The breakdown by congressional district.

In the 2020 general election, voter turnout in Washington State reached 84.1%, just shy of the alltime record of 84.6% set in 2008. The turnout varied across the state, with counties in both Eastern and Western Washington showing high levels of participation. The top 2 counties were both in Western Washington, the bottom 5 turnout were all in Eastern Washington.

This charts the overall turnout on Presidential election years since 1980

While turnout was good across the state, in Eastern Washington some of the counties lagged behind the rest of the state.

1. Negative Advertising and Political Disillusionment: Some voters in Eastern Washington, particularly in conservative areas, may have been turned off by negative political advertising. Additionally, the contentious political climate, including concerns about voter fraud, may have led to voter disillusionment and a decision by some to stay home rather than participate in the election (Cascade PBS News).

- 2. Lack of Competitive Races: In certain areas, like the 4th Congressional District, where incumbent Rep. Dan Newhouse (R) was easily re-elected despite facing primary challenges, the perceived lack of competitiveness may have reduced voter motivation to turn out (Cascade PBS News).
- 3. Belief in Voter Fraud: Some conservative voters might have been influenced by narratives of widespread voter fraud, leading to a belief that their votes would not count. This skepticism about the electoral process could have contributed to lower participation rates (Cascade PBS News).

To address voter disillusionment, especially for moderate voters who feel silenced by the vocal majority, we need ing not to vote, moderates to vote, by choosing not to vote we are essentially letting politicians think that the public is in favor of the extremes. We are allowing our criteria for voting to be dictated by media and campaigns who avoid the subjects where they do not shine. Consider what are the most important issues in your life and find the candidate who will make a difference.
