Chapter 3:

What Are The Causes

Synopsis

Broadly speaking, it takes a combination of matters to develop binge eating and compulsive eating — including an individual's genes, emotions, and experience.

What Brings It On

Biological grounds of binge eating

Biological abnormal conditions may contribute to binge eating. For instance, the hypothalamus (the component of the brain that commands appetite) might not be sending off correct messages about hunger and being full. Lastly, there's evidence that low levels of the brain chemical serotonin play a part in compulsive eating.

Social and cultural grounds of binge eating

A few research workers likewise attribute it to excessive neurological sensitivity in taste and/or smell.

Fatty foods might cause cocaine-like addiction. Taking drugs like cocaine and consuming too much junk food both bit by bit overload the supposed pleasure centers in the brain. Eventually the pleasure centers "crash," and accomplishing the same pleasure-or even simply feeling normal-calls for increasing amounts of the drug or food.

Chapter 4:

Chapter 5:

Stress Reduction

Synopsis

It might feel that there's nothing you are able to do about your stress level. The bills aren't going to quit coming, there will never be additional hours in the day for all your errands, and your job or family obligations will always be demanding.

But you have a lot more command than you may think. As a matter of fact, the simple realization that you're in command of your life is the foundation of stress management and getting control of your eating.

Unwind

Handling stress is all about taking control: taking hold of your thoughts, your emotions, your schedule, your surroundings, and the way you deal with issues. The elemental goal is a balanced life, with time for work, relationships, relaxation, and merriment – plus the resiliency to hold up under pressure and meet challenges head on.

Stress management begins with identifying the sources of tension in your life. This isn't as simple as it sounds. Your genuine sources of stress aren't always visible, and it's all too simple to miss your own stress-inducing thoughts, beliefs, and behaviors.

Sure, you might know that you're always worried about work deadlines. But perhaps it's your procrastination, instead of the genuine job demands, that leads to deadline tension.

To distinguish your real sources of stress, look closely at your habits, mental attitude, and excuses:

- Do you excuse away tension as temporary (“I simply have a million things going on today”) even though you can't recall the last time you rested?
- Do you specify tension as an integral part of your work or household life (“Things are constantly loony around here”) or as a function of your personality (“I have a lot of anxious energy, that's all”).
- Do you blame your tension on others or exterior events, or view it as totally common place and unexceptional?

Till you accept responsibility for the role you play in producing or maintaining it, your tension level will remain outside your command.

Start a stress journal

A stress journal may help you identify the steady stressors in your life and the way you handle them. Every time you feel strained, track it in your journal. As you maintain a daily log, you'll begin to see patterns and standard themes. Write down:

- What induced your tension (make a guess if you're unsure).
- How you felt, both physically and emotionally.
- How you behaved in response.
- What you executed to make yourself feel better.
- View how you presently cope with tension

Consider the ways you presently handle and cope with tension in your life. Your stress journal may help you distinguish them. Are your coping techniques healthy or unhealthy, helpful or unproductive? Regrettably, a lot of individuals cope with tension in ways that compound the issue.

Unhealthy ways of confronting tension

These coping techniques might temporarily reduce stress, but they cause more damage in the long haul:

- Smoking
- Drinking overmuch
- Overeating or under eating
- Zoning out for hours in front of the television set or PC

- Withdrawing from acquaintances, loved ones, and activities
- Utilizing pills or drugs to unwind
- Sleeping a bit much
- Dilly-dallying
- Filling each minute of the day to avoid facing issues
- Taking out your tension on other people (lashing out, furious outbursts, physical violence)

Acquiring healthier ways to handle stress

If your techniques of tackling stress aren't contributing to your better emotional and physical health, it's time to discover healthier ones. There are a lot of healthy ways to handle and cope with tension, but they all call for change. You are able to either alter the situation or alter your reaction.

When choosing which option to select, it's helpful to consider the 4 as: avoid, alter, adapt, or accept.

Since everybody has a unique reaction to stress, there's no "one size fits all" solution to handling it. No single technique works for everybody or in each situation, so experiment with different strategies and techniques. Center on what makes you feel calm and in control.

Dealing with nerve-racking spots: The Four A's

Tension management technique #1: Avoid unneeded tension

Not all tension may be avoided, and it's not healthy to keep away from a situation that needs to be addressed. You might be amazed, however, by the number of stressors in your life that you are able to eliminate.

Learn how to say “no” – understand your limits and stick with them. Whether in your personal or business life, refuse to take on added responsibilities when you’re close to accomplishing them. Accepting more than you are able to handle is a surefire recipe for tension.

Avoid individuals who stress you out – If somebody constantly causes tension in your life and you can’t turn the relationship around, confine the amount of time you spend with that individual or end the relationship totally.

Take charge of your surroundings – If the evening news makes you nervous, turn the television off. If traffic’s got you strained, take a longer but less-traveled road. If going to the grocery is an objectionable chore, do your grocery shopping online.

Keep away from hot-button topics – If you get distressed over religion or politics, cross them off your conversation list. If you repeatedly debate about the same matter with the same individuals, quit bringing it up or excuse yourself when it’s the subject of discussion.

Pare your to-do list – examine your schedule, obligations, and daily tasks. If you’ve got too much on your plate, differentiate between the “shoulds” and the “musts.”

Cut down tasks that aren’t really essential to the bottom of the list or eliminate them totally.

Tension management technique #2: Alter the situation

If you can't keep away from a stressful situation, attempt to change it. Work out what you are able to do to alter things so the issue doesn't present itself in the future. Frequently, this calls for altering the way you communicate and operate in your everyday life.

Convey your feelings rather than bottling them up. If something or somebody is bothering you, communicate your worries in an open and respectful way. If you don't vocalize your feelings, resentment will build up and the situation will likely stay the same.

Be amenable to compromise. When you ask somebody to alter their behavior, be willing to do the same. If you both are amenable to bend leastwise a little, you'll have a great chance of discovering a happy middle ground.

Be more self-asserting. Don't take a backseat in your own life. Deal with issues head on, doing your best to predict and prevent them. If you've got a test to study for and your gabby roommate just got home, say up front that you merely have 5 minutes to talk.

Handle your time better. Poor time management may cause much tension. When you're stretched out too thin and running behind, it's difficult to remain calm and centered. But if you plan ahead and make certain you don't overstrain yourself, you may alter the amount of tension you're under.

Tension management technique #3: Adapt to the stressor

If you can't alter the stressor, alter yourself. You may adapt to nerve-racking situations and retrieve your sense of control by altering your expectations and attitude.

Reframe issues. Attempt to view nerve-racking situations from a more positive position. Instead of fuming about a traffic jam, view it as a chance to pause and regroup, listen to your favorite radio station, or savor some alone time.

View the big picture. Take perspective of the nerve-racking situation. Ask yourself how crucial it will be in the long-term. Will it matter in a month? A year? Is it truly worth getting upset over? If the answer is no, center your time and energy elsewhere.

Adapt your standards. Perfectionism is a major source of avertable stress. Quit setting yourself up for failure by calling for perfection. Arrange reasonable standards for yourself and other people, and learn to be all right with "good enough."

Center on the positive. When tension is getting you down, take a minute to reflect on all the matters you appreciate in your life, including your own favorable qualities and gifts. This easy strategy may help you keep things in perspective.

Correcting Your Attitude

How you think may have a profound effect on your emotional and physical welfare. Every time you think a damaging thought about yourself, your body reacts as though it were in the throes of a tension-filled situation. If you see great things about yourself, you're more likely to feel great; the reverse is likewise true.

Eliminate words like "always," "never," "should," and "must." These are telltale marks of self-defeating thoughts.

Tension management technique #4: Accept the things you can't alter

A few sources of tension are unavoidable. You can't prevent or alter stressors like the death of a loved one, a grave illness, or a national recession. In these cases, the best way to cope with tension is to accept things as they are. Acceptance might be hard, but in the long haul, it's easier than railing against a situation you can't alter.

Don't attempt to control the uncontrollable. A lot of things in life are beyond our control— especially the behavior of others. Instead of stressing out over them, center on the things you may control like the way you decide to react to issues.

Seek the upside. As the saying goes, "What doesn't kill us makes us stronger." When confronting major challenges, try to view them as chances for personal growth. If your own poor choices contributed to a nerve-racking situation, reflect on them and learn from your errors.

Share your feelings. Talk to a trusted acquaintance or make an appointment with a therapist. Conveying what you're experiencing may be very releasing, even if there's nothing you may do to alter the trying situation.

Learn to forgive. Accept the fact that we live in a fallible world and that humans make errors. Release anger and resentments. Free yourself from damaging energy by forgiving and moving on.

Tension management technique #5: Make time for fun and rest

Beyond a take control approach and a positive attitude, you may reduce tension in your life by nurturing yourself. If you regularly make time for fun and rest, you'll be in a better place to handle life's stressors when they unavoidably come.

Fit ways to relax and recharge

- Walk.
- Spend time in nature.
- Call a great friend.
- Workout.
- Write in your journal.
- Take a long bath.
- Light candles.
- Savor a warm cup of coffee or tea.
- Play with a pet.
- Garden.
- Get a massage.
- A good book.
- Listen to music.
- Watch a comedy.

Don't get so caught up in life that you forget to take care of your own needs. Nurturing yourself is a requirement, not a luxury.

Allow relaxation time. Include rest and relaxation in your daily docket. Don't let other obligations infringe. This is your time to take a break from all obligations and reload your batteries.

Connect with other people. Spend time with positive individuals who heighten your life. A strong support system will buffer you from the damaging effects of tension.

Do something you love daily. Make time for leisure activities that bring you delight.

Keep your humor. This includes the ability to laugh at yourself. The act of expressing joy helps your body fight stress in a number of ways.

Tension management technique #6: Adopt a healthy lifestyle

You may better your resistance to tension by strengthening your physical health.

Work out regularly. Physical activity plays a chief role in reducing and preventing the effects of tension. Make time for at least half-hour of exercise, 3 times weekly. Nothing beats aerobics for releasing pent-up tension.

Eat a sound diet. Well-nourished bodies are better fixed to cope with tension, so be mindful of what you eat. Begin your day right with breakfast, and keep your vitality up and your mind clear with balanced, nutritious meals during the day.

Cut down caffeine and sugar. The temporary "highs" caffeine and sugar supply frequently end in with a crash in mood and energy. By cutting down the amount of coffee, soft drinks, chocolate, and sugar snacks in your diet, you'll feel more at ease and you'll sleep better.

Keep away from alcohol, cigarettes, and drugs. Self-medicating with alcohol or drugs might supply an easy escape from tension, but the relief is only temporary. Don't avoid or block out the issue at hand; deal with issues head on and with a clear mind.

Get adequate sleep. Adequate sleep fuels your brain, as well as your body. Feeling tired will step-up your tension as it might cause you to think irrationally.
