The Founding Father Who Predicted America's Future

by Robb McLean (Nebraska free State)

Two hundred and fifty years ago, before the ink on the Constitution had even dried, one man warned what would happen if America forgot why it was founded. That man was John Adams — fiery patriot, lawyer, president, and arguably the most brutally honest of all the Founding Fathers. Adams didn't just fight for independence. He fought for character. And what he said then... feels like it was written for us today.

“Our Constitution was made only for a moral and religious people. It is wholly inadequate to the government of any other.”

Those words weren't meant as a sermon. They were a warning. Adams believed the success of America would never depend solely on laws, armies, or elections — but on something far more fragile: the virtue of its people. He'd seen the dangers of power firsthand. He knew how revolutions started with fire in the heart — and ended in flames when greed, pride, and division took over. So he asked a question that still echoes across centuries:

“Can a nation remain free if it loses its moral compass?”

When Adams looked at the early republic, he saw a fragile experiment — something brand new in world history. Every empire before had been ruled by kings, conquerors, or strongmen. But America dared to try something radical: A government ruled not by power, but by principle. And that terrified Adams. He wrote in 1776:

“The preservation of liberty depends on the intellectual and moral character of the people. As long as knowledge and virtue are diffused generally among the body of a nation, it can never be enslaved.”

In other words — if the people stayed informed, stayed grounded, and stayed decent — no tyrant could ever rule them. But what if those virtues faded? What if freedom became entitlement, and self-interest replaced sacrifice? Then tyranny wouldn't come by invasion. It would rise from within.

Adams wasn't a dreamer like Jefferson or a legend like Washington. He was the realist, the worrier, the one who could see the cracks before anyone else noticed them. He and Jefferson started as allies — united by revolution, separated by politics, and later reconciled as friends. Their letters, written in old age, are haunting to read today. Adams warned of division, of people choosing party over country. Jefferson, ever the optimist, believed education and reason would prevail. But Adams had seen too much of human nature to be so sure. It wasn't cynicism. It was heartbreak — the kind that comes from loving something enough to fear for its future.

“There never was a democracy yet that did not commit suicide,” he once said. “It is in the nature of democracy to envy, to divide, to tear itself apart from within.”

When you read Adams' words now — in an era of constant outrage, information wars, and echo chambers — it's hard not to feel a chill. He predicted that once citizens stopped educating themselves, they'd become easy prey for manipulation. He warned that when people cared more about comfort than courage, liberty would decay from the inside out. And he foresaw that when factions cared more about winning than truth, democracy would falter. Sound familiar?

Adams believed freedom required discipline — the same kind that carried soldiers through the winter at Valley Forge or drove farmers to fight for ideals they could barely afford to dream of. Freedom, he said, isn't self-sustaining. It has to be earned — again and again — by each generation.

"So, having documented the key instances where it was necessary for the Interim Government to give Lawful notice to the de facto UNITED STATES corporation, and acknowledging that we continue to operate parallel to said corporation, we see no current requirement to give further notice. Let it be known that any agent (or officer of the Republic), unless authorized by the President in writing, has no Lawful authority from the Republic to serve notice on de facto officers on behalf of the Republic; and, if they do so, then they are acting in their own private capacity and DO NOT represent the Republic."
