Any streaming service has ads for a couple of reasons. Some programming on Hulu has ads due to different agreements that secured the streaming rights. For example, Hulu might agree to share ad revenue with the creator of a series, and the deal requires that the show always runs with ads regardless of subscription plan. Hulu's Live TV and Cloud DVR features also include ad breaks. As for why the ads are there at all, the simple answers are that hosting streaming services with so much programming is expensive, and ads also help companies offer cheaper, more competitive subscription tiers that the extra revenue can help subsidize.
