Health Checks

- Pre-class health screening of teachers and students (e.g., taking one's temperature):

Temperature checks via a touchless infrared thermometer of every individual, including staff, teachers, volunteers, students, and practitioners will be taken at the studio. The studio has one and will train teachers.

Teachers and students will be notified to check temperatures before coming to classes.

The CDC has recommended regular health checks, including temperature checks to identify individuals with a fever, as a community mitigation strategy to slow virus transmission. It defines a fever as a measured temperature of 100.4 degrees. Notices not to come if temperature is 100.4 degrees or higher will be given to teachers and students.

- Screening Questions:
 - When individuals—staff, teachers, volunteers, students, or practitioners—arrive, teachers will ask questions of each person or make an announcement:
 - Have you had a cough?

Have you had a fever?

Do you live with anyone who is sick or quarantined?

If anyone answers affirmatively, they cannot take the class in person and will be issued a credit for an online class to take a future date. Posters will be displayed with this information to remind clients before the announcement.
