of hulking rakshasa hordes, grinning with joy as he viewed the same hulking rakshasas routed and decimated by the superior strategic skills and persistent stubbornness of Rama's armies.

He prayed now that he would not witness such carnage here in Ayodhya.

Sita started at the sound of the woman's voice. Surely it could not be— Mandodhari? Yet the haughty tone and regal condescension were unmistakable, as were the mannered Sanskrit with not so much as a hint of commonspeak. She had heard the voice often enough to know it well and hate it even more. She looked around at the tense, waiting faces of everyone around, cloistered in the shelter beneath the high spot. She saw her mother-in-law standing not far and their eyes met for a brief moment, exchanging a warm if necessarily distracted silent greeting under the circumstances, then turned her head this way then that, trying to think of a way to gain sight of the events transpiring outside the gate. There was no way, except...

She ducked her head beneath the crisscrossing diagonal struts and taking hold of the ladder, began to climb quickly and efficiently. Perhaps she moved too quickly, or perhaps it was the angle she chose. A sudden spasm struck the lower left side of her abdomen and she paused, feeling the blood drain from her face at the impact. It felt as if...as if something had twisted within her. Something? Or someone? She swallowed nervously, guiltily almost and glanced around to see if anyone was watching. Bharat, Shatrugan and the others avoided looking at her in a way that suggested they knew what she was up to and did not intend to bar her. But Kausalya was gazing directly at her with a clear view of her face and she bore a faintly curious expression. Sita swore silently at her own lack of self-control. Kausalya had noticed the spasm and now her eyes drifted down to Sita's midriff. Sita swallowed and forced herself to resume climbing, exercising more caution this time. Just before the interlinked crossbeam structure of the high spot obscured her view of Kausalya, she saw the queen mother's eyes find her face again, and there was a knowing yet sympathetic look in those upward-turned eyes that made her certain that Rama's mother now knew that she was to be a grandmother. She put that out of her mind and climbed on, reaching the top of the high spot with her heart pounding more rapidly than she would have liked. The months of imprisonment – and pregnancy – had taken a double toll, and she was paying the price now. She reached the top of the high spot and stepped out onto the sturdy platform protected by a wooden escarpment that reached up to her shoulders – and up to Rama’s lower ribs, leaving enough viewspace to observe efficiently while still providing protection. It was used for defensive purposes during a siege – such as pouring vats of boiling oil, which was the reason for the pulleyrope system dangling down the centre of the central structure – but also for parleys involving a monarch. She suspected it had not been used for either in decades.

Rama, ever alert, shot her an appraising glance as she came to stand beside him, with no trace of commentary in his look. He was too focussed on the person who had addressed him moments ago. Sita glanced down as well, and at the sight of the tall, fair rakshasi standing beside the palanquin below, she felt a rush of mixed emotions, like oil and camphor mingling to give off a tiny explosive burst of boiling fumes. She forced herself to remain calm; merely standing beside Rama helped. His steadfastness was the stuff of which legends were made.

“You do recall me, do you not?” asked Mandodhari from below as the muscled rakshasis set a travelling seat behind her with practised efficiency. “I am the widow of the lord of Lanka whom you slew during your invasion of our nation and genocide of our people.”

“I recall you well, Queen Mandodhari,” Rama said in a voice of steely calm. “But my recollection of you is as the widow of the abductor of my wife and the precipitator of a tragic war that could well have been averted had he but abided by the law peaceably and admitted his guilt. I remember you also as the sister of the noble brahmin rakshasa Vibhisena whom I left in charge of the reconstruction of Lanka after the close of that unfortunate war, and as the reigning queen of the nation. You are welcome here to Ayodhya at anytime, and I would bid you kindly enter our happy city and enjoy the hospitality deserving of a queen and ally. But since you arrive at our gates with what appears to be a hostile armed force, dealing threats and slander, I have no choice but to have this conversation in this awkward manner.”

Bravo. Well said. And from the dark flush that crept across the lower part of Mandodhari’s face, Rama’s eloquence had struck home. Like most of her countrymen, the rakshasi had that excessively pale complexion and translucent white skin that made visible any movement of blood to her upper extremities. It was a stark contrast to the dark-hued skin colouring of most Aryas, and one of the qualities that helped distinguish the rakshasa race in general. Mandodhari's servers had placed the travelling seat in a suitable position behind her and awaited their mistress. But instead of seating herself, Mandodhari remained standing, glaring up at Rama. Her eyes flicked briefly, contemptuously to Sita, and despite herself, Sita felt a surge of coiled anger: Have you not had enough yet of war and violence, rakshasi? Go home and lick your wounds in peace. An enemy should know when it is beaten!

Aloud, she said nothing, but her hands gripped the wooden railing tightly enough to turn her knuckles white.

Mandodhari shrugged, a regal tossing of her glossy, burnished mane that reminded Sita of her favourite stallion back in Mithila, the one she had ridden from the time it was a foal and she an unbled girl. Except that Mandodhari's action conveyed not merely pride but threat as well: You fools. Do you not know who I am? You shall see soon enough!

“I expected no less from you, Rama of Ayodhya,” the rakshasi queen said loftily, glancing around as if addressing all those on the wall rather than Rama alone. “Or from your blood-thirsty warmongering countrymen. Ayodhya’s reputation for war and invasion are legendary. Even today, the mere mention of your father Dasaratha is enough to put little rakshasas to sleep, over three and a half decades after the Last Mortal Invasions.”

Said the rakshasi with an army behind her come to lay siege to us, whose husband is known to itihasa by the title ‘He Who Makes The Universe Scream’ – the literal meaning of ‘Ra-van-a’. Sita resisted the urge to speak out, not out of concern for breaking protocol but because she knew the importance of Rama appearing totally in charge.

“Mandodhari-devi,” Rama said in a voice that was loud enough to carry to all in earshot yet still managed to sound ‘quiet’ in its tone somehow. “Your wildly inaccurate recall of history would be more credible without an army at your back and threats and assaults preceding your entry upon this...” he gestured, “this theatrical setup you seem to have designed for our entertainment this morning. As it is, this kind of behaviour is in extremely poor taste and a gross violation of the rules of war. If you or your minions have a grievance with me, you should have forwarded your request for a formal visit through normal diplomatic channels. By arriving unannounced with an armed and self-evidently hostile force, you undermine your own shaky credibility and absurd claims.”

He paused a moment to let the words sink in. Sita resisted the urge to grin: Rama rarely spoke this much or made the effort to be this eloquent to hostile opponents, but once he decided to do so he was as effective as when taking lives in battle. The years of leading ragtag bandits and outlaws through enemy-riddled wildernesses had only honed his oratorical skills further. He was a natural crowd-appeaser.

“I have cautioned your associate already. Now I address my cautionary warning to you as well. If you have diplomatic business here in Ayodhya, go away and send an emissary who shall be received with due respect by my court. If not...”

He paused, to let the import of those last two words sink home.

“If not, then be prepared to face the consequences of making hostile advances against the city-state of

Ayodhya. We do not take such actions and words lightly. Those who act or speak against us should be willing to deal with the repercussions of doing so. I strongly advise you now to either hold your peace – or go speak your piece to those whose ears are not already deafened to your words by the thunderous roar of a million bestial rakshasas whose barbaric cruelties to the mortal race are as well known as your own late husband's rapaciousness. Any further threats or unsubstantiated allegations shall be regarded as direct declaration of war.”

SIX

That's telling her, Sita thought with secret satisfaction, wishing she could applaud and cheer Rama's response. Somewhere along the wall, someone did thump the haft of a spear or hilt of a sword against the dense wood of the seventh wall, and she suspected it was a sly gesture in that very direction. Ayodhyan soldiers were far too disciplined to openly display such emotion, but that did not mean they did not feel the elation and pride she knew they must be feeling at the way Rama was handling the situation thus far.

Mandodhari sighed and cocked her head. She glanced around, seemed to notice the travelling seat placed for her comfort, gestured curtly – the waiting rakshasis bent their powerful backs and removed the seat with practised efficiency – and then, glanced up at the high spot, staring not at Rama, but at Sita. Her eyes found Sita's and locked onto them.

“I am not surprised to hear your hostile response,” said the Queen of Lanka haughtily. “Nor your unwillingness to see reason. And as you can see, I have come fully prepared to undertake whatever measures are needed in order to restore justice to my people and vindication to my late husband's memory.” She gestured at the long winding row of armed soldiers stretching down the raj-marg behind her. “But before we turn this war of words into a war of acts, let me point out two salient facts: One, you are not Rama Chandra, and therefore you have no authority to even address me directly let alone lord over Ayodhya as you now do, you imposter! Two, the woman that you call your wife, and whom you repeatedly claim was ‘abducted’ against her will by my late husband... this woman is the only genuine heir of Ayodhya's throne and the future leader of its destiny. As such, it behoves the people of Ayodhya to know her true identity and the reason why she has been the crucial element in all the events of the preceding years. The bone of contention, you might say. And that reason is simple enough.”

Mandodhari raised her right hand and pointed at Sita. “Sita Janaki of Mithila is the daughter of my late husband Ravana Pulastya and the bearer of our unborn grandchildren. And I am here to claim the throne of Ayodhya as ours by right.”

Time stood still for Sita. The world stopped turning. Breath and life and existence were suspended and held hostage in a place within her heart so small that a butterfly would have suffocated within that space. Motion itself ceased. Birds flying somewhere to the far left of her field of vision seemed to slow in flight, as if suddenly battling a powerful windcurrent.

She stared down at the Queen of Lanka, unable to fully comprehend her words.

She stared so intently that she could see every line, every detail of the rakshasi queen’s features. That proud, pale, angular face; those broad cheekbones and finely-shaped jawline; that flowing forehead with the vertical slash of the hairline truncating it inches lower than most foreheads of women her age; that proud stance; that impressively taut figure, no longer slender but not weighed down by indulgence either; that regal bearing and manner.

And despite herself, some part of her mind was already trying to assess if there was any similarity at all in the woman standing below and the face and body of Sita's own reflection.

Ravana's Daughter? No. How can that be?

And yet.

And yet...

Sita was still staring down dumbfounded when a dark streak arched from left of field into her sphere of vision and intersected with the rakshasi queen. It was a javelin thrown from somewhere below the high spot. Thrown with vicious force and perfect accuracy. It struck Mandodhari with sufficient force to drive the queen of Lanka backwards and off her feet to crash against the side of her own palanquin with force enough to shatter the woodwork and send splinters flying. Blood spurted from the rakshasi's chest. So intense was Sita's concentration in that moment – she was still in shock from Mandodhari's words – that the globules of blood seemed to hang heavily in the air, suspended for a moment before gravity resumed and they sprayed the ground like a spatter of red raindrops. An ominous wetness blossomed on the Lankan queen's pearl-white gown, accompanied by a wheezing sound that Sita, battle-veteran that she was, recognized instantly as the sound of the air being propelled out of the rakshasi's punctured lungs.

The world froze motionless for an instant, during which Sita could hear a distant drumming that she recognized only much later as the pounding of her own racing heart. Then motion and colour and sound and fury returned with a shocking assault and the world was never the same again for her.

Hanuman felt something strike him with the force of a Himalayan mountain. He felt the invisible force crumble to tiny sand-sized particles as it struck his virtually indestructible body and shattered. It was intense enough to have reduced most beings to fragments as well; but then, he was not most beings; he was Maruti Anjaneya Hanuman. He was flung back up, up, to the sky, flung like an arrow from a siege catapult, arms flailing as he struggled to regain control of himself. Wind screamed and howled in his ears and his vision was reduced to a foggy blur as the air itself appeared to fragment. He fought furiously to slow his backwards and upwards flight and after several moments of struggle, finally succeeded in slowing his ascent. He brought himself to a halt with a teeth-gritting effort and hovered momentarily, trying to assimilate what had just happened. Then he shot forward and downwards, shocked to see how far he had been flung in mere moments – which indicated how powerful the force that had struck him must have been. He was instantly enveloped in a bank of dense, foggy clouds so thick that all he could see were swirling smoke-like billows. The wind sang in his ears as he increased speed, jaw tightening as he recalled the last thing he had seen and heard before the invisible blast struck.

The rakshasi speaking those terrible words.

The javelin streaking from the direction of the seventh gate.

The javelin striking the rakshasi in the chest.

Blood spurting – bright red blood, heart-fresh blood.

The rakshasi flung back, with enough force to break her spine if the javelin had not already done her in.

And then a blast of shakti as powerful as any he had witnessed being unleashed, accompanied by a sound so awful he had never heard the likes of it before.

For long moments, he seemed to shoot endlessly through the bank of clouds, blinded by fog, despite the fantastic speed with which he was flying. A roaring filled his ears yet it could not entirely drown out the sound from far below, the sound that had accompanied the explosive force that had flung him skywards like a pebble from a child's catapult.

He broke free of the cloudbank and was relieved to find that instinct and his preternaturally attuned senses had brought him back to more or less the same position in which he had been hovering before the mysterious shakti had blasted him away – he could see the seventh ring gate of Ayodhya below, albeit much farther below. He increased speed, racing downward at a dead flat descent, like a stone dropped from some enraged deva's hand. In his peripheral vision, he glimpsed the curved bowl of Prithvi-loka bathed in a midnight darkness that was nevertheless illuminated by a glow that was neither night nor day, a silvery illumination that was clearly a product of maya shakti. The source of the illumination as well as the epicentre of the force that had struck him lay directly below at the gate of the city. It was, he realized, also the source of the terrible sound that filled his ears, his senses...filled the world.

He slowed his descent as he approached, to avoid crashing to the ground. The roaring of the wind died down, the air itself smelled strange, and the peculiar illumination grew brighter, eerier and seemed clearly unnatural in origin, as he came within a yojana of the earth. He slowed further as he came close enough to make out individual figures below. The tableau outside the seventh gate of Ayodhya remained much the same, except for the crowd of rakshasis now huddled over the fallen queen of Lanka, tending to her, though he knew from long battle experience that she was likely past tending – and a figure on a horse that had strutted several yards ahead of the frontline outside the gate. This figure held up the object that was the source of the supernatural illumination: A sword!

As Hanuman descended to a few hundred yards, then a hundred, then hovered close enough above ground to see individual features and even the colours of eyes, he saw that the raised sword in the white-skinned rakshasa's hand did not merely glow. It blazed! The light it gave off was a burning, crackling silver fire that rose in smoky tendrils, curling in wisps and shavings, rising up into the air to spread wings of silvery light across the world entire. The sword was illuminating the whole of Prithvi-loka! Or at least that part of it within the sightline of the sword. Impossible. Incredible. Yet there it was.

Hanuman glanced up.

The sun had vanished from the sky.

Dark clouds brooded and boiled across the entire ceiling of Prithviloka, obscuring the cosmos completely. He recalled the glimpse he had had of the dense cloudbank stretching in all directions, in the moment when he had managed to stay his ascent, just before he forced himself to descend to earth, and from that glimpse he guessed now that the boiling cloudbank covered all of the world. How such a thing could be possible, or how it could be achieved so miraculously, he did not know or care. What he was certain of was that it was all caused by the drawing of that sword.

He decided to remain where he was, hovering. He had a feeling that the time for talk and parley was over. And now whatever transpired next would be achieved through brutal, swift, intense acts of violence. It would be strategically useful to Rama to have him here, poised thus.

He waited and watched as the drama below unfolded and reshaped itself into open conflict...

Rama's first response was to feel a sense of outrage at Shatrugan. For the javelin had come from a point not far from where Shatrugan must be standing, directly below the high spot. There were firing windows built into the structure of the wall precisely to enable such actions, usually with anti-siege machines situated before them, ready to fire javelins the thickness of a man's torso, and twice as heavy. It would be simple enough for a man to climb up the struts to one such window, balance himself, then launch a javelin. It would take considerable skill and experience to throw one with such devastating aim and force through such a narrow aperture. Shatrugan was the city's best javelin thrower, winner of the annual contest for well over a decade. Yet surely it couldn't have been Shatrugan? His brother knew better than to do something as drastic – and as senseless – as this, didn't he? And to attack a woman? An unarmed woman, a visiting queen no less? No, it was absurd to even think of Shatrugan. But then... who else? It was the only thing he could think of in those first few shocked instants after Mandodhari was struck so brutally.

Beside him, Sita hitched as she broke out of the long held breath that had transfixed her for the past several moments. He saw her teeter briefly and shot out his hand to steady her, then stayed his hand. Her fiercely independent nature did not easily brook chauvinistic gestures, even those made in the thick and heat of battle; he had often seen her deliberately flaunt her feminine status, pretending weakness, in order to bait and then efficiently despatch enemies. That delicate, beautiful veneer was deceptive; she was as tough as he or Lakshman. And the javelin throw, coming as it did on the heels of the stunning revelations of Mandodhari, had shaken him as much as her. She regained her balance without any aid from him. He saw her glance sideways, conscious of his gaze, and closed his fist, accompanying the action with a firm look. She read him as perfectly as ever: Hold fast. We shall get through this together as always. And she nodded in response, her beautiful heart-shaped jaw tightening, the furrows on her narrow forehead easing.

He turned his attention back to the figure on the horse outside the gate.

The man holding up the sword.

There was something very alarming about the man – and the sword. It was hard to tell which was more alarming. The man’s skin, milky-white as ash as it had seemed earlier, now appeared translucent in the peculiar half-light that had fallen across the land. Rama grew gradually aware of the ceiling of boiling clouds overhead that had appeared abruptly in the wake of the attack on Mandodhari and the howling wind that swooped in swathes first off to one side then the other end of the city, like a flying beast raging in search of prey. The sword the man had unsheathed, probably at the very minute after Mandodhari was attacked, was the focal point of everything that was occurring: it blazed fiercely with a strange half-light that was neither white nor golden, shining and resplendent yet silver rather than golden, like moonlight upon the surface of a raging ocean, but moonlight of such intensity as had never been seen before. An incandescent flame searing the centre of vision, impossible to look at directly, and even obliquely, glimpsed from behind a warding arm, as Rama was forced to raise to protect his own eyesight, so brilliant that it would have put the noonday sun to shame. This immense, intense, blazing light spread outwards like a cold white fire laying hostage to the entire countryside for as far as the eye could see in every direction, like a net of burning moonshine cast upon the realm of Prithvi-loka. It curled and smoked and simmered and coalesced like a white-hot raging furnace within the slender flat blade of the weapon: giving off an aura so powerful that no mortal hand could have forged or tempered such an object or held its power within a flesh-and-blood fist. Enveloped in the penumbra of its silver-hot effulgence, the grey-haired man was but a blurred blob. Even attempting to stare directly at him sent needles of agony into Rama's brain.

He sensed and glimpsed rather than directly saw something swoop down from the high heavens and knew it was Hanuman returning. He had sensed the vanar hovering overhead when he had begun speaking to the white-skinned man; he had not seen what happened to his faithful champion in the aftermath of Mandodhari being struck, but the explosive effusion that had followed, flinging him and Sita back a step and searing their vision and consciousness had no doubt had an effect on the flying one too. He sensed Hanuman descend within a few dozen yards above and wait there, ready.

He sensed the near-panic of those gathered in the shelter below the high spot: his brothers, his mother and the wisest counsels of the nation. He sensed their resolve and their iron discipline holding them together and holding in good stead the awed, dazed soldiers all along the walls of the city. He felt their shock and confusion as well as their discipline and determination. Regardless of what Mandodhari had said or claimed, every one of them would give their lives for him.

That knowledge gave him strength.

And he used that strength to call on his own innermost reserves.

To straighten his spine and stride to the edge of the high spot's railing. Thence to look out and call in the loudest voice he could muster, straining to be heard above the keening howl of subvocal sound that was being produced by the sword itself, the sword held in the upraised fist of the man on the horse.

“Who are you? What do you seek here?” he shouted.

For a moment, he thought he felt the song of the sword diminish in volume and intensity ever so slightly and felt the attention of all his kinsmen and countrymen snap and sharpen as they collated their wildly roving conjectures and paid heed to this bellowed query of their commander and king.

The pale man spoke. And his voice was one with the song of the sword. Blade-sharp and sword-deadly, it sliced the nerves and penetrated through to the inner organs, much as Kala-Nemi's voice had, but with a different tone and intensity. That had been like grated glass. This was the texture of liquid fire poured into one's ears. Rama felt his ear canals seared as if by a blast of superheated air from the heart of a fire.

SEVEN

“Imposter! Look upon your doom. I am Atikaya, son of Ravana and Vedawati. Stepson to Mandodhari. Brother to Indrajit, Prahasta, Akshay Kumar, Devantaka, Narantaka, and Trishira. I am the sole heir to the throne of Lanka, bearer of the legacy of my father and the fulfiller of his last wishes.”

The white rider twisted his wrist and the searing light changed in intensity and kind as the blade turned, sending shooting arrows of agony into Rama's forebrain. Across the length of the wall, he heard involuntary moans and cries break out as soldiers were unable to stifle their own agony. If they were feeling the pain he was experiencing right now, it was a wonder any of them could stand. It took all his strength and will to remain on his feet and even then his hands were gripping the railing hard enough to drive a splinter into his palm. He felt as if the wood would crack under the intensity of his grip, but since it was solid lohitwood timber – ironwood, literally – he knew the bones in his hand were more likely to snap first. From the elevated view of the high spot, the sword’s effect was even more unendurable, since the blinding blaze of light intensified as it rose. As the white rider continued, a screaming sound came from the corona of light, shredding through Rama’s nerves, bludgeoning his mind and senses. It was beyond any mortal man’s capacity to look at directly; it reduced the world to a blurring darkness, and everything on the visible spectrum to a white field of shrieking agony. Yet even above this torture, the man’s voice penetrated like the roar of a beast might penetrate a dying prey’s ears while it’s claws savaged the hapless animal.

“Behold the symbol of my righteousness, this blade I carry. It is none other than the divine sword given unto my blessed father by Lord Shiva the Destroyer himself, the indomitable moon-blade known as Chandrabhas that has never been bested in battle. I come to fulfil the prophecy of doom and to wreak the vengeance of Ravana upon you and all who stand by you. Do what you will, you will not escape my fury. You are lost now and Chandrabhas shall not rest until it has drunk deeply of your blood in combat.”

And then he opened his mouth – Rama did not have to see him do it to know he did – and emitted a sound that counterpointed and emphasized the shrieking of the sword to produce a new level of pain. Pain so intense, so all-pervasive, it reduced Rama to a sack of flesh riddled with nothing but pure suffering. He strained and struggled to maintain his upright stance, his wits, his dignity at least if not his strength, but he might as well have been that dying animal with its guts pouring out onto the ground trying to break free of the predator five times its weight and size. He fought with all his might, but it was beyond hopeless, it was laughable. He sank slowly to the floor of the high spot, brain raging with a fire greater than any forge furnace and felt his body stiffen like rock, his blood slow to a pounding gurgle, as the commingled shrieking wail of sword and sword-bearer filled not just his head and senses, but the universe entire.

Faintly, as if from a great distance, he heard another sound. A strange, inhuman sound such as nothing he had ever heard before. Slowly, through the fog of pain and sound and blinding brilliance, he realized it was his own voice. He was sobbing! Not just he, every Ayodhyan along the wall was crying out, groaning or screaming in agony as they reached the limits of their endurance and were still tortured.

The pain increased, intensified, to heights that he did not know he could experience.

And then, when he was certain his skin itself would burst and unloose his blood like an overripe jackfruit fallen from a high branch, he reached the limit of his ability to withstand pain and all went dark and mercifully silent.

Hanuman pressed down in rage and frustration with all his might. Yet try as he would, he could descend no lower than his present height of some forty yards above ground. He could barely move for that matter. It was as if he was wading through quicksand – in mid-air! As with quicksand, the more he struggled and raged, the more the air around him resisted and pushed back. He felt as if he was pushing against a giant winebag filled to bursting point, and while it yielded to pressure, it would not give away completely, nor was he able to burst his way through it. The vanar had grown accustomed to being able to use his preternatural powers to achieve almost any feat he desired in the past several months fighting for Rama's cause. Which made this inability all the harder to accept.

Yet accept it he had to, if only for the present. He looked down and saw the man turn his wrist again, increasing the intensity of the blinding light from his sword further, and the screaming wail both from the man's throat and the sword itself grew to intolerable limits even for a being such as Hanuman. He snarled, raising his thick lips to reveal his teeth. What he would not give for a chance to swoop down and ram into that man like a hawk descended upon a snake... He sensed the white man's awareness of him expand, and thought he heard a faintly mocking tone in the continual wailing that filled the universe. Yet the restriction on his own mobility only increased further, reducing his efforts to a mere sluggish churning of his limbs, until finally even that grew impossible and he was forced to remain still, frozen in an absurdly comical posture, like a fly in amber. He glared down at the man, or rather at the effulgent corona of light that vaguely outlined the shape of the man and the horse below, and cursed in the most fervently rude vanar sounds and clicks and burps he knew, even though no audible sound actually left his rounded snout.

He watched helplessly as the brave Ayodhyans along the wall all succumbed to the agony of the wailing and the light and the abnormal hardening of all matter, watched in immense frustration as Rama himself sank to his feet, the last to succumb, and continued to wage a silent desperate battle. He watched as finally Rama too was unable to fight any longer and slipped into open-mouthed unconsciousness, sprawled on the floor of the high spot. Below, the white rider turned his wrist once more and then the world exploded with brilliant white light and Hanuman saw no more of what followed.

Several moments after Hanuman lost consciousness, all was impossibly still and silent.

Ayodhya lay in a death grasp, shrouded by a darkness greater than night. The Sarayu Valley, verdant and sunkissed until moments ago, now lay under a dense pallor that was tinged with crimson. The sky boiled and seethed with a seemingly endless roof of clouds that were unlike any natural phenomenon ever seen. The air grew thick and still, as if the wind itself had been prevented from entering the great city-state. Not a leaf stirred, not a bird chirruped, not so much as an insect crept along the ground... The river itself seemed to have turned to clotted blood, its roaring rush reduced to a choked gurgle. Fish rose to the surface of the river and lay motionless, floating on their sides with one eye staring blankly up at the raging sky. Animals lay on their sides in the brush, in the dappled forests, in trees and burrows and dens and caves, barely breathing. The air grew fouler as if unable to move and refresh itself. The atoms of all matter moved slower than normal, reducing air to the texture of water, water to mud, and earth, flesh and bone to stone-like solidity. Moving one's body became a struggle, breathing became a torturous battle and even keeping one's eyes open was now a challenge. What Hanuman had experienced was also shared by every living being across the land in a large swathe that extended from the Sarayu Valley outwards to enclose a substantial part of the Kosala nation itself. Outside this region, life went on as normal. Within this area, everything that breathed lay unconscious. Even the creatures in the murky waters of the three moats ringing the city, the lice on the unwashed hair of the prisoners in the city dungeons, the parasites feasting on rotting meat in the refuse... all lay still, silent, senseless. Children slept in gurukuls, women at work, men at their chores, nothing and nobody was spared. The city slept a deep shuddering sleep that was no less than death. For none under the spell of this state could will themselves free of its grasp; nor could they be woken by anyone else.

Above the seventh gate, Hanuman floated in an absurd posture, frozen in mid-air like an insect trapped in ancient tree sap. A fly in amber? Possibly. But amber did not float. The vanar lay suspended in mid-air, the air hard enough to hold him aloft.

The rider who had identified himself as Atikaya, lowered the sword in his hand at last. The screaming from his mouth subsided. He brought the sword closer to his face, the hilt clutched in his palm a breath away from his lips and whispered softly. The words were in the ancient rakshasa speech, and had some similarity to Sanskrit highspeech. But the dialect Atikaya used was like none used by any rakshasa now, nor did it correspond precisely to the peculiarly unique grammar of the language of the Vedas. It was a more archaic tongue, and he spoke it fluently, the alien sounds and intonations rolling off his tongue smoothly, mellifluously. He finished the incantation and the light subsided. From a blazing beacon that had illuminated the night-like darkness now enshrouding the city, it reduced in degrees until the sword glowed faintly, like a dying ember, then the white heat receded across the surface of the blade, like ripples of light passing across the gleaming steel strip, to fade finally into the intricate curves and slashes of the icons imbedded in the metal. It glowed one final time, like a just-forged blade, then the last light snuffed out completely and it was just a blade once more, albeit a whitemetal blade of no metal known to mortalkind.

Atikaya sheathed the blade smoothly.

He dismounted his horse.

He glanced back at the ranks lined up behind his position, the lines upon endless lines of armed and armoured soldiers on horseback, stretching as far down the raj-marg as the eye could see. They remained in the same unnatural, stiff postures they had been for the past hour or more, ever since he had called a halt. Their faces stared blankly ahead, eyes fixed on points nowhere in sight, like men and women lost in a fugue. Even the ones who had been sitting on their horses in the frontline with him. Yudhajit in particular bore a frown on his broad face, as if he had been frozen into immobility at the very moment when he began to suspect that perhaps, just perhaps, he and his countrymen had been duped and enrolled in a cause which was not entirely in their own best interests. Atikaya resisted the urge to snarl a grin at the man: it had not taken much to talk the Kekayans into abiding by his scheme; they were always spoiling for a war and always quick to distrust Ayodhya, in particular Rama Chandra, because of whom their own offspring Bharat had not been crowned prince-in-waiting to begin with, and whose exile had rendered Bharat a king in name only for fourteen years. They had seethed and fretted with the perceived insult of these events for all those years, and when an opportunity rose to blame someone for it, especially the man they considered a rival to their own bloodline, they did not need much prodding. But aggressive though they were, they were not fools; Yudhajit had started to suspect that all might not be as Atikaya and his mother had declared back in Kekaya before his grizzled father's throne. The sheer confidence and authority with which Rama had disputed their assertions was enough to rouse his suspicions. Even the javelin that had struck Mandodhari so shockingly was not enough to remove that suspicion from the simple but stubborn mind of the eldest son of the Kekaya nation.

Speaking of Mandodhari...

Atikaya strolled over to the royal palanquin. Frozen in a tableau like a troupe of dancers at the end of a royal performance, waiting for the lights to be snuffed out so they could make their discreet exit, the rakshasis bent, reached, wailed, clutched, moaned and otherwise exuded horror and outrage at the plight of their mistress. Within their midst, Mandodhari lay sprawled on her back, head lolling sideways on the thigh of one of her servants. Atikaya bent down, crouching on his haunches. He held the sword behind himself so that it didn't obstruct his crouch, and examined the gruesome wound closely. The javelin had done tremendous damage. His mother's lungs, liver and other vital organs had been punctured and damaged terribly, her spine had been snapped and the sheer quantity of blood lost was enough to kill her in itself. She was on the verge of death. Only the swordsong had frozen her in stasis, along with every other living being around, thereby prolonging her life. The moment Atikaya sang the swordsong again and broke the spell of maya, Mandodhari would breathe her last. He mused on that a moment. Perhaps he ought to aid her departure. He peered at the wound, seeing inside it and into her body with the extranatural vision he possessed and saw a delicate spot where, if he nicked a damaged vein with a blade's edge just so, it would be enough to finish her off. She would still remain frozen until he sang the world awake again, but at least once he did, she would die at once. That would leave her no time to speak any last words, to say anything that might be potentially damaging to his plans. It would also be merciful in a sense; she could not be saved, and he would simply be putting her out of her misery.

He did not wish to use Chandrahas for such a meagre task. The moonsword was not needed for such a trifle. He looked around, spied a handblade peeping from the cleavage of a rakshasi aide and tugged at it, easing it from the soft mounds of flesh in which it lay secure. He inserted the point of the blade into the open wound, probed around inside his mother's gaping ribcage for a moment, then found the right spot. Just as he was about to cut the damaged vein open, she exuded a shuddering gasp and her hand shot out, grasping his wrist in a powerful grip. He almost screamed. Using him as her support, she pulled herself forward with a mighty wrench of energy and whispered hoarsely, blood bubbling from her mouth to run down her neck and disappear into the neckline of her gown.

“Do not forget why your father let you live, Ati. Not to fulfil your own twisted desires. But to complete his great plan. Even after I am gone, he will be watching you. Never think—” A mess of something thick and cloggy choked its way up her heaving gullet and dribbled stickily from the edge of her lip. She retched, then continued, spattering a spray of blood as she finished: “— never think he cannot reach out to you even now and admonish you. Remember who he is. Remember your given task. Fulfil your part and never —”

A hoarse, wheezing whistle came from her smashed chest and her eyes bulged, then rolled up into her head. She pitched back, striking her head against the edge of the palanquin’s carrying pole with a sickening sound, and lay still. She had released his hand as she fell lifeless, and he rubbed it ruefully now, smearing the blood and gore she had left on it. He waited in case there was still one last wheeze left in her. But she was gone for good this time. He cursed himself for forgetting momentarily that she would not be bound by the songspell of the sword that held the rest of the natural world in thrall. How could she be? She was a moon-mother as he a moon-child. But she was gone now and there would be no more arm-twisting, ear-bending, rump-paddling, head-rapping, or other forms of ‘admonishment’ as she called it. He took satisfaction in wiping his hands clean upon the hem of her gown, smearing the delicately embroidered rakshas silk. He rose and turned away, feeling a great burden fall from him.

As he walked toward the gate, he realized that he was now an orphan.

It was a hugely liberating feeling. He grinned as he cracked open the barred sally port with a single finger touch and savoured the moment before entering the city of his enemy. An orphan. No Ravana to tell him what to do and how to do it. No mother to ensure that he toed his father’s line, or else...

He was his own master now. And he was about to take charge of his new domain. His home, for a long time to come.

He stepped through the gate and into Ayodhya.

KAAND 3

ONE

Ayodhya lay in ruins.

Dense pillars of smoke rose up across the breadth of the city, interrupted by bellows of flame. Damaged houses lost integrity and crumbled into the smoking wreckage. Bodies and body parts lay strewn everywhere, an abbatoir of fresh slaughter. Weeping survivors crawled through the debris, leaving trails of life-fluids. Somewhere a baby howled, elsewhere a dying dog, somewhere else a confused caged beast in the royal menagerie, all mourning the same shared loss. The sky above the city had grown an angry red that was visible for yojanas around.

Ayodhya the proud, the beautiful, the undefeated, the unbesieged, had been vanquished at last. Those high walls, moats, towers, valiant defenders, millennia of military skill and tactical knowledge, all had come to naught in the end. The enemy had stepped through her gates unchecked, uncountered. Had worked his will. Ravaged as he desired. Pillaged. Raped. Brutalized. Using powers greater than any mortal could withstand – not that any had been given a chance to even try. For under the thrall of the moonspell, Atikaya had worked his vengeance in his father’s name. And even the greatest champions – Bharat, Shatrugan, Lakshman, Rama, Hanuman, countless other brave yoddhas – had lain frozen in grotesquely humiliating postures as the son of Ravana had wielded the sword Chandrahas and wreaked the terrible vengeance of Ravana.

Now, it was all over. A unknown measure of time had passed. Hours? Days? Weeks? It might have been months or years. It was impossible to tell from within the circuit of the songspell. For time itself had been frozen and all that transpired after the singing of the moonsword’s spell-song had taken place in some unearthly otherworldly haze. Atikaya had stalked the city’s proud avenues, laying waste to entire structures with a simple sweep of the greatsword. The Seer’s Eye, proudest landmark of the city, lay in a heap of rubble, brought down in a crashing avalanche with a few deft hews and thrusts of Chandrahas. The royal palace lay in shambles. The great trading houses, the mansions of the rich, the hovels of the poor, the ghettos of the less-socially acceptable lower varnas, all lay in battered ruins together, castes and communities commingled in a common devastation.

Atikaya walked upon the rubble, Chandrahas still singing its terrible hypnotic song. A keening sound that rode the uppermost limits of human hearing and would have set animals barking and roaring in outrage had the poor beasts still possessed independent locomotion and voice. It was a terrible, tragic song, for the sword knew what destruction it had wrought, what horrors it had participated in, what misery it had unleashed. It sang now for the dead it had reaved in thousands – nay, tens of thousands, lakhs even. For the lives it had ended, cut short, hacked down before their righteous time. The crunching of Atikaya's boots upon mottled brick and marble grist was the only other sound that could be heard in the desolate byways of the ruined city, a depressingly mundane counterpoint to the supernatural keening wail of the haunted blade. And still Chandrahas sang on: of darkness and glamour, dreams sliced to shreds, nightmares unleashed, rich blood let loose upon satin bedspreads, mute beasts and mortals alike butchered as they lay pinned by the spellsong as helpless as insects impaled upon pins. Chandrahas sang a dirge for them all. And for their way of life. Their code of dharma. Their lives and loves and memories and monuments, their civilization and its itihasa. And yet, even through its wailing heart-breaking dirge, was a note of lustful longing. For its work was not yet done. There were still victims to be despatched.

Atikaya climbed down the side of the heap of rubble that had once marked the Seventh Watch. The ancient building that housed the headquarters of the PFs – the Purana Wafadars. It was the first structure that any visitor encountered on entering the city. Had encountered. It lay, like hundreds of other proud structures, in a pile of shattered stones and broken bricks now. And as he stepped away from it, he faced the seventh gate once more, the one through which he had entered to unleash his father's vengeance. Outside that gate, the body of his mother lay rotting in the dust of the avenue. The long lines of armed and armoured mortal allies that Mandodhari and he had garnered through clever talk and fervent appeals and brought to Ayodhya also stood frozen still, but remained unharmed yet. He would slaughter them all as well. To send forth the message that all mortals were to be blamed for the invasion of Lanka and the death of Ravana. Sympathizers to Ayodhya, or enemies, it made no difference. The vengeance of Ravana was democratic and pervasive; it did not exclude anyone. Once the massacre of Ayodhya was done, he would go on to the other Arya nations, using tactics similar to the ones he had employed here. Unsheath the spell-song, freeze the denizens, then slaughter them like trussed-up fowl. Only a vague memory would remain of the great Aryavarta nations. And smouldering ruins.

After that, he would go on beyond the redmist mountains, to wipe out the vanar tribes and kingdoms. Then into the deep woods and caverns to hunt and destroy the rksaas. Chandrahas's spell-song worked equally well on all living creatures. By the time his mission was done, not one furry tree-climber, tree-hugger, or tree-cutter would remain on this mortal realm. All three races had conspired to assault his island-nation, his people, his father. All three must be ended, snuffed out as completely as a wax-stick flame in a darkened chamber.

Then all the earthly realm would be his for the taking, Chandrahas the beacon that led him onwards to ultimate success. And after Prithvi-loka, the nether domains of Patalaloka and Naraka, and all the other hellish realms. And then the Swargalokas themselves, dominions of the devas. He would achieve what his father had once achieved: lordship over all three worlds. But unlike his father, he would hold onto that lordship forever. Not lose it through disinterest and self-indulgent wantonness. He, Atikaya, would be god of all worlds, always.

He smiled and raised the sword. Its keening song enthralled him, caused his heart to murmur within its breast, and it took all his will-power not to succumb to its seductive lure. Even though as moon-child he was immune to its power, yet the very affinity he shared with it made him vulnerable. If Chandrahas and its potent song were doom to most people, to him they were a seductive drug, tempting and luring him endlessly. Even now, a mere glance at the blade's polished length drew him in like a whirlpool, promising sensual experiences beyond imagining, fulfillment beyond measure...

He tore his gaze away and forced his limbs to turn the sword downwards, then, with an exertion of will, he sheathed it. The song dimmed, yet remained at the periphery of hearing, like a silence so great that the mind generated ringing and roaring to fill the absence of stimulus.

He turned and looked at what he had wrought. The toppled towers and structures of Ayodhya lay before him, a wasteland strewn with the corpses of his most hated enemies. Fools. They had thought the resurrection of Kala-Nemi to be the real assault. That was only the distraction needed to permit him to approach close enough to the city gate without a full alarm being raised. As it was, the alarm had been raised, but in the heat of those desperate moments when it seemed Kala-Nemi would destroy the city, the presence of another crisis had been diminished and rendered less urgent long enough to let him get within striking distance. For even Chandrahas had its limits. A physical limit, that could be bounded by excessively high mountain ranges containing sufficient mineral and metal lodes. Or a psychic one, such as could be raised by one of sufficient prowess and spiritual strength. The saptarishis could resist its power, he knew. But where were the saptarishis now? The seven great brahmarishis who had walked the earth since the creation of the mortal plane were nowhere to be seen now. Vishwamitra, who had been such a bane, and who was responsible for the awakening of Rama's own power, had long since retired to the highest Himalayan peaks, there to continue his long meditation. Guru Vashishta, as he was known – more famous for his teaching in recent decades than for his status as one of the great caucus of Seven – had retired to an unknown location, presumably to pursue meditation as well. It was what all maharishis did; their source of spiritual strength. All that power they wielded came ultimately from the channelling of brahman shakti, and brahman shakti took a great deal of time and sacrifice to accumulate and store. It meant that their downtime was considerably more than their uptime. And right now, not one saptarishi walked the mortal plane. Which meant that nobody could resist the awesome destructive force of Chandrahas.

Atikaya smiled slyly as he walked towards the gate he had entered earlier. It was time now to use the terrible sword upon the last Ayodhyans who survived. The ones he could have despatched the instant he entered the city, had he chosen. But he had chosen not to do so: for by leaving them alive, he had ensured that they witnessed every horrendous deed he inflicted upon their fellow citizens. If not first-hand, then through the screams and rending cries and other terrible sounds and after-effects that had ensued once he went on his rampage of death and destruction. One way or other, they had remained alive, and frozen into impotent immobility by the sword's spellsong, while he had wreaked the vengeance his father had trained him for, saved him, raised him for. Ever since he was a babe, Atikaya had known that one day he would go forth and do this: today was that day. It was his only purpose in life. And neither Ravana nor Mandodhari had ever let him forget it.

As he walked towards the place where the survivors stood frozen in their absurd poses, he thought that the years of being kept secluded in his underground residence had been worth it. Seclusion so extreme that his skin had lost its pigmentation from lack of sunlight. In his own way, he had endured penitential seclusion too. Except that his years had been spent not in meditating in cross-legged silence upon a Himalayan peak, or subvocalizing the sacred mantra Aum infinite times, but in bonding with the forces that would someday aid in the destruction of his father's foes. This blade that hung now by his side, had been won through accretions of moon-metal gained ounce by precious ounce over the 17 years of his own existence. The mineral itself had been sweated out of his own blood, after being acquired through exposure to moonlight via a secret well his father had created especially for the purpose – a thousand feet below ground, under the bosom of Lanka, he had lain spread-eagled nightly, naked, absorbing moonlight, while chanting mantras of his scholarly pater's own composition. Ravana's mastery of the vedas and knowledge of the smriti texts – the secret lore of Sanatan Dharma – had been poured into the creation of great, immensely powerful mahamantras. And those mantras, when chanted by Atikaya himself while exposing himself naked to the moon night after night – effectively offering up the vessel that was Atikaya’s own being, conceived and birthed under precisely auspicious moon signs and constellations, had enabled him to draw the shakti of the moon itself into his pores. It had been agony indescribable: to draw in moonlight itself and convert it within his body into metal... he still shuddered now as he recalled those torturous nights that seemed to never end. At the end of each moon-cycle, he had felt his entire being luminous with energy, possessed of power indescribable. Then of course had come the draining as, drop by precious drop, the moon-metal had been drawn out of his body, and eventually, they had possessed enough to forge into a sword. And now, here was the sword by his side, and he its wielder. And this the day of reckoning.

He drew the sword now, its song more plaintive, more filled with lust and longing and seductive greed than ever before.

For it knew that it was about to slice the veins and drink the blood and end the lives of its greatest enemies ever.

Atikaya stepped forward, his smile a snarl of anticipatory satisfaction.

It was time to kill Rama, his wife, his brothers, their mother.

Time to end the Suryavansha Ikshwaku line.

And to begin a new line. The race of Ravana upon Earth.

He chuckled. His laughter mingled with the screaming howl of Chandrahas as he approached the place where Rama's blood-kin all stood frozen and helpless, and he raised the sword to deliver the most crucial part of his father's vengeance.

TWO

Bharat watched with impotent fury as the glowing moon-sword rose in a high arc. The blade blazed with that same mercurial fire, beyond bright, impossible to look at directly. He was frozen at an angle that enabled him to see the weapon that would end his life, yet bent over in a manner that exposed his bare neck, inclined at an angle. A man sentenced to decapitation could hardly have been better positioned. The instant Chandrahas fell, it would separate his head from his body. Somewhere within the frozen immobility of the spell that held him in check, his shoulder still throbbed faintly. Or perhaps it was the memory of the pain that still remained to torture his imprisoned senses. Either way, he could do nothing but watch at this absurd, twisted angle as the moon-sword fell upon his neck and severed him from life.

He could not see the sword itself. The sheer brilliance of the blazing light emanating from it dazzled his vision, blinding him. All he could see – like a man caught in a thick fog glimpsing silhouettes and shadows in the haze – was that the roaring screaming brilliance was rising up to hand's breadth above the Lankan's head, then pause before beginning its inevitable downward descent.

But before the sword fell and parted him from existence, something thumped to the ground behind Atikaya. Bharat could not see the rakshasa's features, but from the pause in the smooth movement and the shimmering flickers of the energy-bathed weapon, he could deduce that the son of Ravana was puzzled too. What was that dull thumping sound? What had fallen? And from where?

Mercifully, the blazing sword turned away from Bharat, as Atikaya glanced back over his shoulder. There was a very long pause and when Atikaya spoke again, it was in a tone that left no doubt of his reaction: he was shocked!

“You?”

Bharat’s eyes might not have been able to look past the dazzling beacon of the moon-sword. But his ears could hear just fine. What they heard in that single word spoken aloud was incredulity, inadvertently expressed and completely sincere.

He has been taken by complete surprise, Bharat thought. Whoever that is behind him now, he wasn’t expecting it.

Feeling some small satisfaction in the rakshasa’s response, Bharat used his peripheral vision and mental judgement to observe rather than clearly see Atikaya turn to look at the new arrival. The blinding scream of the spell sword diminished a little – but even a little was some blessed relief – as the rakshasa turned his back on Bharat in order to face his new enemy. “How did you—?” Atikaya began, then stopped. “It’s impossible,” he went on finally. “No one can withstand the glamour of Chandrahas.”

Footsteps now. Soft, slow, measured. Crunching the gravel that lined the inside of the wall in a swathe several yards wide, to enable the heavily laden carts of merchants carrying precious produce to the city for the weekly market to pass unharmed.

Then the footsteps ceased. Close by. And even without being able to see past the ardour of Chandrahas, Bharat sensed that the person who had leaped down from somewhere above had stopped just a few yards short of Atikaya.

“None,” repeated the person, agreeing. “None except someone who also has moon blood in their veins.”

Silence from Atikaya. The rakshasa stood with his back to Bharat, and even without being able to see past the blinding blaze of maya shakti, he could tell that the rakshasa was struck dumb. And that, he assumed, did not happen often to the son of Ravana.

“Of course,” said Atikaya slowly. Then chuckled. “Of course! You too have moon blood in your veins.

Because after all, you are my blood-kin. I knew that!”

“Say it then,” said the other voice. “Say it aloud, and acknowledge what is true.”

“So be it,” the rakshasa replied, recovered from the initial shock far faster than Bharat would have expected. “You are my one and only surviving—”

“—sister,” Sita said stepping forward, her sword lowered and held at an angle, poised to strike upward, for while Arya men favoured the brute strength of arms, back and shoulders gathered together by hacking downwards, a woman’s body – even a warrior of Sita’s skill and mettle – was best served by slicing upwards at a diagonal angle, under the guard of a man, the point of the blade sent piercing home into the softness of the armpit and thence onward to the heart chamber, or at the very least cutting a deep gash at the point where even the best fitted armour must yield space to allow for the wearer’s movement. She held it two-armed and angled as she moved towards Atikaya, on feet that seemed to tread on invisible beetles softly enough not to cause a single shell to crack, her face lowered, eyes hooded by the fringe of hair over her forehead, dark eyes burning in the white slits, petite nostrils flared, breath steady.

“That is your story,” she said. “And a fine one it must make to put sleeping rakshasa babes to bed at night. But here in Ayodhya it has the ring of a poorly written poem. There are better tales told in the drinking houses in the old quarter, where the kusalavya bards know that a tale well told could mean supper that eve, and a tale that displeases the hardworking hard-drinking boisterous audience would result in—” she shrugged. “Well, going to bed without supper would be the least of their complaints that night.”

Atikaya cocked his head, very much like a dog listening to his master perform some peculiar vocal feat. “Perhaps you haven’t noticed, sister dear,” the last words spoken so sweetly they came out as the opposite of a sneer yet managed to convey the same derogatory tone, “but there are neither drinking houses left in Ayodhya now, nor an old quarter, nor kusalavya bards, nor any hard-working hard-drinking boisterous —”

Sita laughed. Atikaya broke off in mid-sentence, and even without being able to see his face, Bharat knew that the rakshasa’s reaction was one of utter surprise. He wished he could smile to show his satisfaction at the ease with which his sister-in-law threw her head back and laughed full-throatedly.

“That asura-maya may fool everyone else,” she said when her mirth was exhausted. “But it has no effect on me, young brother.”

Silence from Atikaya. A smouldering, brooding silence that smelled of growing rage.

Sita strolled sideways, let the tip of her sword almost touch the dirt – almost, but not quite, which showed that the weapon remained in her control, and thus ready to strike despite the casual pose – as she manoeuvred into what Bharat instinctively knew was a better position than the earlier one. “It was a very clever plan indeed. Perhaps too clever.”

She stopped and glanced at the frozen figures suspended in the grip of the sword’s spell-song. Bharat sensed her gaze pass over his own face, felt the frisson of connection briefly, before moving on. Measuring her odds, weighing her strategy: God, but what a formidable general my bhabhi must be on the battlefield!

“But you overlooked one major factor,” she said, turning her attention in the general direction of her still-silent opponent without looking directly at him. “True, the ruling dynasty of Ayodhya comes from the Suryavansha Ikshwaku line. And their alignment to the sun-god Surya makes the bloodline most vulnerable to the power of Chandrahas, moon-sword. But you forgot that they are also related to the line of the Chandravansha dynasty, from which my own adoptive father Janaka of Mithila hails. And from that line they have a connection to the moon as well.”

Atikaya remained silent, standing stiffly and watching Sita as she roamed and spoke, neither yielding any expression nor giving away his reactions through movement or twitches. Yet that very lack of response was in itself the most vocal response of all. He is left speechless, Bharat thought with growing hope. And that's surely a good sign. If nothing else, at least his sister-in-law had shut off the rakshasa's boastful, offensive gloating.

“And that connection,” Sita said, glancing up at Atikaya now, her dark eyes flashing intensely as they met his, undisturbed by the blinding glare of Chandrahas even at this close distance. “is one you would have done well to recall in time. Before you launched this pathetic deception and miasma of illusion like a cheap fair-day conjurer.” She gestured toward the gate off to the left, “Before you killed your own mother to precipitate an imaginary breakdown in ‘negotiations’.” She tossed her head in a clipped feminine shrug of impatience. “Oh, don’t even bother to try countering that. I know that the javelin came from the direction of our ramparts, but that too was illusion. In fact, it was thrown by yourself and made to seem as if it came from another direction through the use of Chandrahas’s shakti – bending the light itself to create an optical illusion.”

Bharat would have exclaimed aloud at that revelation had he been able to do so, and it would have elicited and deserved one of his choicest abuses. He killed his own mother? That was low, even for a rakshasa. Even for the son of Ravana. It also meant that this Atikaya was a lethal opponent and not one to be trifled with. He felt a faint seed of unease and hoped Sita knew what she was doing, toying with an enemy so perverse, so powerful.

“But that was not the end of your cheap mela-day jiggerpokery,” Sita said, settling into a stance not unlike the one she had first presented – but with a much better angle of approach, Bharat noted approvingly. “After that, everything else you ‘did’ was pure illusion.” She gestured with an inclined head at the city behind her, still burning and smouldering and in ruins. “All this. The devastation of Ayodhya. The rape of an Arya nation. This is no more real than your absurd claims and allegations made earlier. True, you hold a great weapon in your unworthy hands. True, Chandrahas is capable of wreaking such devastation – far greater than even this spectacle, were it real. And true, Ravana did have a vengeance he prepared for and carefully nurtured over millennia – not mere years or decades or centuries even! But that vengeance, and Chandrahas’s role in its execution, and your own part, were not intended to be played out in this manner. Nor were you to take matters into your own hands thus. And for doing so, and for ignoring your own father’s wishes and deviating from his carefully manicured plan, you will pay a price. You know this already, of course. I am merely reminding you.”

“Stop!”

The word was a high-pitched squeak of protest. A panicked denial and appeal from a nervous adolescent. Atikaya’s hands trembled visibly as he lowered the moon-sword to point at Sita. The glow blazed out towards her, obscuring her and that entire field of view in its brilliant blaze. Without being able to see them clearly, Bharat sensed that the rakshasa’s hands were trembling now. Sita-bhabhi’s words really hit their mark! Can it really be true? All that she just said? But if it was true, then it begged the question—

“How could you possibly know all that?” Atikaya asked, his voice higher pitched than before, breaking at the end of the question. “How?”

Sita smiled. Or at least Bharat assumed she did. “I know more than you think, my naïve and foolish brother. I know that your mother and you were in fact sent here as envoys to propose a new world order, one in which Ayodhya and Lanka would be allies, and all Aryavarta would unite into one harmonious empire to be ruled not by a single king but by a table of kings. It would end wars between kingdoms, between chieftains and factions, and unite the mortal realm into one great empire ruled by mutual trust and peaceful harmony. That was Ravana’s genius: To use his own defeat in order to generate sufficient sympathy to unite the entire world. And because Rama was responsible for Lanka’s decimation, he would feel compelled to comply. All kings would. Those who refused would be seen as churlish at best, and hostile to their neighbours at worst. In a single brilliant stroke of statesmanship, all mortalkind would be brought together and compelled to work together in peaceful unity hereafter. A legacy so great, it would be remembered for all time to come.”

She raised the sword, pointing it at Atikaya. “But you disagreed. For such a move would rob you of your chance at glory. This was not the ‘vengeance’ you had been raised for, which you had dreamed of since you were a child. You wanted blood and spoils, rape and reaving, plunder and land, dasyas and power alliances. Under this new world envisaged by your late father, you would be just another diplomat in a world of diplomats, reduced to roundtable discussions and heated but ultimately peaceful talks. All words, no actions. No spoils! No loot. No gain. No glory. That would not do, not for you. So you played along until the last moment. And then, you turned the tables. Your mother would have blustered and spoken a few more harsh words, levelled her accusations and allegations. But once her anger and frustration had burned out naturally, she would have capitulated and laid before all the master-plan of her late husband. That was what you would not let happen. And so you turned coat. You killed your mother, and used her death to justify the destruction of Ayodhya. And now, by killing Ayodhya’s ruling family, you would remove the greatest obstacles to your own plan. Leaving nobody formidable enough to stand in your way as you achieved the goal you felt you were born to achieve: Mastery of the entire mortal realm!”

Atikaya shuddered, whether from unbearable anger or fear, Bharat could not tell. The rakshasa's voice was still trembling with nervous anxiety when he spoke: "I still don't understand. How could you know all this? And what do you mean, this is all an illusion? I destroyed Ayodhya. You can see it for yourself, smouldering in ruins. It's gone! Surely you cannot deny the evidence of your own senses!"

Sita laughed again. "Even you aren't foolish enough to have entered the gates of your enemy, left him standing alive behind you, while you plundered and looted his city. Even if he was under the spell of Chandrahas. Killing Rama is the first thing you would do upon entering these vaunted gates. And it is the first thing you were about to do just now – before I interrupted your reverie."

She glanced back over her shoulder and to Bharat's amazement, the smoking fires, the crumbled edifices, the decimated towers, all resolved themselves in one shimmering, melting moment – back into a fully solid, perfectly intact, unharmed and untouched Ayodhya once more. He swore mentally as he realized that it had all been an illusion – or some kind of day dream within the perverse imagination of Atikaya himself, and through the power of the moon-sword, it had been transposed to the minds of all those under the spell. Only now, because they knew it was not true, their minds were able to see the city as it truly was. Pristine and undamaged.

Sita continued. “You merely stepped in through the gates, paused a moment or two to let your imagination play havoc – which sick vision was communicated to the minds of all those under Chandrahas’s thrall – before turning to step this way to despatch one by one Rama and his family. Had I not been able to shake free of the moon-sword’s spell-song, you would have finished your dirty deeds and then gone on to do exactly as your perverted mind envisaged.”

She hefted the sword, swung it this way and that, as warriors often did from time to time to prevent muscles from stiffening. “But here I am. And here you are. And your wicked deviation from Ravana’s original plan will end here and now before it goes any further.”

Without further ado, she leaped forward and attacked the rakshasa. By rights, she ought to have brought him down with her first blow. Instead, her deftly-swung sword merely clanged off an invisible shield, rang out with a terrible ear-splitting burring sound, and was twisted out of her hands to be sent flying yards away. Sita exclaimed and bent over, nursing her wrist which Bharat knew must have been badly twisted by the force and angle with which her sword had bounced off the invisible obstacle.

And then, to her surprise, and Bharat's as well, Atikaya threw his head back and laughed. As open and full-throated a laugh as Sita herself had emitted only moments earlier. Gone was all trace of nervousness. The rakshasa sounded now as if it was he, not Sita, who had been in full command of the situation all this while.

THREE

Sita stared at Atikaya. The rakshasa laughed and laughed until tears spilled from his ghostly grey eyes. The tears were viscous and treacly and though they seemed colourless in themselves, the fluid trickling down his skin appeared greenish in hue. The moon-sword, still held in his hand, blazed and burned without pause, but the shade of its emission seemed to change hue from blinding white to a faint greenish grey as well, a sickly hue that pulsed steadily in rhythm to his laughter. Finally the son of Ravana stopped laughing and looked at Sita. The sword's spellfire blazed steadily.

“Girl,” he said. And now the high-pitched voice of a few moments ago was gone, replaced by a gruff growl, like a young fox threatening a rival. “For girl you will always be, no matter your age in years. You mortals can never fully understand how pointless is your opposition to the asura races. We have walked the earth since before the dawn of your species. And we shall walk it again aeons after you are but ashes and crumbled bones. Your futile resistance only strengthens us by weeding out our weakest specimens. Yet even the strongest among you cannot face up to the might of our greatest warriors! For we wield the secret to ultimate power. The way of brahman channelled into fleshly artifice. For ages untold we have studied to perfection and mastered the art of manipulating the eternal cosmic energy in ways your feeble human minds can never imagine. This is how my father was able to forge Chandrahas. How he raised an army of asuras great enough to invade and conquer the realm of the devas as well as Naraka. And he would have conquered the mortal world too, if not for the accidental happenstance that benefitted your husband.”

Sita forced herself to speak without betraying any trace of hesitation or fear: “It was no accident, nor happenstance. It was Brahmarishi Vishwamitra’s deep knowledge of Vedanta that enabled him to pass on the smriti shloka summoning the terrible power of the brahmastra. And it was Rama’s unwavering sense of dharma that enabled him to utter that shloka. He unleashed the greatest astra ever devised and wiped out your father’s evil hordes before they could accomplish their invasion. One man. Alone against untold asuras. And he alone stood alive at the end of that encounter.”

Atikaya issued a sound that was neither human nor animal, but resembled something between a lion’s cough and a horse’s snort. “Believe your girlish fairy tales if it helps you stay sane. The truth is, everything that happened, from Rama’s birth itself and before it, right to this very moment, was planned and meticulously put into place by my father. The genius of Ravana engendered the very existence of Rama Chandra. For without Ravana, there could be no Rama. And without Rama, we would not be here today. Nor, perhaps, would the world itself.”

What did he mean by that? Even Sita could not fathom those cryptic words. Yet she sensed that despite his nauseating arrogance and nerve-rasping tone, he spoke without any trace of deception. She pushed the thought aside. There would be time later to muse over and analyze; now, it was time to turn this confrontation back to her advantage, and quickly. She did not like the way Atikaya had pretended to be cowed at first, then turned the tables on her so abruptly. She must regain control of the situation. Too much depended on her doing so.

“You can weave your myths and fancies all you wish, rakshasa,” she said coldly. “It does not change the fact that you went against your father’s wishes. That you murdered your own mother because you knew she would not cooperate with your change of plan. You are nothing but a rogue and a renegade seeking to aggrandize yourself by vaulting piggyback over the great history and painstakingly acquired shakti of your great father. Yes, I acknowledge Ravana’s greatness, though it sticks in my gullet to even speak his name. He was a great king, a great master of the Vedas, a mighty brahmin and a devout Shiva worshipper. All his immense shakti came from the same sources that empowered Vishwamitra, Vashishta and the other saptarishis who walked the earth since time immemorial. But he corrupted the use of brahman shakti. He turned it to the devices of asura maya. For self acquisition. Personal gain. Lust and avarice. Greed and profit. Rape and reaving. Conquest and subjugation. These were not acceptable under dharma and by violating dharma he violated the natural order of the universe itself. Therefore he had to be stopped. Had not Rama stopped him, some other champion would surely have risen to do the needful. Ravana's time had come. Rama merely happened to be the right person in the right place – and Ravana's abduction of me the mistake that cost him his life.”

Atikaya smiled, flashing teeth so flat and blockish they seemed incapable of biting or tearing even the softest food. Teeth quite unlike that of any rakhasa Sita had ever seen. Yet there was such menace and forbidding in that grin, it made her pray she never had those teeth at her own throat in a fight.

“That is where you are mistaken, queen of Kosala,” he said in a voice suddenly reduced to a very normal – almost human – level and tone. The transition was as shocking as if he had ratcheted up to a louder rather than softer level. “And that mistake, and that lack of acceptance of the truth, and that yawning gap in your otherwise impressive stable of knowledge, is what will cost you your husband's life. For all this, this mad bloody game of kings, is but a small part of the greater dance being performed at the end of days. And we but bit actors in a lavish production. The real drama is elsewhere. Offworld. The real war is being waged in other realms, other times, other universes. Your husband, the one you still foolishly believe to be Rama Chandra of Ayodhya, is there, fighting those battles, waging those wars. Not entrapped in this minor realm in that flesh cage you recognize and assume to be his only form. I said this before and I say it again now, and mark my words for they are true: Rama is not Rama. Ayodhya not Ayodhya. This world is not what it seems. Nothing is as it appears. And we are pathetic unfortunate beings banished out of our true time and place and the worse for it."

He raised the moon-sword and as Sita watched with bewilderment, it pulsed stronger and stronger, its blazing effulgence growing to an impossible degree, bathing Atikaya himself in a wash of dazzling white light tinged with grey and green in swirling patches. And as its light increased, so did its song.

"I know now how you knew what you knew," he said, his voice slowly overwhelmed by the rising shriek of the swordsong. “You were able to channel the flow of the chandra-shakti. The power of the moonsword. And since my consciousness and the sword’s are one, you were thereby able to read the contents of my uppermost thoughts as well.” He chuckled wistfully. “That is how you were able to discern everything that was in my mind. A simple yet effective device and one that threw me off-guard for a brief moment, I admit. But that was the extent of your ability. The moonsong that burns in your veins can do no more for you. Your puny Mithila steel toothpick cannot match the power of Chandrahas. Nothing and nobody can. And now, it is time for me to complete my small part in this very great game. Time for me to slaughter your husband in this flesh form, and his entire family and dynasty. And then,” he glanced towards the city behind her, “then I shall unleash the vengeance that you glimpsed in my vision before. And this time, Ayodhya shall truly fall. And burn to ruination.”

He held the sword in both hands now, and chanted a mantra that was drowned by the deafening banshee wail of the swordsong. Sita cried out in agony as the waves of energy rammed into her senses like a stone wall falling and she sensed dimly that the sword had fallen from her hands. Then her knees struck the dirt and her forehead bent over until it touched the ground, obeising herself against her will to the deity that was the moon Himself incarnate now. This amsa of Chandra-deva. The progeny of Ravana. Her brother in blood if not in spirit and intent.

“BEHOLD!” Atikaya’s voice rang out with the clear sharpness of a metal hammer striking a clear brass bell. “BEHOLD THE VENGEANCE OF RAVANA!”

And he matched word to deed, bringing the sword down to cleave the ground itself with a force that shook every bone in Sita’s body and threw her a dozen yards up into the air, flying backwards like a pebble slung from a catapult to land in a shattering impact. Then she saw no more.

Everyone frozen by the spellsong of Chandrahas watched and listened with impotent horror as Atikaya brought the moon-sword down with a mighty force, smiting the ground and cleaving it like a woodaxe cleaving a chip. The ground beneath their feet shuddered under the impact and a great crack appeared in the great avenue that led from the foremost gate into the city. The force was great enough that the vibrations caused buildings to tremble and dust and plaster to fall in a shower. Had the entire populace of Ayodhya, and all fauna in the Sarayu Valley itself not been frozen by the asura sorcery, the shock would have drawn a reaction no less than an avalanche or an earthquake. As it was, the world shuddered visibly and the crack in the ground spread in outwardly radiating ripples, creating a spiderweb tracery into which the dust and gravel of the avenue crumbled and fell in a steady shower. Dust rose up in a blinding cloud, and when it settled several moments later, there was a roughly Y-shaped jagged crevasse some fifty yards in length and as much in width. How deep the crack ran below ground, it was hard to tell, but an observer standing on the rim looking down would have seen nothing but darkness for several yards downwards.

Sita lay crumpled across the far side of the crevasse, rendered unconscious by the force with which she had been flung and fallen. Had she struck a wall or post at that speed, she would no doubt have broken her back and body. As it was, she lay bruised and battered, but merely unconscious, not seriously hurt.

Or so Rama assumed. And hoped. And prayed.

Sita's boldness in facing Atikaya alone was breathtaking. But his heart had been in his mouth when she had moved of her own volition, shrugging off the spell's miasma, climbing down the stairway, then leaped down the last few yards to land on the street and confront the rakshasa armed with nothing but an ordinary sword. A Mithila sword against Chandrahas? A mouse battling an elephant would have stood a better chance: at least the mouse could slip into the pachyderm's trunk and block its air and food passage; it could do something. Sita could have accomplished nothing by that risky manoeuvre. It made Rama seethe with impotent anger that she had put herself and their unborn children into harm's way without any forethought or expectation of a successful outcome. But he could not deny that it also made him proud. She was truly a queen of Ayodhya. A monarch of the Kosala nation. And she had proven that yet again, this time in full view of all those whose opinion counted in this kingdom. That would go far in helping her gain the trust, love and respect of everyone – if she survived.

But she hadn't stood a chance against the son of Ravana. Nor did anyone else in this land. Not so long as the young matricide carried that sword.

The first order of business was to take that sword away from Atikaya before he could wreak havoc with it and fulfil the terrible nightmarish vision that he had forced all their captive minds to share only a short while earlier. Or, if it was not possible – or too costly in terms of collateral damage – then the next best tactic would be simply to negate the power of the sword itself, render its epic shakti utterly meaningless...

By countering it with an even greater weapon.

FOUR

Atikaya laughed.

The rakshasa was in his element. Nothing, nobody, no power could thwart him. Ayodhya lay before him like a calf beneath a naked blade. Prithvi-loka itself lay unguarded beyond. Soon, he would achieve even greater glory than his father ever had. He would rule the three worlds for all time to come. With Chandrahas he was indestructible. And once word of the slaughter and havoc he was about to unleash upon Ayodhya spread, few would dare oppose him. The world would open before him like an oyster offering up its prize.

The crack in the ground he had cut open with a single downstroke of Chandrahas yawned wide, running like a jagged streak of lightning away from him. Had he chosen, he could have made a crevasse large enough to swallow entire buildings – or half the city. But that would be too simple. He intended to make the most of his time in Ayodhya. The Unconquerable? Not to Atikaya! The Conquered, it would be known as henceforth. He chuckled at his own wit and hefted the great sword, relishing the thrumming power of chandra-shakti that sang from the face of the open blade and reverberated through his entire being. It evoked powerful lusts within his libido, and he licked his lips in anticipation of the havoc he would wreak today. Finally, he would reap the rewards of a childhood and youth spent in silent patient suffering and preparation. All he had been until now was a weapon of vengeance, a weapon created, tooled and honed by his father and mother. Now, he was to be unleashed. And he would show no mercy, give no quarter, yield not an inch.

A sound rattled through the roar of shakti that enveloped him, cutting through the raging song of Chandras has like a bell heard faintly from across a valley. He frowned. Had that foolish woman regained consciousness? Did she really think she could stand up to him for even a fraction of an instant? He glanced in her direction: No. There lay her body, still crumpled in a heap. She was stone-cold unconscious, or worse. Which was all to the better. For he craved tastier meat than that. His cravings were far deeper and darker than mere flesh-lust could satiate. He desired the dark secret terrors of the flesh that to most mortals resembled the workings of hell-demons. After all, he was a rakshasa, was he not? And he had 17 years worth of abstinence, deprivation and isolation to make up for today. And in the days and aeons to come.

Again that sound.

What was that?

He turned his head to seek out the source.

And saw the man standing in the centre of the sprawling avenue. A dark-skinned skeletal-thin man in a ragged dhoti. Some kind of religious priest, the kind that sat in deep jungles or high mountaintops and meditated till they were skin and bone, surviving on spirit alone. What were they called? Sadhus? Rishis? Munis? All of the above? This sadhu looked like he had until recently been covered in some kind of unguent and had wiped it all off hurriedly – most of it anyway. His skin also looked raw and tender, as if he had been exposed to great heat very recently, a flame great enough to blister and peel the skin off. His eyes were bloodshot, his weight supported upon a charred staff that looked like it had been turned almost to coal in a fire, and his striking egg-shaped head was denuded of hair, as bare as his beardless face. The man had definitely been in a fire quite recently and looked more like a sickbed patient than even the average wandering mendicant begging for alms.

Atikaya grinned, feeling the energy pouring out of his mouth, wafting on his breath, tingling in his fingertips and toes, waiting to burst free.

“What do you want, old one? And how is it that you’re able to withstand the song of the moon-sword?”

The painfully thin rishi – or perhaps he was a sadhu? Was there a difference? – leaned heavily on his blackened staff and raised his head a fraction. Enough so that his eyes met Atikaya’s gaze levelly. Instead of showing fear or the abject terror that ought to have been there as a mark of respect for the one who wielded Chandrahas, there was only a sad bewilderment. A look of loss. As if the old sage was looking at an animal or something to be pitied rather than the most magnificent rakshasa ever to walk the streets of Ayodhya – perhaps the only rakshasa apart from great-uncle Kala-Nemi who had played such a significant part earlier this morning.

As if reading his mind, the rishi said aloud, “Your father’s uncle did his part well. I will admit I too was duped by the appearance of Kala-Nemi, dramatic as it was. I assumed that it was the crisis I had dreamed of these past several months. The great and terrible crisis to befall Ayodhya that would change the course of mortal history forever. But in fact, the resurrection of Kala-Nemi from the subworld of Naraka into which he had been relegated was merely a ploy, a clever conjuror’s trick to distract the city from the real enemy threatening it this day. And that was you, son of Ravana. Kala-Nemi’s cleverly staged resurrection, timed to the minute, was only a ruse to distract Rama and his family from the army approaching the city. Had they not been occupied by the crisis at their very gates, they would surely have thwarted your arrival and brought matters to a head long before you could approach the city proper. But as it so happened, they were kept occupied long enough for you to move into position, close enough to work your asura-maya and unsheath the sword where it would work most effectively.”

The rishi gestured towards the main gate of Ayodhya, to his left and now to Atikaya’s right. “Yet, even that army outside only serves the purpose of minor pieces in a game of chaupar. I see your shrewd plan now. After you wreak your havoc, you will leave those allies of Ayodhya to take the blame. And thereby cause the outbreak of an internecine war between the Arya nations, even as you continue to freely rove the mortal realm and rape and pillage and destroy at will. A clever plan it is. And one that you probably feel is foolproof. But of course, the only fool who is proof against that plan is yourself, son of Ravana.”

Atikaya was sure he had misheard. Surely the tottering, half-dead, starving-thin old man had not just called him a fool? But he had of course. What impudence. What folly! He began to lower Chandrahas in a threatening gesture towards the old rishi. To his surprise, instead of blanching with fear or turning tail and running for his life, the brahmin mortal actually looked as if he had expected Atikaya to do just that and continued speaking unperturbed.

“Yet there are greater plans than your little boy’s game. Laid out since before the beginning of time, some of them. By minds greater and quite unfathomable to one such as you, or to most beings for that matter. Those plans are the maps by which the course of human history moves, along predestined paths and byways. Nothing is truly random or unexpected, not even randomness itself. Even the tiniest flea nipping at a horse’s flank in a remote stable serves a purpose. Not necessarily a purpose of any particular benefit to the flea or the horse, but to the plan itself.”

Atikaya almost giggled. What was the old man blathering about? Fleas and horses?

“You’ll make a nice bed for the fleas to nest in very soon, old one, if Chandrahas leaves enough of you for the fleas!”

And he levelled the sword without further ado. Enough of this nonsense. He had waited long enough for this day, this moment. He had no intention of being interrupted any further by a brainless old sage mouthing incomprehensible inanities.

Chandrahas spat a swell of blue flame. A jagged bolt of blue fire shot out from the tip of the moon-sword and struck the old man with an impact that flashed like lightning striking a lone tree on a mountaintop. Atikaya turned away without bothering to even look at what remained. He leaped across the crack in the earth he had made, landing on the far side with a spring in his step and glee in his heart: A great deal of killing to be done and a whole city filled with people to do it too.

The blow caught him totally unawares. One moment he was striding towards a band of armoured soldiers in the distinctive purple-and-black uniform that most of the Ayodhyan gate-defenders were clad in, intending to start by despatching the frozen men with a few deft flicks of the moon-sword. The next moment, he was hurtling sideways through the air.

He struck the wall of a structure made of stone with force enough to rattle his bones.

That's impossible. I should not even feel any impact, with Chandrahas in my hands, its energy protecting me.

He slid down the wall, scraping the side of one arm painfully against the rough stone – “Aaah!” he cried out, the pain shockingly unexpected and inexplicable – and landed on bent feet that crumpled underneath, toppling him face first onto the dusty avenue. He spat out dirt and rubbed the back of one hand savagely against his mouth, his rage mounting uncontrollably.

“Who do you think you’re playing with here?” he shouted. “Do you know who I am? Do you realize the power of this weapon I have? What it can do to you?”

There was a soft chuckle that was more growl than laugh and even through the dust of the avenue he saw the familiar unmistakable shape looming large.

“I KNOW,” said the impossible ten-headed form rearing up through the dervishes of dust that had suddenly sprung up out of nowhere, accompanied by a chilling wind that was at odds with the near-noon sunshine that was still blazing down. “I KNOW BECAUSE I CREATED BOTH. THE SWORD. AND YOU, MY SON.”

FIVE

Valmiki gazed at the figure that loomed, topping even his own two yards height by almost another full yard, and was almost as wide. That rack of ten heads, each with its own distinctive features and personality, its own independent voice and mind, that neck as thick and knotted with powerful muscle as that of a Himalayan stag, that chest as broad as the chest of three warriors, those arms one above the other, each moving independently, veined with wiry muscle and stony sinew. And that voice. At once gravel and granite. Thunder and wolves. Bear and breaking rapids. Once heard, it could never be forgotten, he had heard it said. Even though it was the first time he had had occasion to hear that mighty rack of voices speaking, he knew the legend was true.

Ravana was a being to behold.

One head of the Lord of Lanka turned to glance in Valmiki's direction, whispered something to its companion heads, and then the great torso twisted as the rakshasa turned, his central head staring directly at Ratnakar. A strange sensation, like cold water washing across his spine and nerves then evaporating instantly, then he felt sweat break out on his face. His skin still felt raw and scalded. But the unguent Hanuman had used had worked a miracle: he suspected it had been part of the cache of precious herbs that the vanar had brought back from the secret mountain and used to provide succour during the battle of Lanka, or so he had heard. It was beyond belief that he could be so well recovered barely a few hours after suffering such unspeakable burns. And he did not feel all well. Yet he could stand and move of his own volition, with only some discomfort. And that was all that he required. The events transpiring here today were historic; it was the reason he had come to Ayodhya after all. Whatever the consequences to himself personally, he could not lie in a sickroom while this terrible pageant unfolded.

Ravana's gaze lingered on him a moment then turned back to its main quarry, Atikaya. The young rakshasa was a being in shock. He stood gaping open-mouthed across the crevasse he had cut with the moon-sword, at his father. His surprise and horror were evident, and were only to be expected.

“But you are dead,” he said incredulously. “I saw you die on the field back home in Lanka. Everyone did!”

Ravana's voice rolled and crashed, like thunder in distant ranges. “Indeed. I died. And am still dead in your timeline.”

In your timeline. A curious choice of words.

“But I am not present in the Ayodhya of your day and time. I am standing in Ayodhya of long ago. So long ago, that there was no Ayodhya as you know it. No

Arya nations. No Lankan city. No rakshasa race even. I am in a time before civilization rose upon this realm. An age when the gods still walked the earth freely, and we who came to be called a-suras later, were still suras, or allies of the devas.”

Ravana gestured behind himself. “This is the place where Ayodhya shall someday rise.”

Valmiki peered curiously at what lay behind Ravana. It took him a moment to realize that it was not the same as the rest of the vista before his field of vision – because it was merged so perfectly with the real Ayodhya around it, it seemed the same, but on closer inspection, it was quite evidently a different world. Or rather, the same world, same place, in a different time. An older, much older, time.

He saw a landscape that was more primordial than any he had seen in his living memory. It was still the Sarayu Valley. But it was densely overgrown, in a way that he had glimpsed in the deep jungles of Janasthana during the years he had fought alongside Rama’s valiant band of outlaws and rebels against the rakshasa hordes. Not the dense yet human-occupied Sarayu Valley of today. The woods rolled across the entire length and breadth of the river’s banks without relief.

There was no raj-marg, no sentry towers, no gates, no moats, no structures – and no people. None at all. Nor any signs of human presence – flora grown to provide for human needs, for instance. He could not know for certain, for it was merely a brief glimpse, but somehow he sensed that it was an age when no mortal beings had begun to appear on Earth. Perhaps not even most of the other races of animals, fish and fowl. Merely the verdant realm of Prithvi Maa herself, gardener supreme.

His gaze passed on to the air to either side of Ravana and he noted a peculiar phenomenon. The air shimmered and warped in two places, one on either side of the rakshasa lord, as if the lines where the old world and the new met were conjoined together with a slight imperfectness. Beyond the warped air and light of those two lines, extending vertically to meet in a kind of vaulting overhang like an insubstantial arch in which Ravana stood centred, the world of the present was visible. Where the world of the present met the old time, all modern details – buildings, wall, frozen soldiers – vanished completely.

“I stand here upon the site where Ayodhya shall be built someday,” Ravana’s rolling voice said. “Not in the here and now that you occupy. But in another place and time, millennia before the time and place of my death. I speak to you from the past, Atikaya. From a time when I was not much older than you are now.” He chuckled sonorously. “Well, in a manner of speaking. For while I am not 17 at this moment, relatively speaking it is in the adolescence of my long lifespan. A mere few centuries of age.”

And it was true. For though Valmiki had never met Ravana in person, yet like all famous personages the rakshasa lord was legendary enough that his description down to the most minute detail had been repeated often enough in Valmiki’s hearing over the decades for him to realize that the figure standing before him was a much younger Ravana than the one spoken of in the present age. It had been widely known that the rakshasa lord was many years old, whether hundreds, thousands or – as some rumours had it – tens of thousands of years, he did not know for sure. But Ravana had just confirmed the rumours. A mere few centuries of age. In the adolescence of my long lifespan...the past...the site where Ayodhya shall be built someday. Ayodhya herself being at least six centuries old, that would make the rakshasa lord a millennium old, perhaps millennia even?

Valmiki saw Atikaya glance furtively around, his eyes flicking nervously like those of a man coming to terms with an unexpected development and trying rapidly to figure out a way to factor it into his plans. He glanced in Valmiki's direction but his gaze passed over him, not seeing a threat worth noting. Nowhere near as great a threat as his ten-headed father returned from the dead. The next words out of his mouth betrayed his own sense of guilt and self-loathing, as obvious as in a child caught torturing a household pet.

“I was only...” Atikaya's tongue flicked out to lick his lips, the latter faintly greenish-grey, the former distinctly purple, in keeping with the rakhasa's unusual colouring. “...undertaking the task with which you entrusted me, father. The mission for which you created me and prepared me to undertake.”

Ravana made a sound of dismissal. “This was not that task. Nor the manner in which the actual given task was to be carried out. You know that as well as I do. Even from this remote time, I have the ability to open portals into your day – or rather, a single series of portals integrated vertically in one timeline, a vortal as I term it. Through this vortal, I have been watching and observing you closely ever since you left Lanka, as I thought you might try something as puerile and juvenile as this. In a sense, you haven't disappointed me at all. You have just done what I expected you to do."

Atikaya's eyes continued to flick left and right, even as his voice feigned an injured ego and a tone of accusation: "You spied on me? You do not trust even me, your own son?"

"I trust nobody," Ravana replied, unperturbed by the outburst. "Especially not my own son. The history of the rakshasa nation is a history of patricide and regicide. Often both directed at the same person."

"Yes, but this is the task that you—"

"Shut up." Ravana's voice was mild, almost off-hand. "Don't bother with pointless denials and don't try to buy yourself time to think yourself out of this one, boy. I'm not going to punish you for your mistakes and your excesses. Besides you haven't done much – you haven't done anything, in fact. Killing your mother..." Those powerful shoulders shrugged. "Well, matricide is almost as common among our people. No, that is not what brought me here."

"Then why are you here?" Atikaya asked nervously but with growing reassurance. Ravana's last words had gone some way in giving him his self-confidence back. That, and the fact that the lord of rakshasas was not roaring and venting fury at him by now.

Valmiki was looking at Ravana when the lord of Lanka – correction, the erstwhile Lord of Lanka – replied. “To ensure that you do nothing to harm my lord and master.”

Atikaya frowned, blinking in amazement. “Your Lord and Master? You have none! You are lord and master of the three worlds. You won that supremacy for yourself when you fought and defeated both devas and asuras and wrested heaven and the underworld both before moving on to Prithvi-loka and subjugating it to your thrall as well. “

“That I am,” Ravana admitted. “Yet there is one to whom even I bow and pay allegiance. And with my death, I am finally free to do so openly and without fear of diminishing my own stature. For in the plane that I currently occupy, I am free to walk between worlds, between ages, between moments of itihasa, as I please. That is the gift and power of my great lord.”

Atikaya chuckled, a sound that mirrored his father’s laugh only moments earlier, yet was less mature and baritone in inflection. “I never thought the day would come when you would acknowledge anyone greater and more powerful than yourself.”

“That is because you know very little about me, son. Almost nothing, in truth. On the eternal plane, I have always been subservient to my lord and master. His greatness is everlasting, his glory undiminishable. All that I do, have done, or will do, is only in his name and serves only his purpose. I am but a small piece upon the chaupar board of his infinite game.”

Valmiki would not have believed he was even hearing the words Ravana had just spoken. As it was, had they not been delivered with complete sincerity and conviction, he would have laughed at them outright. But Ravana’s sincerity was undeniable. Apparently, there was a being that even the lord of all demonkind – for what else were asuras to mortals if not demons – revered and adored. Who could this being possibly be? What great and powerful asura did Ravana bow to on the eternal plane?

Atikaya’s voice betrayed the young rakshasa’s own scepticism. “Who is this great being whom you obey then, father? Pray, share his name with me if you will.”

All ten of Ravana's heads smiled in unison. They were vastly differing smiles – one was near a smirk, another a reluctant sneer, yet another a puzzled frowning grin – but they were smiles nevertheless. “Why, son. He is right here beside me. It is to open this vortal for him to enter through that I have come here today. He will join us in a moment once he completes another pressing task in another dimension in another age. For his work is infinite, his responsibilities untold, his dominions uncountable. These minor events unfolding in Ayodhya in your own time are virtually insignificant in comparison with the vast infinity of concerns that occupy him. He can spare but a moment to address your predicament, then he shall move on to other more pressing matters, therefore I come to prepare the way for him and represent him in all matters of detail and explanation as required.”

Atikaya posed a sneer of his own, closely mirroring the sneering head on Ravana's rack. “If he is so all-important and all-knowing, why does he trouble himself with these minor events at all then? Come now, father. Admit it. You are only playing one of your elaborate mind-games with me. I will not be fooled. There is only you and you have come to punish me for taking matters into my own hand and using my own initiative to unleash your vengeance in a manner of my choosing. That is the truth, is it not?”

Valmiki watched as Ravana shook his many heads and chuckled. A deep-chested, rumbling chuckling. “Ah, youth. Your folly and your utter, complete self-conviction. How blissful it is to believe that what you see, know and assume is the be-all and end-all of everything.”

He stopped chuckling and waved his right hands dismissively. “But you will believe in a moment, when my master arrives. For everything that occurs in every plane is under his watchful eye. Not a leaf drops from a withered branch, not a seed germinates or a sperm quickens within a woman’s womb without his mandate. His is the world and everything in it. He is the universe supreme – past, present and future all rolled into one. He is the infinite one, the master of dharma, keeper of all Creation, and I serve him willingly and with immense pride. And in a moment, he shall arrive and you too shall look upon his glowing visage and believe too. For nothing and no one compares with my master. He is god of gods, deva of devas, and even I, Ravana, bow before him and obey his every wish and command.”

SIX

For a brief moment Valmiki wondered if Ravana was either delusional or pretending to be delusional. There was, he knew, a very thin line between religious ecstasy and mental imbalance. He had seen rishis engaged in ghor tapasya for decades lose all sense of reality over time, coming to believe in ludicrous and arcane philosophical theories that they themselves would have considered untenable under normal circumstances. But this was Ravana. If he was imbalanced, then he had been born that way! Ravana's exploits, his legend, his very physical being were beyond the norm in every sense. Perhaps, just perhaps, he meant what he said. One thing was certain: he believed that everything he said was true, whether or not it really was. Valmiki could see the sincerity shine in the young rakshasa lord's eyes – all his pairs of eyes – glistening with tears of adoration as he spoke eloquently and passionately of his absent lord. Valmiki had seen that look often before: It was not the look of a forest-crazed fanatic. It was the look of pure devotion he had sometimes, if rarely, seen upon the faces of those who had experienced a direct tryst with a deity.

Slowly, a suspicion began to dawn upon Valmiki. No, surely it cannot be. It was impossible. Yet that look on Ravana's face...

Suddenly, a shirring sound arose. A great wind swirled, raising dust clouds around both himself and Atikaya. The whole world seemed to grow silent, as if in respectful adoration. Even the beating of his own heart in Valmiki's chest seemed to slow, until it was a thud every several moments... as if time itself had been stretched and distorted and forced to a fraction of its usual pace. He tried to turn his head but the turning promised to take forever and he knew that some exceedingly powerful supernatural phenomenon was in progress, something greater than anything he had ever experienced before. He felt a great uprising within his being, an elevation of the sense of joy, gratitude, love – the positive emotions. He felt as if all things, visible and invisible, were beautiful and beyond censure or question. He felt as if all his worries and anxieties for himself as well as for others, were petty, insignificant, of no consequence whatsoever. He felt as if the entire burden of living, existing, questing, desiring, wanting, longing, seeking, hungering...all the paraphernalia of everyday mundane existence...were suddenly rendered pointless and irrelevant. He felt the burden of his negativity rise up, threaten to choke him, crush him, weigh down upon him like a bear standing upon his chest...then lifted away abruptly, gone forever. Not merely removed, but deleted from existence. As if everything he had ever feared, desired, dreaded, anticipated had been wiped clean. As if he now faced life once more anew and with the freshness of a newborn babe just come into this natural world. Not even the burden of past lives weighed him down. His aatma felt free and unencumbered. He felt as if he could go anywhere, do anything, live. Live. Live!

Then the sudden flurry of wind settled. The shirring sound, risen to deafening cacophony, subsided. The silence grew to a terrible, beautiful, mind-numbing symphony of natural silence. Not the absence of sound. But the presence of an experiential elevation so pure, so great, so beautiful that it made his heart sing, his very being delight and dance with euphoria. He felt the primordial joy of living. The unadulterated happiness of a young lamb frisking gaily across rocky crags on a high Himalayan peak, following her mother's deft hoofs, unaware of the potential for death by falling or death by predator or illness or old age, aware only of the sunshine on her soft downy fur, the crisp clear cold energy-giving air, the delicious aroma of soft, newly risen grass on the patches where the snows had receded with the approach of spring, and the accompanying bleats and calls of her brethren all around her, and like that young lamb, he felt his eyes rise and look upon the approaching vision of the being Ravana described as his lord and master, god of gods, deva of devas.

And his world changed forever.

Sita felt her consciousness return as if from a great distance, like an arrow flying through an endless tunnel. Yet the arrow struck abruptly. One moment she was at the bottom of the long tunnel, the next she was awake and blinking dust out of her eyes. She sat up, feeling her twisted wrist send out pulsating waves of agony; she was able to ignore the pain through discipline mastered through long years of self-abdication. She took in her circumstances in a single glance: the frozen tableau, the songspell holding all Ayodhya in thrall still very much in force, remained much as it had been before her loss of consciousness. The new events and sights that now met her gaze were the crack in the ground where Atikaya had struck with the moon-sword; Atikaya himself, crouched at the foot of a wall some twenty yards away, staring in shocked disbelief; Maharishi Valmiki, somehow recovered from his terrible burns (though his skin still betrayed a scalded look as if the skin itself was newly grown and still tender and pinkish-black), standing beyond Atikaya, staring at the same thing that shocked the rakshasa so, but with a different look in his eyes. Unlikely as it seemed, the maharishi's gaunt dark face bore an expression of intense adoration. Like a devotee gazing upon the impossible miracle for which he had prayed a thousand years yet never truly believed would ever come to pass.

Then Sita turned her head and looked at the impossibility herself.

At the ten-headed being that stood beneath an arch of peculiarly distorted light and air, clearly the product of some manner of powerful sorcery. The impossible, terrible, ten-headed being that she had never expected to see again except in nightmares. The sight of whom sent great surges of terror coursing through her veins and made her entire being scream in silent agony far, far greater than any physical wound or impairment could ever cause.

Ravana! Here!

How could it be possible? Surely she was in the throes of some nightmare now. Like the nightmare that had plagued her as a young, fifteen-year-old princess in her bed in Mithila that one night, back when life had been so simple, and the future had stretched limitless and full of possibility. That night too, he had seemed palpable, as if he had been present there in her very sleeping chamber; and when the nightmarish vision transported her bodily to that high fortification upon that dark storm-tossed island and she had looked down upon that massive army boarding an armada of warships, it had seemed real too. Yes, surely this was a nightmare just as that had been. Just a bad dream.

But she knew that was not the case. Whatever this was, it was real. As real as the agony in her twisted, perhaps broken, wrist. As unbearable as the knowledge that she had tried and failed to halt Atikaya's rape of Ayodhya. As heart-wrenching as the dread that filled her at the sight of Ravana himself. As plaintive as the pounding of her heart as she stared at the nemesis of her entire existence.

Ravana was really standing there, a mere two dozen or so yards from where she crouched nursing her injured wrist. And he was not quite the same Ravana she had last seen in Lanka. This being was younger. How much younger in actual years she had no way of knowing, for she knew that rakshasas did not age as mortals, and Ravana was unique even among rakshasas. But much younger in actual physical development. His many faces were all, the absence of wrinkles and deeper set eyes, greying brows, healed scars and myriad other little details all informing a single overarching conclusion. Yes, this much was certain: This Ravana was not the same being who had abducted her from the sanctity of their humble domicile in Chitrakut and borne her away to Lanka in the golden Pushpak. No, this rakshasa was a younger Ravana, from a much earlier age. A time when she herself had probably not been born, or maybe not even her ancestors! Most of this she sensed rather than knew for certain, yet she felt sure that she was right.

And he was not looking at her. Seemed to be barely aware of her. Was completely preoccupied with something or someone to his right, although Sita could see nothing and nobody there. Which was something that gave her great relief. She did not think she could bear it if he turned and stared directly at her. She might lose all self-control then and fly into a demoniac rage herself, launching at him with no thought or care for her own life or the consequences. Because that creature, that beast, had altered her life forever. The bastard! He had changed everything forever, just when things had been about to settle back to normal after thirteen long years of exile.

Then an even stranger thing happened.

Ravana bent down and knelt upon the naked ground, his knees crunching the dirt, powerful thigh muscles bunching as he bent his great torso until not one or three but all ten of his heads touched the dirt of the Sarayu Valley, obsequiesing himself the way a devout believer might do in a temple of his deity.

And even as he did so, the deity Himself appeared.

The world hummed in Sita's ears. A chorus of song exploded inside her mind. A great indescribable sense of joy, adoration, relief – too many intermingling emotions to even describe individually, an outpouring of beauty and delight and life-affirming ecstasy – swept her up. The pain in her wrist vanished instantly. She felt her entire being surge with life and vigour. The life – the lives – within her womb shared her ecstasy and kicked and gurgled within their watery paradise. And she found herself stupefied as she watched the form of something completely beyond all imagining appear before Ravana's obeisant form, shining and resplendent beyond all description.

The archway that loomed above Ravana shimmered and pulsed with rainbow hues, showing itself to be clearly some manner of portal. A Vortal, as Ravana had termed it. It crackled with great rolling waves of energy that traversed from one side to another then back again, like a patch of oil upon the surface of a lake reflecting a rainbow in the sky overhead. The crackling and rolling reached a crescendo, then blazed out in a gout of hot white flame – the frozen soldiers by the seventh gate who were in the path of the gout of flame felt its heat upon their frozen bodies, intense and searing, yet could do nothing but stare dumbly like wooden statues. As suddenly as it shot out, the gout of flame retreated and died, as if absorbed into the shimmering, oily air between the arching sides of the Vortal.

In the centre of that gateway – for a gateway it was, in its own fashion – stood a being like none other ever seen by all those present. Nor would any of them be graced by such a vision or presence for the rest of their living years.

None except one of course: Rama. But he was still frozen like everyone else and was only able to watch mutely the extraordinary events unfolding here below.

What stood in that archway now. That gateway. That Vortal. What stood there was no man.

No mortal.

No demon.

No rakshasa.

It was a deva.

Not just a deva.

The deva.

He who possessed the power to end all Creation itself. To perform the Tandav. The Dance at the End of Time. The Dance that would demolish all reality, signal the end of the Day of Brahma. Paving the way for the Wheel of Time to turn once more and a new Day to begin, with Creation renewed, refreshed, re-initiated.

Father of Ganesha. Paramour of Parvati. The Eternal One. Last of the Trimurti. Dweller atop sacred Kailasa peak. Wearer of animal skins. Self-anointed (as he was now) with ashes from cremation grounds. Cohabitor of graveyards and cremation ghats. Friend to ghouls, vetaals, danavs. The first yogi, creator of the art of yoga.

Destroyer of worlds.

Effulgence blazed forth from his very pores, like the rays of a sun brought close enough to touch. A terrible, merciless, searing light, a veritable river of shakti that blasted forth and burned everyone and everything around.

There was a moment.

An infinity contained within a single breath-space.

A fraction of time.

A beat between heartbeats.

A pause so miniscule it could not be measured.

A crack in the surface of time so infinitesimal that it could not be seen by the naked eye – or by the aid of any magnification.

In that moment, the One who had arrived through the Vortal spoke.

And Ayodhya listened.

SEVEN

Reality returned like a roaring of rapids. Rama felt as if he had fallen asleep in his bed at night and awoken to find himself in blinding sunlight upon a raft tossed madly by a brutal white-water river, rushing headlong towards a great waterfall.

He gasped in air, sucking it in so fast he choked upon the first breath, like the very first breath he had once taken upon exiting his mother's womb.

Even before his mind had accepted the end of the unnatural stasis that had held him in thrall, he was moving. Instinct drove him forward before logic and reason returned.

He stopped.

He looked around.

He turned.

He was not upon the high spot. At the seventh gate.

He was in his bed, in his private chamber, sitting upright, arms tight with muscled tension, fists balled, body wound and ready to spring, to attack, to fight.

The covers lay bunched around him, in disarray. Sunlight blazed into the chamber from the verandah where someone had only just this moment levered up and tied the drapes, letting in the daylight. From the angle and intensity of the sunlight bathing the chamber, it was full morning. The person who had opened the drapes stood in the verandah, her back to the chamber, gazing out, a soft tune upon her lips. Sita.

He looked at the space beside him and saw the place where she had lain only moments earlier. He forced his arms to relax, his fists to unclench, and slowly lowered his hand, placing the palm upon the bed. Still warm.

He forced himself to breathe more regularly, to calm his combative instincts. There was no threat here. No enemy. No danger.

He rose from the bed, tossing the covers aside, and walked to the verandah. He shielded his eyes with the back of one hand for a moment as his eyes adjusted to the gaudy sunlight. The sun was warm and pleasing on his body, evaporating the cool sweat that had broken out on his bare torso. Sita sensed his presence and glanced over her shoulder in a mildly coquettish way.

“You look like a cat fallen on its back instead of all fours,” she said, teasing.

He tried to speak, found he had to clear his throat, did so, then said, “I did.”

She turned a frowning smile upon him. “Meaning?”

He shook his head, releasing a long breath. “I did fall...or thought I did.”

She was concerned. “Are you well?”

“Yes.” He made a hoarse sound, cleared his throat. “Yes. I am myself now. Just...” He shook his head as if unable to put it into words. “It was beyond strange. Just...a very odd dream.”

He stood up, stretching and twisting to get the kinks out, then went to stand before the verandah. She joined him.

She slipped her hand through the crook of his arm, her bare skin upon his feeling deliciously sensual yet completely innocent. “Tell me about it. I had a very strange dream too. I suppose you could call it a nightmare even.”

He put an arm around her shoulder. “Perhaps we shared the same dream. Do you think that’s possible?”

“Anything’s possible,” she gestured at the open verandah, at the cloudless deepwater-blue sky beyond, at the city laying sprawled out for their viewing pleasure. “This is Ayodhya.”

“Yes,” he said, picking up on her playful tone. “And a fine city it is.” He looked pointedly at her profile as he said, “There are none fairer in all Aryavarta. Perhaps even all Prithvi-loka.”

She raised her eyebrows but kept her profile to him, eyes fixed on the view. The morning light was warm on her face, reminding her unexpectedly of the sunshiny glade by the river in Chitrakut where they had once sat and bantered playfully much like this – how long had it been since then? Too long. “Well, perhaps not the finest of all,” she admonished archly. “That position I would leave for Mithila the jewel of the Videha nation.”

Rama inclined his head. “Spoken like a true Videhan.”

“But it is a fine city, there’s no denying that. Almost as fine as Mithila.”

His face twitched in a smile. “Gracious of you to concede that, Vaidehi. So what brings you to the Kosala nation?” he said, adopting a teasing playfulness.

She played along. “Oh, various matters. Some personal, some of commerce.”

He nodded so exactly like the merchants in the Trader’s Market in downtown Ayodhya, sombre and pensive as they totted up incredible sums and potential profits and losses in their head while trying not to let the slightest emotion show on their faces, that Sita had to stifle a giggle. When he leaned his elbow with exaggerated casualness against a pillar, feigning a very unsuitable cockiness, it was all she could do not to laugh out loud. “Incidentally, it may interest you to know that I am familiar with the Queen of this fine city.”

She arched her eyebrows. “How interesting. I know the King.”

They looked at each other a moment. He attempted to arch his eyebrows too, to mimic her. He knew he must look ludicrous: playful expressions were not his strong suit. She made the mistake of looking too closely at his face and burst into uncontrollable peals of laughter.

He wagged his eyebrows at her, compounding her hilarity.

“Oh Rama,” she said. “That was priceless. You looked like a tiger trying to digest an inedible meal!”

He smiled. “Good. Perhaps then I need to change my diet.”

“I think we both do.”

He nodded. They were not talking about food.

He smiled again. “I need to work on my happy faces now. We both do.”

“True, true. It has been too long since we made use of them, has it not?”

“Too long.”

They looked at each other. The sun shifted a fraction, shining now on Sita’s upper arm and chest, and it felt like a benediction bestowed by Suryadeva upon her, literally warming her heart.

“Good,” she said warmly. “Because you’ll have need of them.” She patted his arm. “Not to worry, my love. I’ll give you some tips.”

“That would be very nice of you—” he said, then broke off at her expression.

Turning, he looked in the direction of her gaze. The verandah had been empty a moment ago. Hanuman stood there now, hanging his head in embarrassment.

“Forgive me, my lord Rama,” said the vanar gruffly. “I meant no disrespect. But it is urgent.”

“It’s all right, my friend,” Rama replied. “I know it must be, or you would not be here. What is it?”

The vanar kept his gaze averted and pointed downwards as he said, “There is something you must see at once. I have just come from the far end of the Valley, from the first yojana stone. It is the most peculiar phenomenon I have ever scented in all my years.”

Rama glanced at Sita. She made a moue of curiosity too, saying, “What is it, Anjaneya? What did you see there? And you can look at me, I’m quite decently attired, thank you.”

At the mention of Sita’s attire, Hanuman’s pale yellow face fur seemed to turn a deeper golden shade in embarrassment, and though he did look up as requested, his eyes immediately sought out Rama and fixed on them intently. “I do not have words to describe it, my Queen. It is best if you both came with me and viewed it for yourselves.”

Again, Sita and Rama exchanged a glance. He saw the same thought flash through her mind: If it was not very urgent, perhaps even of critical importance, Hanuman would never have climbed up to our private chambers unannounced in the first place. Whatever this thing is, it must be very important, quite likely a matter of life and death. Or of Ayodhya’s survival, said a voice inside his head. He could still see the terrible vision of the city in ruins after the young rakshasa in his nightmare had run havoc through it. What was that creature’s name again? It eluded him now, but the ghastly memory of the city destroyed was etched on his consciousness immutably. It was the only thing from his nightmare that he clearly recalled now; the rest was already wisps of smoke and fragments in the clear light of day.

“Very well, then,” he said, knowing he spoke for both of them. “We shall come at once. Lead the way.”

The horses whinnied and reared as they came around the curve in the rajmarg. Rama had to pull down on the reins with some force to still them, and even then they tossed their manes, twisting their heads from side to side, eyes rolling up to reveal the whites.

“It would be best if we left the carriage here,” Hanuman said quietly as he dropped down from an overhanging branch. The vanar had raced them here despite Rama’s chariot having the fastest team of Kambhoja stallions; a distance of some miles, and yet he was not even winded.

“Chariot,” Rama said, absently correcting him. Hanuman had urged everyone to constantly correct him when he erred in any way, however slight. He rarely did: his occasional slip-ups were invariably with relation to things that had no counterpart in vanar culture, hence had no vanar term for them. Transports were among those. The very idea of enslaving and harnessing other fellow animals for the sake of their own transportation was anathema to vanars; it hurt their sense of pride to even contemplate such cruel self-indulgence.

“Chariot,” Hanuman repeated softly, memorizing the word. He led the way around the thick sala tree that grew at this particular point on the raj-marg, forming a blind curve which compelled all users of the royal highway to go around it with extreme caution. Sita felt a tingling of anticipation and understood the nervousness of the horses – she could hear them whickering even now behind her, and thought that had Rama not had taken the time to tie their reins to a post, they might well have turned around on their own and raced back to Ayodhya. Even she could sense something. Her skin prickled. She reached down instinctively, touching the hilt of the sword she had strapped around her waist. There were weapons in the chariot too: javelins, an unstrung bow, a quiver with steel-tipped arrows, a mace. She wanted to suggest to Rama that perhaps they ought to bring at least the bow and quiver. Just in case...

But Rama was already rounding the sala tree, ducking his head to one side to avoid the drooping roots. She saw him straighten his neck, look ahead, and stop. Beside him, Hanuman stopped as well, and folded his hirsute arms across his chest, as if silently saying, see.

She didn't want to take the last few steps that would bring her alongside them. Didn't want to see what lay beyond the curve, what new disaster, crisis, challenge or conflict now loomed in their lives. She wanted to be back in the bed-chamber with Rama, looking out at Ayodhya, bantering and flirting like just-met lovers, content in each other's company, the sunlight warm upon her face, a beautiful day ahead, a beautiful life...

A peaceful life.

She knew that whatever lay there, beyond that curve, would change this day. Would shatter this peaceful, lazy calm. Would make bantering and flirtation impossible. Would draw a dark coverlet of threat over this warm sunshiny morning.

Yet she had no choice. She was Queen now. And a queen of Ayodhya did not frolic and flirt when crisis loomed; she stood in the frontline, gauging the threat, preparing to meet it head-on.

She stepped forward, stepping to Rama's left, onto the gentle rise that acted as a natural ledge overlooking the downslope to the riverbank, and looked at what Hanuman had brought them here to see.

Her breath caught in her throat. She had no basis to comprehend what this meant. It was beyond the realm of any possibility or probability. Beyond anything she could ever have imagined, ever. She almost wanted to knock her elbow against the sala tree to her left just to wince and know she was still awake, not dreaming.

“What does it mean?” she asked softly. “What is it?”

Rama and Hanuman were silent for a long moment. Finally, Rama spoke slowly, as if he too was coming to terms with the sight and accepting reluctantly that he was awake and truly seeing what he was seeing, “I...” he began, then stopped. “I think...” he began again, then paused.

“I think it is the end of the world,” he said at last.

They gazed together at the phenomenon.

Sita tried to explain the sight to herself. To use logic and language to make the shock of vision more palatable.

They were standing on the shelf of rock upon which the sturdy old sala tree had taken root decades earlier. Behind and around to their right, like the incurve of a bow, the raj-marg curved, leading steadily upwards and out of the Sarayu Valley, thence towards Mithila Bridge and the border of her father’s kingdom, Videha. From here, they looked down upon a plunge of some ten or fifteen yards to the riverbanks. The Sarayu flowed in good strength, its steady roar so much a part of the background that Sita had already learned to ignore it in order to pay heed to other sounds. A rock in the centre of the flow, tumbled there years earlier either through mortal intervention or natural cause, caused the onrushing waters to splash and throw up a high wash of spray that drifted on this gentle breeze to limn Sita's face.

Several yards further downstream, at the point where the river rushed through a natural tunnel, disappearing for several dozen yards before reemerging on the far side to begin the headlong downhill race to Mithila Bridge where the upflung spray was no more gentle but a steady cloud of mist that hung over the structure at all times, lending it an air of mystery and majesty.

But before that point, before the tunnel began, something new had appeared.

A peculiar shimmering phenomenon hung in mid-air, barely a yard or two above the surface of the rushing river. It was hard to describe for Sita; the closest she could come to words was an arched entrance. Yes, that shimmering thing, gleaming with refracted light in a complex spectrum with more subtleties of shade than any natural rainbow, roughly took the form of a great arch, several yards high and perhaps three or four yards wide. It resembled the victory arch that most Arya cities had, and through which returning war heroes were paraded before being felicitated by their kings and queens. But it was made up of shimmering rainbow-hued light, insubstantial, impossible, yet very definitely there.

As Sita watched, something began to happen. The space within the arch crackled and was shot through with veins of interlocking rays of light of different hues. The effect resembled a calm lake surface into which a pebble had been dropped, causing ripples. The ripples increased, multiplying and increasing in intensity as if more pebbles – or larger stones – were being thrown at a rapid rate. Sita wanted to step back, afraid at what might follow this peculiar phenomenon. She had never seen or heard of its like before in her life. What is that thing?

Rama glanced at Hanuman. “Was it doing this when you saw it first?”

Hanuman shook his head slowly. “Nor was it there at dawn this morning. It only appeared perhaps half a paw before I came to report its presence to you.” Vanars measured the passing of time in widths of a paw raised overhead to measure the sun’s or moon’s progress across the sky. ‘Half a paw’ would probably mean about one twentieth of a day. “I thought it best to report it to you directly, my lord.”

Rama put a hand on the vanar's shoulder. "You did well, my friend. In reporting it to me, as well as in being discreet."

Sita wanted to correct Rama, to say aloud that she wished now that she had insisted on bringing along armed PFs, instead of dismissing their personal guard as Rama had done, quite curtly when Saprem Senapati Dheeraj Kumar had grumbled openly about the king himself disregarding safety protocol. She wasn't sure if a few quads of well-trained, well-armed soldiers would make any difference if that thing hanging over the river proved hostile or dangerous, but their presence would have made her feel better right now, especially if she was correct in guessing what was happening.

"Something is coming through," Rama said, echoing her own realization. The shimmering arch had begun blazing and crackling with increased agitation and it was evident that some major change was about to take place. Already she could see something forming in the central space – was that a mortal figure?

"Or someone," she added, then waited, breathless.

EIGHT

Old friend.

The words were not spoken. Rama felt them as a vibration within the bones of his chest, thrumming and humming in the very marrow, as if the means by which they were communicated went far beyond oral speech, was in the realm of blood and bone, flesh and life-force. He felt the ensorcellment holding him in thrall melt away like an ice floe washed down the Sarayu in spring. He could move once again. But to his surprise, when he attempted to climb down the ladder of the high spot, he found his limbs responding oddly, as if he were moving through deep water rather than air. Even as he tried to make sense of what was happening, he felt himself rising, rising, and looked down to see the high spot already yards below, and his feet unanchored to any firm footing. He was floating in mid-air. As he had seen Hanuman do many times. Speaking of Hanuman, the vanar too was freed and floated now beside Rama. The golden furred face gazed with some puzzlement at Rama who inclined his head, blinking once for reassurance. The vanar nodded in response, resigning himself. Together they floated in the grip of the strange new shakti that was now controlling their physical forms – and were deposited, as gently as feathers, upon the ground near the spot where Sita stood, staring in abject amazement.

The light bathing Sita's profile, blazing white light tinged with blue and shot through with myriad hues, was like no natural light Rama had ever seen before. It was like light one might see in a dream, not in reality. Blazingly intense, yet with no apparent source. It seemed to come from nowhere and everywhere at once. And there was that sound. Like a humming. But not quite. More of a...sussuration. Like an invisible ocean made of something other than water. Or the sound of countless voices all speaking at once, but heard from a very great distance, till they were all reduced to a single concatenated shirring. A chorus of apsaras could not have sung as sweetly.

The instant he found his feet again, he went to Sita. Touching her forearm gently to avoid hurting her injured wrist, "Are you well?" he asked softly.

She failed to hear him. Her eyes were fixed on the being that had come through the Vortal. Rama said again, more insistently, "My love? Vaidehi?" But she still did not answer.

So finally he turned to look at what she was looking at.

At the light.

The blinding, blazing, eye-searing light.

And the instant he looked, the light faded away, and was extinguished.

And only a figure stood there, looming above the still-prostrated Ravana. A figure as dark-skinned as Rama himself, despite the ashes smeared across his body. With a throat as dark-mottled blue as deep midnight sky. A serpent coiled around that stained throat – neel kant – unwinding and winding its coils as it pleased, hood bared, forked tongue flicking and hissing. His hair matted in a hermitic bun above his head. And that face. The face. With the third eye nestled in the centre of the forehead, closed now, mercifully. And that aspect so fierce that it had been known to freeze naked flames and melt stone to lava on occasion.

But at this moment, it was not fierce or ferocious. The third eye slept. The serpent – Takshak, his name is Takshak, the last of his breed – hissed out of habit rather than bad temper. And the voice that spoke now, thrumming in the bones of Rama's entire being, like a drumbeat sounding from within, a dumroo kettledrum in place of his heart, was gentle and kind, filled only with empathy and compassion, warmth and friendship.

It is good to see you. As always.

Rama realized the words were meant for him. He also realized that he had no need of vocal cords to express himself.

And you.

The three-eyed one smiled and spread his arms wide, as if desirous of embracing Rama. Then he stopped himself, seemed to recall something, and lowered his arms.

Would that could I greet you as friends should. But your present form...

Rama glanced down at his body.

... it would not be able to withstand my touch.

Without knowing how he knew, Rama knew that this was true.

Yes, he responded silently. I am but mortal. And you, Mahadev... He paused. A part of him listened to his own words echoing through the ether, travelling outwards like invisible despatches to unknown destinations ... you are yourself. This mortal flesh cannot survive an encounter with one such as yourself.

True, Shiva responded with a tinge of sorrow. It is the eternal barrier between the dwellers of the mortal realm and those of us from the other lokas. But we must accept the limitations of the mortal form, for oftentimes that deceptively fragile container of flesh, bones and fluids is our only tool to accomplish that which must be accomplished. Had it been possible for devas alone to serve the end of the great brahman, then why should mortal beings have been created at all? Nay, brother of my mind and heart, your present mortal form was your sole means to achieve your goal. And you chose wisely indeed. For the mortal you selected as your vessel in this amsa is truly a rare example. This Rama Chandra of Ayodhya is perhaps the finest of all mortal men I have heard tell of. He deserves the appellation they have coined for him: Maryada Purshottam. Truly he is One Who Achieves His Goal, against all odds.

Shiva paused, as if abashed at his own loquaciousness.

But of course, I need hardly explain the obvious to Shri Haridev, Almighty Narayana! All things are known to you. The universe contains no secrets from you, great one. I merely restate these things to show my admiration for what you have achieved here upon this troubled mortal realm. And for setting free my loyal and devoted worshipper Jay.

At this, Ravana raised his rack of heads from the ground with reverential slowness and joined his palms together in a namaskaram. “My Lord exalts me by taking my name. I am but a humble servant of Hari. It is I whom He has blessed by His acts. It was my supreme honour to be killed by His hand on the battlefield of Lanka.”

Ravana turned and bowed to Rama as well, offering him the same grace he had showed Shiva. “I have long worshipped Mahadev. But as you well know, my Lord, I am eternally in your service.”

Rama did not answer. He knew he was expected to speak here, to say something. But he found he could not. Out the corner of his eye, he sensed the sage Valmiki turn and look at him, sensed also the curiosity of the maharishi. But he held his tongue.

Finally, Ravana bowed deeply again, then assumed a kneeling posture with heads bowed, at Shiva’s feet.

The Three-Eyed One absently blessed Ravana with an open palm while keeping his gaze on Rama.

You choose not to speak. That is your privilege, Narayana. Infinite are your methods, inscrutable your Leela.

Shiva paused, gazing into the distance as if contemplating some obscure thought. Rama was looking directly at Shiva's face at that instant and for a brief instant – barely a flash – he saw a strange and incredible sight: Shiva's eyes had been replaced by views of something else entirely, the way a man's eyes might reflect a fire or the sky at certain angles. Within Shiva's eye sockets, instead of the ball of his eye, pupil, cornea, optic fluid and so on, there were immense events taking place on a micro-scale. In one eye, he glimpsed a view of a great war being waged, in a world where all things resided beneath dark waters. Then that eye afforded a view of another world or plane of existence where a great ceremony was taking place with pomp and colour – a ceremony involving beings that he could not begin to describe, let alone comprehend their existence. The other eye likewise flickered with such images of distant worlds, dimensions or times. Even in that flash of a moment, he glimpsed countless such images flickering in Shiva's eyes and he knew that the Lord of Destruction was presiding over events on a cosmic scale in countless eras, infinite worlds, even as he spoke to Rama here and now...

Shiva glanced back at Rama. A shade of his persona from some other time and place lingered momentarily, and Rama saw that both Shiva's eyes were filled with crimson flames, consuming entire universes. Then the instant passed, and Shiva's eyes were just normal eyes as before: inasmuch as a deva's eyes could ever be considered 'normal'.

The eyes of a deva never blink. That is how we can tell them apart from other beings, asuras or mortals.

Again Rama did not know how he came by this knowledge. He simply did. Just as he knew perfectly well what Shiva had been speaking of till now, and even what Shiva was about to say next:

I have many other matters to attend to, Haridev. As do you. I will come to the point. I am merely here to congratulate you on a mission masterfully executed. Everything you accomplished while in this amsa was beyond praise. Your great task has been accomplished. The asura races are destroyed upon Prithvi-loka. The rakshasa threat is over. Their race shall never trouble the mortal race in any substantial way again, and over time they shall die out completely and their island-kingdom shall be occupied by the race of mortals, who shall then reign supreme for millennia to come. The brothers Jay and Vijay have been slain yet again, this time being the third occasion, which marks the end of their dand. Now that their penalty is over, they are free to assume their rightful place in Vaikunta in your service. As, I am sure, are you too.

At this, Ravana raised his head and joined hands once more and bowed to Rama. The sheer reverence and adoration on all the rakshasa's ten faces was unlike anything Rama had seen before in Ravana's myriad expressions during the long years of their epic conflict. Yet there was no doubting the sincerity of that reverence and adoration. Ravana bowed his head once more, awaiting any words from Rama.

Once again, Rama said nothing.

Shiva seemed somewhat puzzled by Rama's lack of response, but continued:

Vishnudeva, I am here on behalf of the devas as well as in the capacity of a longtime dear friend to gently remind you that your goal in this mortal avatar has been achieved successfully far in excess of all expectation, and that your work here upon Prithviloka is done. It is time now for you and your eternal consort to return to your rightful place. That is why I come now. To urge you to return where your services are required far more urgently than upon this plane of existence.

And then Shiva himself put his hands together, joining the palms and inclining his head.

OM NARAYANA NAMAHA he said. And then HARI HARI HARI...

Rama listened as the last reverberations of the words faded away, melding with the pulsing of his blood and the thump of his heartbeat.

Then Shiva raised his head once more and gazed upon Rama directly. It was evident that the great Destroyer now required Rama to provide a spoken response.

Rama felt Sita's hand clutch his shoulder hard. His wife was strong; her grip was tight on the ball of his shoulder, fingers pressing deep into the tendons. He glanced at her briefly. Her eyes were wide with shock. Her lips were parted. Her face displayed her disbelief and incredulity.

"Rama!" she said, pointing with her other hand. The word was whispered rather than shouted. As if she was afraid of being heard.

He understood how she felt.

The scene they were viewing through the shimmering arch suspended over the river seemed so real, so immediate. As if they could simply step through that arch – if it were possible to walk over the rushing water, that is – and enter into that place. Wherever that place might be.

It looked like Ayodhya, from what little he could glimpse. And that man and woman standing there looked like himself and like Sita. But that was impossible, surely? This was some manner of sorcerous illusion, yes? The product of asura maya?

Yet he knew fully well it was neither asura maya nor an illusion. Whatever was happening in that place beyond the floating arch – a Vortal, that is what it is called, a Vortal, said a voice inside his head that he knew was his own yet not his own – was very real, and immediate, occurring right now, at this very instant in time.

But neither of those observations were what scared Sita – and me, for I'm scared too, I admit – so badly.

It was the person standing before Rama and Sita in the Ayodhya on the other side of the floating arch...the Vortal.

That could only be one being.

Shiva the Destroyer Himself.

Yet how was that possible?

He realized that none of it was possible, to his knowledge. Yet it was happening. That was all that mattered at present.

With a warrior's instinct, he pushed away the urge to question, doubt, wonder, gape, worry, and focussed entirely on observing, noting, studying, absorbing, analyzing... Upon the battlefield, that meant the difference between destruction and victory. It came naturally to him, and he knew that Hanuman had already slipped into that preternaturally heightened state: seeking only to view and study every notable aspect of what was occurring before their senses, in order to prepare for any inevitability. In a moment, he felt Sita's breathing change as well, and her grip on his shoulder loosen, as she shed her own anxieties and conflicting concerns and focussed simply on observing.

All three of them stood on the ledge and watched. And listened. Above the roar of the river, it ought not have been possible to hear much. Yet he comprehended every word, every syllable, understood every nuance of what was being communicated in that other Ayodhya beyond the Vortal. Even what was not said aloud. Especially what was not said aloud. For devas did not usually speak with the use of tongues and palates and vocal cords; they had no need to use such crude tools...except when addressing ordinary mere mortals.

And he realized that the Rama and Sita he was observing through the Vortal were neither ordinary nor merely mortal.

At this very instant, he felt Sita's head turn towards him and he turned as well to look at her. Their eyes met and a common realization passed between them, a sense of something they had always known, subterranean knowledge buried deep within the bedrock of their subconscious, now tapped and risen to the visible surface.

Yes, her eyes said, it is true, isn't it? We were never just mortal. And neither are that Rama and Sita.

NINE

Rama was keenly aware of Sita's eyes upon him as he prepared to speak aloud for the first time. She had turned to look at him after the Three-Eyed One had completed his last communication, and he knew that she was equally puzzled by his lack of response thus far.

He glanced at her briefly, keeping his head tilted forward slightly in a gesture that reflected his respect for the Destroyer. Her eyes searched his and he felt her mind meld with his as she understood at once what he meant to say, how he felt, everything that was contained within his being and which could not be expressed in words. He saw a deep, enduring sorrow begin to appear in her eyes in response and wanted to reach out to her, to say, no, do not be so anxious, all will be well in the end. But she broke eye contact and looked away, her beautiful brown eyes already brimming with tears, rare tears, for Sita cried even less often than most male kshatriyas, and for anything to have brought such sudden tears to her eyes it must be a terrible insight indeed.

Yet he must do what he must do.

He turned his attention back to Shiva.

“Mahadev,” he said reverentially, performing a deep bow and namaskara of his own. “I beg your indulgence. And your forgiveness. What I am about to say may not please thee. Yet I must say it. For such is my dharma.”

Your dharma, Shiva repeated. The great deva’s face was inscrutable. Takshak’s cowl concealed the lower part of his face, further obscuring any subtleties of expression.

“Yes, Great One.”

Dharma is the prerogative of Yamadev, my friend. We are devas. We are above dharma. We serve the infinite shakti of brahman. All-pervasive, all-inclusive. So has it been ever since the Mahat-tattva. Only the chaos of pradhan lies outside our immediate jurisdiction, and that too is pliant to our uses. And you, you are Nilameghashyama. This is why your colouring is black verging on blue, for that is the sacred hue of brahman itself. You are the master of brahman, and your place is upon Anantanaga floating peacefully on the milky ocean of Shiramudra, or upon Garbhodaka at times.

Shiva indicated Sita.

With your eternal paramour Lakshmi by your side, as you lie in yoganidra, maintaining the balance of creation and destruction eternally. Without you, Brahmadev and I are incomplete and Creation itself would become dangerously imbalanced. That is why you must remain aloof and above such mortal preoccupations such as karma, artha, kama, and... dharma. Leave dharma to Yamadev and to these mortals – Shiva indicated the world at large around them – it befits them. We live by the demands of a higher calling.

Rama inclined his head respectfully, held it there a long moment, before raising it only partially to speak: “You speak indisputable wisdom as ever, Mahadev. I cannot debate your great knowledge nor your conclusions. However, during my sojourn upon Prithvi-loka, I have come to realize that this mortal realm that Brahma has propagated is facing a great crisis. A crisis that affects all Prakriti itself. And I cannot stand by and let this crisis unfold, a mere mute spectator.”

Shiva waved a hand in a dismissive gesture. “It does not concern us, Haridev. Your given task was to take this mortal form, end the asura race, liberate the brothers Jay and Vijay. That task is complete. Your accomplishment shall be legendary throughout all planes of the three worlds for all time to come. Now you are needed back in Swargaloka once more. Greater concerns require your attention. There is much to be done yet to ensure that the end of the asuras is final and that no trace of them remains in the heavenly realms. Narad-muni has just brought word that—

Shiva stopped short. Rama sensed the deva's consciousness scanning the neighbouring region, like a searing light scouring a pitch-black dungeon.

—I cannot discuss such matters here upon this mortal plane, Shiva said with noticeable shortness. Suffice it to say that there is much work yet to be done to ensure that this victory is not ephemeral. I need hardly tell you how often we devas have celebrated the destruction of our most ancient enemies only to find that their end was short-lived and that yet again they found some way to survive and return, often in insidious new forms and with devastating new methods of attack. Please, Haridev, I ask you once again to part from this mortal form and return to Swargaloka with me. Brahmadev has convened an urgent conference of the Trimurti in Brahmataloka. Devi Saraswati and He await us there, alongwith Naradmuni who wishes to share the most recent information with us in private. Parvati Devi is already there on my behalf, and Lakshmi Devi represents you, but without your sacred presence, the conference is incomplete and ineffectual. Whatever we may decide, you are the one we look to first to implement any steps to root out any remnants of the asura menace.

Rama inclined his head. “Regretfully, I must decline your invitation. Kindly inform Brahmadev on my behalf, and the Tridevi of Lakshmi, Saraswati and Parvati, as well as Narad-muni that my work here is not yet finished. I must stay here and complete my work. Dharma demands it.”

At this new mention of dharma, Shiva’s expression grew distinctly darker. Rama felt the voice of the deva grow deeper, less affectionate. The change was instantaneous and not subtle at all.

This is not acceptable, Vishnu. What pressing work holds you to this mortal plane and this fragile human form? I see nothing demanding the presence of the great Preserver.

“That is precisely the reason, Mahadev. I am the Preserver, am I not? And as such, it is my role to preserve, and do whatever is needed to ensure the preservation of all Creation. In this present time, the mortal race requires my presence in order to ensure its continuance.”

I fail to understand your meaning. What is this new crisis that you say threatens the mortal race? The asura race is destroyed, the rakshasas are a dying breed and shall soon be gone. What other threat is there to speak of?

“The threat of adharma, Mahadev.”

Adharma? Explain yourself.

“As long as Ravana existed, he represented the forces of Adharma, the antithesis of Dharma. All Prithviloka was united in its common hatred of He Who Made The Universe Scream. A common enemy, a common cause.”

Yes. Hence the coming together of different species – vanar, rksaa, mortal – to combat the menace of Ravana. I know this.

“But now that Ravana is gone, Adharma has no single form to embody. Yet due to the causal nature of Balance, the eternal scale of Dharma and Adharma, Adharma is as essential for Preservation as Dharma itself. For without Adharma there can be no Dharma, and vice versa.”

I follow. All creation requires contrary forces. It is through the meeting of disparities that change occurs and life propagates and continues. Male and Female unite in coition to reproduce their species. High and low pressures meet in the atmosphere to cause storms and carry precious water from the oceans and rivers to the lands that need it most, ensuring the propagation of flora and thereby, fauna. All nature is dependent on the Balance, and Balance itself is the art of mating contrary forces. This is the basis by which the mortal realm exists. But this has been the way of things since the creation of this plane. Since the great egg of brahman exploded and gave birth to Creation out of Sri's navel. What is new about it that concerns you now?

“The passing of Ravana,” Rama said. “Without Ravana, Adharma now floats free. Unable to find a single great being in which to embed itself and maintain the Balance, it shall seek out and reside in a potentially infinite number of carriers. With the asuras gone, it will inevitably reside in mortals now, for they are created in our image, and like us they have the freedom of will to choose either side of the Balance. Adharma shall take root in countless mortals born and as yet unborn, and lead these adharmic individuals to wage war against their dharmic co-occupants of the mortal plane in an infinite variety of ways.”

Shiva inclined his head. Takshak’s hood bobbed and the serpeant hissed absently.

So it shall be. It is as you say. I do not dispute your speculation. We were aware of this back at the beginning of this particular conflict. That was our very strategy in fact. To push the asuras steadily out of the heavenly realms and down to this mortal plane. Prithvi-loka. Once here, you were to take various avatars and battle them directly. You did so in the form of thousands of avatars over the ages, some major, many minor. That is why you are here now, as Rama Chandra of Ayodhya. But once your individual avatar’s work is done, you have always left this plane and returned to your true form. Why should it be different now?

“Because this time it is different. We have succeeded in our plan to rid ourselves of the asura race, our greatest foes. By tricking them into coming to the mortal plane, then by slaughtering them, we have rid ourselves of an ancient and powerful enemy. But in doing so, we have engendered great Adharma upon this mortal realm. And that adharma will now proliferate and affect all future generations of the mortal race for millennia to come.”

True. We were aware of this when we agreed upon this strategem to combat the asuras. It was an inevitable consequence. What was the term you yourself used, Almighty Narayana? Collateral damage? A succinct phrase. Whatever the mortal race may suffer now cannot be helped.

“But it can, Mahadev! By ensuring that Dharma itself proliferates and spreads just as rapidly and powerfully as its counterpart. That is why I wish to remain here. As the living embodiment of Dharma, Rama Chandra of Ayodhya.”

Shiva was silent a moment, gazing at Rama. Worlds lived and died, warred and were destroyed, within his eyes, as he contemplated. When he spoke, the vibrations of his speech were softer, his tone inflected with understanding and compassion.

I see now. I see it quite clearly. You feel...guilt. For by tricking the asuras into coming to the Earthly realm and battling them here, we have polluted their plane of existence. And because you are responsible for much of the conflict, for launching war after war between Dharma and Adharma, you feel personally responsible for the future of the mortal race now. So you wish to...make amends? Reparations?

“I wish to help maintain the Balance. To show the mortal race that even in the face of the greatest assault by the forces of Adharma, Dharma can still triumph.”

Shiva nodded.

I see. Yes. I understand you now.

“It would not take long, Mahadev. For us devas, it would barely be a few moments, insignificant against our infinite existence. But it would help establish Dharma here upon this mortal plane once and for all, like a beacon blazing from a high tower for all to see and gain succour from.”

And you propose to do this first by remaining here in this same mortal form. As Rama. Thereafter to take new amsas or avatars as required. Suitable avatars for different challenges, different ages.

“Yes.”

Again another moment of silence. Aeons to other worlds, other dimensions. The business of Destruction and clearance of debris continued unabated as the Three-Eyed One contemplated and weighed Rama's words. Finally, he spoke, and for the first time there was a tinge of sadness in his tone.

Who am I to argue with Almighty Hari? Yet, I urge you, my dear friend. My brother in the service of Brahman, reconsider one last time. Dwell upon the many consequences of your decision.

“I have done so already, and at great length,” Rama replied. “It is what I desire.”

Shiva turned his gaze to Sita, who started then controlled herself.

And the mortal amsa of Lakshmi Devi? What does she say about your decision?

Now, it was Rama’s turn to be silent a moment. He felt Sita return Shiva’s gaze without flinching or reacting visibly. When she spoke, her voice was clear and steady without a trace of hesitation or doubt.

“My place is with my Lord, just as his place is beside me always. Whatever needs to be done, it shall be done. Not for nothing is my Hari known as Maryada Purshottam in this mortal avatar. When Rama sets his mind to a task, that task is always accomplished. When Rama says he shall stay upon Earth and propagate Dharma to ensure the survival and happiness of the mortal race, then he shall certainly do as he says. And I shall assist him in whatever way possible.”

Rama felt a flush of pride even though he had already anticipated Sita’s response.

Shiva nodded slowly, sadly.

I expected no less. Just as my beloved in her first incarnation as Sati once threw herself onto her father Daksha’s yagna fire and cremated herself to protest his humiliation of me, so also you, Lakshmi, can hardly be expected to leave Vishnu’s side. But I must caution you as a friend and a fellow Deva. The path you choose is not an easy one.

“The path of Dharma never is, Mahadev,” Sita said quietly.

And you are aware of the calamities that will befall you if you remain here upon this mortal plane? Shiva gestured around. As you can see, I froze time before opening the Vortal to this world. That had nothing to do with the fact that Ravana’s son Atikaya had already used the moon-sword Chandrahas to cast a spellsong over the city and its environs – my power encompassed the entire plane of Creation. The moment I leave and the Vortal vanishes behind me, time shall resume, and Atikaya, Chandrahas and whatever other threats await you shall be unleashed once again. It is not my place to interfere in the playing out of whatever transpires thereafter. You will have to bear the brunt of the events that follow.

Sita inclined her head. “I have borne all that has been thrust upon me thus far. I shall bear the rest.” She gestured towards Rama with her joined hands. “So long as my beloved is by my side, I can endure any calamity.”

At this, Shiva’s eyes widened ever so slightly. Just enough to reveal a hint of surprise. He turned his searing gaze upon Rama again.

Then you have not told her yet, my friend? She is clearly unaware of the fate that lies ahead should you choose to remain here in this mortal avatar.

Rama saw Sita frown and glance at him but kept his own eyes on Shiva. “No, Mahadev. I have not had a chance as yet. Events have transpired at a fantastic rate this day and we have been kept occupied dealing with one crisis after another.” He added, “I shall tell her soon.”

“What?” Sita asked, anxiety evident in her tone. “What will you tell me soon? What fate lies ahead?”

Shiva looked keenly at Rama who swallowed. Suddenly, Rama felt the weight of his decision bear down on him with unendurable pressure. Facing Ravana had not been as great a challenge. When he turned slowly to face Sita directly, he felt his own heart melt and dissolve within his chest. It hurt even to breathe, to speak, to live.

“If we remain here, my love,” he said gently. “We shall not be together.

We shall have to separate and remain apart for the rest of our mortal existence.”

Sita turned and stared at Rama. His eyes were cast downwards, at the river, rather than directed at the Vortal through which they had been watching the other Rama and Sita converse with Lord Shiva. She turned and looked at Hanuman. The vanar was squatting on his haunches, gazing with a puzzled expression at the Vortal. He glanced up at her and from his puzzled look, she could tell that he knew nothing of what was going on. But Rama...Rama was another story.

She turned back to Rama.

“You know about this,” she said, barely able to believe it herself. “Somehow, I don’t understand how or why, you knew Hanuman was going to bring us here to see this, and you knew what we were going to see. Isn't that so?"

Rama sighed and looked up into the distance. She saw blue sky reflected in his black eyes.

"I didn't know we were going to see this exactly," he said. "Just that something was to happen today. And that it would lead inevitably to what followed."

"And what will follow?" she asked, her voice on the verge of trembling now. "What did you mean—," she corrected herself, "what did that Rama mean – when he said that we shall not be together? Why not? What will drive us apart?"

Rama shook his head, turning to face her. "It is futile to upset yourself thus, my love. I do not know why we are even being shown these sights at this moment." He gestured towards the Vortal, where the other Sita and Rama continued their conversation with Lord Shiva as the kneeling Ravana, the shocked Atikaya and the contemplative Maharishi Valmiki looked on. "What purpose does it serve? Who—"

"It serves the purpose of Dharma," said a male voice, deep and sonorous, from behind them. "And as for who would do such a thing, or possess the power to enable such a demonstration, well that would be me.”

TEN

“What lies beyond?” Rama asked of the man as he stopped at the cusp of the cloud-field and the mist-mountain, looking up in part-fear, part-wonder. Was this a dream or the afterworld? It felt like both, and neither. And that vision of the war of Lanka? What had that been? A ghost-memory or a conjuration of some sort?

The man paused beside him. His face was expressionless, yet not without compassion. “Only by going forth can you learn what the future holds in store.” Again that maddeningly familiar manner of speaking, the voice of a man well educated and raised, yet too humble to have been royal himself. A raj-rakshak? A PF? No, he was too young to be a PF, and he did not bear any arms; a raj-rakshak would never fail to bear arms to protect his master. Why then did he seem so familiar? How did Rama know him and from where?

“Or I can wait for the future to approach me,” Rama replied, deliberately being difficult in order to test the man’s patience and character. “Time catches up with the idle and the active alike.”

A twitch of a smile on the man’s sculpted dark face. “Not here,” he said. “Not in Lokaloka. Here, Time is an absent master.”

Lokaloka? What place was that? And how could Time be absent from anyplace? Even dreams must begin and end and therefore served temporal laws. Unless... unless...But he could think of no satisfactory explanation. He was out of his depth here. And the rakshak knew it.

“Then tell me something,” Rama said. “Give me some reason to go up that...mountain?” If it was a mountain indeed. He felt he could be sure of nothing here. In Lokaloka. Wherever...whatever...that might be. He waited, feeling the mist nipping at his bare feet, not cold or wet, merely...wind. “What lies up there?”

“The answers to all your questions,” said the man.

Rama stared at him. Of all the responses he might have expected, that was not one. He found he could think of nothing else to say.

The rakshak began walking up the sloping rise into the swirling mist, and Rama followed.

Sita swung around to stare at a strange man standing behind them. He was dark-skinned, the same deep bluish hue like Rama, but apart from that, there was no resemblance. His eyes were inscrutable, either brown or black though she could not see them clearly enough to tell which. His hair was long, much longer than Rama's – almost as long as her own – and raven-black with that same bluish tinge as his skin. Rama's hair was simply jet-black. He appeared to be standing in shadow, presumably the shadow of the sala tree that compelled the raj-marg to wind around this grassy ridge overlooking the river, but the sun was at the wrong angle and sunlight fell all around him like a great golden shroud. Sita felt her mouth open in a small o as she saw that the man cast no shadow. She pressed her lips together firmly. The man stood at least a head taller than even Hanuman, and his dark hair framing his sculpted face, the white flowing angavastra that covered him from neck to ankle, and the shadow-like dimness that shielded him from clear sight despite the bright late morning sunshine, all lent him an alien air.

Yet she knew that he was no asura. There was no sense of menace, no hint of threat. He meant them no harm, she was certain. Yet he was not entirely their benefactor either. He wanted something from them. What? Her heart was already cold with the things she had just heard and seen, her mind swimming with possibilities and speculation.

She gestured to the Vortal below, raising her voice above the roar of the river to be heard. “You opened that...window...into that other Ayodhya?”

The stranger inclined his head. He had powerful neck muscles, like a bull, and when he lowered his head, his entire torso bulged with muscular strength. He looked like he could fell the sala tree by charging at it a time or two. “Vortal. Yes.”

“What?”

“It is called a Vortal, more a doorway than a window. And yes, I performed the ritual necessary to open it. In fact—”

Sita waved him quiet. “Why?”

He looked at her. “If you will permit me to explain in my own manner and pace, Rani Sita Janaki?”

Her cheeks burned hotly. “If one is to be polite, then one should also know whom one is addressing and the proper manner of that address?”

He nodded graciously. “Quite true. As queen of this kingdom, you are owed a formal introduction. Allow me to introduce myself. I am Yama.”

Sita’s blood ran cold.

The stranger went on quite calmly and politely: “My father was Vivasvat, my mother Saranya. I am both a Lokapala and an Aditya. Like your illustrious husband in this life, I take my lineage from Surya the sun. I am entrusted with guarding the cardinal direction South. In other lands I am variously known as Shinje, Yanluowang, Yan, enma Dai-O or Yamadipati, and other names. I am often mistakenly depicted garbed in red attire, with green or red skin, but in fact this is my natural colouring, black with a bluish tinge like Rama, for the brahman shakti within my veins glows even through this crow-black skin. I prefer to wear white for just as black is sacred and the colour of Aryas and devas, so also white marks the absence of colour, and therefore the absence of life. After all, I am also the Lord of Death. But mainly I am known as the Lord of Dharma. I am Yama.”

Sita was speechless.

He waited a moment then smiled briefly and went on. “Let me assure you that I mean neither yourself nor any of your loved ones any harm. I do not visit you this day in my capacity as a reaper of souls. I come instead as an ally.”

“An ally?”

“Yes. I am in a quandary, you see. It is rare that I find myself confronted by a question I cannot find an answer to, considering that I have access to unlimited resources and infinite time and archives containing all things known and unknown about the Universe – all universes, in fact. Neither I, nor Yami my intrepid sister, nor even Chitragupta my munshi seem to be able to find a case that matches the circumstances of this one. Therefore I find myself in the unusual situation of having to create a new law rather than simply execute an existing statute.”

Sita’s head swam. “I don’t understand...”

He nodded. “Of course. I am rambling as usual. Please, allow me to explain through a simple demonstration...”

He walked towards her. She took a step backwards, instinctively, then another, and suddenly felt the ground crumbling away beneath her heels. She realized what she was doing and stepped forward again, turning to see a patch of loose earth crumbling down the several yards to the riverbank. Rama's hands were stretched out, ready to grasp her, but she shook her head and he withdrew. She felt the rakshak come up behind them, and then pass her.

Yama walked out across thin air, over the river, then stopped.

He glanced down. "You'll pardon me. Not being bound by the physical laws of this particular plane, I am accustomed to manipulating matter as I please."

Sita said nothing.

Yama gestured at the Vortal. Sita noted that the arched window – or doorway – had once more turned opaque and into a shimmering glaze that reflected rainbow hues. The scene that they had witnessed earlier had vanished.

"As you have seen, this particular Vortal opens onto an Ayodhya similar in almost all aspects to your own. The essential differences are the events that transpired there this day. In your Ayodhya, you have woken late this morning, and almost immediately been brought here by Maruti Anjaneya to this spot to view this phenomenon. In fact, I placed the Vortal here knowing that Hanuman watches this ingress to the city as closely as a mother wolf guards the entrance to her den and that he would quickly spy it and report it to you discreetly, without raising a general alarm.”

Hanuman inclined his snout thoughtfully as he absorbed this information.

“Yet at the same time the Vortal itself was placed in such a location that no idle passerby was likely to notice it. Nor can any creature of the forest slip through it.”

Yama gestured at the Vortal and once again the shimmering rainbow hues coalesced to reveal the scene they had seen earlier: Rama and Sita facing Lord Shiva, with Ravana at Shiva’s feet, and Atikaya and Valmiki looking on. “But in the Ayodhya which you viewed through the Vortal earlier, a great deal happened since this morning. And continues to happen...”

“What do you mean, Rama?” Sita asked, staring at her husband. “Why should we be parted for any reason?”

Do you mean...” Her breath caught in her throat.
“Ravana—”

He shook his head. “No. You shall not be abducted again, or taken from me by force. But yes, it is true, we shall be parted, this time forever.”

“Forever?” The word shocked her, stunned her more than the blow struck by Atikaya with the moon-sword Chandrahas. It sent reverberations into her soul, shaking her to the core.

Rama lowered his head. “The rest of this mortal lifespan. It may as well be forever.”

“But why? How? Who will part us? Why shall we let them? Why would you permit it to happen?”

He kept his head lowered, his eyes hooded. “I am the one who shall dismiss you into exile.”

“Into...” She was speechless. “Rama, listen to yourself. What are you saying? You have just fought and won a terrible war, invading a foreign land, destroying an entire race of beings, in order to win me back from a monster,” She gestured in Ravana’s direction, “after we both suffered 14 years in exile for no fault or wrongdoing of our own. No power on earth could cause you to exile me.” She laughed. “It is absurd. It is unspeakably ludicrous. A jest, surely!”

Rama remained silent.

She looked from him to Ravana, whose heads were still bowed, his knees bent at the foot of his master. She looked up at Shiva himself. The Lord of Destruction did not meet her gaze. Even the serpent Takshak had lowered his hood and appeared to be asleep or resting. She turned the other way and saw Atikaya slumped in a morose crouch, lost in his own miserable thoughts. Only Maharishi Valmiki stood straight and tall, gazing at her in sympathy as well as naked curiosity.

“Gurudev,” she said to him. “You arrived here this morning in Ayodhya to avert a crisis, you said earlier. You mentioned a prophecy. Was this what you meant? This absurdity?”

Valmiki frowned. “I do not know for certain. But yes, it may well be. All I was told was that the House of Raghu would be divided. And that the sons of the Suryavansha Ikshwaku line would be in great need of my guidance and aid.”

Sita turned back to Rama. “Explain.”

Rama's head remained lowered.

She reached out and punched him in the chest. Lightly. Yet hard enough to get his attention.

“Explain!”

He looked up slowly. The expression on his face terrified her. Never before had Rama looked at her in that manner.

“What would you have me explain?” he said in a tone so deathly quiet that it chilled her to the marrow. “The fact that you and your father Janaka chose to deceive my family and me all this while? Did you think that we would not learn the truth eventually? Did you think everything would be as before? That we would live happily ever after together, in blissful denial of the truth of your identity and your condition?”

She was stunned. The sheer loathing in his voice shocked her. Never before had Rama spoken to her thus. Never had he looked at her with such vile menace. Never had he said such harsh things to her.

“What...what do you mean?” she stammered.

He sniffed. “There is little point in denying it now, Sitey,” he said, using the formal ‘ey’ suffix as was common among long-married Arya couples. Even that tiny formality hurt her deeply. Janaki, Maithili, Vaidehi – even Ayodhyi of all names – was fine, was affectionate even. But to call her Sitey like this at such a moment, was further insult. Looking at his face with rising dismay, she realized he had meant it as such. “What am I denying, Rama?” she said shakily. “At least tell me that. I’m merely asking.”

He stared at her a moment in silence. A brief fraction of time, barely the space between heartbeats. But in that sliver of a moment she realized that he was already lost to her. She had been declared the loser in a battle to which she had not even been invited, without knowing what was at stake, or why.

“You are not the true daughter of Maharaja Janaka of Mithila. He only adopted you and raised you as his own, among his three true daughters. You are in fact the blood-daughter of Ravana himself,” Rama said in that same deathly quiet tone. “You are pregnant with Ravana’s grandchildren. It is the reason why you left me and went with him of your own free will to Lanka, to live there henceforth and raise the twins as rakshasas, in the lineage of their forefathers. Do you deny any of these facts?”

He waited for his answer with a cold expression that could not have been worse had he held a sword to the pulsating vein in her throat.

ELEVEN

“What is this?” Sita said in a choked voice. “What is this?”

She turned to stare at Rama who was standing silently, staring ahead at the Vortal.

“Rama, I don’t understand what we are watching.”

Rama was staring transfixed at the scene taking place beyond the Vortal, at the other Rama who waited for his Sita’s answer.

“Rama!”

With an effort he tore his eyes away. He glanced at Sita, then away, at Hanuman, then up at the sky, the treeline, around at the densely overgrown outreaches of the sala tree that blocked the view of the raj-marg. He sucked in a deep breath before finally turning back to Sita.

“What do you wish me to say?”

She gestured at the Vortal, at Lord Yama who stood calmly upon thin air. “I do not understand this. It is some kind of god-game. It scares me. I wish to see no more. Please ask him to stop and shut up that doorway at once!”

Rama glanced at Yama who offered no response, verbal or otherwise. “I think he means that we must watch this.”

“Why?” Sita calmed herself, lowering her voice to speak in a more controlled but no less urgent tone. “It is unnerving, to say the least. Deeply unsettling. To see those figures that resemble us so closely, speaking, acting, debating as if they were speaking on our behalf. Like actors in some theatrical performance performed on a feast night!”

Rama put a hand on her shoulder, reassuring, gentle. “But they are us. Not actors, not people who resemble us.” He turned her around gently to face the Vortal once more. “That is you. And that is me.”

She shook her head, refusing to look at it again, refusing to believe. “That is absurd. Impossible. We are here, see? This is you, and this is me.” She slipped a hand around his waist, embracing him, resting her head against his chest. “We are real, flesh and blood.

Not phantom visions viewed through an illusionist's glass.”

Yama chuckled softly, the sound rendered curiously pleasing by his deep baritone, undercutting the roar of the river. “An illusionist. Is that what I am?”

Rama raised a hand. “She means no disrespect, Dharmarajan.”

Yama waved his objection away. “None taken. She is upset. That is only to be expected. And she is not entirely wrong. This is an illusion at present. One conjured up by an ingenious combination of brahman shakti along with a deft manipulation of the laws of the universe.” He sighed. “It would seem more real if I were to ask you to step through the Vortal.”

Hanuman started. “But, sire, you said no creature could pass through that doorway!”

“My good Maruti Anjaneya, I said I placed it in such a spot that would make it highly unlikely that any creature in this world could pass through. It is most definitely possible to pass through the Vortal. That is its whole purpose and the reason why it is named so. It is a portal of sorts, but one that is directly linked with countless other similar portals – a vertical integration, as it shall be termed in future ages – and any being passing through a Vortal in their world must maintain the Balance.”

“The Balance?” The vanar inclined his head quizzically.

“The Balance is the inescapable law that governs the infinite worlds of the Vortal. It states that the quantum of matter in any world, or all worlds, must remain exactly the same, neither increasing nor decreasing, merely changing form. Think of the Vortal as a series of doorways connecting an infinite number of chambers in a great house. There is a certain number of beings in each chamber. That number always remains the same. So if one being steps from one chamber into a second chamber, another being from that chamber must step into the first chamber to take the first being’s place. Do you follow now?”

The vanar nodded slowly. “And so if I pass through this Vortal?” he pointed at the glassy archway above the Sarayu with a shudder that made clear his question was merely rhetorical and that he feared passing through the supernatural doorway more than anything else, “a being from that world must pass through into this one, to take my place?”

“Indeed,” Yamadev said, visibly pleased at Hanuman’s quick grasp of the concept. “But not merely any being. Hanuman himself. Your counterpart in that world.”

Hanuman’s golden eyes widened, filling with shock as he contemplated the possibility of another Hanuman beyond that doorway and what that implied. “And there are infinite worlds connected by such Vortals?”

“Infinite,” Yama agreed. “One could go on crossing from Vortal to Vortal without ever reaching an end. Of course, there is an end to the number, but what makes it impossible to count them through in reality is the complication that results from physically crossing over. Each time any being crosses over through the Vortal from their world to another world, the worlds themselves change in subtle, unpredictable ways. Therefore, while we may compute the number of possible worlds reachable through the Vortal and arrive at a finite number quite definitively, in actual practice, we can never confirm that number because each time we attempt to verify it by passing through the Vortal, we alter the Balance and a chain effect results, altering all the known worlds in unknowable ways.”

Hanuman scratched the back of his head. “Yet surely if we have a hand’s worth of bananas, then whether the bananas turn rotten or ripe or raw, there should still be a hand’s worth, no more, no less, should there not?” The vanar held up one hand to show five fur-backed digits.

Yama nodded. “Very astutely noted, Anjaneya. Yet that is the difference between the Vortal and the natural universe. You see, the Vortal itself possesses energy, and that energy is also a part of Creation within which the Vortal exists. Therefore, merely passing through the Vortal, changes the very meaning of a hand’s worth,” Yama raised one hand, showing five digits again, then wiggled his fingers till they became seven, then four, then eight, then six. He wagged the hand one more time, and the fingers changed back to five as before. “The Vortal alters the very nature of reality itself. Or perhaps it only alters the perception of reality as viewed by a sentient living being. Either way, the result is the same: The Balance remains inscrutable and immutable. We cannot manipulate it or play with it in any fashion. It is the one fixed constant in the infinite worlds of the Vortal. Every being must obey the Law of Balance. So if this Rama and Sita,” Yamadev indicated the King and Queen of Ayodhya, standing with arms around each other's waists, listening silently through the exchange, "were to cross through the Vortal, then that Rama and Sita we see there shall have no choice but to cross over into this world. Except that the very act of passing through the Vortal shall alter both Ramas and both Sitas, for such an enormous flux of energy cannot but alter the universe in some way be it ever so subtle or grossly obvious."

"I still do not see why you need to show us these terrible things," Sita said reproachfully. "With nothing but respect, Yamadev, I ask why you brought us here, and why you speak to us of these matters. We accept that there are great and wonderful things in the universe, many of which we not only do we fail to understand but are wholly incapable of ever understanding. An elephant watches a light pass across the sky and cannot tell from that passing what effect that might have on his future, so also we are mere mortals. We live, we love, we struggle, we die. What purpose does it serve to show us such things that we cannot control, use or manipulate to any good use? What good does it serve except to torture us by showing us plays depicting things we might have said, or might well say someday—" She paused to glance at

Rama, swallowed hard, then went on, “—but might never say at all? It is no different from soothsaying or predictions and prophecies to that same elephant. What good are such predictions to him, chewing the high stalks of his favourite tree?”

Yama sighed. He gestured, turning the Vortal opaque once more. “To the elephant, no good at all. That is true. But to you, my great Queen of Ayodhya, a great deal of good. For you are no ordinary living being. Neither is Rama. Nor is Hanuman. You are no more ordinary than I am merely a man who rides a black buffalo and carries a thin noose.” He was referring to the legends and classical depictions in which Yama was portrayed as a man riding a black buffalo and carrying a worn burlap bag with a length of thin rope inside it, tied in the shape of a noose.

Sita shook her head. “We are Sita and Rama, that is all. And all we now desire is to be left alone in peace to enjoy our years of peace together.”

Yama nodded. “I do understand that desire, my lady Sita. After all you have been through, together as well as apart, it is only natural. Yet I did not bring you here this fine morning to torture you with what might have been, could be or will not be. The events you glimpsed briefly through the Vortal just now are things that have inevitably come to pass. The peace you long for, richly deserved though it is, still does not lie within your grasp. I wish it could be otherwise, but it cannot. It never shall be. For better or worse, you and Rama are destined to struggle, fight, battle, wage war, until the very end of your days here on this mortal realm.”

Yama gestured at the Vortal, now a shimmering archway with a slowly rolling rainbow-hued effect, like a still pond reflecting clouds passing overhead. “That is what your good friend and fellow member of the Holy and Powerful Trimurti attempted to warn you about. When devas descend upon earth, they endanger the Balance in ways that mere mortals never can. Each moment you spend here, you attract more violence towards yourselves, those around you and against those you encounter. It is only a matter of time before your lives will be filled with warring once again.”

“So you feel that mortalkind’s inevitable state is a state of war?” Sita demanded with some insouciance. “That peace is an impossible dream? That we should merely accept the state of events and keep our swords busy as long as we live?”

“No,” Yama replied quietly. “On the contrary. As you know full well, my lady, it is peace, not war that is the natural state of the world. Even in the deepest jungle, the predator hunts only when absolutely necessary, and the vast majority of nature’s beings live out their entire lives with almost no show of aggression nor any need for it. Struggling to survive is one thing, killing to eat is equally understandable and tolerated by nature; but wilful violence against other living beings is an aberration, a sickness, a disease. If mortalkind’s natural state is to be at war, then the species would not survive long! Nay, the reason it survives and flourishes and continues its spread unabated across this mortal realm is because it does so mainly through peaceful means. It is the device of the asura race to create this delusion that violence is the only way, that all living beings thrive on violence and that aggression is the only way to profit and progress. As all devas and enlightened mortals are well aware, there is no Absolute Good and Evil in the universe. But there is delusion. And the delusion that war, violence and aggression are natural, necessary and even desirable is the saddest one of all, for any mortal that subscribes to that delusionary view is a sick being desperately in need of help and education.”

“Then why can we not be in a state of peace?” Sita demanded, her cheeks flushed, eyes sparkling with passion. “Why cannot Ayodhya? Why cannot the entire mortal race? Why cannot you simply leave us alone to be at peace? Why do you leave your rightful work in the nether realms and come here to harangue us and show us sights of lives unlived, things unsaid, words that ought never be spoken.”

Yama nodded as if he had expected her to say just that. “Because you and Rama are not mere mortals. You are devas. Lord Vishnu the Preserver. And His eternal Paramour Lakshmi, who is Herself a form of the Eternal Sri, She Who Created the Universe Entire. You know this to be true. Within your hearts and minds, you have always known it to be true. Just as you know that your rightful places are in your own celestial plane Vaikunta. Not here on the mortal plane Prithviloka. With every additional day you spend here you disrupt the Balance. And by doing so you are playing into the very hands of the one who conceived all this and opened the Vortal in the first place, in order to avenge himself upon you. This is all part of his great plan. And by staying here and denying your true nature, you are feeding into his plans, making possible the true vengeance of Ravana.”

He turned and gestured at the Vortal. “See for yourself.”

TWELVE

“Rama!” Sita cried, a world of anguish audible in that single word. “Why do you speak to me thus harshly? Why do you accuse me like some common criminal brought before your court of dharma in the raj sabha? Do you truly believe that my father Janaka and I would connive in such a deception? That we would conceal my true parentage from you? My poor father never knew whose child I was. All he knew was that he found me in a furrow in a field while ploughing, and hence named me furrow. Sita! He is innocent in all this, a man of peace and learning. Please do not sully his fine name in this manner.”

Rama’s eyes were dark and forbidding, his tone relentless: “It is good that you take full responsibility for this deception yourself. I was loath to accuse the great and sagacious Janaka of Mithila, for the Chandravanshis are no less honourable in the upholding of dharma than we Suryavanshis. By admitting your own guilt and absolving your father, you display his fine upbringing and education that he has imparted you.”

“My father Janaka is great indeed, and loves dharma no less than your father the late great Dasaratha did!” she said. “But I am not admitting to my guilt! I do not believe I have any guilt to declare in this matter! The first I heard of this outrageous lie was when Atikaya first spoke it aloud outside the gate! And then it was echoed by his mother Mandodhari. But I did not believe it then and do not believe it now.”

“Really?” Rama said, and his expression verged on a sneer, but was crueller. “Yet you were able to withstand the spellsong of the moon-sword and retain your ability to move freely even when we were all frozen into immobility. How would that be possible were it not for your sharing the same blood as Atikaya? The bloodline of Ravana himself!”

Sita was at a loss. “I do not know. Perhaps because I am a Chandravanshi? Hence the power of the moon-sword would not be effective against me?”

Rama smiled darkly. “Yet it seemed quite effective enough when used aggressively. And you admit of your own accord that you are not a true Chandravanshi by blood. No, woman, stop lying now. Admit the truth. You knew all along that you were Ravana's daughter. Child of Mandodhari. Deliberately carried from Lanka to this subcontinent and artfully placed in a field that Janaka had begun to plough, so he would be certain to discover it. All this was planned ever so carefully. Your being raised by Janaka as his own daughter. Ravana's appearance at the swayamvara and his pitch-perfect performance there, deliberately provoking me into contesting against him and winning – an obvious set-up, for he being a devout servant of Shiva, he could have won had he desired to do so, but he could hardly win his own daughter's hand in marriage; then later, when the time was right, his alleged abduction and spiriting away of you back to Lanka, whereas in fact you went quite willingly and happily, knowing that since you were not only my wife but also mother-to-be of my unborn sons, therefore the lineage of Ayodhya and the honour of the entire Suryavanshi Ikshwaku clan rested upon my retrieving you, no matter what the cost in lives or dharma.”

“I never asked you to wage a war for me,” she cried. “And I was kidnapped, brutally and cruelly. Treated with great harshness and put through hardship. You know this! You saw me. Your servant Hanuman saw me as well! Ask him if you do not believe me!”

Rama gestured dismissively. “It was all deception. You played your part well, I grant you that. No doubt your father rehearsed you well, your true father. For try as you might, you cannot deny that fact. Ravana is your father, and your unborn children his grandchildren.”

“They are your children, Rama,” she said. “Dasaratha’s grandchildren. Kausalya’s grandchildren. Heirs to the Suryavansha empire. Claimants to the sunwood throne.”

“Ah,” he said, “now you come to the quick. Claimants to the throne of Ayodhya. And in time, all Aryavarta. That was ever your father’s wily scheme. That is the reason why you hid the truth of your being with child when we were in exile.”

“I did not hide it, I was about to tell you that very day! But that monster abducted me, forcibly. You know this to be true. You were there! How can you say these things, accuse me of such terrible crimes? I am your wife. I stayed with you fourteen years in jungle exile! Why would I do that if not for love of you?”

“Or for love of your father,” Rama said. “You were only a tool in his master plan. A minor piece in his great game of chaupar, to be moved at will across the board as he pleased, sacrificed without a second thought.”

“I fought rakshasas with you!” she said fiercely. “Killed them! We slaughtered them by the thousands!” She turned to Valmiki. “Tell him, ! You were there too. Would I have slaughtered rakshasas had I known I was descended from their line?”

Valmiki was about to answer when Rama raised a hand, stopping him. “No need to debate this further. Whether or not you knew then is irrelevant—.”

“Irrelevant? You accuse me of being a liar and of having deceived you all these years! How can you call that irrelevant?”

“It is irrelevant to me,” Rama said coldly. “Either way, the truth is out now. This is where we stand. You are the progeny of Ravana, placed into my innermost circle of trust in order to destabilize not just me but my family, my lineage, my dynasty and all Aryavarta. For all this is part of the master plan devised by your illustrious father.”

“No!” Sita said. “I will not accept what you say. It is untrue, grossly untrue. No such plan was devised. Nor was I party to any act of treachery to you or your family. It is my family too, Rama! My children are your children. I share your bed, your table, your life. Does that not mean anything to you? After a lifetime together, would you reject me out of hand based on mere conjecture and speculation?”

Rama turned to look at her. The hardness of his features was frightening to behold. It was his war face, the face he had showed only to his bitter enemies on the battlefield, before he struck them down with sword or arrow. Never before had that face been directed at her. Yet there it was now, looking at her with such unforgiving cruelty that she could scarcely believe this was Rama, her Rama.

No, not my Rama. Not anymore.

She had no idea how a bond that had withstood every test until now could be snapped so suddenly, so cruelly. It shook her to the very core, caused her to feel a sadness so overwhelming, she felt she would drown in it. Be washed away by its power. It surged and roared inside her head, warring with the disbelief, shock and horror that swam inside her, nauseating her and and making her wish that the earth itself would open up and swallow her whole. Better dead than to face such a moment, live through this, endure such abuse and unfair treatment from the one person she had trusted above all, trusted with her very life. Why? How?

“Enough of your lies and denials, woman,” Rama said with a tone so bitter, he might have been condemning a stranger to death for an unspeakable crime. “It is pointless to lie thusly when the engineer of this great plot himself stands before us. Let us ask Ravana himself to confirm or deny your complicity!”

Rama turned to face Lord Shiva once more.

Sita turned to look as well.

She saw that Shiva had gone, vanished through the great doorway that had brought him here, presumably, for the doorway shimmered and glowed with strange, alien hues and reflections even now, just as it had before the Three-Eyed One had stepped through it to enter their world.

Now only Ravana remained there, still kneeling as he had been before. He began to raise himself up now, heaving his great rack of heads and mighty torso upon his powerful legs as he stood to his full height, glowering down at them with unmitigated expressions of pleasure, delight and glee showing on all his ten faces.

“It is as Rama says,” Ravana boomed. “Every word of it. Though I am a different Ravana from the one you speak of – a Ravana come here from a past time, long before even Ayodhya existed – yet even now, I cannot deny that I have planned and put into motion the seeds of the great plan that will lead eventually to the fruition that is unfolding here and now in the mortal plane. All that has happened on this morning in Ayodhya has been according to a well-ordered plan by me. As my erstwhile uncle Kala-Nemi has surely said to you already, everything you thought you knew until now is a lie. The ease with which Rama slew me upon the battlefield of Lanka was only possible because I permitted myself to be slain that easily. How else could he defeat the One whom even the devas could not overpower in a millennia of conflict? Rama knew this too. Just as he knew that everything he did was essential to my scheme too. Yes. Rama himself was aware that he was merely playing his part in a greater play. As were you, my dear daughter. How well you played your role! How splendid an actor you have been in this role of Sita Janaki! It is no good your pretending further. The time has come for us all to unite and take the next, final step in the greater game that is now afoot. For when Kala-Nemi, Atikaya, Mandodhari, or even Rama referred to my vengeance, they did not mean something as puerile and obvious as the destruction of Ayodhya. The vengeance of Ravana is a far greater plan, one that will impact all worlds, all dimensions, all planes of existence, and change all things known and unknown, through all eternity to come!”

Ravana raised himself to his full height, a formidable specimen, his ten heads all displaying different expressions.

“Behold!”

He spread his arms wide, all six pairs of them, green fire crackling from all his taloned fingertips. And behind him the Vortal opened again, like the eye of some great primordial beast and with a grinding scream that drove everyone to their knees, blinding light exploded outwards from the archway as it expanded to fill the entire universe.

“Rama!” Hanuman bellowed as he struggled to maintain his footing. The light blasting out of the archway was unbearable. Rama and Sita had both wincing instinctively at first, and then been forced to bend over, toppling to their knees too.

For though we may be born of divinity yet in this mortal world, we are mortal too and subject to all the frailties of mortal flesh, Rama thought as he endured the shrieking agony that seared his brain.

Hanuman cried out again, as always more concerned about his master than about his own wellbeing. Finally, he too was unable to withstand the immensity of the shakti pouring out from the doorway, and slumped to his haunches, crouched a moment, then toppled over onto his knees, bending over till his head touched the ground. He was weeping with frustration, for since his own powers had been awakened in Rama's service, he had believed himself capable of anything.

Today he is learning that everyone, no matter how powerful, has a limit. Nobody is greater than the shakti of Brahman itself. I'm sorry, my friend, but it is a necessary lesson.

Almost as if he heard Rama's thoughts, Hanuman's struggles subsided and the vanar settled into a crouched submission.

Beside Rama, Sita knelt on the ground, head bowed as well. Accepting the frailty of her form and the superior shakti that blasted them and the surrounding landscape.

Rama forced himself to look around. The entire world was bathed in blinding white light. So bright, he could just barely make out the fact that where it touched anything, it was tinged with intense blue. It looked like the world was being blasted by a hurricane of epic intensity, yet he knew the shakti would not actually harm or damage anything or being. He did not know how he knew this; he simply knew. The phenomenon was akin to a great tunnel of shakti rushing towards them rather than them rushing through the tunnel. The intensity and epic nature of the shakti as well as the disconcerting effect of the shakti rushing at them with such ferocious velocity and power was what made the experience unbearable.

Yamadev alone remained standing, unmoved by the hurricane of brahman light. After all, he was a deva. Yet even he looked downwards, unwilling to stare directly at the effulgence, or perhaps simply showing humility before the force that made up and worked the universe itself, showing respect. He saw Rama looking towards him and made an infinitesimal movement of acknowledgement. Rama heard his voice within his head and knew that Sita and Hanuman did so too.

This is the Shockwave. It has been triggered in the distant future, yet its power ripples back through time itself, altering the course of history past, present and future. Such is Ravana's genius that he planned his attack on an eleven-dimensional front, choosing the perfect time to launch it, a time when you would never suspect such an attack, let alone anticipate it. Once the Shockwave ends, he shall demonstrate his plan. For he is as vain as he is brilliant, and that vanity shall be his undoing. He desires to show Rama and Sita – as well as Atikaya, Valmiki and the frozen multitudes of Ayodhya in that world we were viewing through the Vortal – how spectacular his plan, how magnificent his artifice, how epic his vengeance. But he does not know that you are watching. Not merely one of countless Ramas and Sitas in countless worlds, but the actual amsas of Vishnu and Lakshmi. Unbeknownst to him, he has in fact been speaking to mere hollow puppets thus far, believing them to be the real amsas. And this duplicity was of course achieved by the aid of your old and dear friend and deva...

Shiva. Yes, I thought as much, Rama said in his mindspace. For Lord Rudra is not a fool to be taken in and used by anyone, least of all a rakshasa as devious and duplicitous as Ravana. He would know he was being used and he must have played along in order to keep Ravana from realizing the truth, that the Rama and Sita in the world he entered through the Vortal were not the real amsas at all.

Precisely. For while there can be infinite worlds accessible through the Vortal, there can only be one of each deva, and by extension, one amsa or avatar of each deva in the mortal realm at any given time. It is the law of Balance, as I explained earlier. As you may be aware, I too serve Lord Shiva, for while I have no immediate superior, being master of Death and Dharma and sufficient unto myself, yet ultimately Death too is but one aspect of and therefore subservient to the natural law of Entropy. And Shiva is Entropy Personified. Lord of Destruction – Destruction in all its myriad forms. And so I appealed to my Lord Shiva to deliberately mislead Ravana and play along, pretending that the Rama and Sita of that world were in fact the real amsas.

And they in turn played along as well, but they did so innocently, unaware that they are only simulacra of us, mirror reflections in an alternate world, not the real Rama and Sita at all.

Yes. That too was my Lord Shiva's doing. He fed them that delusion using his infinite powers.

And Ravana was taken in as well, thinking that all Shiva did was make them aware of their divinity.

Exactly. Because while any amsa or avatar may not be aware of its own divine origin all its life, yet when confronted by a deva or devi and called by one's true name, all awareness and recollection floods back, and one remembers everything. It is the only way an avatar or amsa can be 'unlocked'. So Ravana thought that Shiva was unlocking that Rama and Sita and that they were then recalling their true natures as lord and lady of Vaikunta while in fact they were being duped just as Ravana was. In fact, while any deva or devi might unlock most avatars, in your and Lakshmi-devi's case, a special rule was created.

Yes, and that rule said that you alone of all the devas would be the one to unlock us. For you are Lord of Dharma by which I live my life in this mortal avatar, and Lord of Death as well, because we were never to be made aware of our divinity until the time of our death was nigh. Only you, Yama, my old friend, not Shiva, not Brahma, not anyone else.

Indeed. This is why we know that you are truly Vishnu-avatar and Sita is Lakshmi-avatar. For I would not be here otherwise. But Ravana was never aware of this and assumed that any deva would be able to unlock the amsas, hence we were able to dupe him effectively. He truly believes that he is now showing the real Vishnu and Lakshmi his great epic plan...

A terrible rending sound began, like a great iron thing coming to a halt. Rama sensed the tunnel-like onrush of brahman shakti was finally coming to an end and braced himself. The Shockwave of the Vortal was about to end, and the real vengeance of Ravana about to unfold.

THIRTEEN

“BEHOLD JUDGEMENT DAY!”

Ravana’s great baritone, echoed tenfold by all his heads, rumbled and rolled like thunder across the world. Not across Ayodhya. For Ayodhya was gone. And in its place had come a terrible mind-rending vista such as no mortal had ever witnessed before, or even dreamed of in their wildest visions.

Rama and Sita looked around and saw that they alone remained with Ravana. Atikaya, Valmiki, Ayodhya, all those who were frozen by the spellsong, everyone and everything else was gone. Only they remained.

They stood upon the rim of a great precipice. Below them lay a ravine, canyon, basin, crater...there were no words to describe something so vast. It was so immense, it could well have contained an ocean, or several oceans even. The bottom lay far below, several miles at least, perhaps even yojanas or dozens of yojanas, it was impossible to tell. The scale of the place was so colossal, their perceptions could not encompass the very sight.

Below, in the great abyss lay a world. It was like no place either of them had ever seen. There were great cities with enormous houses so tall that they would have dwarfed even the tallest man-made structure in all Aryavarta – the Seer’s Eye in Ayodhya and its sister tower, the Sage’s Brow in Mithila. There were countless such structures, not made of stone or brick or even wood, but of alien materials: glass? But that was impossible; how could an entire tower be built of glass? Yet that was what many of the structures seemed to be made up of. Great gleaming towers of glass and shining metal. Built with such perfection that even Vishwakarma, architect to the devas, would have envied their builders.

There were roads crisscrossing the neat, perfectly arranged rows of glass and metal towers, dissecting them into squares and blocks, rising above the ground to curve and fly like bridges, but no bridges any Arya engineer could construct – curving, interweaving margs and avenues that continued for yojanas upon yojanas in an intertwining web that was mind-boggling to behold. The cities themselves were marvels. At this height, it was impossible to see the people that inhabited them individually; but they could see great numbers of them moving in shining metal chariots or on foot in immense hordes, like armies on a battlefield.

For the time being, both Rama and Sita seemed to forget their own quarrel and were swept up in the sheer exoticism of the vision.

“Is this Swargaloka?” Sita asked, barely able to form her words clearly for wonderment and fright.

“It is certainly some city of the devas,” Rama replied thickly. “But none I have ever heard tell of in any katha.”

They raised their eyes reluctantly to look out further and reacted – Sita gasped, Rama exclaimed – as they saw that the city immediately below was only one such city upon a world covered from end to end with many others. There were forests too, and oceans, and rivers, and lakes, and all else besides. But these paled beside the sheer number of populated settlements. What world was this where so many tribes resided in such vast numbers? Surely not the mortal realm! There were not so many people in the entire world as could fit within one of those vast cities.

They felt the ground vibrate beneath their feet. And looked down to see that the rim upon which they stood was not ordinary ground. There was no mud underfoot, nor stone or brick or any other natural or man-made material they could identify. Instead, the surface was made up of some alien texture. It was similar to the petrified tile that was so dearly prized as flooring in palaces and had to be mined or quarried with great effort from certain spots, then carefully worked, cut, polished to bring out the natural beauty. Yet they could see no streaks, veins or chips. Only a uniform sameness, a greyish continuity that was physically impossible to attain, no matter how skilled the cutter or worker. But there was no time to identify the surface of the ground itself. It was shuddering and shaking, as if with the impact of immense footfalls. Like a forest floor when a great herd of elephant was stampeding.

Or a battlefield when an army of rakshasas charge to attack, Rama thought. And glancing at Sita, he saw that the same thought had occurred to her simultaneously. Their eyes met briefly and he wondered for a moment why he had ever been so enraged at her only moments earlier. Why had he said all those cruel and terrible things? Did he truly believe those accusations?

But there was no time to dwell on that now. For the shuddering vibrations were increasing in intensity, until they felt as if they would both be shaken off their feet and tossed into the abyss below, to fall for several agonizing moments before crushing their bones upon the floor of the alien city directly below. They stepped back slowly, instinctively raising their hands to their sides to balance themselves better – and their hands touched, and Sita clutched his hand as she had so often before, and he caught her hand as well, as he had so many times, and together they stood, hand in hand, watching...

“AND NOW IT BEGINS!” Ravana’s voice boomed from behind them. They did not turn to look. There was no need. What was happening before them demanded all their attention.

An invasion was taking place. From a great cloud in the sky above, an immense cloud that must have continued for hundreds of yojanas and risen for thousands of yojanas until it vanished in a fog uncountable miles above, an army was descending. Their target was the city immediately below, but Rama sensed that there were other forces descending as well upon the other cities of this world, and that this entire world, wherever it might be, was under siege now.

But what amazed him were the invaders.

“Devas!” he cried.

And that was indeed what they were. Gods and goddesses.

Devas. Devis. Ashwins. Yakshas. Apsaras. Gandharvas. Every manner of supernatural being, including those that were often allied with both Devas and their eternal enemy, the Asuras.

They descended in celestial vehicles of every description. Great shining vaahans as glorious as Pushpak itself. Some drove incredible chariots and while some others rode fabulous creatures.

Many flew unaided. Some simply dropped down, to land like hammers upon the ground below, causing immense cracks to ripple outwards, the ground to buckle and shatter into fragments, entire contingents of the massed mortals below to go flying chaotically, slaughtered even before they had shot an arrow or swung a sword or a mace, or deployed whatever weapon that these mortals used in their world. Some flew down like birds of prey, through the great glass and steel towers like arrows ripping through parchment, sending showers of glass and metal fragments raining down on the screaming masses below, then barrelling into those same crowds, smearing hundreds, thousands perhaps, into jellied blobs upon the roads of the city far below.

Devastras were deployed, slaughtering great numbers, destroying towers and entire swathes of the city.

The mortals fought back bravely as well using wonderful weapons of their own; great metal bows that spat fire and threw great gouts of what appeared to be blazing metal at the descending attackers. They had vaahans too, and these zoomed and buzzed through the air, doing battle with the flying gods and beings, unleashing their own fiery weapons. And as the two armies met on the ground below, great roars of rage and battle fury could be heard, though faintly, even at this great height.

They have great spirit, those poor wretched people, Rama thought. But how can they stand a chance against gods?

Even as he thought this thought, the entire view before them rippled, grew misty, obscure. He dabbed at his eyes, disoriented, and shook his head to clear it. His brain ached as if he had been staring at the same spot in the sky for too long – or at the sun. Beside him, he sensed Sita was also disoriented and rubbing her own eyes.

When they were able to see again, the scene before them had changed.

It was much later. The great battle between the mortals and the gods was long since over. Now the beautiful great cities of their world lay in a shambles, smoking ruins, shattered towers, upheaved ground...it was a world in ruins.

Now, another battle raged.

A battle not between mortals and gods.

A battle between the devas and devis that Rama and Sita knew well, and another race of gods.

There was no doubt that the others were gods as well. From their appearance, their movement through the air and over the ground, their sounds, the shakti they unleashed...they were no less formidable than the devas and devis, and every bit as determined to slaughter their enemy.

Gods at War, Rama thought, numbed to the core.

Mortalkind has been destroyed, and now the gods themselves war for possession of the mortal plane – or perhaps for some other goal that I cannot fathom.

Once more the vista shimmered, obscured and he shut his eyes tightly, feeling the searing pain deep inside his skull grown fiercer now.

When he opened them again, the alien city, the warring armies of gods, all of it was gone.

He stood once more in Ayodhya, Sita beside him, Ravana before him.

“Now you have seen the future of mortalkind. And its end.”

And the Lord of Asuras threw back his heads and laughed.

Sita came to her feet, clutching her belly without being aware she was doing so. In fact, the instant the Shockwave had begun, she had held her hands to her belly protectively, not sure what effect the strange explosion of light might have on her unborn children. She had sensed their utter lack of fear, and that had given her succour, for oftentimes she had learned of late that they knew better than she how to react to what was happening. Of course, there was nothing yet that she could recall that actually scared them or agitated them. Nothing except...well, except her own distress. And so she had learned to check her own emotions and responses, not wishing to alarm them. What would they do anyway? Fight for me? Protect me? She almost smiled at the thought of her two unborn babies doing battle for her sake.

Her smile faded as she stared at the Vortal.

Beside her, Rama stood as well, and beyond him, Hanuman. To her left, Yamadev remained standing as before, seemingly unaffected by anything that had occurred. He gestured, and once more the Vortal turned opaque as he hid its view of the other Ayodhya, where the other Rama and Sita stood staring dumbly as Ravana threw back his heads and laughed.

She was glad not to have to see that anymore; even at a remove, Ravana was not one person she wished to see again. She thought this with clenched fists and instantly felt the lives within her kick and grow agitated. She opened her fists, calming her breathing, caressing her belly in gentle downward strokes, soothing them. Hush, my babies, hush. He shall never trouble us again.

“What does it mean?” Hanuman asked, looking bewildered. He indicated the Vortal as he looked at Yamadev, then at Rama. “I scent that Ravana means to destroy entire worlds by precipitating some manner of war between gods and mortals, and then between gods themselves. In some distant future. But I do not understand how that can affect us here and now.”

“My friend,” Rama said gently. “We care about all living beings. Therefore their fate concerns us immensely. What Ravana showed them just now was merely the end of a great drama he has scripted. That was merely the end of the final act. The play itself has already begun and we are all unwitting players in it, whether we know it or not, choose to be or not.”

“Rama speaks truly,” Yama said, stepping forward. Yet somehow, Sita noted, the Lord of Death and Dharma managed to remain in shadow no matter where he moved or how the light fell; his features never entirely visible, his form always slightly blurred and obscure. And though she had spent a while already in his presence, she had no clear image of him in her mind, no visual means of identifying or describing him.

“Ravana is showing them such sights because he wishes to taunt Vishnu and Lakshmi. By showing them the end of humanity itself and the terrible aftermath, he wishes to gloat and to ask the great Preserver how he feels now that he knows that all the myriad species and races he has toiled so hard to protect and preserve for aeons will all be wiped out in one brief and brutal instant. A single day, no more or less. Judgement Day, as he calls it. What is worse, he is showing Vishnu that the genocide of the mortal race – and of all other living beings upon Prithviloka shall be accomplished by the devas themselves, acting in concert. And that will be followed in turn by a war between the devas and gods of other faiths.”

“Other faiths?” Hanuman asked, snout wrinkling.

Rama put a hand on the vanar’s shoulder. “In future times, mortals will not all worship the same gods. Just as our visiting traders from distant lands speak of different gods and goddesses, practise different rituals and beliefs even now, so also in the future, Sanatan Dharma shall not be the only way of life. There shall be entire races and nations of people who shall follow other laws.”

“Other than dharma?” Hanuman said doubtfully, with a distinctly disapproving tone.

“Many roads, one goal,” Sita said. “Eventually, whether they admit it or not, all righteous paths come to the same end.”

Yama nodded. “That is why the same deva is entrusted both with dharma and death. For both are ways to the same end, as Lakshmidēvi rightly points out.”

Hanuman still looked doubtful, but did not say anything further about the matter.

Yama went on. “Ravana gloats now because he believes he is torturing Vishnu and Lakshmi by these sights and revelations. And by presenting them with a great dharmic dilemma.”

Sita frowned. “Which is?”

Yama glanced at Rama who shrugged and said, “You heard the other Rama say to Lord Shiva that he intends to stay on the mortal plane to continue fighting for dharma against the forces of adharma. He even uses dharma as his excuse for banishing Sita!”

She pursed her lips at that, but said nothing.

Rama went on. “But in fact, that itself is part of Ravana’s plan. To compel Vishnudeva to stay upon the mortal realm, taking avatar after avatar, amsa after amsa, in a never-ending, futile struggle to root out adharma from the world forever.”

“And?” she asked. “What is so wrong with that?”

“It is an impossible task. Ravana has ensured that adharma will always exist. By permitting Rama to destroy him and wipe out all asuras, he has forced the Balance to shift in immense, unpredictable ways.”

“Unpredictable,” Yama said, “except to him. For he planned it that way. By ensuring the obliteration of the asura races, he compels the law of Balance to pervert mortals themselves into warring with one another.

Thus he forces innocent, naively honourable beings into becoming rakshasas and monsters and preying on their own kind. That is the real vengeance of Ravana, to turn man against man, brother against brother, from this day, until all time to come. It begins now, and soon it continues through an endless series of wars, reaching one great peak when all the Arya nations go to war against one another, taking sides in a great epic yuddh that will be known in future times as the Maha Bharata.”

Sita was about to ask when this maha yuddh was going to take place, sceptically, since she could not conceive of any age when the Aryas themselves warred against one another. Before she could speak, the ground beneath her feet shuddered. It was not like the earlier sensation, when it had seemed like an imminent earthquake, this was a single massive shudder, like they were standing upon some wooden surface that had been struck with a great object and the surface itself was shaken. Even Hanuman reached up and grabbed hold of a branch instinctively, which told her how intense the shock must have been. Rama and Yamadev both reeled but clung onto the trunk of the sala tree, Rama also grabbing hold of a hanging vine, his bicep knotting.

“What—?” she started to say. And then her words were snatched away by a gust of wind so powerful, it felt like her very breath was being sucked out of her lungs. She tried to scream but of course that only deprived her of the last air she had. She felt her entire body buffeted from behind by a blasting force so intense, it felt like the fabric of her garment was being driven into her skin; she could actually feel the grain of the cloth boring its way into her pores. She was flung flat upon the ground, mouth filling with dirt and dried leaves, nostrils plugged with dirt as well, choking her.

Above the roaring of the wind, there spoke a voice so great it sounded like an unimaginably great metal object shrieking as it scraped against another great metal object – like a giant sword locked against another giant sword in combat. She had never heard such a sound before, nor anything else this loud. It reduced her to nothingness, to feeling like she was little more than dirt herself. An insignificant tiny being in a terribly large and hostile universe. Whatever the source of that voice, it was beyond her ken or comprehension. It was as if Infinity itself spoke.

“YOU DARE!” said this terrible voice, the metal-shrieking intensity unbearable. “IMPUDENT MORTALS! A VANAR? AND YOU, YAMADEV? I EXPECTED BETTER OF YOU.”

From where she lay, face-down upon the ground, choking on dust, driven by wind so great it felt like an elephant lying upon her back, Sita could neither see nor hear Yamadev, so she never knew whether or not he responded.

And the next instant, another rippling blast struck her, taking away consciousness as easily as it had taken away breath.

And everything turned

WHITE INFINITE WHITE

Then even the white faded, and her vision was filled with

BLANKNESS
&
VOID

She floated in the void for an infinity.

And through the void she heard a voice call her name.

Two voices.

Both male, but young. Very young.

And they both called her, “Maa!”

And laughed.

She felt strangely comforted, even though she knew that something had ended that she had never thought would end. Could end.

And she felt herself smile, even as a tear fell from her eye.

The voices made her feel safe. As if she had nothing to fear anymore.

And that was true.

For even though this was the end, it was also a beginning.

She blinked.

She opened her eyes.

And found herself standing in the great sabha hall of Ayodhya, alone. The seats usually occupied by mantris, the mahamantri, nobles, commoners, were all empty. Only the endless rows of pillars marched in every direction, like stone sentries marking a prison.

She raised her head, knowing whom she would see before she saw him.

Rama sat before her, upon the sunwood throne. He was Rama and yet he was not her Rama. She knew this from a single glance, from the way he sat, legs flung apart insolently, goblet in his careless hand, head bearing the ornate, gleaming crown lowered, eyes dark and gleaming, lupine, boring into her. There was no love there. No compassion. No mercy.

Only ruthless justice.

He spoke. And even before he spoke, she knew what he would say. A single word, more terrible than volumes.

“Exile.”

Don't Miss
The earth-shattering conclusion to this epic series!

SONS OF SITA
Book 8

available soon from

AKB eBOOKS

www.ashokbanker.com

SONS OF SITA

Ashok K. Banker

RAMAYANA SERIES®

Book 8

AKB eBOOKS

Invocation

Ganesa, lead well this army of words

Epigraph

|arvaci subhaghe bhava site vandamahe tva|
||yatha nah subhaghasasi yatha nah suphalasasi||
|Auspicious Sita, we venerate and worship thee|
||Bless us, endow us with prosperity and bring us fruits abundantly||

Rig-Veda, Mandala 4, Sukta 57, rca 6

Dedication

for yashka

ayush yoda

bithika

my beginning my middle

my end

not necessarily in that order

love, forever and nothing but love, forever

RETELLING THE RAMAYANA

AUTHOR'S INTRODUCTION TO THE 2ND INDIAN EDITION 2005

Adi-kavya: The first retelling

Some three thousand years ago, a sage named Valmiki lived in a remote forest ashram, practicing austerities with his disciples. One day, the wandering sage Narada visited the ashram and was asked by Valmiki if he knew of a perfect man. Narada said, indeed, he did know of such a person, and then told Valmiki and his disciples a story of an ideal man.

Some days later, Valmiki happened to witness a hunter killing a kraunchya bird. The crane's partner was left desolate, and cried inconsolably. Valmiki was overwhelmed by anger at the hunter's action, and sorrow at the bird's loss. He felt driven to do something rash, but controlled himself with difficulty.

After his anger and sorrow subsided, he questioned his outburst. After so many years of practicing meditation and austerities, he had still not been able to master his own emotions. Was it even possible to do so? Could any person truly become a master of his passions? For a while he despaired, but then he recalled the story Narada had told him. He thought about the implications of the story, about the choices made by the protagonist and how he had indeed shown great mastery of his own thoughts, words, deeds and feelings. Valmiki felt inspired by the recollection and was filled with a calm serenity such as he had never felt before.

As he recollected the tale of that perfect man of whom Narada had spoken, he found himself reciting it in a particular cadence and rhythm. He realized that this rhythm or meter corresponded to the warbling cries of the kraunchya bird, as if in tribute to the loss that had inspired his recollection. At once, he resolved to compose his own version of the story, using the new form of meter, that others might hear it and be as inspired as he was.

But Narada's story was only a bare narration of the events, a mere plot outline as we would call it today. In order to make the story attractive and memorable to ordinary listeners, Valmiki would have to add and embellish considerably, filling in details and inventing incidents from his own imagination. He would have to dramatize the whole story in order to bring out the powerful dilemmas faced by the protagonist.

But what right did he have to do so? After all, this was not his story. It was a tale told to him. A tale of a real man and real events. How could he make up his own version of the story?

At this point, Valmiki was visited by Lord Brahma Himself.

The Creator told him to set his worries aside and begin composing the work he had in mind. Here is how Valmiki quoted Brahma's exhortation to him, in an introductory passage not unlike this one that you are reading right now:

Recite the tale of Rama ... as you heard it told by Narada. Recite the deeds of Rama that are already known as well as those that are not, his adventures ... his battles ... the acts of Sita, known and unknown. Whatever you do not know will become known to you. Never will your words be inappropriate. Tell Rama's story ... that it may prevail on earth for as long as the mountains and the rivers exist.

Valmiki needed no further urging. He began composing his poem.

He titled it, Ramayana, meaning literally, The Movements (or Travels) of Rama.

Foretelling the future

The first thing Valmiki realized on completing his composition was that it was incomplete. What good was a story without anyone to tell it to? In the tradition of his age, a bard would normally recite his compositions himself, perhaps earning some favour or payment in coin or kind, more often rewarded only with the appreciation of his listeners. But Valmiki knew that while the form of the story was his creation, the story itself belonged to all his countrymen. He recalled Brahma's exhortation that Rama's story must prevail on earth for as long as the mountains and the rivers exist.

So he taught it to his disciples, among whose number were two young boys whose mother had sought sanctuary with him years ago. Those two boys, Luv and Kusa, then travelled from place to place, reciting the Ramayana as composed by their guru.

In time, fate brought them before the very Rama described in the poem. Rama knew at once that the poem referred to him and understood that these boys could be none other than his sons by the banished Sita. Called upon by the curious king, Valmiki himself then appeared before Rama and entreated him to take back Sita.

Later, Rama asked Valmiki to compose an additional part to the poem, so that he himself, Rama Chandra, might know what would happen to him in future. Valmiki obeyed this extraordinary command, and this supplementary section became the Uttara Kaand of his poem.

Valmiki's Sanskrit rendition of the tale was a brilliant work by any standards, ancient or modern. Its charm, beauty and originality can never be matched. It is a true masterpiece of world literature, the 'adi-kavya' which stands as the fountainhead of our great cultural record. Even today, thousands of years after its composition, it remains unsurpassed.

And yet, when we narrate the story of the Ramayana today, it is not Valmiki's Sanskrit shlokas that we recite. Few of us today have even read Valmiki's immortal composition in its original. Most have not even read an abridgment. Indeed, an unabridged Ramayana itself, reproducing Valmiki's verse without alteration or revisions, is almost impossible to find. Even the most learned of scholars, steeped in a lifetime of study of ancient Sanskrit literature, maintain that the versions of Valmiki's poem that exist today have been revised and added to by later hands.

Some believe that the first and seventh kaands, as well as a number of passages within the other kaands, were all inserted by later writers who preferred to remain anonymous.

Perhaps the earliest retelling of Valmiki's poem is to be found in the pages of that vast ocean of stories we call the Mahabharata. When Krishna Dweipayana-Vyasa, more popularly known today as Ved Vyasa, composed his equally legendary epic, he retold the story of the Ramayana in one passage. His retelling differs in small but significant ways.

Sometime later, the burgeoning Buddhist literature, usually composed in the Pali dialect, also included stories from the Ramayana, recast in a somewhat different light. Indeed, Buddhist literature redefined the term dharma itself, restating it as dhamma and changing the definition of this and several other core concepts.

In the eleventh century, a Tamil poet named Kamban undertook his own retelling of the Ramayana legend. Starting out with what seems to have been an attempt to translate Valmiki's Ramayana, Kamban nevertheless deviated dramatically from his source material. In Kamban's Ramayana, entire episodes are deleted, new ones appear, people and places are renamed or changed altogether, and even the order of some major events is revised. Most of all, Kamban's Ramayana relocates the entire story in a milieu that is recognizably eleventh-century Tamil Nadu in its geography, history, clothes, customs, etc., rather than the north Indian milieu of Valmiki's Sanskrit original. It is essentially a whole new Ramayana, retold in a far more passionate, rich and colorful idiom.

A few centuries later, Sant Tulsidas undertook his interpretation of the epic. Tulsidas went so far as to title his work Ramcharitramanas, rather than calling it the Ramayana.

By doing so, he signalled that he was not undertaking a faithful translation, but a wholly new variation of his own creation. The differences are substantial.

In art, sculpture, musical renditions, even in dance, mime and street theatrical performances, the story of Valmiki's great poem has been retold over and over, in countless different variations, some with minor alterations, others with major deviations. The tradition of retellings continues even in modern times, through television serials, films, puppet theatre, children's versions, cartoons, poetry, pop music and, of course, in the tradition of Ramlila enactments across the country every year.

Yet how many of these are faithful to Valmiki? How many, if any at all, actually refer to the original Sanskrit text, or even attempt to seek out that text?

Should they even do so?

So many Ramayanas

Does a grandmother consult Valmiki's Ramayana before she retells the tale to her grandchildren at night? When she imitates a rakshasa's roar or Ravana's laugh, or Sita's tears, or Rama's stoic manner, whom does she base her performance on? When an actor portrays Rama in a television serial, or a Ramlila performer enacts a scene, or a sculptor chisels a likeness, a painter a sketch, whom do they all refer to? There were no illustrations in Valmiki's Ramayana. No existing portraits of Rama survive from that age, no recordings of his voice or video records of his deeds.

Indeed, many of the episodes or 'moments' we believe are from Valmiki's Ramayana are not even present in the original Sanskrit work. They are the result of later retellers, often derived from their own imagination.

One instance is the ‘seema rekha’ believed to have been drawn by Lakshman before leaving Sita in the hut. No mention of this incident exists in Valmiki’s Ramayana.

Then there is the constant process of revision that has altered even those scenes that remain constant through various retellings. For example, take the scene where Sita entreats Rama to allow her to accompany him into exile. In Valmiki’s Ramayana, when Rama tells Sita he has to go into exile, and she asks him to allow her to go with him, he refuses outright. At first, Sita pleads with him and cries earnest tears, but when Rama remains adamant, she grows angry and rebukes him in shockingly harsh terms. She refers to him as a ‘woman disguised as a man’, says that ‘the world is wrong when they say that there is no one greater than Rama’, calls him ‘depressed and frightened’, ‘an actor playing a role’, and other choice epithets. It is one of the longer scenes in Valmiki’s Ramayana, almost equalling in length the entire narration of Rama’s early childhood years!

Tamil poet Kamban retells this incident in his more compressed, volatile, rich style, reducing Sita's objections to a couple of brief rebukes: 'Could it be that the real reason [for Rama not taking her into exile] is that with me left behind, you'll be free to enjoy yourself in the forest?'

By the time we reach Sant Tulsidas's recension, Sita's rebukes are reduced to a few tearful admonitions and appeals. Were these changes the result of the change in the socially accepted standards of behaviour between men and women in our country? Quite possibly. Tulsidas's Ramcharitramanas depicts a world quite different from that which Valmiki or even Kamban depict. In fact, each of these three versions differs so drastically in terms of the language used, the clothes worn, the various social and cultural references, that they seem almost independent of one another.

Perhaps the most popularly known version in more recent times is a simplified English translation of a series of Tamil retellings of selected episodes of the Kamban version, serialized in a children's magazine about fifty years ago. This version by C. Rajagopalachari, aka Rajaji, was my favourite version as a child too. It was only much later that I found, through my own extensive research that my beloved Rajaji version left out whole chunks of the original story and simplified other parts considerably. Still later, I was sorely disappointed by yet another version by an otherwise great writer, R. K. Narayan. In his severely abridged retelling, the story is dealt with in a manner so rushed and abbreviated, it is reduced to a moral fable rather than the rich, powerful, mythic epic that Valmiki created.

English scholar William S. Buck's nineteenth-century version, dubiously regarded as a classic by English scholars, reads like it might have been composed under the influence of certain intoxicants: in one significant departure from Indian versions, Guha, the tribal chief of the Nisada fisherfolk, without discernible reason, spews a diatribe against Brahmins, and ends by kicking a statue of Lord Shiva. To add further confusion, in the illustration accompanying this chapter, Guha is shown kicking what appears to be a statue of Buddha!

If you travel outside India, farther east, you will find more versions of the Ramayana that are so far removed from Valmiki, that some are barely recognizable as the same story. In one recent study of these various versions of the epic across the different cultures of Asia, an ageing Muslim woman in Indonesia is surprised to learn from the author that we have our own Ramayana in India also! The kings of Thailand are always named Rama along with other dynastic titles, and consider themselves to be direct descendants of Rama Chandra. The largest Rama temple, an inspiring ruin even today, is situated not in India, or even in Nepal, the only nation that takes Hinduism as its official religion, but in Cambodia. It is called Angkor Vat.

In fact, it is now possible to say that there are as many Ramayanas as there are people who know the tale, or claim to know it. And no two versions are exactly alike.

My Ramayana: a personal odyssey

And yet, would we rather have this democratic melange of versions and variations, or would we rather have a half-remembered, extinct tale recollected only dimly, like a mostly forgotten myth that we can recall only fragments of?

Valmiki's 'original' Ramayana was written in Sanskrit, the language of his time and in an idiom that was highly modern for its age. In fact, it was so avant garde in its style—the kraunchya inspired shloka metre—that it was considered 'adi' or the first of its kind. Today, few people except dedicated scholars can understand or read it in its original form—and even they often disagree vehemently about their interpretations of the dense archaic Sanskrit text!

Kamban's overblown rhetoric and colourful descriptions, while magnificently inspired and appropriate for its age, are equally anachronistic in today's times.

Tulsidas's interpretation, while rightfully regarded as a sacred text, can seem somewhat heavy-handed in its depiction of man–woman relationships. It is more of a religious tribute to Lord Rama's divinity than a realistic retelling of the story itself.

In Ved Vyasa's version, the devices of ill-intentioned Manthara, misguided Kaikeyi and reprehensible Ravana are not the ultimate cause of Rama's misfortunes. In fact, it is not due to the asuras either. It is Brahma himself, using the mortal avatar of Vishnu to cleanse the world of evil, as perpetuated by Ravana and his asuras, in order to maintain the eternal balance of good and evil.

My reasons for attempting this retelling were simple and intensely personal. As a child of an intensely unhappy broken marriage, a violently bitter failure of parents of two different cultures (Anglo-Indian Christian and Gujarati Hindu) to accept their differences and find common ground, I turned to literature for solace. My first readings were, by accident, in the realm of mythology. So inspired was I by the simple power and heroic victories of those ancient ur-tales, I decided to become a writer and tell stories of my own that would be as great, as inspiring to others. To attempt, if possible, to bridge cultures, and knit together disparate lives by showing the common struggle and strife and, ultimately, triumph of all human souls.

I was barely a boy then. Thirty-odd years of living and battling life later, albeit not as colourful as Valmiki's thieving and dacoit years, I was moved by a powerful inexplicable urge to read the Ramayana once more. Every version I read seemed to lack something, that vital something that I can only describe as the ‘connection’ to the work. In a troubled phase, battling with moral conundrums of my own, I set to writing my own version of the events. My mind exploded with images, scenes, entire conversations between characters. I saw, I heard, I felt ... I wrote. Was I exhorted by Brahma Himself? Probably not! I had no reader in mind, except myself—and everyone. I changed as a person over the course of that writing. I found peace, or a kind of peace. I saw how people could devote their lives to worshipping Rama, or Krishna, or Devi for that matter, my own special ‘Maa’. But I also felt that this story was beyond religion, beyond nationality, beyond race, colour, or creed.

Undertaking to retell a story as great and as precious as our classic adi-kavya is not an enterprise lightly attempted. The first thing I did was study every available edition of previous retellings to know what had been done before, the differences between various retellings, and attempt to understand why. I also spoke extensively to people known and unknown about their knowledge of the poem, in an attempt to trace how millennia of verbal retellings have altered the perception of the tale. One of the most striking things was that most people had never actually read the ‘original’ Valmiki Ramayana. Indeed, most people considered Ramcharitramanas by Tulsidas to be ‘the Ramayana’, and assumed it was an accurate reprise of the Sanskrit work. Nothing could be farther from the truth.

For instance, Valmiki’s Ramayana depicts Dasaratha as having three hundred and fifty concubines in addition to his three titled wives. In keeping with the kingly practices of that age, the ageing raja’s predilection for the fairer sex is depicted honestly and without any sense of misogyny. Valmiki neither comments on nor criticizes Dasaratha’s fondness for fleshly pleasures, he simply states it.

When Rama takes leave of his father before going into exile, he does so in the palace of concubines, and all of them weep copiously for the exiled son of their master. When Valmiki describes women, he does so by enumerating the virtues of each part of their anatomy. There is no sense of embarrassment or male chauvinism evident here: he is simply extolling the beauty of the women characters, just as he does for the male characters like Rama and Hanuman and, yes, even Ravana. Even in Kamban’s version, the women are depicted in such ripe, full-blown language, that a modern reader like myself blushes in embarrassment. Yet the writer exhibits no awkwardness or prurience in these passages—he is simply describing them as he perceived them in the garb and fashion of his time.

By the time we reach Tulsidas and later versions, Rama is no less than a god in human avatar. And in keeping with this foreknowledge, all related characters are depicted accordingly.

So Dasaratha's fleshly indulgences take a backseat, the women are portrayed fully clad and demure in appearance, and their beauty is ethereal rather than earthly.

How was I to approach my retelling? On one hand, the Ramayana was now regarded not as a Sanskrit epic of real events that occurred in ancient India, but as a moral fable of the actions of a human avatar of Vishnu. On the other hand, I felt the need to bring to life the ancient world of epic India in all its glory and magnificence, to explore the human drama as well as the divinity that drove it, to show the nuances of word and action and choice rather than a black-and-white depiction of good versus evil. More importantly, what could I offer that was fresh and new, yet faithful to the spirit of the original story? How could I ensure that all events and characters were depicted respectfully yet realistically?

There was little point in simply repeating any version that had gone before—those already existed, and those who desired to read the Ramayana in any one of its various forms could simply pick up one of those previous versions.

But what had never been done before was a complete, or ‘sampoorn’, Ramayana, incorporating the various, often contradictory aspects of the various Indian retellers (I wasn’t interested in foreign perspectives, frankly), while attempting to put us into the minds and hearts of the various characters. To go beyond a simple plot reprise and bring the whole story, the whole world of ancient India, alive. To do what every verbal reteller attempts, or any classical dancer does: make the story live again.

In order to do this, I chose a modern idiom. I simply used the way I speak, an amalgam of English–Hindi–Urdu–Sanskrit, and various other terms from Indian languages. I deliberately used anachronisms like the terms ‘abs’ or ‘morph’. I based every section, every scene, every character’s dialogues and actions on the previous Ramayanas, be it Valmiki, Kamban, Tulsidas, or Vyasa, and even the various Puranas. Everything you read here is based on actual research, or my interpretation of some detail noted in a previous work. The presentation, of course, is wholly original and my own.

Take the example of the scene of Sita entreating Rama to let her accompany him into exile. In my retelling, I sought to explore the relationship between Rama and Sita at a level that is beyond the physical or social plane. I believed that their's was a love that was eternally destined, and that their bond surpassed all human ties. At one level, yes, I believed that they were Vishnu and Lakshmi. Yet, in the avatars they were currently in, they were Rama and Sita, two young people caught up in a time of great turmoil and strife, subjected to hard, difficult choices. Whatever their divine backgrounds and karma, here and now, they had to play out their parts one moment at a time, as real, flesh-and-blood people.

I adopted an approach that was realistic, putting myself (and thereby the reader) into the feelings and thoughts of both Rama and Sita at that moment of choice. I felt the intensity of their pain, the great sorrow and confusion, the frustration at events beyond their control, and also their ultimate acceptance of what was right, what must be done, of dharma. In my version, they argue as young couples will at such a time, they express their anger and mixed emotions, but in the end, it is not only through duty and dharma that she appeals to him. In the end, she appeals to him as a wife who is secure in the knowledge that her husband loves her sincerely, and that the bond that ties them is not merely one of duty or a formal social knot of matrimony, but of true love. After the tears, after all other avenues have been mutually discussed and discarded, she simply says his name and appeals to him, as a wife, a lover, and as his dearest friend:

‘Rama,’ she said. She raised her arms to him, asking, not pleading. ‘Then let me go with you.’

And he agrees. Not as a god, an avatar, or even a prince. But as a man who loves her and respects her. And needs her.

In the footsteps of giants

Let me be clear.

This is not Valmiki’s story. Nor Kamban’s. Nor Tulsidas’s.

Nor Vyasa's. Nor R.K. Narayan's. Nor Rajaji's charming, abridged children's version.

It is Rama's story. And Rama's story belongs to every one of us. Black, brown, white, or albino. Old or young. Male or female. Hindu, Christian, Muslim, or whatever faith you espouse. I was once asked at a press conference to comment on the Babri Masjid demolition and its relation to my Ramayana. My answer was that the Ramayana had stood for three thousand years, and would stand for all infinity. Ayodhya, in my opinion, is not just a place in north-central Uttar Pradesh. It is a place in our hearts. And in that most sacred of places, it will live forever, burnished and beautiful as no temple of consecrated bricks can ever be. When Rama himself heard Luv and Kusa recite Valmiki's Ramayana for the first time, even he, the protagonist of the story, was flabbergasted by the sage's version of the events—after all, even he had not known what happened to Sita after her exile, nor the childhood of Luv and Kusa, nor had he heard their mother's version of events narrated so eloquently until then. And in commanding Valmiki to compose the section about future events, Rama himself added his seal of authority to Valmiki, adding weight to Brahma's exhortation to recite the deeds of Rama that were already known ‘as well as those that are not’.

And so the tradition of telling and retelling the Ramayana began. It is that tradition that Kamban, Tulsidas, Vyasa, and so many others were following. It is through the works of these bards through the ages that this great tale continues to exist among us. If it changes shape and structure, form and even content, it is because that is the nature of the story itself: it inspires the teller to bring fresh insights to each new version, bringing us ever closer to understanding Rama himself.

This is why it must be told, and retold, an infinite number of times.

By me.

By you.

By grandmothers to their grandchildren.

By people everywhere, regardless of their identity.

The first time I was told the Ramayana, it was on my grandfather’s knee. He was excessively fond of chewing tambaku paan and his breath was redolent of its aroma. Because I loved lions, he infused any number of lions in his Ramayana retellings—Rama fought lions, Sita fought them, I think even Manthara was cowed down by one at one point! My grandfather's name, incidentally, was Ramchandra Banker. He died of throat cancer caused by his tobacco-chewing habit. But before his throat ceased working, he had passed on the tale to me.

And now, I pass it on to you. If you desire, and only if, then read this book. I believe if you are ready to read it, the tale will call out to you, as it did to me. If that happens, you are in for a great treat. Know that the version of the Ramayana retold within these pages is a living, breathing, new-born avatar of the tale itself. Told by a living author in a living idiom. It is my humble attempt to do for this great story what writers down the ages have done with it in their times.

Maazi naroti

In closing, I'd like to quote briefly from two venerable authors who have walked similar paths.

The first is K.M. Munshi whose Krishnavatara series remains a benchmark of the genre of modern retellings of ancient tales. These lines are from Munshi's own

Introduction to the Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan edition of 1972:

In the course of this adventure, I had often to depart from legend and myth, for such a reconstruction by a modern author must necessarily involve the exercise of whatever little imagination he has. I trust He will forgive me for the liberty I am taking, but I must write of Him as I see Him in my imagination.

I could not have said it better.

Yuganta, Iravati Karve's landmark Sahitya Akademi Award-winning study of the Mahabharata, packs more valuable insights into its slender 220-page pocket-sized edition (Disha) than any ten encyclopaedias. In arguably the finest essay of the book, 'Draupadi', she includes this footnote:

'The discussion up to this point is based on the critical edition of the Mahabharata. What follows is my naroti [naroti = a dry coconut shell, i.e. a worthless thing. The word 'naroti' was first used in this sense by the poet Eknath].'

In the free musings of Karve's mind, we learn more about Vyasa's formidable epic than from most encyclopaedic theses. For only from free thought can come truly progressive ideas.

In that spirit, I urge readers to consider my dried coconut shell reworking of the Ramayana in the same spirit.

If anything in the following pages pleases you, thank those great forebears in whose giant footsteps I placed my own small feet.

If any parts displease you, then please blame them on my inadequate talents, not on the tale.

Ashok K. Banker

ASHOK K. BANKER

Mumbai

April 2005

EVERY END IS A BEGINNING IS AN END IS A BEGINNING
AUTHOR'S FOREWORD TO THE LIMITED SIGNED AKB BOOKS
EDITION 2009

So here we are again in Ayodhya. The question is why.

In late 2004, when I wrote the last pages of King of Ayodhya, I was sure I was done with the Ramayana Series. Two years later, when the book went to press, I wrote an Afterword that confidentially stated the series was over and even gave my reasons for not writing the part of the story that is known as Uttar Kaand in the Valmiki Ramayana. Next stop, Hastinapura, I said. And then went back to work on my Mba. No, not a business degree; that's just my personalized term for my retelling of The Mahabharata, a mammoth project by any standards, and equivalent to several degree courses! At a projected ten volumes of over 1000 pages in hardcover each, aiming to cover ALL the material in the original 18 Sanskrit parvas, it was enough to occupy me (or several dozen other writers) for years if not decades. It should have been reason enough for me to wave goodbye to the Ramayana forever, hop on the slow train to Epic India and never look back.

But life has a way of deciding where and when to stop the train. And sometimes, looking back, most of the stops that really matter in the end, turn out to be unscheduled ones.

That's how it was with me and the tale of maryada purshottam.

As some of you may already be aware, I had always been fascinated by myths and itihasa since childhood and around the turn of the millennium, I had begun seriously re-reading, researching and studying the puranas with a view to writing my own series of interlinked retellings as well as original works, comprising an enormous range of books that would, in theory at least, encompass all the major myths, legends, itihasa of the Indian sub-continent. I call it my Epic India Library, and it comprises Four Wheels (to use the Sanskrit analogy) that look something like this:

ASHOK K. BANKER'S EPIC INDIA LIBRARY A Lifetime Writing Plan In Four Wheels

WHEEL ONE: PURANAS

Imaginative retellings of Ramayana,
Shrimad Bhagvatam and Mahabharata.

RAMAYANA SERIES®

Prince of Ayodhya
Siege of Mithila
Demons of Chitrakut
Armies of Hanuman
Bridge of Rama
King of Ayodhya
Vengeance of Ravana
Sons of Sita

OMNIBUS VOLUMES

Prince of Dharma
Prince in Exile
Prince at War
King of Dharma

KRISHNA CORIOLIS

Slayer of Kansa
Dance of Govinda
Flute of Vrindavan

Throne of Dwarka
Field of Kurukshetra
Chariot of Arjuna
Coils of Ananta
Lord of Vaikunta

OMNIBUS VOLUMES

Krishna Leela
Radhey Shyam
Gita Govinda
Vishnu Ananta

MAHABHARATA SERIES

The Forest of Stories
The Seeds of War
The Children of Midnight
As The Blind King Watched
Brothers in Exile
While War Lords Speak of Peace
Upon This Crimson Field
When the Blue God Awakens
Beyond Black, White and Grey
Age of Kali

WHEEL TWO: ITIHASA

Richly detailed historical fiction based entirely on factual research, Starting with Dasarajna (Battle of Ten Kings), the seminal war described in the Vedas that established the Bharata nation in the subcontinent, the rise of the Aryas, the story of the Harappa and Mohenjo-Daro civilizations, the time of Mahavira, the Buddha, Chandragupta Maurya, Asoka, etc, through the Golden Age, Moghul Era, British Era, upto the present day covering the entire national history (with no special North, South or other emphasis) including other related cultures and nations in Asia. An honest and sincere attempt to reconstruct our history for our point of view, rationally, incisively, without the religious, racial or cultural bias that unfortunately mars so many revisionist histories, using fictional devices in the tradition of the finest literary history fiction in order to understand our history better.

WHEEL THREE: OURSTORY

Contemporary novels that explore diverse facets of the Indian condition, with an emphasis on how history, both personal as well as collective, influences, affects and informs every decision, act, motive, outcome. An attempt to create a literary document that records snapshots of contemporary Indian life from a variety of points of view, illuminated by fictional devices, genre tropes, and literary devices. Vertigo, Byculla Boy, The Pasha of Pedder Road, This Song Like A Stone In My Fist, Indian English, Beautiful Ugly, Under A Mumbai Sky, The First Vampire, Devi Darshan: Dark Tales, Man With Celluloid Eyes, In This Cup The Ocean, and various novels and short fiction in the genres of crime, science fiction, fantasy, horror, romance or simply general fiction.

WHEEL FOUR: FUTURE HISTORY

To boldly go where no historian has gone before: Using literary devices to extrapolate possible futures, outcomes of present-day policies and sociopolitical structures, imaginatively and intellectually explore possible future events and histories. Gods of War and its sequels, Judgement Day, The Greater Jihad, Rage of Angels and End of Days. The Vortal Codex, comprising Shockwave, Python, Flash, Dreamweaver and Final Cut. The Indus Rising trilogy comprising Gandhi's War and its two (untitled) sequels.

As you can see, there's a certain chronological flow to the whole plan. Not only through all four Wheels, but within each one as well. Now, it's true that I've already begun submitting books from all four Wheels to publishers – Gods of War is already published, Vortal: Shockwave is available to readers as well, some of the contemporary novels have been out for years, and so on. That's because, for better or worse, I am following tracks and trails of the imagination and intellect that lead me where they will. I feel it's important to write down those parts of the overall plan that most intrigue and excite me at a given time, rather than methodically and mechanically following the plan chronologically. So for example, I wrote Gods of War and Vortal: Shockwave while working on my Mba and Krishna Coriolis and other books, and felt the first two were polished enough to be published right away. This is why you'll find various volumes in the overall Epic India Library appearing out of sequence. The hope is that someday, you will be able to own every single volume in the entire Library, all repackaged in conformance formats and specially related covers, with numbers indicating the correct reading sequence, and then you can sit down and start reading the whole shebang from start to finish – now, that would be something to look forward to, wouldn't it?

However, within each Wheel, it really would be best to read the books in chronological sequence. Just as, for instance, you can't read Bridge of Rama before Siege of Mithila, and so on without destroying the author's attempt to create a cumulative buildup of story through accretion of detail, incident and character development. In short: while you're certainly free to do as you wish, faithful reader, to get the full effect of what I wrote you need to read the whole Ramayana Series in order, complete it, and then go on to read the Krishna Coriolis, which after all, continues the epic adventures of the Vishnu-avatar (the Sword of Dharma as I call Him) through his next incarnation. And then read my Mba when it starts appearing midway through the Krishna Coriolis, thereafter alternating between volumes of Mba and Krishna Coriolis in order to get the full 'stereoscopic' effect of the entire tale. (Or, since there are Four Wheels in the Epic India Library we could even call it a 'quadrosopic' effect!)

Which brings us to Uttar Kaand.

The ending of King of Ayodhya left Rama and Sita and the others back home in Ayodhya. The war of Lanka was won. Sita recovered. The exile ended. Rama presumably crowned and esconced on the sunwood throne. Sita pregnant with their children. And a world of possibilities ahead – all happy ones, we would assume.

Yet anyone who knows the basic story of Valmiki Ramayana – or even Tulsidas's commentary, which differs somewhat from the adi-kavya and adds a strong religious and revisionistic colouring to the original Vedic tale – would know that Rama's story certainly does not end there. In fact, one of the most dramatic events of the entire tale occurs after the return home to Ayodhya. Also one of the most controversial, and the reason most often cited by angry young Indians who still fume about what they feel was Rama's chauvinistic ill-treatment of Sita. Kamban chose to ignore that part of the tale – and so did I, at first, placing my small feet in the footsteps of the giants who went before. Because, as I said in my Afterword to King of Ayodhya, I couldn't reconcile my idea of Rama with the king who cruelly cast out his beloved life-companion. So it was with a clear mind that I put aside the Ramayana Series and went on to write about those amazing five brothers in that great ancient city.

But as I worked on my Mba over the next few years, I realized two major things: one, my Mba was growing far too large and compendious to fit into the original nine volumes as planned. The reason being, I'm not satisfied with offering yet another abridged version of the great purana, but wish to make my retelling the first complete, comprehensive Mahabharata ever attempted by any single writer. (Or, for that matter, by any of the several teams of dozens of academic scholars aided by hundreds of researchers and hundreds of millions of dollars in aid over decades – none of whom, curiously enough seem to have managed to translate the Sanskrit epic in its entirety, either leaving the project abandoned midway, or completing it while leaving out valuable details for inscrutable reasons and using language and ideology that seem designed to make the work accessible to western minds rather than honestly attempting to capture the full detail, glory, and greatness of the work itself irrespective of who reads it.)

This problem of length, I eventually resolved by splitting the story into two separate series: Krishna Coriolis in eight volumes and Mba in ten volumes, making a total of 18, exactly like the original epic.

The second fact that struck me was the realization that the Krishna Coriolis, in the manner in which I was treating the retelling, continued almost directly from the Ramayana Series®,. This is because of my concept of the ‘Sword of Dharma’ about which you will read more in my Afterword to Sons of Sita: Book 8 of the Ramayana Series®, which will explain many other things as well. For an avatar or amsa, the moment of death is no death at all. It is simply a transmogrification. The aatma, that eternal and undiminishable part of brahman of which each living or inanimate being is composed, simply moves on to its next host. Thus, Rama dies and is instantly reawakened as Krishna, the next Sword of Dharma. Mortal years – and our mortal sense of chronological temporality – are irrelevant to the flow of brahman. To His consciousness, the transition is virtually instantaneous.

There was also the issue of my considerable alteration to the original tale, done because I was seeking to find answers to questions that had constantly plagued me (as it had plagued, and continues to plague countless Indians even today): Why did Rama act as he did? If dharma was his justification, then why did he have to be so cruel and heartless about it? Why not gently and regretfully banish Sita?

Because as anyone who puzzles over this age-old problem knows, the real issue is not just that Rama exiled Sita. We might swallow the difficult (near-impossible, in my honest opinion) argument about him abiding by dharma – I don’t, but still. But how do we explain the extreme cruelty with which he treated her? Not in front of all Ayodhya, but in a private faceoff where only the two of them were present, and where he says things and addresses her in a fashion that is unlike the Rama of the preceding story. It’s as if this is a completely different Rama now, one that is impossible to reconcile with the loving, gentle, equalitarian Rama whom Sita is able to speak harshly to, even slap, and otherwise act and behave on completely equal terms with throughout their earlier life. (This is one of the crucial differences between Valmiki Ramayana and Tulsidas and other recensions, including Kamban to some extent: the egalitarianism of the sexes, and the clear evidence of womanly power in exchanges between men and women in those Vedic times, unlike the considerably diminished stature of women in 16th century India during Tulsidas's lifetime.)

The problem I faced was a simple two-fold one: One, how to reconcile Rama's behaviour (not his actions, mind you, which can be justified, however absurdly, by the 'dharma' argument, but his behaviour towards his beloved wife) with the Rama we had known and shared mindspace and heartspace with for over 3000 pages in the preceding six books. Two, how to bridge the time between Rama's return home to Ayodhya at the end of King of Ayodhya, and the start of Slayer of Kansa, the first book of the Krishna Coriolis (which, by the way, will be appearing in bookstores only a few months from now)?

And so my mind returned to Ayodhya, and as an idle mental exercise, began to follow the mindtrails and scent-trails of the imagination.

As I finished Gods of War and began work on Judgement Day, the trail widened and the scent deepened.

When I finished Vortal: Shockwave and began work on Vortal: Python, it became even clearer.

And finally, by the time I finished Dance of Govinda, the sequel to Slayer of Kansa, I knew exactly how and why it had all happened. Or at least, my version of events. (Just as the previous six books were my version of the Valmiki and Kamban Ramayana.)

And so you now have this book in your hands.

Vengeance of Ravana.

And you're about to return with me back to Ayodhya. And to begin a journey that will seem both familiar and strange, I suppose, since that's how it seemed to me. And start down the wide, scented path that will lead you to a whole barrage of new questions that will answer some of the old ones, while raising completely new ones.

All questions will be answered not here, but in the succeeding, final book, Sons of Sita. In fact, I should probably warn you that Vengeance of Ravana ends on a cliffhanger, most definitely incomplete, unfinished, unresolved, and altogether unsatisfying ending – because that’s the way the story unfolds. What I can reassure you off, old friend and companion, is that all these new questions as well as old ones, will be resolved in Sons of Sita. You have my word on that. Of course, the story itself will not end there, even in Sons of Sita. Because, as I mentioned earlier, while Rama’s story ends there in SoS, Krishna’s story begins – and continues in SoK and its seven sequels, and in the Mba thereafter.

But the story starts at this point, and so here we have to start again.

Once again in Ayodhya. Once again in Rama’s bed-chamber late at night. Once again with the sound of a disembodied voice in his ear, and warm breath on his neck. Because endings usually bring us back to the beginning in some fashion. In fact, in Indian (and Asian, to some extent) storytelling, all tales are cyclical, as are all lives.

So in a way, every end is a beginning. Which itself is an end. And which in turn is a new beginning. And so on.

After all, as they say, all stories are ultimately linked together. Just as all people are. All beings. All things. All matter. All universes.

And that’s the last thing I have to tell you before we return to that bed-chamber in Ayodhya.

While VoR and SoS do conclusively end the Ramayana Series®, they also begin a whole new tale. One that doesn’t simply continue through the Krishna Coriolis, Mba, and beyond into the other three Wheels of my Epic India Library. But also slips sideways and leaps forward in time to other linked stories.

Gods of War and its sequels are one storyline that is directly linked to the events that conclude the Ramayana Series®. Without reading that series, it is impossible to fully understand and, more importantly, fully appreciate and enjoy the larger tale that begins in VoR.

Vortal Codex is another series that must be read in order to understand and, again more vitally, relish the thrill of the underlying story that starts here in this book.

In short, once you read this book, loyal reader, you run the risk of entering a maze of chambers. One leads to another to another and so on. Not endlessly. Because there is a definite end. But a long journey nevertheless. A journey that will take you through the entire mythology, itihasa, history and contemporary sociopolitical world of the Indian subcontinent (and to a lesser extent, the world at large). As of this writing, it looks like being about 70 volumes in all. Hence the term Epic India Library.

In a sense, you began reading the Epic India Library the moment you read any of my earlier books.

But once you read VoR you will be committed.

Of course, you could still choose not to continue reading. In fact, it's quite possible that you may be so fed up of me and my work by the time you put this book down, that you may never read anything by me again. (Those who take extremist views for or against Rama may feel that way, since they most often have their own fixed notions of what they believe really happened, and are simply not interested in anyone else's point of view.) But since you're still here, still reading this long and possibly irrelevant foreword, I have a feeling you will go on.

And if you choose to do so, then I just want to remind you that I warned you. Right here. Right now. I warned you that reading this book will commit you to a very wide, very scented path that will lead on those dozens of other books, tens of thousands of pages, and a vast labyrinthine story that will take several years more to complete, publish, purchase and read, and will occupy a considerable portion of your waking hours and your book-buying budget.

Will it be worth it? You'll have to answer that one yourself. I think so. But then again, the engineer always enjoys riding the train. Just as the charioteer always loves leading the team of horses.

Why else would the charioteer be a charioteer otherwise? Or the train engineer a train engineer?

Ultimately, it will be upto you, constant reader, to decide whether this epic undertaking was worth the effort and time and investment.

And in case all the above seems like the insane dream of a bibliomaniac, well, one can dream, can't one? In any case, I'm only talking about writing the books. As was the case when I started writing my Ramayana Series®, it's quite likely that no publisher will want to even look at the manuscripts, let alone publish them. It's equally possible that I won't live long enough to finish telling all the stories, or even most of them. But what the hey, I'm a 45-year old, balding, greying, paunchy father to a teenage daughter and an adult son, husband to a schoolteacher wife, care-giver to an adorable but stubborn basset hound, I live and work surrounded by books, family, some filmed entertainment and a few good friends, and that's pretty much it for me. A simple life, almost boring by Mumbai/Bombay standards or any standard for that matter. So at the least, at the very very least, I can afford to dream big, and I'm damn well going to do so.

I have no idea whether or not I'll succeed, and whether you will feel at the end it was all worth it. But I'm damn well going to give it an epic try.

I couldn't think of a better way to spend this lifetime.

And you're warmly invited to join me for the ride.

Chariots don't have seatbelts (neither do trains, curiously). So you're just going to have to hold on to my shoulder if you need some support. I'll try to coax the team to riding gentle, but at times we will have to ride fast and furious. And there may be bumps. And dips. And obstacles.

But at least we'll ride them together. And the journey is an amazing one.

That much, I can promise you.

Ashok K. Banker
25 November 2009
Andheri, Mumbai

PRARAMBH

Sita...

Sweet whisper in her ear, myrtle breath upon her cheek. She started awake with a lurch and a gasp. In the hut's impenetrable darkness, her hands sought out by instinct the looming mound of her belly. Her palms gently massaged the sweat-slicked pot, soothing both herself as well as her sleeping sons. Slowly, by degrees, the nightmarish visions of ten-headed rakshasas, moon-swords and three-eyed devas faded away reluctantly, retreated hissing and snapping to the far corners of the humble hut. She was too middle-heavy to sit up easily; instead, she leaned upon one elbow, head throbbing, throat hoarse from shouting forgotten prayers to uncaring gods. The darbha grass pallet was dampened by her own exudations. She listened idly, hearing only the absence of human sounds. The ashram was asleep around her. The night was peaceful, the forest quiet – or as quiet as a forest could be at night. The very music of the woods told her that all was well, no menace lurked in the dark recesses of the surrounding wilderness, no rakshasas approached stealthily, no mortal or un-mortal foes threatened. Within the center of her being, the twin lives growing steadily – greedily, it seemed someday – seemed barely to have stirred. She trusted their instincts more than her own now; for they seemed to sense better than she when true danger loomed. One kicked, the other kicked back instinctively, and she felt them both settling back into deep repose. The rhythmic cricketing of insects, droning of cicadas, and hooting of owls lulled her back to sleep. Darkness embraced her like a lover returned from a long war. She fell into sleep and nothingness caught her and began to tug her insistently down towards oblivion...

Sitey.

Her eyes opened, staring up into darkness. That name. Nobody called her by that name, in that tone. Her name Sita modified to the third-person plural, the tense used for royalty or formal addresses. Simultaneously affectionate as well as excessively formal. A name only a lover would use. Nay, not even a lover. Only a husband.

Janaki.

She swallowed, willing her heart to slow, feeling a fresh bead of sweat coagulating upon her brow – she had always had a tendency to sweat a great deal from the crown of her scalp – and it took great restraint to stifle the urge she felt to speak out. Quiet and serene as the ashram was, its occupants were light sleepers, accustomed to living in woods populated by the fiercest predators. Rousing them would take little more than a raised voice, a tone of alarm, or even a strange sound that did not belong: Maharishi Valmiki would be up and at the ready in a trice, broadstaff in hand, a mantra on his lips. Then the devas help any intruder, human or otherwise. So she kept her voice stilled and emotions under control. There were also the twins to consider. At this advanced stage of her confinement, waking them would make sleep impossible the rest of the night, for they would be kicking and ready for action no less quicker than the maharishi. The very fact that they still slept so soundly told her that whatever presence swirled around her this night, it was not a force of evil that intended harm to her. Just as the Maharishi was sensitive to sound, the twins were sensitive to all else.

And that name and that tone. Janaki. Daughter of Janak. Again, an appellation used by one who cared about her.

Rama, she mouthed silently, her heart turning at the use of his name. Is that you?

Maithili.

This one was less intimate, more generic. Woman of Mithila. Yet coming as it did after the other familiar terms of endearment, it was more touching, not less, for its formal generality. She shuddered and covered her face with the crook of her arm, feeling hot tears spill carelessly down her cheeks. The appellation, uttered in the most affectionate of tones, caused her mind to resonate with a deep ringing that issued outwards in concentric waves, seeming to reach to the very ends of creation.

Vaidehi.

Woman of the Videha nation. This last was so generic, so formal, yet spoken in a tone so familiar, intimate, caressing, sincere, that it broke the last reserves of her endurance. The dam burst and she turned her head and cried into the straw, cut ends digging uncomfortably into her neck and arms and cheek; not caring. She heard her own sobs in the stillness and thought with a sense of wonder: Who is that woman weeping so bitterly? Poor thing. She must have suffered some great loss.

My love, forgive me. I did what I had to for our sakes. For the sake of our sons. For the sake of our future.

No! She cried silently in her mind's echoing chamber. You did it for dharma. As you do everything. That's all you really care about. Nothing else matters so long as you fulfill your dharma. It's the way it's always been with you!

A moment of silence, as if he did not debate her accusation. Then, gently, soothingly:

Yes. But you serve dharma too. In your own way. Surely you see that?

She raised her face at last and screamed into the darkness with the true voice of her heart, audible only to phantoms and miasmas: I don't want to serve dharma. I don't want dharma. I just want you.

She waited. But this time no reply came. Only the silent darkness pressing upon her from all sides like an invisible cage shrinking by degrees every passing moment. She felt a sudden rush of remorse then. Regret at having spoken so harshly to her beloved – or to his phantom presence, or memory, or whatever it was that had come to her in the deep watches of the night.

Rama? She asked anxiously. Are you there?

But only the darkness remained. The darkness and the silence.

She lay awake the remaining hours to dawn, till the ashram stirred and the brahmacharyas rose and the daily round of chores and duties began anew. Within the swollen mound of her belly, the twins slept as peacefully as cubs in a den.

He never came to her again, that night, or any other night.

KAAND 1

ONE

The heavily laden wagon train trundled noisily through the woods. Sunlight fell in beams through the high leafy branches of the sala trees, some towering twenty yards or higher, illuminating the dust motes thrown up in the wake of the rattling wheels. The forest was rife with the colours of spring, bright bursts of saffron, vermillion, scarlet, russet, mustard decorating the sloping hillsides across which the old trading path wound its way. Smaller animals paused in their foraging and raised slender necks or cocked furry heads to listen as the wagons rumbled past then continued their nibbling unabated, accustomed to the passing of mortals through this neck of the woods. A leopard stretched out upon a high tree branch snarled and bared her fangs silently as she paused in the act of sharpening her claws; long furrows of stripped bark and gouged slashes marked her chosen spot. After she had satisfied herself the mortal noisemakers were only passing through, not stopping, she resumed her energetic grooming, purring with pleasure as the soft crumbly bark yielded to her razor-sharp tips. Below and only a few dozen yards to the side, a mongoose ignored the sound and continued to burrow into a hollow trunk rich with the scent of cobra, disappointed to find only cracked egg shells and old sheaths discarded at the turn of the season. Suspended on the trunk of another tree, a wasp stuck in a drip of oozing sap struggled hopelessly one last time before succumbing to the treacly golden glue that sealed in its life. Cicadas kept rhythm as the forest went about its daily business of killing, eating, defecating, urinating, dying and living. Higher up the sloping hillside, a tribe of langurs dozed in the shade, dopey in the late afternoon heat; from time to time, a squabble or mating duel provoked a babble which then quickly subsided. It was too hot to fight, mate, or do much except wait for the coolness of dusk and the night when the forest truly came alive.

The wagon wheel rims deepened the ruts in the oft used path as they rolled along. Most of the occupants appeared to be coddled within the covered carts, sleeping or dozing. Even the drivers were still and silent, moving only the minimum they had to in order to keep the teams of horses in line. There were almost no arms in view, and those that were visible were tucked away in rust-rimmed sheaths and carelessly kept swaddles. At first glance, it appeared to be a traditional grama – literally, a travelling tribe, for a wagon-train was the traditional collective in which the Arya hunter-gatherer tribes of yore had moved from place to place before the relatively recent era of fixed townships and city-states. But the absence of any women, the complete lack of children, and the heavily laden carts, as evidenced from the exertion expended by the horses drawing the wagons, as well as the covered wagons and oddly quiet procession, suggested something else altogether. There were none of the usual entourage of brahmins trudging doggedly behind the wagons chanting their shlokas either, which ruled out a religious procession. Vaisya traders returning from Videha to Ayodhya, laden with the spoils of a good season of barter? Perhaps.

At one point the path curved sharply, almost doubling upon itself as it skirted a jagged outcrop of rock protruding from the hillside. At the same time, the trees at the bottom of this little outcrop drew back, providing a roughly semicircular clearing. At some time in the not-too-distant past, two old trees had somehow been uprooted and fallen, cutting this clearing in half in a pattern that roughly resembled an arrow fitted to a curved bow. The trees were rotting and overgrown and intersected the original path in a manner which compelled all travellers to slow and maneuver their way in a zigzag fashion for a few dozen yards. Each wagon and horse rider had to slow down and turn left then right then left again, go around the edge of the outcrop where a particularly enormous boulder jutted out like the fist of the bowman preparing to loose the arrow that was the fallen trees, and then turn inwards one last time, riding in the shade of a brief valley-like enclosure between the sharp rise of the hillside here to the left and the tree line to the right, before coming back upon the original path and settling back into familiar ruts. This slowed the entire train and necessitated some concentration of driverly resources, apart from separating each wagon from the one before and after for a moment or two at each turning point.

When the first wagon completed this minor obstacle course and turned the sharp final left, the driver's attention was immediately diverted to two figures standing upon the large boulder. The angle of the sun and the high positions taken by the two men made it impossible to look directly at them. They were little more than silhouetted male figures clad in simple dhotis, that much he could see. Both held bows loosely by their sides and bore quivers on their backs, each bristling with a goodly supply of fletched arrows. They wore no swords or other weapons that the wagon driver could make out, nor did they appear to have any other companions anywhere in sight. They stood together, facing outwards in an insolent casual posture that suggested they simply happened to be there on this fine spring day, enjoying the late afternoon sunshine, and the arrows fitted loosely to the bows held in the lowered arms were simply things they happened to be carrying.

The driver raised his brows, but neither slowed nor sought to stop the wagon. For one thing, it was very heavily laden, overburdened in fact, and stopping and starting required far too much effort and energy, both on the part of the weary team as well as himself. He did not see anything that occasioned risking that much effort here. The two figures standing upon the outcropping boulder appeared to be simply...standing. If not for their oddly intense faces, he would have raised a gnarled hand and hailed them pleasantly. But there was something in their curiously identical features and stillness that reminded him of a duo of young lionesses he had seen once in the Gir woods, in the moment before they had both pounced from diagonal points, converging upon a magnificent but age-bowed stag. This pair put him in mind of that same relaxed yet powerfully gathered predatory stance. He was an old PF whose ancient war injuries had proved too restrictive for him to continue active service. He had retired on the king's pension and now hired himself out to lead wagon trains like this one to help earn a little extra from time to time. Like all old soldiers who had seen violence explode, he knew how even the most innocuous gesture could sometimes seem provocative or hostile to a person of another culture. He lowered his half-raised hand and stilled his voice. Better to simply ride past and on. These were strange times and there were strange people afoot.

He clicked his tongue softly and completed the turn with deft ease, the wagon swinging around, rear wheels creaking noisily as it rounded the curve. The stallion on the fore right of the team, a healthy young brute in his prime who was given to covering every female in sight if given the chance, tossed his head and shortened his steps reluctantly to compensate for the sharpness of the curve, nudged and coerced expertly by the driver.

The curve done, he lowered his head and pulled hard, drawing looks of protest from his companions who were in no particular hurry to reach Ayodhya. The young stud moved as if he had an appointment with a female waiting eagerly for him in the capitol, straining at the yoke. The old driver admired his strength and youth without envying him; he had been somewhat of a bull himself in his youth; in retrospect, he preferred the quiet wisdom of age and experience over the brash virility of youth anyday. He was distracted for just a fraction of an instant by the young horses's antics—long enough for everything to change.

Movement caught his eye on the boulder. He glanced up just in time to see the two figures that had been standing still as statues suddenly stir to action. Both bows were raised, cords taut, and the old wagon rider looked up to see the lethal metal points of two long arrows aimed directly at him. He had a brief instant to think of his great-grandchildren back in Ayodhya and of the toys he had bought for them from the toy mandi in Mithila. He had been looking forward to seeing their faces dance with delight as he drew each new treat out of the jute sack. Those little tykes were his greatest source of pleasure in these last years. But then again, he had seen his share of happy faces. He was not unafraid of dying, nor foolish enough to risk it just to save some rich vaisya trader's season's stock.

He clucked the team to a halt, yanking hard twice on the young stud's reins for emphasis – the fellow was thick-headed enough to ram into the outcrop if not corrected firmly – then dropped his hands, shaking his head to indicate he meant to take no aggressive action.

One of the figures standing upon the boulder spoke. And it was then that the driver had his first real surprise in a very long time. At his age, with his war record and lifetime of experience, he had seen a fair share of unusual situations. But it had been a long time since he had been genuinely surprised as he was now.

Because when the person on the boulder began to speak, he realized what he hadn't been able to see before due to the angle of the sunlight.

The two bowmen were just boys.

Little more than children.

TWO

Luv fixed a bead on the lead wagon driver and kept his aim steady. The man looked like he had seen violence before, judging from the scar running down the side of his head and neck, and the way he had yielded without argument. Another veteran, for sure. What did they call them, those fellows who dressed up in those funny purple and black dhotis and vastras?

“PF,” Kush said softly beside him. “Tough old men willing to die rather than surrender. Keep your eye on that one. He looks like trouble.”

“I have him,” Luv replied. “You do what you have to.”

Kush disappeared.

Luv was watching the wagon driver’s eyes. They were looking downwards, at the ground, apparently not looking at anything in particular. Yet Luv clearly saw them widen as Kush vanished. Smart fellow, using his peripheral vision.

Yes, this one bore watching closely. Luv would have bet his straightest arrow on the grizzled old fellow being the head of the wagon train’s security force. An old ex-PF, retired, making a few cross-border trips like this one to keep busy and earn a little to keep up his sense of pride. There would be others in the remaining wagons, younger stronger men, more eager and less sensible, but this one was the head. Cut off the head and the body would flail uselessly. Or so it went in theory. He watched the old driver without staring directly at him – that was a sure way to ruin your focus and tire your eyes quickly – and didn’t miss the veteran’s veiled glances back up the path.

He’s expecting the next wagon to come around that curve any moment, hoping to use its appearance as a distraction to leap down to the right, roll quickly and use the wagon to shield himself.

Luv resisted the urge to grin. The man probably thought he could move pretty fast, even at this age.

And he probably can. But not faster than an arrow. Watch out, old uncle.

But it told him the man was an honourable fellow, willing to risk life and limb to earn his coin. And that made him dangerous.

Kush stood in the center of the path, directly in the way of the second wagon. Heavily laden like the first, it had taken a few moments to maneuver around the rock-strewn path. Two men rode in front of this one; an older man handling the reins, a younger one riding beside him with a shortbow laid on his lap. On catching sight of him, this man swore and raised the bow, fitting an arrow to the string. Should have held it loosely in one hand, ready to shoot. Before he could draw, Kush's first arrow knocked the bow out of his hands. It struck the wooden frame of the wagon, bounced off and fell under the rear wheel of the wagon. Kush heard the sound of cured wood splintering. Waste of a good weapon.

The man swore again as he snatched up a javelin lying discreetly in a recessed groove beside his seat. He had the upper body bulk of a thrower and Kush had no doubt he had probably won many melas in his day.

He called out as the man raised the metal tipped wooden pole to shoulder height: "Drop the weapon. Keep your arm."

The man showed his teeth and continued without so much as a sideward glance or hesitation. Kush sighed inwardly and wondered why they never listened. The javelin clattered back onto the wagon's boards as the man stared uncomprehendingly at the arrow that had sprouted from his bicep, disabling his arm. To his credit, he didn't scream or cry out. At least he's a professional. He hated it when at times the vaisya traders too cheap to hire good protectors enlisted their own over-enthusiastic relatives to guard the trains. Someone always got badly hurt at those times.

Kush had already turned the bow back to the wagon driver, another arrow already strung and ready to be loosed. The older man didn't need to have the basics of life explained to him. He was already clucking and prodding and yanking frantically at the reins. With an effort he managed to stop the wagon barely inches from Kush. The breath of the lead horses puffed warmly on Kush's bare hairless chest.

He bent his head forward and nuzzled the dripping snout of the lead horse, a roan stallion with a white leaf-shaped patch on his forehead, whispering a few words of endearment, while keeping the bow cocked and aimed at the wagon driver. If the man jerked the team forward at that moment... Kush would have to dance merrily to somersault out of the way of the pounding hooves in time. But he trusted horses more than men. The roan's eyes would flare the instant that happened, giving him the fraction of a second he needed to act.

He kissed the roan one last time: "Someday, I'll own a herd of beauties just like you." The roan whinnied in approval as he walked away.

He jerked his head sideways at the wagon driver and the protector, indicating to them to get off. When both men were on the ground, the younger one glaring balefully at Kush, ignoring the arrow stuck in the meat of his arm, Kush pointed the arrow at each one in turn, making sure they looked into his eyes and saw he was serious. The younger one still looked rebellious, so Kush shot an arrow past his head, nicking his scalp with the fletch as it hissed past, just enough to open a cut that would bleed without actually harming the man. The man cursed again, tried to clap his injured hand to the head cut, slapped his own cheek instead, then got busy trying to keep the blood out of his eyes. Head wounds never stopped bleeding on their own, and the man would need patching and herbs to staunch the small but troublesome trickle. That, along with the arrow still in his arm would keep him distracted enough. The driver would give Kush no trouble: he could see it in the man's eyes. He probably had grandchildren in Ayodhya he wanted to get home to and fighting to protect some rich vaisya trader's summer's earning did not seem motivation enough to risk his life.

"Keep your arrows on them, brothers," Kush called out as he ran past them. "I shall halt the rest of the grama."

Their eyes flicked one way then another, attempting to seek out where Kush's fictitious companions might be placed. Kush grinned as he turned the corner. Good. That would keep them well-behaved till he returned.

He rounded the corner just as the rest of the wagon train trundled into sight. He wondered what the Sanskrit highspeed word was for a train carrying only produce and goods for barter and sale. A grama was strictly speaking a travelling clan or extended tribe. These wagon trains that rolled through this neck of the woods were purely carrying loads of trade items guarded and ferried by hired hands from one market town to another. There were no families here, no kith or kin. Just male kshatriyas of every background possible, all armed to defend these goods. A vaisya-grama, it should be called, he thought scornfully. Not because there was anything wrong with the vaisya merchant class, but because a grama so wholly devoted to naught but the pursuit of wealth and individual profit was unnatural, an abomination. Then again, these were city gramas, and cities were corrupt places, breeding grounds of venial vices. These men probably thought they were merely fulfilling their dharma; not that they even knew what dharma truly meant.

“Halt!” he shouted in a voice far greater than seemed possible for one of his small frame and slender torso. His voice carried the conviction of a man who would enforce his own command with the unleashing of weapons if need be. Never mind that he was less than 10 years of age. It took more than years or kilos of muscle to make a man a man.

The line of laden wagons continued to approach without slowing down. The riders had to have seen Kush but they were urging their teams on regardless, chins tucked low, eyes narrowed. From the hunched, tensed way they sat, Kush sensed that they had either expected something like this to happen or were prepared for it. He also knew what they intended to do: ride over him. The foremost wagon rumbled at a steady pace towards him, just about twenty yards away now. He could see the colours of the eyes of the men riding on the rider’s bench. They looked grizzled and tougher than the ones on the front two wagons. Grama-rakshaks. Luvu and he had heard of them, kshatriyas who travelled with gramas like this one, guarding them for a fee. It was the first time he was facing one.

He raised his bow, aiming it at them. They seemed to hunch a little lower but made no other move. The man beside the driver already had a bow in his hand with an arrow fitted to the string, stretched and pointed downwards. As Kush raised his bow, the grama-rakshak raised his own, both arrows ready to loose now. Other than that, there was no reaction to his shouted command.

He didn't entirely blame them. A single bowman barring their way, that too one of his obvious physical appearance, probably seemed unworthy of any response.

He would just have to prove them wrong.

"Halt or I shoot!" he called again. The wagon was barely fifteen yards away now.

In response, the man beside the driver loosed his own arrow. It was well aimed and Kush felt the heated wind of its passing tickle his chest as he swung his body just enough to make space for the arrow to go by. His arrow was already loosed before he swung around, a fraction of a second after the grama-rakshak's arrow.

The man cursed once, and stared down at the arrow sprouting from his muscled shoulder. It was not a serious wound but it rendered him incapable of using a bow for the time being, which was all Kush had intended.

The wagon driver cracked his whip and the team of horses lurched forward, breaking into a steady canter. The speed at which they moved startled Kush. It could only mean the wagon was not as heavily laden as Luv and he had thought. They covered the remaining ten yards to him in a trice and he barely had time to sling his bow before the towering Kambhoja stallions thundered down on him, fully twice his height and each weighing a half ton. More than two tons of horse and wagon pounded over him relentlessly.

THREE

Luv knew Kush was in trouble even before he heard the whinnying of horses and shouting of hoarse voices from beyond the outcrop. He wasn't startled in the least but the old PF with the scar probably assumed he would be and made his move. He leaped off the wagon with surprising speed and ought to have rolled to the right, behind the cover of the wagon; instead he rolled left, grabbing the team's rig, using the horses as a shield. Luv's first arrow whizzed harmlessly through the gap where he had expected the man to be and his second remained notched and ready but unloosed. Firing under the team's bellies would certainly startle them and with that lead roan stallion already impatient and restless to be on his way again, that would only result in a runaway wagon. Not part of the plan. He didn't bother to call out to the man either: the fellow knew what he was doing and obviously still had a few tricks up his sleeve. Instead, Luv aimed at a new target, a slender leathery one, and fired off three quick arrows in succession. Then he grinned, pleased at the result, and loosed a fourth one directly behind the lead roan's rump, close enough that were he to go collect that arrow it would probably smell of horse's droppings!

The roan stallion snorted in response, kicked out once, then suddenly realized what had just happened. Somehow, by some miracle, he and his equestrian companions had been set free of their burdensome load. Without further ado, he lowered his head like a charging bull and started down the path. Startled, the rest of the team had no choice but to follow, and with the burden of the wagon gone, they broke instantly into a canter that turned quickly into a cheerful gallop as they went around the last abutment and disappeared from sight.

In the trail of dust left by their passing, the aging wagon driver lay sprawled on the ground, staring in dazed surprise after the fleeing horses. Before he could get back to his feet, Luv had leaped off the boulder, using a series of lesser stones to hop, skip, jump to the path. He aimed the bow at the man again, who started, convinced he was about to be killed.

"Easy," Luv said. "We never hurt anyone unless he tries to hurt us first."

The man showed Luv his open palms. "I'm not looking for a fight, yuvraj. Just an old wagon driver. I leave the fighting to the grama-rakshaks." He jerked his head backwards, indicating the path behind the stranded wagon.

Almost on cue, a fresh burst of yells and horse sounds came to them from beyond the outcrop. Judging by the sounds, Luv estimated that it wasn't the second wagon Kush was having trouble with but the rest of the grama. I should go to him, there might be too many for him to handle.

He saw the old driver watching him closely during the few moments it took him to think this and consider the options. Old man may not want to fight, but he's still a shrewd one.

“What's your name, oldun?” he asked.

The old driver frowned, his forehead wrinkling in a way that reminded Luv of the bed of the Sona river when it had dried up in last year's drought. “Why do you need to know that?” he asked.

Luv raised the arrow a fraction.

The man shrugged. “All right. It's Bejoo. Used to be Captain Bejoo of the Vajra—”

Luv cut him off. “Bejoo. I don't need your atmakatha. Listen carefully. I'm leaving you alone here for a moment. I could tell you that I have companions watching you from the woods but I won't do that because you seem like a sharp man. So I'm just going to ask you to stay here till I get back, and not run away. You do that and I'll let you walk away unharmed. Run and I won't. Clear?”

The man looked at him suddenly with a peculiar expression.

Luv raised the arrow another fraction. “Clear?” He couldn't keep the tone of impatience out of his voice. Kush was definitely in trouble by now, or he would have been back.

The man swallowed, then nodded. “Aye. Ayuh, youngun. Clear as the Sarayu in spring.”

Luv looked at him sharply. “Remember. I know these woods like the back of my hand. Run and you die.”

The man nodded again. Again that same peculiar look. He looks like he's just recognized me and we were long-lost friends. But Luv had never seen the man before in his life.

Luv turned and sprinted up the path.

“Kush!” he yelled as he went. “I’m coming!”

Kush heard the men laughing even over the thundering of the horse's hooves and the racket of the wagon. They meant to run me down! By kshatriya code, that meant he was free to use mortal violence against them. When someone openly attempted to kill a warrior, he in turn was justified in killing the aggressors to defend his life. Even so, Kush scornfully discarded the idea: men who used a wagon to run down a solitary boy were not worthy adversaries. What was the phrase Maatr used? ‘Don't soil your arrowheads with cowardly blood!’ He grinned. Maatr was always saying things like that, Vishnu bless her.

He whispered affectionately to both the horses whose rigging he was clinging to, their warm breath on his neck and face tickling him and making him giggle involuntarily. He had been ridden over before and had learned at an early age how to let the horse take you rather than resist and fight the onward-rushing force. Flesh, sinew and bone could be destroyed by that onrushing weight as easily as a footfall would snap a twig. But if a kshatriya was trained and prepared, it was like a wayward puddle being collected by an onflowing stream of water and just as effortless. He had simply let the pounding horses bear down on him, crouched down at just the right angle, and grabbed hold of the rigging between the two lead horses at precisely the right moment: the warrior's moment, as he and Luv liked to call it. On the raj-marg, one either moved aside – often at breakneck speed to avoid some of those hot-riding royal contingents – or got crushed under pounding hooves and chariot or wagon wheels. Ever since they could remember, they had seen people killed thusly, often old folk too weak or slow to move aside in time, poor unfortunate carrying too heavy a load to toss aside in time and most heartrending of all, children as small as themselves, tiny bodies mangled from the hooves into a shapeless heap of shattered bones and oozing flesh. After viewing one particularly nasty aftermath of a visiting royal procession with an armed escort, Luv and he had begun to teach themselves how to survive such encounters without ending up as battered blood-mash. By the age of 5, when they were old enough to reach the rigging of the tall horses that thundered down the king's road, they had mastered the art of letting the horse take them. Now, it was easy as clinging to Maatr's breast.

He had began working his way down the length of the rigging almost immediately after being picked up. Now he looked up between a crack in the floorboards of the driver's seat at the two men riding there. The one with the arrow in his shoulder was still cursing, but his indignation at his own pain was outweighed by his amusement at having run over the 'brigand'. They were tough grizzled old veterans, probably ex-PFs like the one in the lead wagon. Luv didn't waste more time on them. He was more interested in finding out what cargo they carried that had made them too nervous to halt. It was the work of only another moment to haul himself under the wagon itself, then up the side where he found enough space under the flap covering to slip into the vehicle itself without those in the following wagon seeing him.

Inside the wagon, the noise of the grama oddly muted by the heavy canvas covering, he stared around at the consignment for a long silent moment, stunned.

Of all the possible cargoes he had expected, this was not on the list.

Just then he heard the men shouting and the wagon slowing and knew that could only mean one thing: They had reached the stranded second wagon. And most likely, Luv as well.

Now, the fun would begin.

FOUR

When Luv came sprinting around the outcrop, two pairs of eyes instantly snapped around to stare at him. The two men on the second wagon looked startled to see him. I know that look. They think I'm Kush and can't figure out how he could have run off in that direction and then appeared again from this direction. He was used to that response. He yelled at them as he sprinted past: "Stay where you are!" They looked too startled to try anything anyway.

Barely had he run past the wagon when he heard the sound of pounding hooves from ahead, around the next spur of rock. A few broken boulders lay on the path, their insides gleaming rusty red where they had broken open after falling in a minor landslide during the last monsoon. Others had been pushed over deliberately to block the path, for this was a popular ambush point on the raj-marg. The sound of hooves and rattling of wagon wheels was very loud by then and he knew better than to run around a blind turn. Instead he swerved and leaped up onto the largest broken boulder. He could smell the iron in the air here, so rich was the vein in the lohit stone. These hills were rife with minerals, good pure ore for making steel.

He stood in the relaxed archer position that Bearface had taught them, waiting.

Don't call your guru that name, Maatr's voice said in his mind's ear, He is Gurudev to you, remember!

Yes, Maa.

The position that Bearface had taught them, the lazy cobra, their guru had called it, was now second nature. He waits, seemingly indolent, swaying lazily, but the instant threat appears, he strikes with lightning-speed.

Luv didn't know if he moved at lightning-speed, but the instant the wagon came into sight, he let fly. The first arrow hit its mark and the second was flying even before the wagon had rolled fully into view. A man shouted out with pain and tumbled off the wagon, with two arrows sprouting, one from each shoulder – the first had clearly been Kush's work. The driver screamed like a wounded horse and clutched at the arrow quivering in the meat of his thigh – the head must have struck the thighbone, hence the vibration and the extreme pain. Then the wagon rolled past and the next came into view, and still no sight of Kush.

Damnit, Luv thought, feeling the heat rise in his face, cheeks burning. Where are you?

The men on this wagon were better prepared and better shots. Three well aimed arrows came blurring at Luv and he had to somersault sideways to dodge both. Landing on his bare feet on the rubble of the lohitstone, he felt warmth on his waist where one had nicked the skin just enough to draw a bead or two. He loosed off two quick ones before the men could shoot the second volley, and both hit their marks. Both men dropped their own bows, one grunting, the other choosing the strong silent response.

Then the rest of the grama came into view, riding fast, faster than any grama ought to have been especially on this twisting treacherous neck of the raj-marg, and everything began to move very quickly, so quickly that Luv felt his senses slowing to a crawl as they always did in a fight, the world popping into brilliant crystalline clarity and colour: the veins on every leaf visible, every knothole on the wooden slats of a wagon's side in view, hearing every grinding creak in a wheel, smelling the raw red odors of freshly spilled human blood mixed in with the pungent smell of horse sweat, man-sweat and the rusty tang of the lohitstone.

The flaps of the following wagons opened and revealed armed men. Burly, hirsute, armoured men in the familiar purple and black of Ayodhya's inner guard. PFs, or some new extension of the PF regiment – for PFs were meant to guard the inner city, not ride with trading gramas as hired escorts. Whatever they were, whomever they were, there were a lot of them, too many for Luv to simply disarm. He would have to fight them seriously to survive, kill some quite likely. And even then it would be touch and go.

The good warrior knows when to retreat, said his guru's gruff voice in his ear. The code of the kshatriya means nothing if there is no kshatriya left to fight!

Agreeing with Bearface – sorry, Gurudev – was his mother's voice in his other ear. Run, Luv, run! You can't fight them all!

Ji, Maatr, jaisi aagya, he said in his mind as he began the heavy task of fitting arrows to bow and aiming not to maim or disarm but to disable, possibly kill. I would love to run. But not without my brother.

“Damn it Kush, where the hell are you?” he said aloud as he began shooting.

Kush emerged from the wagon to see his twin brother standing on a pile of lohistone landslide, the edges of the outcrop at his back, loosing arrows with concentrated ease. He appeared to be single-handedly battling what looked like at least five quads of armed PFs, even though PFs never ventured armed and uniformed outside the Ayodhya city limits. Clearly this grama was a notable exception to the usual rules.

Which makes sense, considering the cargo they’re carrying, he thought as he sprinted away from Luv and to the other side of the raj-marg, unnoticed by either his brother or the men busy trying to kill him. In three deft leaps and grabs he had climbed a tree and was standing on a near-horizontal branch twice as thick as his own thigh. It would have bent and drooped under a grown man’s weight but it took his own lithe form easily, and he steadied his left shoulder against the trunk, took aim at his first target and loosed. The man took the arrow in the meaty muscle joining shoulder to neck, and it popped out through his collarbone with a small explosion of blood. The man yelped like a pup and dropped the javelin he had been about to fling at Luv.

Without turning to look directly at Kush, Luv cried out with joy. “Kush!” Then added in a disgruntled tone even as he continued loosing and dodging: “Took your time, didn’t you!”

“Had to make a short visit to the royal treasury,” Kush called back, grinning. He continued loosing, and saw his third target drop, roaring with frustration and fury as he tried to clutch at the arrow sprouting from his shoulderblade. Hit the bone, hurts like blazes. That voice was old Nakhudi’s, who always seemed to know how to inflict maximum pain on the enemy without actually killing them. Only male enemies, as she liked to remind them, grinning to reveal her astonishingly white gleaming teeth in her buffalo-dark face.

The fight continued for another few moments, the PFs on and around the halted wagons trying with admirable skill to face an attack on two diagonally opposed fronts with diminishing success. Their leader, an efficient and intelligent-seeming fellow, tried to rally his men to use the wagons as shielding, while attempting to send a pair of quads around to outflank Kush – Luv was bolstered by the outcrop which would have taken hours to cut over and around – but the brothers had them at the deadliest cross-angle two bowmen could take, and the broken stones shielded Luv while the tree and foliage shielded Kush, and while many arrows and javelins were aimed at them, none came closer than a single wayward arrow that thunked into the tree branch between Kush's big toe and its neighbour.

Then, as fierce fights usually did, this one dissipated like a puddle evaporating under a mid-day sun, and suddenly the captain of the PFs was waving his arms in surrender.

Kush grinned and dropped down from his perch, making his way cautiously towards the halted wagons. He had his eye on some men at the back who might, if still feisty enough, try to fling a javelin or two as he approached. But every one of them and all the others as well had at least one arrow in their arm, leg or back, and one massively built chap who had refused to settle down with just two or even three arrows had four bristling from his extremities, lying on his back and cursing the sky roundly with a raised fist, turning the air blue with his choice of profanities. Kush grinned even wider, making a note of several for future reference. Living in an ashram community as they did, good curses were hard to come by!

Luv had leaped up to the tall broken lohitstone boulder, keeping his weapon trained on the PFs as his brother approached. Kush winked at him as he came and saw Luv shake his head in mock-disgust – complaining about the moments when Kush had disappeared from sight earlier. The PFs quietened as he reached them, holding down their moaning and grunting and cursing as they saw the 'men' who had bested them up close for the first time.

FIVE

“You should have seen their faces,” Kush said, slapping his thigh with delight. “They looked like brahmins who had eaten ashubh bhojan by mistake and didn’t know whether to spit it out rudely or swallow it and violate dharma!”

“And they had so many arrows sticking out of their arms and legs,” Luv said, “if they stood close together in a bunch, they would have looked like a giant hedgehog!”

Both boys laughed in the high-pitched tone of young men whose voices had not been altered by maturity yet.

Nakhudi grunted non-committally, shaking her head wistfully. “You boys. One of these days, you’ll run up against someone who’s a match for you two, and there will be hell to pay. How many gramas have you held up and robbed until now?”

“Nakhudi!” Luv said plaintively. “We didn’t rob anybody! We just took back a fair share of what Ayodhya takes from the people unlawfully, that’s all.”

“That’s right,” Kush said, equally outraged. “Whatever we took from those gramas belonged to the people, and we took it to give it back to the people anyway. So it wasn’t robbing!”

Nakhudi looked at their two young faces, identical chins turned up stubborn to point at her, dusky cheeks flushed with their recent adventures and their present outrage. She shook her head slowly. She had been picking out berries from her thatched basket to offer them: the boys loved berries and she always kept some just for their visits. She put down the handful of choice berries she had picked out lovingly from the basket and stood. Her head almost bumped the roof of her little hut when she drew herself to her full height, for it was built low to withstand the sweeping monsoon winds that sometimes washed this hillock in the midst of the deep woods. She glared down at the boys. Standing to her full height, she topped their tousled heads by easily twice their height; she was taller than any woman they had ever seen, taller than most men they knew, and her scarred broad face, flat nose, shining dark eyes and formidable bulk all combined to give her a fierce aspect. She used all of that as well as the hoarse voice that lent her an air of danger and made her seem angry even when she wasn't, to deliberately intimidate them.

“Listen to me, and listen well, for I'll only say this once,” she rasped, poking an outstretched finger into Luv's chest and then at Kush's chest. To the boys, strong as they were for their age, it felt like being struck by the blunt end of a thin staff or rod. She cracked her knuckles and stretched her hands, as if limbering up for more aggressive action, which only added to the air of threat. “Ayodhya makes the laws in this part of the world. By Indra's hundred eyes, what am I saying? Ayodhya is the law. This jungle may seem unpopulated and a long way from any city, but it's still part of the Kosala nation. And by law, it falls under Ayodhyan jurisdiction and governance. That governance includes the right to tax the people as required from time to time. So don't call what they take unlawful.”

They glanced at each other doubtfully. Suddenly, the same two young bowmen who had stood up to an entire grama protected by armed warriors had been reduced to just two startled young boys. It had taken only a change of tone and attitude on Nakhudi's part; the hermit woman always had that effect on them. Part of it was a result of the respect and awe they felt for her warrior skills and longstanding comradeship with their mother. But they were also scared of her. Nakhudi when angered was a fearsome thing to behold. For reasons they could not wholly fathom, she was clearly angered now. And they didn't like it one bit.

“Now, you boys may feel that after the droughts and famines and other ill winds that have harried the kingdom over the last several years, Ayodhya ought not to be taxing the people and I can't say I disagree with you. Kali Herself knows that times are hard enough as it is, and the tax is only one more back-breaking burden piled on top of too many others. But that's not for you or me to decide. That's Ayodhya's decision. And if Ayodhya chooses to levy the tax, then that makes it a lawful tax. You boys saw the suffering of a few people who reside in these remote parts and felt sorry for them. So you decided to hold up a grama or two – or is it three? How many is it anyway?”

She snapped her fingers right by Kush's ear, loud enough that it sounded like a twig snapping underfoot.

The boy didn't flinch but said sullenly, "Three so far. But one was only—"

"Be quiet while your elders are talking." She continued decisively, "So you hold up three gramas in as many seasons, and take a wagonload from each one. And you distribute the contents of that wagonload to the poorest, most needy people you can find around here. And it's true, the few people who live here in this Durgaforsaken jungle are really poor and truly needy. And it's a great service you do them, by giving them those provisions. I don't deny that one whit. But make no mistake about this one truth: those wagonloads of goods you take by force don't belong to the people anymore. The minute Ayodhya's tax-collector's claim it, it belongs to Ayodhya. So you are robbing Ayodhya. I'm not saying it's not for a good cause; indeed, I agree that it's a very good cause. But that doesn't make it right, or just, or even lawful. So don't go fooling yourself about the rightness or lawfulness of what you're doing. Understand?"

Both boys glared at her with such identical expressions of righteous indignation on their handsome young faces, she was instantly reminded of someone else. A man's face, older, leaner, darker-complected. Much darker-complected, for they had inherited their mother's wheatish colouring and more than a smidgen of their grandfather's lightness of skin. But the features were the same. So much the same that looking at them now, with those defiant expressions on their young faces, it made her want to grin and burst out laughing. She restrained herself. She knew how much they respected and looked up to her and this was an important lesson she was giving them. Their mother had been right. 'Be a friend to them, Nakhu,' she had said quietly to her at the beginning, when she had first come to live here. It had been soon after she had rebuilt her old ties with her old friend and sometime mistress and they had grown close enough to speak heart's truth to one another again. 'Be the friend to them that I cannot be, because I am their mother. And as a friend, teach them the things that they will not heed if I try to teach them. For oftentimes, young boys and girls will heed the same advice when given by an outsider when they would shrug off a parent saying the same things.' And Vedavati, as she was now called, had smiled wistfully and shaken her head before going on with more than a trace of sadness: 'Because my boys are growing up already. And I fear they may be growing too fast.'

Nakhudi had taken her former mistress's and lifelong friend's words to heart. She had wanted to give the twins this talk ever since they had burst into her hut last monsoon, flushed and bursting with pride from the thrill of having successfully waylaid the first grama and having taken an entire wagonload of grain from the tax collectors. But she had remembered their Maatr's words, gritted her teeth, and bided her time until now. She had even laughed with them and celebrated their 'success' at the time, although when they returned in the autumn to crow about waylaying the second grama, her smile had been forced and her joy a pretense. This time, she could not take anymore. It was time to stop being a friend and be something more. Perhaps even past time. A grama guarded by six or seven quads of Ayodhyan PFs? Parvati protect us all! Even allowing for some youthful exaggeration, they had still put their little heads into a tiger's jaws this time. It was one thing to hold up a tax grama or a trading grama and take away some grain or other provisions. This new shenanigan was in a different league altogether. She shuddered to think what would have happened had their little adventure gone awry. After all, for all their skill with the dhanush-baan, they were still just boys. Not yet adolescents. And if they continued on this path, not likely to achieve that stage of maturation. Yes, Vedavati, she said silently now, your boys are indeed growing up too fast. And I think there is nothing anyone can do to slow or stop it.

"But I can correct you at least," she said aloud. They both frowned simultaneously, and where their frowns met in the center of their foreheads, between their brows, two little diagonal crinkles appeared, like tiny crow's feet. Her heart leaped with emotion. Their father had the exact same crinkles on his forehead when he frowned. That little detail, more than all the similarities of face and body shape and attitude, brought home to her once more just who and what they truly were. And why it was so important that they be bred right. She raised her palm, showing it to Kush, who was closest – and this time he did flinch, for she was close enough to slap him if she wanted, and an open-handed slap from her would hurt far more than just harsh words. But she only placed it on his left shoulder, firmly and quite gently in fact.

In a much gentler tone, she said, "I can correct you and show you when you're wrong. For that is what friends do for one another. And it is time you realized that you have gone too far. By taking on this grama today and injuring all those PFs, you've not just stolen another wagonload of provisions from the tax collector, you've challenged the military might and authority of Ayodhya herself. And that's not something you boast and laugh about, young men." She patted Kush's shoulder affectionately, tempering her tirade with friendship now, before she lost their trust entirely. "That's all I want you both to understand. As a friend who cares about your well-being," she added, looking from one to the other slowly.

"They weren't provisions," Luv said sullenly, looking down at the dungpacked floor of the little hut that had been home to Nakhudi these past two years.

"What was that?" she asked sharply.

"He said, they weren't provisions," Kush replied. "The wagonload we took today. It was something else. Something different."

And he shot her a glance that was at once a defiant challenge as well as a triumphant comeback: See? We're not just young children to be corrected and talked down to. We did something today that children could never do.

Nakhudi swallowed. Something stirred deep inside her belly, some long-sleeping snake of forgotten fear.

"Show me," she said shortly. And prayed to all the avatars of the Goddess she could name.

SIX

The ashrama of Maharishi Valmiki was peaceful and quiet in the yellowing light of dusk. The red ochre robes of the rishis and senior brahmacharyas stood out in clear relief against the rich green darbha grass nourished by the recent rains, while the white dhotis of the younger acolytes caught the fading light and seemed to glow as if illuminated. The sky above the hermitage clearing was purple broken by clusters of gold-tinged clouds that clung to the last light of the descended sun. Brahmins went about their evening chores, their clean faces and hands testifying to their recent completion of sandhyavandana in the nearby Tamasa river.

Most of the rishis and brahmacharyas deftly avoided crossing paths with or coming face to face with Nakhudi. Even though she too was clad in the faded yet still serviceable rust-brown garb of a sadhini, a female hermit on the same spiritual path as they, the ashramites still seemed to prefer to give her a wide berth. She barely noticed, striding across the center of the ashrama directly towards the thatched mud hut on the extreme North Eastern corner, set sufficient distance away from the remaining structures to afford the ashramites a modicum of privacy from the only unattached female resident who inhabited it, yet close enough that the hut was not entirely separated from the ashrama.

The soft questioning voices of the curious acolytes fell away behind Nakhudi as she turned down the short path that led to Vedavati's hut, nestled in a small cluster of sala trees. She did not need to turn to see if Luv and Kush followed her. This was their home. Where else would they go? Besides, it was Vedavati she had to speak to urgently. Kali grant there is still time to set this right, she prayed silently, even as a sinking sensation in the pit of her belly told her that it was already too late. The damage was done, and quite likely the price would have to be paid when the time came. But they're just boys, she thought, just boys doing what they thought was the right thing to do in a wrong time. Surely they would be punished too harshly for not realizing what they might be getting themselves into? Yes, said the voice inside her head, but you knew what they were doing and could have stopped them. It need never have come to this.

She ground her teeth in frustration and stopped at the doorway of the hut. Like all huts in all ashramas, it had no door to speak of, merely a curtain of jute hanging across the open entranceway. She parted the curtain with her hand, swatting it aside, and peered inside. Nobody home. Well, Vedavati must be around somewhere. She would have been expecting the boys home in time for sandhyavandana. Nakhudi remembered belatedly that she had forgotten to stop and ensure that the boys underwent their evening ablutions as required by ashrama rules. She had had bigger things in mind than rituals.

She looked around, uncertain. Where could Vedavati have gone at such a time?

“By the river,” Luv said from behind.

Nakhudi turned away from the entrance, allowing the jute cloth to fall back into place. She looked in the direction the twins were staring and saw Vedavati coming up the path from the river, an earthen pot balanced on her hip. Looking at her erstwhile mistress’s roughcloth robe, matted hair, and subdued aspect, not to mention the lines of age showing on her face, the charcoal-grey streaks in her hair, and the weariness in her eyes, Nakhudi felt a deep pang of sadness. Had she not known all that had transpired those ten long years ago, she might have been persuaded into believing that Sita was still in exile, the same exile in which she had been ten years ago, before the events that led her and then Rama to Lanka and altered their lives forever.

His exile ended, her’s goes on. For how long, my Devi? Is this always woman’s lot? To suffer in silence while men live their lives in boisterous vitality? She carries a mud pot filled with water she drew herself from the river at dusk, back to a thatched hut where she sleeps on a straw pallet and eats falahar the year round, while he sleeps and sits on satin sheets, is attended by thousands, and drinks the wine of the devas, precious soma, from golden goblets if it pleases his fancy? How can life be so unjust? Is this dharma? If so, it is man’s dharma, not woman’s dharma.

Vedavati was aware of their presence yet did not overly react. She approached quietly, greeting her sons with a knowing look, and Nakhudi with a wisp of a smile. “Sister,” she said, before going into her humble domicile. Nakhudi decided to follow her inside, in an effort to keep their dialogue as private as possible for the moment. First she glanced sharply at the boys and pointed to the tiny patch of mud before the threshold. “Sweep that,” she said, and went in.

Vedavati was carefully setting down the brimming pot in a shaded corner. She picked up a piece of the mineralized phitkari stone that every ashramite used, dipped it carefully into the water, stirring slowly for several moments, in widening circles. Nakhudi waited with growing impatience. The phitkari stone sterilized the water and separated any pollutants, dispersing them to the bottom of the vessel. Vedavati finished the sterilization, put the stone carefully beside the pot, and covered the mouth of the pot with a fresh clean papaya leaf. Vedavati emptied, washed and replenished the drinking water pot daily, replacing the leaf everyday as well. Nakhudi couldn’t remember if she had done the same last week or last month! As always she was humbled and moved by how clean and sweet-smelling Vedavati managed to keep this humble domicile. Yet the simplicity of the dwelling shamed her, Nakhudi, who had herself occupied better quarters back when she had been Sita’s bodyguard and captain of her personal queensguard back in Mithila two and a half decades ago. It was humiliating to see her former princess living here, like some common sadhini. No, not a princess anymore, she reminded herself, a queen! A queen-mother, no less. Maatr to the heirs of the greatest Arya nation.

Nakhudi shook her head once more in disgust and outrage: Men! At the same time, she felt pride at how well Sita upheld her own dignity through this utterly simple yet immaculate existence. Truly, she was no less than a living embodiment of Devi herself. Even the name given to her by Maharishi Valmiki was an appropriate one: Vedavati. Nakhudi had heard it said around the ashram, always with a reverential awed tone, that Kush and Luv’s Maatr was better versed in the Vedas than any other woman alive.

Dusk had turned to darkness by the time Vedavati was done with her evening chores. The boys had finished cleaning the outside threshold, aangan and surroundings, and had even lit the house lamp that hung by the door of the hut but they still remained outside. No doubt to avoid chancing their mother's wrath as long as possible. The lamp's yellow glow provided sufficient light to illuminate Nakhudi and her longtime friend and mistress within the hut, though it also reminded her depressingly of the day-bright illumination that had lit up the glittering luxury and gleaming beauty of Maharaja Janak's palace in those days of yore. From light to darkness, they had come a long way from home, Nakhudi thought not without some bitterness. Her former mistress broke into her thoughts.

"What have they been upto this time?" Sita asked matter-of-factly, without preamble.

Nakhudi told her.

Even in the dim light and flickering reflections, she saw Sita blanch. She felt awful at bringing such news. But it was better than Sita not knowing.

"This will have consequences," she finished at last, spreading her calloused palms on her meaty thighs. She waited for Sita's response.

The exiled queen of sighed. "Ayodhya again." She looked up at Nakhudi with a puzzled smile twisting her mouth. "Did it have to be Ayodhya, of all places? Why not some other nation? Why only Ayodhya!"

Nakhudi shrugged, knowing better than to answer that one aloud. Silently, she thought: Because your karma is eternally intertwined with His, that's why, my lady.

SEVEN

Sita stood looking into the back of the wagon for a long time. So long that the boys grew nervous and fidgety and began shuffling from foot to foot, then hopping, then holding hands and doing a kind of jig, wholly involuntary and instinctive, until Nakhudi turned and gave them the full benefit of one of her formidable glares, which stopped them short. They stood with slumped shoulders then, though the overly beatific expressions on their faces suggested more than a touch of mock innocence. What? We? Never! She controlled the urge to cuff them on their backs, knowing it would only make them whoop and cough with pretended pain, while actually laughing. They were boys after all, though when watching them in a pitched fight, it was hard to remember that. She was certain their opponents didn't care, which only made their exploits that much more dangerous. Only a matter of time, she thought in dismay, before they meet their match. Maate protect them both.

Finally, Sita let the burlap flap drop and turned away. She put her fists on her hips and looked at the boys. Their innocent wide-eyed expressions deepened to the point of self-parody.

“Well,” Vedavati said at last. “This time you’ve really gone and done it, you two.”

“We were just—”

“Shut up.”

“—taking back—”

“Be quiet.”

“—rightfully our’s!”

“Hold your tongues!”

“We thought it was—”

“Silence, you scamps!”

“—another vaisya grama with grains—”

“I said—”

“—need food desperately, they’re near-starvation and—”

“Enough!” Vedavati’s voice cracked like a whip, making even Nakhudi wince.

The boys held their tongues this time.

Their mother moved closer, facing them directly, hands crossed firmly across her chest now. Nakhudi saw from the faint flush lightening Sita’s neck and lower face that she was really upset this time. It took a lot to upset Sita. She swallowed, wishing she could slip away and leave mother and sons to sort out the matter on their own. She was dreading the moment when Vedavati would realize that Nakhudi had known about the boys’ antics from the time of the very first waylaying. She glanced around, glad that the boys had been wise enough to hide the stolen wagon in this remote hollow deep in the woods, where there was nobody to see and hear. She had not even been able to bring herself to think about the consequences that awaited them once the survivors of the waylaying reached Ayodhya and reported to their superiors there. Sita brought up that very issue just then.

“Do you know what you have done?” Vedavati asked her sons, the colour rising in her face for the first time in weeks that Nakhudi had seen. “You have transgressed against the authority of Ayodhya! Do you even understand what that means?”

The boys looked up at their Maatr, their big-eyed innocent expressions slowly fading as they saw just how angry she was, and how much effort she was putting into controlling that anger. They also saw what Nakhudi saw, that she had already flashed past her ire at the boys for their youthful waywardness to the larger issue at hand, and that observation deflated any further attempt to appeal to her maternal affections. “Nakhudi explained it to us,” Kush said, looking down with his head tilted awkwardly, as young boys will do when they are discomfited. “We broke the law, she says. But we didn’t know that. We thought we were just taking back what was the people’s. Honest, Maatr!”

“Yes, Maatr!” Luv chipped in, looking as disconcerted as his twin.

Vedavati glared at them both in turn, showing them what she thought about their understanding and misinterpretation of the law. But aloud she said: “They won’t let this rest. That’s for sure.” She frowned, thinking. “You say you waylaid this grama just this morning?”

Both nodded vigorously.

Sita looked up at the rock walls of the hollow, turning around slowly as she thought for a moment. The torch in Nakhudi’s hand threw flickering yellow light up several yards, illuminating the overhanging broken rock walls that leaned together to produce the empty cave-like hollow where the boys had brought the wagon. The hollow was at the rear of the very outcrop near which the boys had stopped and robbed the wagon grama, although one had to know it was there or one would never find it easily, even though it was literally within stone’s throw of the raj-marg itself. The choice of hiding place was as ingenious as everything else the twins ever did, but Nakhudi doubted that would help them much if what Sita feared came to pass.

“That means they ought to reach Ayodhya in three days, maybe even two if they travel fast.” She flashed them angry looks, the torchlight reflecting in her dark eyes and giving her a unmotherlike aspect. “But more likely they would have sent a rider ahead to give Ayodhya the news of the waylaying. In which case, he would reach Ayodhya before nightfall tomorrow.” She mumbled something incoherent that Nakhudi was sure was a curse. “Doesn’t give us much time.”

“Much time for what, Maatr?” Luv asked in some puzzlement. Nakhudi glanced at them both, the torch sending their shadows fleeing as she turned it towards them. Both boys looked more concerned about their mother’s stress than any anger she might display towards them. They still don’t fully understand the implications of what they’ve done.

Sita looked at them and shook her head in disgust as she came to the same conclusion. She sighed and said, “To try to make amends.”

Kush looked at his brother. “How, Maatr?”

Sita gestured at the wagon. “Only one way that I can think of now. Unless you have a better idea?” This last she tossed at Nakhudi, who shrugged, then shook her head. Sita nodded, and raised her hands in the universal gesture of despair. “Then, there’s only one thing we can do to try and make amends. We have to give this back. At once. That means taking this wagon back to Ayodhya and delivering it to them with a full apology for your actions.”

Kush and Luv stared at their mother as if she had suddenly sprouted a second head and spoken in voices. “What?” they said at exactly the same time, in the exact same tone of shocked outrage.

Sita looked at them both with her hands on her hips. “Well, smarty boys, what would you have us do then?”

Luv shrugged. Kush imitated him. “Why not just keep it?”

Sita raised her eyebrows at them, then turned to Nakhudi. “Of course! Why didn’t I think of that, right, Nakhudi? Why not just...keep it!” She laughed a semi-hysterical laugh that echoed oddly in the enclosed rock hollow. Nakhudi glanced around nervously. She didn’t like being in a place like this, with only one ingress, in the jungle at night. Even the military gramas avoided passing through this neck of the woods at night. Panthers, boars, lions, wolf packs, snakes, you could take your pick of predators on the prowl. The Valmiki ashramites knew better than to venture even to the edges of the light-pools thrown by the ashram lanterns at night – and despite their extreme caution there were always incidents. She hoped Sita would keep her voice down to avoid attracting undue animal attention.

Sita shook her head in despair, walking several steps to and fro before turning to say to the boys: “Do you know what you stole today? Do you even understand?” She went up to the back of the wagon, hopped up on the rear steps, and twitched the flap open with a single flick of her wrist, sending the flap over the top of the wagon where it fell with a heavy rustling sound. Nakhudi hefted the mashaal, raising it up to throw some light into the back of the wagon. Standing that way, her feet slightly apart, one arm raised with the torch in hand, reminded her vaguely of a statue she had seen somewhere in her many travels that was sculpted in an identical pose. For the life of her, she couldn’t remember where or when. Then again, perhaps she was only wistfully wishing someone would sculpt her in this pose. Yes, sure, she thought sarcastically, the great lady with the upraised torch, casting light upon the ill-gotten gains of theft and brigandry!

“This,” Sita said, gesturing at the wagon filled with massive chests thrown open earlier by Sita herself when examining the contents, “is a war wagon.” The treasure within the chests – for it was nothing less than a treasure – glittered, gleamed and shone as the gold ingots, silver bars, coins, gems, and other precious items caught and refracted the light from Nakhudi’s torch. “Tribute collected to finance Ayodhya’s next war.”

Nakhudi nodded in agreement: she knew enough about the inner workings of a kingdom to recognize a war chest when she saw one. This was no mere tithe, lagaan or other kind of tax; only a royal tribute could be this rich. And protected as it was by such a heavily armed contingent of PFs, Ayodhya’s elite regiment of royal guards, a war wagon was the only likelihood that presented itself. Literally a wagonload of wealth to be used to pay for a major military offensive. Which begged the question: What war was Ayodhya planning to wage? Against whom? When? Nakhudi had no answers to such questions. Hell. She didn’t even want to know the answers. She wished fervently now as she had that morning when the boys first brought her here to show her their rich pickings, that she had never laid eyes on that goddamned wagon.

Sita turned back to glare at her sons, black pupils flashing darkly in the torchlight. “The penalty for stealing a war wagon belonging to Ayodhya is not mere imprisonment or a penalty. It is death to one’s entire family, on grounds of treason.”

Nakhudi watched the boys faces lose every last vestige of youthful brashness as the full implications of Sita’s word sank in. She felt sorry for them in that moment. This time, they had truly bitten off more than they – or anyone else – could chew. They had just sentenced themselves and their Maatr to certain death. Now, no matter what any of them did next, their crime was beyond forgiving. Except...and Nakhudi drew in a deep breath, the arm holding the upraised mashaal shaking slightly...except by a king’s pardon. And that, she thought, looking at the sons of Sita as they absorbed the crushing blow of the implications of their boyish transgression, was as unlikely as the moon lighting up the world with light as bright as sunshine.

EIGHT

For perhaps the first time in his long and wearying life, Bejoo felt no pleasure at seeing the familiar towers and skyline of Ayodhya appear on the horizon. As the grama topped the hilly rise that led up from Mithila Bridge before trundling down the raj-marg into the Sarayu Valley, he felt none of the relief and satisfaction that his fellow PFs felt in that moment. Their gruff voices, several shot through with more than a little anger at their painful wounds and abject humiliation, rang out in the still dawn air around him, lending the grama's last leg of travel a festive atmosphere. He did not share in it. All he felt right now was trepidation and gloom.

His mood had not altered by the time the grama rolled sonorously through the first gate and wound its way up Raghuvamsha Avenue to its destination, the royal quadrant. The high stone walls of the eighth gate only worsened his mood. Once, this had been a bustling intersection where citizens, merchants, and anyone and everyone had freely roved. A public space like all the rest of Ayodhya had been. It was hard to believe that was only a decade ago. Now, the forebodingly high stone wall that marked the end of the public sections of Ayodhya and the start of the highly restricted royal quadrant, was a symbol of the new Ayodhya, a city divided into two parts: One, the public prosperous trading and residential public city where almost a lakh of citizens of all castes, creeds and persuasions still lived in cosmopolitan harmony as they profitted, worked with and traded with one another. Two, the royal quadrant, where only a hundred or so royally favoured clans resided in luxuriant elegance, their lives, estates and activities separated from the hustle and bustle of the outer city – the Lower City as it had come to be called derisively of late – while they remained in the sheltered shadow of the Fortress.

For that was what the palatial complex had become now. A veritable fortress.

Bejoo looked up despondently as the grama entered through the trade gate of the royal quadrant – the front gate was only for royalty or the court-favoured clans – and felt even more depressed at the sight of the massively reinforced structures that had been erected a decade ago and added to considerably in the intervening years, altering the once-beautiful open architecture of the royal palace complex into an ugly forbidding military enclosure. He sighed. As a soldier, he ought to have appreciated the superior protection these architectural changes provided to the royal Suryavansha Ikshwaku dynasty which he was sworn to protect with his life. But as an Ayodhyan and Arya citizen, he felt more pity and sadness at what had been lost in order to gain this superior level of protection. Was it worth it in the end? He had never thought so, and today, feeling as despondent and morose as he did, he felt that the loss of the former beauty and sense of freedom and interconnectedness that the old layout had provided was too high a price to have paid for better defense. Much too high a price.

He put thoughts of architecture and security out of his head as he pulled up the team before the cantonment stables. Men rushed forward to take the weary horses and tend to them, moving with military efficiency. It was the work of moments for the vital contents of the wagons to be unloaded and carried to a suitably safe location indoors where they would be barred and sealed and guarded closely. And inventoried.

He sighed, stretching his travel-weary limbs and started towards the lockhouse with reluctant steps.

Pradhan Mantri Jabali was already waiting by the entrance of the lockhouse, alongwith his munshis. Bejoo didn't like the minister. He hadn't liked him when he had been just a minister, he had liked him even less when he became War Minister and his notorious War Council was imbedded as a permanent fixture instead of the ad hoc committed it used to be; now, he actively disliked him as Pradhan Mantri. The chief of the ministers of the sabha, the assembly that administered the kingdom and its capital city under the guidance and oversight of the king, ought not to be a bigotted bad-tempered self-righteous and overly pious war-mongering old man. Especially when he followed in the footsteps of Sumantra, perhaps the finest prime minister the Kosala nation had ever had. Bejoo had never been high enough in the military chain of command to have been privy to the inner workings of Dasaratha's government, but he hadn't needed to be. The results were there for all to see, from the highest senapati to the lowest sipahi. Those in Dasaratha's army had been proud of the fact that the Last Asura Wars had been 22 years ago and that peace had reigned supreme since then; a peace they took pride in being responsible for instituting and maintaining. Those in Rama's army – or, more accurately these days, Mantri Jabali's army – took pride in the fact of Ayodhya's military supremacy and how effectively intimidated even their closest allies were by that supremacy. Governance by cooperation versus governance by sword, Bejoo thought with more than a little bitterness. Like all old kshatriyas, he believed that the true purpose of the warrior class was not to wage war and inflict violence, but to help preserve a state where neither was necessary. He did not speak such thoughts aloud. These days, under this regime, such thinking was considered—

“Treason!” Jabali said sharply, pointing his forefinger – accusingly, it seemed to Bejoo – with the tip of the finger crooked, a result of the aging minister's advanced arthritis. Bejoo archly noted the curious resemblance between the angle of the crooked finger and the mantri's hooked nose. “Open treason that must be punished at once!”

Bejoo sighed inwardly. He had expected this very reception. Although he had hoped for a few moments of respite before the haranguing began in earnest. And perhaps, Shaneshwara willing, a brief audience with Rama himself, so that I may try to put things in perspective before this old vulture twists it all out of recognition and embarks on another of his notorious demon-hunts. He tried to put aside his weariness and despondency and face the pradhan mantri squarely. “Pradhan Mantri, allow me to explain what happened,” he began. “The grama—”

“—was waylaid by a band of brigands!” the Prime Minister said loudly. “Yes, yes, I already have the facts. Now it is time to take action. Such an open act of treason must be punished most severely and swiftly, before word of it spreads to our disgruntled allies and encourages further rebellion. We must crush the offenders with an iron fist!”

Whose fist? Bejoo wondered bitterly. Not your own, I'm sure. Indeed, the minister's right fist lay curled like a misshapen claw by his side, the result of what appeared to be a particularly bad arthritic day in this bracing autumn weather. “Pradhan Mantri, if you will let me narrate the exact events—”

Jabali jerked his bent finger dismissively. “Don’t waste your breath, boy. My people have told me everything already. I got word last night itself and have already taken appropriate action.”

Bejoo’s heart sank. Boy? At 68 years, still a boy? “Pradhan Mantri, if I may suggest a diplomatic course of action that will hopefully avoid needless bloodshed—”

“Needless?” The old minister laughed scornfully, his white brows twitching in his long face. “Bloodshed is not merely needed, it is imperative! A kingdom is ruled by force, not by words. Diplomacy is irrelevant. Ayodhya does not negotiate with rebels. I already know which band of brigands was responsible for this latest act of treason.”

“You do?” Bejoo blinked rapidly. “But it was no band, Pradhan Mantri. Merely two young boys upto some childish prank—”

Again the open-mouthed laughter burst in his face, the white brows twitching. He could smell the Pradhan Mantri’s breath. Surprisingly, the man retained most of his teeth in pristine white condition even at his age. Even though he must surely have been a good decade and a half past Bejoo’s own age. Then again, Jabali was notoriously given to extolling the virtues of fasting and self-deprivation and their beneficial effect on one’s aatma and state of mind. When a man rarely ate, no wonder his teeth stayed as good as new!

“Come now, Grama-rakshak Bejoo. I hardly expected you to be taken in by that subterfuge. I have received a full report. The boys were merely placed in the path to confuse you and your men. The real bowmen were concealed in the rocks and the surrounding jungle. After all, you don’t really think that two little striplings could outshoot and outfight an entire entourage of the finest Purana Wafadars in his Lord Rama’s force, do you?”

Bejoo wanted to start by protesting that since the very term Purana Wafadar meant ‘Old Veteran’ it ought to have implied that the force was made of exactly that, old veterans of previous wars. Such as himself. The young untried army regulars who had been enrolled into the elite force these past few years did not deserve to be called Wafadars, being as they were untested and untried in actual war conditions, and they most certainly were not Purana, none being over 30 years of age! While they looked and trained well enough to dissuade most potential attackers, in a pinch they were hardly the elite fighting force they were supposed to be. The truth of the matter was that the ‘two little striplings’ had outshot and outfought the entire entourage. Despite the warning given by the boy who had so cleverly severed the horse riggings as Bejoo had attempted to break away, he had still followed the boy at a safe distance and arrived at the main length of the grama in time to watch the two young bowmen rout his men thoroughly in one of the most impressive displays of bowcraft he had ever witnessed. Not just ‘one of’, it was the most impressive display apart from just one other previous display I once had the privilege of witnessing, when a certain other pair of bowmen engaged in a far deadlier battle a long time ago in a jungle called Bhayanak-van, against a yaksi giant named Tataka.

He kept all this to himself as he said aloud: “Actually, Pradhan Mantri, I think—”

But Jabali was already waving his crooked hand at him dismissively. “What you think is irrelevant. The culprits who did this must be roundly punished for this treasonous action. We must make sure that this entire colony of outlaws is dealt with once and for all.”

Colony? Sure he doesn’t mean...

Jabali’s left cheek curled to reveal a brilliant white eye-tooth. “The so-called Maharishi Valmiki’s colony of brigands and rogues masquerading as sadhus. They are behind the theft of the Maharaja’s war wagon and this time they have gone too far. They must be entirely wiped out, down to the last man, woman and child, and I shall see to it that it is done.”

NINE

“Bhraatr,” Shatrugan said gently but urgently without preamble. “I desire an immediate audience with Ayodhya-naresh.”

Lakshman looked at his twin impassively. The years had altered their individual appearances so considerably, any onlooker viewing them together for the first time could be forgiven for not recognizing them to be identical twins, or even brothers. Shatrugan’s years of hard travel to the farthest reaches of the kingdom and beyond, the hard outdoor living and fighting and endless waging of war had not been tempered overmuch by his assuming the throne of Mathura these past several years. If anything the years of kingship had toughened him further, tempering the unassailable steel of his character and will with greater wisdom, insight, and moderation. No longer did he fly instantly into rages or lose his patience at the slightest provocation when thwarted. He had assumed a certain gravitas and dignity that he wore as well as the robes of kingship. The sculpting away of his overly muscled physique by the years of hard travel and warring had stripped him down to a leathery wiry muscularity that lent him an almost pantherlike aspect when he walked on the balls of his feet.

Lakshman glanced over his brother’s shoulder. Shatrugan’s entourage remained several yards behind their king, alert but affable. Whatever Shatrugan’s crisis was, it appeared personal rather than nationalistic in nature.

In contrast to his twin, Lakshman had changed too but in wholly other ways. He had been lean and pantherlike when he had returned with Rama and Sita to Ayodhya in Pushpak ten years ago, skin burned nut-dark from years of open living and hard fighting. But the last decade had seen him spend almost all his days within the newly raised walls of the palace complex, virtually Rama’s personal guard and guide at all times. He had dealt with every daily crisis that cropped up – and at times, they did come thick and fast – from city riots to internal intrigues, with conspiracies and assassination plots, and the constant living under the air of stress and political intrigue had softened him outwardly to some extent, filling out his leanness, thickening his torso and face somewhat. Working out in the palace akhada had only expanded his muscles and bulk further, while he lacked the trimming and leaning effects of long travel or warring. At the same time, the stress had aged him quickly, the hair at his temples turning grey. Even his brows and the moustache he had taken to keeping showed grey amidst the black now, Shatrguan saw at this close range. It was almost as if Lakshman had become an older, wearier looking version of Shatrugan himself ten years ago. While Shatrugan had become an older more dignified version of Lakshman from ten years ago! How ironic, how appropriate that they had both aged to resemble older versions of one another.

Lakshman regarded him with a measured glance. “Well met Mathuranaresh. What business do you seek to discuss with Samrat Rama Chandra?”

Samrat? The last time Shatrugan had met his older brother, Rama had still been just a Maharaja, a king of kings. Now he had dubbed himself Emperor? Then at least some of the rumours were true after all. He ignored the title and focussed on the man, continuing to use the Sanskrit highspeech term for Brother which both lent intimacy as well as carried respect: “Bhraatr, my business is for Rama’s ears alone. I assure you it is most urgent. I request you kindly to announce me and permit me the pleasure of an audience with him at once.”

Lakshman folded his arms, his overdeveloped chest muscles bulging as he did so. Shatrugan recalled having exactly the same upper body bulk and felt relieved he didn’t anymore. As one got older, it got harder to maintain muscle tone and an old wrestler soon began to sag like an old woman if he didn’t watch himself. He thought it wise not to mention that to his twin. These days, Lakshman was rarely in the mood to listen to brotherly advice on anything, be it physical maintenance or anything else. “In that case, you would have to wait. Someone is in the sabha hall with the Samrat. He cannot be disturbed until the conference is over.”

Shatrugan glanced at the barred doors behind Lakshman, guarded by six heavily armoured and armed sentries, all bigger built and tougher looking than Lakshman himself. He sighed and nodded, even as he said with a wistful smile: “Used to be a time when the doors of the sabha hall were always left open, for anyone to walk into and out of, and almost all sessions were open to all, even the lowest sweeper on the streets. Now, I hear the doors are always barred when the sabha sits in session and the public audiences are only permitted to attend the four seasonal sessions.”

Lakshman shrugged. “Times have changed. Ayodhya had to change with the times.”

Shatrugan shook his head. “Not all change is for the best.”

He began to say something further, then thought better of it. Clearly, Lakshman was not interested in padapad talk, and he had no desire to get into another slanging debate as they had the last time. Brothers though they were – bhraatrey, to use the Sanskrit highspeech – they seemed to be on opposite sides of the political fence more and more these days.

He walked back to his entourage, intending to stay in their company while he waited. He knew better than to try to pass the time bantering with his brother. That was one of the many changes he questioned and resented. Lakshman was no longer Lakshman. Nor was Rama. He leaned on the portal that overlooked the royal Udyaan and was sad to see that it too had been walled-in like everything else in this part of the city. He stood there, musing on how much Ayodhya had changed since he had left, indeed, since their father’s passing. In so many ways.

He glimpsed movement on the path below and saw a familiar pair of aging feminine forms walking slowly together, heads bowed in conversation. He smiled to himself. There were two people who would not be as grim-faced and stern of tone as his twin brother. He paused to instruct his entourage to send for him at once the instant the sabha doors reopened, and then went down to the garden.

Sumitra was the first to see him. She smiled and slowed, placing a hand gently on Kauslaya’s arm to stop her as well. They both looked back up the path as Shatrugan came at a steady trot, his broad swarthy face open in a wide grin. He dropped before them, touching each of their feet with heartfelt sincerity.

“Maa, aashirwaad. Maa, aashirwaad,” he repeated, for though Sumitra was his womb-mother, in Arya families, Kausalya was no less his mother. In their turn, both greeted him with identical warmth and for an onlooker it would have been impossible to tell which was his biological mother. If anything, slight, small-built, delicately boned Sumitra seemed unlikely; while Kausalya, darker-complected but bigger-proportioned though no less feminine in form, seemed more likely. Both laid hands on his shoulders, Sumitra having to look up by an angle of more than two feet to her perpendicular. Looking at them both in that moment, Shatrugan thought to himself that the pride and pleasure on their faces could not be replicated in any official portrait, not even by the most accomplished artists in Aryavarta.

“Maatrey,” he said, and put his meaty arms around both women, enfolding them in a bear hug that drew gasps of surprised delight. Sumitra glanced at her companion over Shatrugan’s bowed head and Kausalya’s eyes twinkled back in response. Shatrugan saw this without actually needing to look at their faces, and his heart filled with the tenderness of a boy who still longed for the days when mothers had been the protectors of the universe and the world had extended only to their guru’s kul and ashrama and back, and the four of them had been as one being with four heads and a single mind. He bit back a tear as he released his mothers and clapped them on their shoulders hard enough to make them gasp with amusement.

“It is so good to see you,” he said. “I missed you. I missed it all.” He gestured with a bend of his head, indicating the palace and the city but what he really missed was the way things had been before it all changed, long long ago in a city far far away and yet right here, right now.

The two Queens exchanged another glance and he saw that they knew all, understood everything. A great sadness fell upon him then, a profound sense of regret for all that had been, all that could have been, and that which would now almost certainly never come to be.

TEN

They found a shady spot to sit in beside the lotus pool. Kraunchyas stalked the far end of the pool, standing on one leg. Swans swam proudly in the still clear water, and below the calm surface Shatrugan glimpsed golden fish drawing lazy circles, their tails flashing as they caught the beam of sunlight falling on the water. A symphony of birdsong rose incessantly from all around the arbor and the scent of freshly blossoming marigolds came to him on a gentle wisp of wind. He sat between his mothers and wondered what would happen if he remained here all day, just sitting quietly between them, perhaps laying his head on one of their laps, sleeping away the quiet afternoon. The travails of the world seemed distant and remote here. The ascendancy politics of Mathura. The constant bickering and squabbling over river rights. The tribal feuds. The grama clashes. The daily sabha sessions where the complaints and issues raised always seemed too many for any single day, and had to be carried over to the next day, and the next, until people began complaining that they had been here for so many days, and others countered they had waited weeks, and some argued they had camped outside the city for months, and even after the bickering and hearing of both sides, and the endless arguments and counter-arguments, when he finally pronounced the final arbitration, invariably one side stalked off in a barely suppressed rage while even the winning side seemed oddly disgruntled and ingracious. The troubles of his wife with the other wives he had been required to take in order to entrench himself more staunchly into Yadava politics. The dandas that he had meted out in sabha and therefore was required by dharama to witness being executed: nothing like a few whippings, dismemberments and executions to make one's day.

How good it would be to simply doze here in this idyllic arbor, where all those problems and burdens of kingship might as well not exist. To regress to the boy he had once been, the son, the brother, the child.

A kraunchya bird immersed its head with sudden force. Its dripping beak emerged with a thrashing fish scissored neatly. The other kraunchyas raised their wings, put their tucked feet down and raised their own beaks, calling out raucously. The bird with the fish pointed its long beak at the sky, opened the long tongs, jerked its head up once sharply, tossing the fish up, then caught it in mid air and swallowed it neatly. The fish thrashed once in a last act of desperate futility, its silver scales glittering gaudily in the sunlight, then was imbedded in the kraunchya's long throat.

He came out of his reverie to find his birth mother looking at him with that sad sure expression that he knew so well.

“Is it the raiders?” she asked quietly.

She was referring to the cattle and horse thieves that had been plaguing the border gramas the past season. Sharugan had learned at the very outset that the thieves were renegades and outlaws from the Andhaka tribes who resented the sharing of river rights with the Suras; they took the stolen heads upcountry and sold them to unscrupulous traders who then cleverly sold them in other neighbouring kingdoms, many turning up in Ayodhyan markets, their brands marking their origin quite clearly. Despite his efforts, he had been unable to procure the cooperation of the Ayodhyan authorities in ending the trade and resale of these stolen beasts. All Ayodhya had to do was issue a proclamation prohibiting any trade or sale of beasts marked with Sura brands. With their most lucrative market gone, the thieves would soon find the effort of evading Shatrugan's diligent marshals and the risk of transporting the animals to other more remote points of sale uneconomical, guaranteeing a natural end to the thievery. But despite three visits, Shatrugan had been unable to get the sabha here to reach a decision. True, the tangled web of Arya politics complicated the matter, especially since Ayodhya could not be seen favouring Mathura merely because it was ruled by a son of Ayodhya and a brother of Rama: that might cause further resentment among the Andhakas who had been spoiling for a war ever since Shatrugan had brokered the recent hard-won truce between the two major Yadava tribes over the long-standing issue of river rights. War always had more supporters and vested interests than peace. There was no profit in peace. The very essence of trade was exploitation, whether fair or excessive, and war ensured the highest exploitative profits possible. It took every ounce of his strength and will to maintain the truce, making kingship a task so onerous that he rarely had time to himself.

He shook his head. “It's everything,” he said. “This.” Again the all-encompassing gesture. Except that this time he meant Ayodhya in its current state. Not the idyllic Ayodhya of his childhood but the fortress-city-state of today, perpetually in a state of war-preparedness, every decision governed by military interests and strategy. And military interests were not always human interests; in fact, they rarely were.

Sumitra sighed and looked down at her open hands resting upon her lap. Her silks rustled, her jewellery tinkled lightly, counterpointing the chirruping of a pair of songbirds on the tree immediately above the marbled nook on which the three of them were esconced. Like her sister queen Kausalya, she had always chosen to adorn herself as simply and elegantly as possible, ignoring the customary Arya excesses designed to draw envy and admiration from the masses. He admired that in her and in Kausalya-maa. They were women with their own minds, the kind of women who had built Aryavarta into the great civilization it was today. Women such as they had founded the Bharata nation and nursed it through a thousand generations, until it had spread and flourished throughout the known world. The days of the matriarchs had long passed and for one reason or another, men were now as likely to rule and dominate the grama as women – perhaps more likely – but in women such as Kausalya and Sumitra, that ancient strength of character and will could still be seen. Women such as they were the pillars upon which all Arya civilization stood today. And to see Kausalya-maa, First Queen and Queen Mother, and his own maatr, so close in friendship and companionship with his womb-mother Sumitra, was heart-warming to him. Sumitra truly lived upto her name which literally meant ‘good friend’ in highspeech. Aryavarta in general and Ayodhya in particular had far greater need of women such as these two than of warrior-queens like Kaikeyi, he thought not without a trace of bitterness. Even though as a kshatriya, it was his dharma to accept the need for violent action and the consequences of that action, as he grew older there were times he questioned whether violence was the only means a kshatriya should use to achieve his goals and fulfill his dharma. In his experience, violent action often worsened the situation rather than resolved it. And even when it did resolve certain situations, the solution was ephemeral, while the deep wounds and emotional scars of that violence lingered for much, much longer.

“Yes,” she said simply. “Ayodhya is not what it once was. Nor is Rama.” As she spoke the latter statement, she sought out Kausalya. “Excuse me, Kausalya.”

The First Queen nodded, her proud aquiline profile hardened by time, the once glossy long hair peppered with streaks of silver, the grooves bracketing her mouth deepened by decades of sharing that beautiful smile.

“You are as much his mother as I, Sumitra,” she said, her voice throatier than Shatrugan remembered it. He recalled her mentioning a persistent cough. Possibly that had hoarsened her speech. “And what you speak is true. Whether Rama has changed Ayodhya or Ayodhya has changed Rama, even I cannot say. What is indisputable is that they have both changed and,” she sighed softly, lowering her eyes, “all change is not for the better.”

Shatrugan hesitated before speaking. He was unaccustomed to this kind of candid conversation with Kausalya maa. For one thing, the past years had altered his own perception of himself considerably. From a younger prince – the youngest, if only by mere moments – he was now a king in his own right. That demanded an alteration of both self-perception and outward bearing. Yet he felt that if there were two persons he could trust to weigh his words fairly and advise him wisely, he could find no better than his two maatrey.

“Is the rumour true then?” he asked them, careful to keep his voice low, too low for even the kraunchyas fighting over fish in the pool to hear, not because he thought they might be spied upon – no spasas could find ingress into this innermost sanctum of the Kosala nation’s capital – but because he felt saddened that he had to pose such a query to his mothers rather than to his bhraatr in order to be certain of an honest and direct response. “Is Ayodhya preparing to go to war with its neighbours?”

Both queens were silent for a moment. A strange lull fell over the garden as if even the fauna paused in their singing and squabbling and daily business of living for a moment in order to hear their answer.

Finally, Sumitra raised her eyes to Kausalya, communicating some wordless request.

Kausalya drew in a deep breath, let it out, and said matter of factly:

“Not just its neighbours. Ayodhya is preparing to go to war with the entire world.”

ELEVEN

Bharat slid off his horse, tossing the reins to one of several stable boys who had come running up eagerly. They fought briefly over the right to groom the steed of Ayodhya's eldest Prince and the winner triumphantly led the tired mount away, snorting and steaming faintly in the cool autumn air. Bharat stood for a moment, enjoying the sensation of being on solid ground and instinctively slapped down his garments to rid himself of some of the dust of the road that had accumulated over the long ride. As he was turning, he spied a trough nearby that looked as if it had just been mucked out and refilled and went over to it. The water felt deliciously cool and refreshing and the faint scent of horse it carried did not bother him in the least. He had drunk from pools that smelt worse than this trough, and he had no patience to go to a private chamber and wait for serving girls to bring him the scented jars of heated Sarayu water to bathe in. Bathing and washing were necessities and not the luxuries some men made them out to be, and Bharat was happy to get them out of the way so he could get on with the real business at hand. And the business at hand today was grave business indeed.

He had just finished washing the grime from behind his neck when he saw a reflection appear in the water of the trough. Distorted and distended as it was by the lapping water and angle, he could tell at once that it was a man who carried himself in the familiar wide-stepping manner of a kshatriya. He kept his head down and eyes averted, pretending to finish up his toilet as he watched the figure approach, ready for any eventuality. After all, this was Ayodhya and he was a natural target. But rather than make any sudden attempts to attack, the man stopped short, put his hands on his hips, and chuckled softly.

“Well, well, bhraatr, are the scented baths of the palace too good for you? Or have you decided to give up princehood and take up sarathi work now?”

Bharat smiled grimly as he turned to face the oncomer. “It's kingship, in case you hadn't heard, bhraatr mine. Ever since I managed to put down that pesky rebellion among the Gandharas, I've had my own kingdom. You may even have heard tell of it. The capital city is named Takshashila.”

Shatrugan pretended to make a face of mock disbelief. “What? That little arid patch in the Ghandara ranges? I thought it was named for your son, little Taksha!”

Bharat chuckled at Shatrugan’s disparagement. “It is, actually. Just as Puskalavati is named for my daughter little Pushkala. They’re just two cities in my kingdom, which comprises the entire Gandhara nation now that I’ve subdued the rebels.”

Shatrugan twisted his brows into a mock expression of amazement. “Impressive. Those Gandharas can be really tough to chase down and kill, especially with all those hilly ranges and caves to hide in. Why, they’re even said to be related to the Nagas, the snake-like Asuras, because of how quickly they vanish into the ground and take refuge in the tiniest crevices.”

Bharat nodded, clapping a hand on Shatrugan’s shoulder, and squeezing his brother’s deltoid muscle hard enough to draw an involuntary twitch of the lips. “That’s why I didn’t make the mistake of wasting years and men trying to hunt them down as greater generals before me have done in the past. I simply built the most beautiful city ever known to the region, filled it with the finest artists, musicians, dancers, performers, and personally made sure it flourished and grew more prosperous than any Gandhara nation ever before.”

Shatrugan put his own hand on Bharat’s shoulder, squeezing his deltoid muscle and drawing a similar involuntary grimace from his elder brother. “And as everyone knows, though the Gandharas are the fiercest hill-range warriors in the world, they are also great lovers of fine music, art, dancing, and cannot resist the lure of such things. So sooner or later they could not help but come to Takshashila to see if a firangee had indeed outdone them at their own artistic pursuits. And when they saw how magnificently you had built the city and how prosperous and artistically accomplished its denizens were, why, they all but threw down their weapons at your feet and asked to be allowed to serve you till the end of time!”

Bharat threw his head back and laughed, giving Shatrugan a brief but clear view of his pink uvula, quivering with his mirth. “Not quite so simply, bhraatr! Not quite so simply. There was much fighting, and several dozen battles to boot, some quite nasty and ugly.” He shook his head, sighing. “Those hilly bastards can be tougher and sneakier than snakes, as you rightly said. And with their long beards and deftness with blades, and vajra-like fleetness with unsaddled horse cavalry, they harried my troops to an inch of extinction. But your information is right in one respect. It was through my patronage of their own arts and culture that I eventually won them over. The fact that your own nephew and neice – and your sister in law and cousin Mandavi – undertook to learn their arts from the finest gurus of the Gandhara school of music and dance and grew to become expert practitioners of the same, impressed them no small whit. Yes, I must admit that in the end, they turned out to be as passionate as friends and allies as they can be enemies and rivals.”

Both brothers looked at one another with enduring fondness. It had been a long time since they had met casually thus with no pressing political or military issue to deal with, and it was with brotherly curiosity and interest that each examined the other from head to toe, noting all changes that age and hard living and warring had wrought in the intervening time. And once the initial gruff banter and masculine

Shatrugan cleared his throat at last. “So thanks to your self-aggrandizing exaggerations and fanciful account, I deduce that my bhraatrjaya Mandavi – who also happens to be my cousin on account of her being my wife’s sister – my niece Pushkala and nephew Taksha are all doing well. And how are you, bhraatr dear? Apart from having put on a little weight and let yourself go to seed, I mean?”

Bharat ignored the patently absurd remarks at the end: while it was true he had filled out a little over the years, coming to resemble their late father Dasaratha in startling manner, he was by no means over-weight, nor could his muscled bulk be said to justify the description ‘gone to seed’. He replied amicably and with evident emotion: “First tell me, how is my bhraatrjaaya and cousin Shruta Kirti and your sons Subahu and Shrutasena?”

Shatrugan inclined his head in a half-nod. “They are well. Mathura has been good to all of us. It is home now, I suppose. Although she never lets a moon-phase pass or a festival go by without berating me for keeping her apart from her precious sisters! As if we men deliberately create wars and political upheaval just to be able to avoid family gatherings!”

Bharat laughed. “Well, I don’t know about you, bhraatr. But I’m not past drumming up a skirmish or two, or even a brief war, just to avoid having to sit through a week of festivities and rituals. The moment those blessed brahmins begin to chant their mantras—”

“—I feel like running miles away, and continuing to run until I reach the ends of the Earth!” Shatrugan finished. It was an oft-repeated refrain among kshatriyas in general and they had repeated it often during their childhood years. It was a good-natured way of grumbling about the intense patience and serious aspect required by temperamentally restless action-oriented kshatriyas during the seemingly endless yagnas and brahmanical rituals.

They laughed together. And with that laugh, the years apart were gone, snapped off by the wind, as if they had never been apart a day, or an hour, let alone three whole years.

Later, over drink and refreshment, Shatrugan told Bharat of the long talk he had had with their mothers in the royal garden. Even though they were never sodara, children of the same womb, it was Bharat and Shatrugan who had formed the closest bond during the early years, just as Rama and Shatrugan’s twin Lakshman had formed an equally firm bond in the same period. Just as Rama’s and Lakshman’s bond had deepened during the fourteen long years of exile, and the past ten years since their return to Ayodhya, so also Bharat and Shatrugan’s fourteen years together in Ayodhya, battling the political and emotional consequences of Rama’s exile and Bharat’s mother Kaikeyi’s perceived betrayal, had brought them closer together than ever before. The fact that the past ten years had seen them spend more time apart than together, as well as the burdens of kingship and family responsibilities, made no difference. Their kinship was stronger than time could bend or other relationships alter. They were brothers in soul.

TWELVE

“A war against the entire world,” Bharat repeated softly, careful to keep his tone low and expressions guarded.

They were seated in a temple in the sudra quarter of the city that they had been fond of frequenting ever since they were both young yuvajaras—princes in waiting—back in the day when hunting and training had seemed to occupy the bulk of their days. The temple was kept by a sudra artisan turned pundit who distilled his own soma and offered it to a select few on the condition that it be consumed only within the temple precinct and that no drinker should arrive or depart so intoxicated that he or she should lose control of basic faculties. To this end, each new arrival and person departing was required to hit a target set up by the temple entrance at least once out of three tries with a training arrow. Those who failed had to leave without consuming any of the famous concoction, and those who were unable to hit the target at least once on departure were never permitted entrance again. It was a strange method of ensuring temperance, but an effective one. After a few incidents when Bharat and Shatrugan had gotten too drunk and too much in trouble in their adolescent years, pradhan mantri Sumantra had guided them to this establishment. Bharat always suspected that it had been his father who had instructed Sumantra to do so, but he had never been able to find out for certain. Now, of course, both Dasaratha and Sumantra were gone and he would never know whose idea it had been. Either way, the method had succeeded. Both Bharat and Shatrugan had learned to control their drinking and long after they had stopped coming to the temple, they had maintained safe drinking habits. It was more than most Arya kings—or kshatriyas—could claim.

“What does that mean?” Bharat wondered aloud. “Does he mean to invade our neighbours unprovoked? To resurrect the old asura bogey to justify expansion? What, exactly?”

Shatrugan shrugged. “Maatr Kausalya and Sumitra didn’t know for sure. But they are quite sure that Rama and his war council have been massing a war treasury for some time now, and using it to hire and train a prodigious number of new akshohinis, not just in Ayodhyan military precincts but across the entire kingdom.”

Bharat nodded sombrely. “Aye, that’s true enough. I’ve contributed my share of war wagons.”

“As have I,” Shatrugan admitted.

“But what does Rama intend to do with this much mobilization? Who does he intend to invade? The last of the asuras are gone. The rakshasas that remain are all converts to Sanatan Dharma, thanks to King Vibhisena of Lanka. They’re as devout bhakts of the devas and practitioners of our vedic rituals as the Mithilans, I’ve heard said.”

“You heard truth.” Shatrugan took a sip from his earthen mug. Chandra’s soma was pure nectar as always. The very taste brought back boyish memories that took an effort to push away. “It’s troubled me as well as my allies. Even Maharaja Janak and Maharaja Kusadhwaja met me to speak on this very matter, alongwith several dozen other troubled grama-lords.”

Bharat nodded, quaffing his soma like water. “Mandavi told me so. She had word from Shruta Kirti. It was that very missive that prompted me to call a meeting of my local chiefs and that’s what brought me here today.”

While Rama and Lakshman were married to Sita and Urmila, daughters of Maharaja Janak of Mithila, king of the Videha nation, their brothers Bharat and Shatrugan were married to Mandavi and Shruta Kirti respectively, named sisters of Sita and Urmila, adopted daughters of Janak, but in fact they were the daughters of Janak’s brother Kusadhwaja, king of Sankasya, a pura in the Videha kingdom fed by the river Ikshumati. At the time of their wedding and several years earlier, Kusadhwaja’s ongoing feud with several other clans of the Sankasya pura region made it too dangerous for him to keep his daughters by his side, let alone arrange their marriages. So Janak had adopted his neices and raised them as his own. To most people, the girls were regarded as ‘Janak’s four corners’, the pillars of his household. It was only inevitable that they would all be married together – and pure good fortune that the eldest among them, Sita, happened to find a soul-mate with three eminently suitable brothers. In the years since, Kusadhwaja had not only succeeded in weeding out the hostile elements in his pura, he had united the clans and knitted together a veritable minor kingdom of his own, one that had begun showing signs of prosperity thanks to the rich fertile fields fed by the Ikshumati. Both brothers regarded the marriage of their daughters to the sons of Dasaratha as being responsible for their change of fortunes. Which was why they were so concerned to hear of Ayodhya's inexplicable amassing of a war treasury and build up of forces along the Kosala-Videha border. As the Kosala nation's neighbouring kingdom, Videha stood to lose the most if Ayodhya went to war. Not because they feared Ayodhya would invade them but because they feared being forced to ally with their powerful warmongering neighbours and relatives and get dragged into yet another long and painful campaign. Over time, the Chandravanshis had grown far more fond of spiritual triumphs than martial victories, and if they were called upon to support the Suryavanshis in a new war campaign, it would be with the utmost reluctance.

As sons of Ayodhya as well as sons in law of Mithila and Sankasya, Bharat and Shatrugan had the doubly complex task of finding out where their family's political ambitions while remaining considerate of their fathers in law and their desire for continued peace. Add to that their own recently built kingdoms with their own individual mixtures of political complexities and complications, and it was shaping up to be quite a tangled web.

Bharat voiced his anxiety again. "By Indra's yoni-covered face, what does Rama intend to do with a force that size? Invade swargaloka and narakaloka as well as the mortal realm?"

"That's what I've been trying to find out. But none of my entourage seem to be able to get anyone to talk. There's a danda on any Ayodhyan caught or overheard speaking about military matters to any outsider. The danda, by the way, is execution on the spot by the PFs."

Bharat stared at him. "Outsiders? Us?"

Shatrugan indicated Bharat's insignia, now hidden discreetly beneath the cloak he had thrown on for their incognito visit to their old drinking spot, then his own mark of kingship, also concealed beneath his robes. "You're king of Gandahar. I'm king of Mathura. Face it, big bhraatr. We're not Ayodhyans anymore."

Bharat finished his mug with a vehement flourish that barely masked his anger. "I'm not sure I'd want to be called an Ayodhyan anymore. Not in these times.”

Shatrugan grinned. Bharat had always had a tendency to over-react at times, especially when he drank. “You don’t mean that. No matter how many cities you build and name after your children or yourself, you’ll always be an Ayodhyan through and through. Let’s face it. So will I. Once an Ayodhyavaasi...”

“...always an Ayodhyavaasi.” Bharat finished with just a twinge of bitterness in his tone. He sighed and grinned back at his brother. “What can I say? I’m not a perfect master of dharma like Rama. I lose my patience at times.”

He held up the empty mug and waved it in the air for a moment. Shatrugan, who was facing into the temple precinct, saw Chandra’s eyes rise from his scroll, then drop again. The pundit would fetch them refills but only after a fair wait. Yet another of his efficient methods to enforce ‘safe drinking’ as he put it.

Shatrugan offered Bharat his own mug. It was still half full and he was really just drinking to pass the time. These days, he rarely felt safe enough in Ayodhya to truly surrender his senses. It was partly the reason why he had insisted on leaving Shruta Kirti and his sons home. What did it say about his homeland when he did not consider it safe enough to bring his own family here any more frequently than was absolutely necessary? Nothing good, he concluded morosely.

“It’s not just you,” he admitted with a deep sigh of his own. “Everyone feels the change. Just that they don’t have the luxury to remark on it for fear of their heads. Jabali runs a tight house. His spasas are everywhere.” Shatrugan glanced around. “I’d even advise you not to speak your heart too openly, bhraatr. The way things are going, one never knows.”

Bharat didn’t respond to that. He was looking off to one side with a speculative expression. Shatrugan glanced back over his shoulder to see what had attracted his attention. “Who is that? Someone you know?”

Bharat nodded slowly. “Someone you know as well. Remember Captain Bejoo of the king’s vajra?”

Shatrugan did a double take. “That’s Captain Bejoo?”

Bharat nodded. “Not anymore. He’s a PF now, I think. But knowing his calibre, I’d bet he’s still pretty high up in the inner circle. I’m going to have a few words with him.”

Shatrugan put a hand on Bharat’s shoulder as his elder brother started to rise. “Careful, bhraatr. These are dangerous times.”

Bharat retorted, “That’s why information is precious.”

Shatrugan watched him walk over to the spot beneath a pillar where the former vajra captain sat nursing his own mug of soma. He had to admit Bharat was right: there were a great many things he would like to know as well. He just hoped Bharat remembered that the danda on Ayodhyans speaking to outsiders also applied to the outsiders who received the information. And with Rama’s dogged adherence to the law, it was possible that even his own brothers might not be considered exceptions to the rule. If they were caught or overheard discussing Ayodhya’s internal matters with a ranking officer of the PR, the danda would be on the spot execution for all three of them.

THIRTEEN

Bejoo was surprised when he recognized the man walking towards him. Yuvaraj Bharat? Well, technically, he was Gandahar-naresh now, ruler of the new territories up north beyond the Himalayas, a legend in his own time for having achieved what he had in that brutally rough country. But to Bejoo, he would always be that strapping young prince of Ayodhya who had stolen his best chariot and horse from right under his sarathi's nose one festival day to run a race with his three brothers down the length of the raj-marg. Bejoo had been livid that day, but of course, he could hardly berate or punish a prince of Ayodhya. So he had punished the sarathi instead. He winced inwardly now as he recalled how hard he had come down on that poor fellow. Ah, but I used to be a hardass in those times, damn my battered soul.

The man who sat beside him on the cool stone floor was much leaner and harder looking than the puffed up young prince of that day, almost thirty long years ago and he had discreetly clad himself so no evidence of his kingly status was outwardly visible. But it was prince Bharat, no question about it. And the man who had been sitting with him across the way and was now rising too to come over and join them, why, that was prince Shatrugan, for certain, now Mathura-naresh.

“You were hard on that poor sarathi,” Bharat said in a conversational tone, taking Bejoo by surprise.

Bejoo started. “I cannot believe you still recall that incident, master Bharat. It has been a fair while since the days of your youthful excesses.”

“True. But the older one gets, the more fondly one seems to remember those youthful excesses, don't you agree?” Bharat glanced at him sideways, waiting for a response.

Bejoo nodded. Then grinned. “You were quite the hell raiser back then. Must make for some good memories now!”

Bharat nodded, grinning too. “Except that I always felt bad for the poor sarathi and how hard you came down on him that day.”

“Well, young master. As I recall, it was you who were responsible for his plight, not I. ‘Twas his job to guard the rath. He ought not to have been swayed by your sweet princely tongue.”

Bharat spread his hands in a what-to-do gesture. “True, true. But my words to him were compelling. Did he tell you what I said to him that day to make him hand over his reins to me so readily?”

Bejoo thought back a moment then shook his head. “Nay, that he did not.”

Shatrugan came over, flashed a smile of greeting, and sat down beside his brother.

Bejoo took the cue and simply nodded back in return, understanding that they wished to remain incognito for some reason. He continued: “In point of truth, young master, I did not let him explain. It was the principle of the thing, I told him, if I recall correctly. A sarathi never surrendered his chariot on pain of death. It was his dharma.”

Bharat shook his head regretfully. “Not if his prince told him that another prince, Yuvajara Rama Chandra, lay injured and bleeding and he needed to commandeer the chariot to rush to his aid at once.”

Bejoo lost any trace of a smile. He stared bluntly at Bharat. “You told him that?”

Bharat nodded. “I was a young fool then. Used to getting my way. And I so wanted to win that race. Right, Shatrugan?”

Shatrugan nodded. “Surely. You always had to prove you were better than Rama, even when you weren’t.”

Bejoo shook his head slowly, remembering how harshly he had penalized the sarathi. “Poor man. Had I know that then...”

“You would probably have still punished him anyway,” Bharat said. “You were a tough old bastard back then, Captain Bejoo. No offense.”

Bejoo nodded. “None taken.”

“That’s why our father put you in charge of his personal vajra. He took great pride in the way you ran that outfit. He was always using you as an example when trying to discipline us, wasn't he, Shatrugan?"

Shatrugan grunted, smiling ruefully: "He did. I can vouch for that as well as the danda we got while he berated us for not being more like Captain Bejoo."

Bharat glanced at the old man. "I have to admit, that was part of the reason why I stole your rath in particular, and not one of the others."

"Oh yes, sir, he came down that raj-marg yelling, 'I'm Captain Bejoo, make way, make way!'" Shatrugan laughed, and Bharat laughed with him. With barely a pause, Bejoo joined in as well. The other drinkers in the temple precinct turned their heads to look at them curiously. Chandra pujari continued fanning himself slowly, frowning as if wondering whether he had served too many mugs of soma to this particular group.

Finally, Bejoo stopped laughing, sighed deeply and looked down at the rough stone floor on which he sat. "Sometimes, I wonder if it was worth it. Being as tough a bastard as I was back then."

Bharat glanced up at him quizically. "What do you mean?"

Bejoo shrugged. "Well, as time tempers once mettle, it also leads to introspection. I do not deny that a warrior's countenance is part of a kshatriya's dharma and all that. But sometimes I wonder. Is not a kshatriya also a man? A human being? A husband, a father, a brother? We are not just machines of war, surely?"

Bharat looked at him for a long moment. Elsewhere in the temple compound, a man raised his voice, demanding more soma harshly. The voice cut off abruptly as the drunken fool felt the blunt end of Chandra pujari's staff.

"That is a very insightful thing you just said, Captain Bejoo," Bharat said at last. "A very very insightful thing indeed."

Bejoo made a throaty sound. "It's not Captain Bejoo anymore, boys. Hasn't been for a very long time. I'm grama-rakshak Bejoo now. Although I suppose I'm technically some kind of ranking officer in the PF hierarchy, but don't ask me where I figure in relation to all the rest of the organization. It changes every day these days, it would seem."

He noticed Bharat and Shatrugan exchange a quick glance. Shatrugan seemed to nod briefly as if saying yes, go ahead to his brother. Bharat turned back to Bejoo with an expectant look on his face.

“Actually, we’d like very much to speak with you about exactly that,” he said quietly. “About the changes.”

Shatrugan added: “That is, if you don’t mind speaking about such things with us privately.”

Bejoo drunk off the last of his soma, literally licking his lips and tips of his upper moustache. Ah, that Chandra pujari really had a deva’s touch. “Of course, young princes. The day when an old veteran and two princes of Ayodhya can’t speak freely, if privately, about their own city hasn’t come yet.” He lowered the mug and flashed them a broad smile and a wink. “Not as far as I’m concerned at least!”

He was pleased to see them both return beaming smiles. He raised his mug, requesting the pujari for more soma. And was surprised when the pujari actually fetched them refills.

Pradhan Mantri Jabali continued to stare fixedly at the far end of the chamber as he listened to the spasa kneeling beside him. The man whispered in tones that only the pradhan mantri could catch. Not even the artist standing before the canvas across the chamber, attempting to capture the prime minister’s dignified pose in all its hawk-nosed grimness, could have caught more than a sussuration. Finally, the spasa finished and waited for his master’s command. Jabali remained staring at the same spot as before, for the benefit of the portrait which after all, he had commissioned. But two tiny spots of colour began to appear on his high protruding cheekbones, and in a moment, he looked as if he had painted daubs of crimson on them. Except for those two telltale signs, and the intensity with which his eyes bored into the pre-arranged spot across the chamber – a marble bust of Raja Harischandra, one of Rama’s most illustrious ancestors – there were no other indications of just how upset the aging minister had become after hearing his spasa’s message.

But the spasa saw and read these signs correctly. And later, after he was dismissed and back in the security unit in the dungeon below the palace complex, he shuddered and told a colleague over their evening meal: “I wouldn’t want to be the next person to cross the old hawk.”

“What did you tell him that made him so upset?” asked his companion, less interested in the actual information than in knowing what, of the several dozen things he already knew of, had triggered the pradhan mantri’s anger. Slow as it was to trigger, that anger was a terrible thing to behold once fully stoked. He was more interesting in knowing the trigger from the point of view of self-preservation. Jabali had been known to kill the messenger more than once, if the rumours were to be believed. It would be useful to bear in mind that such-and-such a report might be the one to set off his formidable ire.

The spasa shrugged, stripping off a hunk of goat-meat from a marrow bone which he then sucked dry before tossing to the dogs who fought over it raucously. “Just that I saw yuvarajas Bharat and Shatrugan drinking soma with an old PF at the sudra’s temple.”

The other spasa frowned. “That’s it? What were they talking about?”

“Don’t know. Couldn’t get close enough to hear without arousing suspicion. Couldn’t have been anything very important, it seemed to me. They were laughing and drinking.”

The other spasa shrugged. “Politics.”

They enjoyed their goat meat and soon forgot the incident.

The pradhan mantri, on the other hand, most definitely did not.

FOURTEEN

Old Somasra watched as the young soldier leaned over the top of the first wall, peering down its length. “I see it, Soma, sir, I see it right there!”

Somasra resisted the urge to knock his lance against the youngun’s backside. Had there not been sharp-toothed things swimming about in that moat down there, he’d have knocked the fellow over without a second thought. He was sick and tired of these greenhorns they sent him these days, blustering young fools who couldn’t throw a spear twenty yards and hit a whole wagon. In his youth, duty at the first gatewatch had been a posting of immeasurable pride. A young soldier could have his pleasure of any number of women over the first several weeks just on the back of that simple statement: “I’m first-gate-watch.”

He had been the youngest ever to pass the rigorous tests they set back then and his entire akshohini had been damn proud of the fact. “One of our’s!” He sighed and shook his head in disgust as the young soldier continued to lean dangerously over the wall. Sure. I was the youngest then and now I’m the oldest gatewatch still on active duty. So what does it mean? Have I gotten too old for the job? Or has Ayodhya changed from under me? Probably a bit of both.

Either way, it stank like the moat in the days before refilling time – when the mulch and dead carcasses and other rotting stuff grew too dank and noxious, and the dam-gates connecting the moats to a small diversion of the Sarayu had to be knocked open to let the water be refreshed, the mesh-screens ensuring that while fresh water came in and filthy water went out, the denizens themselves remained in their watery enclosure as their predecessors had for the past centuries since Ayodhya had been built. And later, hauling up those mesh screens when they grew too clogged with gunk, and replacing them with fresh ones? Now that had been a task in itself. He had helped out a few times, because back in those days, everyone did everything, not like it was today with even hairless younguns dodging work saying, “It’s not my varna,” or “Below my varna to do that”. Besides, he had wanted to see what it was like. The way those jaws and slick snouts emerged and snapped and thrashed and rolled madly in the water the moment human hands or feet came remotely within chomping range...it churned his stomach even now to think of it. Especially since he had seen what those gnashing jaws and razor teeth could do to a living creature – on more occasions than he cared to count in fact, Shiva take his blessed soul.

“I got it, Soma! I got it!” cried the youngun now, leaning so far over the top of the wall, that his lower garment was pulled up high above his thighs, exposing his fuzzy rear end.

Somasra cursed, reached out with one hairy knuckled fist, grabbed hold of the young soldiers langot by its waist knot, yanked on it hard to get a grip – the youngun yelped once as his crown jewels were squished more than a little – and hauled the fellow back and down, thumping him on the hardwood platform again. He turned around, the errant pennant that had fallen off and got stuck a yard down on a convenient splinter clutched in his hand, face red with effort. “What you do that for?”

Without a word, Somasra snatched the nearest mashaal off its iron sconce, leaned over the wall and pointed down. The youngun’s curiosity made him look over once again, and Somasra held the torch low enough that they could both see the dimpling dark surface of the moat below. Somasra hawked and spat a gob. The instant it splashed into the water, a dozen twisting writhing shapes thrashed and fought and lunged. Finding nothing for their efforts, yet still able to smell human product in the water, they fought one another, gharial versus shark versus crocodile versus piranha versus watersnake versus...well, versus whatever else was down there. He drew back the arm with the mashaal, plunging the moat below into the shadowy darkness again, fitted the torch back into its sconce and turned to see the young fellow standing stupefied, eyes round with shock.

“Holy Shiva,” the man said slowly. “If I’d fallen over into that...”

Somasra grunted. “...you’d have saved the moat-keepers having to drop tomorrow morning’s load of meat, is all. Mayhaps not even that.” He pinched the young man’s bicep, barely as thick as Somasra’s wrist. “Mayhaps just a treat for our fellows below.”

“Fellows?”

“Ayuh. They’s gatewatchers same as we are. More effective even. Intruders might get past us somehow. But them?” Somasra chuckled and shook his head. “How would anyone even know for sure what was down there and how many and how to fight them in the water? Even old Sankarshan, Captain of Moats, probably doesn’t know for sure anymore—they creatures have been breeding in the moats since before great Raghu was a little babe running around without a dhoti. Who knows what exactly is in there now and how many they might be?”

The young PF shuddered as he realized how close he had come to finding out exactly what and how many were down there in the moat. Hoarsely, he thanked Somasra for yanking him back in time and then went off to a corner where Somasra suspected he would soon hurl the contents of his stomach out. Young fools. Too stupid to avoid danger, too scared to deal with it after the fact. What they all need is a good knock on the head with the end of my lance.

Not long after, he saw a light winking on the opposite side of the gate, went over to the lantern and turned it to face a different side, causing it to wink as well and show a different coloured side. The gatewatchers used that system of coloured faces on their wall-lanterns to indicate the changing of the watch. This change meant that it was the end of Somasra’s shift. The next shift guards were already here and he surrendered charge to them and climbed down the wooden ladder to street-level. A man was standing there, apparently waiting for him, clad in the officious purple, black and green outfit that indicated he was a PF-provost, one of those new-fangled titles that they handed out like roasted treats these days even to kshatriyas untested in combat. Munshis is all they really are, he thought, trying not to let his disgust show. Glorified clerks dressed up in soldier guises.

“Gate-watch Somasra, father’s name Uchasravas?” asked the man.

“First-gate-watch Somasra,” he answered. “Ayuh.”

The man blinked, not seeming to see the difference between a simple gate-watch guard and a first-gate-watch, the latter being the best of the best, one of a very select few chosen and entrusted with the vital task of manning the very first gate, the first boundary of defense of the entire city. Another young fool who doesn’t know his itihasa or sanskriti, Somasra thought. They’re growing on trees like rotten fruit these days.

“Somasra Uchasravas, you are commended for your service. Ayodhya thanks you. You may now enjoy the fruits of your long and honourable service. You are hereby retired from active duty. Congratulations.”

And the man turned to go. Done. Finished. Just like that.

Somasra’s hand shot out and grasped hold of the man’s shoulder, pinning him. “Hold your rabid horses in check, youngun,” Somasra said, more than a little angry. “What are you saying here?”

The man glanced at him curiously, and a bit nervously, probably feeling the strength of the hand on his shoulder. “You are relieved from your duty. Retired. You don’t need to show up for work here at the gate anymore.”

Somasra stared at him so intently and silently, the man actually writhed, trying to wriggle out from the stone-hard grip. Finally, Somasra relented and released him. The man scuttled away nervously, glancing back once before scurrying up the raj-marg the way he had come—back to the governance quadrant.

Somasra looked around, at the towering structure of the first gate of Ayodhya, pride of the Arya world, looking quite proud and magnificent in the light of the mashaals at dusk. Ayodhya the Unconquerable. A large part of that legendary reputation was because of the efficiency with which these seven gates were manned and monitored. And he, Somasra, the oldest surviving first-gate-watch still on duty, was now informed that his service to the state was over and done with. Thank you. Congratulations. Commendations. As easily as that, he had been cast off like an old coat.

So that was it? The end? Of his career? And his career was his life. For he had lost his wife and son in the Last Asura Wars, in a particularly brutal skirmish in a hamlet not far from here, on the North bank of the Sarayu, back when asuras had prowled this land like beetles in a dank dungeon. Pisacas had done it, and had gotten away clean with it too. By the time Somasra had arrived, nothing but their ravaged barely recognizable carcasses remained. He had never remarried again, never took children. The first-gate-watch had been his pride and his life. Doing his bit to ensure that his fellow Ayodhyans never fell prey to the fate that befell his own loved ones. That task had given him succour and strength for forty two years, not counting the twenty four years before that when he had been in active military service, a total of 76 years out of his 91 years upon this earth. What was he to do now? Take up Vanaprasthashrama? Kshatriyas rarely lived long enough to even consider the second ashrama, let alone the third. He was old enough to take up Sanyasashrama directly now, yet he didn't know the first thing about spirituality and meditation. He had spent his life serving with strength and the use of weapons and force of mind was all he knew.

Slowly, he began the walk back to his quarters in the military quadrant. Probably he would now have to vacate that tiny room as well, with whatever meagre possessions he owned, to make way for the young and the new. He watched a quad-quad of new recruits in their spiffy new PF uniforms march past in perfect step. None of them were more than a quarter of his age, none had probably seen combat in their lives or known anyone who had seen combat. They spent their days drilling and marching to perfection, but were they good for much more besides that? It bothered him to know that they were now charged with the defense of his homeland.

What does it matter either way, Somasra? Your time is done now. You are an old bull being put out to pasture. Go gracefully and go with strength. The old must pass to make way for the new. This too is your dharma.

He straightened his shoulders and walked the raj-marg, going the opposite way to the lines of marching recruits. One last march. A solitary figure, gnarled and white-haired and grizzled with the ravages of age and old wounds and shattered bones and long hard living. Yet he cut a no less impressive figure than the dozens of straight young bodies marching the other way. As they passed each other, the old man just walking home and the young men marching to show off their youth and their strength, it was hard to say who walked the more impressive walk. A few of them who knew who he was—a living legend among gate-watchers—muttered to each other and glanced back as he passed by. Somasra neither returned their glances nor looked back. He walked on and passed into the annals of obscurity.

FIFTEEN

Bharat sprang to his feet.

His sword was in his hands, and he was ready to fight the instant the intruders entered his chambers. But as they swarmed the night-darkened chamber with silent deadly efficiency, surrounding him on all sides in less time than it took him to alter his position from a front-pointing to a raised hacking posture, he realized he had no desire to fight these warriors. He lowered his sword slowly, reluctantly, and watched as they crouched, perched, squatted, crept and otherwise filled his chamber with such a mass of furry simian force that any attempt to fight would have resulted in the tastefully white chamber being redecorated in lifeblood crimson. Several of them swarmed up the twin pillars that flanked his bed, squatting comfortably, eyes gleaming in that reflective way that animal eyes gleamed in darkness. There was little moonlight from the verandah and open windows but it was enough for him to see that none of the vanars were armed nor seemed to be offering any threat. They merely seemed to be observing him, holding him hostage, and waiting.

He sheathed the sword, sat on the edge of his own bed, and waited with them. The chamber was rank with their odour. To Bharat, used to travelling on long campaigns with horses and dogs and fellow humans who seldom had opportunity to bathe, it was not an entirely unpleasant odour. He could grow accustomed to it.

A short while later, a familiar figure entered the chamber, walking taller and straighter than any other vanar, his leonine head shot through with much more grey than Bharat recalled at their last meeting. God, but he cut a proud figure even at his age, which in vanar years Bharat assumed would be the equivalent of over 60 mortal years. Few human kshatriyas could look so fit and strong at 60. The strength of his belief in Rama makes it possible, just as it makes all his extraordinary powers possible.

Hanuman bowed, joining his palms with his customary sincerity. “Forgive the sudden intrusion, Lord Bharata, but I felt it more becoming your stature than the manner in which Pradhan Mantri Jabali desired to have you apprehended.” He indicated the chamber full of vanars. “As you can see, none of my warriors has made any attempt to threaten or harm you, and that will not change so long as you heed my words and accompany me graciously.”

Without replying, Bharat held up his sheathed sword on both his open palms, showing that he had no intention of using it. Hanuman nodded. Bharat kissed the sword, placed it lovingly on the bed, and rose to his feet. “Lead the way.”

The vanars parted like water before a ship’s prow.

Shatrugan joined them in the corridor outside the sabha hall, accompanied by his own contingent of vanars, none of whose furry heads came to higher than his chest. He seemed in good spirits as if being roused out of bed in his private chambers by half a hundred vanars was something that happened every second night. “Bhraatr,” he said by way of greeting, a faint tone of irony in his tone.

The palace was quiet and still at this late hour. Yet in the distance, Bharat caught the sounds of shouted commands, marching feet, hooves and wheels. Something was afoot in Ayodhya. Something very substantial. Yet he felt a sense of disapproval at any military exercise or campaign being conducted in these hours. The kshatriya code existed for a reason: warriors deserved their rest and leisure hours. To mobilize troops in the middle of the night could only lead to tired soldiers come daylight. What could be so urgent that it required mobilization by night? What national emergency could not wait until dawn at least, which was after all only a few short hours away, less than half a watch.

Their silent progress through the winding corridors led down two flights of marbled stairs and past the Hall of Ancestors. Bharat saw the vanars peep curiously into the great museum-like chamber where gentle lighting remained lit at all hours, to honour the illustrious Suryavanshi Ikshwaku forebears. It was testimony to their discipline that none lagged behind or dropped back to take a quick tour, even though their intense fascination was palpable. These artifacts must be unseen in their cities. He had never had the pleasure of visiting Kiskindha, the capital of the vanar nation deep in the redmist mountain ranges beyond the North-Easternmost boundaries of the Aryavarta empire, but he had heard enough accounts of its wonders to know that stone and canvas were not the usual media used by vanar to commemorate their famous dead. They believed in honouring their ancestors through their deeds rather than through carved marble busts and painted art. The artistic wonders that greeted them at every turn were unlike anything they had seen or heard of in their rustic vanar lives.

They reached their destination, the rajya sabha hall, and the contingent came to a halt.

Hanuman stopped before the closed sabha doors. Rama was evidently inside and some manner of official meeting was clearly in session, as was obvious from the presence of the guards diligently guarding the corridors and doorway.

Bharat half-expected to see Lakshman there as well, in his usual place. But his brother was conspicuous by his absence from his familiar spot. The sentries opened the doors to Hanuman who went inside the sabha hall and returned moments later, indicating that they should follow him inside.

The vanars remained outside, the vaulting doors groaning shut behind Bharat and Shatrugan. Bharat glanced around as they followed Hanuman up the long central walkway between the endless rows of pillars. The hall was almost empty, and lay mostly in darkness. The only people present were gathered around the throne dais, where a pair of mashaals crackled quietly, illuminating the dozen odd faces that Bharat recognized easily as the War Council. The only ministers present were Pradhan Mantri Jabali and Mantri Ashok. Another face he recognized unhappily was that of Bhadra, scion of a noble family of Ayodhya and a friend and sporting rival to Rama as a boy. He had himself seen Bhadra's friendship to Rama grow considerably in the past ten years and had heard growing rumours of just how much power and influence that friendship had earned Bhadra. He was also the Chancellor of the War Council and the Governor of the city now, Bharat had heard. His name had been one among a few that had cropped up several times during his talk with Shatrugan and Bejoo last evening.

Bhadra must have sensed Bharat's intense scrutiny because he looked up just then, canny knowing blue eyes flashing straight to Bharat. His handsome fair features betrayed no trace of his feelings as he returned Bharat's gaze with a cool appraise of his own. If anything, he looked a capable, upstanding man and an able administrator. Then why do I feel that he has grown too close to Rama too soon?

Hanuman announced them. “Samrat Rama Chandra, as you instructed, I have chaperoned Mathura-naresh Raja Shatrugan and Gandahar-naresh Raja Bharat to your presence.”

Rama glanced at Bharat and Shatrugan before replying. “Yes, thank you, Anjaneya. That will be all.”

Hanuman remained standing.

Rama looked at the vanar. “You may leave now, Maruti. Your chore is done.”

Hanuman cleared his throat gruffly in the vanar manner, a cross between a nervous cough and a plaintive sound. “I beg your pardon, sire. But I also wished to inform you that the troops you requested have arrived. I received word when I was on my way to fulfill this errand.”

Rama nodded, looking pleased. “That is excellent. Have they entered the city?”

Hanuman shook his head once. “I scented that would be unadvisable if not difficult, given their numbers, sire. But they await your inspection within sight of the city. If you will trouble yourself to ride out with me just a yojana or two...”

Rama waved a hand dismissively. “Out of the question. We are about to sit in council now. I can’t leave here.”

Hanuman bowed his snout humbly. “As you say, sire.”

Rama frowned, crooking a finger. “However, I can use the Seer’s Eye to look over them from afar. Yes, I believe I shall do just that. Arrange for them to be in view of the tower and I shall be able to look over them briefly. How soon do you think you can arrange them?”

Hanuman scratched the sparse silvering fur on the back of his head, thinking. The ability to tell time, especially in the tiny increments mortals divided it into, was a feat that generally defeated the vanar intellect. But in this, as in so many other things, Hanuman was an exception to his race. “Within the hour, sire. I shall fly out myself and organize them.”

Rama nodded. “Good. Do that then. Go now. Call me only when they are ready to be viewed.”

Hanuman left the chamber—but instead of going back towards the doorway, he went the other way, towards the window. Bharat watched as the vanar moved easily from a brisk walk to a quick sprint to build up momentum, then launched himself out the window into the black of night. One last glimpse of his tail flicking as his powerful legs launched him skywards, then he was gone.

Bharat turned his attention back to Rama.

He was a little discomfited by the intensity of Rama’s gaze. Not a gaze, it was more a glare.

“Gandahar-naresh Bharat,” Rama said with stiff formality, “it appears you have committed a grave transgression against Ayodhya. I have summoned you and Mathura-naresh Shatrugan here in order to give you an opportunity to defend yourselves before I pronounce sentence on you and impose the applicable danda for your violation of our laws.”

SIXTEEN

Bharat exchanged a glance with Shatrugan before looking up at Rama. “Ayodhya-naresh, Kosala-narad,” he said formally yet in as friendly a tone as possible. “I believe I speak for both Shatrugan and myself when I assert that Mathura and Gandahar are both sworn allies to Ayodhya. The question of transgression does not arise. We have nothing but goodwill towards the Kosala nation and its capital city. Not to mention the fact that we are both loyal sons of Ayodhya and patriots to the core.”

Even as he spoke he was aware of the hostile looks directed at both himself and Shatrugan, as well as the presence of swords and daggers among the members of the War Council. But weapons are forbidden by law in the sabha hall! It has been so since the days of Manu and the ignoble uprising. The event that had precipitated the imposition of the law had occurred during the reign of Manu the Lawmaker, an illustrious ancestor of their’s who was legendary for his creation of the famous Laws of Manu, a code of conduct that did not find favour with all who served under him, particularly those whom the Laws sought to muzzle, contrain, or otherwise restrain. That had led to an uprising of the court nobles on one occasion, and a bloody fight in the sabha hall – this very sabha hall – and the subsequent imposition of the rule that weapons would henceforth be forbidden within the sabha hall, an offense punishable by immediate and lifelong banishment from all court affairs. The event came to be called the Ignoble Uprising and the rule had stuck. Until now. Bharat wondered grimly how many other changes Rama and his War Council and state advisors had brought about, and which other time-honoured traditions had been overthrown as summarily as this one.

Rama accepted a goblet of some manner of drink from a serving man – a serving man, not girl, which was another unusual change, Bharat noted. He seriously doubted the use of men in place of women to serve the liege had anything to do with equalitarianism. More likely it was for other more military reasons; the fact that the serving man had the body and manner of a trained soldier and carried a discreetly worn short sword did not escape him either.

Rama sipped briefly from the goblet before speaking. “Your past actions have no relevance. All that matters is your present transgression against the state. Do you accept or deny that you have acted against the best interests of Ayodhya?”

Bharat frowned while still trying to keep his voice polite and expression friendly. “My Lord Rama, how can past actions have no relevance? They have every bearing upon a man’s motives and present actions. Every living breath expended by either of us has been in the service of Ayodhya. Besides, we have not even been informed what these allegations against us may be. How can we accept or deny them then?”

Rather than reply, Rama continued to sip his drink while his eyes remained on Bharat. Instead it was Bhadra who spoke up in the irritatingly laconic tone that had always sounded to Bharat as if he was sneering at everything and everyone.

“You are impudent to even question the sunwood throne thus. The rajya sabha has already heard the charges against you and found them meritorious. There is no obligation to inform you of the details. In fact, the only reason why Lord Rama is permitting you this appearance is on account of your past services to Ayodhya. The Council itself has already found its verdict and the vote is against you. All that remains now is to announce the danda imposed on you two.”

Years of kingship and numerous diplomatic parleys and negotiations with a variety of other powerful people had tempered Bharat’s youthful temper considerably. While he might never become legendary as a diplomat or politician, he was justifiably proud of the fact that unlike most Arya kings and lords, he had learned to wield his tongue rather than his sword to convince those who disagreed with him. But hearing Bhadra speak now, completely out of turn and against all protocol, that too in a tone that dripped with irony and utter disrespect for Bharat’s lineage, made him want to cry to hell with diplomacy and fling himself at the hefty Advisor. Who in the name of Ravana’s butt is this fool anyway? When we were kids, and he tried to tag along with us, Rama was the one who used to have least sympathy for him. A spoilt snot-nosed rich noble’s brat who inherited too much family fortune and power at too young an age. And now he sits by Rama’s right hand and speaks for him? Outrageous!

He felt Shatrugan's calloused palm on his shoulder and warm breath on the side of his neck. "Sabar, bhraatr," whispered his brother. Patience, brother.

The watchful eyes and alert hands poised over pommels and hilt-guards surrounding them underscored the merit of Shatrugan's advice. Besides, he had no desire to start a blood-battle with the administrators of his own family throne, no matter how strongly he might disagree with their methods.

It still took an effort for him to reply in a level tone. "With due respect, Lord Bhadra, I believe my brother and I have every right to know the allegations made against us and to be given a fair chance to speak for ourselves. Where I do agree with you is that the sabha is not obliged to inform us of these allegations. The accuser must personally face us in open court," he gestured at the virtually deserted hall to indicate that it by no means satisfied the definition of an open court, "and speak his accusations in our presence. The question of the Council finding a verdict against us does not arise, since the process of justice has not yet been carried out under Ayodhyan Law, let alone Arya law." Again, he emphasized 'Ayodhyan' to highlight the fact that while Arya law might be interpreted variously by different tribes and nations, Ayodhya was legendary for its justice and fairness – if Bhadra, whose lineage came from a particularly brutal bloodstained grama with a history of resorting to violence in order to amass its lands and wealth, regarded that emphasis as a reminder that his own family did not have the best record for abiding by the Law, well so be it. He was rewarded by seeing the man's eyes narrow at that emphasis.

Bhadra moved his mouth as if to speak, but Bharat held up his hand and continued: "Besides, it was my impression that Lord Rama had addressed me. Is it now acceptable protocol for a mere nobleman to interrupt when kings are in formal dialogue?"

That one struck home hard. Bharat saw Bhadra's eyes widen, and his nostrils flare alongwith his anger. Bhadra's own temper was notorious. Even as a boy he had been in the ugly habit of beating his dogs and horses to death when they did not obey his commands to the letter. Bharat now saw a flash of that same boyhood cruelty rise to the fore as the Advisor took a step forward, hand reaching for the hilt of his sword. Come on then, make a move against me, and we'll see who gets the danda then.

Rama's hand rose. Bhadra stopped short, although his eyes burned now with a hot rage that Bharat had seen too often before to mistake for anything less than a death-wish. He marked in his mind as a reminder of the exact moment when the Advisor had first become his mortal enemy.

“Enough.” Rama placed the goblet on a tray beside the sunwood throne. “This is a waste of valuable time. The Council has far more vital matters to discuss today.”

He looked at someone beyond the edge of the circle of Counsellors and Ministers and made a gesture that Bharat could not catch. Someone flitted away into the shadows in response, off to do Rama's bidding. Rama turned his eyes back to Bharat, a faint trace of a smile evident now. “Lord Bharat, your concern for Ayodhya Law – as against Arya Law,” he said, showing that he had caught the nuance as well as the implied insult to Bhadra's own family background, “is commendable. However, you are not facing a lok sabha. This is a rajya sabha. Hence there is no requirement of an open public court. We are in a time of war. This is a War Council seated here today. We operate under rule of martial law now, and all decisions and judgements are summary and immediate and not subject to the usual process of public hearings and trials.”

Bharat's heart sank as he realized what this meant and what Rama was leading up to. Rama read his reaction and smiled coldly before continuing.

“I see you follow my meaning now. Under martial law, the War Council in conjunction with the rajya sabha,” Rama indicated both the circle of Counsellors as well as the usual roster of ministers, “are empowered to consider any act of transgression or treason against the state in private and arrive at private judgement. Only the danda need be announced publicly, and it is that part of the process for which you are summoned here today.”

Rama gestured again and Bharat glanced back to see a group of figures coming forward from the shadows, apparently just brought into the sabha hall on Rama's summons. He was more than a little shocked to see the Queens Kausalya and Sumitra, as well as a few other elder statesmen and stateswomen of the court. From the puzzled faces, he knew that the 'witnesses' had not been told anything either.

Rama gestured to the small group who were now standing in the light of the mashaals, blinking and looking curiously at Bharat and Shatrugan as they tried to understand what was going on. "Here are the witnesses as required by law, and in their presence I shall now pronounce your danda. Bharat and Shatrugan. For transgressions against the state of Kosala and the throne of Ayodhya, you are both stripped of your kingships and all other possessions and placed under house arrest within the bounds of the Royal Palace with immediate effect and for an indefinite period of time. This sentence is now pronounced by me, Rama Chandra of Ayodhya, under the auspices of Ayodhyan martial law. I ask that the War Council seconds it."

"So seconded," said Bhadra eagerly, his teeth glinting whitely in the light of a mashaal. He locked eyes with Bharat, lip curling in that familiar sneer of triumph.

"The Sabha of Ministers confirms it," Pradhan Mantri Jabali said aloud.

Rama nodded. "The motion is carried. Have the accused taken into custody at once."

SEVENTEEN

“Wait!” cried a woman’s voice.

Had it been anyone else, Shatrugan knew the plea would have fallen on deaf ears. But it was Kausalya-maa who cried out. First Queen of Ayodhya by Dasaratha’s side, then Queen Regent during those long years of exile, and now Queen Mother to the seated King. For the past ten years, she had played no active role in the administration and governance of Ayodhya—had in fact been relieved and happy to surrender all responsibility to Rama—but the knowledge of her power and stature remained, as did the overwhelming affection the people, the court, even the armed forces felt towards her. Many considered her an avatar of the goddess, and while associations of royalty with divinity were common across Aryavarta, in Kausalya-maa’s case, they were believed more fervently and by greater numbers than was usual.

The soldiers who had encircled Bharat and he in a ring of spears and were about to shepherd them out the sabha hall halted at once. Shatrugan saw them glance at each other uneasily. That single uneasy glance told him more than an hour of questioning would have revealed. They know things are not right here. They don’t like it. But they have no choice but to follow orders.

He saw his clan-mother step forward, out of the group that had been summoned at this unearthly hour to serve as witnesses in this sorry excuse for a trial. She walked through the circle of seated Ministers and Counsellors, towards the royal dais itself. Pradhan Mantri Jabali stood in her way, looking down his hawk nose at her imperiously. She met his hawk gaze with an eagle stare of her own, and he visibly blanched and shuffled aside. Like most politicians who advocated war and invasion and signed the death warrants of countless young bodies sent out to do violence on unseen enemies in distant lands, Jabali was a coward at heart. Shatrugan bitterly wished Sumantra were still here among them, with his quiet grace and wisdom. But this was what they had to work with, the likes of Jabali and Bhadra. This was Ayodhya today.

Bhadra made a move as if to block Kausalya’s path too, and from the insolent expression on his face, Shatrugan knew he would not cow down as easily as Jabali had done. The Advisor was no coward, he was something far worse: a man who took pleasure in harming others through brute violence but clever enough to disguise it as in a warrior's willingness for combat. Shatrugan would not put it past him to lay a hand on Kausalya too.

But Rama spoke then, in a voice so quiet, it was clearly intended only for Bhadra. "She may speak."

Bhadra hesitated, then stepped back to his position to the right of the throne. He folded his arms across his muscled chest, biceps bulging and anga-vastra tightening around them, as he watched Kausalya approach.

She walked to the foot of the dais, up the steps, and right up to the sunwood throne itself. Shatrugan saw several Counsellors and Ministers turn their heads to speak with one another, without taking their eyes off her for an instant. It was against protocol to approach a sitting liege thus, without being expressly ordered or given permission. But Rama had said "She may speak," and he seemed unperturbed by her approach.

She stopped one step below the throne, maintaining a little more than a sword's length distance between Rama and herself—though of course, she wore no sword at all—and remained over two heads lower than his eyeline. Thus, she maintained the decorum of the court and throne, still looking up to her liege and keeping safe distance, yet using the unusual position to assert her own stature and power. Now that is a brilliant politician, Shatrugan thought, resisting the urge to flash a grin. And not one playing to advance her career either; everything that Kausalya-maa did, she did for the common good. Nothing more or less. Nobody else in the whole world would dare to approach the King of Ayodhya thusly, yet after all, nobody else in the whole world could claim to have borne the King of Ayodhya for nine months in her own womb either. For all its recent emphasis on masculine muscle, Arya civilization was after all, a matriarchial civilization. For as the cheeky old commonspeak saying went: "Lineage is father's privilege. But only the mother can say who is truly whose!"

Kausalya spoke words to Rama then. She did so quietly enough and rapidly enough that nobody, least of all those standing as far away as Shatrugan and Bharat were, could catch her words. No doubt Bhadra could hear her quiet well, being as close to Rama as he was, and it was by watching his face as well as Rama's own features, that Shatrugan had some semblance of understanding what Kausalya might have said.

Bhadra's face turned white with anger almost at once, then red with frustration as she continued speaking and Rama continued listening without reaction or response, then finally it turned purple with impotent rage by the time she finished, reached out, laid a hand gentle on Rama's knees, stretching out to touch it, then stepped back, dismounting the steps as gracefully as she had mounted them and without once needing to glance down or backwards. She reached the foot of the dais, adjusted her garment to ensure her head was properly covered as court protocol required, and waited quietly.

Bhadra stepped towards the throne, his adam's apple bobbing furiously in his throat. He opened his mouth to speak, but before he could get a word out, Rama raised a hand, causing Bhadra to stop, and gestured him back with a faintly admonishing gesture. Bhadra stepped back and stayed quiet, but it was evident that the amount of self-control those two simple acts required cost the Advisor dearly. He knew better than to glare at Kausalya the way he had glared at Bharat earlier: hot-headed as he might be, Bhadra was shrewd enough to display enough outward control to have gotten this far. But he's not going to take this lying down either, Shatrugan thought grimly. Whatever Kausalya-maa said to Rama, it must have been really effective.

As if agreeing, Rama lowered the same hand he had raised to stop Bhadra and pointed it at Bharat and Shatrugan.

“Release them.”

Pradhan Mantri Jabali sputtered in protest: “My Lord!”

Rama gestured Jabali to silence. “Queen Mother Kausalya, in her capacity as Elder Maatr of the dynasty, has proposed an alternative danda for the two transgressors. As Samrat of the assembly, I have considered her proposal and deemed it acceptable. Therefore, instead of placing Lords Bharat and Shatrugan under house arrest, I am entrusting them with a task. If they oversee the completion of the task successfully, they shall be deemed to have proven their fealty to the Kosala nation and the sunwood throne beyond doubt. But should they fail in this task or waiver in any manner, their danda shall be increased to the maximum penalty under law. Namely, summary execution.”

Shatrugan swallowed. What in the name of Devi had just happened? Was this supposed to be a reprieve or an escalation? He glanced at Bharat and saw the same thought reflected in his eyes: Two princes of Ayodhya, threatened with execution for transgressions against Ayodhya? Surely their father—nay, all their ancestors—must be fuming in the afterlife!

But then he looked at Kausalya and saw something very different in her face. She looked grim too, but she also looked relieved, as if she had achieved her goal. Their eyes met and she inclined her head very slightly, just enough to reassure him.

Without wholly understanding what had just happened and what lay ahead, Shatrugan nevertheless felt better than he had just moments earlier. He trusted Kausalya-maa. With his life if need be. Whatever she had wrought for his and Bharat’s sake, it would be right.

Before anyone else could say another word, a familiar furred shape flew in through the same window through which he had exited not long before. Hanuman walked up to the foot of the dais bowed deeply and said, “My Lord Rama, they are arrayed as you commanded. Awaiting your inspection.”

Rama nodded and rose from the throne. At once, everyone present who was also seated rose as well. Rama walked down the steps of the dais. Following in his wake, the rest of the entourage went with him, Bharat and Shatrugan as well.

EIGHTEEN

From the lofty height of the Seer's Eye, the distant horizon already held the promise of dawn. The sky in the east was marginally lighter than the inky blackness of the rest of the world. The mashaals and lanterns of Ayodhya lay far below the 1008 foot stone tower, illuminating the city in pockets. Beyond its walls, crow-black darkness claimed the land. Seen thus at this hour of ghor suvah, it was possible to understand why the Aryas of the Satya Yuga had chosen this location. Bounded by the river on one side, straddling it in fact, with the rugged mountain ranges at its back, the foothills of the Himalayas, and facing the wild jungles of the Southwoods that had long marked the great patch of central aranya wilderness dividing the Southern Arya nations from the Northern ones, the city was ideally situated for defense. Beyond that great Southern sprawl of tumultuous forest wilderness, the great and splendid tribes of the southern part of the subcontinent flourished in no lesser grandeur than Ayodhya. But that central forest had long marked a natural border in the spread of Arya civilization; a boundary not of mortal making but of nature herself. And nestled within its sprawling largesse, many minor kingdoms had grown and flourished independently. Some, like the Gangetic fisher tribe the Nisadas under Guha, were friendly to Ayodhyans and Aryas. Others were openly hostile. Seen from this height, it was like viewing an ocean of darkness untouched by the mashaals of Arya knowledge and vedic wisdom.

“Extinguish the lights,” Rama commanded as he took up a position at the South East side of the circular promontory. The wind up here was too wanton for mashaals. The PFs accompanying the royal entourage had carried lanterns. They extinguished them now at Rama's command.

Bharat looked around as the light faded from the last of these, marvelling at the sheer number assembled here. There were no less than thirty people on the main promontory, with a few at the back here where he stood, by the half-platform at the head of the winding stairs that afforded climbers a space to catch their breath. He had never seen so many here together at one time before. Why was it necessary to bring the entire War Council, the Counsellors, the Advisor, their mandatory PF guard, and even the Queens Sumitra and Kausalya? Whatever Rama intended to show them, it must be quite extraordinary to require their presence. He had hoped to have a moment alone with Rama to speak in private and discuss matters in a more brotherly fashion, rather than the absurd formality of the hearing – if it could be called that – to which they had just been subjected back in the sabha hall. But that seemed unlikely now.

Bharat wistfully recalled coming up here with his brothers in happier days of yore – with Rama as well, though what a different Rama it had been back then; he remembered this one thing they had all loved to do, even though it was expressly forbidden to them. They would each take turns standing in the center of the promontory, arms held out, head flung back then turning round and round as fast as he could manage, pinwheeling, until the pillars bounding the chamber seemed to vanish, leaving one with the illusion of a completely clear view all around. It had been remarkable – and more than a little frightening, at that age. And once, when he had lost his balance and gone rolling across the stone floor, it had been Rama who had caught him, just a yard short of the unbounded edge. He had clasped his brother's shoulders and hugged him warmly. And Rama had hugged him back.

Now he remembered those days with sadness and regret. What had changed? Why had it changed? Why did it have to change at all? He would give anything to have those days, that brotherly love, that sense of utter closeness and completeness, back again, if only for a day, an hour, a moment.

As the last light of the last lantern faded out slowly, and Bharat saw the faces of those nearest to him fade into obscurity, he realized why Rama had asked for the lights to be extinguished. The answer came in the form of a collective intake of breath from those standing at the fore, looking out between the pillars that were the only thing between themselves and the darkness beyond the tower.

Due to the prescient design of the tower, every one of those gathered here on the promontory was afforded a view of the lands that lay beyond the Sarayu Valley. Despite the thick forestation of those parts, it was possible to see what Rama had brought them here to witness.

Visible between the gaps in the trees, and in front of the treeline, their fur contrasting sufficiently with the verdant flora to make them stand out, was an army of vanars so immense that Bharat had no words to describe it. Mammoth? Huge? Enormous? All these seemed weak choices to describe the sheer profusion that carpeted the land to the east of Ayodhya, stretching for yojanas in that direction. A moving, stirring, sea of vanars, their fur rippling like grass on an open plain. Bharat felt his own breath catch in his throat. There must be lakhs of the creatures. A crore even. Two crores? Possibly.

A small shape hovered above the gathered vanar armies, floating in mid air. Even without the silhouette of that familiar leonine head and the bushy tipped enormously long tail curled upwards, Bharat could not have mistaken Hanuman. As he watched the vanar expanded himself in size until he grew large and tall enough for his feet to touch the ground – a hummock of earth dissolved beneath his heel, crumbling to dust – and his head stood at the same height as the Seer’s Eye itself. He put his palms together and bowed towards the tower, towards Rama, speaking in a great rumbling tone that reached the gathering on the promontory like a great wind redolent of vanar fur and sweat. “By your grace, Lord Rama, I present to you the vanar armies assembled and awaiting your command.”

Rama raised his hand which, Bharat noted, now held the gleaming raj-taru of the Suryavanshi Ikshwaku dynasty. “Thank you, my loyal friend. Once again, you have lived up to your word and done me a great service.”

Hanuman bowed deeply, shrinking as he did so. In another moment, he had resumed his normal size and flew back towards the vanar ranks, descending to ground level before them.

Several excited voices began to speak in the gathering. Rama cut them all off by turning and raising his hand again, the royal sceptre commanding instant obedience.

“If we shall all turn to look north and west now, we shall see what Lakshman has to show us as well.”

The gathering turned at once in the direction specified. Bharat turned with them, his eyes meeting Shatrugan’s as his brother turned too. He saw the simulacrum of his own astonishment reflected in Shatrugan’s eyes. What is Rama upto? What does he intend to do with a vanar army of that magnitude? Invade Lanka again? Surely not! There was nothing in Lanka worth taking, he knew. Which meant Rama had other territories in mind. But which ones? And why? Ayodhya had no more natural enemies left now that Ravana and his great asura and rakshasa hordes were gone. Yet he would not have called for Hanuman to assembled the vanar multitudes just for a parade!

Then he saw what lay to the north-west and all thought, all logic drained from his mind. When the gathering gasped collectively this time, he opened his mouth as well. Although no sound emerged, he felt no less stunned.

On the northwestern plains above Ayodhya, cleared generations ago to accommodate the city-state's great standing army and provide space for its military maneuvers and training, there now stood a force of mortal soldiers on foot, on chariot, on horseback and on elephant-back. It was the army of Ayodhya, but Bharat knew the size and extent of Ayodhyan forces. This assemblage far exceeded their normal standing numbers. Where Ayodhya's regular standing army had perhaps four akshohini or battalions, this force was far, far greater in size.

His practised eye scanned the neat rectangular formations arrayed out in impressive order on the practise plains and beyond. The dawn was just breaking, and as the assembly on the promontory gazed out at this astonishing spectacle, spreading tentacles of light crept across the landscape, catching and reflecting off the gleaming polished armour and weaponry of the assembled ranks. Bharat estimated that no less than six akshohini were assembled, perhaps even seven or eight if those shadows at the mouth of Ikshwaku's Canyon were also soldiers. Eight akshohini? It was staggering. Twice the size of Ayodhya's army! And this was in addition to the vanar hordes!

Rama said: "Behold, the greatest army ever raised in the history of the world. A force of mortals and vanars together comprising greater numbers than all the other armies of the Arya nations combined. With this great force we shall perform the Ashwamedha yagna and go forth today to challenge all the nations of the known world."

And he raised the rajtaru, catching the slanting first light of day and setting it aglow.

“Ayodhya Anashya!” he cried.

Three dozen voices answered him from the promontory: “Ayodhya Anashya!”

And from the vanar hordes behind them and the mortal army before them, a great and terrible cry resounded, filling the world with a rumbling no less than thunder:

“AYODHYA ANASHYA!”

NINETEEN

Bejoo heard the thundering roar of the armies and shuddered. Between the vanars on one side and the Ayodhyan army on the other, as well as the PF forces assembled here on the main royal avenues, the sound was deafening, like a thunder crack directly above. As the echoes faded away into the silent dawn, he glanced up at the Seer's Eye morosely. The slanting first light highlighted the rajtaru held up by Maharaja Rama Chandra – nay, it's Samrat Rama Chandra now, remember – and limned it in dull golden light. A cheer rose from the throats of the PFs around him and he raised his hand unhappily, pretending to join in. One never knew who was watching these days, and after witnessing what happened to those who seemed less than enthusiastic about displaying support for the Emperor, he had decided to keep his objections private and his displays public. He even shouted the ubiquitous chant “Samrat Rama Chandra ki jai!!” along with the rest, almost fumbling over the first word, which had been ‘Siyavar’ for so long rather than the recent ‘Samrat’ that he had yet to grow accustomed to saying it. It tripped awkwardly off his tongue. Emperor Rama Chandra in place of Sita's Husband Rama Chandra. That amendment of the customary cheer pretty much summed up the change in Rama over the past ten years and described all that he considered to have gone wrong with Ayodhya in the same decade.

From his position in the midst of a large regiment of similarly attired grama-rakshaks, Bejoo could not see what the distant figures on the lofty tower were presently viewing. But he had heard the awed descriptions of the sheer size of the vanar forces, and he had personally borne witness to the growing ranks of Ayodhyan regulars over the past year, and he could imagine the mind-numbing size of the two armies that now flanked Ayodhya. Those thundering cries had been like nothing he had ever heard before. An old senapati had once said when Bejoo was but a young novice soldier, that while men stood and walked alone, they still counted as men. But the moment they banded together, they grew into a kind of beast. The greater the number of men together, the less human and more bestial they became. Until finally, when it became the size of a national army, its individual humanity was all but lost in the hive-mind of the great majority. As the old craggy general had summed it up, An army has its own sense of morality, and that sense has very little to do with what you or I call dharma.

Now, the greatest beast ever created stood outside the walls of Ayodhya. Roaring a challenge.

And the fact that it was on their side rather than some external enemy's side offered little comfort to Bejoo.

Once awakened, the beast must be fed. It will be fed. And if it cannot find sufficient nourishment outside, it will eat its own home, family and finally, itself. For such is the nature of the beast, that slouching shambling monster that men become when they go to war. It needs no reason, for war itself is against all reason. It merely needs to be unleashed. And then the massacre begins. The old veteran's words still rumbled in the caverns of memory.

Bejoo shuddered again.

A little while later, after the assembly was over and the Samrat and the others from the Seer's Eye had descended once again into the bowels of the Palace, during the brief respite before the yagna itself was scheduled to start, Bejoo was standing by his wagon, checking that all was in readiness. The task of the grama rakshaks was to bring up the flanks and rear, providing an unbroken supply chain that led back from the frontlines all the way to Ayodhya. To this end, his grama was sparsely manned, just the minimum number required to drive the wagons and load and unload. They were all over-the-hill, old or partially incapacitated PFs deemed unfit to fight or march or ride along with the regular army. And they carried only supplies. In Bejoo's case, that meant mostly weapons of all kinds. Two wagons were filled with only arrows, some so freshly fletched and leaded he could smell the birdshit on the feathers and the smelting on the irontips. The other wagons carried an assortment of every kind of device or tool that could accomplish the brutal business of killing and sundering human beings. He supposed it was better than having to carry food provisions, like old Nachiketa's grama, or voids to administer to the wounded on the field like Jagannath's grama. He sighed as he resecured a loose binding and flicked the flap of the wagon down again, hooking it deftly to prevent it flapping up as they rode. It was hard to believe that these weapons and tools of war would be used against fellow Aryas – against fellow humans, for that matter. All their lives, old soldiers like Bejoo had prayed to their chosen amsas or avatars of the One God, in his case that had been Shaneshwara, his family's patron deity, that someday they would annihilate the asura races from the mortal realm, restore peace and usher in a new era of contentment and prosperity.

And look at us now, he thought as he walked around the large dusty field where dozens of other gramas were similarly awaiting the order to move out. We annihilated the asura races at last. Restored peace. We even achieved the prosperity part of the bargain. But then, instead of being content with that, we're about to start the whole vicious cycle of violence all over again. Except that this time, since we don't have a common non-human enemy to fight, we're just going to make do, and slaughter one another. It made him sick to the stomach to even think of the countless men and women that had died over the decades, centuries even, so that Arya civilization could attain its present level of stability and prosperity. Was it all for this? This miserable sodding relaunch of the same old madness all over again? What the bloody hell for?

Angry and impotent, he kicked a loose stone and winced as it narrowly missed hitting the foot of another grama-rakshak. The man glared at him as if he was insane, and Bejoo raised a hand in sheepish apology. The mood across Ayodhya was taut as a bow pulled to its maximum stretch, as it usually was before any campaign, and the last thing he needed was to get into a brawl. The other grama rakshaks regarded him with barely disguised hostility, not the least because of his earlier high office and closeness to the late King Dasaratha as well as his fame as a vajra captain, hero of many legendary exploits. They knew he was too good for this post and resented his presence among them. And they were justified in their resentment. After all, he wasn't here because he enjoyed inhaling the dust of the road and watching the hindquarters of a team of horses twitching tails for fifty yojanas every day. He was here because he had been kicked down here to this position, courtesy of Pradhan Mantri Jabali and his cronies. Not just he, much the same fate had befallen most of those old vets who had enjoyed the trust of the late Maharaja. Dasaratha had tolerated Jabali because of his efficiency and his old ties to Kosala nobility; he had never made a secret of his personal dislike of the man and his personal habits and beliefs. After Dasaratha, and more importantly, after Pradhan Mantri Sumantra's passing, Jabali had swept the royal house clean of all those who had been in the late king's favour – replacing them with his own cohorts. It was typical transition politics and Bejoo understood it well. What he didn't understand, and found increasingly difficult to tolerate, was the growing hawkishness of Jabali's administration. And Rama's growing espousal of that hawkishness.

And today, all his fears had been proven true.

He stopped and looked around listlessly. He had reached the end of his grama, and everything that could be checked had been checked twice or thrice; there was nothing left to do except wait for the order to roll out. He was bitterly unhappy about having to participate in the coming campaign. This is not what I signed up for, forty years ago. And this is not what Ayodhya is supposed to use its power and military might for. Shaneshwara curse that hawknosed fool and his cronies. I warrant they're the ones who poisoned Rama's ear until he finally agreed to this madness.

He suddenly felt defiant.

What if he simply refused to take the grama out? If he just resigned his commission and walked away?

But then again, what good would that do? It would make no difference to this massive war machine that had already been set into motion. The only one it would affect was old Bejoo himself. Military service was now compulsory in Ayodhya. Refusal or resignation – or going absent without leave – was tantamount to treason, under the new interpretation of Manu's Laws. And the danda for such an act of defiance was execution. He would be arrested for treason and probably be executed summarily, like the handful of other protestors or dissenters who had found the Ashwamedha campaign beyond their limits of tolerance. His body would still be warm as the other gramas trundled out onto the raj-marg, and he could almost imagine the other grama-rakshaks sneering or even spitting on his cooling corpse as they passed by. He sighed and rubbed his chest. No. A futile protest was no good to anyone. He may as well go along, do his duty, serve his time. At least he was not expected to participate directly in the brutality.

He leaned morosely against the side of his lead wagon, mulling over the unfairness of it all. So distracted was he by his own thoughts that he failed to raise his head even when he heard a wagon approach. He hardly noticed even when the wagon stopped close by and the horses snickered quietly.

A voice spoke from the wagon. A voice he had not heard in Shaneshwara knew how many years – decades? A voice from a distant, happier past.

“So tell me, Vajra Captain Bejoo, have you danced with any vetaals lately?”

TWENTY

As the soft gloam of first light gradually illuminated the promontory of the Seer's Eye, Shatrugan sought out Bharat and saw his own worst fears reflected in his brother's face. Bharat was clearly as shaken as he himself felt after viewing the extraordinary display.

Ayodhya Anshya indeed. This isn't what our forebears intended when they first roared that slogan in battle. Ayodhya stands for defensibility, for making a stand against injustice and the madness of conquest and invasion, not for them!

The mood of exhilaration remained even after the spectacular formal viewing of the armies was over and the elite gathering had begun to disperse. Shatrugan had never felt so out of place in his own homeland before in his life, so severely pitted against the tide of public opinion. Even though the Seer's Eye was so high above the city, their father the late king Dasaratha had always believed that immense spiritual power with which the tower was infused enabled a king of Ayodhya to read the mood of the city from up here. He often came during times of trouble, or when a difficult decision had to be made, and now as Shatrugan stood there with head reeling and senses shaken, he understood why. It was as if the tower acted as a kind of emotional listening post. He thought he could actually hear and feel what people were feeling across the great expanse of the capital city. After all, this tower and its sister structure the Sage's Brow in neighbouring Mithila were said to have been erected not by mortal architects but by the saptarishis – the seven legendary brahmarishis of yore – using only brahman shakti. Even as a young boy, Shatrugan had always been awed by the sense of power and intimate connection to the people that standing here evoked in him. He felt it again now, as a thrumming living vibration that was drawn in from the city by the tower like a beacon, passed up through the very spine of the structure, and through those stones on which he now stood, transmuted into energy and emotion that rippled through his body and mind, giving him a vivid image of what Ayodhya felt and thought at this moment in time.

There were no surprises there.

All across Ayodhya, the mood was overwhelmingly one of excitement and anticipation. A sense of power. Of eagerness to go forth and conquer. It was the mood of a people embarking on a great venture, naively unaware of the long-term consequences and repercussions.

He felt frustrated and more than a little angered. What was Rama thinking? This was no time to put on such a display of military might? And to embark on the Ashwamedha yagna now? This could well be the act that tipped the delicate balance of inter-nation politics and precipitated a war between the Arya kingdoms. Unless of course...he realized with a sinking sensation...unless that was what Rama and his advisors wanted to achieve.

Up here, he needed no spiritual infusion to read the mood. The sombre wizened old Mantris and Councillors were infected with war fever. Even now they murmured excitedly amongst themselves as they shuffled towards the narrow egress, starting the descent down the narrow spiral stairwell which was designed, like most Arya stairwells, to stifle the progress of men clad in armour bearing arms and make the use of those weapons all but impossible. Shatrugan estimated that it would take several more moments for them all to descend and deliberately hung back, indicating with a brief nod of his head to Bharat to do the same. He wished to have words with Bharat in as much privacy as was possible under the circumstances.

Rama, Jabali, Bhadra and a pair of other senior ministers seemed in no hurry to descend either; they remained standing at the far edge of the promontory, talking. Shatrugan noted with a discreet glance that Bharat and he were virtually unguarded; the handful of PFs present were more intent on maintaining the suraksha chakra – the perpetual ‘circle of safety’ they were required to maintain at all times around the person of the king – than in watching the erstwhile offenders. They were aware of Shatrugan as he moved closer to Bharat but did not object by word or gesture. After all, despite their ‘offenses’, they were still royal sons of Ayodhya and that counted for something with most. Though not with Rama, apparently, he noted with a tinge of bitter regret.

Finally, he found his moment when the Councillors standing nearby moved towards the egress to take their turn to begin the long descent. He shuffled close enough to Bharat to speak without being heard by anyone else.

“Bhraatr, the situation is beyond control. Something must be done.”

“Aye. We must speak with Rama.”

Shatrugan glanced at the group across the promontory and was not surprised to see Bhadra’s light grey eyes glinting sharply as they flicked in this direction. He avoided meeting the Councillor’s eyes, pretending to look down morosely as if lost in contemplation. After a moment or two, when he saw Bhadra engaged in conversation once more, he spoke again, keeping his face averted so his moving lips could not be seen.

“We must speak with him alone. Away from the long ears of those two bheriya.”

He didn’t have to spell out who the jackals were. Bharat made a soft sound of assent. They were quite again for a long moment as the remaining two ministers also came closer, awaiting their turn to ascend down the narrow mouth of the stairwell. Finally, they had passed out of easy hearing. Shatrugan shot another discreet glance and saw that only Bhadra, Jabali and Rama now remained. Both War Minister and Prime Minister seemed to be talking at once, eyes glinting in the gaining light as they spewed more madness and poison into Rama’s ears.

Finally, Bhadra finished speaking and gestured to one of the PFs. When the soldier approached him, the War Minister spoke quickly and brusquely, and gestured with his raised chin at Bharat and Shatrugan. The PF came over with quick efficient steps towards them.

“Move along, now, my Lords. Samrat Rama has instructed that you be taken to your stations.”

Bharat stood his ground silently. Shatrugan followed his example.

The PF frowned. In a somewhat gentler tone with a modicum of respect, he said, “Come now, Yuvarajas. My orders are to escort you down. Kindly do me the courtesy of moving.”

Bharat raised his head a fraction, just enough to meet the PF’s eyes, but not enough that Bhadra could see his face or know if he spoke. “If you value our position as princes of Ayodhya, you'll leave us be. We wish to have words with our bhraatr."

The PF looked unhappy. "My Lord, I served under you briefly in the battle of Ahichatra, during the Panchala campaign... I have no wish to use harsh words or actions against you."

"Indeed you did serve under me, Surasena, and you served well, particularly in the action on the hill where the Mlecchas were rooted in. That was where you took the wound in your side, did you not?"

The soldier's eyes flashed with bright pride. "You remember, sire? It was a long time ago and a small affair in a foreign land."

"Yet no effort is too small nor any man insignificant if he risks life and limb in the struggle for freedom," Bharat replied, still using the PF's body to conceal his face. Shatrugan saw Bhadra watching them openly now, contempt distorting his otherwise handsome features. "You fought bravely and when your wound prevented you from returning to active service, I recommended you for an officer's posting in the Purana Wafadars. I see you have done well for yourself. Kingsguard, no less."

"Thank you, sire," the man said, clearly delighted now and seemed about to snap off a salute. Then he remembered where he was and what duty he had been assigned and his face slackened. "I apologize again, sire, but my orders—"

Bharat nodded. "You have fulfilled your orders. You have informed us quite clearly and unequivocally that we are to move out. But as your superior and senior, I countermand that order and ask you to step aside now. We intend to stay. Not to do anyone harm. Simply to speak peaceably. Stand down, soldier."

The man named Surasena hesitated, swallowed, then came to a decision. He stepped back three paces, resuming his former position on the rim of the suraksha chakra. Then he fixed his gaze in that distant ten-yojana stare that the PFs were famous for on parade grounds. They were trained to stand that way for hours if need be. Shatrugan resisted the urge to grin.

"Well handled, bhraatr," he said, touching his brother's shoulder.

Bharat said grimly, “Don’t be too quick to praise me, bhraatr. I have a feeling those two won’t be as easy to convince. But we still have to try. For Ayodhya’s sake.”

And he moved towards Rama, even as the ring of PFs came to full alert and raised their weapons at once, protecting their king from the offender.

Shatrugan prayed that Bharat would be able to talk Rama out of this madness before it was too late, and without provoking further bad blood between them.

But in his heart, he had a feeling that it might already be too late.

TWENTY-ONE

Nakhudi had travelled all of one full night and day, reaching within sight of Ayodhya by the previous night. New gate-watch rules required that all those unable to pass through before nightfall had to wait until dawn to be admitted. She had spent the night outside the first gate, not sleeping, but walking among the many other travellers who had failed to make it through before nightfall, talking and exchanging gossip, news, tidbits of information, with people from as far away as Kalinga. It had been a very useful night and she had gleaned more insight into the state of the kingdom than even the king possessed by the time she finally returned to the wagon to bed down. She had no fear of thieves here: under the new laws, the danda for even an attempt at theft was the severance of a limb at best, and execution at worst. After all, the contents of the wagon were not really her's, they belonged to Ayodhya. Had she impressed that fact upon the gatewatch, she had no doubt they would have relented and permitted her passage. But she had her reasons for wanting to wait another night. She wished to be here in the morning. If all that she had learned was accurate in fact, then the morning would be a momentous one for Ayodhya.

Not just Ayodhya, for the whole wide world, she thought now as she looked down from the wagon's seat at the old PF. For this is the day Ayodhya lays claim to all Prithvi-loka.

The old vet stared up at her in bemused confusion, and she smiled beneath the shawl covering the lower half of her face as she imagined how much more befuddled he would look when he recognized her.

“Who—” he began then stopped as she reached up and undid the shawl to show him her face. Dawning recognition spread across his lined and weathered features. His eyes and mouth crinkled in a smile. He never used to have those lines, she thought. Looks like Captain Bejoo of the King's Vajra finally learned how to smile – a lot! Though he hadn't looked like he had much to smile about as she had approached. In fact, he looked like a man awaiting a death sentence.

“Nakhudi?” he said tentatively, then more confidently, “it is you, isn't it?”

She grinned as she bent over to secure the reins, then leaped down from the wagon. The ground, churned by the wheels of hundreds of gramas, was as loose as an over-ploughed field and a sod gave way beneath her not inconsiderable weight, causing her to stumble. Bejoo caught her instinctively and she felt his hands on her waist and her left breast, gripping tightly, and felt a flash of heat. She saw his eyes widen and his throat working. Well, at least he's still got his virility, the old dog. Then he retracted his hands like a man who had just touched scalding steel and she laughed openly, throwing back her head to the dusty sky.

“Well, maybe it's women I should have asked about instead,” she said, when she was able to stop guffawing. “Looks like you haven't...danced... with one in a fair while!”

Bejoo glanced around. “Keep your voice down, you brainless hussy! Do you want everyone to hear?” He indicated her shawl. “And cover your face up again. It's a bad day to be on the wrong side of the law in Ayodhya.”

She chuckled as she hitched the end of the shawl over her ear again, concealing her mouth. “What makes you think I'm on the wrong side? I could be a grama-rakshak same as you, couldn't I?”

He issued a short unamused barking laugh at that. “Yes, of course. Because Ayodhya is so short of old fogeys that it has to resort to calling up the women reserves. Besides, you aren't an Ayodhyan. Quite the opposite, remember?”

She shrugged good-naturedly, unperturbed by his hostility – pleased by it, in fact, because it was obviously a feeble attempt to cover up that moment of shocked lust she had glimpsed in his eyes – and patted down her team to preserve the illusion of their being just two grama-rakshaks having a conversation. “You mean the fact that my nation happens to be one of the many that are opposed to Ayodhya's military arrogance? Well, truth be told, Captain Bejoo, I don't know how loyal I am to my nation anymore, seeing as I've been away for almost two decades and the last time I took up my sword in her service was even farther back than that!”

He snorted. “We king's warriors had an old saying... ‘His backside may be in Lanka, but his heart will always be in Ayodhya.’”

She snorted a horse-like laugh. “How quaint. What does it mean?”

“That it doesn’t matter where you stay now or how far you’ve wandered from home, Nakhudi, when it comes to the pinch, you will gladly lay down your life for your homeland.”

Her dark eyes glittered playfully. “It is nice to see you again, Vajra Captain Bejoo. You know, the last time we met, I had a great urge to get to know you better. But there was so little time and so much to do.”

He grunted, not sure if she was pulling his leg or being serious. It was hard to say. He wasn’t that young anymore, although back then...he sighed. She could almost read his thoughts with that sigh: Those days are gone, old fool. Put the past behind you. There is only today and today’s tomorrows. “I’m no longer Captain. The Vajra was disbanded a long time ago. Now they have something else called a Trishul.”

“Makes sense. A vajra is Lord Indra’s weapon, the thunderbolt from heaven. A trishul is Lord Shiva’s weapon, the celestial trident.” She glanced around at the wagon train he was manning. “So surely a vajra veteran like yourself would be the logical choice to captain this Trishul, whatever it may be?”

He looked at her sharply and she instantly realized she had touched a sore spot. “The Trishul was Lord Bhadra’s brainchild. He personally captains it in battle. He and his brothers. He reports directly to Pradhan Mantri Jabali” He seemed to be about to speak further then stopped himself and looked down, staring murderously at a chariot wheel. For good measure he kicked the wheel hard enough to make the lead horse of that particular wagon’s team snort in surprise. The canvas rigging shook. Old mule still packs a mean kick, she thought.

The very mention of Bhadra and Jabali worked a change on him, and she could tell that the men, whomever he might be, had played some part in the disbanding of Bejoo’s Vajra and his subsequent demotion to grama-rakshak. Politicians, no doubt.

She sensed the change in him and was quiet for a moment. Across the field, a grama-rakshak grew impatient with a horse and flicked the end of a switch. The horse whinnied in pain.

Bejoo grimaced. He started to say something, stopped, then spoke after all. “Back when I ran the vajra, we took as good care of our animals as of themselves. ‘We are all soldiers,’ I used to tell my men, ‘some of us happen to be four-footed, others two-footed’.”

Nakhudi nodded in approval. “They ride with us, carry us into battle, bleed with us, die with us. They are warriors too. They deserve to be treated as such.”

He looked at her with a strange look and she found his scrutiny curiously intense. After a moment, she turned her head away.

He went on quietly.

“The way I see animals treated in Ayodhya now makes me want to take a whip to some of the fools meting out the abuse, if only to ask them how they liked to be treated that way themselves.”

“Ayodhya has changed,” she said and her foreign accent made even that simple statement seem like an accusation.

He nodded, turned his head, and spat in disgust. Part of a grama-rakshak’s qualification was being able to imbibe and withstand copious quantities of dust, she guessed. She had eaten more than her stomach’s fill on the ride here.

“More than we Ayodhyans would like,” he said.

“We thought you might have issues with the changes. That was why I came straight to you. It wasn’t too hard to find you, once I heard your name from the boys and realized you were a grama-rakshak now.” She gestured at the field.

“We?” he asked. There was a glint of interest in his eyes.

She glanced around to make sure nobody was within hearing range. Then she leaned closer, close enough to smell the sweat and man-odour of his body. It was not an altogether unpleasant odour. “My Lady Vedavati and I.”

He looked at her. The glint of interest had hardened to something else: hope? Perhaps. “Lady Vedavati,” he repeated slowly.

She nodded. “Lady Vedavati. You met her sons a few days ago.”

A new light gleamed in his eyes. “The boys who held up the grama...?” he asked softly.

She nodded a third time.

He stared up at the sky. No, not at the sky, but at the tall stone tower that loomed above the city. She glanced at it as well and saw figures standing there at the top, too shadowed by the still not-quite-daylight flush of dawn. “Then that makes them...princes.”

“Aye,” she said. “Princes of Ayodhya.”

He stared intently at the top of the stone tower for a long time. She wondered who was up there. Then the rose-tinted dawn luminescence caught something bright and shining held by one of the figures up on the tower, something golden, and she caught her breath. Of course. He was up there.

“His sons and heirs,” Bejoo said at last.

“Yes,” she said in barely a whisper. “Although there are many who might disagree with that description.”

“Not I,” said Bejoo. He had a faraway thoughtful look. “I knew there was something familiar about those boys. And their audacity in holding up my grama!” He shook his head, chortling gruffly. “Outrageous!”

Nakhudi laughed with him. “Yes. Well. They’re boys. And boys will get up to such antics at times.”

He glanced at her. “Antics? Do you know the danda for highway robbery? Let alone stealing away royal Ayodhyan property? Attacking the king’s men?”

She sighed, rubbing the back of her head through the scarf. Even looking away, she saw the way his eyes cut to her raised elbows and what lay beneath them. Well, well, she thought, glad that the shawl concealed her smile. Vajra Captain Bejoo isn’t that old after all, it seems.

“I have some notion,” she said. “I can’t undo what’s done. But I thought perhaps some form of reparation might prevent the wrath of Ayodhya from coming down on them too harshly.”

Bejoo frowned. “What did you have in mind? And what makes you think you can bargain with these people? You have no idea how ruthless Ayodhyan jurisprudence has now become, Nakhudi. It isn’t Panchayat or Grama justice anymore. This is—”

He broke off. She had walked over to the back of the wagon she had brought and now she flung open the rear flap, revealing its contents.

“Would this go some small way in appeasing them?” she asked.

TWENTY-TWO

Bharat was careful to keep his movements slow and unthreatening. The kingsguard kept their spears pointed at him, maintaining the protective ring around Rama. Over the tips of the spears, Jabali and Bhadra glared at him with deep suspicion. Even Rama was standing with arms folded across his chest, eyes narrowed.

“Rama, I only wish to say a few words,” Bharat said.

Bhadra stepped forward with his hand on the hilt of his sword. “Lord Rama, I told you it was a mistake to bring them here. They will try to impede and obstruct every chance they get. That is their plan.”

“It is part of the conspiracy to keep Ayodhya from realizing its full potential,” Jabali barked in his stentorian manner. “These two should be given the severest danda under law to set an example.”

Rama raised a hand, commanding silence from both flanks. “We have already ruled upon this matter. Let us not waste time rehashing it.” He looked at Bharat directly. “You were made to understand your position. It is extremely delicate. My advice to you,” he flicked his eyes to include Shatrugan, “is to hold your silence and do as instructed. Anything else will only worsen matters for both of you.”

“Rama,” Bharat said in as placative a tone as he could muster, “It would only take a moment of your time.”

Rama looked at him. Bharat looked back and tried to appeal to Rama personally. But all he saw in Rama’s dark eyes was a resoluteness that he knew too well. Once Rama got that look in his eyes, nothing could steer him off the course he had embarked on. Not for nothing did the kusa lavya bards call him Maryada Purshottam Rama. Rama Who Does As He Says.

“My time belongs to Ayodhya,” Rama said. “And Ayodhya cannot spare the moment.”

And he turned his back on Bharat, turning to face the eastern sky where daylight had broken and the first tentatively probing rays of the imminent sun were turning the sky above Ayodhya golden. Some of that golden hue fell upon Rama's silhouette as he turned and somehow, despite the beauty of the illumination, it lent him a dark, terrible aspect. Samrat Rama Chandra. Emperor of Ayodhya, lord and master of all Aryavarta, the civilized world, Prithvi-loka, the mortal realm.

All this, Bharat realized in a flash of insight even as the kingsguard PFs moved forward, jabbing their spears at him and Shatrugan. One point pricked his side, piercing the skin, drawing a trickle of blood. He did not feel it. Nor did he care about the harsh mocking tones of Bhadra and Jabali who ordered the guards to escort Shatrugan and he from the tower and see that they were secured and that they were not permitted to come into the king's presence again. That last image of Rama staring out at the rising sun, cold hearted and resolute, stayed with him. It was the rock against which the surging tide of his emotions pounded and broke unrequited.

The sun had risen by the time Bejoo had a chance to speak with the Prime Minister. He waited as Yuvarajas Bharat and Shatrugan were escorted under armed guard from the tower and taken to the palace. His eyes met Bharat's as he passed by, and Bejoo was saddened to see the look on Bharat's face. It was the face of a man facing a death sentence. He knew that was not the case, because the news of how First Queen Mother Kausalya had intervened and had Bharat's and Shatrugan's dandas transmuted was all over the city, but apparently to Bharat and Shatrugan, even the alternative was no less a punishment.

His fist tightened in anger on the pommel of his shortsword as he considered the injustice of it all. Princes of Ayodhya, sons of the Suryavansha Ikshwaku line, patriots of the Kosala nation, Rama's own brothers! Being treated like criminals! It was beyond tolerance. What he failed to understand was why he had not been arrested too. From what he had heard, Bharat and Shatrugan's only crime had been to discuss and question the king's new martial policies, which under the new law could be construed as treason. Yet it was he, Bejoo, with whom they had discussed and questioned those policies. So then why was he not being interrogated, arrested, or somehow reprimanded for the same? There was only one possible answer: The spasa or spasas whose reports had resulted in their being arrested had not been able to provide any concrete details. Because had they provided concrete details, it was inconceivable that Bejoo would not be arrested by now. Which meant that they had been arrested on mere suspicion.

No, not mere suspicion. As a preventive measure.

Bejoo knew enough about politics to understand that this was the likely answer. It hardly mattered if Bharat and Shatrugan had been overheard voicing treasonous opinions or merely taking a stroll on the North Bank of Sarayu. They would have been arrested under any pretext, however flimsy. The whole point was not to actually charge them, merely to prevent them from interfering in any way with Rama's plans.

No, not Rama's plans—Jabali's plans. Bhadra's plans. All those warmongering political power factions that stand to profit from Ayodhya going to war.

Yes, that made perfect sense.

He watched as the man he had been waiting for finally emerged from the lane that led to the Seer's Eye tower, escorted as always by his retinue of thuggish looking guards. Bejoo knew that each one of those so-called bodyguards were responsible for as many murders, assaults and other dark deeds done in the shadows of night than most condemned criminals in the dungeons of Ayodhya. But of course, all their crimes had been committed in the name of national security and in the service of Ayodhya, so they commanded respect rather than dandas. Such was politics. So would it always be.

“Pradhan Mantri? A word, if you please?”

Jabali frowned down his long nose. His thugs glared at Bejoo, waiting for a single word or gesture to crack his skull. The man closest to Bejoo, a menacing hulk of a fellow with tiny rat eyes, looked almost disappointed when the Prime Minister gestured them aside and deigned to step a foot or two closer to hear what he had to say.

“Quickly, man, this is the most important day in Ayodhya's history and I have a great deal of work to do,” snapped Jabali.

Yes, of course, such as barking orders at the men who will actually go forth and fight and die for Ayodhya while you recline on the silken cushions of your royal palkhi and sip soma.

“Aye, my Lord,” Bejoo said apologetically, “But I thought this merited your immediate attention.” He gestured at the wagon standing a few yards away on Suryavansha Avenue. “I have succeeded in recovering the king’s property.”

Jabali frowned. “What rubbish are you blabbering about—” He broke off as the sight of the wagon refreshed his memory. “Surely you don’t mean...” He shoved Bejoo aside roughly and strode to the wagon. A barked order and his henchmen raised the rear covering for him to peer inside, his bright eyes glinting with greedy delight as he viewed the contents.

He turned to Bejoo. “You? You recovered the stolen war wagon?”

Bejoo bowed his head in humility. “Aye, my Lord. I had my men on the trail ever since the unfortunate incident, and they were able to track it down and return it safely.” He gestured towards the wagon. “Not one thing is missing. The complete inventory is present. You may have it checked.”

“I certainly will,” Jabali said sharply. “But what of the miscreants who held up the grama and wounded so many? Where are they?” He looked around as if expecting to see the culprits standing nearby, trussed in ropes and chains. Bejoo had no doubt that if that had indeed been the case, Jabali might well have given the order to have them executed right there and then.

No. What he would do is to parade them and claim credit for their capture, and then have them executed. That’s his way.

“They were dealt with most severely,” Bejoo said.

Jabali clicked his tongue impatiently. “Yes, of course they were, or how else could you have recovered the property. But where are they now? Or... their bodies?”

Bejoo shook his head. “Lions.”

Jabali stared at him. “Lions?”

“Aye, my Lord. During the fight to recover the wagon, they were wounded and retreated deeper into the woods. Unknowingly, they strayed near a den. The pride tore them to shreds. They were in no state to bring here. There was virtually nothing left to bring in fact.”

Jabali’s eyes gleamed briefly as he contemplated this ultimate penalty meted out by nature in her mystical wisdom. “...tore them to shreds, you say.” He sighed. “Oh well. They were given their danda, that’s what counts.” The disappointment was palpable in his tone – he would have loved to have meted out those dandas himself, no doubt. He glanced again at Bejoo. “Quite impressive, Grama-rakshak...?”

“Bejoo, sire. You commissioned me yourself.” Demoted me, actually. But let’s not get prissy. You damn well know who I am, and who I was.

“Yes, of course, Bejoo,” Jabali crooked a long finger. The way the skin creased on the bone reminded Bejoo of the claw of a starved fowl. “Well, you seem to have surpassed yourself, Grama-rakshak Bejoo. I shall have to see to it that you are given a suitable reward for your exemplary service to the king.” He began to move away even before he finished speaking.

Bejoo cleared his throat cautiously. Now came the tricky part. “Actually, sire, I desire no reward at all. No pecuniary reward, that is. Rather, I desire an opportunity to serve the king further, if he so wills it, and by your grace, of course.”

Jabali stopped and looked impatiently at Bejoo. “What did you have in mind, soldier? Be quick, I have much to do.”

Bejoo told him.

TWENTY-THREE

The armies of Ayodhya were mobile before the sun had risen more than a double handsbreadth above the eastern horizon. It was an awe-inspiring display of planning, coordination and precision. Queens Kausalya and Sumitra watched from the highest balcony in their palace as the akshohini wheeled and enormous crescents in order to maintain their formation while navigating their way out of the city precincts.

A dust cloud the size of a mountain rose up high above. Panicked flocks of birds crisscrossed the skies, alarmed by the great and unusual gathering of mortals below; their scavenging brethren began to collect overhead and follow the procession, knowing that such large gatherings of mortals usually meant fresh meat to be had, if not right away, then soon. Mortals rarely collected together in such vast numbers without great violence and numerous casualties resulting; it was an enduring trait of humankind. The exodus itself was an awe-inspiring sight, the immaculate uninterrupted movement of procession after procession belying the enormous drilling and discipline that made such efficiently coordinated movement possible.

The great contingents took all day to exit the city, the supply trains bringing up the rear departing only in the late afternoon. This long tail would link the armies to the city across their campaign trail, providing the vital sustenance that enabled an army to fight abroad. More wagons would be added as required. Ayodhya was capable of supplying, feeding and maintaining a warring force as far away as three hundred yojanas. This impressive capacity made the city state a force to reckon with even in the most far flung corners of Aryavarta, and beyond. Unlike other nations, Ayodhya did not rely on its own surrounding towns and villages to supply its needs; it was entirely self-sufficient. The original reason for this self-sufficiency had been to enable it to withstand a prolonged invasion and multiple sieges. Today, that same self-sufficiency was being used for the exact opposite purpose: to enable Ayodhya to supply and maintain a force that ventured outwards aggressively.

“A system created for defense perverted and used to perpetrate offense,” Kausalya said sadly. “I wonder what Dasa would say if he were here to see this.”

Sumitra put her hand reassuringly on the Queen Mother's shoulder. "Dasaratha might not have been as averse to it as we are, Kausalya. Remember, he was a man of war. He believed in resolute action."

Kausalya sighed. "You are right. That's why it's pointless to speculate on what the dead would have said or felt with regard to things now. But I can say this with certainty: I do not approve of what is happening today in Ayodhya. I do not approve at all."

Sumitra nodded. "Neither do I. It is a monstrosity. A terrible misuse of power. If only we could speak to our sons and try to make them see how wrong this is..."

"Words cannot resolve every problem, Sumitra. For too long now I have begun to feel as if everything I say to Rama has been falling on deaf ears. Or blocked ears at least. It is as if he sees my point of view perfectly, knows exactly what I mean to say, but does not feel it is even worth the effort to debate it with me. He simply accepts it silently and discards it later like a garment that does not fit. If only he would argue at least, debate the issues at stake, I believe he would be compelled to see reason. But when a man turns himself to stone as Rama has done, he feels no need to bother with intellectual debate. He simply does as he pleases and nothing can sway him."

Sumitra looked at her, concerned at the intensity in Kausalya's tone and face. "You make him sound like a tyrant."

Kausalya shook her head. "Not a tyrant, no...but yes, if a king, however powerful, does not use his power to serve, to build, to create, and starts to use the power instead to destroy, attack, bring down, then what difference between that king and a tyrant? I fear that Rama could well become one if he continues uninterrupted upon this present path. You know how quickly and easily absolute power corrupts even the most idealistic mind. For all his fine qualities, Rama today is not the Rama he was ten years ago when he returned from Lanka, or the Rama who left us fourteen years before that. He has changed so much."

"Or has been changed."

Kausalya nodded, turning away from the bird's eye view of the endless rows of infantry, chariot regiments, elephant regiments, cavalry, and other units wheeling and proceeding out the gates of Ayodhya. Already the sun was risen high and the dust cloud churned up by the departing army had all but obscured the southern sky, as vast and wide as a mountain range that must surely be visible across most of the Kosala nation. "Or has been changed. By time. By experience. By the inevitable alterations that age and circumstances impose on us all. But also, I fear, by bad advisors. That is what concerns me most of all. The fact that Rama may be falling prey to the war-mongering hawks who seek only way one forward for Ayodhya, for all Aryavarta. What is that term they use now, Sumitra?"

"Republicans. After the idea of forming a republican nation that will be self-governed by the people through a democratic process."

"Yes, Republicans. A fine ideal. A lofty purpose. But often a murderer will pretend to be a patriot in order to justify his killing spree. Some thieves will proclaim themselves levellers of wealth and friends of the poor to gain sympathy for his cause. So also a war-thirsty group of tyrants who seek only their own aggrandization and self-benefit will pose as benefactors of society in order to go about their selfish business with the full approval and consent of the very people they exploit and abuse. Republicans. Supporters of democracy. Peacemakers. They come in many guises but always with the same purpose: To enrich, empower and aggrandize the few at the expense of the many. Beware the king who cries out that he only serves his people while secretly taxing them to death and filling his private coffers with gold and public dungeons with dissenters. I would much rather have a king who was less rich, less powerful, less feared, but greatly loved, with a richer population, happier citizenry."

Sumitra gestured at the wheeling hordes below. The sound of the armies moving out was so loud, it sounded as if they were in this very balcony, tramping and marching and yelling orders. "And you believe this is what Rama's advisors are up to? Why they convinced him to undertake this Ashwamedha yajna?"

"Yes and no. The Ashwamedha yajna in itself is a ritual every Arya king undertakes from time to time. It is a ceremonial, symbolic act. Dasaratha conducted it once, and I, as his Queen at the time, performed the yajna.

But this,” she waved a hand in disgust, “this is no ceremony or ritual. This is a war campaign. A carefully planned, orchestrated, mounted, financed, and managed campaign to spread Ayodhyan rule from one corner of the sub-continent to the other. No king ever sent forth an army of this size after the white horse. There is only supposed to be a symbolic force of riders following the horse, ensuring that none capture it and thereby symbolically challenge the authority of the king. But an army of this size?” She shook her head. “An army of this size can only be intended to crush, trample, roll over the countryside, leave a swathe of death and destruction in its wake. This is akin to what the Asura hordes sent forth when they began their invasion and attempted conquest of Prithvi-loka.”

Sumitra frowned. “And one argument raised by the likes of Jabali and Bhadra is exactly that. They say that not long ago the asura hordes led by Ravana sought to cut a swathe of death through the mortal realm. Now, it is time we mortals put on a show of strength so great that no other force would ever dare to attempt such audacity again.”

Kausalya made a sound of exasperation. “They are wrong. Invaders invade because they desire to take lands by force, to rape and pillage and destroy. To conquer. It is the most vile act of mankind, the lowest ebb of human behaviour. It is one thing to defend oneself against such invaders. But to imitate them? To emulate their example and send forth our own forces to invade, rape, pillage, destroy, conquer...? What sense does that make? For one thing, where are we sending these forces? Through our own lands! To subjugate our own people, and our neighbours and allies!”

“And a few hostile nations who are neither neighbours nor allies,” Sumitra added thoughtfully.

“Yes, but who are not enemies either! And by doing this, we are certain to force them to become our enemies. For the sheer size of our forces will compel them to band together and unite against us, and so, we shall have created a new, more powerful enemy than actually existed. Besides which, what gives us the right to do all these things?”

Sumitra shrugged. “They say we must do it because we are Ayodhya. We are the land of freedom and courage. The nation that the world looks to for protection, for hope. They say it is our responsibility. Our dharma!”

“Dharma!” Kausalya laughed bitterly. “They do not know the meaning of the word. Dharma does not mean going to war when there is no threat to oneself! Dharma is not raising a force great enough to conquer all the known worlds and then use it to do just that. Dharma is not pretending to conduct a symbolic horse sacrifice and using it as a cover for a full scale invasion – of one’s own land! It is not dharma that drives them. It is greed, pure and simple. Lust for power. Arrogance. And because it is couched as dharma, presented with pretty words and fancy ideas like republicanism, democracy, a people’s kingdom, duty, responsibility, protection, necessity... because of this devilish subterfuge, it verges on tyranny. It is tyranny.”

“Yet Rama is no tyrant,” Sumitra said firmly, “on that we are agreed.” She might be the mother of a different son, but she could hear no ill spoken of Rama without debating it hotly.

Kausalya touched Sumitra’s shoulder affectionately. “No, he is not. That is why it pains me so much to see him caught up in this manipulative politicking and vile rhetoric.”

They watched the processions for a while. The sun drifted overhead and passed into the afternoon, dipping lower and lower towards the western horizon. And still the regiments wheeled and turned and wound their way up the avenues and out the gates and up the raj-marg. It seemed as if they would go on thus forever.

“What shall we do then, Kausalya?” Sumitra asked a while later. “We must do something. Otherwise there will be terrible bloodshed and once that occurs, the chain of violence will be set into motion yet again.”

Kausalya nodded. She knew what Sumitra meant. United by the Last Asura Wars, mortal nations had fought largely together, putting aside their own territorial ambitions and other differences to fight a common, far more powerful invading foe. But now that there were no Asuras left to fight, all those petty differences and ambitions had begun rising once again to the fore, needing but a catalyst to set the pile blazing into a bonfire of crisscrossing clashes that could only lead inevitably, eventually, to a great internecine war. There was far more than just Ayodhya’s future at stake here, or Rama's reputation as a king. It was the future of all Aryavarta that hung on the outcome of this so-called Ashwamedha yajna.

"Yes, we must do something and we must do it before those armies cross our borders and cross swords with our neighbours and allies, let alone other hostile ones. Once begun, this will lead to a war among the bharata nations such as has never been seen before." Kausalya was referring to the original 'bharata' tribe governed by the legendary vedic king Sudas, who had fought and won the historic Dasarajna war, defeating Ten powerful kings to claim this sub-continent for the bharatas. Today, all Aryas residing in this part of the world were descendants of that great bharata king Sudas and his original tribe. Indeed, while the term Aryavarta described their civilization and culture, the correct name by which the sub-continent was known was Bharat, or Land of the Bharatas.

"A maha bharata," said Sumitra, using the Sanskrit, wherein the word 'war' was implied contextually. "A great war of the bharata nations."

"Yes," Kausalya said, "A Maha Bharata. And once that happens, then it will be not just a great war but the greatest war of all time. That is why we must do whatever we can to ensure that this yajna goes no further than the borders of our Kosala nation." Which was as it was supposed to be as per the vedic ritual of the ashwamedha: the horse was not expected to rove the entire mortal realm after all, nor was the king sponsoring the sacrifice expected to conquer the whole of Prithvi-loka. Merely his bordering kingdoms and regions.

"Yes, Kausalya," Sumitra said, agreeing whole-heartedly. "But what can we do? How can we stop it? How can anyone stop it? More importantly, who can stop it now?"

Kausalya shook her head sadly. "I do not know, Sumitra. All I know is someone must."

They sat in silence then, watching the last of the army regiments exit the city gates. And Sumitra thought to herself how much of Rama's strength, his resoluteness, his determination came from this woman, his mother. Now that Rama was older, approaching middle age, she could even see the similar line of their features clearly. The spiritual likeness was even more striking.

If there is a way to set things right, she thought, then surely Kausalya will find it. If he is now an emperor, then she is the emperor's mother.

KAAND 2

ONE

Kush smelled the strangers long before they appeared.

He had been roving with Sarama and her pack since morning, pretending to be one of her cubs. It was a game Luv and he had played ever since they could keep up with the lovable mongrel. Now, of course, she was old and greying, the dark whiskers around her muzzle turned completely white, and she often trailed behind the pack. Kukur, the alpha male of her first litter, now a mature but still robust fellow, led them, and he set a hard pace. But he never chastised the others when they straggled or came back to check on Sarama who was often left heaving far behind. In that sense, he was a kind son and not prone to the instinctive cruelty that animals resorted to in packs. He corrected himself mentally—Maharishi Valmiki always cautioned them that it was not ‘cruelty’ no matter how harsh such behavior may seem at times; animals too, like humans, or birds, or insects, or even the rocks and trees and water and earth, were simply aspects of brahman in different forms. And all forms of brahman were subject to the law of dharma.

The thought made Kush smile now as he loped along in a crouching stance, imitating Sarama who panted heavily as she jogged beside him. The sounds of the pack were several dozen yards ahead but they were still quiet so that meant they had not yet found their prey. He smiled because he sometimes found gurudev’s pronouncements amusing after the fact. When listening to gurudev’s pravachans Luv and he were always intent and rapt, hanging on every word, particularly the Vedic shlokas which were full of such wonderful stories. But afterwards, when discussing what they had learned at gurukul that morning, usually with Maatr, they sometimes found something quite amusing in retrospect. The thought of dogs adhering to dharma was one of these. How could dogs have dharma! It was too much to comprehend. Their mother had laughed as well, her eyes crinkling in that way he loved to see, and he had exchanged a glance with Luv, for it was not often that Vedavati laughed, and rarer still that she smiled.

Others smiled much more often. Rishi Dumma for instance, probably the fattest rishi he had ever known and also the jolliest, seemed to laugh or smile all the time. He often had to be admonished for it by Maharishi Valmiki, especially when other rishis were visiting or when they went travelling to other ashrams or to the occasional sammelan in the big city. Maatr never came with them on those trips, particularly the visits to Mithila city, which was a shame, because both Luv and he loved visiting Mithila. They loved everything about the city, and the palace was a thing to marvel at for days. But most of all, Maharaja Janak was such a fine king; “the finest who had ever lived,” Maharishi Valmiki always said, putting a hand on each of their shoulders when he said it, his face turning skywards and that familiar expression of infinite sadness coming over him.

“The finest king who ever lived, and a wonderful father as well,” he would usually add, which always mystified both of them because what did Janak’s relationship with his children have to do with anything? Even stranger was the fact that Maatr also grew as sad as Maharishi Valmiki when they tried to tell her about Mithila, about the market place and the streets and the buildings and palaces, and all the wonderful sights, and the grand feast that Maharaja Janak had laid out for the visiting brahmins and scholars from all the Bharata nations, and how his daughters and their husbands and children once came especially to join in and to feed the brahmins personally.

At this last recounting, Maatr had suddenly produced a choking sound, risen from the floor and left the hut. Gurudev had stopped them from going after her, pacifying them with the explanation that it was a womanly matter and she would recover in time. He then suggested, gently, that perhaps they should speak less of Mithila and tell her about the other wonderful things they had seen on the trip. Of course, nothing had been as wonderful as Mithila, but both Luv and he were smart enough to get the point and they had changed the topic when Maatr returned, her eyes pink-cornered as if she had been weeping.

Now, he paused, resting on his bunched fists and forefeet to imitate the elderly mongrel beside him, raised his head, and sniffed curiously. At once, Sarama stopped and did the same. From her reactions he deduced that he was not alone in detecting a strange odor among the normal earthy smells of the forest.

She suddenly issued a growl, and he saw her hackles rise, and then he was sure. That was unwashed uksan he smelled on the downwind, and unwashed human too, if he was not mistaken. And even if he was mistaken, Sarama was not. She would only growl if there was a creature that posed physical danger to her or her pack—which of course included Luv and himself—not just a deer or other docile creature of the woods. As he and his brother knew so well by now, the deadliest of all predators were those that walked on two legs.

Sarama suddenly released a volley of barks. Kush wanted to shush her but knew better than to try. She was simply alerting her pack. They responded at once. Kush recognized Kukur's distinctive mournful howl, followed by a chorus of excited yaps and barks. In moments, the pack was racing back to join their matriarch. Luv was with them, bounding along in the same bent-over position as Kush. He woofed once at Kush who woofed back and they slapped "paws" together in a playful imitation of sibling pups before turning their attention to the approaching threat.

Sarama crouched in a low stance, teeth bared, snarling. She was pointing her muzzle upwind. Luv and Kush cut back a few yards, slipping behind a thick sala tree; the trunk was big enough for both their slender forms to stand behind and there was still room on either side. The pack remained with Sarama, Kukur standing wither-to-withers beside her, howling long and low. Elsewhere in the woods, birds took off in flights, monkeys chattered, and other creatures issued sounds that most humans would not even notice, spreading the word that a predator was in this neck of the forest.

Luv knew the pack well enough to be able to tell what kind of predator they had scented. If it was bear, they usually reacted with snarls and low growls but retreated without barking or howling. There was no point barking at a bear—the rksaa was apt to get mad and come chasing after them, and a bear on all fours was a beast no dog ever wanted to take on! If it was a big cat—there were lions in this part of the woods and a few other felines, though no tigers—then they howled and barked and got riled up but still retreated. The scent of cat brought out the dog in them to the utmost, but they still knew better than to go head to head with it. They took what satisfaction they could from warning off any prey the cat might be hunting and then running away themselves! If very hungry, they waited till the cat had killed and eaten, then harried it from a safe distance till the cat retreated in disgust, leaving the pickings to them.

But when it came to man, they stood their ground, howled long and hard to alert the whole forest, and were prepared to fight to the death if necessary. The great dog packs that dominated the forests around this region had no fear of men at all. It was men who feared them—and for good reason. With their low height, ability to see in the dark, powerful jaws, and fearlessness in battle, only a very foolish man would dare oppose them in their own terrain. The thick vegetation camouflaged and obscured dogs perfectly, while leaving humans woefully exposed. Even a dozen armed men could be taken down by a dozen dogs, at best leaving every man severely wounded, and at worst, slaughtering every last man and feasting on the remains. Luv and Kush had seen it happen on one grisly occasion when a gang of bear-hunters had come by to visit some old friend they claimed lived in this region. Maharishi Valmiki had tried to prevent Luv and Kush from seeing the terrible scene but as already expert trackers they had been able to retrace most of the encounter afterwards.

Other packs that lived closer to human habitation, such as this one, had an uneasy relationship with men. They could be tamed individually but when roving in packs and living wild and free for generations as this pack had done, they distrusted armed men in groups and often attacked if provoked. The reason of course was that armed men—such as the bear-killers—were the only creatures on earth who killed for no discernible reason at all. Not all men, and not always, but often enough that a wild dog's initial reaction was one of distrust and fear. And with a wild beast, fear always manifested itself as hostility.

There were exceptions of course. Luv and Kush had proved that by befriending Sarama when she was still a pup, the solitary survivor of a litter that had been killed by unknown means in a ravine near the ashram. As young boys, they had dearly wanted to keep her in their hut as a pet, the way they had seen other men do sometimes, tying a dog to their wagon or horse with a rope on their travels or keeping the animal tied to a pillar or post outside their homes.

But their Maatr had explained to them that it was cruel to treat any living creature thus. “Would it be all right if someone were to tie a rope around our necks and keep us tied to a post?” she asked gently.

They admitted it would not be all right.

“Just because they are a different species from us does not make them inferior in any way. We have no right to control them or treat them harshly, no more than we have the right to treat other humans badly. We were all born free, and none of us have the right to take away that gift of freedom.”

So they had set Sarama free. And she had roved the woods nearby and visited them often, almost daily, but retained her freedom. Once or twice she had come back with a companion dog or two—a stray separated from its pack or a runaway. That had given them the idea of seeking out travelers with dogs in tow and secretly slipping the animals loose! That was one of the many little mischiefs that Maatr as well as Gurudev didn’t know about. Thus, Sarama’s pack had been assembled, a motley bunch of creatures, some of such vastly different appearance from her own that the twins had taken to comparing each one with a different animal or creature. So there was Monkeytail, because her tail curled like a Monkey’s; Wagh, because his fur was a beautiful golden hue and his eyes a mesmerising yellow too; Vaman, because though a third the size of most full-grown dogs, he was compact and powerfully muscled. Over time, she had mated and birthed her own get, and now the majority of the pack were her children or grand-children, but the motley mutts still stood out and the pack itself had grown expert in finding and setting free other imprisoned dogs on their own. At present, the pack was thirty-strong and growing constantly.

Luv exchanged a glance with Kush as they listened to Kukur’s deep booming bark echoed by the varied howls and barks of the others. They shared a deep love for the pack; these wild dogs were not pets to the twins, they were playmates and friends. And they were proud of their friends. The usual behaviour of the pack would have been to charge towards the approaching threat; the only reason they were waiting here was because Luv and Kush had requested them to do so.

Now, both grinned and winked at each other as they strung their bows and fixed arrows. The increasing intensity of the pack's barking told them that the stranger or strangers were closer now. Both boys pointed their arrows around the trunk of the sala tree, aimed in the general direction at which the pack was barking, and waited for the enemy to show itself.

TWO

There was a darkness in Rama's heart that would not dissipate.

Lakshman knew this just as he knew everything else that lay in Rama's heart and mind. Twins were supposed to be joined thus in emotion and thought but somehow, by some quirk of karma or kismet, it had turned out that he shared such a connection not with his own twin Shatrugan, but with Rama. The pairing had happened soon after they were able to move on their own volition, and after that, Rama and he were inseparable. When Bharat and Shatrugan partnered up as well, it was obvious it was because they wished to emulate Rama and Lakshman. Although they shared a close brotherhood too, it was not like the one shared by Rama and he. Somehow, Lakshman had always been like the mirror to Rama's face, the leaf to his branch, the river to his rain. He could not claim to actually feel everything that Rama felt, or think his thoughts, or know what he was about to say before he said it. But he knew these things. He knew them well enough to be able to know what Rama was feeling at any time, or thinking, or was likely to say. And he was rarely wrong. He might not like knowing what he knew, or agree with Rama's thoughts and feelings and pronouncements on many things, but he rarely erred in the facts of those matters.

Just as he knew now that the darkness that lay upon Rama's heart was one that would result in grave consequences. It was a darkness vast and dense enough that if unleashed it could easily cover the entire world. Like a fog that would pass across the land and envelope every living creature in its cold clammy embrace.

Everything Rama did was epic. His epic love, his epic tragedy, his epic war, his epic life itself. And now, if he unloosed the darkness within his soul, it would be an epic tragedy not only for him and all those around him, but for the world entire. This war itself was the final stage in that unleashing, and Lakshman worried that it might engender the very rebellion it sought to suppress.

Lakshman was not afraid of war itself. Or of dying in one. It was a greatly desirable end for any kshatriya. He wanted to die fighting, not old and sickly and wasting away in his bedchamber in the palace, tended by Urmila and her maids and the royal vaids, a pale shadow of his own self.

What else was death by natural causes if not a kind of war as well? A war against disease, old age, chronic debilitation or injury, old wounds and new ailments? If he must die fighting, he would rather fight foes he could face with a sword and a bow, rather than those invisible demons of the flesh and physis that slaughtered you piece by piece without ever showing themselves or abiding by the kshatriya code of battle. Phshaw! That was no death for any warrior, male or female, mortal or otherwise. He would rather be fighting this way from now until the end of his days, whether that end came today or a hundred years hence.

But if there was one thing he did fear, it was a needless war. Violence without purpose or necessity. Like any kshatriya who had been bloodied in battle on myriad occasions, Lakshman loathed violence. Contradictory as that might seem, he knew that it was the very essence of the warrior code. A warrior's dharma was not to fight or kill or maim for the sake of doing so. It was to do so when all other means to communicate failed and one's enemy threatened one's life, one's loved ones and one's homeland with certain death and destruction. Violence and war were the final steps in a human tragedy. The kusalavya bards might sing their songs from city to city and extol the praises of epic warriors—such as Rama himself and even he, Lakshman—from now till the end of time; it would not change the fact that war was a brutal terrible tragedy, nothing more or less. The only victor in a war was death itself. Only Lord Yama could walk a battlefield after the conflict ended and claim to have won. Any other claim of victory was a sham.

And yet, one went to war when one had to, when there was no other way to survive, to protect one's own, to defend one's land.

Was this campaign they were embarking upon, this grand Ashwamedha yagna, a necessary one? Would it serve its stated purpose and unite all the various factions of the Kosala nation and neighbouring principalities as well, or would it simply be seen as a naked act of aggression. An open declaration of war to serve Rama's intentions of building an empire? Might it not be misconstrued to be the very opposite of what it was intended to be, as things often were in this world? And what then? Total war with all Aryavarta? With their own fellow Aryas, Bharatas, call them whatever one desired? Unite them at the point of a sword? Compel them to bow symbolically to the magnificent black horse – and, by implication, to Samrat Rama Chandra as well? Or, if they refused to acknowledge the horse and to let it pass freely to rove across their lands, symbolizing Rama's claim over those territories, then what? Round them up like stray kine and force them to bow?

Lakshman's bond with Rama was such that it far exceeded any normal mortal standard of loyalty. He would do every single thing he was told or expected to do, regardless of the consequences. But he was deeply concerned about some of Rama's recent decisions; particularly those that he felt might have adverse effects on Rama's own well-being.

In particular, this Ashwamedha campaign troubled him greatly. It was too loud a statement of imperial might and power, too provocative a display. He feared it might well stoke the fires of disagreement and churlishness into a full-blown rebellion. He was glad that the horse had chosen to head South at the outset rather than North. Had the stallion gone the other way, the pahadi tribes and the rugged Himalayan clans would have taken it as an outright taunt and come roaring down to do battle. Blood would have been shed before the horse could go more than a few dozen yojanas. Thankfully, the nations to the immediate South of Ayodhya were less belligerent and might be more prudent in their response to the yagna. At least, he hoped so.

He was also deeply uncomfortable with the deviation from the ritual. As per Vedic ritual, the Ashwamedha yagna had to be initiated by the Queen Consort in order to be fruitful. That meant Sita, of course, because Rama had no other wives or concubines. Lakshman knew for a fact that Rama had not so much as laid hands on another woman with that intent since Sita's departure. Since only the King's own consort could undertake the ritual, that left a void. The purohits had urged Rama not to undertake the yagna as it would be inauspicious to do so in the Queen's absence. One or two bold pundits had even suggested—timidly and with appropriate deference—that perhaps Rama might choose to take a wife in order to fulfill the ritual requirement. After all, Arya kings were required by dharma to produce progeny, especially heirs, and Rama had none.

Rama would not hear of it, of course. Instead, he had ordered that a life-size effigy be made of Sita, carved from jet black lohitanite—the famed ironwood of the Sarayu Valley—and fixed upon a one-horse chariot. The statue had been used as a stand-in for the ritual, despite the disapproving protests of the purohits, and it was that same statue that now followed close behind the unbridled horse at the head of the great procession winding its way out of Ayodhya.

He twisted in his saddle to look back at the endless rows of foot-soldiers stretching out along the raj-marg as far as the eye could see, over the rise of Seventh Hill, and down to the Sarayu Valley, stretching yojanas back towards Ayodhya—and yojanas up ahead as well. The chariots and horse regiments had already gone on ahead and the elephants were being taken by a different route to avoid congesting the raj-marg further. The sheer logistics of the campaign were mind-boggling and if not for the rote obedience of Ayodhya's troops, this undertaking would have been impossible. As it was, there would be a line of grama-trains following behind the army, stretching back all the way to Ayodhya, in order to keep this enormous fauj supplied and fed.

He spurred his horse into a canter, moving up the rise and beyond the Sarayu Valley in moments. Ahead lay the mist-shrouded silhouette of Mithila Bridge. The spray produced by the impact of the roaring white waters striking the rocks below cast a perpetual mist-shroud over the bridge. Seen now at this angle, with the rising sun peeping over the eastern horizon, the infinite droplets of water suspended in mid air caught the sunlight and refracted it, turning the air around the bridge into a glittering veil of diamonds, rubies, emeralds and sapphires. It was a sight to behold. After being shown this same sight as young boys, Rama and he had taken to riding out here to view the sunrise over Mithila Bridge every day for a week, even though they had been forbidden at the time to go outside the Sarayu Valley. That was before they had achieved the age of seven and turned old enough to go to Guru Vashishta's gurukul for formal education. Lakshman leaned on his pommel and smiled at the thought: those had been some of the best years of his life. The world had been filled with infinite wonder and hope, the impossible had seemed possible, the sky had loomed larger and bluer, the river's cool water an elixir of youth, and they had been princes of the earth and all upon it. Princes of Ayodhya.

The smile faded slowly as he remembered who and where he was and the many duties, chores and obligations of his post returned to clamour for his attention and time. He was still a Prince, and Rama now a Emperor, not just a King. But nothing was the same again. Even the mesmerizing beauty of the sunlight refracting through the mist over Mithila Bridge seemed like a tawdry effect produced by a travelling theatre troupe for an hour's entertainment. Those two boys who had sat thus upon this very ridge, chins resting on their palms, elbows on their pommels, gazing at this very sight with ecstatic rapture...those boys were long gone. And with them, all that they felt and hoped and dreamed was gone as well.

Lakshman shook his head to clear it of foolish fancies and childhood memories. Twisting his horse's bit a little harder than was needed, he rode down the raj-marg past the endless lines of soldiers, picking up pace as he went. Some sipahis raised their wooden shields instinctively to avoid being struck across the face by the pebbles and stray stones kicked up by his horse as he passed, one of the routine hazards of foot travel on the king's highway. The majority didn't even bother with the shields and trudged on in the infinitely plodding way of all foot soldiers.

By the time he reached Mithila Bridge, he had forgotten all about those childhood mornings spent watching this magical sight from the ridge. Like the ridge itself, those idyllic childhood days were behind him now. He rode onwards, leaving them both behind.

The head of the procession had reached the junction where the raj-marg forked in three directions: one road went on over the hilly ranges to Mithila, another went west, and the third went east. The chariot with the black wax statue was almost at the crossroads as Lakshman came riding up at a brisk canter. The sarathi driving it was none other than the old pradhan mantri Sumantra, his straggly white hair tied behind his head, his large bald spot shiny with perspiration. He glanced back as Lakshman came up beside him, then jerked his head, pointing.

Lakshman looked in that direction and saw the black stallion stopped by the side of the crossroads, head lowered, munching kusa grass. He looked like any wild horse ranging freely, stopping where he pleased, foraging when he desired. And he was free. The great army following behind him was none of his concern after all. The whole point of the Ashwamedha yagna was that the horse represented Rama and that Rama was free to go where he pleased. It was only when he was stayed by any man's hand that it represented a challenge to Ayodhya's sovereignty and could be regarded as tantamount to a declaration of war.

Lakshman fervently hoped that no man would be foolish or rebellious enough to stay the stallion. Declaring war against Ayodhya was one thing; challenging the might of this great army was suicide. This was no mere token force symbolizing the sovereignty of Ayodhya, as the horse ritual customarily required; it was the entire fighting strength of the nation! There had rarely been a precedent for such a massive display of military might, if only because most chieftains and tribal leaders might rightly view it as exceeding the requirements of the Vedic rite and amounting to imperialistic aggression. Which, Lakshman admitted regretfully, it was indeed.

He glanced back at the winding line, stretching back across the gently undulating dips and rises of the raj-marg, like a great serpent snaking its way across the land. Like the serpent it resembled, its sole intention was to swallow the independent nations and tribes of the Bharata world alive.

"If we stand here, the line will have to stop," he said to Sumantra, leaning over the rim of the chariot. "And if the line stops..."

Sumantra nodded. A veteran of more logistical operations than Lakshman had year-notches on his life-stick, he was well aware of the problems that would arise if such a large juggernaut had to stop and stand for even a few minutes. The resulting congestion and confusion would snarl up the raj-marg for hours. The best thing for such a huge force was to keep it moving, constantly moving, stopping only when they reached one of the designated overnight campsites. The old face turned eastwards, catching the sunlight which unkindly limned every one of the myriad lines and creases of the aged statesman's features. In his own quiet, unassuming way, Sumantra was part of the unselfishly dedicated system that had kept Ayodhya functioning through every crisis, war and outbreak. Men and women like he were the backbone of the nation and of Arya civilization itself. The basic tenet of Vedic philosophy: to do one's duty without concern or desire for the fruits of one's labours, was rarely better exemplified than in men like Sumantra.

“Lord Bhadra has given instructions that if the horse should stop, it is to be encouraged,” he said quietly to Lakshman. Even though there was nobody within hearing distance—the first row of cavalry was several yards behind them—it was evident that he was speaking the words for Lakshman’s ears only.

Lakshman glanced at him curiously. They were not supposed to lead or guide the horse, merely to follow it. But Sumantra already knew that better than he: he had presided over the Ashwamedha yagnas performed by Lakshman’s own father Dasaratha decades ago. What did this odd instruction from Bhadra mean?

“Encouraged...?” Lakshman asked, nonplussed.

Sumantra nodded, his ragged white eyebrows almost concealing his dark brown eyes, but said nothing further.

Lakshman glanced back at the stallion. The animal took hold of a fresh clump of green kusa grass with his teeth, yanking it out slowly, then threw his head back and began munching on it happily. Frothy cud dripped from the sides of his mouth. He looked like he could stay there in that little patch of meadow beside the crossroads all day long. His tail twitched rhythmically, shooing off a swarm of midges and mites.

Lakshman considered the location where the stallion had chosen to partake of its impromptu repast. If the animal were to go eastwards as the raj-marg itself led, it would end up in Videha territory, the sister nation to Kosala. That would mean a direct challenge to Mithila, sister city of Ayodhya, seat of the moonwood throne of the Chandravanshi dynasty and ancient ally to Ayodhya, seat of the sunwood throne of the Suryavansha dynasty. Maharaja Janak of Mithila was the very opposite of an aggressive king; he had disbanded his army years ago, employing only a reserve guard and relying on a citizen’s militia that adored their liege and his kind paternal regime so fiercely that they acted as a better deterrent than any salaried army. Not a soul in the Videha nation would raise so much as a finger of aggression against Ayodhya, or attempt to captivate the sacred stallion on its ritual course; but in the unlikely event that there were to be an incident on Videha land, it would lead to terrible, undesirable consequences. Maharaja Janaka was not merely the kindest, most spiritually enlightened and humanitarian Arya king in all Aryavarta, he was also Lakshman's and his brothers' father-in-law, for all four sons of Dasaratha were married to Janak's daughters or adoptive daughters.

Including my banished sister-in-law, he thought with a twinge of sadness even after all these years.

For the stallion to tread on Videha land, or so much as turn its head toward Mithila, could well bode disaster.

On the other hand, were the beast to head south and west, it would then pass through the great Naimisha-van forest, bordering the great central aranya—the Arya term for uncivilized and unsettled wilderness – and would transgress no borders or boundaries.

Lakshman knew the old pradhan mantri well enough to understand when he was attempting to communicate much more than he was able to say aloud. Sumantra was telling him that Bhadra—and no doubt the rest of the War Council—wanted the horse to stray into friendly territory, to provoke an incident and justify annexure. It was a heart-stopping thought but, he realized with a sinking heart, also the logical corollary of the yagna itself. The Ashwamedha yagna was not conducted merely to remind existing vassals of the king's dominance; it was intended as a campaign of expansion and consolidation. His heart raced as he considered the horror of invoking outright war with his wife's homeland. Unthinkable! Yet not for Bhadra, Jabali and those other war-mongers. He had heard them speak lasciviously of Videha's considerable wealth as well as its lack of a standing armed force. Clearly, this was the first phase of their plans of empirical 'expansion'. If they could give instructions for the horse to be 'encouraged' into Videha lands, they could as easily arrange for a few mercenaries to captivate the horse and justify Ayodhya's declaration of war against the Videha nation for that transgression. In the horror that followed, it would hardly matter whether or not the men who stopped the horse had been Videha citizens or Kosala citizens or neither—their dead bodies would be all the evidence needed to inflame Videha's passions and cause their citizen militia to take up arms in their own defense.

On the other hand, if a horse could be encouraged to go in one direction, it could as easily be encouraged to go in another.

Lakshman smiled.

He glanced at Sumantra who looked at him with interest. Lakshman knew that the old statesman was sharp enough to have followed a similar line of thought, even if he might not see Lakshman's solution to the problem. But Sumantra said nothing.

In turn, Lakshman himself dared not speak his thoughts aloud: he knew the efficacy of Rama's spases too well to risk being caught saying the wrong thing himself. As the Enforcer of the law, it would not do for him to be caught subverting the imperial diktat. And Bhadra's word was no less than Rama's word.

Lakshman unslung his bow, put an arrow to the string and aimed at a rotting tree trunk lying at the edge of a thicket. It was just beyond the patch where the stallion grazed, the line of fire passing just behind the sacred horse itself. With a single motion, he loosed the arrow, sending it flying just behind the rump of the sacred stallion. The horse was never in danger: Lakshman was a master bowman. The arrow missed the beast by a clear inch or three, passing through the small cloud of midges around the stallion's rear, but the wind and violence of its passing were enough for the sensitive creature to instantly lurch forward, its grazing forgotten.

A clump of half-chewed kusa grass fell from its open jaws as it neighed softly in dismay, then, with the inevitable skittishness of the equine species, it neighed twice more, sidling sideways nervously, then picked up its heels in a brisk trot, heading in a south-westerly direction. Precisely the opposite direction from the arrow that had grazed its rump. Towards the great central aranya of Naimisha-van and the Southwoods that lay beside and below it. No-man's land. And certainly, no king's.

Lakshman looked back at Sumantra. The old minister smiled approvingly, then dropped one bushy-browed lid in a loud wink.

Lakshman winked back, then rode on after the horse, into the woods.

Ayodhya followed.

THREE

Nakhudi and Bejoo made their way carefully through the woods on horseback, Nakhudi leading the way as she knew these forests and he did not. That is to say, he knew the paths and the raj-marg well enough, but they had left those behind a long way back. They were now in uncharted terrain and if not for Nakhudi, Bejoo had no doubt that he and his band could be wandering in these woods for weeks without being able to find their way.

Bejoo glanced back from time to time at the riders following them. The forest floor was littered with leaves that had been dampened by a shower or two that morning and the mulch formed a carpet that muffled their hoofbeats. Apart from the occasional snicker or whinny of a horse, there was almost no sound to indicate that almost a hundred men were making their way through the woods on horseback. Had they been young brash recruits like the ones he had commanded on that last grama-train, he had no doubt they would be drinking and laughing and bantering loudly enough to wake up the entire forest for miles around and alert anyone who might be ahead that they were coming.

But these were Purana Wafadars in truth, not merely in name like those new upstarts who wore the purple-and-black without having earned the colours. Every single man here was known personally to Bejoo, several older than he, veterans of war before he was so much as a suckling babe on his Maatr's arm. All had seen battle numerous times and suffered injuries ranging from greivous to maiming, forcing them to retire from active duty and enter the PF regiments. Many had had the pleasure of serving directly under Saprem Senapati Dheeraj Kumar during the heydey of the PFs. Now, Dheeraj Kumar was long gone, en route to his ancestors, and it was his son Drishti Kumar who was now Saprem Senapati, two of his grandsons Captains of the King's Guard, a grand-daughter a Captain of the Queen's Guard, and numerous other grandsons and grand-daughters serving their nation in other martial capacities. At least three men in the group following Bejoo now had served under Maharaja Dasaratha himself in the Last Asura Wars, which made them old enough to be Bejoo's grandfather.

He knew one closely: old veteran Somasra had not had much to do with his days since being retired from his charge as gate keeper of the First Gate, no less, and Bejoo's duties as grama-rakshak had involved much downtime between trips. They had both spent many pleasant hours together faffing over mugs of various beverages. When he had gone to Somasra and asked him if he wanted an opportunity to do more than just faff, the old veteran had glanced at him without a word, risen to his feet, grunting briefly as he wrested something wrapped in an old dust-layered length of cloth off a high shelf, then unwrapped it slowly and carefully to reveal a pike of a design Bejoo had never seen before. The seal of the Suryavansha Ikshwakus was unmistakable, melded into the base of the pole, and Somasra had flipped the weapon over with an expert, heart-stopping ease to show it to him.

Bejoo had raised his eyebrows in response, knowing a royal prize when he saw one, knowing also that such prizes had been handed out last by Maharaja Dasaratha during the Last Asura Wars and then only to those who distinguished themselves in battle. He felt his throat thicken as he realized what that meant. If there was a higher honour for any kshatriya serving in Ayodhya's armed forces now or in the past three quarters of a century, he did not know of it.

He glanced back and saw Somasra two men behind him and to his right at a diagonal. The old gatekeeper dipped his grizzled jaw at him, and Bejoo nodded back. He made out the long length of the pike rising behind the man, sheathed behind the old PFs saddle and ready for use. He wondered if he would get to see Somasra use the weapon and hoped not.

In fact, he hoped this entire exercise would pass off peacably. The intention was to prevent violence, not to perpetrate it.

After what seemed to be another yojana or so of slow maneuvering through thickly growing woods—it was difficult to judge how far one had travelled in such deep forest—Nakhudi finally held up her hand. Bejoo imitated her gesture, glancing back to make sure the others had seen his action. They had already reined in their mounts. He felt a flicker of pride. Ayodhya's veterans were still sharp of eye and clear of mind and undoubtedly wise. Almost as a counterpoint he thought: If only her youth were even half as wise. He knew that the exercise they were about to undertake might well save lives; but he also knew that if things turned bad, these hundred lives and his own would be the least of the fatalities in the days to come.

Nakhudi beckoned him forward. Since she had dismounted, he dismounted as well and walked his horse to where she waited. He looked over her shoulder but could see nothing ahead but endless rows of trees and shrubbery, identical to the yojanas of forest they had travelled through already.

“Something is wrong,” she said. “There is someone in the camp.”

“Someone?” he asked, puzzled. “What do you mean, someone?”

She glanced at him with a look of unmasked irritation. “If I knew, I would have said who it was, wouldn’t I?”

He bit his lip. It had been a long time since a woman had snapped at him. It reminded him of his long-dead wife, died in a fever epidemic almost fifteen years ago. She had been the only woman to roundly berate him on a regular basis, especially when he demonstrated one of his habitual flaws, of which, he had to admit, he had several. It had been how she expressed her love for him mingled with the exasperation of a very long marital relationship—they had been together over fifty years when she died.

He said nothing, waiting for Nakhudi to go on.

When she spoke again, she sounded gruffly contrite. “I didn’t mean to cut your throat. I just don’t like this whole situation. There is too much at stake. I care about these people. They are the only family, clan, nation, call them what you will, that I have left.”

“Grama,” he said.

She looked at him.

“Grama,” he explained. “The original grouping of families linked by blood, marriage and comradeship. They travelled from place to place, living off the land, joining together to fend for themselves and one another. An extended family. It was the basis of early Arya society. The gramas went travelling across such vast distances, to this date, nobody knows for certain where they started from. The poets argue even now if they originated here in Bharata-varsha and then later migrated North-Westwards, or originated in those far Northern lands and then travelled here.”

She looked taken aback at this unsolicited information, raising her eyebrows. “Were there arrowposts?”

He frowned. “Arrowposts?”

“Arrows, shot into tree trunks by the roadside to show which way to go next, an old traveler’s trick to help those following stay on the trail.”

“I don’t understand.”

She waved in exasperation. “The poets can argue all they want. As far as I know, unless someone posted arrows directing everyone to go only this way or that, people go where they please when they please. In my culture, we don’t call that migration, we call it wandering the land in search of greener pastures.”

He thought about that for a moment. “Interesting. But—”

She held up one large dark palm and for a moment he thought she was about to smack him in the mouth. “Do you mind? We can debate itihasa later. Right now, I wish to make sure my people are all safe and well.” She paused. “My grama, as you so eloquently put it. I shall go ahead through there,” she pointed, “and I need you to split the group into two and circle around through there and there,” pointing twice more, “and then wait for my wolf-whistle before showing yourselves. Clear?”

He nodded. She flashed a dark grin at him and slipped away, moving with surprising ease and stealth for a woman her size. He wondered again how much of that considerable height and bulk was muscle and sinew, and how much...well, womanly splendor would be the polite term.

He thought he might not mind having a chance to find out.

The strangers did not appear slashing swords and loosing arrows as Luv had feared. That itself was something of a shock.

When Kush had called him back to alert the pack and he to the arrival of strangers, he had assumed it was one of those nauseating bear killer gangs come around these parts again. He intensely disliked those people and could not understand for the life of him why Maharishi Valmiki permitted them to visit. Somehow, gurudev always seemed tense and uncomfortable when they were around, but after they left, his mood lightened considerably and he would even display a rare smile at times.

Once, when Rishi Dumma, who was prone to opening his mouth before he had thought his words through, had commented archly, “Mlechhas!” as the bearkillers left the camp, grinning lewdly and speaking raucously in the vulgar way they had. Several of the other rishis had sniffed in agreement and even the brahmacharyas had bobbed their bald heads, their little chchottis wagging.

Even the twins knew the word was the most derogatory one any Arya could use, meaning barbarians or uncivilized people. And if Dumma was justified in using it to describe anyone, the bearkillers certainly qualified. But to their surprise, and everyone else’s, Maharishi Valmiki had swatted Dumma lightly across his shoulder, and said gruffly, “There but for the grace of Brahma, go you and I.” Then he walked away, retiring to his hut. But he had been in an exceptionally good mood for days afterwards and had even given the twins a holiday from their kavya practise.

Nobody quite knew what to make of that comment. Did Maharishi Valmiki mean that anyone might become a bearkiller? That was impossible! Why would a brahmin, sworn to a life of yogic ritual fasting, penance, meditation and the pursuit of learning, suddenly take up the tools of violence and start killing the innocent animals of the forest? Brahmins had no use for earning, and were content to beg for their needs if unable to provide for themselves – or to starve. In any case, their calling exalted fasting and starvation. And even if they changed varnas, as some brahmins did, to take up tradecraft or statecraft or even the use of weapons, surely they would pursue more honourable occupations than merely animal slaughter? It was unfathomable. Yet nobody dared question the guru or even discuss the matter behind his back. So, after several perplexed looks were cast around by all present, the ashramites returned to their respective chores – there were always chores to be done in an ashram – and thought no more of it.

But Kush and Luv had never forgotten that day or that statement, and had known instinctively that it had a deeper significance than anyone else realized.

Now, he saw the first of the strangers come into view even as the dogs flew into a frenzy, leaping and jumping and rolling in the air with the foamy jaws and gaping snarls of a pack ready to fight to the death if need be. And with a grim heart, he saw that they were indeed bearkillers. Those ragged clothes, stained deeply crimson-black with the blood of countless slaughtered animals, those rusting axes and long barbed-point spears they favoured, and those filthy faces with broken yellow teeth flashing in grinning mouths, the plaited hair plastered with tree sap in a mockery of Shaivite tapasvi sadhus...yes, they were bearkillers, all right. Luv even recognized a face or two as having been part of that same troupe that had visited the ashram some moons earlier, especially that one, a tall lanky man with a horribly scarred face but surprisingly clean and perfect teeth that flashed brightly against his dark face. He plaited his hair in a particular way that reminded Luv of a procession of Tantric Sadhus he had seen once, passing by as Kush and he waited for a grama-train. The man had seemed to be the leader of the bearkillers, from his bearing and manner on their last visit. It was he who had gone in with gurudev into his hut for a private talk – although what Maharishi Valmiki and a bearkiller could have to talk about, nobody in the ashram could guess at, not even Rishi Dumma who was usually quite adept at coming up with outlandish explanations for anything under the sun that he didn't understand.

Luv kept his arrow pointed at that ugly face, tightening his draw, ready to drop the man on the spot. The dogs were going crazy and he had no doubt they could take give as good as they got, but he knew that men who were capable of hunting and slaying bears were not likely to be brought down easily by a mere pack of wild dogs. And he would not stand by and let his friends be chopped down brutally by these...these Mlecchas!

He sensed Kush coming to the same conclusion and tightening his draw as well. He also knew that Kush was aiming at the other man, the one to the right of the scarfaced one. That was one of the gifts Kush and he had always possessed, the ability to instinctively know what the other would be thinking, saying or even doing at any point in time. Even taking into account the usual conjoined consciousness of twins—the typical explanation everyone used to explain away their extraordinary feats of coordination—what they had was beyond explanation.

The splitting of targets was a much simpler trick: the scarfaced bearkiller was on the left, as was Luv while the other man was on the right, as was Kush. Even without looking back at Kush's position, Luv could map his possible lines of fire mentally, just as Kush could map his own lines of fire. It just made more sense to split the targets in that manner. As more targets came into view and the choices grew more complex, the decisions to split them grew more complex as well, but they were still based on the time-honoured practise of lines of fire that Arya bowmen had been trained to work with since deva knew how many millennia.

He was itching to loose and put an arrow through that grotesquely mauled scarred face. Just raise your axe to one of Sarama's brood, he thought, and it will be the last time you raise that hand!

But the hand never rose, nor was the axe removed from its sheath on the bearkiller's waist. Instead, the man did a shockingly unexpected thing.

He bent down and allowed the snarling leaping pack of dogs to jump upon him and have at his throat and face, without offering any resistance.

FOUR

The lady Vedavati was playing the veena.

As she picked out the variation on Raga Bhairav, making the melancholy raag sound even more disconsolate and doleful than usual, she felt the peculiar mixture of grief and transcendence that only music could unleash from the depths of the human soul.

The stringed instrument seemed to express her feelings more eloquently than words ever could. Then again, even if words could express what she truly felt, and even if she could find the perfect words to achieve that task, to whom would she address those words?

To Maharishi Valmiki? He was a mentor, a father figure, a guide and guru. There were some things one could not say to such a figure—things one would not want to say.

To the other women of the ashram? Certainly not! They were all wives of devout brahmins, each so pious and absorbed in the daily rituals and chores of ashram life that they were wives and mothers only in the most literal sense. At night, instead of lullabies, they sang mantras to their newborn babes. The life of a kshatriya woman—a warrior princess no less—would be incomprehensible to their religious sensibilities, if not outright offensive. She had to conceal even the fact of her prowess with weapons and intimacy with violence from them, for fear of inviting shock and dismay on a daily basis. While she shared a common gender with the other women of the ashram, she knew that they were completely different kinds of women, almost a different gender altogether and would never be wholly alike.

To Nakhudi? She was a friend, yes, and there had been times when she had cried and pressed her face into Nakhudi's meaty shoulder and had found comfort in her former bodyguard's strength and presence, by the knowledge that she had known her back when she was simply Sita Janaki, the only person apart from Valmiki himself who knew her entire story. But that very intimacy and long-standing relationship also caused her some embarrassment. She enjoyed Nakhudi's company as a friend and equal now, the one woman she could talk to freely and without fear of censure or criticism, the one woman who lived within the general environs of the ashram yet had not renounced life and society altogether. She needed Nakhudi as a companion and friend, and to break down completely and express her heart's deepest, darkest feelings and thoughts would put too great a burden upon that relationship, force Nakhudi to become protective and maternal. As it was, the former bodyguard had a tendency to play the old role again too easily, even slipping and addressing her as "Janaki Devi" or "Princess" at times. Were Sita to yield to these impulses and treat Nakhudi like a confidante of her most intimate fears and sorrows, Nakhudi would certainly feel compelled to take action and address her former mistress's plight; perhaps even do something that would draw undue attention to them all.

And if there was one thing that Sita did not desire, it was attention. Especially the attention of Ayodhya. Cut off though they were in this isolated forest hermitage, deep in the Naimisha van forest, she was nevertheless reasonably well informed. The constant traffic of brahmins and acolytes to and from various other ashrams and cities, distant as well as near, ensured a never-ending supply of news and updates. She had followed the growing hardening of Ayodhya's political position this past decade with growing dismay. And now, when it was believed that the sunwood throne was about to embark on its most ambitious programme of political expansion and consolidation, the last thing she wanted was to draw the scrutiny of that powerful juggernaut upon her tiny community.

She had long ago given up any hope of reconciliation.

For one thing, the very absence of any attempt on His part—she refused to take his name even in her thoughts—to find out where she was, how she was, and more importantly, how their sons were faring, had long ago convinced her that he had hardened his heart and mind and blinded his senses and memory to her very existence. To their very existence. Herself and her sons. What father ignored his wife and sons for ten whole years? What husband turned his back on the woman he had once claimed to love more than life itself so remorselessly? What dharma impelled a grihasta to abandon his family for some obscure ideal of philosophical ethics?

Had Rama cared one whit for them, he would have come to the ashram long ago. Or sent someone at least. The fact that he had not done so was more chilling than the circumstances of her exile itself. Mere abandonment might occur in a moment of extreme anger or rage. But after the anger had cooled, after the rage had dwindled, surely a loving heart would feel some regret, some curiosity, some doubt? If not to admit its own fault—for which man liked to admit he was at fault?—then at least to question if the separation had been warranted. Even a condemned criminal was condemned for a certain length of time. How long was her sentence to be? And what crime had their sons committed even before birth that they were forced to grow up thus, deprived of their birthright, their social status, their dynastic heritage, their community, their home, their father?

These were the unspeakable sorrows she expressed through her playing. Not the pain of being abandoned, exiled, forgotten—that pain had struck her ten years ago like a sword point piercing her heart, as she had watched Lakshman ride away in the chariot, back to Ayodhya, leaving her in the aranya, the wilderness of Rama's abandonment. The sorrow of continued punishment, the danda of being deprived continually, every moment and every day, of her rightful place, upon the throne beside him, in his life, his house, his family, and most of all, within his heart. It was that unspeakable grief that she cried out through the straining instrument, turning heartache into music and music into the voice of womanhood wronged. As the veena softly wept, she smiled in woeful ecstasy, her eyes shut tightly, not a single tear leaving her dark lashes or staining her wheat-brown cheeks. For the veena cried for them both, herself and Rama, for their lost decade, for their lost love, for their lost destiny.

“Milady!”

The voice cut through her playing.

It was one of the ashram women, the wife of Dumma, judging by the sharp, high-pitched voice. The voice was a familiar one, cutting through the daily hustle and bustle of the ashram and the padapad rote chanting of the brahmacharyas on the occasions when Dumma was berated by his spouse for some new buffoonery or other, which, Dumma being Dumma, was almost every other day. But this time her voice was raised not in wifely irritation but in sheer panic. It was that sound of a woman terrified that cut through Sita's desolate mood and brought her back to reality in a thumping instant.

“Milady, soldiers!” cried the voice, with rising terror. “They—”

And then the horrible yet unmistakable sound of a javelin punching through breastbone and flesh, and the wet splatter of bodily content out the other side, followed a moment later by the dull sound of a body falling to the ground.

Sita dropped the veena and sprang to her feet, racing for the back of the hut, reaching for the discreet hole in the ground artfully concealed with straw and covered by a tribal shawl, where she kept her weapons. For she had known that someday this moment would come. She had not expected it to be today. But if it was to be so, then she was prepared for it.

Kush watched in irritated amazement as Sarama and her brood, rather than viciously mauling and attacking the bearkillers, greeted them with adulation and joy instead. They ran from one to the other, wagging their tails, barking and yapping loudly. Sarama herself stood up on her hind legs and actually licked the face of the leader of the gang, who in turn rubbed her shaggy head and back affectionately and whispered sweet words to her. This went on for a few moments as Luv and he watched with growing pique and frustration. He wanted to send an arrow or three through the greasy hands patting the dogs and send the lot of them fleeing for their lives, but there was no call to do so. He loosened the pressure on the bow string, lowering the bow but keeping the arrow still in place, and glanced over at his brother. Luv rolled his eyes and shook his head in disgust, clearly as irritated as he was. They would both be having a word with Sarama about whom she lavished her affections on. Of all the aranya outlaws to befriend, she had to wag her tail at Bearkillers!

The leader of the gang had crouched down to greet the pack. Now that their initial excitement had subsided, he rose slowly to his feet and spoke. He pitched the words in Kush’s direction with surprising accuracy.

“I see you,” he said in a voice loud enough to be heard by both twins, but not loud enough to carry much further. “Do not be afraid, we mean you no harm. We are friends of your Guru Ratnakaran.”

Ratnakaran? Kush glanced at Luv again. Luv shrugged but raised his bow slowly, cocking an eyebrow to let Luv know that they were not to trust these fellows so easily.

“Our guru’s name is Valmiki,” Kush called back in as insolent a tone as he could muster. “And bearkillers can never be friends of our’s.”

The man chuckled, revealing two blackened teeth in the top row. He glanced back at his gang. “You hear that, people? We can never be their friends!”

There were titters of laughter from the group.

Kush sent an arrow past the man’s face, close enough to snip off a tiny lock of his hair and let him feel the wind of the sharpened iron blade whistle past his temple. It went home in the trunk of a teak tree with a dull thwack.

The bearkiller lost his smile. His hand clapped to the side of his head, he said, much louder now: “Stop that! We said we’re friends, didn’t we?”

“Go tell that to all the bears you’ve killed,” Kush replied. Luv had left his spot and was circling around behind the gang. After all, they had spotted Kush somehow and his position was confirmed by his speaking, but they might not still know where Luv had been. “Especially all the little cubs, and the mothers protecting them. Tell them you were just trying to be friends.”

“We haven’t killed any bears,” said another voice. A woman came forward. She had a face marred by heavily pockmarked cheeks and there was something odd about her singlet and the way she held her bow that Kush could not make out right away. “We’re not really bearkillers. We’re outlaws.”

Kush laughed. “That makes me feel much better now. You only murder men, women and children, not bears, is that right?”

“We don’t kill anybody!” said the first bearkiller, the leader. “Unless they come around trying to kill us first!”

“Yes, well, we have the same policy. So if you’ll take your weapons and move on, we don’t want any trouble here, if you please.” Kush considered snipping an errant lock of hair on the man’s right side, to balance the one snipped on the left, then decided against it. He was keeping them occupied while giving Luv time to circle to their rear, not aiming to provoke an all-out fight. He wasn’t scared of facing this bunch, he just didn’t think they were worth the arrows.

“Listen, you snotty nosed little fellow—” started the leader, then stopped as the pockmarked woman raised a hand and said something in his ear. “All right, Ragini, you give it a try.” He settled for glowering in the direction that Kush’s voice was coming from.

The woman he had called Ragini raised both her hands to show her open palms. She took several steps forward, causing Kush to immediately take aim at her: “Please, believe me. We are not bearkillers or brigands in the sense that you mean. We do not murder people to steal their belongings. We are outlaws banished a long time ago to the aranya for various offenses—some unjustly laid accusations, and some genuine crimes as well. But none of that matters now. We are here to warn you and assist you. And we must move quickly as time is scarce.”

Kush suddenly realized what was odd about the woman’s singlet and the way she held her bow. Her chest was bumpy only on one side—it was flat on the other side, the side on which lay the arm with which she pulled her bow-string. He had heard about this from Nakhudi and seen women archers on the raj-marg who had also sliced off one side of their chests in similar fashion. It was the unmistakable sign of a true archer, one who had sacrificed a part of her own flesh in order to be able to hold and pull a bow-string as perfectly as possible. It gave him a little more respect for her.

But he still kept the arrow pointed.

“Whoever you are,” he called out, “we don’t need your warning or your help. Move on. This is your last warning.”

A bird call joined the various sounds of the forest, sustained just a little longer than the gurgling liked to call. That meant Luv was in position and they were ready to take on the bearkillers in a two-way crossfire. Kush’s finger ached to release the arrow, not because holding the string taut for so long was hard, which it was, but because he was suspicious of the motives of these ruffians.

Pockmarked Ragini shook her head. “No, you don’t understand. We are the only ones who can help you now. It was Maharishi Valmiki’s last wish that we should take charge of you and raise you as best as we could in case anything should happen to him. And your mother wanted the same. Will you not heed the last words of your own mother and guru?”

Last words? A chill blade slashed through Kush’s nether regions, forcing him to lower the bow and loosen his hold on the string. If there was anything the bearkillers could possibly say that would cause him to lower his guard, that was it. What did she mean? Surely she didn’t mean that Gurudev and Maatra were...?

“THEY LIE, KUSH! Do not fall for their trick! Attack now!”

The voice was Luv’s and it came from the rear of the bearkillers. Kush had never known his brother to give away his position before—nor had he himself ever done so—but he also knew from the way he felt after hearing the woman Ragini’s words that Luv was hugely upset, and angry. And that, like him, he had come to the natural conclusion.

Wretched bearkillers attacked the ashram and killed everyone!

He raised his bow again, pulling the arrow tighter than before, taking aim not on the pockmarked woman’s shoulder as he had earlier but at her throat now. One more incensing word from her and she would be dead before the air left her lungs.

But before he could loose, a sound came to them from across the tree tops. A sound that he knew well, for Luv and he had often produced that same sound too, practising it until Maharishi Valmiki was satisfied that they could do so even under duress and at a sufficiently loud volume to be heard miles away from the ashram.

It was the sound of a conch shell trumpet, issuing the call that signaled the ashram was in mortal distress.

FIVE

Nakhudi fought the rising sense of outrage and fury that threatened to engulf her as she walked through the settlement. The rational part of her mind reminded her that she ought to have been more circumspect and circled the village first, making sure that none of the attackers were still around. But once she had seen and smelled the horror that was all that remained of her people, all rational thought had fled her mind.

And if they were still around, she would dearly love to meet them face to face! And to do more than simply ask them how and why they could massacre an entire settlement—her grama, as Bejoo had aptly called it—of impoverished forest dwelling people, the majority of whom were women, children and elderly. Barely a fourth of them had been men of fighting age and fitness, and even those had been no match for the strength and weaponry of trained Ayodhyan soldiers. The hundred-odd people with whom she had resided here in this little clearing, sharing food, clothing, shelter, resources as readily as members of one large extended family, had been outcasts—some literally out-caste, forced out from Ayodhya itself following the rise of the subtle but increasingly belligerent bias against lower castes and mixed castes that had begun in recent years, others criminals and outlaws with broken bodies and battered minds who had been released from the dungeons and prisons of the great shining capital city in some generous fit of amnesty, yet were unemployable due to the years or decades of disease, privation and abuse endured in their incarceration.

The irony of the system of justice meted out by the current regime was that while the hardened criminals stayed on in the city to pursue illicit trades, those who had had their bellyfull of crime and punishment, and were therefore rehabilitated in the truest sense of the term, preferred to leave the city that had been so harsh to them and retreated into self-imposed exile from the glories of Arya civilization. Each year, more and more severely punished people, some brutalized for the most minor of offenses, ended up in ashrams or settlements such as this one. Sometimes, a few found companionship, camaraderie, even love and kinship over time, and slowly, painfully, the wounds of their own past misdemeanours and the terrible dandas initiated, enforced and inflicted under the iron rule of the King of Dharma, healed partially. They were hardly people in the proud 'Arya' sense of the word, but they had been people once, and they were human still. And most of all, alive. Or at least they had been until a few days ago, when she had left this settlement, filling the crisp forest air with the spicy aroma of their cookfires, their laughter and rough talk. These had been simple people; broken people even, bent down and battered by the might and power of Rama's rigid interpretations of dharma and the consequences of straying from that hard path, but still people.

Now, they were just corpses. Food for the vermin and the worms.

She walked through the smoking, scorched, broken, cracked and battered ruins of the score of humble thatch-and-mud huts that had served as the domiciles of those dregs of society. Each reluctant step took her past a new horror: children lying in one another's arms or their mother's embrace, eyes open and filled with blood, faces splattered with the effluents of their own or loved ones' gaping wounds, severed limbs, speared bodies, butchered corpses...Tears slipped past her iron veil of self-control and spilled from her eyes as she recognized faces, profiles, or, in some awful cases, limbs and tattered garments. From the way the bodies were strewn and cut down, it was obvious that the attack had been sudden, brutal and swift. Many of the fatal cuts had been inflicted on the backs of the heads and torsos of the victims, suggesting that they had been turning away or running from the attackers. Around her, the looming trees and lush forest seemed to echo with the memories of screams and pitiful cries that must have rung out only hours earlier. She could almost hear familiar voices, crying out in anguish and mortal terror.

She paused when she saw a living figure up ahead, her sword already out and ready, rising to deal out the vengeance she ached to deliver, but realized at once that it was only Bejoo. The vajra captain looked sallow faced and as grim as she felt, his grizzled jaw tight with his own anger. His eyes met her's then cut away at once in shame. She might not think of herself as Ayodhyan, or even as "Arya" in the purest sense of the term, but he did, and she could see that it pained him greatly to witness such dishonourable butchery committed by fellow Aryas, let alone fellow Ayodhyans.

He had circled around as instructed by her—she could see the other men holding back in the trees, probably on his orders—and was examining a dozen-odd corpses laying in a ragged line on the ground. This was the rough pathway that led eventually to the raj-marg, or Mithila Road, as it was called by her people, and it was the direction from which the attackers had surely come.

He crouched down beside one body, which she recognized with a small shock as having been Nandu, the white-haired elder who functioned as a kind of roughshod chief of the little community. He was examining the footmarks on the ground and reading the trail. She crouched beside him, steeling herself to ignore the stench of the corpses, left out in the open for at least a day and already ripening, and read the signs as well.

“There were a great many of them,” she said, “at least a hundred healthy heavily armed men on horseback.”

She rose and walked further up the winding trail that led through natural gaps in the trees. Forest folk followed an unwritten covenant not to cut down healthy trees merely to make way for themselves; they respected the forest too much for that. As it was, the forest made way for them to live in it and supported their existence. The least they could do was protect and serve it as best as possible. This meant that the trail was a long winding one that did not follow any of the usual geometrical patterns of man-made roads. It also made riding along it on horseback a challenge—unless one knew the way intimately.

“They came down the trail, riding quickly without stopping.” She glanced at Bejoo as she spoke, walking quickly as she continued to read the signs on the trees and ground—snapped branches, cracked twigs, hoofprints embedded in mulch, chipped bark on a tree trunk where the edge of a sheathed weapon had nicked it accidentally while passing, a hundred other indicators that she could read as clearly as a brahmin could interpret Sanskrit neatly printed on a scroll.

Bejoo nodded to show he understood: for such a large group, so heavily burdened, to have come through this winding forest “path” on horseback at such a speed, meant that they had a guide who knew the way. Her grama had been betrayed. By whom? And why?

“They were here for one reason only, to slaughter,” she said, for it was evident that the attackers had left as soon as they were done killing every last man, woman and child in the settlement. “The men of the grama tried to mount a resistance, to draw the attackers away from their families, but were encircled in a chakravyuh and slaughtered to the last man.”

Bejoo nodded. As a veteran ex-military man, he knew that a chakravyuh—a complex encircling attack technique—was unique to Arya military forces. It confirmed that the attackers were not merely some armed gang of bandits or marauders passing by, but heavily armed and healthy soldiers on well-fed mounts come here for the express purpose of murdering the entire village.

Nakhudi’s trail-reading had taken the better part of an hour and led her on a winding route around and to the south-west of the settlement. She was aware of Bejoo’s men following them discretely, spread out through a wide swathe of forest, the better to ensure that they were not encircled and trapped or ambushed by the same attackers. She was glad for his presence and his military acumen, for right now, her entire consciousness and being were filled with only the raging desire for vengeance.

“And once their butchery was done,” she said, pausing beside a tree with a low-hanging branch on which several twigs had been snapped and lay, freshly broken and trampled by horse hooves on the beaten ground below, “they did not go back the way they came. Instead, they took this route, towards...”

She broke off, her eyes widening, heart racing. Her sword hand rose, fist tightening on the pommel. She sensed Bejoo react, turning to look at her in evident alarm.

“What?” he asked. “Speak, woman!”

“Guru Valmiki’s ashram,” she said. “They are headed for the ashram!”

And then she began running.

Sita knew better than to go running out of her hut—straight into the waiting blades of the enemy. For no matter who or why they were, the screams and unmistakable sounds of weaponry and slaughter from outside clearly announced that enemies were in the ashram. She had faced violent opposition frequently and regularly enough in her life not to waste time questioning the how, why and wherefore of it, merely to act in a manner designed to ensure her own survival and the survival of those she loved.

Which was why she did not run across the threshold of her hut.

Instead, she kicked aside the earthen pot of water she used for drinking and cleaning hands and faces, shattering it with one expert blow, and pushed at the thatched panel at the bottom of the back wall. It rose up on a hinge made from two sections of half-bamboo ingeniously interlocked to allow just so much movement in one direction, opening an exit just large enough for her to crawl through – more than sufficient for her sons to slip through.

She went through with practiced ease, her slender form in better physical condition than it had ever been in her life. Not quite the hard, overworked lithely muscular form of her days in Janasthana or Chitrakut, but nevertheless slim, fit and strong enough to fight to save her own life and the lives of her sons if they needed saving.

Or the lives of others.

The back of the hut looked out upon a steep fall-off that in turn overlooked a narrow winding path that led down to the river Sona. She had built her hut in this location for this precise reason: Isolated from the rest of the ashram, discretely tucked away just behind a line of trees, its natural materials and the artful construction made it appear to be a part of the hillside rather than a man-made structure. Even if the enemy knew where to look and found it, they could only approach it from the front. The steep fall-off at the back was unclimbable because of the soft yielding earth, dampened by rain part of the year and deliberately dampened by Sita herself in the dry seasons.

She glanced out over the edge, careful not to step too close to the mushy rim, and was relieved to see no armed soldiers rushing up the path from the river. That suggested that the attack was not directed at her or her sons. That was good, that was very good. No matter how artful or expert she might be in the ways of survival, there was no true way to defend oneself from direct, sustained assault. Especially not when one was genuinely a penniless penitent living in a hermitage in the forest.

That meant that this was some random attack by brigands or dacoits. Or unknown forces with an unknown agenda.

She had torn off the lower part of her modestly flowing garment to free her legs for quicker movement. Now, she unwrapped the tribal blanket and extracted its treasures. In the aranya, weapons were more precious than gold or jewels. One could use weapons to ensure one's survival, or to hunt and feed, which was the same thing; however, there was nothing here to be buy even if one possessed all the gold and precious gems in the world!

She slung the rig, packed tight with carefully crafted arrows, made by herself, Nakhudi and the twins and replenished weekly after their training sessions. Each of them had their own cache, although Nakhudi and the boys took their's around openly, while she kept her's stored secretly and only brought it out for her daily practise sessions.

She strung the bow with quick expert actions, slinging it over the same left shoulder as the rig. Then she unsheathed the sword and the short iron pike with the specially designed grip-guards that doubled as shortblades, and she was ready.

But she took a moment to listen and orient herself to what was going on, or at least what she could discern by way of hearing at least. Once she went around the hut and exposed herself, she might be fighting for her life, and it was worth taking a moment or two to learn as much as she could about whom she was fighting and what they might want.

The entire process until now—from reacting to Dumma's wife's screams to this moment of total readiness —had taken only a few moments. The shouts and yells and sounds of men and metal and horses had continued unabated. The ashram housed over four dozen inhabitants, and there was a party of another two dozen just arrived from Thiruvanthapuram. And if there was one thing brahmins were well versed to doing, it was raising their voices. All those years of chanting and reciting nonstop all day long had conditioned them to be able to raise a great hue and cry in this time of crisis. The sheer sound level from across the ashram suggested a few hundred people rather than merely six dozen. From what she could make out, all that noise and uproar was not merely screams and crying out; many of the brahmins, particularly the senior rishis and maharishis, were not men or women to fear kshatriyas and their violence. They were berating the attackers loudly and unequivocally, several issuing shraaps and eternal curses in the names of various deities. It was a bold and godless dacoit who could withstand such an onslaught of priestly curses, she knew, and the fact that she could still hear sounds of violence and screams of agony punctuating the cacophony meant that whomever these men were, they were dangerous, deadly men come here with the express intention of committing the crime of brahmin-hatya. Priest-killing was not something most kshatriyas did lightly and it meant that the men were most likely mercenaries working for coin, and with no scruples or attachment to any nation, liege or other loyalties. That was not good, not good at all.

She wished Nakhudi and the twins were with her right now, or at the very least, were in some place far away, secure and isolated. The canyon. She must get them to the canyon. That was a defensible position. There, they could hold off even a small army if need be, or at least defend themselves until they ran out of arrows and replenishment.

But they were not here, and she was. And she was the only person in the ashram capable of fighting back against these intruders, whomever they might be. Those were her daily companions dying out there, and she could not simply run away and leave them to their fate. Moreover, there was Maharishi Valmiki himself. After all he had done for her and the boys, she could hardly abandon him to such a fate. The boys were wherever they were, and until she knew where, it made most sense for her to go out there and fight. If the odds were overwhelming—which seemed likely—then she would extricate herself and escape into the forest. The boys and Nakhudi were smart enough to know something was wrong and would not simply blunder into the ashram. She could count on them joining her eventually at the canyon, their agreed-upon refuge in the event of such a calamity.

Her mind made up, she took a deep breath, then slipped around the side of the hut and went running down the path to the main ashram grounds, bow-string pulled taut, first arrow notched and ready to loose. The row of sala trees blurred past and then she was out in the open and in the thick of the fray.

SIX

Somasra found himself unable to control his anger as he raced along, following behind former Vajra Captain Bejoo and the ex-rani-rakshak Nakhudi. He had seen the bodies of the slaughtered villagers and was thoroughly disgusted. How could Ayodhyans have stooped to such a heinous deed? These people might not be Arya any more, if Arya meant one had to be literally pure and noble and superior in behavior, thought and deed, since they had committed crimes at some point and fallen from that status of nobility of character. But they had been punished for their crimes and had additionally chosen to take themselves into exile from Arya society, which was further punishment. From the looks of their humble habitation and their ascetic lifestyles, it was evident they had not prospered through ill-gotten gains nor continued upon the path of crime – which was more than could be said for many people who still remained within the auspices of so-called Arya society.

And yet they had been slaughtered mercilessly by a heavily armed company of cavalry without warning or cause or even opportunity to arm and defend themselves. There were certain rules for combat among Aryas, and this not only violated that kshatriya code of conduct, it was an affront to any warrior. He had known that the murky politics of Ayodhya had taken a bad turn these past years—he had seen the steady decline himself among the PFs, the common soldiery and the city itself. But this was unacceptable.

He was aware of the other men, all senior PFs recently retired from active duty, at the edges of his vision. He was proud to see that they were all able to keep pace with the much younger woman, as was the aging Captain Bejoo. Even though none of them had seen active combat for decades, there was enough activity on gatewatch—small skirmishes, sudden violent outbreaks, encounters with brash youngsters, minor riots, communal clashes—to have kept them all fighting fit. Besides, each and everyone of this handpicked band of white-haired retirees spent one full day each week at the training camp. He had even seen Captain Bejoo there, even though as a grama-rakshak now, he didn't have to adhere to such high standards of fitness. The training camps were no mere formality. Run by veterans like himself and held to the same high standards as they had been since the time of Manu Lawmaker, they were a gruelling day's routine of drills, exercises, mock combat, wargames and tactical briefings and discussions that kept the mind sharp and the body on the cutting edge of fitness. They might all be over 75 here in this band, in fact several were a decade older and at least two were in their 10th decade of life, but they were nonetheless able to hold their own.

As he sprinted at a demanding but sustainable pace through the forest, negotiating the overhanging branches, mulch-carpetted and snake-holed ground, and bushes and stones and other flora expertly, he felt as if he was not retired but rejuvenated. This was why these men were so fit and strong even at their age: because they loved the demands and challenges of combat. It was when they were put out to pasture and told to go home and spend the rest of their days staring at sunsets and snowfall that they grew fat around the waist and the brain. Right now, he was confident that he and his band of octagenarians and nonagenarians could take on that company of cavalry and come out on top. They might not survive it—not all of them, for sure—but they would take as good as they got and still triumph. He was sure of it. He had seen the way the younger, new PF troops drilled and trained at the camps in the cantonment north of Ayodhya, and he and his mates would laugh at the absurdity of it. Then again, what could one expect of men and women who had never known first-hand the terrors of a Pisaca ambush or gone hand to hand with a Rakshasa, or faced a swarm of Nagas? Warfare today was only about mortals versus mortals, and after one had faced asuras, mortals just didn't seem as dangerous.

But these mortals made him angry. This was murder, nothing less. They had no right to come here to these people's grama and slaughter them thusly. And if what he had heard Nakhudi say to Bejoo was right, and they were attacking an ashram now, then these mortal soldiers did not deserve to be called Aryas, let alone Ayodhyans. They were no less than rakshasas and deserved to be killed like rakshasas.

He looked forward to coming face to face with them and showing them how real kshatriyas fought.

Bejoo sensed the anger in Nakhudi. Twenty five years ago, when he had first met Nakhudi, he had been impressed by the young woman's fierce dedication to her duty and her fearless fighting attitude. At the time, he had been in charge of the vajra force assigned by Maharaja Dasaratha himself to follow and protect Princes Rama Chandra and Lakshman on their journey to Bhayanak-van with Brahmarishi Vishwamitra. They had encountered Nakhudi and Princess Sita Janaki after the Bhayanak-van mission, while on their way to Mithila. Nakhudi and her mistress had disguised themselves as men at the time, to make it easier to move incognito across the land as well as deflect the excessive attention that a princess would naturally have drawn.

He had been very impressed by Nakhudi's fighting skills as well as her fierce loyalty to Sita, and when he had learned that the rani-rakshak was in fact a woman herself, he had been doubly impressed. Not because he had not expected a woman to fight that well or be that skillful: Arya society was a matriarchial society, and Bejoo had met and seen women kshatriyas who would put most men to shame in battle, and who chose to undertake the challenges of motherhood and family-raising just as efficaciously. No, he had been impressed because Nakhudi was impressive, just for who she was, and how she worked and the lengths she was willing to go to in order to fulfill her duties. He had felt more than a little attracted to her then. But he had been happily married and the question of betraying his wife, even for a brief encounter, had been untenable morally.

Now, two and a half decades later, she was still impressive, and he found himself still admiring her fierce devotion to her mistress, her fearless decisiveness, and yes, he still desired her. He was not as young as he had been back then, but then again, neither was she now. The age difference of almost two decades between them hardly mattered. All that mattered was that he had finally found a woman he cared about, even though just days earlier he would have thought such a thing to be impossible, and whom he now believed he could come to love as deeply and strongly – if very differently – than he had loved his long-standing companion and belated wife. And he thought that she cared about him too, which mattered most of all.

He followed her through the woods, admiring the ease with which she negotiated the treacherous obstacle course of the deep woods as if it were a city avenue. He admired also the way she displayed anger but kept it banked, using the energy from that anger instead to fuel her forward movement and pace, even after having just found her entire community slaughtered to the last woman, elder and child. He could hardly imagine what fortitude it took to overcome that shock, and the inevitable outrage and fury that must be bubbling up inside her as a result. Yet he could see no wavering of hand or eye, no clumsiness of footing or rashness of action. Her breathing remained even, if short, and her aspect contained and measured. It reminded him of the great commanders and leaders he had followed into battle in his younger days; Nakhudi was no less a leader of warriors than they had been.

He smiled despite the circumstances, shaking his head once as he ran through the sun-dappled shadows, and thought that even if she did not consider herself 'Arya' and mayhap she might not be Arya in the strictest sense of the term, yet she was in fact the very epitome of the epithet. Pure of soul, noble of purpose, elevated in deed and thought. Yes, she was Arya to the core.

He decided then that if they survived this harebrained adventure, unlikely as it was, he would ask her to marry him, and live the rest of his days with her by his side. If she would have him, of course, which was another question altogether.

He heard the shouts and screams and metallic sounds of weapons a fraction of a moment before she stopped and raised her hand. Behind and around them the rest of the vajra stopped as well. He realized it was odd to call a band of old retired PFs on foot a 'vajra'. How could this group of old fogeys possibly strike forays and retreat with the swiftness of the mythical lightning bolts of Lord Indra? The very analogy was absurd. Yet, he would call it a vajra. For in their own way, in these circumstances and this environment and under this leadership, they would strike and retreat as swiftly as lightning. He would see to that. He had promised Nakhudi he would.

And she had tried to smile coquettishly—which only made her expansive dark face look menacing—and said, “I know you will. That’s why I came to you.”

Now, she ducked down to a crouch and crept forward for the last hundred yards. He could see the smoke from the ashram cookfires curling above the rooftops up ahead, but due to the denseness of the woods, he did not see the ashram itself until they were barely twenty yards away.

He frowned.

The ravagers could hardly have stumbled across two such cleverly hidden settlements accidentally. They had good directions, or a guide. Which meant this entire sordid operation had been planned down to the last detail.

That made him angrier. Bad enough that these vermin were slaughtering unarmed and innocent women, children and elders – and now brahmins as well. But it was infinitely worse to know that someone had plotted and planned these massacres and executed them with such ruthless cruelty.

He put aside the romantic notions that had been filling his senses for the past few moments and focussed on the task at hand. The man in him yielded to the kshatriya in him and he pursed his lips grimly and passed the hilt of his blade across his unshaven stubble, producing a rasping sound that only he could hear and which helped him sink into the mental state required for complete concentration during a battle or fight. The scenes of violence and abuse unfolding before them needed no explanation or argument. It was quite obvious who were the aggressors and who were the victims and what needed to be done.

“Attack at will,” Nakhudi said from ahead, her voice cold and deadly.

He raised his hand and gave the signal to his vajra.

Then he led them into battle, following after Nakhudi.

Luv feared the worst. At the sound of the trumpet call, Kush and he had begun racing back to the ashram, followed closely by Sarama and her pack —and the bearkillers. He knew the bearkillers must have something to do with the alarm being raised but explanations could come later. All he cared about was getting back to the hermitage as fast as possible. Fortunately, they were only a few miles away. Even so, the race through the forest seemed to take forever and the thought of what might lie ahead were unbearable. His greatest anxiety was for Maatr.

Prithvi-Maa, protect her.

But a part of him knew that his mother was no ordinary sadhini. Ever since his brother and he had been old enough to understand such things, she had explained to them, calmly and without transferring any sense of fear or emotion, that it was imperative that they maintain a certain discipline about some things, such as their daily weapons and physical training, and that they follow certain pre-arranged codes and signals in the event of a calamity. What form the calamity might take was never quite clear, but they had come to understand that it would most likely take the shape of a group of attackers and that Ayodhya had something to do with it. That was more than enough. So they drilled and trained and practised and prepared for the event of an unexpected attack by armed Ayodhyans. Today, that training was about to be tested, it seemed.

Because Kush had been at the far side of the group, he was a fair ways behind. But the pockmarked-face woman named Ragini kept good pace with Luv as he ran. She even managed to speak though the last thing he wanted to do was talk. “This is what we came to warn you about—they had already slaughtered Nakhudi’s village and we tracked them moving towards Valmiki ashram. We hoped to reach you two and warn you before you blundered into the thick of it.”

Luv kept running, moving his arms and legs efficiently, breathing rhythmically, as he had learned to do. He did not bother to waste breath on a response.

“Your mother could be dead already. You know that she gave specific orders for how to act in such an event. You are not to return to the ashram. You are to go to the pre-arranged meeting point and wait there.”

This time he could not resist. Rather than ask the most expected question—How do you know what we had pre-arranged?—he asked the next most relevant one.

“Wait there for what?” he demanded, not slowing his pace. “If she is indeed dead as you claim—which I don’t accept—then what are we to wait for?”

“For us,” said Ragini, turning her head to look at him.

He glanced at her briefly as they ran and saw the earnestness in her light brown eyes. She was telling the truth. The forest blurred behind her.

He felt a small flutter of shock: these were the ‘friends’ that Maatr had spoken of? The ones who would come to help them in the event of a calamity? Impossible! They were bearkillers. Scum of the forest!

“Our association with your father and mother goes back a long way, Luv,” she said.

He was not impressed by her being able to tell his brother and he apart, since he had yelled out Kush’s name earlier. But he believed her when she said that she had known his mother. Maatr had spoken of old friends of their father and she. Everything this woman, this bearkiller, was saying rang true. He swallowed, feeling a twinge of emotion even as he sprinted. That meant the bearkillers had known their father. And to think that Kush and he had regarded them with scorn and derision, often making jokes about their appearance or derogatory comments about their hygiene and sense of dharma. Even Rishi Dumma had often participated in these jocular insults, coming up with real gems. Dumma did have a sense of humour, that and a great appetite.

“Turn away now,” Ragini said, bringing him back to the moment. “Follow your mother’s orders. Turn away and come with us. We shall protect and care for you. We are sworn to do so until our dying breath. Do not go back to the ashram.”

He hesitated mentally, even though his feet continued pumping and his arms swung to and fro and the breath chugged in and out of his lungs in the rhythmic pattern that he could maintain all day and for twenty yojanas if need be. Then the sounds of screaming rose again from ahead, very close now, barely a mile or so, and he shook his head grimly, lowered his chin and increased his pace.

Ragini had to strain now to catch up. Whatever else the bearkillers might be, they were not long-distance runners—or perhaps they were burdened by their heavier metal weapons. Kush and he only carried bows and rigs, which made a difference. Someday, they would graduate to metal blades, and in a pinch, they could use them just as well up close, but at his and Kush's age and size the weight of swords and blades far outweighed their usefulness.

Besides, Maatr had always preferred that they use bows. So that we could fight from a distance and be safer. She always tried to keep us safe. He fought back the emotion that was threatening to engulf him and sucked in two sharp, shallowed breaths, regaining control.

Because he had not replied, Ragini reached out and touched his shoulder lightly, a gesture of affection. "I see you will not heed my warning. Very well then. Whatever happens now, in the ashram," she said, "you must not risk your lives unduly. Remember that your brother and you have a far larger purpose to fulfill. It is not your destiny to die at the hands of those mercenaries today. Leave the fighting to us. Stay with your brother. Stay back. It was your mother's wish."

And then, surprising him, she shot out a foot and deftly tripped him, sending him sprawling in a pile of wildgrass, winded but unhurt.

"Stay back and let us fight!" she shouted, then was gone, sprinting up ahead.

The rest of her gang raced past him, the scarred man glancing down briefly as he passed to make sure that he was all right. Then the dogs were there, also loping past, long muzzles dripping froth, Sarama whimpering as she ran past as if to apologize for running with her pack rather than stopping to help him. Her tail flicked his nose as she whipped past.

Luv sat up and rubbed his head, wondering at how neatly the half-chested outlaw woman had tripped him. He was not harmed or injured in any way but it had effectively stopped him, if only for a moment or two. That was all the advantage she had needed, clever woman!

He was on his feet and picking up pace again just as Kush caught up with him. Luv glanced sideways at his brother who grinned back at him, displaying a fleck of grass between his upper front teeth. From the blades of grass and leaf or two pasted to Kush's face and arms, Luv guessed that he too had been similarly delayed by the bearkillers. They exchanged a glance and it was all he needed to let him know that his brother had had a similar exchange with one of the gang, probably the scarred man, and that they both knew all that was needed to be known.

Except what happened to Maatr and Gurudev Valmiki.

Shoulder to shoulder now, they ran the last few hundred yards to the ashram. Up ahead, they could already hear the sounds of the bearkillers roaring and calling out in their vulgar way and the dogs growling and snarling with the low-toned ferocity of animals at war as the new arrivals clashed with the attackers in the ashram.

Moments later, Kush and he burst into the clearing and joined them.

SEVEN

Even though Sita saw what she had expected to see, it was still a shock.

The large rectangular central courtyard of the ashram, lined by huts on either side, with the ashram's largest domicile at the head, was a melee of flailing bodies, human and equestrian. Rishis and their wives, all dressed alike in red-ochre dhotis and anga-vastras, with their junior acolytes clad in white, ran about everywhere in confusion and fear. Riding among them were the attackers, armed and armoured horsemen wielding longswords, axes and pikes. The attackers were randomly chasing down and slaughtering the ashramites without cause or provocation. It was a massacre.

Sita watched as a frail dark woman whom she recognized as the wife of Rishi Divakara attempted to run down the alleyspace between two huts and was checked by a spear flung by a horseman. The spear struck her in the back, severing her spine, and she fell, instantly dead, her eyes still open and staring blankly.

She saw the aging Rishi Kanwa, a visitor from the South-Eastern kingdom of Kalinga, standing with his hands clasped together in silent appeal, as he was hacked down by two separate horsemen, one from the front cutting through his clasped hands with a sword, the other chopping at the juncture of his neck and torso with an axe. He fell into a spreading pool of his own blood, half-severed limbs dangling grotesquely, lips still parted in recitation of a shloka of forgiveness. Bodies lay sprawled everywhere, blood splatters staining the white robes, the red ochre robes concealing the brutality meted out to the bodies they clothed. The air of the ashram, usually so pristine and clear and crisp, was sullied by the stench of death and the odour of bodily effluents spilled out into the dust.

It had been a long time since Sita had seen such brutality, the brutality of unbridled human arrogance unleashed for its own selfish pleasures—male arrogance, to put a fine point on it—and she had forgotten how cruel men could be, kshatriya men in particular, when embarked upon a mission they were convinced it was their dharma to execute. Forest living was harsh; the animal kingdom was ruthless; life itself was never easy, and nature herself posed as many relentless challenges to existence as she provided succour and nourishment. But this, this was naked male arrogance, the madness of muscle and virility unchecked, the naked lust for violence that some men insisted was a natural part of all humankind but was in fact only an ailment of their own twisted psyches, perpetrated by them through generations in order to justify their own violent urges and lustful indulgences. Only an evil man spoke of good versus evil; and those who spoke of good versus evil always insisted they were on the side of good. In fact, as any sane, rational person knew, there were no good or evil people or beings, only people who did things to serve their own ends—whether those things were adjudged good or evil depended on the perception of others.

Yet if she were to start believing in evil, this was as good a time as any. For what was being perpetrated here, under whatever guise or excuse, was an evil, abhorrent act.

She had watched the horrific slaughter for only a few moments, the bare minimum time needed to orient herself to the sheer ruthlessness of the attackers and the shameless manner in which they pursued their given task. She witnessed only three actual deaths, although many other victims were already dying or about to be attacked when she appeared on the scene. And she could hear the sounds and screams from beyond the huts and within the huts as well. But it was all she needed to see and hear. There was no point in appealing to such men. Any kshatriya who would ride into a peaceful camp, ignore the sacred appeal of a man of the cloth, and murder him so brutally as they had just murdered Rishi Kanwa, were not men at all. They were monsters driven by a misguided madness, a fanatical devotion to an aberrant sense of dharma, soldiers who had the power to mete out life and death and were abusing it to slaughter rather than save, to murder rather than protect. They were exterminators driven by a distorted interpretation of dharma. Dharmanators, to coin a phrase. And there was no arguing or speaking to such dharmanators. They could only be stopped in one way: by killing them as quickly and efficiently as possible.

She aimed at a helmed face with its mouth open wide in laughter, raising a sword high as it prepared to strike down a young rishi who had just been ordained only days earlier, his face wet and shiny from copious weeping.

She loosed, and watched the arrow punch into the open mouth and through the back of the head, the arrowhead striking the inside of the helm with a metallic clanging impact. The rider toppled backwards off his horse, his sword striking the rump of another horse nearby and sending it bolting, knocking that rider off his aim as he was about to throw a spear at another woman running away in shrieking panic.

The young rishi blinked through his tears, saw the arrow sticking out of the gaping mouth of the man lying on the ground, the man who had been about to kill him only a moment ago, and stared upwards uncomprehendingly. Unfamiliar with war and its methods, he could not fathom that the arrow had been shot by a mortal hand. He assumed that his soldier had been struck down by the devas.

Sita turned her attention to another target.

A soldier on horseback was about to hack down a kneeling rishi with his parasu. The kneeling rishi was Rishi Angira, an old and venerated man known for his ascetic habits and ever-joyous temperament. The younger acolytes always joked that Rishi Angira had never lost his temper or said a word in anger all his life, so when he did turn angry, it would surely be an epic temper tantrum! Looking at him now, calmly cradling the head of a fellow brahmin—Rishi Ashita, she saw, with a horrible disfiguring wound to his face and neck—as he sat on the stoop of his own hut, Sita thought that if he was not losing his temper now, he never would. To have such self-restraint and single-minded conviction in his vows was beyond admirable, it was proof to her yet again of the inherent goodness and desire for peaceful co-existence that pervaded all creatures of the universe. That face, calm and self-assured even in the face of a hideous violent death, was proof that the natural state of all beings was peaceful existence.

The face beyond the tip of her poised arrow displayed the exact opposite of that natural calm. It was a face distorted by its own anger and lustful energies, nostrils flaring as the man snarled in evident delight at his brutal task, swinging the parasu at a diagonal angle intended to lope Rishi Ashita's head from his body. To see a man use an axe for such an act was itself a reminder why the legendary Parasuram, Rama of the Axe, had taken up the weapon, intended for chopping trees and wood, and used it to eliminate the kshatriyas of the mortal realm seven times over in order to teach them humility and respect for their own preceptors. Clearly, this kshatriya had not heeded that lesson.

She loosed and saw her arrow strike the man in the slim gap between his helm and his chest armour. It took him in the neck, passing through the soft liquid-filled stalk and punching through the other side in a small explosion of blood and gristle. His snarling turned to a liquid gurgling, and the parasu fell useless from his muscled hands as he grasped at his mortally wounded throat. He fell, thrashing in his death throes, singing a different tune from the cry of victory he had been snarling a moment earlier.

She loosed three more arrows in quick succession, saw three more men fall. Two of them were mortally wounded and died in moments, but one was forewarned by the fall of the soldier next to him and swung away just as she loosed, the arrow gouging open a bloody track on his upper thigh but missing all vital organs. He screamed in pain and outrage and turned to point at her position, having already watched her two earlier arrows strike home and placing her with accuracy.

That brought the attention of the others to her and a half dozen riders galloped towards her at once, roaring with pleasure.

“It’s her!” shouted one to the others, swinging his sword overhead as he came. “Remember the reward, men!”

She took him down with an arrow in the throat, wincing as his feet and hands tightened instinctively, bringing down his horse in a fetter-snapping fall. The horse screamed out the agony that he could not express and she loosed again, and again, and again, bringing down another, and a third, and wounding a fourth. But there were still three riders coming at her, and she was out of time. She had known she ought to have stopped after the first or second shot, circled around to a new position and then fired again, but she had been unable to let more innocents die as they would have if she had taken the extra time, so she had continued standing her ground and losing arrows, and now it was too late to get away. So much for her plan of self-extrication!

She leaped over the dead tree trunk that marked the northern boundary of the main ashram grounds, ducked behind an ancient banyan tree, and ran through the thickest part of the woods to make it harder for her followers. But there were more riders coming at her from the other side and there were too many of them and the same obstacles that made it harder from them to follow also made it harder for her to shoot while running with any degree of accuracy. She knew they would catch her in a moment and when they did, she would be dead, so she made a decision in an instant.

She leaped up on the Y-shaped cradle of an aging tree, swinging around and letting her back strike the trunk hard, bracing herself, then raising her bow and preparing to shoot the first horseman who came into sight. That eliminated their height advantage of being on horseback. There was no way for her to escape this alive now, but she would take as many of them as possible with her before dying.

Nakhudi cried out with outrage.

She had emerged from the forest into the gurukul. This was a large clearing just north of the main ashram, used mainly for children's games, morning and evening group exercises, and rote chanting by brahmacharyas—the youngest acolytes of the ashram. Unlike the more permanent denizens of the hermitage who were all brahmin by vocation if not by birth, these young acolytes could be from any varna. They were children sent here to be schooled in the guru-shishya parampara, also known as Upanishad, or learning-by-the-side-of-the-guru, and they ranged from the age of 7 to 14.

From the looks of it, they were the ones who had been here at the time of the attack, drilling in martial training exercises as they did everyday, under the supervision of the rishis. The red-ochre garb of the half dozen rishis who had been supervising today stood out across the clearing, laying where they had been standing at the time of the attack. They were overwhelmed by the three dozen other, much smaller bodies clad in white that lay sprawled around the clearing. Many of these smaller corpses lay in postures and attitudes that suggested they had tried to use their meagre training weapons against the intruders. But wooden swords, lathis and ropes were hardly a match for steel blades and iron spears.

She passed around the clearing with rage boiling in her belly. How could anyone do this to little children? Mere boys, these were. What had they done to deserve such a fate?

But after all, it was not about what anyone had done or not done, simply about who they were.

In a world of haves and have-nots, the man in armour upon horseback with a sword felt he was entitled to run down and slaughter even innocent young boys—because they were not ‘Arya’, not noble-born, city-living, high and mighty citizens here, just shishyas in a forest gurukul. And in a world where power and wealth and citizenship were what made you superior to your fellow man, if you were out here in some remote forest, you were not human in the same sense that those superior beings were human; you were no less than animals, and as such, fit only for slaughter.

Not a single intruder’s corpse lay in the clearing, testifying to the shock and overwhelming odds of the attack. These boys and their teachers had never stood a chance, nor been given one. It went against the very spirit and rule of the kshatriya code, but after the massacre in her village, she already knew that these intruders were not kshatriyas, merely vendors of death, come to ply their business in exchange for coin paid by the highest bidder. No king, no minister, no Arya court of justice would find them guilty of any crime or wrongdoing. Their’s the sword, therefore their’s the power and the glory.

Well, she thought, hefting the specially weighted blade she carried to suit her larger form and heavier carrying strength, I have a sword too, and unlike those poor brahmacharyas and brahmins, I know how to use it and will can do so!

The sounds of butchery and terror were loudest up ahead, past the vegetable gardens where the ashramites grew their own food. Horse hooves had tramped through the gardens as well, she saw, for when one did not respect life, then why would they respect the things that sustained life? She circled around the crushed pods and yams and then she was running past a line of sheds that smelled of cow. She was relieved to hear the panicked mooing and looing of the milk-giving beasts and thanked Durga Maa that the attackers had not slaughtered the animals as well. Then she realized it was not out of compassion or even out of reverence for Go-Maata, the sacred Mother Cow, sustainer of life and nourishment, but simply out of expedience that they had spared the cows—they would probably be back later, to finish them off, once they had killed their main targets, the human residents.

She came around a cow shed just in time to see a woman in saffron-coloured sadhini's garb come shrieking from the direction of the main ashram complex. Three horsemen followed the poor woman, swinging bloody swords and pikes, and a fourth was following belatedly, hefting what looked like an elephant mace—the kind used to club war elephants in battle and crush their brains within their skulls. The faces of the men were glowing with excitement and lust, the lust for blood and slaughter that she had seen too often before. It was a face she too had worn, but never as a mask against the slaughter of innocents or the unarmed. And in response to those leering expressions of lurid lustfulness, she put on her own face of terrible justice.

The woman ran past her without even registering who she was, simply stumbling on in panic. She was already bleeding from a deep gash on her back where a sword had chopped a chunk of flesh out, and her eyes were dilated and wild with terror. For a woman who had spent years, perhaps her entire life, in silent contemplation, meditation and prayer, the onslaught of armed horsemen seeking to slaughter you for no reason at all, was a shocking violation of her worldview. She was half-mad with terror.

Nakhudi let her go by, standing in the path of the men following her.

They too had eyes only for the task at hand, hunter to her hunted, and whooped and called out obscene words as they cantered down with the audaciousness of men who had no fear of anything and would do as they pleased to whomever they pleased.

They were about to receive an object lesson in what they could not do.

Nakhudi raised her sword and waved it at the first horseman, who was a good ten yards ahead of the others.

“You,” she called out, “Try me instead. I’m more fun to play with.”

He blinked and grinned, noticing her for the first time. She realized that even the sword in her hand had not caused him any concern. As far as he was concerned, he was king of the world and every living thing was his to command. He was wrong, and was about to find out just how wrong—the hard way.

He swung his sword in a loping action as he rode up, not slowing a whit. His intention was to cut her down and ride on after the sadhini.

She didn’t try to deflect his sword. Defense was not her goal. Instead, she swung higher, raising herself up at just the right moment, and hacked viciously hard at the junction of his shoulder and arm.

Her sword, weighted one and a half times as much as most longswords, was strengthened by the rider’s own forward motion. The blade sliced through the man’s shoulder, severing armour, bone and muscle easily, and lopped off the entire arm. The arm, still clutching the useless sword, fell to the ground, and the man rode on, the fist-sized hole in his torso gushing deep crimson heart’s blood over the crushed vegetables. He made a sound that was like a child wailing, the kind of sound the youngest brahmacharyas might have made when they had been cut down mercilessly by his associates and himself. She heard him fall off his horse behind her but did not bother to turn to look. She was busy greeting the other riders.

The second one tried to skewer her throat with his iron pike. There were gobs of flesh stuck to the point and she could smell the reek of something awful as the weapon shot out at her with deadly efficiency.

She dodged the point, feeling it scrape the edge of her collar, and plunged her swordblade upwards, into the gap between his armour and his belt. It stabbed deep into the region of his liver, and beyond, into his vitals, and he screamed much louder than the first man, sounding more like an animal than a human, and fell sideways onto her. She had been prepared for that possibility and hurled him over, sending him sprawling on the ground with a sickly cracking of bones and more animal screaming, freeing her sword with practised effort.

The third man shouted with anger. He had not expected to see his friends die before him, killed by a woman he probably assumed to be another sadhini from the ashram, and was furious. He was the one with the elephant mace and he came at her with a speed and ferocity that almost undid her.

She rolled in the nick of time—across the path of his horse—and narrowly missed having her skull stoved in by the pounding hooves. But then she was up and swinging and he yelled with outrage as her sword hacked through his leather garments, severing his thigh. He swung the horse around for another pass, but she had slipped a throwing dagger into her palm from a belt at her waist, and she flung it at his throat where it stuck and cut off any further sounds of protest he might wish to produce.

She turned just in time to see the last rider—he was in fact the third rider but he had hung back after watching her cut down the first man—raise a spear. There was no time to turn or dodge before he threw the yard-long length of wood and iron.

EIGHT

Luv and Kush came at the ashram's south side to see the bearkillers clashing with at least two dozen armoured mounted soldiers. The dogs ran amuck, snapping at the horse's, panicking them into kicking and jumping, which threw the riders off their aim as they tried to hack and cut and spear the new arrivals.

They took in the number of white clad and ochre clad corpses lying about with growing dismay, trying to spot the familiar long black-haired and red clad form of their Maatr among the dead. Both finished the scan of the visible area and shook their heads at the exact same time, knowing it did not mean that she was not dead, merely that they could not see her body.

In their hearts, they could not bring themselves to believe she could be slain. Not her. Not Maatr. They had watched her spar with Nakhudi any number of times and both secretly thought that she was the greatest warrior that had ever lived. Only their guru's epic poem which they had been taught to recite daily ever since they could pronounce Sanskrit, filled as it was with tales of derring-do and incredible battles, described a warrior that could match the great Vedavati's prowess at arms. And that was the man who was both the subject of the poem as well as the architect of its greatest tragedy, Raja Rama Chandra. They felt certain that even if the legendary Rama Chandra of the poem were to face Maatr, it was she who would carry the day.

But that did not stop them worrying.

They watched briefly as the bearkillers held their own against the superior arms and number of attackers, but then began to lose ground almost at once. More and more horsemen kept coming from around the ashram, called by their comrades to join the fight, and their sheer numbers and superior arms and mounts made them impossible to defeat. They knew that they ought to leave the bearkillers to the fight and go to the canyon as they had been instructed. But they had still not seen Maatr, dead or alive, and those were their daily companions and friends and gurus lying dead there on the ground.

With one motion, both slung their bows, notched arrows and drew together.

They glanced sideways at each other, winked with the closest eye, and let fly. As before, their almost preternatural ability to know one another's thoughts and actions enabled them to pick different targets.

Two horsemen about to converge on the scar faced bearkiller from behind suddenly sprouted arrows from their throats and fell screaming and thrashing off their horses. The dogs were at their faces and feet at once, snarling and ripping and tearing viciously, showing the fallen attackers as little mercy as they had shown their victims.

Scar face did not have time to turn and look in their direction, but he waved two fingers pressed close together in a sketch of a half-salute and they understood that he was acknowledging their help. Then he was back in the fray and so were they.

For the next several moments, they picked out targets and took them down, each time with a single arrow. Only once did it take more than one arrow and that was because the man in question turned aside at the last instant and Kush's arrow was deflected by the jutting metal of his helm. It clanged off and the man turned to glare at the place where the boys stood. He shouted to his comrades who shouted at each other in turn. The fight was turning swiftly. Luv and Kush alone had brought down over a dozen riders and the bearkillers and dogs had managed as many. The attackers had likely not expected such resistance and were unwilling to take such losses. Already, some of them were turning the heads of their horses and riding away.

Luv and Kush both drew together and with concerted coordination, shot the man that Kush's first arrow had missed. Both their arrows took him in the open mouth, silencing his angry instructions. He gurgled, blood pouring from his mouth and fell, shuddering violently, onto his head on the ground. Even the dogs gave him a wide berth as he crashed, already dead.

After that, the spine of the attack was broken and the remaining horsemen retreated.

But they were not to get away that easily.

Even as Kush and Luv whooped loudly and watched the last of the intruders riding away, the sound of yells and weapons rose from the north side of the ashram.

Again, moving as if with one body and mind, they slung their bows and ran.

They ran past the bearkillers, who shouted at them. Ragini tried to grab at Luv as he went past, but he dodged and slipped away easily, and he heard her curse herself as he flew by. Kush and he went around the corner of the largest hut and beyond the main ashram courtyard to the north side, where the vegetable gardens and training grounds were located.

They saw a rider about to fling a spear at a woman whom they recognized at once as Nakhudi, from her stance and the way she held her sword. She had been caught unawares and the spear would hit her squarely in the chest—or in the side if she tried to turn away.

But another spear came shooting out of the thicket beyond the vegetable garden and strike the rider low in the belly, just as his own spear left his hand. The other spear struck just a fraction of a moment before he released his weapon, just enough to cause his aim to go awry. The spear passed within an inch of Nakhudi's side, ripping a tear in her garment noisily as it flew past. A little blood spurted from the spot but Nakhudi didn't even bother to react or clap a hand to it as anyone else might have done. Instead, she ran straight towards the main ashram, the expression on her face like nothing Luv and Kush had ever seen before.

They ran out in front of her, blocking her way and for an instant, Luv thought that she would run straight at them, cutting them both down with a single stroke of her sword. Then something changed in her eyes as she registered and recognized them and she blinked and lowered her sword, slowing her pace.

She stopped before them, the terrible mask slipping from her face and another more familiar face replacing it. This Nakhudi they knew well. This Nakhudi clasped their shoulders with great relief.

“You are well! Kali be blessed. Where is your Maatr?”

They shook their heads.

“Not dead,” Luv said for both of them. “We haven’t seen her body anywhere. The bearkillers said she might be dead already but we would have seen her by now.”

“Quickly, then,” she said, “she might be somewhere in the ashram precincts still. We must find her before they do!”

They needed no further urging.

“Luv and I will search the eastern side,” Kush said. “You take the main complex. But be careful, there are soldiers there still.”

“That’s all right,” she said grimly. “I have soldiers too.”

She beckoned and the man who had flung the spear that saved her life came jogging through the vegetable garden, looking apologetic as he trod the last of the pumpkins to a pulp. Behind him came a swarm of other men similar to him, white-haired and thick with age. They ran past, following Nakhudi.

Kush and he looked at one another in puzzlement. “Old soldiers? What can they do to help?”

They shook their heads as they sprinted to the east perimeter to search for their mother.

Sarama was not an old dog but she was ailing. Constant birthing had taken its toll on her and she had produced more litters than dogs twice her age. She was very proud of that and of the size of her brood and their robust health and strength. But being a Maatr was not easy and it had drained her resources considerably. As a result she had grown as frail as most dogs twice or thrice her age. Nature had a way of balancing things out in the end. She could no longer run, jump, bark or fight even half as well as she once did.

But there was one thing she could do as well if not better than ever.

Scent.

Even as the rest of her body and senses shrivelled away and weakened, her sense of smell remained strong. In fact, due to her eyesight fading and her other senses failing, she had come to rely almost entirely on that sense of smell, and used it to great advantage. Where other dogs would use a combination of sight and hearing and smell to make decisions, choose directions and otherwise pursue various courses of actions, Sarama relied mainly on her nose to lead her through the last remaining months, perhaps years, of her life. Dogs that grow blind or deaf will often do the same, coming to rely on the one sense their kind trusted the most. For eyes could be deceived by illusions, sounds could resemble one another or be mistaken, but smells were pure and perfect. No scent was quite like another, and even groups of scents, while sharing an affinity and similarity, were easily discernible from one another. To a dog, the world was a world of smells, each to its own. Not a black and white world but a universe where each and every scent was an unique, distinct shade of colour. Sarama often confused men with one another, or even with trees and horses, and she would puzzle over sounds for hours sometimes, unable to fathom their meaning, such as the nasal repetitive sounds recited over and over by the little humans in the ashram each day, but she never confused smells. Smells were sacred. Thus had the great creator of dogkind made all her followers in Her image. Go forth and scent the world, it is your's to sniff and snuffle to your nose's content.

It was this sense of smell that told her that the good Maatr was in trouble.

She milled about at the edges of the fight in the ashram grounds, barking mostly and snarling and nipping a little, but mostly keeping away from the flailing limbs and hooves and nasty metal cutting things that humans used to harm one another. Her brood was doing admirably well, participating and assisting their human friends with great enthusiasm and success. She was very proud of them. But she knew better than to try to fight as they fought, for if she received so much as a cut to her vital organs or a hard blow, she knew she would not survive it. The last litter or two had taken a heavy toll on her. Three of her pups had been born still-born and of the remaining four only two survived beyond the first year, and even those two were relatively frail and prone to illness.

Also, there was a constant pain in her birthing chamber that only worsened as time went by, and she sensed that this pain was caused by some inner canker that would ultimately be the death of her. She knew this and accepted it with the equanimity of all animalkind, for life and death were one and the same thing, and this world or the next, they all belonged to Pashupati, lord of animals. Not understanding names or the human words by which they called to their own kind as well as her kind, she did not know that she had been named after the great Sarama herself, matrix of all dogkind. But even so, she knew that all dogs, good or nasty, smelly or sweet, toothless or sharp-fanged, must lay down someday, never to rise again. So it was to be with her and so it would be with every living creature.

But there was nothing wrong with her sense of smell. On the contrary. And as a downwind from the east brought a fresh batch of scents to her keen black nostrils, she became aware that the Good Maatr, the one who lived in a kennel apart from the others, with her two little pups, all three of whom were exceedingly kind and generous to Sarama as well as her brood, and who had nursed her and many of her offspring through many ailments and injuries, that good matriarch was in trouble. She could smell the scent of her blood and her sweat, ripe with fear and anger, the peculiar mixture of the two that exuded from a being when it was on the verge of death. She knew that scent well, she knew she would smell it on herself someday soon. And it was not right that Maatr should be exuding that scent.

Barking loudly, she tried to attract the attention of some of her brood. But some of them were busy finishing off the metal-furred men that had fallen off the backs of their horses, and the rest were chasing after the ones who were trying to ride away. The humans she and the other dogs had accompanied here were busy fighting and chasing too, and paid her no heed. She was, after all, just one of thirty dogs barking and running around!

So she turned and made away on her own.

She did not have far to go. In moments, she found the spot from which the wind had carried the Maatr's scent to her. It was a little enclave set off from the main ashram, and as such not directly visible from there.

The scenario was bad, worse than she had expected.

There were several of the horse-riding bad men here, waving those horrible metal things that cut and hurt terribly and that dogs must avoid being struck by at all costs, on pain of death. A few of them lay dead or mortally wounded on the ground, their horses milling about or slipping away into the woods to try and find their fellow equines. But a pack of more than one paw's worth and less than two paws' worth still surrounded the tree before which the Maatr stood, defending herself with her own metal thing.

It was good that Maatr had a metal thing to defend herself. But Sarama sensed that Maatr had been up on the tree not long before, and from that position had shot those flying wooden missiles that hurt from afar. That was how she had killed so many of her attackers already. But apparently she had run out of wooden things to shoot and had been forced to use the metal thing and now she was at a grave disadvantage. For there were many of the men and only one of her, and they were clad in that iron-scented metal fur which no dog could bite through for fear of breaking her teeth, and they were very vicious, snarling brutes who seemed to want nothing more than to tear her throat out and rip out her guts.

Sarama did not wish to see Maatr lay down here and end her life. She loved Maatr and her young cubs.

She milled about restlessly for a moment, fretting and worrying. Finally, she realized there was nothing else left to do. She was the only one here who could help Maatr. Either she risked her life to do so, or Maatr would die.

She had no choice really.

She shook herself vigorously, waking up her ailing body as best as she could. She felt a sharp arrow of pain in her nether regions and yelped but then forced herself to ignore the pain. There was no time to think of her pain now, it was Maatr who was in grave danger. And Maatr must be helped.

Turning in the opposite direction she took a running length then turned around sharply and launched herself at the men in metal fur, her yellowed fangs bared in a snarl.

NINE

Luv and Kush heard the sounds of a dog in distress and knew at once it was Sarama. She had a distinctive yelp when in trouble or pain which they had heard often over the years. Being the oldest dog they knew, and one they had been intimately friendly with almost since birth, her voice was as recognizable to them as any human's. They sprinted in the direction her yelps had come from, separating and taking opposite, converging routes to go around the thicket. When they came around into view of the banyan tree and the violent scene before it, both had arrows notched and ready to loose.

It was a heartbreaking scene, underscored by a cacophony of tired barks, punctuated by the sound of steel on steel.

Maatr stood with her back to the old tree, defending herself valiantly with a sword in her left hand against three of the attackers. She was bleeding from a dozen nicks and cuts, her right arm hung limply by her side, her right thigh bled profusely from a gash, and there was blood on her chin and chest from what appeared to be a copious nose bleed. Kush guessed that a sword hilt had been pummeled into her face, breaking her nose. Luv thought that her arm was dislocated and that the fact that her bow lay broken on the Y-juncture of the tree trunk, just above and behind her, indicated that she had been up there, firing arrows from her vantage point, when one of the riders had flung something, a spear perhaps, or even an axe, and in avoiding the weapon, she had lost the bow and dislocated her shoulder. She seemed otherwise all right but her strength was clearly failing her and the sword work was tiring her out. The attackers knew this and were deliberately forcing her to keep her guard up and keep swinging this way then that, exhausting her good arm, until the moment came when she let the sword drop for an instant, and they could plunge through. A few more minutes and that moment would have come and they would both have been orphaned; it was a miracle she was managing as well as she was at all. From the looks of it, she had killed seven attackers with the bow and another three with the sword already. It was unlikely she would take any more down, but just the fact that she had cost them so heavily had earned her a grudging respect from her opponents, which was why they had opted for this slower but more effective method of tiring her out.

The dog stood with Maatr, barking and leaping about, trying to avoid the deadly sword points and blade edges but more concerned with keeping the attackers at bay. From the looks of it, at least two of the fallen men had their throats torn out, which was obviously Sarama's handiwork. That itself was impressive. More impressive—and heartbreaking—were the many slashes, cuts and jabs on the aging matriarch-dog's body, bleeding profusely from a dozen wounds, any of which were probably enough to end her days. The very fact that she continued to bark and snap so valiantly, with nothing to protect her from the lethal steel swinging to and fro, testified to her loyalty and courage.

Both boys felt lumps in their throats at the sight.

Time to end this now.

Luv whistled sharply.

Maatr was smart enough not to look in their direction. She had already seen them in her peripheral vision and restrained herself from showing any reaction. She continued swinging her blade to and fro in the defensive movement, blocking and parrying the regular thrusts and cuts of the three men. She had trained them herself in the art of seeing without turning to look. Taking one's eyes off one's opponent might be the last time one turned to look at anything, she had warned them.

The others were not as smart.

Two of the men turned at once, expecting deva knew what. The instant their faces looked towards Luv and Kush, their swords turning away from Maatr, both brothers loosed as one. The arrows sped as one bolt, striking at the exact same instant, producing a combined chunking sound as the points went home into the exposed sides of the necks of the men. Both men dropped their swords, clutched identically at their necks, and fell to the ground, thrashing in their death throes. They resembled dancers in some grotesque palace performance, mirroring the same dance steps.

Sarama wheeled as well and saw them. She leaped up into the air, barking with renewed vigor and joy. She even performed a complete somersault, something they hadn't seen her do since they were five and she almost as young. She was that thrilled to see them.

Sadly, as Maatr had rightly warned, that was the worst thing any person could do when the enemy was at your throat. That somersault and the sight of her young masters were the last things the poor old dog ever did or saw.

The third soldier, nearest to Sarama, had probably been waiting for an opportunity. The raw wounds on his right arm and foot suggested that she had already mauled and savaged him more than once during the fight and he had been waiting to pay her back. He turned his sword, plunging it into the breastbone, and into the furry body beneath.

The boys gasped as they saw most of the length of the sword slide into their beloved Sarama's body.

She collapsed, falling with a sickening thump to the ground.

The attacker laughed with satisfaction as he yanked the blade out of the dying dog, pressing the heel of his boot against her snout to brace himself. Even in that moment of ultimate surrender, she still attempted to nip at his ankle, the heel snapping off her canine tooth as it came down hard on her face. Any sound she made was lost in the gruff laughter of the man.

Blood spurted from her mouth, and she collapsed, lolled her tongue, and died.

The man's laughter was abruptly cut off by the sensation of a sword piercing his guts. Maatr plunged the blade in hard enough for the point to emerge from his back, very low. He bent over, grunting mournfully. She put her boot to his face, kicking him away and freeing her blade in the same motion. He toppled backwards and fell, not dying immediately but rolling in agony, beyond help and unable to rise and do more harm.

The instant he was clear of Maatr and Sarama's body, the boys put an arrow each into him. The bolts thumped home, stilling his groans. They wanted to keep shooting arrows into his body but knew better than to waste good bolts on a dead enemy.

Maatr looked over their shoulders, then around, checking the fallen attackers and keeping a wary eye out.

They ran to her. She stilled them with an upraised hand, still holding the sword, as she continued her check.

“The rest are dead or fled,” Kush said. “Maatr, are you all right?”

She turned to them. “Are you sure?”

Luv slung his bow over his shoulder. “Maatr, are you wounded badly?”

“Are you sure?” she repeated urgently, still holding the sword up defensively.

Both boys nodded in unison, eyes wet with tears.

She looked around, then back at them, saw the tears in their eyes, and finally relented. “All right,” she said wearily, “all right.” She lowered the sword, pushing the point of the blade into the soft earth and resting on the hilt. “If you’re sure it’s over, we’re safe...?”

“The bearkillers are here, and Nakhudi has friends,” Luv offered, resisting the urge to run to her and hug her tightly.

“If you like, we can check for ourselves,” Kush offered, though he did not want to do anything of the sort; all he wanted to do was run to his mother and bury his face in her belly and cry.

She looked around one last time, leaning hard on the sword, her eyes filming over with exhaustion and relief. “Good, good. I mean, no. Don’t go to check. I’m sure Nakhudi will take care of it. And the bearkillers. Good.”

She looked at them and her expression changed. Both of them saw her eyes soften and dampen instantly, as she finally permitted herself to be just their mother again. “I am so pleased to see you both, my sons. Alive and well. So pleased.”

She toppled backwards, fell on her rear end on the ground, then fell back unconscious. The sword remained stuck where she had put it, swaying slowly.

They rushed to her.

It was a very subdued and oddly mixed group that assembled in the ashram courtyard some time later. The corpses of the dead—friend and foe alike—had been carried over to the North clearing and lined up there, awaiting last rites and cremation. Maharishi Valmiki himself sat with his head and arm bound with whatever clean cloth was available. He had been caught unawares early in the attack and struck down hard by a mace blow when he emerged from his hut to see what the commotion was about. Somehow, he had survived with only a bruised skull and broken arm. He looked sombre and sad. Every face was grim, several still stained by tear streaks, some still in pain, with injuries minor or major, and more than a few were angry, even on the verge of rage. The double rows of little bodies were responsible for invoking that last emotion. Even the most peacable of brahmins or sadhins could not overcome the revulsion and rage that rose unbidden at the thought of those little innocents being hacked down so mercilessly. There had already been several tirades and angry words and it had taken a while and some words from Maharishi Valmiki before they calmed down sufficiently to sit silently.

Sita herself felt that same rage, but coupled with it was a great sense of relief that her sons had survived. She knew that was only because of the training she had imparted unto them, and the fortuitous fact that they had not been present at the time of the attack so were not caught unawares in the thick of the melee. But had the bearkillers not been alerted to the approach of the attackers by their assault on Nakhudi's village earlier, and had Nakhudi herself not arrived when she had, with a whole company of aging but nevertheless fit and armed ex-soldiers, then the entire ashram would certainly have been wiped out, down to the last living creature. One attacker had been about to start killing the milch cows when Captain Bejoo and his men came upon him and his companions—had they come even moments later, the cows would have been hacked down where they stood. And the children! Oh, the children. What monsters could do such things?

She forced her own emotions under control and listened as Maharishi Valmiki began to speak. The guru sat on the raised mud stoop of his own hut, as he did everyday during his daily pravachan. But never before had he addressed such a motley gathering: Before him the remnants of the ashram inhabitants sat cross-legged as they always did, barely two dozen-odd brahmins and sadhins who had survived from almost twice that number, most of them injured physically, every last one grievously soul-struck and psychologically shocked. To his right sat the bearkillers, crouched down on their haunches, weapons laid behind them out of consideration for the Maharishi, yet close enough at hand just in case. They had lost only two of their number and suffered a few minor injuries, while causing over a dozen casualties. To the guru's left sat Bejoo and the retired PFs. They had suffered no losses at all, just three minor injuries. By the time they had appeared on the scene, the attackers had already been in retreat and apart from the attempted cow-killer and three or four of his associates, they had caused no further casualties in the enemy ranks either. Nakhudi and her sons sat close beside her.

She listened with only half her mind as the guru spoke deep glowing words of reassurance, drawing on his deep knowledge of the Vedas, the sacred repository of all knowledge in the mortal world, and providing explanations that threw light on the events of the day. They were wonderful, healing words and she felt their efficacy in calming her spirit and acting as a balm to her emotional wounds. But she could not help thinking through the details and reasons of today's assault.

In all, about forty of the attackers had died during the ashram attack and its aftermath, almost half of that number killed by Sita herself and her sons. That was an inherent advantage of arrowcraft of course but it was more than that. It was the difference between armed and trained kshatriyas in a state of preparedness and innocent unarmed brahmins caught unawares. Sita had long since thought that if only she and a few of the other acolytes could form a permanent sentry watch of the ashram, they could have ensured a better defense in the event of such an attack. But Maharishi Valmiki had forbidden that outright each time she suggested it, and moreover, while many ashrams encouraged the bearing of weapons and even the use of them in training on a daily basis, Valmiki Ashram emphasized ahimsa, peaceful existence, as a way of life. Even the young brahmacharyas who trained in warcraft were only permitted to use wooden training weapons—their final year of weapons training was conducted at Vashishta Ashram north of Ayodhya. While many maharishis spoke of non-violence and peaceful co-existence fervently, Valmiki made it an integral aspect of everyday living.

But that was not the reason this had happened. Living in peace was not the reason for so many having died violently today. Armed mercenaries as well-equipped, trained and experienced as these had been did not simply come rampaging through ashrams. Rakshasas had once attacked outposts, ashrams and travellers in just such vicious fashion, and there was no doubt that these men had behaved like rakshasas in their brutal assault. But rakshasas attacked because their kind and mortalkind were engaged in an internecine struggle for dominance of the mortal realm. These mercenaries had no racial or species survival motivation for their actions. They were quite obviously following orders and getting paid exceedingly well for doing so. Purses had been found on every single one, identical purses filled with goldcoin. The coin was Ayodhyan, struck with the king's seal, no less. And the number had been the same in every case: thirty gold coins. A small fortune, sufficient to enable each one of them to live comfortably for years, buy his way into a good position at any Arya court, or provide capital to set up his own trade or business. Retirement funds. That explained the brutal vigor with which they had pursued their mission. But it didn't explain why the persons who had paid them had ordered them to attack these particular targets. It was possible that even they did not know or care. Their job was to ride here and kill everyone, and they had tried to do that as best and as quickly as possible.

She also thought that they were not likely to return. The losses they had suffered had been considerable, almost half of their total number. They could not have expected such heavy casualties on such a mission. It must have come as a great shock to those who survived and got away. They would likely not care to return to their employers, who might well get upset with them for having left any survivors, and might even demand that they return forthwith and complete their given task. Fulfil your dharma, kshatriya, as the phrase went. Which they would not want to do, when faced with such superior opposition. So they would probably just ride out and keep riding and enjoy their ill-gotten gains. She understood their type well enough to be certain that was what they would do.

Which meant the ashram was safe enough. For now.

But sooner or later, the people who had sent this attack force here would learn of their survival. And once they learned that some of them still lived, they would send more mercenaries. Again. And again. Until they accomplished their task.

They must act before that happened.

Her mind made up, she waited for a suitable break in the pravachan, then stood and waited until Maharishi Valmiki acknowledged her.

He did so very soon. His drawn face and deeply set eyes reflected his own inner sorrow as he nodded, permitting her to speak.

“Gurudev,” she said in a voice loud enough to be heard across the courtyard, yet sombrely enough to reflect the grim mood of the occasion, “A terrible thing has happened here today. Someone from Ayodhya has ordered our extermination.”

Valmiki sighed and looked down for a moment, as if she had said the very thing he had been dreading she would say. “It is a terrible thing indeed. Yet we cannot know who caused it or what their reasons were. Let us not make hasty assumptions.”

She shook her head, disagreeing gently but firmly. “Not assumptions, guruji. Conclusions. The evidence we have found points to only one source for this heinous assault. Ayodhya.”

There were murmurs of agreement from both sides, as beakillers and veterans agreed alike with her conclusion. Even the wan and pale ashramites listened with morbid interest. She saw her sons exchange a glance and saw that Nakhudi observed that glance with a peculiar expression and felt her heart ache with a familiar pain. And I even know his name but cannot speak it aloud, for he is the father of our children.

“Even if we cannot name the ultimate perpetrator responsible, there is no doubt about Ayodhya’s involvement.” She held her hand down to Nakhudi who understood what she meant and passed up one of the purses to her. Sita held it up, removing a coin and holding it up so it caught the evening light and gleamed coldly, viciously. “This is the king’s seal. These coin purses were not given to ordinary men for any ordinary task. These were men personally hired and instructed by the king himself or someone close to him. Former Vajra Captain Bejoo can confirm this. He received similar purses from the late Maharaja Dasaratha during his reign and the present liege, King Rama Chandra.”

She held a hand out in Bejoo’s direction, the same hand that held the purse. The other hand had been reset by Nakhudi but still ached terribly and would be unusable for a few days. Bejoo stood and looked around, nodding sadly, almost shamefully.

“It is true. That is a maharaja’s purse, given only to those following his explicit orders on private missions. These men were working for none other than the king of Ayodhya.”

This provoked an outburst of murmurs which Sita quelled with another gesture.

“Given this evidence, I say we act at once and ensure that such an attack does not happen again.”

Many heads bobbed, nodding in agreement. But there was one whose opinion counted more than the others. She turned to look at Maharishi Valmiki, joining her hands together in supplication. It hurt to move the injured hand even by that much but she held the namaskaram out of respect for her guru and protector for all these years.

“Gurudev,” she said. “We ask your aashirwaad to go forth and attempt to resolve this situation. Pray, grant us your sacred blessings that we may ensure the survival of the inhabitants of this ashram and the continuance of your great work here.”

Maharishi Valmiki looked at her with troubled dark eyes. His once-jet black beard sprouted several curls of white and his face was lined and drawn with the pain of the day’s events.

“Lady Vedavati,” he said, “You feel this is our only recourse? We cannot simply put this incident behind us and continue with our lives as before?”

She shook her head slowly, using her good arm to point north, towards the northern clearing, where all the bodies lay awaiting their final unction. “Can we? Truly?”

He lowered his head, acknowledging the truth of what she said. Several heads bowed with his as well, sharing his sorrow. Sita felt his pain at seeing this day come to pass and resented the man who had brutalized the peaceful environment of the Maharishi’s ashram and brought things to such a pass.

Yet she knew that they must act, if only to survive. And taking action meant doing whatever was necessary.

What other choice do we have now?

What choice has Rama left us?

TEN

Shatrugan and Bharat rode silently at the head of the long column. Glancing back, it seemed as if the line went on forever, to the horizon and beyond, endlessly. And these are only our own forces. The vanar armies are on a separate route, moving across woodland and hinterland, eastwards. The thought of an army of this size—two armies, to be precise—was mind-numbing. This was no Ashwamedha yagna, it was a campaign of empirical conquest and expansion. And every maharaja, raja, clan chief, tribe chief and grama chief across Aryavarta would see it as such.

He could not believe that such a day could come to pass when Ayodhya the great emblem of democracy and kingly virtue would send forth an army to conquer its own neighbours, allies and friends in this manner. There was nothing this yagna would achieve that could not be achieved simply by calling a Grand Council, a Maha-Sabha of all the leaders of all the forces that governed the diverse nations and communities of the sub-continent and outlands.

Such a Maha-Sabha had been called before, by the great Manu Lawmaker, when he proposed an uniform code of kshatriya conduct and recommended a similar code be drawn up by the heads of each varna and adhered to throughout the civilized world. Many other great things had been proposed and ratified at that same Maha-sabha. The shelves in the King's Library of Ayodhya were heavy with the scroll records of its achievements. Guru Vashishta had made them spend several dusty days studying the original scrolls themselves as young men, to see for themselves what their ancestors had wrought through diplomacy, wisdom and through Arya dharma—the noblest form of dharma possible.

And today, what good were all the scrolls in that great library, all those annals, all those treaties and writs and declarations and codes and lawbooks? In one fell sweep, the war-hawks had driven Rama to build an army the likes of which had never even been imagined before and which was certainly not required, and his hawkish advisors and ministers had convinced him to send forth the army on this travesty of a ritual. There was no need for an Ashwamedha yagna. Ayodhya was already acknowledged as the supreme power in the Arya world. A king did not need a ceremony to remind people that he was still king. And even if such a ceremony was called for, it certainly did not require the sending forth of an armed force of this strength and magnitude to ensure that nobody disagreed with the king's authority. Only a tyrant deployed such an iron hand. A great king needed only a firm voice to command obedience.

Bharat knew Rama was a great king. Ram Rajya, his reign was rightly called. And he had done a great deal of good for the kingdom and the capital city. But at what cost? Dharma, his catchphrase, his unofficial slogan, his motto for all occasions, was all well and good. But this was not dharma, this was beyond dharma or anything akin to it. This was simply war-mongering. And he did not believe Rama was a war-monger. As Dasaratha's son, as the heir to the sunwood throne, protector of the Arya world and inheritor of the burden of responsibility of caring for the welfare of the civilized world, he knew better. But those year in exile, the things he had undergone, the atrocities and wars and struggles, perhaps they had changed Rama more deeply than even he, Bharat, had suspected at first.

Or perhaps it was the loss of Sita.

Yes.

That was what his heart believed. The true cause at the centre of Rama's change of personality and outlook.

Banishing Sita had altered Rama forever. From within and without. He was no longer the man who had left for exile as a young married prince in love with his new bride, nor was he the man who had returned from that long and punishing exile, marked by the scars of a thousand violent encounters and a terrible war. This man was someone else. Someone Bharat did not entirely understand. All he knew was that the day Rama had banished Sita, he had begun to change. And today, this travesty that was being passed off as a yagna, this was only the culmination of that long process of change.

The sound of a conch shell trumpet startled him out of his reverie. He looked up, trying to discern the source of the alarm.

Shatrugan pointed up ahead, over the hill that obscured their view. "Up ahead from the front of the line. That sounds like..." He broke off, glancing at Bharat with a grim expression. “I hope it isn’t what I think it is.”

Bharat cursed softly under his breath. “Let’s go.”

They broke away from their line and rode along the shoulder of the raj-marg. The lines of foot-soldiers, marching six-abreast in full battle kit, blurred past as they broke into a full-out gallop. The conch shell alarm was taken up by their own trumpeteer, followed thereafter by the one at the head of the next column and so on down the line. With the sheer number of columns and regiments in the procession, he thought it would probably take an hour or more for the alarm to finally reach Rama himself, for based on the distance Shatrugan and he had come and their relative position to the royal regiment, Rama was probably only just departing the First Gate now, on the evening of the day the great yagna had begun.

They crested the hill and saw that it was indeed what they had feared. From the ranks of cavalry riding at a brisk canter a yojana ahead—they could make this out from the shape and movement of the dust cloud raised by the horses—they estimated that the incident had occurred just west of the Videha border. Bharat felt a surge of alarm mixed with uncertain emotions. Surely Videhans were not involved! He couldn’t bear to even think of the possibility of going to war against his own in-laws! What would Mandvi think? And Taksha and Pushkala were in Mithila as well, alongwith their mother, for one of their grandfather’s frequent peace ceremonies. The thought of this mighty force going up against the voluntary reserve militia of Videha made his blood run cold.

“Come on,” he said grimly, spurring his horse downhill. Shatrugan needed no urging; the same thoughts were surely passing through his mind as well. After all, they had the same in-laws.

Lakshman pointed an accusing finger at the man at the head of the mercenary force. “What do you mean, someone took the horse? The only ones I see here are you fellows!”

The man stared arrogantly back at Lakshman. He and the sixty-odd soldiers behind him were all mounted on handsome horses, fully armoured and well-equipped. While Lakshman didn't recognize him or any of the men he commanded, he recognized the equipment well enough. It was king's issue, given out only to those on missions for the maharaja himself. I mean missions for the Samrat, he thought acidly. That and the fact that the man had known the proper Sanskrit codes that pronounced him as one of their own was scant reassurance to him. His gut told him something was wrong and he trusted his gut over any number of codes or authorizations.

For one thing, he knew that these men had no business being here. Nobody was supposed to be ahead of the sacred stallion. Sumantra and he were the frontrunners, the only ones permitted to watch the animal from close quarters. Everyone else was expected to follow.

Yet these men had appeared from nowhere, cutting across his and Sumantra's path, almost startling the horses drawing the old prime minister's chariot, and had just made the astonishing claim that the horse had been taken.

How? When?

Only moments before, Lakshman had been watching the rear end of the horse with his own eyes. Tail twitching rhythmically, the beast had been cantering leisurely along the wooded path, heading deeper into the woods and farther away from any recognized human settlement, which suited him perfectly.

Then, suddenly something had startled the beast and he had seen it lurch, whinny in panic, then break into a gallop, racing off the path and into the woods. He had coaxed his horse to speed up and was about to follow the sacred stallion when suddenly, this band of armed horsemen had burst out of the woods, blocking his way effectively and shouting that the royal horse had been captured and a challenge issued. He had ordered them out of the way so he could follow the horse. He was certain that it could not possibly have been taken in the few moments since he had seen it bolt into the woods, and even if it had, how could these men have seen that happen, and ridden out to intercept him, all within a moment or two? It was impossible. Yet this man provided the pre-arranged code which identified him as one of the maharaja's regiment, and insisted on this absurd claim.

“We are the emperor’s men,” said the man leading the band. “It is our sworn duty to protect and serve our liege and his interests. We tell you, the horse has been taken and the challenge issued. Sound the alarm, ex-pradhan mantri. You know the protocol.”

Lakshman had glanced back at Sumantra. The old man’s bushy brows were knitted together suspiciously as he stared at the newcomer.

“Do as you are told, oldun,” said the man harshly. “Or you will be reported to Lord Bhadra and Pradhan Mantri Jabali and dealt with severely!”

Sumantra’s eyes narrowed and he held the man’s gaze for a moment. “I will issue the alarm, not because I fear reprimand, but because you are right, it is the protocol.” To Lakshman he said in a kinder, almost apologetic tone. “If we lose sight of the stallion for even as long as this much time, it is our duty to sound the alarm and inform the king.”

“Emperor,” the horseman corrected harshly.

Sumantra glared at him but said nothing. Instead, he picked up a red flag on a pole from the floor of the chariot, hefted it up as high as he could manage and waved it to and fro several times until it was seen by the next contingent behind them. The flagman of that contingent responded by waving a similar flag back at him, then turned and instructed the trumpeteer beside him on that chariot. The man immediately took up his conch shell trumpet and sounded the clear booming tones that carried across the landscape loudly enough to be heard miles behind. The instant his conch shell fell silent, the next one in the procession a mile or so behind them sounded, and in this manner the alarm was taken up and followed down the line, all the way back to Ayodhya where it would be heard finally by the king. Sorry, emperor.

Lakshman pushed his horse a yard forward, taking it almost snout to snout with the newcomer’s horse. “What name do you go by, soldier?” he asked roughly.

“Why?” asked the man with a sly grin. “Do you wish to suggest me for a commendation?”

Lakshman resisted the urge to draw his sword and slice the insolent grin off the man's face. Instead, he said, "Your name."

The man shrugged. "Aarohan."

Lakshman stared at him a moment longer, then snapped his reins, urging his horse forward. He rode straight at the rest of the gang milling about, blocking his path. He saw their eyes flick to their leader, over his shoulder, as he approached. He also saw several of them reach for the hilts of their swords and other weapons, as if prepared to fight him rather than let him pass.

He did not turn to look back but from the relaxing of their expressions and the fact that they moved their horses aside with brisk tugs of their reins, he understood that they had asked and received permission visually from their leader to let him pass.

That galled him no end. What right did they have to decide whether or not he passed! Who were these men anyway and why were they permitted—or ordered, as they claimed—to ride ahead of the horse itself in violation of the ritual's rules? And what was this game they were playing? Besides, he could see bloodstains, tears and rents, and other indications that this group had been in a fight very recently. What did that mean? The horse had been in his view until only moments ago. There had been nobody to fight. So whom had these men been fighting and where and why?

He had no answers to these questions, and it was possible they did not matter. His only concern right now was the horse and what had happened to it. That was his sole responsibility. He would never have lost sight of it had these buffoons not come riding out and blocked his path as they had done—quite deliberately, he knew, although he also knew that it would not sound logical were he to explain the same to Rama or to anyone else, because they would in turn claim that they had only been riding to warn him.

But he knew damn well the horse had not been taken or challenged until they had appeared.

And he would prove that in another moment or two, once he followed its trail and found it.

He rode past the last of the men, clearly nursing a broken or badly injured arm in a makeshift sling, and then went past them and into the forest, praying he could pick up the trail of the horse and locate it before it grew too dark to read signs. He didn't think it would be possible. Already, the sun was low in the western sky and long shadows were drawing across the forest. And while the men might be louts and arrogant asses, he did not think they were lying altogether. Someone must have taken the horse, even if that someone turned out to be one of Arohan's own men or associates.

The question was why.

He intended to find that out.

Shatrugan exclaimed in a low voice. Bharat and he were galloping down the raj-marg, just passing the head of the first column. The officers saluted both of them as they rode past. Bharat didn't waste time saluting or slowing. He had seen the same thing Shatrugan had and didn't like the looks of it.

They were still a good four or five hundred yards from the frontrunner's chariot. He knew that was manned by the former pradhan mantri Sumantra, with Lakshman riding alongside on point to keep a watch for any challengers or threats to the sacred horse. That was the custom. Strictly speaking, the king or chieftain for whose good fortunes the yagna was being performed usually rode the chariot, with the queen's foremost champion riding alongside as protection. But since Rama was now an Emperor and presumably too important to be riding a bumpy old single chariot by himself, he had delegated the task to Sumantra. Although why an ex-prime minister should be handling the chore rather than the present incumbent prime minister, Jabali, who at least filled an official capacity in the government of the nation, Bharat could not fathom. Like most of Rama's operations and decisions, his motives were inscrutable to all but the most intimate of his advisors. For that matter, Bhadra, as the declared champion at the last mela, ought to be the one riding alongside the chariot, but Bhadra being Bhadra, was way back there with Rama.

And now, if he was seeing correctly ahead, Bharat thought he might guess at the reason why protocol had been conveniently sidestepped.

He saw what looked like a violent scuffle up ahead. A band of armoured and heavily armed horseriders—the setting sun flashed off their armour and reflected off their weapons as they swung them—seemed to be attacking a lone man in the frontrunner chariot. That would be Sumantra. Where was Lakshman then? Bharat had no idea. But he would certainly find out very quickly. He didn't know who those men were or why they were attacking the aging pradhan mantri who had been acknowledged as one of the finest diplomats ever to grace Arya governance, and one of the greatest peacekeepers as well, but he knew that it could not be because Sumantra had wanted or invited violence. If Sumantra was engaged in a violent clash with an entire company of armed cavalry as it seemed, then the horsemen were the ones attacking without provocation.

He urged his horse to gallop faster, pushing the mare to her limit. He was glad that protocol required at least a third of the marg to be kept clear for riders and chariots on urgent missions to be able to move quickly, and that his ancestors had built such fine kingsroads and maintained them so well all these centuries.

Even so, all that fine planning and maintenance and a powerful Bhoja mare between his legs could not carry him to the aid of Sumantra in time.

He was still a hundred yards away, Shatrugan neck to neck with him, when they saw one of the horsemen ride around the chariot and throw a pike at Sumantra's back. The pike struck home—and stuck. The old man twisted, freezing in mid air, and that pause was all his attackers needed—they moved in, chopping and hacking and pounding at will, five or six of them at once, the cowards, and even as Bharat came within shouting distance, he saw the old diplomat fall upon the railing of his own chariot, collapsing with a sickening finality.

“COWARDS! Leave him be!” Bharat roared, feeling the frustration and impotence of the past several days explode in a burst of righteous rage.

Beside him, Shatrugan had unslung his bow and now loosed three arrows in quick succession. All three found their mark – in the torso and neck of the coward who had struck at Sumantra from behind. The man clutched at his throat as he fell off his horse, his death rattle audible even as the brothers bore down on the armed murderers. The other men continued to hack and poke at Sumantra with their weapons.

“COWARDS!” Bharat shouted.

At the sound of his voice, they broke away from the chariot, shot nervous glances back at the approaching horses, and spurred their own mounts into a fitful gallop, riding for the treeline.

“STAND AND FIGHT, YOU CRAVEN!” Bharat yelled.

But the horsemen had the advantage of being close to one of the densest forests in all Aryavarta, the fabled Southwoods. Even as Bharat and Shatrugan came abreast of the chariot, the horsemen were disappearing into the shadowy depths of the forest.

Bharat would have ridden past the chariot and given chase but he saw Sumantra move and slowed his horse to a reluctant halt.

“Go on!” he yelled at Shatrugan who thundered past him, loosing arrows as he went. “I’ll catch up. Don’t let them get away!”

He paused beside Sumantra, his horse snorting and shaking her head. Bharat reached out and grasped hold of the old statesman’s hand. He was sickened by the number of wounds on the man’s torso, head and neck. The butchers! What kind of soldiers were these to attack a solitary old man?

“Who were they?” he asked, squeezing Sumantra’s hand gently.

Sumantra coughed up a mouthful of blood, spitting it over the side of the chariot. His eyes were rheumy and filled with blood streaming down from a gash on his skull. An axe wound. He kept blinking, but could not see Bharat. Still, he recognized his voice.

“Yuvraj Bharat,” he said, as he had said so many thousands of times before, through Bharat’s growing years when he had been both father’s friend and father figure to all four brothers.

“Treachery within...” Sumantra said, then coughed up a burst of blood, much of which splattered on Bharat’s tunic.

Bharat held on to the old man's hand without flinching or turning away: he had seen his share of blood spilled, and had spilled his share as well. He listened and waited for more, but the wrinkled hand had lost all life and the eyes had shut, sticky with blood, and the old balding head full of white hair dyed crimson had fallen forward on the railing of the chariot, lifeless.

ELEVEN

Nakhudi held up her hand, cocking her head. Maatr passed on the instruction, emphasizing it with a downward chop of her hand.

At once, all those following froze in place. Nakhudi had spent several minutes reminding the group that she would be in charge and they must follow her lead in all actions. The twins knew that even though she had seemed to say this to the entire group, it was actually the two of them she was addressing. They had sighed impatiently and nodded reluctantly. And had almost immediately after regretted doing so, because Nakhudi set such a slow pace. But they had agreed and while they sometimes things that displeased Nakhudi, Maatr, or even Guru Valmiki on occasion, they never blatantly disregarded or disobeyed a direct instruction. It just so happened that they seemed to always find some loop hole in interpretation that they could take advantage of!

Right now, though, with Nakhudi in front leading the way, and Maatr on second point just behind Nakhudi, they could hardly just race ahead, even though they knew they could make five times the pace she was making. Besides, that old fogey Bejoo and the rest of the retired soldiers were right behind them, and despite their age, they were pretty sharp and savvy; so Luv and Kush were behaving themselves and trotting respectfully behind Nakhudi and Maatr as instructed.

There was a grim mood upon the group. The massacre at the ashram and the village had shaken everybody. The surviving rishis and brahmins of the ashram had been the worst affected, of course, being men and women of vedic learning and quiet meditation all their lives. The kshatriyas had recovered sooner but were no less injured emotionally by the experience. Such things were not supposed to happen. Not in the reign of the great Rama Chandra of Ayodhya. Then again, as Luv and Kush knew quite well because of their daily recitation lessons taught by Guruji himself, Rama Chandra was not entirely the great exalted being that he was often made out to be; he had feet of clay that were painfully brittle. The long epic poem that had formed the main body of their instruction by the Maharishi ever since they were old enough to recite and memorize long Sanskrit passages, told a quite unflattering version of the itihasa of the great King of Ayodhya's life and adventures. Even the name seemed ironic to them now: Rama-yana, literally, 'the travels of Rama'.

Well, it seemed that the great Rama was on the move once again, and the slaughter had resumed. Why was it, they wondered – and had often asked Gurudev after their daily rote recitation lessons – that Rama's tale was so replete with blood-letting and violence? Maharishi Valmiki had been silent for a moment, as he almost always was after being asked a question, then he had said that they must examine the poem he had composed and which they now knew well enough to recite by heart from start to finish, for themselves, and come to their own conclusions. It was important, he added, that one consider the actual verses and interpret them oneself, without an intermediary involved, even one as learned as himself, the creator of the work! There might be commentaries written about his Rama-yana in ages to come, and perhaps once the wisdom of Treta-Yuga dimmed to give way to the lesser self-awareness and thirst for knowledge of later Yugas people would pay less attention to the original shlokas he had composed and give more weightage to its recensions, retellings and commentaries instead, but for now, there was only the original text itself, and it would have to suffice.

“A life must speak for itself, on its own terms, in its own words,” he had said gravely, looking at each one of them in turn with that penetrating yet deeply empathetic and benign gaze he had, making each of them feel as if he could see right through to the depths of their souls. “It is a mistake to listen to interpretations and versions of any fact and assume that they too are fact. Only truth itself is truth. Anything that refers, references or even repeats it is but a version. For no repetition can be perfect and exact in every detail. A man is a man. A portrait of a man, no matter how accurate, is not the man himself, merely a portrait. Similarly, a story of a man is not the man himself, merely a story. My Ramayana is already a version of itihasa, not itihasa itself. To know that truth, one would have to live and observe those events oneself—not merely as a bystander, or even a participant—but as Rama himself! Until you can walk in his paduka and be Rama, you can never truly know what he was and why he did what he did, you can only offer individual interpretations —and when it comes to interpretations, each one is as valid as any other. So be careful of judging him. For by doing so, you are judging only an ephemeron.”

He had gestured to the moths flying around the oil lamp that hung from the pole of the stoop. “Like an insect that lives only a short time, any poem, portrait or description of a man is simply a moth. Hold it close to the agni of truth and that version burns to ash and disappears. Only the flame itself is truth. And who can enter into the heart of agni and live to report that truth?”

Now, they each wondered grimly if Rama Chandra had indeed sent those vicious murderers to massacre their friends and neighbours so brutally. If they could not judge his past itihasa, they could certainly judge his present actions. They dearly wished to know how a man hailed by the world as the king of dharma could be responsible for such undharmic deeds. This was not a debatable act such as the killing of Vali or the invasion of Lanka, both of which were contentious but justifiable in some way. This was pure and simple murder of innocents without cause, provocation or justification. Surely Rama could not be so hypocritical to have sent those men himself to do this unforgivable deed? There must be a better explanation—and as shishyas of the great Maharishi Valmiki, they would suspend judgement until they knew what that explanation might be. But it had better come soon and it had better clear all their doubts.

They waited impatiently but with absolute discipline as Nakhudi and Maatr went up ahead to investigate something.

Finally, Luv sighed. Kush glanced at him, reading him as easily as he could read the thoughts of his own mind.

Luv looked at him in a certain way. To anyone watching the twins, it would have seemed just a look, with no particular meaning or inflection. But to Kush, it spoke as eloquently as words themselves.

Luv was asking him if they should go forward just a bit, to take a small peek.

Kush looked back at him with the faintest twinkle in his eyes. Again, that careful observer might not have seen any change of expression in the boy’s face, but somehow, Kush conveyed his response:

Yes!

Moving as one, both twins left their place behind a papaya tree and slipped ahead, following the direction their mother and Nakhudi had taken.

Bejoo watched the boys go and knew they ought to be waiting patiently until Nakhudi or Vedavati returned and gave the order to push forward again. But he didn't judge them. He had no problem following Nakhudi's lead, she was as effective a leader as many fine commanders he had served under, and far better than many juniors he himself had commanded. But this was not a military operation, fought under the kshatriya code and in usual battle circumstances. This was something else altogether; he did not know it was exactly and that troubled him. It troubled him more than the actual massacre. Death and slaughter disturbed him as much as it did the peaceful denizens of Valmiki Ashram, but unlike them, he could think and act beyond the shock of those events. That was his job, and the essence of his varna. It was the reason why varna existed in the first place: so that enough individuals in any Arya community or kingdom were capable of doing their vital given task even under the most challenging circumstances and conditions. Such as a soldier capable of withstanding the horrors of violence and continuing to fulfill his dharma as a warrior. Or a house builder capable of building houses even while a war raged, because that was his dharma. Bejoo's life had prepared him for violence and for acting despite the net of confusion and madness that violence inevitably cast upon those affected by it, but the massacre in the forest had shaken even that sense of kshatriya fortitude, not because of the horror of the deaths, for he had seen far worse, but because of the possibility that the marauders might have been on a king's mission, as the discovery of the purses and their accoutrements seemed to prove. He was determined to find out the truth behind the attacks. And like the boys, he was as impatient to keep moving and get answers quickly.

He was also troubled by Nakhudi and Lady Vedavati taking so long. A moment or two to check if someone lurked ahead—that was fine. But they had been absent several moments and that was not fine.

As the leader of his company, he decided that the prolonged absence of his commanding officer entitled him to disregard that commander's last order and move ahead.

He raised his hand, gesturing forward, and began moving ahead himself. The PFs would follow like shadows.

He was not surprised to see that the twins were already out of sight and hearing. Those two boys moved like arrows on a backwind. He only hoped that their very speed would not propel them into the arms of trouble too quickly.

Sita knew something was wrong the instant she saw the horse. It was a magnificent black stallion, a great one, and it was adorned with the marks and signs of a yagna. This was no ordinary horse and it was not here by accident. She was well aware of the Ashwamedha ceremony being performed by Rama and the epic army accompanying the horse on what was clearly a campaign of empirical conquest and expansion. Seeing this stallion, she knew at once that this was the horse being used in the sacrifice.

But what is it doing here? And why is it unaccompanied?

The first question could be answered easily: the horse could have wandered into this neck of the woods. It was only a stone's throw from the raj-marg after all, which was why Nakhudi and she had been heading this way, the quicker to reach their destination.

But the second question was a disturbing one. It was not conceivable that the horse could be allowed to stray on its own into the woods, out of sight of its followers. That defeated the whole purpose of the Ashwamedha yagna. It was imperative to follow the horse closely and watch where it went at all times.

She exchanged a glance with Nakhudi who shook her head doubtfully. This was not right.

They watched the horse for a few more moments. It was wandering aimlessly, nuzzling a patch of grass here, then snorting and moving on to find a more appetising patch elsewhere. It came towards Sita and she blanched, backing away to keep a distance. Even being seen near the horse could be misconstrued. Her heart beat faster as she looked over the animal's rump. But there was nobody there, nobody in sight, just the forest. She listened and heard bird sounds from about a mile or two further up, just about where the raj-marg ought to pass by this section of the forest. This part of the woods were dead silent, which meant there were no other intruders here.

Even so, she kept her distance from the beast. It flicked its ears to and fro as his keen senses smelled her out and Nakhudi too, but as they did not move or do anything that seemed alarming, he continued around the shrubbery behind which they crouched, trotting slowly past them, moving deeper into the forest.

Nakhudi came closer to whisper to her. "You know what that is?"

Sita nodded grimly. "It's no coincidence."

"No, it isn't. I don't like the smell of this."

"What should we do?" Sita asked. "If we let it stray further that way, sooner or later they will follow." She jerked her head backwards to indicate the direction the horse was heading. Valmiki Ashram lay that way.

Nakhudi rubbed her forehead slowly, as she often did when she was trying to think her way through an especially knotty dilemma. "We cannot stop it. Even touching it or being seen near it might be misunderstood." She glanced in the direction of the raj-marg with uncharacteristic anxiety. "We should not even be this close to it."

"But what else can we do?" Sita asked.

Nakhudi thought for a moment. "Scare it away."

"What?"

"Startle it into turning tail and heading back the way it came. And we should do it quickly, before the Ayodhyans come as they surely will."

Sita nodded approvingly. "Very nice. After all, it is a horse."

Nakhudi nodded. "Let's go get it before it loses itself in the woods."

They turned and were about to start back when suddenly the sound of neighing came to them clearly.

They exchanged a startled glance. Then started running.

Luv grasped the mane of the stallion and patted his side reassuringly. “Easy there, big fellow. We won’t harm you. We’re just wondering what a fine beast like you is doing here in these forests!”

“He’s a beautiful horse, isn’t he?” Kush said, patting the horse’s rump and admiring the sleek muscles beneath the glossy coat. “I’ve never seen anything like him before.”

The horse snickered again nervously, but didn’t rear up or neigh as loudly as it had when the boys came sprinting up and started it. He even let Luv put his hand around his neck and bury his face in his soft, furry side.

“Maybe we can keep him for ourselves,” Luv asked eagerly. “We’ll ask Maatr.”

“She’ll say no,” Kush grumbled. “Look at those marks. He must be part of some kind of yagna or something.”

“So? Maybe Guruji can complete the yagna and we can keep him afterwards.”

Kush shrugged doubtfully, stroking the horse’s side. “I don’t know. Let’s ask Maatr first and see.”

The stallion settled down, whinnying one last time but very half-heartedly, as if reminding them that he could bolt at any time. He seemed to be enjoying the attention lavished on him by the twins and stood still as they massaged and rubbed and generally fussed over him.

“Luv! Kush!”

Maatr’s voice was distinctive even from a distance.

Both brothers exchanged a wearily knowing look. “Uh oh,” said Luv. “Here she comes.”

“I told you!” Kush said. “Let’s go back to our position, and pretend we never moved an inch. It worked that last time.”

Luv shook his head. “No, maybe she’s not upset with us. Maybe she’s in trouble and needs our help.”

Kush shrugged but didn’t argue.

A few moments later, Maatr came sprinting through the woods, Nakhudi close behind. They stopped dead in her tracks when they saw the horse. Maatr’s eyes grew big and round and she stared in horror at her sons.

“Boys,” she said in an exaggerated whisper. “Get away from that horse.”

“He was just wandering around on his own in the woods,” Luv said. “Can we keep him? Please, Maatr!”

“Luv! Kush! Both of you! Move away from the horse at once. Do as I say!”

They sighed and released the horse. They took several steps away, shoulders slumped in a defeated gesture.

They stopped and turned around.

Maatr was still staring at them, only this time her hand was clapped across her mouth in an expression of abject dismay. “No!” she said. “No!”

Luv felt a rush of warm air on his left shoulder and frowned.

Kush turned to see the horse right behind them. He nuzzled Kush’s chin affectionately. His bright black eyes glittered mischevously beneath his fringe of coal-black mane. He snickered softly.

“Look! He likes us, Maatr!”

“He wants to be our friend,” Luv added. “Please, can we keep him?”

Nakhudi came towards them, clapping her hands loudly. “Shoo!” she said, waving urgently at the horse. “Get away, you! Go from here! Leave us!”

The stallion snorted and stepped backwards in dismay, upset by Nakhudi’s voice and tone and the sound of her clapping.

Luv held the horse's mane, comforting him. Kush shot Nakhudi a dirty look. "You're scaring him!" he said.

"Boys!" Maatr said, even more urgently. "I said get away from that horse! Leave him! Right now!"

Nakhudi waved her arms vigorously before the stallion, startling him into rearing back.

Instinctively, Kush caught hold of his mane and tried to calm him down.

"GO AWAY!" Nakhudi shouted. "Get lost!"

At that moment, Bejoo and the PF company came running up, stopping short at the sight of the Ashwamedha horse and Luv and Kush holding on to him even as Nakhudi and Sita tried to shoo him away.

"Jai Shri Shaneshwara aid us in our moment of need," Bejoo said mechanically, the colour draining from his face as he read the situation.

"Boys!" Maatr said loudly, "please leave that horse! We're not supposed to touch him!"

Luv and Kush released the horse's mane reluctantly, obeying their mother's instructions. But the stallion seemed to think they were his protectors and stayed beside them, following even when they tried to move away. Or perhaps he was only trying to get away from the large woman who was yelling and waving her arms at him violently.

"GO!" Nakhudi shouted. "Go before you get us all into trouble, you stupid horse!"

Just then birds began to call out and fly from the treetops above and the familiar rumbling sounds of horses approaching became audible to all present.

Luv and Kush saw their Maatr turn and stare at Nakhudi with a look of abject terror.

"Too late," their mother said hoarsely. "Trouble has arrived."

TWELVE

Fourteen years of forest warfare had made Lakshman an expert in reading signs and tracks. He knew at once that the gang of riders he had met on the raj-marg had come from the direction of the forest. That itself was suspicious. What business had they in the Southwoods? There was nothing in this vast wilderness that would be of interest to Ayodhyan troops, let alone king's guard as they had claimed to be, apart from a few ashrams and communities of outcastes and outlaws, which didn't count.

Also, on entering the treeline, he had immediately found signs that indicated they had waited here, within sight of the raj-marg. A closer inspection confirmed that they had been loitering here for several hours, perhaps the better part of the day, awaiting...what? The arrival of the sacred stallion and the procession, of course. And the instant they had set eyes on the horse, they had ridden out, blocking its way and forcing it off the raj-marg and into the forest, even as the larger part of their party had continued up the raj-marg, blocking Lakshman's way and line of sight, and delaying him until the horse had been coerced successfully into going into the woods.

The question was why.

He didn't mind the horse going this way. He himself had urged it in this direction, rather than towards Mithila, to avoid a confrontation. Was that their intention too? If so, they had certainly chosen a strange way to go about it! He had also actively disliked the arrogant manner and bearing of their leader Aarohan as well as the way they had all looked at him, as if he was just another rival kshatriya they would have no compunctions in cutting down in a moment. He had fought enough fights and battles to recognize the killing lust in another kshatriya's eyes—Devi knew he had often harboured that same lust in his own eyes, in the heat of battle or when faced with impossible odds—but to see it reflected in the eyes of men who were in the employ of Ayodhya, of Rama no less, was deeply disturbing. Yet he had not been mistaken: those horsemen had been willing to fight him at a moment's notice and would perhaps even have welcome an opportunity. He knew kshatriyas well enough to recognize those signs as well.

Again, the question was why. Why challenge the brother of the king...of the emperor? Why divert the sacred stallion and delay him and Sumantra long enough for the animal to lose itself in the woods? There was some larger game afoot here and he meant to find out what it was.

The tracking and reading of signs had slowed him down. He had dismounted and remounted a half dozen times already, the better to read the ground and shrubbery and lower trunks of trees. He was certain of what he had read in the tracks. But the process had also cost him time. He was not worried about the horse itself—he had found its trail most easily of all, and the animal's leisurely pace meant that he could catch up with it in a few ticks. But as he bent one last time to read a snapped twig and a hoof print, he felt the familiar vibration of the ground that indicated several riders were approaching fast, from the direction of the raj-marg.

How interesting. So the gang was now following him into the woods? Why not just ride with him at the same time? Why let him go ahead and then follow?

He weighed his options quickly: the horse was in no great danger. It was sensible enough not to go too far into the deep woods. In fact, left to itself, it would probably find its way back to the raj-marg in a little while. The only reason it had ventured into the woods was because it had been forced into them.

On the other hand, he was very curious to see why the horseriders were following him into the forest.

His decision made, he slipped behind a tree trunk, remounting his horse as he did so. With the instinct that had seen him through a hundred battles and any number of smaller encounters, he unslung his bow and notched an arrow. Then he waited.

Moments later, the gang came into sight, riding at a steady pace, clearly following the same tracks he had been following. He expected them to be following his trail as well, but they went right past him without stopping. He kept the point of the arrow on the neck of the surly leader, Aarohan, watching the man as he rode past with a broad leer on his face. Aarohan was quite pleased about something. He wondered what that might be. In a moment, they were out of sight, swallowed instantly by the dense forest.

As the thunder of their hooves faded away, he lowered the arrow, frowning.

What was going on here? If they were following the horse, they could have done so earlier, instead of waiting on the raj-marg and blocking his path and wasting time. Yet they were clearly not following him, since his trail ended here and they hadn't bothered to stop or check if he was around. They had simply gone straight on, keeping to the trail of the stallion – which meant they had chased the horse in here earlier, prevented Sumantra and he from seeing where it went, and were now following it. What did they expect would happen in the short while that the horse was out of view? And why were they following it now?

Before he could come up with any answers, or even theories, he heard the sound of another horse, a single rider coming fast.

He raised the bow again.

A moment later, the rider came into view. He was surprised to see it was his own twin brother.

“Shatrugan!” he called out softly, issuing a low whistle as he did so.

Shatrugan glanced up, as surprised to see him, and slowed to a halt. He looked angry.

“Lakshman?” He looked around suspiciously. “What are you doing here, bhraatr? What the devil is going on here? What game are those ruffians playing at?”

Lakshman raised his eyebrows. “So you met Aarohan and his nasty bunch too, I see. I don't quite know, but they seem to be chasing the sacred stallion which got away somehow. What's your excuse?”

Shatrugan glared at him. Lakshman felt a twinge of guilt at the distance that had grown between them these past years, particularly in the most recent months. “I want to see the bastards who murdered Sumantra punished, that's what. How can you tolerate such things? I know that Rama calls himself Emperor now and wants to conquer the entire known world, but is this the way to—”

Lakshman held up a hand in protest. “Hold on. What did you say? Murdered Sumantra? What do you mean?”

Shatrugan almost spat the words out in anger. “Them!” He pointed in the direction the riders had gone. “Bharat and I heard the alarm sound and raced to the frontline. We saw those brutes attacking Sumantra. They saw us coming and fled in here. Bharat said to follow, he would be close behind.”

As if on cue, the sound of another horse approaching came to Lakshman’s ears. He was still reeling from the news of Sumantra. Was this some ruse on Shatrugan and Bharat’s part? He couldn’t believe his brothers would do such a dastardly thing.

The new arrival was indeed Bharat. If Shatrugan had seemed angry, Bharat was clearly furious. He reacted violently when he saw Lakshman, wrenching his mount to a standstill and pointing an angry accusing finger.

“This is what your great emperor brother condones? Murder in broad daylight? Sumantra died in my arms moments ago.”

He held out his hands. Lakshman was shocked to see that there was indeed blood splashed on his arms and his garments. But he forced himself to remain calm. A part of his mind even whispered: He could have murdered Sumantra himself, that could be how he got that blood on his person. He immediately felt ashamed for thinking that his own brother could do such a thing. But ten years in the corridors of Suryavanshi Palace had taught him that power and politics corrupted everybody sooner or later.

He concealed his discomfiture by taking issue with Bharat’s accusation of Rama. “Rama has nothing to do with this,” he protested. “Don’t drag his name into everything that happens.”

“Of course he’s responsible,” Bharat said, “those men are king’s guard, they as good as said so to my face, the swine. If they had waited a moment longer, I would have shown them what I thought of them and their cowardly methods! They slaughtered poor Sumantra and then fled into the forest.”

Lakshman tried to keep his voice calm. "I will get to the bottom of this," he said, "but you have no authority to go about challenging or fighting our own soldiers. If they indeed assaulted Sumantra as you say, then I shall see to it they are brought to book. But until I gather all the facts in this matter —"

"If?" Bharat shouted, red in the face. "You dare to say 'If' to me? Your own brother? There is no If. Sumantra was murdered and the men who killed him fled into these woods like craven jackals. If you are our father's son, then come with us and let us punish them right now for what they did! The sons of Ayodhya need no authority to mete out justice when they see injustice done!"

Lakshman was about to reply when suddenly the sound of violent cries and shouts erupted. The clamour came from deeper inside the woods, but was not very far away.

Bharat turned the head of his horse at once. "There! You see? They are upto some game here and if you were not so enamoured of our bhraatr the emperor, you would see it as well."

Lakshman controlled his urge to shout back at his brother. "Very well, we shall ride together then and investigate further. But there will be no drawing of weapons or engaging of hostilities unless I say so. Remember. You are both under a danda and disobedience will not be tolerated!"

Bharat snorted and spoke aside to Shatrugan: "Neither will murder. Those cowards killed Sumantra by attacking from behind. I saw this man ride around the chariot and throw a pike into his back! The man wore a beard clipped in that eastern style, with some of his cheek shaved clean, and his chin full of hair and he was a big fellow, even bigger than me by at least half a foot. I would recognize him anywhere. He will answer to me personally, danda be damned."

Lakshman realized with a start that Bharat had just described Aarohan, the leader of the horse riders. He set his mouth grimly and turned his horse. He could not admit it to his brothers but he too had his suspicions about that gang and that was why it was important that he approached this matter with caution and intelligence. There was a great game afoot here, no doubt about it, and evidently it was important enough to the players to sacrifice an ex-prime minister and even a prince or two to achieve victory.

“Let’s go,” he said curtly and rode into the forest, his brothers close beside him.

Bejoo arrived on the scene just in time to see Luv and Kush clinging to a sleek black horse that could be no other than the sacred Ashwamedha stallion. Their mother was urging them to release the horse even as Nakudi tried to shoo it away. The horse itself seemed nervous and he distinctly saw it nuzzle one of the boys, as if seeking his protection.

Then the sound of pounding hooves alerted him and he instantly reacted, gesturing orders to his men. He saw Somasra, who was acting as his second in command, nod and pass on the instructions to the others. At once, they melded into the forest, keeping out of sight for the time being. Bejoo had seen just enough to know something was desperately wrong with the scene before his eyes. The sacred stallion could not have simply wandered into the forest unaccompanied. And he had been only moments behind Luv and Kush, so he knew quite well that the boys had not gone out of their way to seek out and capture the horse. Somehow, the horse had come to them and they were only trying to comfort and calm it down. He had been a boy once and had loved horses then with a passion that had never faded since; he understood the protectiveness the boys felt. Besides, from the looks of it, they had no idea it was forbidden to touch the horse, nor were they aware of the consequences of doing so.

But he was. And he had a feeling that all heaven and hell were about to come crashing down on their heads now. And those two innocent young boys were going to need all the help they could get.

So he hid behind a tree and waited to see what happened next.

He did not have to wait long. Moments later, a large company of horseriders appeared, riding hard and fast. He felt a surge of anger as he recognized them as the same brigands who had committed the slaughter in the village and the ashram. The brutes had the gumption to come back? But of course! This must be part of the plan! He was no politician or statesman but he knew enough of the dirty tricks those people played to see that this whole day had been scripted from morn to dusk and that this scene unfolding now was a crucial part of the whole play.

He saw the man at the head of the company haul up his horse. He was a big fellow, brutish looking and powerfully built, with the kind of musculature that came from exercising with elephants. Bejoo had been a vajra commander once and elephants had been an integral part of his vajra. He had known men who had trained with elephants to build their muscle strength to extents that could not be achieved merely by lifting weighted objects or boulders. Elephants did not lie still like rocks or weights, they pulled and pushed and bore down in unexpected ways. Training with them could leave a man with crushed limbs or worse very quickly, but if he survived and persisted, he would achieve a body bulk that few others could. This man leading the horse gang was clearly an elephant wrestler judging by those bulging neck muscles, shoulders, arms, biceps—just about every part of his body in fact. Bejoo suspected the man also took some of the forbidden herbs known for increasing a man's strength albeit at the cost of his senses and wits.

The man had a distinctive way of wearing his beard, shaving away the sides to bare his cheeks, leaving a bristly chin. That suggested vanity. Which went with the naked arrogance he displayed.

The man spoke in loud commanding tones, clearly delivering a carefully rehearsed speech: “YOU THERE! You have violated the sanctity of the Ashwamedha ritual and challenged the supremacy of Samrat Rama Chandra of Ayodhya! The penalty is instant execution. Surrender yourself to our mercy or die now!”

There was an instant of shocked silence. Into this brief pause, Bejoo heard Luv's voice—or perhaps it was Kush's voice, he could not tell the two apart—say in his boyish way but with a cold steely edge that was far more mature than most ten year olds, “Those are the men who attacked our home this morning.”

And he heard the other boy reply just as grimly: “Yes, they are.”

THIRTEEN

Bharat clenched his fist around his reins angrily as he took in the scene ahead. So this was the drama that was being played out.

He saw two women and two boys and the sacred stallion. The boys were beside the stallion which seemed to desire their company. The horse displayed no signs of restlessness or nervousness that it would have, had the boys captivated it against its will. Bharat distinctly saw the horse nudge one of the boys in the shoulder, demanding his attention, a gesture Bharat himself knew well from his own life-long experience with horses. There was no capture here nor any challenge that he could see. Not by the Ashwamedha's interpretation of the terms. It was obvious that the gang of horse riders had deliberately coerced the horse to ride in this direction, somehow knowing that these forest dwellers would come across it sooner or later, with the express intention of blaming them.

Then he saw who the boys and the women were and his mouth opened in surprise. It helped that one of the women, the one clad in the red-ochre garb of a sadhini, looked up at him as he approached, and her face flickered with the unmistakable glimmer of recognition too. The hefty woman looming beside her glared up protectively as well and her face changed as well, showing that she recognized him as well as Lakshman and Shatrugan beside him.

Even after a decade, there was no mistaking his sister-in-law. That was Sita Bhabhi, he was quite certain.

Her old bodyguard he recognized from her unique physical appearance and the fact that she was with Sita Bhabhi. Which meant that the two boys standing by the horse could only be...his nephews! His throat leaped in his throat as he swallowed with difficulty. Yes, it was definitely Sita, there was no mistaking her. And that meant the boys were her sons.

“Surrender or die, jungle vermin,” said the man with the trimmed beard arrogantly. “Those are the only two choices before you. This is the last chance I offer you before I decide that you are not worth capturing at all.”

One of the boys shook his head and drew an arrow from the quiver over his shoulder with a fluid action that impressed Bharat.

Now there's a boy who knows how to handle a bow, he thought. Reminds me of a bhraatr who was as efficient with a bow and arrows at less than this boy's age.

The bearded man swore harshly at the boy.

Bharat recognized him as well. He was the same craven who had stuck Sumantra from behind with a pike. Neither he nor his horse men paid heed to Bharat, Shatrugan and Lakshman as they approached on their left flank, but the stilted way he was speaking and acting suggested what Bharat had already suspected, that the man and his companions were only playing elaborate roles in some scripted scenario. Evidently, the scenario involved Sita and her sons as well, which was something Bharat had never expected nor dreamed of. He had never even associated his banished sister-in-law and her boys with anything that had occurred until now. But the fact that they were apparently being 'staged' as the alleged challengers of Rama's authority and stealers of the sacred horse suggested that this drama's playscript was far more elaborate than he had expected. It could hardly be a coincidence that of all the people in the world, Rama's sacred sacrificial horse would be allegedly captured by none other than his own two sons! Something here smelled rotten as a musk melon cut open and left out for a week.

Bharat waited to see what the response was to the gang leader's last call.

"What say you, Kush," said one of the boys, keeping the arrow notched and ready but still pointed at the ground. "Shall we surrender to the authority of a king who has never done anything for us, not even protect us as is his dharma by law, or shall we let his murdering soldiers kill us just as they slaughtered the innocent rishis and brahmins of Valmiki Ashram, including the brahmacharya acolytes, man of whom were younger than us?" The words were delivered calmly but with a rich accent of irony.

The other boy feigned a shrug, keeping his bow strung and the arrow notched but pointing downwards. "I don't know, Luv. It's such a difficult choice to make. Hmmm. What do you recommend?"

"Enough banter," said the ruffian who had murdered Sumantra, evidently losing patience. "Step aside and let us reclaim the horse, and we may yet let you live long enough to be taken before Samrat Rama for pronouncement of judgement. This is your final warning!”

The boys exchanged a glance. Bharat sensed something pass between them and recognized it as being similar to the instinctive telepathy that developed between comrades at arms over long periods of time and intense threat. Except that these two boys possess the ability to communicate without words naturally, they were probably born with it. He glanced sideways at Shatrugan and Lakshman, and sensed that they understood this as well. After all, they were not just identical twin brothers like Sita Bhabhi’s sons, they were also blood relatives to those two young boys.

Luv raised his chin to stare insolently back at the horseman. “If your Emperor Rama wants his horse back, tell him to come get it. As for you, you craven wretch, you must pay for what you did to Valmiki Ashram and the innocents you massacred!”

And without further ado, he raised his bow and released the arrow.

And then all hell broke loose.

Luv’s arrow was dead on target. But his words and actions had forewarned the leader of the king’s guard sufficiently. When Luv released, Aarohan raised his sword up quickly, deflecting the arrow. At the same time, he shouted a command to his men to attack. The entire company charged at once.

Kush released his arrow a fraction after Luv, also aiming at Aarohan. But because they had both aimed at the same spot—the gap between the horse rider’s chest armourplate and helm which left the man’s neck and throat exposed, his arrow was deflected by the same sword action. The charging horses, only a dozen yards from where the boys stood, left them no time for a second shot. In perfect coordination, both brothers leaped on the back of the black stallion and clapped their heels to its flanks.

“Go! Ride!” Maatr shouted at them, seeing the danger.

Nakhudi added her voice to the furore: “GO!”

The sacred horse needed no further urging. He shot forward like a bolt, whinnying with excitement. The other equines pounding after him excited him greatly, after having been alone for several days. He screamed his excitement as he charged through the forest at a pace few horses could have matched. The king's guard's horses, burdened as they were with over-muscled men each weighing more than Luv and Kuch combined, as well as their armour and heavy weapons, and tired from being ridden hard the past few days, couldn't even hope to catch up. Luv and Kush disappeared into the shadows of Southwoods in a moment, the rump of the black horse invisible in the dim gloam of the dense woods. There would be no catching them by speed alone.

But Aarohan wasn't accepting the fact. He shouted to his men to go after the stallion and they rode after it, following in his wake.

They did not go far.

Bejoo and his PFs rose and stepped out from the hiding places, aiming bows and throwing blades at the oncoming king's guards.

Sita and Nakhudi raised their weapons as well.

And from the left flank, Bharat, Shatrugan and Lakshman rode forward and came around to face Aarohan. Bharat's horse lurched ahead, but Lakshman reached out, took hold of the bit and gave Bharat a firm stare. Bharat looked into his brother's eyes, nodded once, and stopped his horse, allowing Lakshman to go forward to speak face to face with the king's guard captain.

"Captain Aarohan," Lakshman said. "That is your name and title, is it not?"

The man glared down at him. The menace in his eyes was venomous. "Get out of my way. You are obstructing the emperor's personal guard."

Lakshman looked at him coldly. "I am the emperor's brother. I am also the Protector of the sacred horse."

"A fine job you're doing then, letting it be stolen by vagabond children!" The man spat to one side.

“Those boys did not intend to steal the horse. They were provoked by you and your men. I witnessed the incident myself.”

This time Aarohan hawked and spat in Lakshman’s direction, aiming the produce of his mouth at the foot of Lakshman’s horse. The mare snickered softly but held her ground, too well trained to respond to such an obvious taunt. “It is a well-planned ambush. Look around you. These are traitors, men dismissed from service of Ayodhya, now turned against their own motherland. This whole scheme to steal the horse and shame the Suryavansha throne is a plot against the emperor. If you were a true loyal son of Ayodhya, you would see the truth for yourself!”

“I am one of the heirs to the Suryavansha throne,” Lakshman replied. “I do not need to be reminded of my loyalty. Nor do I need to be fed the truth by the likes of you, Captain Aarohan. My bhraatrin Bharat and Shatrugan say they witnessed you murdering the former pradhan mantri Sumantra a short while ago. How do you respond to that charge?”

The light blue eyes glittered like diamonds in the shadows of his helmet. Aarohan made a sound of arrogance. “I spit on their claims. They are dishonoured and penalized for transgressions against the throne. Their loyalty is also questionable. I would not be surprised if they too were part of the plot in which Sumantra was involved.”

Lakshman stared at him in disbelief. This fellow was truly testing his patience now. “You claim that Sumantra was involved in this? Sumantra!”

Aarohan looked at him pointedly. “Perhaps you were involved as well, Yuvaraj Lakshman. Why else would you be obstructing Samrat Rama Chandra’s personal guard from fulfilling our dharma.”

“That’s enough of this claptrap!” Bharat said, urging his horse forward. “I won’t stand here and listen to this arrogant ass spout every vile thought that comes into his stinking mouth!”

Lakshman knew how Bharat felt. He looked at Aarohan. The man was clearly in no mood to talk sense. But he also knew how quickly Bharat’s anger reached flashpoint and could go out of control. Under these circumstances, it might not be wise to let his brother unleash his temper.

“Just a moment, bhraatr,” he said aside to Bharat. “I am still trying to clear this up.”

Bharat pursed his lips and kept his silence, but Lakshman could see that it took all of his self-control to do so. He continued to glare at Aarohan who in turn glared back. If not for the number of men as well as the three of them blocking their way, the king’s guard would not have stood still a moment longer. As it was, they seemed ready to fight even Lakshman and his brothers if need be. Bharat was astute enough to recognize this and to agree to be patient a while longer.

Lakshman turned his attention to the two women. Again, looking at his sister-in-law’s long-familiar face brought back feelings that had lain beneath the surface for too long. But he also knew that to acknowledge her for who she really was might well complicate the situation further. Aarohan would not care that she was his precious emperor’s banished wife; if anything, he might consider that a reason to abuse her or attack her instead. Also, the way Nakhudi was glaring at the horsemen and hefting her sword, he could see that a fight was only a single insult distant at this point.

“Sister,” he said, choosing a noncommittal greeting. “Were those your sons who rode away with the sacred horse?”

Sita’s eyes gazed up at him calmly, and he saw that she understood his choosing to err on the side of discretion. “Yes.”

“And did they lure the horse in this neck of the woods with the intention of capturing it and challenging the emperor?”

Her mouth twitched in something that might have been humour, although it could as easily have been a bitter smile. “Emperor?”

Aarohan started to say something in his arrogant insulting way, but Lakshman raised a clenched fist in warning, telling him to shut up. The man shut up, though he didn’t like it, and Lakshman knew that even his own cache as Rama’s brother would only buy him a little more time and patience—very little.

“The horse was sent on an Ashwamedha yagna on behalf of Samrat Rama Chandra’s claim as emperor of the Kosala nation and its allies. You know the law. Anyone who stops the horse or seizes it, challenges the authority of the owner and as such—”

“As such, is liable to be put to death on the spot,” Sita said with a trace of bitterness. “Yes, I am aware of the law. But my sons did not lure, capture or steal that horse. They have no interest in challenging the authority of your emperor. They were merely trying to get away from that man and his gang of murderers,” she stabbed a finger at Aarohan and the rest of the king’s guard behind him, “who, by the way, were sent by your precious emperor this morning to find and massacre all peaceable people dwelling in these woods, including but not limited to the brahmins, rishis, sadhus, sadhunis of Valmiki Ashram as well!”

Lakshman stared at her, astonished. “What? These men?”

Nakhudi stepped forward, pointing with her sword. “Yes! These men! Either you are blind or you are also a part of this cowardly conspiracy! Don’t pretend you were not aware of their mission. They rode through this morning and wiped out an entire village of innocent unarmed people.” She was sobbing angrily, tears spilling freely down her face as she went on, “even the frail, elderly and the young! They did the same at Guru Valmiki’s Ashram. They slew every last brahmacharya, some as young as seven!”

Lakshman turned in his seat to look at Aarohan. The captain of the king’s guard was looking in the direction of a tree branch which he appeared to find exceptionally fascinating.

“Is this true?” Lakshman demanded. “You and your men did all this? This adharmic slaughter?”

Aarohan turned his cool blue gaze back to Lakshman. “These women are whores and outlaws. Every Arya knows that the Southwoods are fit only for asuras and outcastes. No decent Arya people reside here. The whole region is aranya, wilderness, and as such comes under no legal jurisdiction.”

Lakshman heard Bharat curse and come up beside him, unable to listen silently any longer. “Who do you think you are, you arrogant ass? Do you know whom you speak of? What gives you the authority to go where you please and kill who you wish in this fashion? No Arya kshatriya would do such things! Not on the honor of holy gurus or our sacred Vedas!”

Aarohan smiled coldly. “Whatever I do is under the authority of Samrat Rama Chandra of Ayodhya. I answer to him and him alone. Now, I have had enough of this bantering. While we stand here chit-chatting about outlaws and their pathetic kin, the sacred horse is getting farther away. Stand aside and let me do my job.”

“No,” Lakshman said, reaching a decision. He drew his sword slowly and calmly, with deliberate care. The steel sang out as it scraped the rim of the sheath, the sound ringing out ominously in the sudden stillness of the forest afternoon. He held the sword across the saddle of his horse, not raising it or brandishing it just yet, but keeping it ready to deploy in an instant. “You have done enough already. I am taking charge here. You are ordered to return to your superior officer and report to him until further notice. I shall go after the horse and retrieve it myself as protecting the stallion is my task. Turn back and leave here, Captain Aarohan. I command you in the name of my brother and by my right as a Suryavanshi Ikshwaku. I command you on pain of death!”

And now he raised the sword and pointed it directly at the king’s guard captain. Aarohan didn’t flinch or react in any way. He stared directly at Lakshman, his eyeline in perfect level with the length of the sword. Their eyes met over the yard’s length of burnished Mithila steel and Lakshman, accustomed to looking his enemies in the eye before a battle, saw that the man held no fear or anxiety at all. Instead, Aarohan lowered his chin, deepening his gaze like a predator marking its prey, and smiled with supreme confidence.

“I shall go for now, Yuvaraj Lakshman. But I shall return soon enough. Not just with half a company,” he gestured at the fifty-odd men behind him, “but with an army. The entire might and power of Ayodhya shall be with me when I come back. And then we shall see who gives the orders here, and who comes first to a painful death.”

And he snapped his horse around and barked a single word to his men. As one, they turned and rode out of the woods, in the direction of the raj-marg. Every single one glared in Lakshman's direction as he turned, and Lakshman realized grimly that the captain of the king's guard was not merely bluffing or speaking idly. He meant every word he said and he had the authority to do exactly as he claimed.

"Devi help us," Lakshman muttered, then sheathed his sword and turned back to face the others. "What is going on here?"

A man stepped forward. It was one of the PFs. Lakshman recognized him at once as former Vajra Captain Bejoo, most recently employed as a grama-rakshak.

"I believe I have a fair notion, Yuvraj Lakshman," Bejoo said without much joy in his tone. "And if you do not act quickly and contact Maharaja Rama Chandra before Captain Aarohan does, I think this brewing conflict may well turn into a full-blown war. That is the intention of those who have put this devious plan into motion."

FOURTEEN

Luv and Kush slowed the horse and looked back.

“Nobody’s following,” Kush said.

Luv agreed. He couldn’t hear or sense any signs of a pursuit.

“Maatr and Nakhudi and the olduns must have stopped them dead in their tracks,” Kush said, with complete confidence. “Maybe those three strangers helped too. I saw the way they were looking at Maatr. They know her. Maybe they’re rishis in disguise, or they took up arms and became kshatriyas.”

Luv turned to look questioningly at his brother.

Kush shrugged. “Parasurama did it. In the story Guruji told us.”

“Those are puranas, Kush. Those things happened eons ago, in the Satya Yuga. This is a modern era, Treta Yuga. Brahmins don’t go around riding horses and pretending to be kshatriyas. Besides, those three were royalty of some kind, did you see their ensignia?”

Kush frowned. “The embroidering on their clothes and saddlebags?”

“Yes, and the markings on their armour and their sword sheaths. If they’re not princes or kings of someplace important, I’ll eat this horse.”

The sacred horse whinnied in protest. Kush patted his neck affectionately. “Don’t worry, big fella. I won’t let him eat you. He’s just exaggerating as usual.”

“You’re the one who’s always exaggerating, not me.”

Kush cocked his head. “You’re the one who just said he would eat the horse!”

Luv shrugged. “Well, I would. If I were wrong. But I’m not wrong. I’m right. Those three strangers were royalty! I bet you this whole forest they were!”

Kush looked around doubtfully. “Do you own this forest?”

Luv frowned. “Well, it doesn’t belong to anybody. It’s just aranya. Uncivilized wilderness.”

Kush grinned. “Aha. If it doesn’t belong to anybody, it can’t belong to you. So it’s not your forest! So how can you bet it away?”

“Well, I haven’t lost it yet, have I? I’m just saying, if I was wrong about those three strangers being royalty, then I would give you this forest. But I’m not wrong, I’m right! So it doesn’t matter whether or not I owned the forest in the first place!”

Kush giggled. “I bet you the moon and the sun!”

“What?”

“I bet you the moon and the sun that those three weren’t princes or royalty. They were probably just...house builders!”

Luv gaped at him in astonishment. “House builders?”

Kush shrugged. “Or sculptors. Or road-repairmen. Or army cooks. What difference does it make? I’m just saying!”

“And if you’re right—though I’m not sure which one you would be right about, since you named half a dozen professions—then you’ll give me the moon and the stars?”

Kush wagged a finger. “No stars. Just the sun and the moon, that’s all.”

Luv laughed. “Okay, so you have yourself a deal.”

He spat on his palm and proffered his hand.

Kush spat on his own palm, then slapped it against his bhraatr’s damp palm. “If they’re royalty, you get the sun and the moon. If they’re not, I get the forest.”

Luv smiled. “Done.”

“There’s only one problem, Luv.”

“What?”

“How do we know who they really are?”

“Kush, they’re going to come after us sooner or later. We’ll find out in time.”

“Okay then. What should we do now? Until we find out, I mean?”

Luv looked around thoughtfully. He looked at Kush’s rig and touched it. “Get ready for the murderers. They’ll be coming after us sooner or later, probably sooner. We should be ready when they come.”

Kush’s eyes brightened. “A real fight!”

“Yes! A really real fight. We’ll need LOTS of arrows. And other stuff. And traps. And hidey holes. And tree machans. And tunnels. And...”

“Yes, yes, I know,” Kush said happily. “Let’s go to work on it. We don’t know how much time we might have.”

“Oh I know exactly how much time we have before they come after us.”

“You do? How?”

Luv gestured upwards, at the slivers of sky visible through the dense tree cover. “It’ll be dark soon. They won’t risk coming into this deep into the woods after dark, especially not after a black horse in the deep woods. All we’d have to do is stand still and they wouldn’t find us for days.”

“You mean they wouldn’t find us for nights.”

“Yes. That’s what I meant. So they’ll come in the morning, at sunrise.”

“Long before that,” Luv said scornfully. “They probably expect to have caught us by sunrise.”

“By dawn then? Even before that?”

“Just before. When it’s just light enough to see and yet too dim to be seen easily. They’ll probably assemble at the same place around two hours before sunrise, then try to track us...”

“At which time, we’ll be ready and will lead them on a wild and wonderful merry chase!” Kush said. “All right, let’s go.”

“Wait, what about Maatr and Nakhudi?”

Kush thought for a moment. “All right, once we’ve made our arrangements, we’ll go back and check on them.”

Luv twisted around and looked east. The sun was low on the horizon, only an hour from sunset. “There isn’t much time. It may be too late then.”

“So you think we should go back and check on them now?”

“Yes, but we can double back by a wide circuit, leaving confusing tracks at the same time.”

Kush patted the side of the horse and whispered in his ear. He made a horse sound that sounded remarkably like a girl chuckling. He turned of his own accord and began trotting back the way they had come. In moments, he was cantering then galloping as if he had lived in the deep forest all his life and knew his way about as well as a dray horse knew the city streets.

“He’s enjoying this, you know, the rascalion,” Kush said.

Luv patted the rump of the horse affectionately. “Good for him.”

“So are you,” Kush said. “I can tell.”

“That’s because you are too.”

They galloped through the woods.

“What? How could this have happened? What were Yuvraj Lakshman and former pradhan mantri Sumantra doing at the time?”

Rama’s dark skin seemed to grow more bluish in hue when he got angry. Which had been a rare occurrence in earlier days but had increased in frequency of late. Right now, for instance, he was displaying the first warning signs of a rising temper.

He rose from the travelling throne on which he had been seated and paced the spacious royal tent that had been set up on the north bank of the Sarayu just beyond Mithila gate to accommodate the royal entourage for the night.

Bringing up the rear of the great procession, they had barely covered two yojanas distance from the capital. A whole day, to travel less than 18 miles from Ayodhya, Kausalya thought as she watched her son pace the carpeted floor of the tent. A pleasure trip would have been more useful. Devi knew Rama could have used one rather than this uncalled-for campaign.

The courier explained to Rama that Sumantra was dead and Lakshman feared missing in the deep Southwoods, last seen in pursuit of the stolen sacrificial horse.

“What other word do you have of the incident?”

The man shook his head to indicate that he had exceeded the extent of his knowledge. Kausalya knew that royal couriers were not wont to hold back messages or information; they usually blurted out everything they knew the instant they were permitted to open their mouth. That was their job, after all. Rama’s question was pointless. She was more saddened by the news of Sumantra’s death. That old sweet man...what a pity.

“At least he died fighting like a kshatriya,” whispered Sumantra softly. Kausalya and she were watching from the far side of the tent, where they had been about to partake of some light refreshment together with Rama. But Rama had barely bitten into a piece of apple when the courier had arrived. And he would not simply let the man deliver his news and depart as was the usual practise with couriers.

He persisted even now: “Come, come, man. You must know something else of what happened. Who were the parties who stopped the horse and issued the challenge?”

“Unknown, sire.”

“And where exactly did this occur? On the Mithila border?”

“No, sire,” the man replied, glad to have a question he could answer, “well away from it. In aranya territory, no man’s land.”

“I see,” Rama said thoughtfully. He paced another few steps then swung around again. “But that does not make sense! Why would anyone capture it in undeveloped territory? If nobody claims that region then in turn nobody can challenge the authority of the throne there! It's a completely pointless act of political aggression."

"Not for some people," said Pradhan Mantri Jabali as he ducked his head to enter the royal tent. He turned and dipped his head slightly to indicate respect for the royal Maatrs, then turned his attention back to Rama. "The aranya territories may not belong to any kingdom per se. But precisely for that reason, they provide a lawless haven where unknown numbers of brigands, dacoits, highway robbers, outlaws, outcastes, Magadhans and other such undesirable elements gather and proliferate. As you know, Samrat Rama Chandra, I have repeatedly proposed to you that we clean up those territories once and for all."

Rama shook his head impatiently. "There is nothing to clean up. The Southwoods are deep, savage, inhospitable forests. Those few who venture within out of sheer desperation struggle to stay alive, let alone flourish. Those poor dregs of society pose no threat to the Arya world."

"Ah," Jabali said, glancing at the repast spread out before the Maatrs and examining it with the air of a man who actively disliked food, his lanky skeletal frame testifying to that fact. "I forget that you yourself once lived among these very dregs of society, during your years of exile. You must have come to depend on these sordid elements, for reasons of survival. Every Ayodhyan continues to bear a deep regret for the long suffering you endured during those years. But, sire, it does not change the fact that it is in places where such dregs and filth proliferate that the seeds of rebellion are often sown and flourish."

"Rebellion?" Rama looked doubtfully at the prime minister. "Nonsense! The aranya folk are too busy surviving each night without bothering their heads with plans of political opposition!"

Jabali wagged a long bony finger in disagreement. "Nay, sire, do not underestimate them. Even the lichen and moss growing on the backroom wall seems benign for years until the day it suddenly sprouts poisonous mushrooms. Who knows what dark hatreds ferment and fester in those dark woods? Perhaps you do, of course, having lived among them. Tell me, were they all filled with universal love and affection for our Arya ways and our polished, noble society, ruled by the four precepts of Artha, Kama, Dharma and Karma? Were they not driven by some modicum of resentment and loathing for the society which had cast them out and of which they could never be a part again?"

Rama picked up the apple from which he had taken a single small bite and looked at it. "I had hoped to be able to rehabilitate those people one day."

Jabali made a sound of impatience, clicking his tongue. "Such beings cannot be rehabilitated. They are tainted, beyond the purview of decent, civilized human society."

"They are humans too. And many were Arya once. Ayodhyan even." Rama's tone was declarative but tinged with sadness, rather than argumentative. As if he knows he is rehashing a debate he has already lost a long time ago, Kausalya thought.

"Once, perhaps. Not anymore. They are no more than insects now. Venomous, barbed insects beneath our consideration."

Rama protested. "They are people. Fellow mortals. With families."

"Criminals. Unforgiven. Exiles."

At the last word, Rama flinched. It was very slight, not a visible reaction, barely a flicker in his pupils, but for a man so well in control of his senses, that was as much as a grunt of pain from most ordinary men. Kausalya felt her own heart ache with empathy. Exiles. That word had applied to her Rama as well, along with his brother Lakshman and wife Sita, not long ago. Almost a third of his entire life had been spent in exile. The very word must sting like the metal tip of a lash.

He turned and looked at Jabali with the same calm steady expression with which he greeted everything, but Kausalya knew his heart must ache a great deal more than her own. For while she could empathize with his past suffering, he had endured that suffering himself. Nothing could compare. And what he was saying now with his silent reproachful look was that Jabali should know that and be more considerate of how he spoke. But the prime minister appeared to have deliberately turned his face away from Rama for a moment, under the pretext of looking at something or other.

Rama turned to the courier, who was still standing and waiting patiently.

“You may go,” he said.

The courier left with obvious relief. There were courts in which men who accidentally overheard important matters of state or king’s secrets were often executed in order to preserve state privacy, such executions performed with an air of sorry-but-you-know-we-have-no-choice but which were nevertheless quite final all the same. That had never happened in Rama’s court but that was only because Rama did not approve of what he termed ‘excessive danda’. It was a concept and term that she herself had taught him as a boy, and she was proud to see that he still adhered to the precept. It told her that her Rama still lay within the body of this man, this emperor of dharma who sought to rule the known world. She could still appeal to him then, when the time came. And it was approaching soon, she knew.

She felt Sumitra’s hand clasp her own in sisterly commiseration and squeezed back, thanking her sister-queen for her continual support.

Since their husband’s demise two and a half decades ago, First Queen and Third Queen had been inseparable friends, and during the years that Kausalya governed Ayodhya as a Dowager Queen-Mother, Sumitra had been a valuable asset in court as well as in matters that required careful thought and interpretation of law. She had a particular gift for such matters and Kausalya was glad to have her with her now, for law played an integral part of the plan she had to try and turn Rama back from this empirical course he was set upon.

Rama turned to Jabali the instant the courier had left. “What further word? Have you heard anything? Has Bhadra returned yet? You did say he had gone to find out why the alarms rang out, when you stayed me from going myself.”

Jabali dipped his bird-like chin and nose once, acknowledging that he had indeed done so. “It would have pointless for you to inhale the dust of the marg and ride all that way just to learn what we could learn just as well sitting here in the command centre. That is why you have such vast resources deployed. You are an emperor now, Samrat Rama Chandra, not a chieftain who must ride out and check on every emergency yourself.”

Rama sighed. “Yes, I understand. Now speak, have you any news from the frontline? The courier could tell me nothing beyond what we had already guessed.”

Nothing? Was that what he called the news of Sumantra’s death? The man who had once sat him upon his knee as a very young boy and answered his every question about kings and courts with infinite patience. Kausalya shook her head, sighing softly despite herself. Rama glanced briefly in her direction but did not say anything further.

Jabali placed his palms together and rubbed them briskly in that manner he had that Kausalya had always found pretentious. A skeleton rubbing two tinders together to kindle his own funeral pyre, was how her late dear Dasaratha had described it, with his customary wit. She remembered that now and stifled a laugh. It would not do to actually belittle the man in his presence; ridiculous as he was, he was nonetheless a powerful political figure and she could not afford to antagonize him in any way whatsoever.

“It is as we feared. Your brothers have all gone missing. The excuse given is that they were in pursuit of the sacred stallion. But of course, we know better.”

Rama frowned. “My brothers? You mean Bharat and Shatrugan too?”

“Indeed. Is that not peculiar? That they should all three of them go after the horse together and disappear together?”

Rama shook his head slowly. “Not particularly. They are Suryavanshis. The yagna may be conducted by me, but it is for the future and stability of the Suryavanasha throne. They have a great vested interest in preserving the sanctity of the ritual and ensuring its success.”

“Exactly! A vested interest. For if the horse were to be captured and a challenge issued in that aranya territory, by whose authority would it be?”

Rama shrugged. “Nobody’s. Since the Southwoods do not come under any kingdom’s jurisdiction.”

“Aha. But what if your brothers had secretly formed an alliance with the aranya folk, the poor misguided mortals you expressed such sympathy for just a while ago, and conspired to capture the horse and challenge your authority?”

Rama looked coldly at Jabali. “These are grave accusations. Do not make them unless you have strong evidence to back them up.”

“Strong evidence?” The hawkish nose all but sneered at Rama—although that sneer like expression was one Jabali displayed naturally—and he turned and clapped his hands, issuing a command to someone waiting outside the tent.

At once, several armoured men, dust-covered and bloody from obvious close fighting, entered, pulling a corpse with them which they laid down on the floor. Even Kausalya and Sumitra stood and peered in horror to see whose corpse it was. It was Sumantra, the poor old man’s body and face mutilated by multiple wounds and punctures. Sumitra and she both gasped in horror at the sight of the old and long-beloved prime minister.

‘Sumantra!’ Kausalya said. She could scarcely believe her eyes. Yet there was no doubt it was Sumantra. Beside her, Sumitra clutched her arm hard enough to hurt, unable to even voice her own reaction.

“Is this sufficient to begin with,” Jabali said, pointing a long bony finger at the body of his predecessor. “The corpse of our beloved ex prime minister, brutally murdered and stabbed in the back by none other than your own brothers as the first gambit in their bid to unveil this shocking plot and conspiracy against your throne!”

Rama stared down at the body, his own face revealing the intensity of his shock. “Did anyone witness this?”

Jabali gestured. “King’s Guard Captain Aarohan, sent on a mission under your own seal to roam the frontlines to ensure the security of the yagna stallion.”

A man stepped forward from the group. He was exceptionally tall and well muscled, even among the other well-built warriors. He wore his beard in a very distinctive style.

He saluted Rama obstreperously. “Samrat Rama Chandra, sire. I saw with my own eyes Yuvrajas Lakshman, Bharat and Shatrugan inflict these wounds upon Sumantra.”

Rama stepped forward, eyes blazing with sudden fury. Despite the height difference and the superior build of the taller man, Rama seemed to tower over him by dint of sheer force of personality. “You saw them? Where were you when it occurred? If you saw them, why did you not seek to stop them?”

The man did not answer instantly. He seemed, Kausalya thought with a twinge of suspicion, to be irritated by Rama’s tone and manner. Even though this is his emperor speaking, he still resents it! She had also noted the lack of honorific before Sumantra’s name, not a common lapse among the scrupulously disciplined Arya kshatriyas. Who were these king’s guard anyway? She dimly recalled hearing of them once or twice in some Council session but their precise purpose eluded her. How odd that such a man should be the only one to come forward as a witness to such a significant event. And to blame Rama’s own brothers? She could not even entertain the possibility of such an accusation being true. It was instantly obvious that there was something amiss here.

“I was riding towards Sumantra’s chariot,” the man said after a pause, “I saw the murder as I approached. I shouted to them to stop, but they saw me coming and rode away into the woods.” He added after a moment, “They had accomplices waiting for them ahead, who had captured the sacred horse. Outlaws of the forest.”

Rama stood before the man a moment or three longer, breathing upon him. Though the man was stone still, yet he seemed to be restraining himself, while Rama who was on the very precipice of utter rage, appeared perfectly in control of his faculties. Kausalya realized that she was looking at a man who was the very inverse of Rama. She did not know what that meant, but she did not like it one bit. That man is dangerous, she thought. And he is lying, I’m as sure of it as I am that I am Kausalya. She felt Sumitra squeeze her hand in as if in silent agreement, and knew that her sister queen-mother also saw exactly what she saw.

Finally Rama turned away, showing his back to the soldier and to Pradhan Mantri Jabali. In that instant, Kausalya saw something pass between Jabali and the man named Aarohan. She did not like that either. But her misgivings were washed away in a flood of emotion when she heard Rama pronounce his next words with the finality and grim commanding tones of a death sentence.

“Hunt them down,” Rama said. “Hunt them down and bring them before me, dead or alive. Do whatever you have to, use whatever force is necessary. Send the entire army into the Southwoods. But find the murderers of Sumantra and bring back the yagna stallion. Whatever it takes.”

KAAND 3

ONE

In the gloamy hour before dawn, the Southwoods lay as still as a predator in waiting. The inhabitants that lived within its tree-shaded sanctuary were more numerous than the citizens of the most populous Arya city—and the cities of Aryavarta were more densely populated than any place in the mortal realm, including the rough but developing lands far to the west across the great oceans, whose envoys and traders frequently made the long and arduous journey across land to purchase the precious spices, silks and precious objets d'art of the subcontinent and the civilized nations farther to the east.

Yet unlike the bustling metropolises of Ayodhya, Gandahar, Sumer, Akkad, Babylon, Assyria, Cathay, Ayutha and other great kingdoms that lay scattered like caches of precious jewels upon the Asian seaboard, the denizens of the great ancient forest went about their daily deeds as discretely as the secret guilds of assassins in the desert kingdoms went about their dark missions. To one another, the bustle and hustle was plain to see: the panther saw the ants who in turn saw the ant eater, who saw the rabbit, who saw the lion, who saw the deer, who heard the cricket who stopped chirrupping when the lizard approached, and so on in an endless circle of infinite inter-dependence.

There was no individual independence in this world. Every living being depending on every other being to sustain its environment and by doing so, its daily sources of nutrition and survival. Like the assassins of the arab kingdoms, the predators of the deep Southwoods needed the hustle and bustle of everyday forest life in order to go about their own violent missions.

But unlike the great cities of the mortal world, the deep forest had certain codes by which it endured. One of these was the tacitly agreed-upon rule of mutual co-dependence: When an intruder or intruders entered its environs, every denizen was obligated to issue a warning and intimate its fellow animals, avians and insects of the presence of the outsider. For outsiders always spelled danger; there were no exceptions to this rule. Be it ever so miniscule a threat as the careless ass that stepped on an ant's nest and destroyed half a summer's toil, or the overt menace of a pack of wild dogs seeking a fresh kill, any creature that chose to enter the dangerous perpetually twilight world of the dense jungle did so only for one reason: self-preservation. Whether that meant fleeing from outside enemies or seeking prey or food here, the end result was the same: the newcomers would fight, kill, feed or otherwise commit some form of violent aggression in order to survive and sustain themselves. It was the only way they, or any living being, could possibly survive in this ruthless world. The way of the jungle, the poets called it. And so it was: the only way to survive in here was to kill or be killed.

The men who poured in from the raj-marg and entered the Southwoods that hour before dawn intended to kill. They were trained for it, equipped for it, and even bred for it: not merely kshatriyas, they were Ayodhyan kshatriyas, and Ayodhya's war cry spoke their own motto and conviction: Ayodhya Anashya!

Ayodhya the Unconquerable and Undefeated.

For Ayodhya was the one city in all the known world that had never been besieged, attacked, or invaded, successfully or otherwise. Because it was impossible to besiege, attack or invade, no sane force in the world would dare to attempt such a suicidal feat. The only one that had tried, once, had been the asura hordes of Ravana, and they had made it only as far as the outskirts of Mithila, which was a long way from Ayodhya. That great invading force of supernatural demoniac beings had been thwarted by a brahm-astra, a sacred weapon of the devas, unleashed by an Ayodhyan, none other than the same Samrat Rama Chandra whom these kshatriyas served today. That was part of the legend of Rama, the fact that he had halted the only known attempt to attack Ayodhya over twelve yojanas away! It was not even fit to be called an attack, let alone a siege.

And now, with Ravana gone, the asura hordes extinguished from the mortal realm forever, even the severely weakened rakhsasa race of the lord of asura's erstwhile capital, Lanka, diminishing in number with each passing year, there were no other forces, mortal, asura or otherwise, who dared or desired to challenge the might of Ayodhya by attacking the greatest Arya city on earth.

But today, the enemy was not coming to invade Ayodhya.

Ayodhya was coming to invade the enemy's domain.

And this domain, the fabled and dreaded Southwoods of mythic lore, until only twenty four years ago the domain of the fearsome yakshi giantess Tataka and her hybrid offspring, was unlike any battleground, field or city these brave soldiers of Ayodhya had ever visited or fought upon.

In its own way, it was as indomitable as Ayodhya herself, even if it did not boast seven great moats filled with ravenous predators, seven tall stone gates manned by awe-inspiring war machines, and all the mechanical and architectural marvels that mortalkind was capable of creating.

In its own way, the forest was a living breathing force as powerful as the great military might of Ayodhya.

In its own way—and on its own terms—the jungle was a formidable opponent unto itself, not merely a theatre of battle, but part of the enemy's armory itself. The fact that it did not appear to be an armory, and could be assumed to be a staging ground or battlefield, was part of its sinister threat.

Ayodhya might well be unconquerable, never-besieged, indomitable.

But in its own way, so was the Southwoods.

The first regiment of soldiers were not unaccustomed to forests or forest warfare. After all, the world was not so old and jaded as to have completely forgotten the forests from which mortalkind sprang not long ago. Many of these kshatriyas had spent their childhood and youth roving the wild countryside of Kosala, hunting, farming, herding. They were familiar with woods and with forest environments. They moved slowly and carefully, unburdened by the heavy armor that cavalry regiments like the king's guard wore, bearing lighter pikes and swords. There were archers among them too, with fine Gandahari longbows. And they were told to expect an ambush.

But to their surprise, they met with no resistance at all.

They went further and further into the forest, the dim grey of the sky visible above the tall tree tops turning slowly whiter as they went, and even a full hour later, when dawn broke across the eastern part of the forest, not an arrow had been loosed or a sword swung in aggression. It was puzzling but not entirely surprising. Their commanding officers assumed the obvious: the challengers had been all bluster and intent but lacked the guts to follow through. It was easy enough to filch a horse, quite another thing to face an entire army, leave alone an Ayodhyan army. They had probably retreated or were in hiding, quivering with their blankets pulled over their sweating faces. There were some sardonic grins and shaken heads as the forward regiment went a mile then two miles then three without meeting any resistance.

As dawn turned to daybreak and the first golden rays of sunlight twinkled through the trees, the men began to relax their guard, feeling that this would be an easy assignment after all. The only reason they went on at all was because the horse still had to be retrieved and the culprits put to death, their bodies brought back nailed to wooden posts to caution future challengers.

Soon, the mood lightened and the men began to chat softly among themselves, even joke and relax their guard. Due to the nature of the forest, they were spread out considerably, and their commanding officers could not see or hear every single one at all times, so it was easy for them to simply squat against a tree trunk and smoke a beedi or chew some betelnut and chat softly about the pointlessness of this mission.

The first inkling that they had of danger was when a peculiar sound came to their ears. It was a sound that was vaguely familiar yet not easily recognizable. At first, many assumed it was only insects or perhaps even the wind. But as it grew louder and closer, they became aware that it was neither of these things.

The sound was a constant hissing. A sussuration similar to the sound of the wind shirring in trees in autumn or the ocean surf rising to the shore and falling back. Yet it was neither of these either.

A man smoking a beedi was the first to grow certain he knew the source of the sound. He sat bolt upright against the trunk of the tree where he had been resting, dropping his beedi. It fell onto a damp patch of earth and was luckily extinguished at once by itself. He reached out and snatched hold of his spear which he had left standing upright against the tree trunk.

“Snakes!” he said aloud. Then even louder, so his comrades could hear as well: “SNAKES! It’s snakes, coming towards us!”

The word was repeated and past along the frontlines, moving with surprising speed. The commanding officers heard it too and frowned. Snakes? What did the man mean? Had he seen a snake or perhaps even a nest of snakes near his position? What did that have to do with the rest of the army?

They shrugged and ignored it.

But as the sound grew larger, closer, and omnipresent, seeming to come from every direction at once and all around them, they grew uneasy. Men stopped chatting or lounging about and took up their weapons. Eyes scanned left and right, seeking out something, anything that would provide a more believable explanation for the sound.

Slowly, as the hissing grew so loud and close that each man realized it could be nothing but snakes, they began to panic. Men retreated slowly, stepping backwards, seeking to get away from the wall of approaching sound. The HISSSSSS pervaded the entire forest now, it seemed.

“Hold your positions!” ordered their officers.

“Stay your ground, you lazy ruffians,” growled sergeants gruffly, passing on the officer’s orders.

But many of the officers were sweating nervously as well. Some were old enough to have heard stories at their father’s and grandfather’s knees of the dreaded Nagas and Urugas in the Last Asura Wars. Snakes were not the most popular forest creature and every year on an allotted day, oblations and offerings were given to the snake deities to appease them and persuade them not to unleash their venom on mortals. Of course, everyone knew that the last of the asuras had been exterminated when Rama had unleashed the brahm-astra at Mithila twenty four years ago. But these were the Southwoods, dreaded site of so many fearsome fables and cautionary tales from ancient itihasa, and who knew what beings might still reside in this dense jungle?

Suddenly, one of the archers cried out. They were the ones with the sharpest eyesight and he had seen something in the alternately shadowy and sunlit forest.

He reacted by doing something no kshatriya was ever supposed to do: he threw down his bow and rig and turned around. He ran past his fellows, ignoring even his commanding officers who were to surprised to order him to stop. His face betrayed his terror at whatever he had seen.

“Flee!” he yelled. “Flee for your lives!”

The others stared after him then at each other. The officers shouted sporadically to hold the line and hold their positions and the usual claptrap that officers were expected shout but none of the men were listening. They were all thinking about how the archer, one of the finest Ayodhyan bowmen, which made him one of the finest in the world, apart from the Assyrian horse bowmen and chariot archers, whom, it was said, were the best in the world, had thrown aside his bow and rig as if it was so much useless baggage, rather than the beautifully shaped polished and resin-waxed Mithila bow, a treasure to any kshatriya of the archer varna. It was a bow worth giving up one’s life for, and if the archer had thrown it aside, it could be for only one reason: the bow, fine as it was, would be utterly useless against the HISSsing thing that was approaching them, and while running away, would be an impediment while trying to get away through the close-growing trees and shrubbery. And if a bow and arrows, which could be used to kill or wound any enemy from afar, was useless, then what good were a sword, pike or axe which required close quarters to be effective?

The officers had realized this as well. And sweating with anxiety though they were, they were still commanding officers entrusted with a mission. It was their dharma to fulfil that mission or die trying. Under Samrat Rama Chandra’s ‘Ram Rajya’ failing to do one’s dharma was itself punishable by death. So they roared instructions that nobody was to abandon their weapon, and every soldier must hold the line and engage the enemy. Failure to comply would result in the severest danda: on-site execution.

That worked. Terrible though the HISSSing sound was and the thought of what it might be caused by, the fear of facing the wrath of danda was greater. Face the unseen menace and they might yet live. Run from it as the archer had done, and they would certainly be put to death.

So they stayed, reluctantly but bravely. And raised their weapons when their officers told them to, and prepared to fight.

A moment later, the source of the HISSSing was revealed. And it was every bit as terrifying as they had feared.

The forest floor was writhing with a carpet of snakes. All racing along at considerable speed, winding their sinuous way across the ground, slithering over and under each other, intertwining, hissing at each other or at everything in general, some pausing to strike at one another, fangs lashing out angrily, milky white drops of venom flicking off their gaping pink maws. For as far as the eye could see the ground was writhing with the creatures. They were all coming as fast as they could, towards the frontlines of Ayodhya's finest.

Too late the officers gaped in disbelief and thought that perhaps they had given the wrong orders. Perhaps it was acceptable to retreat. After all, how could they fight such an enemy? And why fight it at all? The snakes of the Southwoods were not responsible for the abduction of the sacred horse! But their own orders, received from the chief of the King's Guard, Captain Aarohan himself, had been crystal clear: No surrender, no retreat...on pain of death.

So they stood their ground. A few soldiers were unable to stand and watch the writhing monstrosity slither towards them, like some enormous beast spread out across acres of forest ground, and they turned and ran. They were caught and despatched a mile or two back, by men of the king's guard, deployed to ensure the obedience of the army. A few others attempted to climb trees, forgetting that many breeds of snakes live in trees. But the majority of the frontliners stayed where they were, weapons in hand and ready to use. And watched as a terrible slithering death approached them yard by twining yard.

The line of snakes and the line of soldiers came closer together, until finally, they met, converged, and overlapped.

TWO

Luv and Kush smiled grimly at each other as the sound of soldiers screaming came to them on the forest wind. Their first tactic had worked better than expected. They had known of the existence of the snake nest ever since they were very young: it was a legend in these parts of the forest. A great nest, larger than any ever known had always existed here near a grotto that led to a network of underground caverns. The nest itself only housed the few thousand snakes that still chose to remain in the open rocky basin at the mouth of the grotto. It was said there were tens of thousands, perhaps even hundreds of thousands inside the deep cavern. They constantly slithered up and down through the tunnels, presumably in search of food and water and sunlight, which as cold-blooded creatures, they required in order to stay alive. From the sounds of it, they had succeeded in disturbing a good number into leaving their subterranean home and traveling in search of safer climes. If those migrating serpents happened to come across several hundred armed soldiers and consider them an obstruction to their seeking of safety, well, too bad for the soldiers.

It had been the work of moments to light a fire and throw the blazing debris down the other end of the great hole that joined up with the one at the back of that same grotto. They had not known how many snakes might be disturbed by the smoke and fire into climbing up and emerging into the open but any number would be sufficient to cause trouble in the enemy ranks. But even as they glanced down at the grotto from the top of the overhang—the only place safe enough to view the nest—they had been astonished at the sheer masses of writhing snakes that were emerging from the cave mouth. Thick sinuous green-black ropes of intertwined snakes fell in a constant stream, like a waterfall of serpents, to land on the leaf-strewn ground below, then work their way out of the nest and into the forest, snaking away at the heightened speed that their species resorted to only when faced by natural disaster or fire. They knew better than to follow the fleeing snakes to view what happened when they encountered the incoming soldiers: once let loose in the open jungle, panicked out of their minds, those snakes were an army unto themselves.

As the screams of the soldiers continued, they climbed back down into the canyon through another route which avoided any caves or open holes which might be filled with more escaping snakes. Reaching the ground several moments later, they were greeted with sighs of relief by their Maatr and Nakhudi.

“That was the most dangerous thing possible,” Maatr admonished. “What if those snakes had turned on you?”

Kush grinned. “We would have ordered them not to harm us by the authority of Emperor Rama Chandra of Ayodhya!”

“Yes!” Luv agreed. Both brothers laughed.

Nakhudi glanced at Sita’s face when the boys mentioned Rama Chandra. “You boys shouldn’t speak so insolently of the King.”

“Emperor!” Luv corrected. “Why not? He’s nothing but a kshatriya corrupted by his lust for power.”

Nakhudi started to reply but Sita raised her hand. “Enough talk. That ploy with the snakes, clever though it was, won’t keep them back for long. This time they’ll come in force and when they do, it will take more than tactics to stop them.”

“It’s all right, Maatr,” Kush said. “We have a plan.”

Sita looked at each of them in turn, her face filled with some undefinable sadness. “I’m sure you do, my sons. But you will need all the help you can get. Just two of you alone, brave soldiers though you are, can’t keep back the entire Ayodhyan army.”

“Actually, Maatr,” Luv said, “in the right circumstances, it’s easier for a very small force to elude a very large army. In this part of the jungle, with this defensible position, knowing the terrain as we do, having made arrangements for such a contingency, we stand a better chance of survival than a regiment or an akshohini of defenders.”

“Yes, Maatr,” Kush added, deadly serious now. “You know this to be true. And so do you, Nakhudi.”

Nakhudi nodded slowly. “Aye, true it is. But I did not intend for you two to make this stand alone.”

Kush shrugged. “Nobody knows this terrain as well as we do. We have the advantage of being difficult to spot and quick to move. They will be expecting a much larger force, not just two defenders.” He spread his hands. “What do I have to say to convince you?”

“I’m convinced,” Sita said, struggling to rise to her feet. “Except that there will be more than just two of us defending.” She got to her feet and stood, swaying a moment, then her eyes rolled up in her head and she collapsed soundlessly.

Nakhudi caught her without any effort and lowered her gently to the ground. After placing her comfortably on the ground she rose and looked at the boys.

“She will be all right, but she has lost a great deal of blood. She needs rest and treatment.”

The twins nodded, staring solemnly at her. “You must stay and care for her, Nakhudi. You do see the wisdom in that, don’t you? You must stay and protect all the survivors of the attack on the ashram.” Luv gestured at the band of wounded and exhausted brahmins and brahmacharyas clustered at the back of the box canyon. Rishi Dumma had taken charge of tending to the wounded and his bulky form was visible moving from pallet to pallet, doing the best he could to ease pain and suffering.

Nakhudi sighed but nodded. “Yes, in the event that the Ayodhyan forces do track us down, I could hold them off at the mouth of the canyon. I will stay,” she finished shortly, not happy about it but not arguing either.

“You will be safe here,” Kush added. “The only way the enemy can get in here is if they get past us. And they won’t.”

Nakhudi nodded slowly, passing a hand across her face which looked more weary than they had ever seen her before. “If they get past you, even her wounds won’t keep your mother down,” she said. She meant that if the enemy could enter the canyon it would mean Luv and Kush were dead and if that happened, Sita wouldn’t care to live another minute. “Nor I.”

They looked at her steadily. “We will return. Once the enemy leaves. Or surrenders.”

Nakhudi’s hand flew to her mouth involuntarily. “Surrenders!” she said. The word brought a smile to her face. The very idea!

They neither laughed nor smiled. They had meant what they said. “Surrender is always an option for them,” they said. “Just not for us.”

That much was true. While she doubted that two young boys could bring the mighty Kosala empire to its knees in surrender, there was absolutely no doubt that the enemy would never rest now until they were all dead. It made her wonder if she was doing the right thing by letting the boys go out to fight this battle on their own. Every instinct screamed to her to order them to stay and go herself. But she knew that they were right for once. Somehow, this was their fight and they had every right to wage this war. Whatever the consequence. Even Guru Valmiki had given his assent earlier.

“There comes a day in every child’s life when he or she must become a man or woman. For a kshatriya child, that is the day you become a kshatriya. Today is your day, boys. Go and do what you must.”

They bowed to her, took her blessing. Then left at a run. She watched their lithe bodies go, wondering if she would ever see them alive again—or they she.

Bejoo cringed at the sounds of the Ayodhyan soldiers screaming. The forest rang with their misery and fear. He and his men had been in mortal fear that the fleeing snakes might pass this way but mercifully there was water between his position and the Ayodhyan’s and the wave of serpent’s has passed them by with several hundred yards to spare. Even so, each time an Ayodhyan came stumbling to the water, lips blackened and eyes staring wildly, he cringed, praying to Shaneshwara that such a death never befall him. These were the stragglers who had been fortunate enough, if you could call them fortunate, to be bitten by snakes with slower-acting venom. Already consumed with fever and madness, they sought out water desperately. But no amount of water could save them. They would die slower and less painfully than their less fortunate comrades but die they would, whether it took minutes more or hours. He estimated that several hundred must have been bitten by the fleeing wave of snakes. The distant spiral of smoke had told him how the boys had caused the snakes to flee this way but he could not imagine venturing even close to a nest large enough to house so many deadly reptiles. No doubt about it: The sons of the Lady Vedavati were truly extraordinary in every way.

Now, he waited in the woods across the stream as the sound of hooves announced the arrival of new troops. Metal glittered and flashed through the trees, catching the morning sunlight and from the looks and sound of it, he estimated that this was the main body of the King's Guard he had seen earlier. A familiar lean face came into view, riding a huge stallion, and Bejoo recognized the villain who led this newly conscripted legion at once. Captain Aarohan. He had heard tales about the man that he had not paid much heed to at the time. As a simple grama-rakshkak, the politics of the army and city no longer concerned him overmuch. But now that he was involved again, the very sight of the man made his stomach churn. He knew now that the tales he had heard were probably true. The devastation at Valmiki Ashram confirmed it. What manner of monster would attack and slaughter innocent unarmed brahmacharyas, boys and women included, without provocation or cause? Had he been thirty years younger—fifteen even—and still in charge of his Vajra, he would have gladly led a lightning attack against that monster. The man deserved to have all the snakes in the Southwoods set upon him and left to die.

He watched as Aarohan questioned the groaning and half-poisoned remnants of the first wave with growing impatience then outright anger. He heard the sound of the man's raised voice and saw his whip curl out and lash men mercilessly as he vented his anger at the unexpected thwarting of the advance. Bejoo's lips curled back grimly, not relishing the sight of army men being abused thus, but taking pleasure in Aarohan's frustration. He was too far away to hear much of what was said but the overall gist was quite obvious.

“What do you mean, retreat?” Aarohan snarled. He lashed out with his horse-whip again, leaving a welt rising on the cheek and neck of a sergeant in charge of one of the forward platoons. The man took the beating with stubborn resignation, either accustomed to such abuse under the new Empirical Army or simply too terrified to care. “Our orders are to flush out and destroy the rebels, whatever the cost!”

The sergeant spoke without looking up at the mounted officer. He knew better than to match gazes with the notorious new Captain, allegedly the right-hand man of Pradhan Mantri Jabali himself and already notorious by his nickname, Spike Hand Aarohan, owing to an incident in which the Captain had used a spiked handguard to beat a man until the very flesh was ripped off his face, rendering him unrecognizable even to his own family. “They have Nagas fighting for them. And who knows what other breed of Asuras. They are demons in human guise. We cannot fight such creatures.”

Aarohan stared at the man for a moment as if unable to absorb his words. Then he lashed out with greater ferocity than before, whipping the man mercilessly as he lost his temper. “FOOL! They were only snakes. They must have flushed them out of some pit. No doubt they bred the wretched reptiles for food. There are no asuras or Nagas left on earth, don’t you know that? This is the Treta Yuga not the ancient world!”

The sergeant collapsed wordlessly under the beating. He had been bitten mainly only non-venomous snakes but he had attempted to suck out the poison from the wounds of several of his men and in the process some venom had entered his bloodstream as well. Now, under the barrage from Aarohan, he suffered a fatal collapse and sprawled on the ground, body quivering, legs lurching, foam oozing from his open mouth.

Several of the men under the sergeant’s command ran up to help him. “BACK!” shouted Aarohan, using his whip to warn them. He saw a spear clutched in one man’s hand and said, “Hand me that!” The man handed him the spear, looking dazed.

Aarohan turned his horse around, rode the few yards back to where the sergeant lay in the throes of the venom-induced attack, and drove the spear down through the man’s throat. The sergeant died, gurgling and gasping. His men reared back in horror.

Aarohan wrenched the spear out of the man’s throat and turned to point the bloody end at them. “The punishment for retreat is death! The penalty for failing in your mission is death! The danda for disobeying or questioning my orders is death! Do you understand?”

They stared at him dumbly. Then belatedly shouted a ragged response: “Aye!” There was only fear and no respect in their tone but their response was clear.

“Now, continue in your mission! Track down and find the rebels and kill them all. Spread the word down the lines. Search and kill all rebels! No retreat, no surrender.”

Then, to underline his point, he flung the spear at the crowd of dazed soldiers. It struck a foot-soldier in the belly, driving him back into the crowd. He collapsed, dying. His comrades started to bend to give him aid, then remembered that Aarohan was watching and straightened up again. They stared at him, then turned and began shuffling away, snatching up their weapons. Even the wounded and those who had injured themselves getting away from the snakes but had not been actually bitten scrambled to their feet and ran after their comrades. In moments, the clearing by the stream was empty except for the dead sergeant and other men who had collapsed from the slower-acting venom and were eking out their last moments.

“Kill them all,” Aarohan ordered his men. “I don’t care if they will die anyway. Kill them all to drive home the point. The danda for desertion is death.”

As his men went about the grisly task of cutting the throats of the dying and fatally poisoned men lying by the stream, Aarohan summoned his closest and most trusted cronies to him. They came, their sly faces grinning in anticipation. “Now, listen carefully, this is the day for which we’ve been waiting. We roll our bone dice right and we will all live out our lives as rich lords of Ayodhya, doing as we please to the end of our days.”

“We’ll do what has to be done,” said one of his aides confidently. “That band of ragtag outlaws and children won’t survive long.”

“Even so,” Aarohan said, “they know this forest well and may have more tricks at hand like the ploy with the snakes. We’ll use the main army to beat down the woods. Let them do the dog work and die like dogs if need be. Meanwhile, I want us to split up into two groups and ride around. We have to find the woman named Vedavati, the one who survived the fight at the ashram.”

One of his men spat bitterly on the ground. “That one? She was lucky to have escaped us there. She killed half a dozen good men. One of them was my brother. I want a chance at her.” He patted his thigh. “When I finish with her, she’ll be begging for the edge of my blade.”

Aarohan nodded. “You do that. You do whatever you want to her that pleases you. But I want her and her companion, the other bigger-built woman, dead before the sun sets today. Do you understand? I will give a hundred gold coin to any man who fetches me the head of the woman named Vedavati.”

“What about her brats, the twins with the bows.”

Aarohan turned his head to seek out the man who had spoken. “A hundred gold coin for each of their heads then. And fifty for the woman companion, the big one.”

The men looked at each other with pleased grins plastered on their faces. “Easy money, boys.”

“Maybe not so easy,” muttered one of the men. “I saw those boys use their bows. They ain’t no brahmacharya novices.”

“Get the mother, you get the boys,” said Aarohan harshly. He looked directly at the man who had complained. “Use her as a hostage or as you please if that works. The boys will do anything to save her. Anything.”

The men nodded, liking the sound of this now. “That’s three hundred gold coins for the mother and sons then,” said another man. “Right, captain?”

Aarohan nodded. “And fifty for the woman companion.”

His aide grinned slyly. “Sounds like you don’t want them saying the wrong things to the right people.”

Aarohan nodded. “I don’t want them saying anything ever again. See to it,” he barked.

“Yes, sir, yes captain!” replied his men smartly.

They split into two groups and rode in separate directions.

Across the stream, Bejoo watched them go, then turned and melted back into the forest.

THREE

Lakshman emerged from the royal pavilion, face tight with anger. Bharat and Shatrugan watched as he strode to and fro several times, trying to work off his fury, then went over to a horse trough that had just been filled with fresh water for the emperor’s own horse and emptied a pailful of water over his own head. He shook his face free of the excess waters, spitting out a mouthful angrily. His brothers waited for him to cool sufficiently to speak.

“He will not listen to reason,” he told them. “He says he has heard the testimony of the witnesses and seen the evidence and has delivered his judgement.”

Bharata and Shatrugan exchanged a glance. “But we were there! We can bear witness to what happened. What about our testimony?”

Lakshman dipped another pail and drank deeply from it. Nearby, the tethered horse whinnied in protest. “He will not hear or see anyone else. He is in consultation with the War Council.” Lakshman clenched his fist around the handle of the pail. “Jabali is by his side, filling his ear with venom. I heard them talking of war with Videha when I entered.”

Shatrugan sat on the edge of the trough, not caring that the water was sloshing over the edge. “This is bad, bhraatr. We have to do something. We must stop this madness.”

Lakshman took a deep breath and exhaled slowly. “I can do nothing further.”

Bharat took hold of Lakshman’s bicep. “You can’t just walk away! That was Sita-bhabhi and her sons we saw. Our nephews. Did you tell Rama that much at least?"

Lakshman took hold of Bharat's forearm and dislodged his brother's hand from his bicep. "I tried everything. But he is on a road without any chance of slowing or turning back. There is only one way to go from here: forward."

"And forward means war with our own allies? This is madness," Shatrugan said.

"This is Rama, Emperor of Kosala," Lakshman said bitterly. "And these are the limits to my influence over him. If I try to circumvent his authority, I will be in defiance of the throne as you two are."

"There must be something we can do to stop this. I know that lout Aarohan and his thugs are upto something."

"If they are, then it is with the full knowledge and oversight of Pradhan Mantri Jabali himself," Lakshman said morosely. "He personally vouched for the King's Guard. They function under his command, did you know that? Even the King himself does not have command of his own Guard!"

"Let me speak to Kausalya-Maa," Bharat said. "She talked some sense into Rama's head earlier. Maybe he will listen to her again." He started to leave.

Lakshman caught his brother's arm, stopping him. "There is no use. He will see no one now that the War Council is in session. Besides, to back down now would be to lose face before Jabali and the War Council. It would be a tactical error to call on his mother each time he needs correction."

"Then what do you propose we do?" Shatrugan asked. "Stand by and watch this juggernaut," he gestured towards the enormous army camp sprawled along the banks of the Sarayu for yojanas downriver, "roll on and crush our own relatives and friends across the land? Plunge the entire civilized world into the madness of a war without reason, without purpose?"

Lakshman stood up. "There may be a way to get Rama to listen. Someone he cannot dismiss as easily as his brothers or his mother."

“Who?” Bharat asked curiously.

Lakshman looked at each of them in turn. “His sons.”

They were silent for a moment. Then Bharat and Shatrugan both smiled. Shatrugan slapped Lakshman’s shoulder. “Now this is the Lakshman I grew up with,” he said, grinning widely.

Lakshman shrugged. “It took me a while but I finally realized I can’t just go on this way. Things are going out of hand in Ayodhya. This madness has to stop.”

“Very well, then, bhraatr, we are with you. What shall we do?”

Lakshman gestured to where their horses stood waiting and ready. “You two ride back into the forest and try to find the sons of Sita before Aarohan and his men do. If our suspicions are right, that villain will be trying his best to track them and kill them. Make sure you keep them alive. Officially though, you will both be on a personal mission on my direct orders, your goal being to find the Ashwamedha stallion.”

Bharat nodded. “We understand. What will you do in the meanwhile?”

Lakshman turned and glared in the direction of the royal pavilion. “I’ll wait here for an opportunity to get Rama alone without Jabali or the other ear-poisoners. When you find the twins, bring Sita-bhabhi and them here.”

“And then what happens?” Shatrugan asked, mounting his horse. Bharat did the same beside him.

“Then we shall have a family reunion,” Lakshman said.

He slapped the rumps of their horses, sending them lurching forward and on their way.

Captain Aarohan studied the valley one last time before turning to his aides. “This time we have them. This valley is a death trap. There are only two ways out. North, back to the raj-marg, the Sarayu river and then Mithila. The Imperial Army is already on that route. All we have to do is move one akshohini ahead of the main procession and position it so that anyone exiting the forest on that road is instantly captured.”

“But the army is supposed to follow the trail of the Ashwamedha stallion, not range ahead at will,” said one of his aides.

Aarohan made a sound of impatience. “Yes. And once the stallion is captured, the army does what it must to recapture it.”

“Ah. Of course.”

Aarohan shook his head despairingly. “Leave the military strategy to me. Just follow orders. Now, as I was saying, there are only two ways out of this valley. The other way is East by South-East. If they go that way, we have them. In fact, it would be best if we force them in that direction.”

His aide frowned but hesitated before asking the question.

Aarohan cursed. “Because it leads to a series of ravines and gullies and finally ends in a box canyon.” He looked around to make sure they all understood. “A dead end. Once we chase them in there, they will be like rats in a trap. We have only to poke them through the bars until they are dead.”

The aides nodded.

“I am so happy we are all in agreement,” Aarohan said sarcastically. “Make sure the akshohini on the raj-marg covering that patch of forest is prominently visible. The outlaws will most likely attempt to exit using the old grama-train route that snakes through the jungle and rejoins the raj-marg at the Ahilya Bai junction, some miles outside of Mithila.”

The aides exchanged a glance. One spoke cautiously: “That will put the army on Mithila land. Well into Videha territory.”

Aarohan nodded. “That’s the idea. We operate on the premise that the old minister Sumantra was murdered by Mithilan brigands who then stole the sacred stallion and absconded with him into the jungle. We have every right under Arya law to rove wherever necessary to recover the stallion.”

“And every acre of land we cover while doing so becomes annexed to Kosala?” said another aide, tentatively adding a questioning note to the statement. “So we incidentally expand Ayodhya’s dominion in the course of this outlaw hunt! That’s sharp.”

“Not as sharp as the point of my blade if we fail at this mission,” said Aarohan shortly. He half-drew his sword, keeping his hand on the hilt to let them know he was done chatting and that this was serious business now. “We all know the upside of success on this job. The downside is not something that bears thinking about so I suggest you don’t dwell on it. Do as I order. Get these outlaws. And we all go home rich and set for life.”

They all nodded tersely, none of them grinning or saying an unnecessary word.

Aarohan looked at each one of them in turn to make sure his message had struck home. When he was satisfied he had made his point as effectively as possible, he slid the sword back into the hilt and leaned forward on his saddle. He pointed down into the valley, jabbing his finger as he pointed and instructed:

“This is how we round them up and herd them,” he said, “just like running cattle except that this time we don’t have to worry about being chased by the cattle owners.” He grinned brightly, light eyes twinkling in his fair face. “We’ll be doing all the chasing.”

Bejoo started as a lithe figure leaped down from the tree branch to land beside him. “Boy,” he said softly, “you gave me a start.” He glanced up at the tree. “I checked that tree just before I stopped here.” He didn’t add ‘in case there might be snakes hanging from the branches’. The fact was he could still hear the screams of those bitten soldiers and see their bloodless faces as they gasped and choked out their last breaths by the stream. He thought he would see them in his nightmares forever—or at least as long as he lived.

Luv grinned up at him, squatting. “I wasn’t there when you stopped here. I waited till you settled before coming over. I used the vanar highway.”

Bejoo frowned. “The vanar highway...” An image flashed in his mind, of Hanuman loping through the trees along the Sarayu near Ayodhya, a sight that had never failed to draw excited cries and pointed fingers particularly among the children of the city back in the months following Rama's return. Another age, another Ayodhya. The vanar could race along the treeline faster than the fastest horse in the kingdom. Bejoo doubted if these boys could travel as fast through the trees, lacking Hanuman's particular bodily appendages, but he guessed they must be fast enough to have dropped in on him so suddenly. He had only stopped here a moment ago. "I understand," he said, smiling. "You are resourceful little fellows, younguns. I knew you were someone special the minute I laid eyes on you on that grama marg the other day."

Luv shrugged with some embarrassment. "Sorry we held you up that day. You did get back the wagon with all its contents, didn't you?"

"Oh yes, Nakhudi returned it safe and sound, thank you very much." Bejoo reflected briefly that had they not stolen the wagon and Nakhudi not returned it, he would never have gotten involved in this in the first place. "Actually, I'm very happy you robbed our grama-train that day."

Luv crinkled his nose. It was somewhat snubbed, resembling his mother's slightly snubbed nose as well. "You are?" He looked puzzled.

Bejoo patted him on the back affectionately, careful not to touch the oversized rig bristling with arrows. "It was the best thing that happened to me in the last ten years."

Luv shrugged, making a face that suggested he would never understand the ways and minds of grown ups. "We know they're coming. We're ready for them."

Bejoo stared at him. "Ready? My boy, from what I saw, you and your brother are very good with your bows but these are armed, armored, mounted and trained mercenaries. More of them than even I have seen together in my life. There are over a hundred mounted men in the King's Guard, with another full company of about one thousand on foot. And they know what they're doing from the looks of it. Don't under-estimate that Captain Aarohan. He's a brute but he's an experienced brute. When he comes at you with over one thousand armed killers, he means business. And that's not counting the Imperial Army at his back for whatever support he needs. You cannot fight these men with just your bows, lad!"

Luv looked undisturbed by Bejoo's speech. "Why not? It's been done before. There's the famous battle of Janasthana where a band of outlaws stood against a horde of thousands of rakshasas. Berserkers too! And still they won."

Bejoo realized the boy was referring to the battle led by Rama himself, against the last survivors of the clan of rakshasas that had come to avenge the humiliation of their sister-rakhsasa Supanakha, twenty three years ago. He wondered if Luv and his brother knew that the leader of that 'band of outlaws' had been none other than their own father. He wasn't going to be the one to tell them. Especially not here and now! The boy had a grandiose enough opinion of his and his brother's abilities as it was.

"Forget tales and legends," he said gently, "this is real. These men are worse than rakshasas. They have the power and might of the kingdom backing them. They will not stop until they get what they want."

Luv nodded. "We have the royal stallion. We kept it safe. We think they mean to kill it and blame it on us."

Bejoo spread his hands. "Yes! That is exactly what they mean to, I have no doubt at all. You see? That's why I must take the stallion back to Ayodhya myself. I have the ear of Pradhan Mantri Jabali. He will listen to me. I will take the horse to him and attempt to sort out this entire situation. It's the only way."

Luv looked at him with a strangely intense expression that belied his years. "And what of the ashram slaughter? The extermination of the outlaw camps? The killing of Nakhudi's friends? We thought the bear-killers were monsters but these men are the real demons. They are asuras in human guise. We cannot let them walk away unpunished."

Bejoo sighed. "What do you want me to say, youngun? They are authorized by Jabali himself under Rama's authority. If I try to accuse them, I would be clapped in chains before I could finish explaining. They are too powerful to bring to book right away. But at some point in time, once this is all over, we can try our best to see that justice is done—Where are you going?"

Luv had risen to his feet and turned away. He stopped and looked back at Bejoo darkly. “There is no other point in time. This is the time. This is the place. This is the day they come to justice.” He raised his bow. “And this is the instrument of their danda.”

Bejoo rose to a half-crouch, his aging knees and joints protesting. “Boy, listen to me.”

Luv’s face was caught by a beam of sunlight shining through the dense dappled tree cover as he looked back. Bejoo was struck by how much the boy resembled his father at that moment, in that angle and light. Despite his boyish voice, his tone was as stern and forbidding as Rama himself: “Bejoo-chacha, thank you for everything you have done for us. Leave the rest to Kush and me and me now.”

And before Bejoo could say another word, he was gone, vanished like a deer into the dark woods.

FOUR

The men of the Captain’s Guard were confident of themselves. They were a ragtag band of ruffians who had lent their swords out for hire in half a dozen different kingdoms across the civilized world. Most of them were Mlecchas, barbarians from foreign lands beyond the great Kush mountain ranges or across the great oceans that bounded the sub-continent. Their mixture of skin color and appearance betrayed their worldly mix as did their accents and languages and customs. They were a motley bunch with only three things in common: They knew how to kill. They enjoyed doing it. And they had no compunctions about who was at the receiving end of their blows or thrusts. Brahmins or merchants, kings or serving girls, soldiers or other sell-swords, they had killed all kinds. Often enough to know that all living creatures died much the same way and were as easy or hard to kill. They had turned execution into an art, assassination into a craft, murder into a thriving trade and now, as their youth soured into mature manhood, they sought to secure their futures, build a nest for themselves where they could indulge their varied vices and live out the rest of their lives in opulence and luxury. They had seen their numbers ebb and flow any number of times in the past decade itself, for the mortality rate in their business was the highest imaginable and it was time now to settle down and reap the fruits of their adventuring.

As the ancient jest went: What happens to criminals when they retire? They become politicians. Politics would do very nicely, thank you. And the totalitarian regime that dominated Kosala now made Ayodhya the ideal place for such men to settle and make their homes. After all, the courts of kingdoms across the world were filled with over-dressed overweight nobles and aristocrats who had risen through much the same means: by doing whatever they had to in order to get there. To them, the end always justified the means and today, their end was to kill the woman named Vedavati and her twin sons Luv and Kush...by any means necessary. It was a mission simpler by far than most they had undertaken until now. Even the handful who had been with the band since the beginning—Aarohan and his aides—could not recall an assignment that had seemed less daunting and which promised greater rewards. The mood was good, morale high, and an air of certain victory reigned among the company as it poured into the valley.

They moved through the valley in a familiar pattern they had executed several times before, laying out a grid on which men moved in trios, each one positioned diagonally to the other two at all times, thereby enabling them to watch one another's flanks and rear. The valley was perhaps a mile from the highest point of the eastern hill to the peak of the western hill bounding it, most of that distance at ground level. It was a little more than a mile long, the two hills converging in a series of wadis and gullies that wound and crisscrossed until they led to the box canyon surrounded by sheer crumbling rock faces. It was impossible to climb over those rock faces and there was no way to ride or walk or climb around them. Once a person entered the wadis and gullies from any point, they would either end up going in circles until they came back into the valley or enter the box canyon and be boxed in. Aarohan had deployed the full thousand men at his command into the valley at once, determined to flush out and finish off the prey within the day rather than prolong this hunt. He and his hundred horse-mounted cavalry stayed on the hill rise overlooking the valley, watching from above. It was difficult to see much with the dense tree cover but unlike the jungle outside the valley there were gaps in the trees here and even a few small clearings and he could glimpse the reflection of noon sunlight on weapons and armor and buckles and helmets as his warriors moved in threes. He smiled as he watched the frontline cross the halfway point. There was less than half a mile between them and the box canyon now. Already the prey was trapped. It was only a matter of time now.

Bejoo waited until the last possible moment before ordering his men into action. He knew from experience that a larger company attacking a smaller target would be more cautious and wary when they first entered the new environment. The further they went into hostile territory without encountering any resistance, the more complacent and less alert they grew. In this case, he could hear the occasional gruff laughter of Aarohan's men and see the flash of their teeth as they jested and laughed their way up the valley. It was evident that they did not think much of the target they intended to acquire and were already assuming that the target was probably skulking quietly, sweating it out and hoping not to be found. It was a common mistake made when fighting outlaws and refugees. It was true that these were people who had run away or chose to stay away from civilized society. But that did not mean they were all cowards or that they could not fight. Push them too hard, invade their territories, slaughter their loved ones and friends...and they would fight back more fiercely than trained soldiers. He knew that these arrogant mercenaries were in for a surprise once they finally came face to face with their quarry. But he also knew that once that happened, the fight would be over very quickly. Short and fierce. Because there were thousands of these brutes. And only a handful of defenders. And of those defenders, very few could actually fight. Which was why most of the bear-killers and Nakhudi herself were in the box canyon, protecting the survivors of the ashram massacre. And the sacred horse.

So Bejoo had positioned his small band of grama-rakshaks with their backs to the canyon, at the end of the valley. In order to get to the defenders, Aarohan's men would have to get past them. And that would only happen when Bejoo and every last one of his men were down.

He had spoken briefly to his men before they deployed into the valley. His scouts told him that Aarohan's company would be here in moments, so they did not have much time. They were barely a few hundred yards ahead of the enemy. Still, he needed to say what he had to say—and to give them a chance to respond, should they choose to do so.

“You are all olduns like myself,” he said gruffly. “So I won't unload the usual wagon load of uks offal on your heads the way they do with younguns. If nothing else, we've all earned the right to hear things said plainly and directly.”

There was a chuckle or two at his colorful reference but for the most part the band of grizzled, white-bearded, white-haired and bald-headed veterans gazed back with apparent indifference at him. These were men who had seen too much to get excited over anything anymore. The fact that they were here was enough.

“What we are about to do is foolish and heroic. We are likely to die doing it. And even if some of us survive, they will either be killed on the spot or be executed later. Not to put too fine a point on it, we are going up against suicidal odds and our action will probably be termed treasonous.”

He looked around to see if there was any reaction to those words. One oldun hawked and spat a mouthful of supari juice, another with his hair tied behind his head with a cloth band scratched his backside but mostly everyone just looked old and disinterested. Only the newest man in the group, that big-built fellow who had joined them only a few days earlier, seemed to display a modicum of reaction. The man had been a gatewatch sentry all his life, Bejoo recalled, a familiar face at the first gate for as long as Bejoo could remember. He had been retired involuntarily, he had said, yet another modern development brought in by the new regime. In Bejoo's time the only way a soldier 'retired' was when he died in battle. There was no other form of retirement. So long as I can raise my sword... went the old kshatriya tavern song, with a second line that descended into ribaldry... And so long as I can raise my sword... The gatewatch retiree was the only one whose face showed some semblance of emotion and that emotion was a familiar one. He wants to fight the bastards who retired him, the new order that seeks to change the old ways and bring in a 'better' Ayodhya for all. He wants to show those young idiots backed by venal old war-mongers that real soldiers don't retire and don't go out looking for trouble: they just do their job quietly and when trouble comes, they don't back down. What was the man's name again? Somasra. That was it. Old gatewatch Somasra.

“I am going to fight for these people because I believe they are being unjustly hunted down and slaughtered without cause or provocation. That goes against everything I know about kshatriya dharma. It is an affront to Ayodhya that these so-called King's Guard wear our national colors and claim to be acting in our national interest. They represent everything that is wrong with our kingdom and has been growing steadily wronger over the past decade. With all due respect to Samrat Rama Chandra, I think he does not know the half of what some of his people are upto and if he did he would not condone their actions or endorse them. But since they act in his name, and since there is no time to seek out the Samrat or his advisors and beg for this action to be halted, the only way is to stand and face them down.”

He looked around, indicating their numbers. “Or at least hold them off as long as possible. Now, I do this out of my own choice. You don't have to. Those who wish to turn back can do so now, before the King's Guard arrive. Slip out through the forest and go farther north or south or wherever you please. Those who wish to stay and die with me today... well, all I can say about those who do stay...” he shrugged then raised his voice to heckle them furiously: “...is that you're a bunch of farting old fools with more pride in dharma than love of life.”

At this, they perked up a little, some snorting, others rubbing mustaches and slapping arms and thighs. Old Somasra showed his teeth: they were quite yellow and the front two were missing. Sign of a man who stuck his face where it doesn't belong—or where it does, Bejoo's wife used to say when she saw a kshatriya like that. Then she would look at him as if to say silently: Like yourself.

“Are we going to fight now,” said the old gatewatch Somasra, “or are we going to stand around here all day talking and polishing each other's swords?”

This brought a few guffaws. Bejoo grinned. At least he had gotten through to them, with Somasra's help. "Very well. We take a defensive position at the end of the valley and only show ourselves at the last moment, when they are almost upon us."

"And then we kill them with our bad breath," said another oldun with only one arm and one eye. He had lost the limb in the Last Asura War and the eye in a childhood fight, and while he had once been able to wield a sword with his good arm better than most men with two good arms, he now had to use a lighter shortsword because it was all he could manage to lift. The man would probably not survive his first clash with the enemy yet here he was, tossing off a quip as if he were teaching new recruits on the training field.

"You do that, Yuddhajit," said one of the others, stuffing a fresh plug of tobacco in his mouth. "You're armed for it!"

Guffaws all around. Then they disbanded and descended into the valley. Barely had they entered the tree line when Bejoo made out the distant thunder of approaching hooves. Soon after, he had turned back and peered cautiously through a gap and saw the familiar half-shaved half-bearded face of the Captain of the King's Guard. See you at the end of my sword, he thought, then continued working his way through the undergrowth with greater stealth. The element of surprise—if even that—was about all they had on their side.

That, and two young boys with big bows and even bigger hearts.

But he had fought and lived long enough to know that even the biggest of hearts couldn't overcome odds like these.

It's just not possible, he thought morosely. Once they knock us down, there'll be nothing to stop them barging into that canyon and finishing the slaughter they began yesterday.

All the more reason why his olduns and he had to do whatever damage they could. Perhaps if they caused enough casualties, Aarohan would withdraw and leave the regular army to flush out the rebels. If they did that, then at least there might be a chance, however slender, that the commanding officer would honor kshatriya dharma and not cut down brahmins, women and children out of hand.

It wasn't much but it was all that he could think of and hope for.

And die for.

Time now, he thought, as he glimpsed and heard the frontline of Aarohan's Guard approach his position. He glanced to right and left. Somewhere over there in the shade of those trees was the old gatewatch Somasra. Yes, there he was, a hulking shadow no less a tree trunk in his own right. The man must have been formidable in his youth. Bejoo nodded at the shadow, not sure if Somasra saw him.

Then he raised his sword and launched himself at the nearest trio of approaching King's Guard.

FIVE

"Jai Shree Shaneshwara!" Bejoo cried as he launched himself at the closest trio of King's Guard.

Somasra had seen the grama-rakshak's sign and was prepared. Even as Bejoo leaped out, shouting loud enough to send cockatoos screeching in panic from the trees overhead, Somasra stepped from his hiding place and began slashing with his double-sided sword at the next trio.

They were momentarily distracted by Bejoo's cry—which was the reason why the grama-rakshak had shouted a battle cry in the first place. It served to inform his own men that the attack had begun, and to distract the approaching enemy frontline for that brief instant. Somasra took full advantage of the distraction.

He leaped into the center of the triangle formed by the three King's Guard, slashing sideways at the first. He caught the man completely unawares and had the satisfaction of striking aside the man's drawn sword and feeling his own blade bite deeply. The man collapsed, gouting blood.

But that was all the advantage Somasra got. The other two immediately moved to take up positions on either side of Somasra, forcing him to fight on two fronts at once. That was a deadly game. It had been a long time since he had seen active combat. Most of his decades on gatewatch had been spent breaking up brawls, dealing with angry traders and offensive foreigners who thought it their birthright to enter any city they pleased and act as they desired. But there had been a fair share of good fights as well, mostly with armed and dangerous men, some drunk, others just mean enough to take satisfaction from gutting a guard or two, even though they knew they would be caught at once and thrown into the dungeons. Casualties among gatewatch guards weren't high but they did occur and Somasra had seen a fair number of fellow gatewatch guards cut down on the job. Enough to make him stay relatively well enough in shape and practice every chance he got.

Now, he had to work for his life. The two King's Guard were shrewd and young and experienced enough to have taken down men like him before. They made him dance, toying with him, one coming in and pretending to get past his guard, forcing him to turn and swing to defend himself, the other doing the same on the other side, until all he was doing was swinging this way and that like a dancer at a king's court. He would tire soon like this and sooner or later, one of them would get a point in and then the other would finish the job. Already he felt his old lower back injury protest as he swung from the hip, trying to keep both in sight at once and failing because they were smart enough to know just how far apart to stand.

There was only one way to end this dance and he resorted to it. When one of them feinted, grinning with the knowledge that he was a foot closer than the last attempt, Somasra lunged at the man. They were prepared for this move—it was the cue for the other fellow to step in fast from behind and run his sword through Somasra's kidney—but what they weren't prepared for was what he did next. He grabbed the first man's sword hand, then the man's neck and shoulder, turned and swung the man towards his oncoming comrade. The other man, rushing in to aim at Somasra's kidney from behind, realized what was about to happen and tried to turn away but was too late. His thrusting blade punched into his own fellow's belly, running the man through. The first man collapsed on the ground, heaving in his death throes. The second fellow's sword, trapped in the man's stomach, required a moment to be pulled free. That moment gave Somasra's aging muscles and feet enough time to cover the few yards of ground and hack at the man's exposed neck with the power of his bunched arms. He nearly took the man's head off.

Leaning on his bloody sword, gasping for breath, he heard the cries and shouts of outraged men from all across the valley. It seemed the element of surprise had worked for them after all. Those sounded like King's Guard dying to him—the olduns would just grunt and die, they wouldn't waste their fading breath trying to shout. Some of them probably couldn't shout, their throats hoarsened by over-use and chewing too much supari. They were old enough to know when a man died he died alone even if he was on a battlefield surrounded by a dozen akshohini of his own. Only the young mercenary fools would shout to warn each other and call for help. Somasra grinned at the screams that rang through the noonday stillness. Maybe old gold was as tough as young steel after all.

He heard a sound behind him and turned to see two men in King's Guard uniforms approaching. They had blood on their anga-vastras and swords and since there were only two of them, he could only presume they had met one of his comrades and come off victors. They approached him cautiously but confidently, secure in their youth and knowledge of superior numbers. He sighed. Now he would be obliged to kill these two in order to avenge his fallen fellow as well as defend his own life. Oh well. If he hadn't wanted to dance he wouldn't have come to the wedding feast.

“Come on, littleuns,” Somasra said, forcing his tired shoulder and back muscles to heave and raise the lowered sword. “Time for your bloodbath. Don't forget to wash behind the ears.”

Bejoo finished cutting down his second trio of enemy and took a brief moment to catch his breath. He leaned against a tree trunk splattered with the gore from a slashed throat. He looked back and found himself unable to believe that those six corpses were his work. Six young men of the King's Guard? Really? Either these mercenaries were out of practice or they had grown too accustomed to easy pickings. Although, he admitted ruefully as he worked a broken tooth loose from a socket and examined it, they hadn't seemed out of practice when he was surrounded by them, three at a time and fighting for his life. In fact, come to think of it, they had been quite good. Perhaps he simply had more experience and knowledge of swordcraft? Or perhaps—and this was more likely—he had more reason to fight than they.

The cries and shouts from across the valley had ceased. Only the cries of the birds remained in the still afternoon air, calling out in plaintive tones as they circled the valley, wanting to return to their roosts if the wretched humans below had finished killing each other. Not yet, winged brothers, but soon it will all be over. Very soon. He was old and experienced enough to know that killing those six men had taken everything he had. Now, he would be lucky if he was able to keep the next trio at bay for more than a few minutes before succumbing.

A sudden silence fell upon the valley. He frowned. That was odd. Then he tilted his head and listened. The faint sounds of clashing weaponry had ceased as well. That could only mean one thing: the enemy had retreated. And since he knew that his old veterans, however bravely they might have conducted themselves in the first clash, were not enough cause for a force of a thousand King's Guard to retreat. No. They were simply regrouping and changing tactics. They would attack again soon and this time, they would cut through Bejoo and his dirty dozens in a matter of minutes.

He wiped his face clean and held his sword ready, taking up a position which afforded him cover on at least one side. It meant he would be boxed in if they came at him in numbers but this was likely to be his last stand anyway. He would rather be taken from the front than from behind.

A sound came to his ears.

He frowned but it was gone as quickly as it had come.

He waited and listened.

There it was again.

And again.

And yet again.

Then it continued almost non-stop, a rhythmic repetition. The same, or similar sounds, repeated over and over again, like some distant drummer's beat. For an instant, he wondered if it was a drummer's beat. But that was no drum beat. It was...something else. Something he had heard infinite times before and knew intimately well. He clenched his free hand, frustrated at not being able to identify the sound.

Then a man sound came on the still afternoon air. A choking wet cry, as a man might make if struck in the throat with a blade. A quick explosion of air before the blood rushed up and spurted out the hole.

A few minutes later, there was another man's sound, this one a distinctive death rattle in a dying man's throat. As if he had been cut down but the message that he was dead had yet to reach his flailing limbs. It ended with another repetition of that sound. The first sound.

After a few more moments, Bejoo understood that men were dying across the valley. Not his men, not the dirty dozens. The sounds of dying men were coming from several yards further out, from the enemy frontlines. So the men who were dying were King's Guards. No mystery to that. The question was: Who was killing them and how?

He didn't think his olduns would have gone after the retreating frontline. They wouldn't have had the energy for one thing. And they might be suicidal but they were not stupid: at best, they had dealt with four score or five score of the enemy. There were still the better part of a thousand more out there, across the valley. To hold them off was madness enough: to try to push them back was ludicrous. No. Bejoo was dead certain that all his men were to his left and right, spread out in a long ragged line across this end of the valley. The sounds and death rattles were coming from farther down. It had to be King's Guard men dying.

Then it came to him.

The sound.

It was the sound of a weapon being deployed. One so familiar he berated himself for not recognizing it at once.

“Arrows!”

That was the sound of an arrow whickering through the air across a long distance. It should have been almost silent except to the bowman himself but the sound was amplified by the bowl-shape of the valley, which was why he heard it at all. And those death rattles were the ones that hadn't killed their targets instantly. Which meant all the others had struck home dead to rights. It had to mean that because if the arrow passing overhead was so clearly audible then the same bolt striking the wood of a tree trunk or passing through a clump of bushes. This was the sound of arrows being shot from somewhere behind him and at the King's Guard soldiers spread out across the valley. Being shot with deadly accuracy and lightning speed.

He began to count the rhythm of the loosing and was astonished to find himself unable to keep up. How fast were they shooting? How was it possible to shoot that fast and with such accuracy? Then he understood: there are two of them. They shoot alternately, so at any given instant, there's always an arrow in the air. That way, they cover each other during the moment between shots.

He marveled at the skill and training that had gone into perfecting such a system.

Then, after he had mulled over that for a moment, he wondered how many enemy soldiers they were actually hitting.

SIX

Luv and Kush were a single being and that being's entire existence was dedicated to a single task: Destruction. They had found a position on the top of the rock face above the box canyon, overlooking the valley yet still high enough to cover most of the low-lying basin. It had taken them time to climb up here carrying their heavy burden for they were carrying their entire store of arrows. Ever since they had learned to loose and Maatr had taught them the importance of replacing what they used, they had taken to crafting at least a certain number of arrows each day. They used many during their practice play each day, developing their own methods for various angles of attack, for shooting from low positions upwards and from high to low, through leaves and foliage, across water, into water, against the wind, downwind...every imaginable situation in which it was possible to fire arrows, they experimented with, mastered and then perfected. Whenever possible, they reused their arrows. But many were damaged in use or not retrievable. That was when they thought of the possibility of someday requiring a store of arrows for defending the ashram. They would require perfectly made and stored arrows, not reused ones chipped or bent or damaged in any way. And when that day came, it would be too late to start making and storing.

So they had taken to making a certain number every day for their practice...and setting a fixed number aside. They made the best arrows they were capable of making, honing the fletching and shaft and head after much experimentation and use in various situations. Finally, they had begun saving their store carefully in bales of straw to avoid warping from moisture and then stored the bales themselves in the box canyon. They had retrieved the bundles earlier and then carried them up here to this position chosen months earlier in case of just such a contingency. At the time they had never seriously thought that they would literally be fending off an army. But just in case, they thought it wouldn't hurt to be prepared. Besides, arrows could be sold at the city markets or to the occasional grama-train—the ones they didn't waylay—for a small profit. If nothing else, they had intended to sell their store and buy Maatr something from the market or a trader. A new veena perhaps to replace the old molding one she played on. Luckily for them, Maatr's naming day was a good few months away and their store was intact.

Now, they depleted that store at a prodigious rate. They were loosing faster than they had ever loosed before, and for longer, and across greater distances and with unerring accuracy. For one thing, they had never actually aimed to kill before. They loved the creatures of the forest and could never dream of killing them for sport—or for food, which was, in a sense, worse. They had always practiced on inanimate objects, resorting to clever tricks to increase the challenge when practicing. One of them would spin a stone in the air, for instance, and the other aim at it. Or a piece of driftwood rushing down white waters served as a moving target. Or objects hung from trees a hundred yards distant. Over time, the stones flung in the air had become smaller, the driftwood reduced to a mere chip, the objects hung from trees merely dots and painted leaves. The use of natural challenges had only sharpened their skills over time.

But killing actual living beings was a different experience. They had not anticipated the shock they felt when their first arrows punched into the throats of the first two men. This had happened immediately after the clash with Bejoo's men, when the King's Guard frontline had retreated to regroup and prepare for their next attack. Luv and Kush had seen their opportunity and fired their first two shots, aiming at two men standing in a clearing with drawn, bloody swords, hacking at a badly wounded but still alive veteran. The veteran wasn't making any sound or crying for mercy and that was probably what irked the two Guardsmen. So they had taken to chopping and poking at the fallen man in a bid to evoke some response. Luv had pointed out the men using the terse short form they had developed over the years when practicing together.

"South-south-west, one and one," he said, naming the direction in which the targets lay when viewed from their position and the individual targets themselves.

"I see them," Kush replied, his bow already turned and aimed, string taut and ready to fire. "You first?"

"Loose," Luv said and released his arrow. As he bent his hand back to pluck another arrow from the rig over his shoulder, Kush released his arrow as well. By the time Luv's second arrow was notched and strung and ready to loose, Kush's hand was reaching for his second arrow.

That first time, they had paused and looked at the results of their shots.

Both the Guardsmen clutched their throats, blood spurting brazenly between their fingers, and collapsed on the ground, the first dying instantly, the second shuddering once then laying still.

The wounded veteran sat up slowly, staring at the corpses with arrows standing from their ravaged throats and looked around in grim amazement. He seemed almost disappointed to be alive as he staggered to his feet and hobbled towards Luv and Kush's side of the valley. The twins lowered their bows and followed him until they saw three or four of his comrades emerge from their hiding places to assist him. Then, moving as one, they raised their bows again to seek new targets.

Both of them paused yet again, lowered their bows completely, letting the drawstrings go limp, and looked at each other.

Both of them had tears in their eyes.

“I killed a man,” each of them said at exactly the same time.

“But I had to,” each one added.

They cried for a moment, the tears running freely down their faces. Their throats hitched once then they wiped their faces clear with the length of cloth they kept to keep their hands clean and sweat-free during their practice sessions. They knew now that this was no more a practice session. This was the real thing. It was war. They thought for a moment silently, their faces hardening, the tears replaced by a new emotion.

“They attacked the ashram and slaughtered everyone in sight,” Kush said.

“They would have killed every last person if we didn’t arrive with the bear-killers to stop them,” Luv said.

“They were even going to kill the cows and calves.”

“They killed Sarama and most of her pack.”

“They wounded Maatr badly, almost killed her.”

“They mean to kill us all now. And nobody else is going to save us or stop them.”

“There are thousands of them.”

“Hundreds of thousands.”

“Crores and arbo even.”

“There are hardly any of us.”

“We have the right to defend our home, our loved ones, and ourselves by any means necessary.”

“It is the law of survival,” Luv said.

“It is the duty of a kshatriya to take arms when needed,” Kush said.

“It is our dharma,” they said together.

Then they raised their bows as one.

Tracked and found targets. This was easy because the valley was crawling with hundreds of easy-to-spot targets. While the soldiers might be partially covered by the trees and foliage when seen at ground level, from this vantage point they were as easily visible as carved bone shapes on a chaupat dice board.

At first they called out targets to one another:

“North by north east.”

“Due west.”

“West by south west.”

“South by south east.”

After a while, they stopped calling out targets. It seemed pointless. By then, they were in the grip of battle fever. Their hands, their shoulders, their back muscles, their eyes, their necks, all moved in concert as an unified whole. Like a single organism dedicated to only one function, they aimed and loosed, aimed and loosed, aimed and loosed, over and over again.

They kept count silently, only because they had been taught that as well by Maatr as well as by Nakhudi. It was part of the lesson on war which began: Know Thy Enemy. Knowing the enemy included knowing his strength in numbers and by extension, how many of that number your forces had succeeded in killing.

Aarohan stared down at the Valley, speechless with rage. The runner who had just come up the hill to bring him word stood several yards away, out of sword reach. The man was familiar with Aarohan’s temper.

“How many did you say?” he asked again.

The man glanced around nervously, then said, “Over four score dead or dying in the first clash. And now, another three score downed by arrows.” The man paused then cleared his throat. “And as Sergeant Manasvir said to tell you, the arrows are taking lives at the rate of one every few seconds.”

“Yes, I heard you the first time,” Aarohan said, then seethed silently for a moment. He saw a flurry of movement in a cluster of trees then had an unmistakable glimpse of a man collapsing. The man’s limbs fluttered then ceased movement. That was deadly accurate shooting. Whoever was loosing this barrage of arrows, they had the aim of an eagle-hawk swooping down on prey. Aarohan had once worked for a great lord of the desert who bred eagle-hawks. The desert lord had trained the birds to fly over his city of tents when he camped in an oasis for a few weeks at a time. The birds would fly so high overhead, one had to constantly keep looking up at the sun to spot them, and even then they circumscribed such enormous arcs that one could never locate the camp just by looking up at the birds. But if any stranger made the mistake of coming too close to the desert lord’s camp, and if the stranger and his entourage met certain requirements—such as a large number of men bearing metal weapons—the birds would swoop down on them and attack. The clincher was in how they attacked: the birds were trained to swoop down and pluck out only the left eye of each man then fly back to their master and present him with the ripped-out eyeballs. Aarohan had witnessed the birds attacking a caravan in which he was traveling once and it had seemed as if a gust of wind blew out of a clear sky, tore out a man’s eye and carried it away. The bird itself was barely a blur of feathers and talons and beak.

Now, for the first time since that day he saw another creature at work with the same deadly efficiency. An archer who possessed the ultimate level of perfection: the ability to spot a target, judge distance, bow-pull, pressure, wind, and then loose a killing shot...all within the space of half a heartbeat. It was impossible. No archer he had ever heard of possessed such speed and accuracy. It must be a platoon of archers. A company of archers, perhaps even a whole regiment, taking turns to loose, while spotters called out targets to them. But he knew that too was impossible: No group of archers could be loosing with such perfect repetition, over and over again. No, this must be a small band of truly gifted bowmen. A handful even. Perhaps even...

“Two young boys!” he said, and his mouth stayed open with awe and amazement. He felt a rush of excitement such as he had not felt in years. The sons of Sita! They had to be the archers responsible for this killing wave. He had seen them briefly in action and they had certainly been quick enough. He had not thought them capable of such a concerted attack—nor of taking so many lives with such impunity. But apparently they were and could. Yes. It had to be them.

“Backtrack,” he told one of his aides curtly. The man nodded and rode off downhill to do as he bade.

“Pull back and use tree cover. Lay low until I give further orders,” he barked to another aide. This man too rode downhill at once. His aides were the men who had stayed the longest with him in service. And nobody stayed in service with him for long if they were prone to arguing or debating his orders.

Aarohan leaned over the rock on which he had been standing, peering down at the far end of the valley. It was too far to see clearly but he thought he could faintly glimpse the thin lines of the arrows as they streaked down towards their targets. He could certainly see patches of foliage where the arrows cut through leaves and twigs to reach their mark. He estimated the shooting range to be at least four hundred yards, perhaps even five hundred. For arrows to cover that distance and still punch through armor and bone...no, he corrected himself...not armor and bone, merely flesh and cartilage. That's why they're aiming only at throats. So long as it arrives with enough force to punch through the larynx and sever the main blood vessels, it would be fatal everytime. He admired the strategy and the execution both. They must be firing from a high position, someplace from where they can see the whole valley and glimpse my men moving through the forest. And they must be standing and aiming downwards, with heavier-weight arrowheads, to give their arrows sufficient momentum and accuracy to cover such a long distance. But no amount of calculation and positioning was worth a pie if the archer's hand and eye were not perfect enough. To shoot ten or twenty times in a row with such accuracy was impressive. To do so three score times and more was unheard of. And that had been the tally several moments ago when the runner was despatched up here to bring me word. In this much time, their tally must be twice as much!

Even if they missed occasionally, which was inevitable, it still meant that they were reaping a terrible toll. The olduns had put up stiffer resistance than he would have expected—not that he had been expecting them at all. Their very presence in this fray was a surprise. But the fact that they could hold their own against his Thousand was even more surprising. Still, more than half of them had been killed or severely wounded in that first clash. The second wave of attack would have finished them off. They would have been rolled up and packed away without further ado and his men could have taken the canyon thereafter.

But this was a new twist on the game. The sons of Sita, tallying deaths by the score, without taking a single casualty for their side. He would not have believed it possible had he not traveled widely enough and seen all the various ways in which men could kill and wage war against one another. Yes, two exceptionally good archers perfectly attuned to one another could keep up a killing barrage such as this for a length of time. But sooner or later, arms would tire, bows would lose their pulling strength, and arrows would be depleted. All he had to do was reduce their accuracy while continuing to force them to keep loosing. Hence the two orders he had issued: Pull back and use tree cover. Which would starve the boys of targets, forcing them to shoot at movements behind trees, missing more and more often, wasting precious arrows and energy. Backtrack. Which would send his best scouts scouring around their flanks to find their exact position and mark it. Archers were well and good so long as they were shooting from a distance. The moment the fight came to them, up close and personal, they lost their advantage. And in a close fight, two striplings were no match for his elite Hundred. All he had to do was slip in through their deadly circle of fire and attack man to man. The whole thing would be over in moments.

He grinned. At last he had an adversary worthy of his talents.

He waited for the next runner to bring word as he watched the hail of arrows continue.

SEVEN

When they were each past a hundred-count in enemy fatalities, something changed in the theater of war.

They found it increasingly more difficult to acquire targets. At first they assumed that the invading forces were retreating. But that would mean moving backwards. Instead, they had simply gone to ground. They glimpsed flickers of movement behind tree trunks or through gaps in foliage but the men were apparently smart enough not to reveal themselves. The two hundred or so corpses with arrows sticking out of their throats probably acted as good motivation. As the seconds turned to minutes and then became a half-hour of the afternoon sun's westward progress, they realized that this was a stratagem by the enemy.

Suddenly, a man burst from cover and sprinted to the shelter of another tree. He was visible only partially for perhaps two heartbeats.

He fell, sprawling, with an arrow through his neck before he could reach halfway to his destination.

After several moments, another man in another part of the valley moved his position, showing his back and part of his head to them as he leaned against the trunk of the tree he was squatting behind. He was dead before his body hit the ground.

This continued for another half hour or so, the occasional target showing partially here and there. They took every shot they could get and their aim was true seven times out of ten. The three times they missed were only because the arrows struck armor or sword hilts and that too only because they were risking shots based on guesswork rather than clear acquisition.

After that, the soldiers seemed to grow more disciplined and even these occasional lapses ceased.

Finally, as a whole hour passed without their acquiring a single target or loosing a solitary arrow, they sighed together as one.

“We will have to change our position,” Luv said. “It’s the only way.”

Kush nodded. The predator could not simply wait for the prey to come to him: he had to go where the prey went. That was the basis of hunting.

Still, he was reluctant to leave their carefully chosen perch. Once they climbed down from here they would lose this panoramic view of the valley and be at the same level as the enemy. Which meant that the enemy would be able to see them too. Outnumbered as they were, once the enemy marked their position and attacked en masse, they could not possibly repel them for long. No. Up here, they were unapproachable except up the same crumbling rock face they had climbed to get here. The soldiers burdened with their armor and weapons would have a hard, slow struggle coming up and would make easy targets. Only so many could climb at a time after all. There was no other access by horse or on foot either. They were kings of this hill. Once they climbed down, they would lose their greatest advantage.

“No,” Kush said at last after weighing all options. “They will still have to come forward and get past us as well as the old veterans in order to get to the canyon. If we wait them out, they will have no other option but to charge. We should remain here.”

Luv nodded. He too had reached the same conclusion. “You speak truly, bhraatr. They are only testing our patience in the hope that we will show ourselves. So long as we wait them out, they will be forced to come to us eventually.”

“Then we are agreed. We stay here and wait.”

And so they waited. They decided to take turns watching the valley, one resting or refreshing himself while the other watched.

Another hour passed. The sun dipped lower in the western sky. Early afternoon moved slowly towards late afternoon.

Still, no soldiers advanced. The valley was as still as as a graveyard.

Bejoo cursed. Somasra and the others looked up at him. They had spent the afternoon resting in the shade of the thicket near the rock face as a handful of their number took turns standing watch. It had been a dull afternoon after the action of that morning. More than half their number had died in that first clash itself and many who survived were nicked or wounded more severely. Only about a score remained fit enough to fight and perhaps half that number could lift their swords a time or two in defense. Considering the number of enemy amassed in the valley, it was a pitiful band. But the surviving fighting fit in the canyon were even fewer and once the enemy charged in full force, they would sweep all aside in a single attack.

The only reason they had survived the day at all was because of the sons of Sita. They had all marveled at the skill with which the boys downed the enemy. Although they could not clearly tell how many casualties had been taken, they were in a position to see the arrows passing overhead and from their profusion alone they could estimate that a lot of the enemy were falling. The very fact that the advance had halted was itself proof of the efficacy of the archers. Bejoo had grinned each time he heard a muffled cry or throaty gargle across the valley, signaling the death of another of Aarohan's prized King's Guard. How appropriate that the King's Guard should be cut down by the King's own sons! He grinned at the irony of the situation and enjoyed the brief respite.

Now, he saw something that made him curse and rise to his feet.

Somasra and the others reacted as well, rising and taking up their swords at once. Old they might be. Wounded and tired too. But they were neither careless nor foolish. Each man was willing to face death today itself but only after he had exacted a great price from the enemy for his life. They had taken their respite but known that no battle could remain suspended for long, not when one side boasted such vastly superior numbers. It was only a matter of time before fighting resumed.

And now that time had come.

Bejoo cursed again and peered through the trees. The high afternoon sun threw the trees into deep shadow, making it difficult to penetrate the gloom of the thick undergrowth.

Somasra looked at him laconically. “You want to tell us what you’re cursing at or is it a private matter you wish to keep to yourself?”

Bejoo gestured with a jerk of his head at the rock face behind. “They’ve tracked them back, the bastards. They must have gotten a fix on their position by using their men as bait to draw their fire. Now they’re moving in for the kill.”

Somasra peered through the shadows of the thicket. His old eyes glimpsed a flicker of movement that could have been a ladybug leaping onto a leaf but his warrior’s instincts told him that it was no ladybug that caused that leaf to stir. “You’re right, Vajra Captain. They are moving forward again but stealthily, seeking to circle around the surround the rock face.”

Bejoo shook his head. “Even so, what good will it do them? The boys will only cut them down as they come, unless...”

Somasra waited for him to go on. When Bejoo stopped and looked up and then back again, thinking intently, Somasra finished for him: “...unless this advance is only meant to be a distraction. The real attack on the boys will come from another position. That what you meant to say, Vajra Captain?”

“Yes, yes,” Bejoo said impatiently, “and stop calling me Vajra Captain. I haven’t led a Vajra for decades.”

Somasra grinned, revealing teeth flecked with fragments of the betelnut he chewed incessantly. “This is a Vajra you lead right now, in a manner of speaking,” he said.

Bejoo looked around at the old tired men leaning against tree trunks and on the hilts of their own swords, white-bearded faces and balding heads gleaming with perspiration, and he grinned back at Somasra. “I suppose it is, in a manner of speaking.”

Somasra laughed softly and clapped Bejoo’s shoulder. “You’re a good man, Vajra Captain Bejoo. Would have liked to have fought with you in a real battle back in the day.”

Bejoo smiled, acknowledging the compliment. “What do you call this?”

Somasra looked at the valley scornfully. “This? I call this wiping our backsides with poison leaves, that’s all! Not a real battle, oh no, sir!”

Bejoo shook his head, laughing softly. “Well. If they’re advancing again, we won’t be wiping ourselves for long. Get ready, men. If they’re doing what I think they’re doing, they’ll be rushing us again and this time, they won’t stop or slow down. This is likely to be our last stand.”

The men got to their feet wearily, faces suggesting they would rather be in a tavern swigging large containers of soma or any cheaper alcoholic fluid they could afford to buy in great quantities. “At my age,” said one ancient fellow who looked as if he had already died twenty years earlier, “every time I stand is the last stand. It shall be a relief to finally lie down at last!”

They stood together and shuffled forward, swords at the ready, prepared to die fighting.

Luv and Kush watched with guarded expressions as the enemy advanced man by man, tree by tree, gauging the pattern. So attuned were they to each other’s minds they did not even need to glance at one another to share a thought.

“Ready,” one said.

“Ready,” replied the other.

They began loosing. This time the rhythm was completely different from before. No longer was it a non-stop barrage. They could only shoot when they visually acquired a target and so they were limited by the appearance of targets. In only a few moments and about two dozen arrows loosed, it became evident to both of them that this itself was being carefully controlled and monitored by someone. No. Not by someone. By the enemy. The manner in which the enemy soldiers appeared and ran from tree to tree, advancing down the valley in twos and threes rather than all at once, the pattern in which they ran forward, not two or three in the same place but at different spots across the valley, made it very clear that the enemy was trying to keep them shooting in all directions at once.

“They are testing us,” one of the boys said.

“Yes,” replied his brother tersely, loosing an arrow. He saw a tiny spurt of crimson against the dark green backdrop of the dark afternoon shadows and was already turning in search of the next target.

But after another half dozen arrows, a suspicion began to form in their minds.

And slowly, it grew until it became a realization.

Then that realization coalesced into conviction.

“They know our position,” said Kush, turning to his brother for the first time in over an hour.

Luv lowered his chin, brooding briefly. His dark eyes flashed. “Yes,” he said.

“They are keeping us busy without actually launching a full-scale attack,” Kush said.

Luv loosed another arrow, saw another man fall. “Yes,” he replied without looking up this time. “They are trying something...this forward movement is just a diversion.”

Kush agreed but could not think of the next logical conclusion: What were they trying? If this was the diversion, what was the main action?

The answer came a moment later in the form of an arrow whickering sharply past Kush’s left ear. He blinked, missing his first shot of the day so far—the ones that had struck hilts and armor didn’t count as misses—and his arrow went a whole foot wide of the mark. The soldier who had run from tree to tree glanced back at the arrow embedded in the ground with an expression of disbelief then fell to his knees, clasping both palms together in supplication.

The arrow that had narrowly missed Kush struck solid rock a few yards further, then clattered to the hard stony ground. Both brothers stared at it for a moment.

Then they turned as one, tracing back the arrow to its origin.

The hillside nearest to the rock face was less than a hundred yards away due to the narrowing of the valley at this end. Arrayed along that hilltop was an entire company of archers, bows drawn and arrows notched. It was an astonishing sight to see that many where there had been not a single man only moments earlier. They knew because they had been checking, expecting something like this sooner or later. The enemy had been smart enough to wait until the last possible moment, then move the entire company of archers forward the last few yards up the slope until they were visible from the rock face, and immediately give the order to string and pull. Now, the leader of the enemy appeared in view, atop his horse, light-skinned face grinning widely as he raised his sword, preparing to give the final signal to the archers.

“Maatr...” Luv and Kush both said as one, not even aware they were saying the words. “...Save us.”

Then the enemy captain slashed his sword forward at Luv and Kush and the first wave of arrows flew at them through the air, perfectly aimed at their unprotected and wholly exposed position atop the rock face.

EIGHT

Bharat and Shatrugan had tracked Aarohan’s company to the hills overlooking the valley, avoiding direct contact until they were able to discern what was happening. They had passed the dead victims of the snake exodus and blanched at the sight of the venom-blackened corpses, then cursed as they saw the survivors with their throats cut, understanding the situation as perfectly as if they had been there and seen and heard everything that transpired. They came up the slope to the top of the rise just before the King’s Guard archers unleashed their first volley. Veterans in warcraft, both brothers took in the scene in a flash: the archers ready to loose, the two boys on the rock overlooking the valley, the corpses strewn across the valley basin...and Aarohan with his sword held raised, ready to give the signal to loose. They reined in their lathered horses, staring intently across the valley.

“Sita’s sons!” Shatrugan said. “They are completely exposed on that rock.”

Bharat saw. But there was nothing he or Shatrugan could do. They were on the far side of the valley. To reach Aarohan they would have to ride around the valley and that would take time. The rock on which the boys stood was detached and reachable only by climbing directly up the rock face, as the boys themselves must have done. It was a brilliantly selected vantage point for archers to position themselves and accounted for some of the corpses that lay in the valley but he knew bowcraft well enough to also know that only the most exceptional archers could have leveraged that advantage to rack up such a high body count. It was no wonder that Aarohan was furious with them, furious enough to launch this counter-attack. But the reaction was more devastating than the action that had provoked it. That first volley itself would rain down on the boys like hail on an exposed snail. There was nowhere they could hide and nothing they could do to protect themselves. The instant that first volley was unleashed at them, they would be dead.

At that instant, Aarohan’s sword slashed forward, giving the signal to loose.

“No!” Bharat cried, his words lost in the wind that whipped around the hillside on which they stood.

The distance from the far hill side to the rock was not much more than a hundred yards. Close enough that the longbow archers of the King’s Guard did not even need to raise their bows. They aimed directly at the two targets on the rock, and their volley of arrows shot forward unerringly, all bunched close enough together that from this slightly angled viewpoint they resembled a single dark missile with a hundred individual barbs, racing to deliver death to the two sons of Sita.

The time needed for the volley to cover the distance to the boys was barely a heartbeat.

But before that heartbeat could elapse, something extraordinary happened.

From where he stood, Bejoo could glimpse the line of archers on the hill top, silhouetted against the late afternoon sun with their bows raised, arrowheads pointed directly above him. He could not actually see the top of the rock face behind his position, but he knew that was their target. His heart was in his mouth too as he assessed the situation and came to the same obvious conclusion: The boys would not survive the first volley. More frustrating to him as a kshatriya was the fact that they had no way to defend themselves. That was a terrible way to die, far worse than being bitten by a dozen venomous snakes.

But before the first volley could be loosed, the sounds of men advancing through the valley came to him and he swung around, bringing his attention back to his immediate surroundings.

“They’re advancing, all right,” Somasra said a few yards to his right. The surviving veterans of Bejoo’s group had formed a single ragged line across this side of the valley, forming a one-man wall of resistance. It was unlikely to impede the progress of the enemy by more than a few moments but as soldiers it was their duty to stick to their mission to the end. Not just our duty, he reminded himself, our dharma. For they were not merely fighting a desperate suicidal action to save a few brahmins and sadhins. They were fighting to uphold the values for which Ayodhya had once stood and which men like Pradhan Mantri Jabali and King’s Guard Captain Aarohan were trampling over like they did not matter anymore. This action itself was proof that those values mattered. To pit a whole company of archers against two boys, no matter how brilliant they might be at bowcraft...was it really necessary? He could not recall hearing Captain Aarohan calling out a demand for surrender. Clearly, the man intended to inflict his own summary judgement on the two striplings for having cost him so dearly. Never mind the fact that the boys had only been defending their loved ones and unarmed friends and doing what they had to in order to survive. Never mind the fact that kshatriya code required the Captain to at least ask them to lay down arms before taking action against them. Never mind anything anymore: this was the new way and the new age of Ayodhya. Either you are with us or against us. No middle path. No compromise. No mercy.

And no dharma.

Then, the Captain's sword caught the sunlight as it slashed forward and Bejoo glimpsed the volley of arrows, thick as an elephant with a hundred barbed points, flying through the air to deliver the Captain's verdict of summary execution.

At the same instant, the soldiers waiting in the valley launched their attack with an explosion of noise and furore. It was obvious that the two actions were coordinated to be unleashed with the same signal: the release of the volley and the advance of the army.

They will cut down the sons of Sita up there as they ram through us down here, Bejoo thought grimly as he raised his sword to meet the rushing line of invaders. They seemed to come at him as thickly as the volley of arrows, holding nothing back this time. This would not be a fight anymore, it would be a juggernaut rolling over a minor obstacle. His mind flashed back to a moment similar to this one in so many ways: the siege of Mithila, when he had led a ragged but proud force of defenders against the overwhelming ocean of onrushing asura hordes despatched by Ravana, Lord of Lanka. He still recalled that day with crystal clarity. The asura wave had come at him like a gigantic tsunami wave. He had remembered thinking at that instant that he would not last a moment, that this stand was pointless, that they may as well have stayed in the city and awaited the invaders there. But he knew then as he knew now that of course it mattered, it mattered not whether they won or lost, but simply that they stood, proud men and warriors, shoulder to shoulder, facing certain death with raised chins and clear unblinking gazes, swords ready to inflict whatever damage possible, no matter how miniscule, upon that overwhelming enemy horde.

Just as it mattered now.

Even though they were rebels fighting against the very colors they had once defended with their lives, they were still fighting for the same cause. That cause was dharma, which Ayodhya had once stood for. And in their hearts, would always stand for. If anything, it was they who represented Ayodhya here, not that shiny-tunic band of ruffians with no more sense of dharma than the snakes that had thinned their ranks. The real Ayodhya was a place of the heart and mind and soul, not merely a city or kingdom-state. The real Ayodhya was the capital of the kingdom of dharma and it was that Ayodhya they had fought for all their lives, and for which they would die now.

He raised his sword and cried with all the force he could muster from his age-hoarsened throat: “AYODHYA ANASHYA!”

Luv and Kush saw the Captain of the King’s Guard slash his sword forward, giving the signal to release. And the first volley of arrows was loosed. Never before in their short lives had either boy seen such a sight. They had been in a fair number of scrapes, exchanged arrows with hostile archers on more than one occasion. But that had been forest fighting with uneven but still manageable odds. This was different. There were at least a hundred archers loosing at them at the same time, and they were only two, and there was no place to hide, nothing to shelter behind or under. There was nothing to do but watch as the barrage sped toward them, the very air seeming to grow still and the hail of death seeming to take eons rather than the single heartbeat required to cover the mere hundred yards to where they stood, waiting.

|arvacī subhaghe bhava site vandamahe tva|
||yatha nah subhaghasasi yatha nah suphalasasi||

The shloka spun in his mind unbidden. It rose from his lips like hot breath exhaled. It filled the air around himself and his brother like a cloud of expanding smoke.

|arvacī subhaghe bhava site vandamahe tva|
||yatha nah subhaghasasi yatha nah suphalasasi||

The arrows still continued to advance towards them. But surely far more than a heartbeat had passed since their loosing? Surely they ought to have reached their targets by now and Kush and he ought to be riddled with arrows, bleeding from dozens of fatal wounds, slender young bodies pierced beyond repair or rejuvenation? Surely we ought to be dead, Luv thought, mildly astonished.

|arvaci subhaghe bhava site vandamahe tva|
||yatha nah subhaghasasi yatha nah suphalasasi||

Now he saw and heard the same shlokas issuing from his brother's lips and mind, taking the shape of midnight blue smoke as it spewed forth. The dark smoke expanded outwards like a great cloud, covering the whole of the top of the rock now, then this end of the valley, then the entire valley... still continuing to spread. With each repetition, it grew farther until he knew that the whole world, not merely the mortal realm but all Creation itself was consumed by the cloud of brahman, for that was what it was, pure brahman shakti, the stuff of which all matter was made, as it had been in the Beginning when the Great Egg burst to release the cosmic brahman energy that made the universe. And despite the smoke he could see clearly, could view Luv standing beside him as clear as daylight, even though the sun was lost in a miasma of blue brahman energy, could see the archers across the gap, bow strings still rippling from the force of the loosing, see the arrows in mid air, traveling as sluggishly as snails across a glacier see every mote of light, every blade of grass, every insect, animal, hair and hide, being and unbeing that existed, had ever existed and would ever exist for all eternity.

|arvaci subhaghe bhava site vandamahe tva|
||yatha nah subhaghasasi yatha nah suphalasasi||

And Luv could feel every emotion ever felt by every sentient creature, know everything that had ever been known, hear every sound, see every color...it was magnificent, it was beyond description, it was the heart of all existence itself. What else is God then but a collective of us all, living and unliving, being and unbeing, together in love and harmony forever? And that which you feel I feel and your pain is mine and mine is your's and all we do affects us all, for God is love and we are love embodied and to hurt myself is to hurt you as well for there is no place where I end and you do not begin.

|arvaci subhaghe bhava site vandamahe tva|

||yatha nah subhaghasasi yatha nah suphalasasi||

And Kush saw his father upon a great throne made of sunwood, the back of the seat shaped to resembled an effulgent sun spreading carved rays outward in every direction, and his father's face was as foreboding as the sun itself at noonday, merciless and relentless in its heat of tapas, dark as the night yet lustrous as the moon, and in that face was a terrible fury, a rage as devastating as the anger that ended the cosmos at the end of each day of Brahma, as unendurable as the rage of the Three-Eyed One himself. And in that terrible rage Luv's father said a single word more unbearable than speeches, more heart-rending than volumes. The word was: "Exile." And it reverberated through the length of time like the beat of a dhol drum in a dark empty chamber. And Kush felt the word pierce his heart like a hundred arrows at once, like a hundred thousand arrows, like a hundred thousand times a hundred thousand arrows. And Luv felt a tear leave his right eye as Kush felt a tear leave his left eye and both tears combined to form a single tear large enough to drown all Creation and the sins of all beings past, present and future were washed clean by the innocence of that single tear.

*|arvaci subhaghe bhava site vandamahe
tva|*

*||yatha nah subhaghasasi yatha nah
suphalasasi||*

And the being that was Luv-Kush felt a stirring in his heart and an answer to that single word spoken by his father, that word that had reduced his mother from a princess to a vagabond, from a devoted and loyal wife to a widow-in-all-but-name, from a proud and magnificent Queen Mother to a penniless sadhini in a remote forest ashram. And that answer was not rage, not fury, not frustration or a desire to respond to harm with more harm, but simply...denial. A refusal of anger, more terrible than anger itself. A denial of rage, more powerful than rage. A deflection of violence, against which there can be no defense and which renders violence itself meaningless. For what good is a blow if it never strikes its intended victim? Or an arrow that never reaches its target?

And then suspended time flicked back into existence and the world resumed its journey on the path to ultimate destruction.

NINE

Aarohan's face lost its grin as he watched the impossible happen.

The first volley of arrows was loosed at his signal. He slashed the sword forward, bringing it down on the heads of the boys a hundred yards away, wishing he was close enough to smash open their skulls with the same blow, and watched the volley fly to its targets.

And then the volley slowed in mid air.

And time stood still.

And a strange darkness descended on the world.

And the heartbeat of an instant which it should have taken the volley to reach and kill the boys stretched out into an eon.

He did not know how long time stood still—for how can you measure the passage of time when time itself is absent?—but all at once it resumed.

The only sign that it had happened at all was a crack in the substance of reality, in the fabric of memory, a gap in consciousness, like a day one knows one lived through but can summon up no memory of at all.

And then the volley changed course.

Almost at its target, it passed over the rock face, missing the two boys by a yard, then turned sharp right and descended into the valley, retaining the same velocity and intensity of momentum.

Aarohan lost his grin as he gaped.

The volley of arrows flew down like a flock of birds descending with ominous intent, like a murder of crows hellbent on violence—and parted into a hundred individual arrows, each seeking a different target.

The arrows flew at the advancing King's Guard forces charging down the valley at the ragged line of veterans.

He saw and heard the impossible sounds of the arrows finding their mark, each striking a target with a mortal wound, each punching into breastplate and through bone and sinew and muscle and flesh and blood with as much impact as if it had just been shot straight from ten yards away, not travelled two hundred yards diverting this way and that like a sinuous snake.

They may have travelled like arrows from a mythic tale but they struck home like normal everyday arrows, each taking a life with brutal efficiency.

A hundred of his own men died in the valley, downed by his own arrows.

Upon the rock face, the two boys stood, bows in hand, untouched, unharmed, uninjured.

Aarohan turned to look at his aides, sitting forward on their own horses, faces drained of blood, gaping and staring with faces as shocked as his own felt. He looked the other way, at the long line of archers, standing and pointing down at the valley, trying to make sense of what had just happened—and how it had happened.

He was filled with a sudden rage.

“Archers!” he cried out. “Ready again!”

He looked left to make sure they had heard his command.

They had. But they were confused and shaken. Most did not even raise their bows, let alone take arrows in hand.

“ARCHERS!” he roared, pointing his sword at them threateningly. “OBEY OR DIE!”

That got their attention. They knew that Aarohan did not threaten punishment idly. If he threatened death, he would in fact kill those who did not obey at once. The threat of death was enough to overcome their bewilderment.

A hundred bows were raised again, arrows ready to loose.

“AIM!” he shouted.

They took aim. This time those who had taken the shot for granted earlier took greater care to make sure their missiles were perfectly targeted, in the event, however unlikely, that the cause had been merely a strong gust of wind or...or something inexplicable.

“LOOSE!” Aarohan yelled, dropping his sword forward.

Again the volley flew out across the gap between this hill top and the rock on which the boys stood.

This time there was no break in time and consciousness. Nothing discernible happened.

But again, the arrows turned as one—and swooped down into the valley.

Again they parted ways to seek out their own individual targets. And struck home with unerring efficiency.

Again, a hundred of Aarohan’s company died with blasted throats and ruptured hearts and lungs and spleens, thrashing and bleeding on the jungle floor.

Aarohan could not accept it. This was not possible. There was some mischief afoot. He would not condone such treachery—not from mere mindless wooden arrows!

Again he gave the command to aim and loose. Again, another volley was released. Again the arrows diverted. Again, a hundred men died.

And yet again.

And yet again.

And yet again.

Bharat and Shatrugan watched in smiling disbelief as the impossible happened again and yet again. After the first few times, they shook their heads in commiseration for the men in the valley below. “Those poor fools,” Shatrugan said. “They are dying because of the arrogance of that idiot Aarohan.”

Bharat turned the head of his horse. “I think it’s time to teach that idiot a lesson.”

Shatrugan grinned. Both brothers rode away, taking the route that would lead them around to where the Captain of the King’s Guard stood, slashing his sword forward and yelling “LOOSE!” over and over again.

In the royal camp, Rama emerged from his tent, a strange expression on his face. He looked like a man who had woken from a long deep sleep and strange dreams.

Strange dreams indeed.

Lakshman was waiting for him outside.

Lakshman saw that Rama’s eyes glowed with deep blue illumination from within, the way they had once glowed in the darkness of Bhayanak-van.

Rama looked at him and saw a fainter illumination of the same ilk in Lakshman’s eyes as well.

“Bhraatr,” Rama said, holding out his hand to his brother.

“Ride with me.”

Lakshman took his brother’s hand without hesitation.

They strode towards Rama’s chariot together.

Bejoo whooped and cheered as the corpses piled up. Beside him to either side, the ragged line of veterans cheered as well as another volley of arrows swung by overhead, zinging through the trees, even zipping around tree trunks and over obstacles to reach their intended targets.

One shot by Bejoo's right arm, pursuing a soldier of the King's Guard who ran screaming for mercy. The arrow caught up with him and punched through his armor backplate with enough force to send the man flying several yards to crash into a tree.

Bejoo laughed, unable to believe that he had survived yet another stand where merely walking away had seemed impossible. The arrows had not touched him or his men—it was almost as if they knew which men to avoid and which to strike.

The valley was littered with corpses now. He had estimated that each volley consisted of around one hundred arrows. Thanks to Aarohan's arrogant insistence on loosing volley after volley, he guessed that almost a thousand men must have died by now. The entire King's Guard was wiped out, all except the archers on the hill top and the elite One Hundred that sat on their horses beside their Captain, staring down in disbelief at the mayhem caused by their own company's arrows.

Somasra was chuckling beside him too, sitting on a tree trunk and swigging from a leather skin. From the odor that wafted to Bejoo, it was definitely not water though the old gatewatch guard was drinking as if it was. Bejoo held out a hand. "A taste for a comrade?" he asked.

Somasra grinned and handed the skin to Bejoo. "Go ahead. Finish it." He pulled out another small skinbag from somewhere in his garment. "I have another. It's Chandra Pujari's best."

Bejoo paused in the act of raising the skin to his lips and laughed. Somasra watched him, his own grin widening. "Ah," he said. "A fellow worshipper at Chandra Pujari's temple?"

"Ever since I was weaned off mother's milk," Bejoo said, then drank long and deep from the bag. Soma had never tasted this good in his entire life.

Luv and Kush watched as the Captain of the King's Guard lowered his sword at last. Even from a hundred yards away, it was evident that the man was burning with frustration and anger. He pointed his gloved hand at the rock and issued a string of curses and threats.

“Methinks the good Captain is a little upset,” Luv said.

“Methinks you may be right,” Kush replied.

“Let us give him something to really be upset about, shall we?” Luv said, raising his bow.

Kush was already raising his own bow. “Yes, bhraatr, let’s.”

They loosed together.

Both arrows rose up into the sky, then converged, joining together into a single arrow. The single arrow curved downwards then raced ahead with renewed speed, flashing like lightning towards the archers on the hill top. The archers saw the arrow and some started to turn away to run. They had barely turned when the arrow struck. The arrow turned at the last instant, punching into the chest of the man to the far right. It passed through his breast on the right, entering just beneath his armpit, and emerged from the other side, out his other armpit. It passed through bone and flesh and muscle as if passing through air. It emerged from the breast of the first archer—then struck the second. It emerged from his breast too, moving with as great force as before, and struck the third. It continued down the line, taking the lives of every last archer in that row. Finally, barely a moment after it had been loosed, it emerged from the armpit of the hundredth archer, the man nearest to where Captain Aarohan sat astride his horse.

The horse reared and neighed in fright, sensing a supernatural force at work.

The arrow hovered in mid air, rose and floated before Captain Aarohan. His aides reacted more violently than he did, turning their horses and riding away. The Captain himself sat frozen, staring at the arrow hovering in mid air before him. He clutched his sword tightly, his knuckles turning white as he gripped it harder but he made no move to raise it or strike out. He tilted his head an inch to the left and the arrow adjusted its angle just enough to account for the tilt. He tilted it the other way, experimentally, and the arrow turned that way an inch as well. Realization grew upon him that no matter what he did or where he moved, the arrow would follow. Slowly, as the moments stretched out, his rage melted into fear and then into stark terror as he stared at the blind unseeing pointed tip of the arrow.

Suddenly, the arrow darted at him directly. He cried out and slashed out in panic with the sword. He missed the arrow—and the arrow missed him too. It nicked his ear, drawing blood in a small splatter on his left shoulder, then zipped on past him. It took him a moment to realize that he was not mortally struck. When he did, he turned to follow its course and saw that it was chasing after his aides who were riding away furiously. The arrow punched into the back of the nearest one and emerged from the man's chest. The man fell off his horse, spewing gore. The arrow continued onwards, reaping another bloody harvest. By the time it was done, every last man under Captain Aarohan's command lay sprawled dead on the hilltop. Their horses milled about in confusion, then began to ride away, glad to be free at last of their ill-tempered masters. Several corpses stuck in the stirrups were dragged along for miles, their heads bouncing along merrily.

Captain Aarohan saw his chance when the arrow was killing his men and turned to ride away. He broke into a gallop with expert ease, racing alongside the hilltop with the desperation of a man pursued by demons.

He glanced back from time to time to see if the arrow was following. He saw it finish off the last of his elite One Hundred and turn around, seeking him out. He rode faster, yelping like a dog in pain, as the arrow spun after him, making a buzzing sound like a bee at work on a honeycomb.

He had not gone far before two riders appeared before him, riding as hard towards him as he was riding in their direction. "Help me!" he cried. "Mercy!"

Bharat and Shatrugan stared as they approached the King's Guard Captain riding desperately towards them. They saw the sprawled corpses of his archers and men lying on the hillside behind him. Then they saw the arrow chasing the man.

Captain Aarohan saw their faces, recognizing them from a distance.

He stopped crying for help.

He looked back and saw the arrow come flying at him like a flying demon from the lowest level of Naraka.

Crying out in pitiful terror, he turned the head of his horse...

And rode off the hill top, straight into thin air.

Moments later, his neighing horse and he crashed to the floor of the valley, landing in the rocky wadis behind the rock on which Luv and Kush still stood, watching.

Bharat and Shatrugan slowed and looked down at the dead horse and man below. Captain Aarohan had landed with his horse on top of him. His body was broken in a hundred places. He lay sprawled like a drunk, eyes staring sightlessly up at the sky.

Bharat shook his head. "It seems he has learned his lesson after all."

"And a bitter one it was," Shatrugan said.

They turned their horses and rode back the way they had come.

Luv and Kush ran to their mother, embracing her fiercely. Sita gasped, her wounds still fresh, but smiled through her pain as she embraced her sons, tears spilling from her dark-underscored eyes.

"My sons," she said. "What have you done?"

They looked up at her. "What we had to, Maatr. They left us no choice."

Behind them, Bejoo and Somasra both nodded, supporting the boys. Nakhudi and the other survivors of the ashram massacre as well as the bear-killers who had been protecting them, heard details of the battle from various members of Bejoo's group and marveled.

Maharishi Valmiki rose to his feet wearily, leaning on his staff. The great guru had aged another decade that day itself. "Time to return home," he said.

TEN

The thunder of hooves and chariot wheels overcame the crackling of the chandan wood as the cremation pyres consumed the dead. The royal chariot was preceded by PFs in their familiar purple and black uniforms, the original and true king's guard. The ashramites who were clustered around the cremation pyres with Maharishi Valmiki at their head looked up with hostility as Rama and Lakshman dismounted.

Sita was standing with her sons before her. At the sound of the approaching hooves, they had immediately wanted to take up their bows but she had stopped them, indicating the pyres. It would be disrespectful to leave the ritual half-done. They subsided but still kept their eyes on the pathway down which the intruders arrived. The instant they saw the soldiers with spears and swords, their backs tightened and it was only their mother's hands, firmly squeezing each boy's shoulder, that kept them from racing for their bows and rigs.

Rama's eyes met Sita's as he approached. He was raising his palms in a gesture of supplication at that instant and it appeared as if he were greeting her first and foremost, the pain in his eyes speaking volumes. Sita tried to glare daggers at him but for some reason, the very sight of him melted her heart. How tired he looks, how much he has aged, he looks ten years older than his age, why has he become so thin, so drawn...Does he not get enough sleep? Instead of anger and hostility, these were the thoughts that came to her mind in that crucial moment. The heart's capacity to love always exceeds its capacity to hate. Anger fades in time, genuine affection stays bright forever.

He held her gaze a moment, then moved on to Maharishi Valmiki. He bowed to the Maharishi, offering the appropriate greetings and gestures.

"Forgive my intrusion, mahadev," he said. "I do not mean to disturb you at your time of grief but my business here is urgent."

Maharishi Valmiki finished the last part of the cremation ritual without comment. When all was done and the pyres had almost completely consumed the bodies, he turned his tired face to Rama. There was no space left for anger or recrimination in his heart. When he spoke, it was with sadness and regret, not out of a desire to apportion blame. “You know that this was the work of men deputed by you, under your own authority?”

Rama bowed his head in shame. “I regret that these lives were lost. I am told the men responsible have been killed as they deserve to have been killed.” His eyes searched for and found the two boys standing before Sita like proud cubs defending their mother lioness. “I have heard the entire tale of the battle of the arrows and seen the results with my own eyes.” He turned and indicated Bharat and Shatrugan who stepped forward to greet the Maharishi as well. Valmiki acknowledged them all.

“And now what business brings you here?” asked the guru. “How have your feet found the way to my ashram after these many years?”

Rama looked at the face of his old face and fellow exile, the man he had once known as Ratnakaran and whom he had once fought against when he was known as Bearkiller. Valmiki’s mangled face, ruined by the claws of a bear in youth, was mostly covered by his flowing white beard now, and the intense hatred in his eyes had been replaced by an enduring sadness and deep philosophical acceptance of the way of the world, but beneath all that great store of learning and acquired wisdom there was still the core of the man whom Rama had once stood shoulder to shoulder with in a jungle called Janasthana, battling against impossible foes and unbeatable odds—and winning.

“I feel as if I have been asleep these many years and have only awoken today. As if the cobwebs of a decade have been washed away and my eyesight cleared suddenly.”

Valmiki considered this a moment. “And how did this sudden change come about?”

“A great resonance sounded in the world this day, shaking me out of my slumber,” Rama said. “It was someone using dev-astras in the service of dharma.” He turned and looked directly at Luv and Kush. “The shakti of brahman cascading through creation cleansed my soul of all confusion and doubt. I was as a man refreshed by a cold wave that falls upon him unexpectedly. I remembered things I had not even thought about for years.

I saw the mistakes I had made and desired to correct them. I saw the error of my ways and sought to redress those errors. But most of all, I saw the unjustness I had meted out to a loved one and knew I must act quickly and do what was right.”

“And what exactly does doing right mean?” Valmiki asked.

Rama’s eyes found Sita, standing proud yet tragic in the stillness of the evening. In the trees above, birds cried out and called as the day approached an end.

“I intend to beg my wife’s forgiveness and take her and our sons home, if she will agree to come,” he said.

Sita’s knees buckled. Both her sons looked up in alarm as they felt her weight shift, and they caught her arms tightly, holding her up. She regained control of herself and nodded to them. Still, they remained alert in case she should lurch again.

Maharishi Valmiki looked at Sita. “What say you, Lady Vedavati? Do you think Lord Rama Chandra deserves forgiveness?”

She looked at the guru, avoiding Rama’s gaze for the moment. “I cannot say if he does or does not deserve it. I will not judge him. I cannot judge him. I can only speak for myself.”

“Then will you or will you not forgive him?” the maharishi asked gently.

Sita was silent a long moment. Everyone gathered around waited as well. Luv and Kush looked up at her face, holding her hands tightly.

“I will,” she said at last.

A great cheering rose from the ranks of the Ayodhyan army. Word had spread through the army of all that had transpired that day and everyone knew that Rama had found his long-exiled wife and sons. To the masses, it meant that Ayodhya had found her queen. After the threat of war hanging over their heads and the likelihood of war against their neighboring kingdom of Videha no less, it was a treat to see their liege’s martial obsession diverted into a more gentle preoccupation. Kings who loved were easier to love than kings who warred.

The expression on Rama's face as well as Sita's showed nothing but love.

A white-cloaked figure strode forward with a stern face. Pradhan Mantri Jabali gestured at his king. "Samrat Rama Chandra, you cannot simply take her back."

Rama shot Jabali a cursory glance. "I can do as I please. She is still my wife."

"She is an exile. And she was exiled for good reason. Her secret kinship to Ravana, lord of Lanka, and the fact that it was kept hidden from us for so long, endangering not just our kingdom but all mortalkind, is partly the reason. But there is also the matter of her purity."

"Purity?" spat Nakhudi, stepping forward angrily. "You speak of purity? How pure are you? How pure is any man? Why do men only speak of purity when it comes to their women!"

Jabali gestured dismissively at Nakhudi, ignoring her outburst. "As a husband, you may do as you please. But as king of Ayodhya, you must also uphold dharma. And dharma demands that any woman you choose to instate as Queen of Kosala should prove herself worthy of that position and respect. You cannot expect your people to respect you if they do not respect your wife."

"Why should they not respect her?" Rama asked, forehead creased but his tone not angry, not yet.

"For the same reason that any husband hesitates to respect his wife if she stays for even one night under another man's roof." Jabali pointed accusingly at Sita. Luv and Kush glared angrily back at him. "Your wife was abducted by Ravana and stayed for months under his control."

"Yes," Rama admitted, "but we learned later that he was her father by birth."

"That is irrelevant to the question of purity. Who knew what transpired with her during the time she was incarcerated in Lanka? A den of demons, lair of rakshasas and all manner of vile asuras."

Rama's face hardened. "She underwent the agni-pariksha as was required by our customs. She passed the test of fire successfully."

Jabali shook his head. "The error you made, if I may call it that, was in holding the agni-pariksha without any witnesses present."

"There were witnesses by the millions," Lakshman countered, stepping forward. He gestured at Hanuman, standing to one side quietly, watching the debate with his arms folded over his greying chest. "Our friend Hanuman was there. As were the entire vanar nations and rksaa nations."

Jabali's face twitched in a half-smile. "I meant civilized witnesses. Aryas. The noble folk. Not monkeys and bears!"

Hanuman bristled at the tone of derision but made no comment or move. After a decade spent with mortals he had probably become inured to their racist epithets although it was evident that he did not appreciate them.

"Then take my word for it," Rama said. "And my brother's. We were there. We witnessed her succeed in the agni-pariksha."

"And what of the past ten years?" Jabali asked slyly. "Once again she has been away from your house, who knows where or with whom?"

Rama had no answer to that. Even Lakshman was silent. Bharat and Shatrugan looked on angrily but said nothing because they could not offer anything worthwhile in such a matter. It was Maharishi Valmiki who spoke up then.

"I will vouch personally for the reputation of Lady Vedavati whom you know as Queen Sita," Valmiki said. "Her honor is spotless."

Jabali laughed harshly. "We cannot take your word for it, Maharishi. The people must be appeased. And the people are not easily appeased. They have been betrayed too often. The conniving late Queen Kaikeyi, the scheming asura-worshipping Daiimaa Manthara, the intrusions into Ayodhya, the near-invasion by Ravana's son Atikiya. Jabali spread his arms, affecting a guileless expression. "It is not I who questions the authenticity, Samrat Rama. It is the people. They would need to see it with their own eyes in order to be certain."

“See it?” Lakshman asked angrily. “Do you mean we should hold another agni-pariksha just to appease the people’s doubts?”

Jabali shrugged. “If she is truly innocent of wrongdoing and pure as you claim, there is nothing to fear. Besides, it is not I who demands this test, it is dharma.”

“Dharma!” shouted Nakhudi scornfully. “You change your interpretation of dharma to suit your own interests!”

Jabali wagged a finger of warning at the oversized woman warrior. “Mind your tongue, woman. Otherwise you may well be compelled to undergo an agni-pariksha as well.”

“Enough!” Rama said angrily. “If this is the only way, then it must be done.”

He looked at Sita. “I know you are spotless and beyond reproach but what Pradhan Mantri Jabali says is true, a king serves his people and the people will talk. We set very high standards of morality in Ayodhya and in order to enforce those standards I must prove that my family and I abide by them as well. Nobody must have the right to raise a finger and say a single word about you or anyone else in our house once you return home. Therefore I ask you to do this, not for my sake or even for your own sake, but for the sake of the people we serve. For the sake of dharma. Do this one last thing and we shall be together again, forever.”

Sita looked at him sadly. “I thought you might have changed after all. I thought you genuinely meant it when you begged my forgiveness, that you sincerely wished to undo your mistakes and do the right thing at last. I kept my love preserved like an acorn in a bushel for ten long years, in the hope that someday perhaps we might be reunited, that someday you would see the light of reason. But today I realize that it is not possible. You never truly desired forgiveness. You were never sincere in your proffer. You did not ask with genuine intention. All you desired was a queen, not a wife. A figurehead to place on the throne beside you, like the stone statue of me your army carries before it. A pure, perfect idol of a woman. Not a woman herself.”

“Sitey,” Rama said, “you misunderstand me entirely. I came here to ask you to come back. But I live in the service of my station. A king serves the people. Yatha raja tatha praja.”

“‘As does the king, so do the people,’” Sita translated. “So do it. Show the people that you believe in my fealty. That you do not need a fire sacrifice to prove my...purity! Do this and prove to them that to doubt an honest woman is itself a stain on her reputation. To point a finger is itself a sully of honor. To gossip and speak about someone without their being found guilty of any wrongdoing is itself a crime. Deny this unfair demand and prove to your people that dharma comes from conviction not compromise. Dharma breaks but does not bend. Dharma is the same for men as well as women. Do this and show the praja that you are truly a raja of dharma. Not merely a servant but a king of dharma. Do this, Rama. Do this for the sake of all mortalkind for you are as close to a god as it is possible for a man to be. Do this one thing and you shall be pure yourself, unsullied, and undoubted by history for all time to come. The eyes of countless generations watch you now. You are the one being judged, not I. Do this and prove to all humanity forever that Rama, King of Dharma, can pass this final agni-pariksha. The test of trust. Prove that you believe without question in my so-called purity and need no superstitious ritual to confirm it for the naysayers and doubters of the world.”

Rama was silent a long moment. Even the birds in the forest seemed to have fallen silent as if listening and waiting now for Rama’s response. The entire army, arrayed out for yojanas behind Rama’s royal chariot, waited silently as well, word of mouth having passed on the urgency and import of what was being discussed here. The world itself waited.

Finally, with head bowed, Rama sobbed a single sob and said two simple words, “I cannot.”

Sita was silent for a long moment, even longer than the time Rama had taken to respond. Finally, she raised her head, lifting her hands from the shoulders of her two sons who looked anxiously up at her. And she said in a voice that cracked like thunder: “Then be a broken god forever!”

ELEVEN

The earth heaved and cracked beneath Sita's feet. Luv and Kush cried out and stumbled, reaching out for their mother, not asking for her help but in order to help her. To their surprise, Maatr pushed them away with a firm but not unkind gesture. They staggered back even as the entire section of ground on which Sita stood broke free of the surrounding earth and rose up high into the earth, as if shoved by an invisible fist from below. Everybody around her fell back, staggering and stumbling away from the rising fist of ground. Debris and stones fell, and packed dirt crumbled and spilled over as the ground split. Everybody moved back, away from the heaving earth. A great gaping hole opened in the ground, cracking in a rough circle over three yards wide that forced everybody to move back. Then the cremation pyres heaved and lurched, and fell into the gaping hole! At once, fire leaped up, huge gouts of flame blazing up, as if the smoldering pyres had ignited some underground fuel. The fire roared over a dozen yards high, rising steadily.

Luv and Kush went berserk with panic. "Maatr!" they cried out together, scrambling to their feet. They ran forward, halting at the crumbling edge of the rough circle that had appeared and which separated them from the fist of risen earth upon which Sita still stood. Flames roared upward from the circular gash in the earth and dirt and pebbles crumbled and fell away from beneath their scrambling feet. Nakhudi saw the danger and leaped forward, grasping hold of one of them with each meaty arm. She held them tight, pulling them back. Great archers they were and gifted with the power of brahman, but when it came to simple muscular strength, they were no match for Nakhudi's wrestler bulk.

Still, they struggled mightily. "MAATR!" they cried, young boyish voices almost girlish in their panic.

Sita turned and raised a hand, palm outwards, to comfort them. "Do not fear for me, my sons," she said affectionately, "I am safe in my mother's arms."

As the other ashramites moved back out of the way, guided by Dumma and the other rishis, Rama and his brothers came forward to try to help. Bejoo and Somasra came forward as well. But the distance was too far to leap, the flames too ferocious and each time anyone came close to the edge, the flames seemed to leap higher, almost as if forbidding anyone from trying to save Sita.

“Stay back, my friends,” she said, her voice clearly audible to all in the ashram clearing. Word of what was transpiring was constantly being passed on from soldier to soldier through the long lines of Ayodhya’s army. Those who were within viewing were gawking with amazement, unable to comprehend what was happening. “Prithvi-maa, the earth herself is my birth mother. It was she who was seeded by Ravana resulting in my birth. That is why Maharaja Janak of Mithila found me while ploughing his field. I was literally born of the earth in a furrow. And now, to that same earth I shall return.”

“MAATR!” cried her sons. Nakhudi’s powerful arms strained to hold them back as they fought and kicked and struggled to break free. Had she let go, there was no doubt they would have tried to leap across the cleft to rescue their Maatr—and would surely have died trying.

“Sitey,” said Rama from beside them. “Sitey, forgive me! I know I have transgressed against you. I came here today to try to make amends.”

“And you failed, Rama,” she said sorrowfully. “You failed utterly. That is why you will always be a broken god. Revered and worshipped, honored and admired, but also doubted and despised. Each time someone speaks of your great works and exploits, another will remind them of your banishment of your wife and ask what god would do such a thing and question your divinity? Today you had a chance to answer them once and for all, to silence those doubters, and you failed yet again. Now, for as long as your memory shall live, you shall be adored as a deva yet doubted as a man.”

“I am a man,” he said, dropping to his knees before the fiery pit. “Just a man. Know me as a man. Understand me as a man. Not as a god.”

She shook her head sadly. “That is the eternal dilemma of heroes and those who worship them. How can greatness have flaws? How can perfection contain a blemish? How can a deva do wrong? And eternally, in answer to those questions, people shall answer a single name: Rama. They shall offer you prayers, yes. But they shall do so knowing that they are prayers offered to a broken god.”

“Come to me, Janaki,” he said, tears rolling from his eyes. “Join with me again. Make me whole.”

“Don’t you want your agni-pariksha?” she asked bitterly. And the flames roared up, engulfing her.

“Maatr,” her sons cried.

“Cry not for me, my sons,” her voice said from within the flames. “These fires shall not burn me, nor the earth suffocate. The heat of the sun will not blacken my skin, nor the cold of winter freeze my blood. My bones will not turn to dust with the passing of time nor will my hair shrivel and come undone. I shall return to the earth and shall be eternally present in her every aspect. Think of me every time you see a flower bloom, a tree offer you shade, or the ground provide you with sustenance. I go home to my mother’s bosom. For that is our sanskriti. When a woman is not accepted at her husband’s home, she must go back to her mother’s house. And this is home to me. From whence I came, thither I return. Before I go, witness my agni-pariksha, tell all in Ayodhya of me, for even in parting, I remain Rama’s wife, and lest a single finger be raised in accusation or a single gossiping tongue speak with doubt, let all see and bear testimony that the sacred agni did not singe a hair on my head or harm me. Pure, did you say, Pradhan Mantri Jabali? Is this pure enough for you? Or do you need to ladle ghee upon my body to satisfy yourself further? Perhaps what men like you truly desire is to cremate women alive rather than accept that they are flesh and blood and human as you are. If Rama is a broken god it is because of this one flaw: he could not accept his own wife without questioning her purity!”

And the flames shot up impossibly high, reaching for the sky, until the pillar of flame was visible all across the land, across the length and breadth of the kingdom, and every man, woman and children paused and stared skywards, and saw upon the top of the pillar of flame, the figure of their long banished but beloved queen Sita Janaki of Mithila, standing on that searing flame, yet untouched and unharmed. And every heart went out to her and every voice spoke in veneration. “Devi-Maa,” they said, the highest exaltation possible. Mother Goddess. And if she had not been until then, she became in that moment, Mother Goddess Sita. Then and now and forever.

The pillar fell. It descended as suddenly as it had risen, and plunged deep into the earth. As Sita returned to ground level, the pillar paused, as if her mother Earth permitted her daughter one final goodbye. And she reached out to her weeping sons and blessed them. “Ayushmaanbhavya, sons, rule as one, live as one, and follow this one law at all times: One dharma for all.”

And then she descended into the earth and was swallowed whole. The flames were sucked in and vanished. The cracked earth heaved again and moved together, with a grinding sound that resembled a great stone silbutta being churned. The broken pieces fit together as perfectly as a china pot fitted back together. And a moment later, the ground was as it had been before, without a single crack or wisp of flame or trace of anything that had happened.

Only the absence of the cremation pyres served as reminder that indeed, Sita had been here only moments earlier. And was gone now.

SAMAPTAM

The doe leaped out of Rama's arms. He had enfolded her in a gentle embrace, careful not to grip her too hard, and when he sensed her muscles tensing for the leap, he made no attempt to stop her. She jumped upwards and away, bounding across the grassy knoll in the direction of the river. Reaching the rim of the knoll, she paused and turned her head. Her ears flicked as she looked back with wide alarmed eyes. He smiled and rose to his feet, speaking softly, his voice barely audible below the sound of the river.

'Did I scare you? That was not my intention, little beauty. I was only eager to be your friend. Will you not come back and speak to me again?'

The doe watched him from the edge of the precipice, her body still turned towards the path that led down to the river, only her head twisted back towards him. She made no move to return, yet she did not flee immediately.

Rama took a step towards her, then another. She did not run. He took several steps more, but when he was within twenty paces or so, her flank rippled and her ears flickered at a faster rate.

So he stopped again. He called to her. She stayed where she was, watching him. For a long moment, they stayed that way, the man and the doe, watching each other, the river rushing along, the sun breasting the top of the northern hills to shine down in its full glory. In the distance, the city caught the light of the new day and sent back a thousand glittering reflections. Towers and spires, windows and arches, domes and columns, glass and brass, silver and gold, copper and bronze, crystal and shell, bead and stone, all were illuminated at once, and Ayodhya blazed like a beacon of gold fire, filling the valley with a luminous glow. In the light of this glorious new day, it was easy to dismiss the nightmare as just that, a bad dream. And yet ... he could still hear the sound of Sita's voice, hear her last words, see her engulfed by the pillar of fire as it descended into the embrace of the earth—

He stopped and sighed.

He straightened and stared at the city. His beloved Ayodhya resplendent in the sunlight of a new day, a new season, a new harvest year. He walked forward, eyes fixed on the blazing city. Before they had grown old enough to be sent to gurukul, he and his brothers had spent any number of days here in the shade of this mango grove. Playing, fighting, racing, all the things that young boys and young princes alike were wont to do. He had come here today hoping these nostalgically familiar environs would cleanse his mind of the nightmare that life itself seemed to have become. So far he hadn't been entirely successful. He hadn't expected to be.

His feet found the edge of the knoll and he stopped, poised ten yards or more above the raging river. It was the point where the Sarayu roared around a bend in the valley, tumbling over rocks and boulders with the haste and energy of a river still in the first stage of its lengthy course. The sound was thunder sustained. He spread his arms, raised his face to the warm golden sunlight, and laughed. Droplets of spray drifted up slowly, catching his hair and simple white dhoti, like diamonds glittering in the sunlight.

“Bhai.”

He turned to see Lakshman standing behind him. Clad in a white anga-vastra as was Rama.

“It is time.”

They walked down together to the riverbank. There were great numbers of people lined along the bank on either side. The lines stretched back to the raj-marg and all along its length back to the city itself. Tens of thousands upon thousands...lakhs...millions in fact. The entire population of the city. He looked at the city one last time, intending to fix it in his memory. But from this angle, the overhang of the bank on the far side obstructed the view. The deep red light of the setting sun in the west obscured what little was visible. Perhaps it was better that way. To have seen those familiar towers and arches, the palace, the walls, the Seer's Eye...perhaps they were better remembered in his mind's eye as they were. As all things were. In memory, evergreen. Perfect. Immutable.

Maharishi Valmiki had agreed to preside over the ritual. The other purohitas of the city were present as well. At his nod, all the brahmins began chanting the ritual Sanskrit shlokas together, their voices rising to rival the roar of the river. Yet as Rama walked towards the edge of the bank, the Sarayu's song was louder by far. She was calling to him. Come to me, my son. Come and sleep awhile. A season of rest.

Perhaps Sita would be waiting for him there, beyond the river's end, beyond sleep.

He entered the river. The water was icy cold but that was good. The shock awakened his senses, made him aware of every sensation. The wind on his fevered scalp. The fading sunlight on his cheek and ear. The smell of jasmine blossoms on the evening air. The sound of parrots or monkeys or both squabbling in the trees.

The brahmin's chanting reached a crescendo. Everybody had joined their palms together and was chanting along. Rama saw Hanuman looking at him, hands joined together in supplication. The vanar's eyes were shedding tears freely. Rama smiled sadly at him. Hanuman did not smile back: vanars could not smile. Yet they could cry. Strange, wasn't it?

Rama stepped further into the river. So this was samadhi. The ritual immersion into flowing water as a voluntary end to one's life. A literal crossing over to another state of being. What had his karma in this and previous lifetimes earned him thus far? The right to be reborn as another mortal or some other species? The right to moksha, that final liberation from the cycle of birth and rebirth? He saw Luv and Kush, faces drawn and severe, standing with Nakhudi and Bejoo, who was now elevated to Minister of Peace, a new post he had instated before stepping down from the throne. Nakhudi was personal bodyguard to the twins, Captain of the new King's Guardians. With the help of Saprem Senapati Shirisha Kumar, great-grandson of Senapati Dheeraj Kumar and grandson of Senapati Drishti Kumar, perhaps they might usher in a new era for Kosala and Ayodhya. An age of peace. He hoped the twins would learn more from their newly discovered adoptive grandfather Janak of Mithila than from himself. Ram Rajya was a great period in the city-kingdom's history, but its time was past. Perhaps there had never been a time for it at all.

He took another step and the water embraced him like a cold lover. She swirled around him, dancing and rushing and washing over him with icy tendrils. He felt his extremities grow colder, his heartbeat slow, his pulse slow, his brow feel more feverish, almost burning hot.

The decision to take samadhi had been his own. His brothers had insisted on following in his steps. None of them wished to rule in his stead. And the entire populace had chosen to follow as well. He had considered issuing some kind of a writ or diktat, forbidding everyone from doing as he did but it would be pointless once he was gone. Besides, yatha raja tatha praja. They had lived by that law and now they were willing to die by it.

Except that this was not death. Not exactly. It was transmogrification. They believed that by following their god-like emperor into the afterlife they would be achieving transmogrification of their mortal souls into eternal states of being. Who was he to disprove their belief? The truth was even he did not know what lay beyond. All he knew was that there was nothing left in this world for him to live for. He had come to his senses in the nick of time, but had Sita and her sons not intervened and Jabali and his evil cronies Aarohan and his men not tried to hasten things by force and manipulation, he might have authorized a war against Videha. And after Videha, perhaps even the other Arya nations. And after that, what? Then what would be the difference between Rama and Ravana except a few syllables?

Samadhi ensured that he sought a higher plane of existence. It was an honorable way to pass on. He could not have endured the idea of vanaprasthashrama, forest retirement, as was the custom among kings of his line. For he had already spent the better part of his life in forest retirement—forced retirement, that too, without so much as a pension. Nor did he wish to remain in Ayodhya and watch his sons rule—every moment with them would lead to questions of whether to do things Rama’s way or their way. Now, nobody could raise that question. There would be only their way, and that was the way it ought to be. He would have liked to watch them grow to manhood but each day with them would have been a day without Sita. And in their eyes he could still see the reflected flames of Sita’s final agni-pariksha reflected, burning deep in their hearts, just as his own youthful anger at his mother’s treatment had burned in his eyes when he had looked at his father Dasaratha in days gone by. Because he had been a son himself, he knew what they felt. Because he had seen his mother suffer his father’s mistakes, he knew how they felt about him, their father. And he could not live with that knowledge nor could he make things right with them. That moment had passed. That opportunity was lost forever.

The only way ahead for him was to seek other worlds, other lives.

Samadhi.

He took another step and the water closed completely over his head, submerging him. He heard a collective gasp from the assembled crowd and the word was passed on that Rama had gone under the river. He heard no more except the gurgling of the water and the buffeting of the tide which felt oddly like a powerful wind. The water was crystal clear and he could still see the evening sky. Birds flew overhead, silhouetted against the evening redness. He saw faces and bodies moving, heard the murmur of voices—or perhaps they were only the voices of the river speaking to him.

His feet found the bottom of the river. He was yards underwater now. The sky was no longer visible, the rushing water overhead obscuring all vision. He heard and felt a splash beside him and saw another man's form sink slowly to land on the bottom of the river beside him. It was Lakshman, his eyes open as well, still holding his breath. He gestured at Rama. Rama nodded and gestured, indicating that they should move forward.

Then a strange thing happened.

A great blue light blazed up from the depths of the river, like a standing rectangle of deep midnight-blue illumination glowing brightly. Like a doorway without any substance, just inky blue light spilling through. From where? How?

He did not know. The inky blue light shaped like a doorway stood ahead on the floor of the river. Behind it was pitch darkness as if the river itself ended there, although he knew that was impossible.

Vortal. That is a Vortal. The name came to him unbidden. He had no idea what it meant.

I have been expecting you, Ayodhya-naresh. Come towards the Vortal.

He did not look around to see who had spoken. The voice was in his mind. He glanced at Lakshman and saw from his brother's face that he had heard the voice too. It had spoken in Lakshman's mind as well.

Two more splashes behind them: Bharat and Shatrugan. They came up beside Lakshman and Rama saw that they were looking at the Vortal too. They had heard the voice as well.

Yes, this is the way. You are to go through the Vortal now. One by one. Come.

They looked at one another.

Do not fear. This is inevitable. It was ordained for you from eons before your birth on this realm.

Rama nodded to his brothers then walked towards the Vortal. If this was what he was meant to do then he may as well do it. In any case, he had come here seeking something. He had not known what. It seemed he had found it.

At the place where the blue light met the Sarayu's water, the effect was most peculiar. As if the water and light met...and merged. There was a point where he could see that the molecules were neither entirely water nor entirely light. They were...something else.

Brahman. Pure brahman.

Yes, Vaikunta-naresh. The Vortal is composed of pure brahman. It is a portal between possible worlds. Go on through. It is the reason why you chose this way to end your mortal existence in this plane.

Rama stood before the Vortal. He felt Lakshman come up behind him, waiting.

Rama stepped through. It felt like stepping through water into...

Light. Bright infinite light. Light of no color. Perfect. Extending in every direction. Originating from nowhere.

He felt a strange sensation within himself, then a repetition of the sensation, then another. It happened thrice in all.

When he looked back, his brothers were gone. As was the Vortal. As was the river itself.

The entire mortal world had vanished.

And so had his brothers.

Because here we are all one being...I.

His voice sounded strange in his own mind.

He heard a fluttering from above and looked up to see a great magnificent being descending. He knew instinctively that this was Garuda, his friend and carrier.

Garuda bowed down before him.

Rama climbed aboard.

Garuda flapped his wings and rose up into the air, into the infinite light without beginning or end, origin or limit.

Take me home, Garuda, Vishnu heard himself say. My heart longs to see my Devi Lakshmi again. I have been too long away from her, playing this game of gods and demons. My work there on earth is done for now. Take me home.

His voice no longer sounded strange to himself. It sounded natural as it had always sounded.

The bird-carrier rose up into the infinite light, carrying the being named Vishnu who had once been Rama.

In a flash of an eye-wink they were lost to human sight and mind, passing beyond the extent of mortal understanding or knowledge.

Jai Shri Vishnu.
Jai Shri Lakshmi.
Jai Shri Hindmata.

AKB eBOOKS
Home of the epics!

RAMAYANA SERIES®

PRINCE OF DHARMA

PRINCE OF AYODHYA & SIEGE OF MITHILA

PRINCE IN EXILE

DEMONS OF CHITRAKUT & ARMIES OF HANUMAN

PRINCE AT WAR

BRIDGE OF RAMA & KING OF AYODHYA

KING OF DHARMA

VENGEANCE OF RAVANA & SONS OF SITA

KRISHNA CORIOLIS SERIES

SLAYER OF KAMSA

DANCE OF GOVINDA

FLUTE OF VRINDAVAN

LORD OF MATHURA

FORTRESS OF DWARKA

CHARIOT OF ARJUNA

RIDER OF GARUDA

LORD OF VAIKUNTA

MAHABHARATA SERIES®

THE FOREST OF STORIES
THE SEEDS OF WAR
THE CHILDREN OF MIDNIGHT
(& 15 more volumes)

MUMBAI NOIR
THE IRON BRA
TEN DEAD ADMEN
MURDER & CHAMPAGNE
A BLOOD RED SAREE
THE ARBITRATOR

GODS OF WAR
VORTAL:SHOCWAVE
VERTIGO
TEN KINGS
SAFFRON WHITE GREEN

NON-FICTION
RAMA: THE MAN BEHIND THE MYTH
THE VALMIKI SYNDROME

& MUCH, MUCH MORE!

only from

AKB eBOOKS

www.ashokbanker.com