The story of the Doughnut

The modern doughnut was invented by a sailor, a Dutchman named Hanson Gregory. His mother, Elizabeth, was known to make a good "oily cake." She made some for him to take on one of his voyages, and she also gave him the recipe, so his cook could make some more.

These cakes didn't have holes in them, however. He invented the donut by impaling one of the cakes on the ship's steering wheel, to keep his hands free in a sudden storm, on June 22, 1847. Gregory discovered that he liked the cake better with a hole in the middle and ordered his cook to make them that way for the rest of the voyage.

Doughnut is the English term. There are similar creations in other countries like (Aebleskiver, Danish doughnut look-alikes that have a slice of apple inside; Beignet, a French version of the doughnut; Berliners German versions of doughnuts, usually filled with jelly; Oliebollen, a Dutch treat that contains a slice of apple and usually raisins and is traditionally served to celebrate the New Year; Zeppole, an Italian doughnut).

Doughnuts traditionally are circular and have a hole in the middle. Doughnuts gained in popularity in the U.S. after World War I. A New York businessman named Adolph Levitt invented the doughnut machine
